 1966 “The Treaty Background of Hebrew Yāda.” Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 181:31–37.
- Hultgren, A. J.
 1982 “The Johannine Footwashing (13.1–11) as Symbol of Eschatological Hospitality.” New Testament Studies 28:539–46.
- p 622 Humphreys, C. J., and W. G. Waddington
 1992 “The Jewish Calendar, a Lunar Eclipse, and the Date of Christ’s Crucifixion.” Tyndale Bulletin 43:331–51.
- Hunter, W. B.
 1979 “The Prayers of Jesus in the Gospel of John.” Ph.D. diss., University of Aberdeen.
 1985 “Contextual and Genre Implications for the Historicity of John 11:41b–42.” Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 28:53–70.
- Hurtado, L. W.
 1998a “First-Century Jewish Monotheism.” Journal for the Study of the New Testament

- 71:3–26.
- 1998b One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism. Edinburgh: Clark.
- 1999 “Pre-70 C.E. Jewish Opposition to Christ-Devotion.” Journal of Theological Studies 50:35–58.
- ISBE The International Standard Bible Encyclopedia. Edited by G. W. Bromiley et al. 4 vols. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979–88.
- Jackson, H. M.
- 1999 “Ancient Self-Referential Conventions and Their Implications for the Authorship and Integrity of the Gospel of John.” Journal of Theological Studies 50:1–34.
- Jensen, E. E.
- 1941 “The First Century Controversy over Jesus as a Revolutionary Figure.” Journal of Biblical Literature 60:261–72.
- Jeremias, J.
- 1966a The Eucharistic Words of Jesus. London: SCM.
- 1966b The Rediscovery of Bethesda. Louisville: Southern Baptist Seminary.
- 1968 “Lampades in Matthew 25:1–13.” Pp. 83–87 in Soli Deo Gloria: New Testament Studies in Honor of William Childs Robinson. Edited by J. M. Richards. Richmond: John Knox.
- 1969 Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus. London: SCM.
- 1971 New Testament Theology. London: SCM.
- Jervell, J.
- 1956 “‘Er kam in sein Eigentum’: zum Joh 1, 11.” Studia Theologica 10:14–27.
- Johnson, B.
- 2001 “The Temple in the Gospel of John.” Pp. 110–33 in Christ’s Victorious Church: Essays on Biblical Ecclesiology and Eschatology in Honor of Tom Friskney. Edited by J. A. Weatherly. Eugene, Ore.: Wipf & Stock.
- Johnston, E. D.
- 1962 “The Johannine Version of the Feeding of the Five Thousand: An Independent Tradition?” New Testament Studies 8:151–54.
- Johnston, G.
- 1970 The Spirit-Paraclete in the Gospel of John. Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 12. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Jonge, M. de
- 1971 “Nicodemus and Jesus: Some Observations on Misunderstanding and Understanding in the Fourth Gospel.” Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 53:337–59.
- Julian, P.
- 2000 Jesus and Nicodemus: A Literary and Narrative Exegesis of Jn. 2, 23–3, 36. European University Studies 23/171. Frankfurt: Lang.
- Jungkuntz, R.
- 1964 “Approach to the Exegesis of John 10:34–36.” Currents in Theology and Mission 35:556–65.

- Käsemann, E.
1968 The Testament of Jesus. Translated by G. Krodel. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Katz, P.
1997 “Wieso gerade nach Efrajim? (Erwägungen zu Jh 11, 54).” Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 88:130–34.
- Keener, C. S.
1993 Bible Background Commentary: New Testament. Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity.
1999 “Is Subordination within the Trinity Really Heresy? A Study of John 5:18 in Context.” Trinity Journal, n.s., 20:39–51.
2003 The Gospel of John. 2 vols. Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson.
- p 623 Kellum, L. S.
2005 The Unity of the Farewell Discourse: The Literary Integrity of John 13:31–16:33. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 256. London/New York: Clark.
- Kenyon, F.
1939 Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts. London: Eyre & Spottiswoode.
- Kerr, A. R.
2002 The Temple of Jesus’ Body: The Temple Theme in the Gospel of John. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 220. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Kessler, W. T.
1998 Peter as the First Witness of the Risen Lord. Rome: Gregorian University Press.
- Kilpatrick, G. D.
1963 “John IV.51 Παῖς or Ὑἱός?” Journal of Theological Studies 14:393.
- Kippenberg, H. G.
1971 Garizim und Synagoge: Traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen zur samaritanischen Religion der aramaischen Periode. Religionsgeschichtliche Versuche und Vorarbeiten 30. Berlin: de Gruyter.
- Klaiber, W.
1990 “Der irdische und der himmlische Zeuge.” New Testament Studies 36:205–33.
- Klausner, J.
1925 Jesus of Nazareth. London: Allen & Unwin.
- Klein, W. W., C. L. Blomberg, and R. L. Hubbard Jr.
1993 Introduction to Biblical Interpretation. Dallas: Word.
- Knapp, H. M.
1997 “The Messianic Water Which Gives Life to the World.” Horizons in Biblical Theology 19:109–21.
- Koester, C. R.
1990a “Messianic Exegesis and the Call of Nathanael (John 1.45–51).” Journal for the Study of the New Testament 39:23–34.
1990b “‘The Savior of the World’ (John 4:42).” Journal of Biblical Literature 109:665–

- 80.
- 2003 Symbolism in the Fourth Gospel: Meaning, Mystery, Community. 2d edition. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Koester, H.
1989 "Hearing, Seeing, and Believing in the Gospel of John." Biblica 70:327–48.
- Kopp, C.
1963 The Holy Places of the Gospels. Edinburgh/London: Nelson.
- Kosmala, H.
1963 "The Time of the Cock-Crow." Annual of the Swedish Theological Institute 2:118–20.
1967–68 "The Time of the Cock-Crow (II)." Annual of the Swedish Theological Institute 6:132–34.
- Kossen, H. B.
1970 "Who Were the Greeks of John XII 20?" Pp. 97–110 in Studies in John: Presented to Professor Dr. J. N. Sevenster on the Occasion of His Seventieth Birthday. Novum Testamentum Supplements 24. Leiden: Brill.
- Köstenberger, A. J.
1995a "The 'Greater Works' of the Believer according to John 14:12." Didaskalia 6:36–45.
1995b "The Seventh Johannine Sign: A Study in John's Christology." Bulletin for Biblical Research 5:87–103.
1996 "Review of Martin Hengel, Die johanneische Frage." Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 39:154–55.
1997 "What Does It Mean to Be Filled with the Spirit?" Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 40:229–40.
1998a "Jesus as Rabbi in the Fourth Gospel." Bulletin for Biblical Research 8:97–128.
1998b The Missions of Jesus and the Disciples according to the Fourth Gospel. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
1999a Encountering John: The Gospel in Historical, Literary, and Theological Perspective. Encountering Biblical Studies. Grand Rapids: Baker.
1999b "Review of David R. Beck, The Discipleship Paradigm." Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 42:749–51.
1999c "The Two Johannine Verbs for Sending: A Study of John's Use of Words with Reference to General Linguistic Theory." Pp. 125–43 in Linguistics and the New Testament: Critical Junctures. Edited by S. E. p 624 Porter and D. A. Carson. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 168. Studies in New Testament Greek 5. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
2000 "John." Pp. 280–85 in New Dictionary of Biblical Theology. Edited by D. Alexander and B. Rosner. Leicester: Inter-Varsity/Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity.
2001a "Review of Andrew Lincoln, Truth on Trial." Trinity Journal, n.s., 22:269–72.
2001b Studies on John and Gender: A Decade of Scholarship. Studies in Biblical Literature 38. New York: Lang.
2002a "Diversity and Unity in the New Testament." Pp. 144–58 in Biblical Theology: Retrospect and Prospect. Edited by S. J. Hafemann. Downers Grove, Ill.:

- InterVarsity.
- 2002b "Jesus the Good Shepherd Who Will Also Bring Other Sheep (John 10:16): The Old Testament Background of a Familiar Metaphor." Bulletin for Biblical Research 12:67–96.
- 2002c "John." Vol. 2 / pp. 1–216 in Zondervan Illustrated Bible Background Commentary: New Testament. Edited by C. E. Arnold. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
- 2002d "Review of Marianne Meye Thompson, The God of the Gospel of John." Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 45:521–24.
- 2003 "Translating John's Gospel: Challenges and Opportunities." Pp. 347–64 in The Challenge of Bible Translation: Communicating God's Word to the World. Edited by G. G. Scorgie, M. L. Strauss, and S. M. Voth. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
- 2004 "'I Suppose' (Οἶμαι): The Conclusion of John's Gospel in Its Literary and Historical Context." Pp. 72–88 in The New Testament in Its First Century Setting: Essays on Context and Background in Honour of B. W. Winter on His 65th Birthday. Edited by P. J. Williams, A. D. Clarke, P. M. Head, and D. Instone-Brewer. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- forthcoming "The Destruction of the Second Temple and the Composition of the Fourth Gospel." In Historical and Literary Studies in John: Challenges to Prevailing Paradigms. Edited by P. Head and J. Lierman. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament. Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck.

Köstenberger, A. J., and P. T. O'Brien

- 2001 Salvation to the Ends of the Earth: A Biblical Theology of Mission. New Studies in Biblical Theology 11. Leicester: Apollos/Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity.

Kovacs, J. L.

- 1995 "'Now Shall the Ruler of This World Be Driven Out': Jesus' Death as Cosmic Battle in John 12:20–36." Journal of Biblical Literature 114:227–47.

Kraeling, C. H.

- 1946 "Christian Burial Urns." Biblical Archaeologist 9:18.

Kreitzer, L. J.

- 1998 "The Temple Incident of John 2.13–25: A Preview of What Is to Come." Pp. 92–101 in Understanding, Studying, and Reading: New Testament Essays in Honour of John Ashton. Edited by C. Rowland and C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 153. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.

Kruijf, T. C. de

- 1970 "The Glory of the Only Son (John I 14)." Pp. 111–23 in Studies in John: Presented to Professor Dr. J. N. Sevenster on the Occasion of His Seventieth Birthday. Novum Testamentum Supplements 24. Leiden: Brill.

Kruse, C. G.

- 2003 The Gospel according to John. Tyndale New Testament Commentary. Leicester: Inter-Varsity.

Küchler, M.

- 1999 "Zum 'Probatischen Becken' und zu 'Betsda mit den fünf Stoën.'" Pp. 381–90 in Judaica, Hellenistica et Christiana: Kleine Schriften II. By M. Hengel.

Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 109. Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck.

Kuhn, H.-W., and R. Arav

- 1991 "The Bethsaida Excavations: Historical and Archaeological Approaches." Pp. 77–106 in The Future of Early Christianity: p 625 Festschrift für H. Koester. Edited by B. A. Pearson. Minneapolis: Fortress.

Kuhn, K. G.

- 1957 "The Lord's Supper and the Communal Meal at Qumran." Pp. 65–93 in The Scrolls and the New Testament. Edited by K. Stendahl. New York: Harper.

Kundsin, K.

- 1925 Topologische Überlieferungstoffe im Johannes-Evangelium. Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments, Neue Folge 22. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Kurz, W. S.

- 1985 "Luke 22:14–38 and Greco-Roman and Biblical Farewell Addresses." Journal of Biblical Literature 104:251–68.
- 1990 Farewell Addresses in the New Testament. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press.
- 1997 "Intertextual Permutations of the Genesis Word in the Johannine Prologues." Pp. 179–90 in Early Christian Interpretation of the Scriptures of Israel: Investigations and Proposals. Edited by C. A. Evans and J. A. Sanders. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 148. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.

Kuyper, L. J.

- 1964 "Grace and Truth: An Old Testament Description of God and Its Use in the Johannine Gospel." Interpretation 18:3–19.

Kysar, R.

- 2002a "The De-historicizing of the Gospel of John." Paper presented at the annual meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature, Toronto, November 23–26.
- 2002b "Expulsion from the Synagogue: A Tale of a Theory." Paper presented at the annual meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature, Toronto, November 23–26.

Lacomara, A.

- 1974 "Deuteronomy and the Farewell Discourse (Jn 13:31–16:33)." Catholic Biblical Quarterly 36:65–84.

Ladd, G. E.

- 1993 A Theology of the New Testament. 2d edition. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

Lagrange, M.-J.

- 1925 Évangile selon Saint Jean. 2d edition. Paris: Gabalda.

Lamarche, P.

- 1964 "Le Prologue de Jean." Recherches de science religieuse 52:529–32.

Laney, J. C.

- 1989 "Abiding Is Believing: The Analogy of the Vine in John 15:1–6." Bibliotheca sacra 146:55–66.
- 1992 John. Moody Gospel Commentary. Chicago: Moody.

La Potterie, I. de

- 1977 La vérité dans Saint Jean. 2 vols. Rome: Biblical Institute Press.
1984 "Structure du Prologue de saint Jean." New Testament Studies 30:354–81.

Larsen, B.

- 2001 "An Interaction of Theology and Literature by Means of Archetypal Criticism with Reference to the Characters Jesus, Pilate, Thomas, the Jews, and Peter in the Gospel." Ph.D. diss., University of St. Andrews.

Lattey, C.

- 1953–54 "A Note on Cockcrow." Scripture 6:53–55.

Laughlin, J. C. H.

- 1993 "Capernaum: From Jesus' Time and After." Biblical Archaeology Review 19/5:54–61, 90.

Leaney, A. R. C.

- 1972 "The Johannine Paraclete and the Qumran Scrolls." Pp. 38–61 in John and Qumran. Edited by J. H. Charlesworth. London: Chapman.

Lee, D. A.

- 1994 The Symbolic Narratives of the Fourth Gospel: The Interplay of Form and Meaning. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 95. Sheffield: JSOT Press.
1995 "Partnership in Easter Faith: The Role of Mary Magdalene and Thomas in John 20." Journal for the Study of the New Testament 58:37–49.

Legasse, S.

- 1997 The Trial of Jesus. London: SCM.

Leidig, E.

- 1979 Jesu Gespräch mit der Samaritanerin und weitere Gespräche im Johannesevangelium. Theologische Dissertationen 15. Basel: Reinhardt Kommissionsverlag.
p 626 1980 "Natanael, ein Sohn des Tholomäus." Theologische Zeitschrift 36:374–75.

Levinskaya, I.

- 1996 The Book of Acts in Its Diaspora Setting. The Book of Acts in Its First Century Setting 5. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans/Carlisle: Paternoster.

Lieu, J. M.

- 1988 "Blindness in the Johannine Tradition." New Testament Studies 34:83–95.
1999 "Temple and Synagogue in John." New Testament Studies 45:51–69.

Lightfoot, J.

- 1859 A Commentary on the New Testament from the Talmud and Hebraica. 4 vols. Oxford: Oxford University Press. Reprinted Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson, 1989.

Lightfoot, R. H.

- 1956 St. John's Gospel. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Lincoln, A. T.

- 2000 Truth on Trial: The Lawsuit Motif in the Fourth Gospel. Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson.

Lindars, B.

- 1956 "The Composition of John xx." New Testament Studies 7:142–47.
1970 "Δικαιοσύνη in Jn 16.8 and 10." Pp. 275–85 in Mélanges bibliques en hommage au R. P. Béda Rigaux. Edited by A. Descamps and A. de Halleux. Gembloux: Duculot.
1971 Behind the Fourth Gospel. Studies in Creative Criticism 3. London: SPCK.
1972 The Gospel of John. New Century Bible. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans/London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott.
1981 "John and the Synoptic Gospels: A Test Case." New Testament Studies 29:287–94.
1992a "Capernaum Revisited: John 4, 46–53 and the Synoptics." Vol. 3 / pp. 1985–2000 in The Four Gospels 1992: Festschrift Frans Neirynck. Edited by F. van Segbroeck et al. Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologicarum lovaniensium 100. Leuven: Leuven University Press.
1992b "Rebuking the Spirit: A New Analysis of the Lazarus Story of John 11." New Testament Studies 38:89–104.

Liver, J.

- 1963 "The Half-Shekel Offering in Biblical and Post-biblical Literature." Harvard Theological Review 56:173–98.

Loader, W.

- 1991 "John 1:50–51 and the 'Greater Things' of Johannine Christology." Pp. 255–74 in Anfänge der Christologie: Festschrift für Ferdinand Hahn zum 65. Geburtstag. Edited by C. Breytenbach and H. Paulsen. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Loos, H. van der

- 1965 The Miracles of Jesus. Translated by T. S. Preston. Novum Testamentum Supplements 9. Leiden: Brill.

Louw, J. P.

- 1968 "Narrator of the Father: Ἐξηγεῖσθαι and Related Terms in Johannine Christology." Neotestamentica 2:32–40.
1986 "On Johannine Style." Neotestamentica 20:5–12.

Lowery, D. K.

- 2003 "Review of A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, 3d ed., by Walter Bauer [BDAG]." Bibliotheca sacra 160:119–21.

LSJ

- A Greek-English Lexicon*. By H. G. Liddell, R. Scott, and H. S. Jones. 9th edition. Oxford: Clarendon, 1968.

Lund, N. W.

- 1931 "The Influence of Chiasmus upon the Structure of the Gospels." Anglican Theological Review 13:42–46.

Luthardt, C. E.

- 1875 St. John the Author of the Fourth Gospel. Translated and revised by C. R. Gregory. Edinburgh: Clark.

Luther, M.

- 1957 Luther's Works, vol. 22: Sermons on the Gospel of St. John Chapters 1–4. Edited by J. Pelikan. Saint Louis: Concordia.

MacAdam, H. I.

- 1999 “Σκότος Ἐγένετο: Luke 3:1; 23:44 and Four First Century Solar Eclipses at Antioch.” Irish Biblical Studies 21:2–33.

Maccini, R. G.

- 1994 “A Reassessment of the Woman at the Well in John 4 in Light of the Samaritan Context.” Journal for the Study of the New Testament 53:35–46.
- 1996 Her Testimony Is True: Women as Witnesses according to John. Journal p 627 for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 125. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.

Macdonald, J.

- 1964 The Theology of the Samaritans. Philadelphia: Westminster.

Mackowski, R. M.

- 1979 “ ‘Scholar’s Qanah.’ A Re-examination of the Evidence in Favor of Khirbet-Qanah.” Biblische Zeitschrift 23:278–84.
- 1980 Jerusalem, City of Jesus. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

MacLeod, D. J.

- 2003 “The Eternality and Deity of the Word: John 1:1–2.” Bibliotheca sacra 160:48–64.

Mahoney, R.

- 1974 Two Disciples at the Tomb. Frankfurt: Lang.

Maier, G.

- 1994 Biblical Hermeneutics. Translated by R. W. Yarbrough. Wheaton: Crossway.

Maier, P. L.

- 1968 “Sejanus, Pilate, and the Date of the Crucifixion.” Church History 37:3–13.
- 1969 “Episode of the Golden Roman Shields at Jerusalem.” Harvard Theological Review 62:109–21.
- 1989 “The Date of the Nativity and the Chronology of Jesus’ Life.” Pp. 113–30 in Chronos, Kairos, Christos: Nativity and Chronological Studies Presented to Jack Finegan. Edited by J. Vardaman and E. M. Yamauchi. Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns.

Malatesta, E.

- 1971 “The Literary Structure of John 17.” Biblica 52:190–214.
- 1978 Interiority and Covenant: A Study of EINAI EN and MENEIN EN in the First Letter of Saint John. Analecta biblica 69. Rome: Biblical Institute Press.

Malina, B. J.

- 1981 The New Testament World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology. Atlanta: John Knox.

Malina, B. J., and R. L. Rohrbaugh

- 1998 Social-Science Commentary on the Gospel of John. Minneapolis: Fortress.

Marcus, J.

- 1998 “Rivers of Living Water from Jesus’ Belly (John 7:38).” Journal of Biblical Literature 117:328–30.

Marshall, I. H.

1974 "The Problem of New Testament Exegesis." Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 17:67–73.

Martin, J. P.

1964 "History and Eschatology in the Lazarus Narrative John 11.1–44." Scottish Journal of Theology 17:332–43.

Martin, T. W.

1998 "Assessing the Johannine Epithet 'the Mother of Jesus.'" Catholic Biblical Quarterly 60:63–73.

Martyn, J. L.

1977 "Glimpses into the History of the Johannine Community." Pp. 149–75 in L'Évangile de Jean: sources, rédaction, théologie. Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologicarum lovaniensium 44. Edited by M. de Jonge. Gembloux: Duculot.

1979 History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel. 2d edition. Nashville: Abingdon.

Marzotto, D.

1977 "Giovanni 17 e il Targum di Esodo 19–20." Rivista biblica italiana 25:375–88.

Mathews, K. A.

1988–89 "John, Jesus, and the Essenes: Trouble at the Temple." Criswell Theological Review 3:101–26.

McCabe, R. V.

1999 "The Meaning of 'Born of Water and the Spirit' in John 3:5." Detroit Baptist Seminary Journal 4:85–107.

McCaffrey, J.

1988 The House with Many Rooms: The Temple Theme of Jn. 14, 2–3. Analecta biblica 114. Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute.

McCracken, D.

1994 The Scandal of the Gospels: Jesus, Story, and Offense. New York: Oxford University Press.

McDonald, J. I. H.

1995 "The So-Called Pericope de Adultera." New Testament Studies 41:415–27.

McGaughy, L. C.

1972 Toward a Descriptive Analysis of EINAI as a Linking Verb in New Testament Greek. Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series 6. p 628 Missoula, Mont.: Society of Biblical Literature.

McGehee, M.

1986 "A Less Theological Reading of John 20:17." Journal of Biblical Literature 105:299–302.

McKay, K. L.

1985 "Style and Significance in the Language of John 21:15–17." Novum Testamentum 27:319–33.

1994 A New Syntax of the Verb in New Testament Greek: An Aspectual Approach. Studies in Biblical Greek 5. New York: Lang.

Mead, A. H.

- 1985 "The Βασιλικός in John 4.46–53." Journal for the Study of the New Testament 23:69–72.

Meeks, W. A.

- 1966 "Galilee and Judea in the Fourth Gospel." Journal of Biblical Literature 85:159–69.
1967 The Prophet-King. Novum Testamentum Supplements 14. Leiden: Brill.
1972 "The Man from Heaven in Johannine Sectarianism." Journal of Biblical Literature 91:44–72.

Mees, M.

- 1986 "Die Heilung des Kranken vom Bethesda-Teich aus Joh 5:1–18." New Testament Studies 32:596–608.

Meier, J. P.

- 1994 A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vol. 2: Mentor, Message, and Miracles. Anchor Bible Reference Library. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday.
2001 A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vol. 3: Companions and Competitors. Anchor Bible Reference Library. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday.

Melick, R. R.

- 1976 "A Study in the Concept of Belief: A Comparison of the Gospel of John and the Epistle to the Romans." Th.D. diss., Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary.

Menken, M. J. J.

- 1985 "The Quotation from Isa 40:3 in John 1:23." Biblica 66:190–205.
1988 "The Provenance and Meaning of the Old Testament Quotation in John 6:31." Novum Testamentum 30:39–56.
1990 "The Translation of Psalm 41.10 in John 13.18." Journal for the Study of the New Testament 40:61–79.
1996 "The Origin of the Old Testament Quotation in John 7:38." Novum Testamentum 38:160–75.

Messner, B.

- 1998 "'In the Fifteenth Year' Reconsidered: A Study of Luke 3:1." Stone-Campbell Journal 1:201–11.

Metzger, B. M.

- 1994 A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament. 2d edition. Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft.

Metzner, R.

- 1999 "Der Geheilte von Johannes 5—Repräsentant des Unglaubens." Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 90:177–93.

Meyer, P. W.

- 1956 "A Note on John 10 1–18." Journal of Biblical Literature 75:232–35.
1996 "'The Father': The Presentation of God in the Fourth Gospel." Pp. 255–73 in Exploring the Gospel of John: In Honor of D. Moody Smith. Edited by R. A. Culpepper and C. C. Black. Louisville: Westminster John Knox.

Michaels, J. R.

- 1966–67 “Nathanael under the Fig Tree.” Expository Times 78:182–83.
 1983 John: A Good News Commentary. San Francisco/Cambridge: Harper & Row.
 1989 John. New International Bible Commentary. Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson.
- Michel, M.
 1981 “Nicodème ou le non-lieu de la vérité.” Revue des science religieuses 55:227–36.
- Millard, A.
 1997 Discoveries from Bible Times. Oxford: Lion.
- Miller, E. L.
 1989 Salvation-History in the Prologue of John: The Significance of John 1:3–4. Novum Testamentum Supplements 60. Leiden: Brill.
 1993 “The Johannine Origins of the Johannine Logos.” Journal of Biblical Literature 112:445–57.
 1999 “‘In the Beginning’: A Christological Transparency.” New Testament Studies 45:587–92.
- p 629 Milne, B.
 1993 The Message of John: Here Is Your King. Leicester: Inter-Varsity/Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity.
- Minear, P. S.
 1976 “We Don’t Know Where ... John 20:2.” Interpretation 30:129–39.
 1983 “The Original Functions of John 21.” Journal of Biblical Literature 102:85–98.
- MM The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament: Illustrated from the Papyri and Other Non-literary Sources. By J. H. Moulton and G. Milligan, 1930. Reprinted Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1976.
- Moloney, F. J.
 1977 The Word Became Flesh. Theology Today Series 14. Dublin/Cork: Mercier.
 1978 The Johannine Son of Man. 2d edition. Bibliothèque des sciences religieuses 14. Rome: LAS.
 1986 “The Structure and Message of John 13:1–38.” Australian Biblical Review 34:1–16.
 1993 Belief in the Word: Reading John 1–4. Minneapolis: Fortress.
 1998 The Gospel of John. Sacra Pagina 4. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press.
 2002 “Narrative and Discourse at the Feast of Tabernacles: John 7:1–8:59.” Pp. 155–72 in Word, Theology, and Community in John. Edited by J. Painter, R. A. Culpepper, and F. F. Segovia. St. Louis: Chalice.
- Montgomery, J. A.
 1939 “Hebrew Hesed and Greek Charis.” Harvard Theological Review 32:97–102.
- Moody, D.
 1953 “God’s Only Son: The Translation of John 3:16 in the Revised Standard Version.” Journal of Biblical Literature 72:213–19.
- Morgan-Wynne, J. E.
 1980 “The Cross and the Revelation of Jesus as ἐγώ εἰμι in the Fourth Gospel (John 8.28).” Pp. 219–26 in Studia Biblica 1978: Sixth International Congress on Biblical Studies, Oxford, 3–7 April 1978, vol. 2: Papers on the Gospels. Edited by

E. A. Livingstone. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 2. Sheffield: JSOT Press.

Morgenthaler, R.

1958 Statistik des neutestamentlichen Wortschatzes. Zürich: Gotthelf.

Morris, L.

1965a The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross. 3d edition. London: Tyndale.

1965b The Cross in the New Testament. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

1969 Studies in the Fourth Gospel. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

1974 The Lord from Heaven. Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity.

1989 Jesus Is the Christ. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

1995 The Gospel according to John. Revised edition. New International Commentary on the New Testament. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

Motyer, S.

1997 'Your Father the Devil'? A New Approach to John and 'the Jews.' Carlisle: Paternoster.

Moule, C. F. D.

1954 "A Note on 'under the Fig Tree' in John I.48, 50." Journal of Theological Studies 5:210–11.

1957–58 "The Post-resurrection Appearances in the Light of Festival Pilgrimages." New Testament Studies 4:58–61.

1975 "The Meaning of 'Life' in the Gospels and Epistles of St John." Theology 78:114–25.

Mowvley, H.

1984 "John 1^{14–18} in the Light of Exodus 33⁷–34³⁵." Expository Times 95:135–37.

Müller, M.

1991 " 'Have You Faith in the Son of Man?' (John 9.35)." New Testament Studies 37:291–94.

Munck, J.

1959 "Presbyters and Disciples of the Lord in Papias: Exegetic Comments on Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, III, 39." Harvard Theological Review 52:223–43.

Murphy-O'Connor, J.

2000 "Jesus and the Money Changers (Mark 11:15–17; John 2:13–17)." Revue biblique 107:42–55.

NA²⁷

Novum Testamentum Graece. Edited by [E. and E. Nestle], B. Aland, K. Aland, J. Karavidopoulos, C. M. Martini, and B. M. Metzger. 27th revised edition. Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1993.

p 630 NEAEHL The New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land. Edited by E. Stern. 4 vols. Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society & Carta/New York: Simon & Schuster, 1993.

Neirynck, F.

1984 "John and the Synoptics: The Empty Tomb Stories." New Testament Studies 30:161–87.

1990 "John 21." New Testament Studies 36:321–36.

- Nelson, D. P.
2001 "In Spirit and Truth: The Holy Spirit and the Interrelation of Doxology and Doctrine with Implications for Evangelical Congregational Worship." Ph.D. diss., Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary.
- Nestle, E.
1913 "Zum Ysop bei Johannes, Josephus und Philo." Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 14:263–65.
- Neuer, W.
1996 Adolf Schlatter: A Biography of Germany's Premier Biblical Theologian. Translated by R. W. Yarbrough. Grand Rapids: Baker.
- Neusner, J.
1989 "Money-Change in the Temple: The Mishnah's Explanation." New Testament Studies 35:287–90.
- NewDocs New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity. Edited by G. H. R. Horsley and S. Llewelyn. North Ride, N.S.W.: Ancient History Documentary Research Centre, Macquarie University, 1981–.
- Neyrey, J. H.
1979 "Jacob Traditions and the Interpretation of John 4:10–26." Catholic Biblical Quarterly 41:419–37.
1982 "The Jacob Allusions in John 1.51." Catholic Biblical Quarterly 44:586–605.
1987 "Jesus the Judge: Forensic Process in John 8, 21–59." Biblica 68:509–42.
1994 "What's Wrong with This Picture? John 4, Cultural Stereotypes of Women, and Public and Private Space." Biblical Theology Bulletin 24:77–91.
1996 "The Trials (Forensic) and Tribulations (Honor Challenges) of Jesus: John 7 in Social Science Perspective." Biblical Theology Bulletin 26:107–24.
2001 "The 'Noble Shepherd' in John 10: Cultural and Rhetorical Background." Journal of Biblical Literature 120:267–91.
- Nicklas, T.
2000a "Die Prophetie des Kaiaphas: Im Netz johanneischer Ironie." New Testament Studies 46:589–94.
2000b "'Unter dem Feigenbaum': Die Rolle des Lesers im Dialog zwischen Jesus und Natanael (Joh 1, 45–50)." New Testament Studies 46:193–203.
- NIDNTT The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology. Edited by L. Coenen, E. Beyreuther, and H. Bietenhard. English translation edited by C. Brown. 4 vols. Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1975–86.
- Nixon, J. A.
2003 "Who Wrote the Fourth Gospel? The Authorship and Occasion of the Fourth Gospel according to Patristic Evidence from the First Three Centuries." Faith and Mission 20/3:81–98.
- Nortjé, S. J.
1986 "The Role of Women in the Fourth Gospel." Neotestamentica 20:21–28.
- O'Connell, M. J.
1960 "The Concept of Commandment in the Old Testament." Theological Studies

21:352.

O'Day, G. R.

- 1986 Revelation in the Fourth Gospel: Narrative Mode and Theological Claim. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- 1992 "John 7:53–8:11: A Study in Misreading." Journal of Biblical Literature 111:631–40.
- 1995 "John." Vol. 9 / pp. 493–865 in The New Interpreter's Bible. Edited by L. E. Keck. Nashville: Abingdon.
- 2002 "Response to 'Expulsion from the Synagogue: A Tale of a Theory' by Robert Kysar." Paper presented at the annual meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature, Toronto, November 23–26.

Odeberg, H.

- 1968 The Fourth Gospel. Amsterdam: Grüner.

Okure, T.

- 1992 "The Significance Today of Jesus' Commission to Mary Magdalene." p 631 International Review of Mission 81:177–88.

Olsson, B.

- 1974 Structure and Meaning in the Fourth Gospel: A Text-Linguistic Analysis of John 2:1–11 and 4:1–42. Coniectanea Biblica, New Testament 6. Lund: Gleerup.

O'Neill, J. C.

- 1991 "The Word Did Not 'Become' Flesh." Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 82:125–27.
- 1995 Who Did Jesus Think He Was? Biblical Interpretation Series 11. Leiden: Brill.

Osborn, E. F.

- 1973 Justin Martyr. Beiträge zur historischen Theologie 47. Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck.

Osborne, G. R.

- 1981 "John 21: Test Case for History and Redaction in the Resurrection Narratives." Pp. 293–328 in Gospel Perspectives, vol. 2: Studies of History and Tradition in the Four Gospels. Edited by R. T. France and D. Wenham. Sheffield: JSOT Press.
- 1991 The Hermeneutical Spiral: A Comprehensive Introduction to Biblical Interpretation. Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity.

Osburn, C. D.

- 1989 "Some Exegetical Observations on John 3:5–8." Restoration Quarterly 31:129–38.

Pagels, E. H.

- 1999 "Exegesis of Genesis 1 in the Gospels of Thomas and John." Journal of Biblical Literature 118:477–96.

Painter, J.

- 1977 "Christ and the Church in John 1, 45–51." Pp. 359–62 in L'Évangile de Jean: sources, rédaction, théologie. Edited by M. de Jonge. Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologicarum lovaniensium 44. Gembloux: Duculot.

Pamment, M.

- 1985 "Focus in the Fourth Gospel." Expository Times 97:71–75.

Pancaro, S.

- 1972 "The Metamorphosis of a Legal Principle in the Fourth Gospel: A Closer Look at Jn 7, 51." Biblica 23:340–51.
- 1975 The Law in the Fourth Gospel. Novum Testamentum Supplements 42. Leiden: Brill.

Parrot, A.

- 1957 Golgotha and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. London: SCM.

Payton, J. R.

- 1992 "On Unity and Truth: Martin Bucer's Sermon on John 17." Calvin Theological Journal 27:26–38.

Pazdan, M. M.

- 1987 "Nicodemus and the Samaritan Woman: Contrasting Models of Discipleship." Biblical Theology Bulletin 17:145–48.

Pendrick, G.

- 1995 "Μονογενής." New Testament Studies 41:587–600.

Petersen, W. L.

- 1997 "Οὐδὲ ἐγὼ σε [κατα]κρίνω: John 8:11, the Protevangelium Iacobi, and the History of the Pericope Adulterae." Pp. 191–221 in Sayings of Jesus: Canonical and Non-canonical: Essays in Honour of Tjitze Baarda. Edited by W. L. Petersen, J. S. Vos, and H. J. de Jonge. Novum Testamentum Supplements 89. Leiden: Brill.

Peterson, R. A.

- 1995 Hell on Trial: The Case for Eternal Punishment. Phillipsburg, N.J.: Presbyterian & Reformed.

Pixner, B.

- 1985 "Searching for the New Testament Site of Bethsaida." Biblical Archaeologist 48:207–16.

Poirier, J. C.

- 1996 "'Day and Night' and the Punctuation of John 9.3." New Testament Studies 42:288–94.

Pollard, T. E.

- 1970 Johannine Christology and the Early Church. Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 13. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- 1973 "The Raising of Lazarus (John xi)." Pp. 434–43 in Studia Evangelica, vol. 6: Papers Presented to the Fourth International Congress on New Testament Studies Held at Oxford, 1969. Edited by E. A. Livingstone. Texte und Untersuchungen 112. Berlin: Akademie.
- 1977 "The Father-Son and God-Believer Relationships according to St John: A Brief Study of John's p 632 Use of Prepositions." Pp. 363–69 in L'Évangile de Jean: sources, rédaction, théologie. Edited by M. de Jonge. Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologicarum lovaniensium 44. Gembloux: Duculot.

Porter, C. L.

- 1966–67 "John 9:38, 39a: A Liturgical Addition to the Text." New Testament Studies

13:387–94.

Porter, S. E.

- 1989 Verbal Aspect in the Greek of the New Testament, with Reference to Tense and Mood. Studies in Biblical Greek 1. Bern: Lang.
- 1992 Idioms of the Greek New Testament. Sheffield: JSOT Press.
- 2002 “Jesus, the Jews, and John’s Gospel: A Conflict of Religious Paradigms.” Paper presented at the annual meeting of the Evangelical Theological Society, Toronto.

Potter, R. D.

- 1959 “Typography and Archaeology in the Fourth Gospel.” Pp. 329–37 in Studia Evangelica, vol. 1: Papers Presented to the International Congress on “The Four Gospels in 1957” Held at Christ Church, Oxford. Edited by K. Aland et al. Texte und Untersuchungen 73. Berlin: Akademie.

Prest, L. A.

- 1992 “The Samaritan Woman.” Bible Today 30:367–71.

Pryor, J. W.

- 1987 “John 4:44 and the Patris of Jesus.” Catholic Biblical Quarterly 49:254–63.
- 1988 “Covenant and Community in John’s Gospel.” Reformed Theological Review 47:44–51.
- 1990 “Jesus and Israel in the Fourth Gospel—John 1:11.” Novum Testamentum 32:201–18.
- 1991a “The Johannine Son of Man and Descent-Ascent Motif.” Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 34:341–51.
- 1991b “John 3.3, 5: A Study in the Relation of John’s Gospel to the Synoptic Tradition.” Journal for the Study of the New Testament 41:71–95.
- 1992a John, Evangelist of the Covenant People: The Narrative and Themes of the Fourth Gospel. Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity.
- 1992b “Justin Martyr and the Fourth Gospel.” The Second Century 9:153–69.
- 1997 “John the Baptist and Jesus: Tradition and Text in John 3.25.” Journal for the Study of the New Testament 66:15–26.

Quast, K.

- 1989 Peter and the Beloved Disciple: Figures for a Community in Crisis. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 32. Sheffield: JSOT Press.

Ramsay, Lady W. M.

- 1915–16 “Her That Kept the Door.” Expository Times 27:217–18, 314–16.

Reich, R.

- 1995 “6 Stone Water Jars.” Jerusalem Perspective 48:30–33.

Reim, G.

- 1976 “Johannes 21: Ein Anhang?” Pp. 330–37 in Studies in New Testament Language and Text: Essays in Honour of George D. Kilpatrick on the Occasion of His Sixty-fifth Birthday. Edited by J. K. Elliott. Novum Testamentum Supplements 44. Leiden: Brill.

Reinhardt, W.

- 1995 “The Population Size of Jerusalem and the Numerical Growth of the Jerusalem Church.” Pp. 237–65 in The Book of Acts in Its Palestinian Setting. Edited by R.

Bauckham. The Book of Acts in Its First Century Setting 4. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

Reiser, W. E.

1973 "The Case of the Tidy Tomb: The Place of the Napkins of John 11:44 and 20:7." Heythrop Journal 14:47–57.

Rensberger, D.

1988 Johannine Faith and Liberating Community. Philadelphia: Westminster.

Repond, C.

1922 "Le Costume du Christ." Biblica 3:3–14.

Richardson, P.

1992 "Why Turn the Tables? Jesus' Protest in the Temple Precincts." Pp. 507–23 in SBL Seminar Papers. Edited by E. H. Lovering Jr. Atlanta: Scholars Press.

Ridderbos, H.

1975 Paul: An Outline of His Theology. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

p 633 1997 The Gospel according to John. Translated by J. Vriend. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

Riesenfeld, H.

1970 "The Pericope de adultera in the Early Christian Tradition." Pp. 95–110 in The Gospel Tradition. Translated by E. M. Rowley and R. A. Kraft. Oxford: Blackwell.

1972 "A Probable Background to the Johannine Paraclete." Vol. 1 / pp. 266–74 in Ex Orbe Religionum: Studia Geo Widengren. Edited by C. J. Bleeker et al. Studies in the History of Religions 21. Leiden: Brill.

Riesner, R.

1981 Jesus als Lehrer: Eine Untersuchung zum Ursprung der Evangelien-überlieferung. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 2/7. Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck.

1987 "Bethany beyond the Jordan (John 1:28): Topography, Theology, and History in the Fourth Gospel." Tyndale Bulletin 38:29–63.

2002 Bethanien jenseits des Jordan: Topographie und Theologie im Johannes-Evangelium. Studien zur biblischen Archäologie und Zeitgeschichte 12. Giessen: Brunnen.

Rissi, M.

1979 "Voll grosser Fische, hundertdreiundfünfzig: Joh 21, 1–14." Theologische Literaturzeitschrift 35:73–89.

Roberts, C.

1987 "John 20:30–31 and 21:24–25." Journal of Theological Studies 38:409–10.

Robertson, A. T.

1934 A Grammar of the Greek New Testament in the Light of Historical Research. Nashville: Broadman.

Robinson, H. W.

1964 Corporate Personality in Ancient Israel. Philadelphia: Fortress.

Robinson, J. A. T.

1959 "The 'Others' of John 4, 38: A Test of Exegetical Method." Pp. 510–15 in Studia

- Evangelica*, vol. 1: Papers Presented to the International Congress on "The Four Gospels in 1957" Held at Christ Church, Oxford. Edited by Kurt Aland et al. Texte und Untersuchungen 73. Berlin: Akademie.
- 1962–63 "The Relation of the Prologue to the Gospel of St. John." New Testament Studies 9:120–29.
- 1976 Redating the New Testament. London: SCM.
- 1985 The Priority of John. Edited by J. F. Coakley. London: SCM.
- Robinson, J. M.
- 1964 "Die Hodajot-Formel in Gebet und Hymnus des Frühchristentums." Pp. 194–225 in Apophoreta: Festschrift für Ernst Haenchen zu seinem siebzigsten Geburtstag am 10. Dezember 1964. Edited by W. Eltester. Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche 30. Berlin: Töpelmann.
- Robinson, M. A.
- 1998 "Preliminary Observations regarding the Pericope Adulterae Based upon Fresh Collations of Nearly All Continuous-Text Manuscripts and over One Hundred Lectionaries." Paper presented at the annual meeting of the Evangelical Theological Society, Orlando, Florida.
- Rodgers, P. R.
- 1999 "The Text of John 1:34." Pp. 299–305 in Theological Exegesis: Essays in Honor of Brevard S. Childs. Edited by C. Seitz and K. Greene-McCreight. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Rowland, C.
- 1984 "John 1.51, Jewish Apocalyptic and Targumic Tradition." New Testament Studies 30:498–507.
- Ruckstuhl, E.
- 1977 "Zur Aussage und Botschaft von Johannes 21." Pp. 339–62 in Kirche des Anfangs: Festschrift für Heinz Schürmann zum 65. Geburtstag. Edited by R. Schnackenburg, J. Ernst, and J. Wanke. Erfurter theologische Studien 38. Leipzig: St. Benno.
- Ruckstuhl, E., and P. Dschulnigg
- 1991 Stilkritik und Verfasserfrage im Johannesevangelium: Die johanneischen Sprachmerkmale auf dem Hintergrund des Neuen Testaments und des zeitgenössischen hellenistischen Schrifttums. p 634 Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- Saayman, C.
- 1995 "The Textual Strategy in John 3:12–14: Preliminary Observations." Neotestamentica 29:27–48.
- Sabbe, M.
- 1992 "The Anointing of Jesus in John 12, 1–8 and Its Synoptic Parallels." Vol. 3 / pp. 2051–82 in The Four Gospels 1992: Festschrift Frans Neirynck. Edited by F. van Segbroeck et al. Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologiarum lovaniensium 100. Leuven: Leuven University Press.
- Safrai, S.

- 1976 "Home and Family." Vol. 2 / pp. 728–92 in The Jewish People in the First Century: Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural and Religious Life and Institutions. Edited by S. Safrai and M. Stern. Compendia rerum iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum 1/2. Assen: Van Gorcum/Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Safrai, S., and M. Stern (eds.)
- 1976 The Jewish People in the First Century: Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural and Religious Life and Institutions. Compendia rerum iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum 1/2. Assen: Van Gorcum/Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Sanders, E. P.
- 1985 Jesus and Judaism. London: SCM.
- Sanders, J. A.
- 1990 "‘Nor Do I ...’: A Canonical Reading of the Challenge to Jesus in John 8." Pp. 337–47 in The Conversation Continues: Studies in Paul and John in Honor of J. Louis Martyn. Edited by R. T. Fortna and B. R. Gaventa. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Sanders, J. N.
- 1943 The Fourth Gospel in the Early Church: Its Origin and Influence on Christian Theology up to Irenaeus. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- 1968 A Commentary on the Gospel according to St John. Edited and completed by B. A. Mastin. London: Black.
- Sandy, D. B.
- 1991 "John the Baptist's 'Lamb of God' Affirmation in Its Canonical and Apocalyptic Milieu." Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 34:447–59.
- Sava, A. F.
- 1960 "Wound in the Side of Christ." Catholic Biblical Quarterly 19:343–46.
- Schenk, W.
- 1992 "Interne Strukturierungen im Schluss-Segment Johannes 21: Συγγραφή + Σατυρικόν Ἐπιλόγιος." New Testament Studies 38:507–30.
- Schenke, L.
- 1989 "Joh 7–10: Eine dramatische Szene." Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 80:172–92.
- Schlatter, A.
- 1948 Der Evangelist Johannes. 2d edition. Stuttgart: Calwer.
- 1959 Der Evangelist Matthäus. 5th edition. Stuttgart: Calwer.
- 1962 Das Evangelium nach Johannes: Ausgelegt für Bibelleser. Erläuterungen zum Neuen Testament 3. Stuttgart: Calwer.
- 1997 The History of the Christ. Translated by A. J. Köstenberger. Grand Rapids: Baker. Original German edition published in 1923.
- Schlösser, J.
- 1990 "La parole de Jésus sur la fin du temple." New Testament Studies 36:398–414.
- Schnackenburg, R.
- 1990 The Gospel according to St. John. Translated by C. Hastings et al. 3 vols. New York: Crossroad.

Schneiders, S.

1989 "John 21.1–14." Interpretation 43:70–75.

Schnelle, U.

1996 "Die Tempelreinigung und die Christologie des Johannesevangeliums." New Testament Studies 42:359–73.

Schürer, E.

1973–79 The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ. Revised and edited by G. Vermes et al. 4 vols. Edinburgh: Clark.

Schwank, B.

1977 "Efraim in Joh 11, 54." Pp. 377–83 in L'Évangile de Jean: sources, rédaction, théologie. Edited by M. de Jonge. Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologicarum lovaniensium 44. Gembloux: Duculot.

p 635 Schwartz, E.

1907 "Aporien im 4. Evangelium I." Pp. 342–72 in Nachrichten von der Königlichen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen. Berlin: Weidmannsche Buchhandlung.

1908 "Aporien im 4. Evangelium II," "Aporien im 4. Evangelium III," and "Aporien im 4. Evangelium IV." Pp. 115–48, 149–88, 497–560 in Nachrichten von der Königlichen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen. Berlin: Weidmannsche Buchhandlung.

Schweizer, E.

1996 "What about the Johannine 'Parables'?" Pp. 208–19 in Exploring the Gospel of John: In Honor of D. Moody Smith. Edited by R. A. Culpepper and C. C. Black. Louisville: Westminster John Knox.

Scott, M.

1992 Sophia and the Johannine Jesus. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 71. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.

Segal, A. F.

1981 "Ruler of This World: Attitudes about Mediator Figures and the Importance of Sociology for Self-Definition." Vol. 2 / pp. 245–68, 403–13 in Jewish and Christian Self-Definition. Edited by E. P. Sanders. Philadelphia: Fortress.

Segovia, F. F.

1982 Love Relationships in the Johannine Tradition: Agape/Agapan in 1 John and the Fourth Gospel. Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series 58. Chico, Calif.: Scholars Press.

1991 The Farewell of the Word: The Johannine Call to Abide. Minneapolis: Fortress.

Seim, T. K.

1987 "Roles of Women in the Gospel of John." Pp. 56–73 in Aspects on the Johannine Literature: Papers presented at a Conference of Scandinavian New Testament Exegetes at Uppsala, June 16–19, 1986. Edited by L. Hartman and B. Olsson. Uppsala: Almqvist & Wiksell.

Shafaat, A.

1980–81 "Geber of the Qumran Scrolls and the Spirit-Paraclete of the Gospel of John."

New Testament Studies 27:263–69.

Shanks, H.

1985 “New Analysis of the Crucified Man.” Biblical Archaeology Review 11/6:20–21.

Shaw, A.

1974 “Breakfast by the Shore and the Mary Magdalene Encounter as Eucharistic Narratives.” Journal of Theological Studies 25:12–26.

Sherwin-White, A. N.

1963 Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

1965 “The Trial of Christ.” Pp. 97–116 in Historicity and Chronology in the New Testament. D. E. Nineham et al. London: SPCK.

Shewell-Cooper, W. E.

1962 Plants and Fruits of the Bible. London: Darton, Longman & Todd.

Shidemantle, C. S.

2001 “Nehemiah 9 in John 7:37–39.” Ph.D. diss., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School.

Sidebottom, E. M.

1956–57 “The Son of Man in the Fourth Gospel.” Expository Times 68:231–35.

Silva, M.

1991 “Bilingualism and the Character of Biblical Greek.” Pp. 205–26 in The Language of the New Testament: Classic Essays. Edited by S. E. Porter. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 60. Sheffield: JSOT Press.

Simoens, Y.

1981 La gloire d’aimer: structures stylistiques et interpretatives dans de la Cegagne (Jn 13–17). Analecta biblica 90. Rome: Pontifical Bible Institute.

Simon, W. B.

2002 “The Role of the Spirit-Paraclete in the Disciples’ Mission in the Fourth Gospel.” Ph.D. diss., Southern Baptist Theological Seminary.

Simonis, A. J.

1967 Die Hirtenrede im Johannes-Evangelium: Versuch einer Analyse von Johannes 10, 1–18 nach Entstehung, Hintergrund, und Inhalt. Analecta biblica 29. Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute.

p 636 Skarsaune, O.

1987 The Proof from Prophecy: A Study in Justin Martyr’s Proof-Text Tradition: Text-Type, Provenance, Theological Profile. Novum Testamentum Supplements 56. Leiden: Brill.

Sloyan, G. S.

1996 “The Gnostic Adoption of John’s Gospel and Its Canonization by the Church Catholic.” Biblical Theology Bulletin 26:125–32.

Smalley, S. S.

1996 “‘The Paraclete’: Pneumatology in the Johannine Gospel and Apocalypse.” Pp. 289–300 in Exploring the Gospel of John: In Honor of D. Moody Smith. Edited by R. A. Culpepper and C. C. Black. Louisville: Westminster John Knox.

Smallwood, E. M.

- 1954 "The Date of the Dismissal of Pontius Pilate from Judaea." Journal of Jewish Studies 5:12–21.
- 1962 "High Priests and Politics in Roman Palestine." Journal of Theological Studies 13:14–34.

Smith, B. H.

- 1968 Poetic Closure: A Study of How Poems End. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Smith, C. A.

- 2002 "The Leaning Tower: Foundational Weaknesses of Contemporary Chiastic Studies." Paper presented at the annual meeting of the Evangelical Theological Society, Toronto.

Smith, D.

- 1985 "Jesus and the Pharisees in Socio-Anthropological Perspective." Trinity Journal, n.s., 6:151–56.

Smith, D. M.

- 1963 "John 12:12ff. and the Question of John's Use of the Synoptics." Journal of Biblical Literature 82:58–64.
- 1990 "The Contribution of J. Louis Martyn to the Understanding of the Gospel of John." Pp. 275–94 in The Conversation Continues: Studies in Paul and John in Honor of J. Louis Martyn. Edited by R. T. Fortna and B. R. Gaventa. Nashville: Abingdon.
- 1992 John among the Gospels: The Relationship in Twentieth-Century Research. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- 1999 John. Abingdon New Testament Commentaries. Nashville: Abingdon.

Smith, R. H.

- 1966 "The Household Lamps of Palestine in New Testament Times." Biblical Archaeologist 29:2–27.

Smothers, E. R.

- 1958 "Two Readings in Papyrus Bodmer II (Jn 7:52, 8:25)." Harvard Theological Review 51:109–22.

Soards, M.

- 1983 "Critical Notes: Τὸν ἐπενδύτην διεζώσατο, ἣν γὰρ γυμνός." Journal of Biblical Literature 102:283–84.

Sordi, M.

- 1994 The Christians and the Roman Empire. London/New York: Routledge.

Spencer, P. E.

- 1999 "Narrative Echoes in John 21: Intertextual Interpretation and Intratextual Connection." Journal for the Study of the New Testament 75:49–68.

Staley, J. L.

- 1986 "The Structure of John's Prologue: Its Implications for the Gospel's Narrative Structure." Catholic Biblical Quarterly 48:241–63.
- 1988 The Print's First Kiss: A Rhetorical Investigation of the Implied Reader in the - Fourth Gospel*. Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series 82. Atlanta: Scholars Press.

- 1991 "Stumbling in the Dark, Reaching for the Light: Reading Character in John 5 and 9." Semeia 53:55–80.
- Stauffer, E.
1960 Jesus and His Story. London: SCM.
- Steele, M.
1988 "Where Does the Speech Quotation End in John 3:1–21?" Notes on Translation 2/2:51–58.
- Stegemann, E.
1990 "Zur Tempelreinigung im Johannesevangelium." Pp. 503–16 in Die Hebräische Bibel und ihre zweifache Nachgeschichte: Festschrift für Rolf Rendtorff zum 65. Geburtstag. Edited by E. Blum, C. Macholz, and E. W. Stegemann. Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag.
- Steinmetz, D.
1980 "The Superiority of Pre-critical Exegesis." Theology Today 37:27–38.
- Stenger, W.
1990 Strukturelle Beobachtungen zum Neuen Testament. Leiden: Brill.
- p 637 Sternberg, M.
1985 Poetics of Biblical Narrative. Bloomington: Indiana State University.
- Stibbe, M. W. G.
1991 "The Elusive Christ: A New Reading of the Fourth Gospel." Journal for the Study of the New Testament 44:19–38.
1992 John as Storyteller: Narrative Criticism and the Fourth Gospel. Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 73. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
1993 John. Readings: A New Biblical Commentary. Sheffield: JSOT Press.
1994 "A Tomb with a View: John 11.1–44 in Narrative-Critical Perspective." New Testament Studies 40:38–54.
- Stimpfle, A.
1992 "Das 'sinnlose γάρ' in Joh 4:44: Beobachtungen zur Doppeldeutigkeit im Johannesevangelium." Biblische Notizen 65:86–96.
- Story, C. I. K.
1989 "The Bearing of Old Testament Terminology on the Johannine Chronology of the Final Passover of Jesus." Novum Testamentum 31:316–24.
1991 "The Mental Attitude of Jesus at Bethany: John 11.33, 38." New Testament Studies 37:51–66.
- Strachan, R. H.
1955 The Fourth Gospel. London: SCM.
- Str-B Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch. By H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck. 6 vols. Munich: Beck, 1922–61.
- Strickert, F.
1998 Bethsaida: Home of the Apostles. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press.

Stuhlmacher, P.

- 1997 "Der Kanon und seine Auslegung." Pp. 263–90 in Jesus Christus als die Mitte der Schrift: Studien zur Hermeneutik des Evangeliums. Edited by C. Landmesser et al. Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 86. Berlin: de Gruyter.
- 2002 "My Experience with Biblical Theology." Pp. 174–91 in Biblical Theology: Retrospect and Prospect. Edited by S. J. Hafemann. Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity.

Swain, S. R.

- 1998 "Truth in the Gospel of John." Th.M. thesis, Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary.

Swanson, R. J. (ed.)

- 1995 New Testament Greek Manuscripts: Variant Readings Arranged in Horizontal Lines against Codex Vaticanus. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press/Pasadena: William Carey International University Press.

Swetnam, J.

- 1980 "The Meaning of Πειστευκότας in John 8, 31." Biblica 61:106–9.

Sylva, D. D.

- 1988 "Nicodemus and His Spices (John 19:39)." New Testament Studies 34:148–51.

Talbert, C. H.

- 1970 "Artistry and Theology: An Analysis of the Architecture of Jn 1, 19–5, 47." Catholic Biblical Quarterly 32:341–66.
- 1992 Reading John. Reading the New Testament. New York: Crossroad.

Taylor, J. E.

- 1998 "Golgotha: A Reconsideration of the Evidence for the Sites of Jesus' Crucifixion and Burial." New Testament Studies 44:180–203.

TDNT

- Theological Dictionary of the New Testament*. Edited by G. Kittel and G. Friedrich. Translated and edited by G. W. Bromiley. 10 vols. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1964–76.

Thatcher, T.

- 1999 "The Sabbath Trick: Unstable Irony in the Fourth Gospel." Journal for the Study of the New Testament 76:53–77.

Thielman, F.

- 1991 "The Style of the Fourth Gospel and Ancient Literary Critical Concepts of Religious Discourse." Pp. 169–83 in Persuasive Artistry: Studies in New Testament Rhetoric in Honor of George A. Kennedy. Edited by D. F. Watson. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 50. Sheffield: JSOT Press.

Thomas, J. C.

- 1987 "A Note on the Text of John 13:10." Novum Testamentum 29:46–52.
- 1991a Footwashing in John 13 and the Johannine Community. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 61. Sheffield: JSOT Press.
- p 638 1991b "The Fourth Gospel and Rabbinic Judaism." Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche

- Wissenschaft 82:159–82.
- 1995 “‘Stop Sinning Lest Something Worse Come upon You’: The Man at the Pool in John 5.” Journal for the Study of the New Testament 59:3–20.
- Thompson, M. M.
- 2000 The Promise of the Father: Jesus and God in the New Testament. Louisville: Westminster John Knox.
- 2001 The God of the Gospel of John. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- 2002 “A Response to ‘The De-historicizing of the Gospel of John’ by Robert Kysar.” Paper presented at the annual meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature, Toronto, November 23–26.
- Thomson, J. G. S. S.
- 1955 “The Shepherd-Ruler Concept in the Old Testament and Its Application in the New Testament.” Scottish Journal of Theology 8:406–18.
- Tobin, T. H.
- 1990 “The Prologue of John and Hellenistic Jewish Speculation.” Catholic Biblical Quarterly 52:252–69.
- Tolmie, D. F.
- 1998 “The Characterization of God in the Fourth Gospel.” Journal for the Study of the New Testament 69:57–75.
- Torgovnick, M.
- 1981 Closure in the Novel. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Torrey, C. C.
- 1931 “The Date of the Crucifixion according to the Fourth Gospel.” Journal of Biblical Literature 50:227–41.
- 1936 Our Translated Gospels: Some of the Evidence. New York: Harper.
- Tovey, D.
- 1997 Narrative Art and Act in the Fourth Gospel. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 151. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Trudinger, L. P.
- 1982 “An Israelite in Whom There Is No Guile: An Interpretive Note on John 1:45–51.” Evangelical Quarterly 54:117–20.
- Trudinger, P.
- 1997 “The Cleansing of the Temple: St John’s Independent, Subtle Reflections.” Expository Times 108:329–30.
- Turner, M. M. B.
- 1977 “The Concept of Receiving the Spirit in John’s Gospel.” Vox Evangelica 10:24–42.
- 1990 “Atonement and the Death of Jesus in John: Some Questions to Bultmann and Forestell.” Evangelical Quarterly 62:99–122.
- 1998 The Holy Spirit and Spiritual Gifts in the New Testament Church and Today. Revised edition. Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson.
- Turner, N.
- 1963 Syntax. Vol. 3 of A Grammar of New Testament Greek, by James Hope Moulton.

- Edinburgh: Clark.
- 1976 Style. Vol. 4 of A Grammar of New Testament Greek, by James Hope Moulton. Edinburgh: Clark.
- Twomey, J. J.
1956 “‘Barabbas Was a Robber.’” Scripture 8:115–19.
- UBS⁴ The Greek New Testament. Edited by B. Aland, K. Aland, J. Karavidopoulos, C. M. Martini, and B. M. Metzger. 4th revised edition. Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft/United Bible Societies, 1993.
- Valentine, S. R.
1996 “The Johannine Prologue—a Microcosm of the Gospel.” Evangelical Quarterly 68:291–304.
- VanderKam, J. C.
1990 “John 10 and the Feast of the Dedication.” Pp. 203–14 in Of Scribes and Scrolls: Studies on the Hebrew Bible, Intertestamental Judaism, and Christian Origins Presented to John Strugnell. Edited by J. J. Collins and T. H. Tobin. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America.
- van der Watt, J. G.
1995 “The Composition of the Prologue of John’s Gospel: The Historical Jesus Introducing Divine Grace.” Westminster Theological Journal 57:311–32.
- Vanhoozer, K. J.
1993 “The Hermeneutics of I-Witness Testimony: John 21.20–24 and the ‘Death’ of the ‘Author.’” Pp. 366–87 in Understanding Poets and Prophets: Essays in Honour of George Wishart Anderson. Edited by A. G. Auld. Journal for the Study of the Old Testament: Supplement Series 152. Sheffield: JSOT Press. Also published as pp. 257–74 in First Theology: God, Scripture, and Hermeneutics. By K. J. Vanhoozer. Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 2002.
1995 “The Reader in New Testament Interpretation.” Pp. 301–28 in Hearing the New Testament: Strategies for Interpretation. Edited by J. B. Green. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans/Carlisle: Paternoster.
1998 Is There Meaning in This Text? The Bible, the Reader, and the Morality of Literary Knowledge. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
2002 First Theology: God, Scripture, and Hermeneutics. Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity.
- Vardaman, E. J.
1962 “A New Inscription Which Mentions Pilate as ‘Prefect.’” Journal of Biblical Literature 81:70–71.
1963 “The Pool of Bethesda.” Bible and Theology 14:27–29.
- Vawter, B.
1964 “Ezekiel and John.” Catholic Biblical Quarterly 26:450–58.
- Vermes, G.
1972–73 “Ḥanina ben Dosa: A Controversial Galilean Saint from the First Century of the Christian Era.” Journal of Jewish Studies 23:28–50; 24:51–64.
- Vincent, L. H.

- 1954 "L'Antonia, palais primitif d'Hérode." Revue biblique 61:87–107.
- Viviano, B. T.
1998 "The Structure of the Prologue of John (1:1–18): A Note." Revue biblique 105:176–84.
- Volfing, A.
2001 John the Evangelist in Medieval German Writing: Imitating the Inimitable. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Vorster, W. S.
1992 "The Growth and Making of John 21." Vol. 3 / pp. 2207–21 in The Four Gospels 1992: Festschrift Frans Neirynck. Edited by F. Van Segbroeck et al. Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologicarum lovaniensium 100. Leuven: Leuven University Press.
- Waheeb, M.
1999 "Site of Jesus' Baptism Found—Again." Biblical Archaeology Review 25/3:14–15.
- Walker, N.
1960 "The Reckoning of Hours in the Fourth Gospel." Novum Testamentum 4:69–73.
- Walker, P. W. L.
1996 Jesus and the Holy City: New Testament Perspectives on Jerusalem. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Walker, W.
1958 All the Plants of the Bible. London: Lutterworth.
- Walker, W. O., Jr.
1982 "The Lord's Prayer in Matthew and in John." New Testament Studies 28:237–56.
1994 "John 1.43–51 and 'the Son of Man' in the Fourth Gospel." Journal for the Study of the New Testament 56:31–42.
- Wallace, D. B.
1990 "John 5, 2 and the Date of the Fourth Gospel." Biblica 71:177–205.
1993 "Reconsidering 'The Story of Jesus and the Adulteress Reconsidered.'" New Testament Studies 39:290–96.
1996 Greek Grammar beyond the Basics. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
- Waltke, B. K.
1958 "The Theological Significance of Ἀντί and Ὑπέρ in the New Testament." 2 vols. Th.D. diss., Dallas Theological Seminary.
- Warfield, B. B.
1950 The Person and Work of Christ. Edited by S. G. Craig. Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed Publishing Company.
- Weisse, C. H.
1856 Die Evangelienfrage in ihrem gegenwärtigen Stadium. Leipzig: Breitkopf & Härtel.
- Wellhausen, J.
1907 Erweiterungen und Änderungen im vierten Evangelium. Berlin: Reimer.

- Wenham, D.
1997 "The Enigma of the Fourth Gospel: Another Look." Tyndale Bulletin 48:149–78.
- West, M.
1981 The Clowns of God. London: Hodder & Stoughton.
- p 640 Westcott, B. F.
1881 The Gospel according to St John. London: Murray.
1896 A General Survey of the History of the Canon of the New Testament. 7th edition. London/New York: Macmillan.
1908 The Gospel according to St. John: The Greek Text with Introduction and Notes. 2 vols. London: Murray.
- Whitacre, R. A.
1999 John. IVP New Testament Commentary 4. Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity.
- Wiarda, T.
1992 "John 21.1–23: Narrative Unity and Its Implications." Journal for the Study of the New Testament 46:53–71.
2000 Peter in the Gospels: Pattern, Personality, Relationship. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 2/127. Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck.
- Wieand, D. J.
1965–66 "John V.2 and the Pool of Bethesda." New Testament Studies 12:392–404.
- Wilcox, M.
1977 "The 'Prayer' of Jesus in John xi.41b–42." New Testament Studies 24:128–32.
- Wilkinson, J.
1964 "Seven Words from the Cross." Scottish Journal of Theology 17:69–82.
- Williams, R. H.
1997 "The Mother of Jesus at Cana: A Social-Science Interpretation of John 2:1–12." Catholic Biblical Quarterly 59:679–92.
- Wilson, C. T.
1906 Peasant Life in the Holy Land. London: Murray.
- Windisch, H.
1968 The Spirit-Paraclete in the Fourth Gospel. Translated by J. W. Cox. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Winter, P.
1953 "Μονογενὴς παρὰ Πατρός." Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte 5:335–65.
1974 On the Trial of Jesus. 2d edition. Berlin/New York: de Gruyter.
- Witherington, B.
1995 John's Wisdom. Louisville: Westminster John Knox.
- Witkamp, L. T.
1985 "The Use of Traditions in John 5:1–18." Journal for the Study of the New Testament 25:19–47.
- Workman, H. B.
1923 Persecution in the Early Church: A Chapter in the History of Renunciation. 4th edition. London: Epworth.

Wright, N. T.

- 1986 "Harpagmos and the Meaning of Philippians 2:5–11." Journal of Theological Studies 37:321–53.
1992 The New Testament and the People of God. Minneapolis: Fortress.

Wuellner, W.

- 1967 The Meaning of "Fishers of Men." New Testament Library. Philadelphia: Westminster.
1991 "Rhetorical Criticism and Its Theory in Culture-Critical Perspective: The Narrative Rhetoric of John 11." Pp. 171–85 in Text and Interpretation: New Approaches in the Criticism of the New Testament. New Testament Tools and Studies 15. Edited by P. J. Hartin and J. H. Petzer. Leiden: Brill.

Yarbrough, R. W.

- 1983 "The Date of Papias: A Reassessment." Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 26:181–91.

Young, F. W.

- 1955 "A Study of the Relation of Isaiah to the Fourth Gospel." Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 46:215–33.

Zahn, T.

- 1921 Das Evangelium des Johannes. 6th edition. Kommentar zum Neuen Testament 4. Leipzig: Deichert.

Zias, J., and E. Sekeles

- 1985 "The Crucified Man from Giv'at-ha-Mivtar." Israel Exploration Journal 35:22–27.

Zimmermann, M., and R. Zimmermann

- 1999 "Der Freund des Bräutigams (Joh 3, 29): Deflorations- oder Christuszeuge?" Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 90:123–30.

ZPEB

Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible. Edited by M. C. Tenney. 5 vols. Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1975.

Zugibe, F. T.

- 1989 "Two Questions about Crucifixion." Bible and Review 5/2:35–43.

Index of Subjects

Aaron 325

Aaronic priests 316

Abraham 47, 151, 153, 192, 234, 268, 270–73

as father of believers 34n42

42 Abraham "believed the Lord" and thus became the father of all believers (Gen. 15:6; cf. Rom.

as father of many nations 459
as friend of God 458–59
offering of Isaac 43, 67 seed of 251, 262, 263–64, 268, 275
Absalom 411
adulterous woman 226n1, 245–49
adultery 246, 265
Advocate, Spirit as 435n67, 436n70, 437

4:3, 20–24; Gal. 3:6; Heb. 11:8–12; James 2:23). Israel as a nation, however, is known in the OT primarily for unbelief (John 12:38; cf. Isa. 53:1).

1 The story of the adulterous woman in 7:53–8:11 is not found in the earliest MSS of John’s Gospel and was almost certainly not part of the Gospel the way John wrote it. Once this account is removed from the Gospel, it becomes evident that 8:12 picks up where 7:52 left off, restoring the unity of 7:1–52 and 8:12–59, which will be dealt with here as one coherent section. See further the excursus on 7:53–8:11 below.

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel . . . in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

70 The translation of the term has proved particularly difficult since there does not seem to be an exact equivalent in the English language (see discussion in Carson 1991: 499). None of the expressions chosen in English translations seems fully adequate: “Counselor” (NIV) smacks of contemporary notions of counseling (marriage counselor, camp counselor), focusing primarily on

Aenon 135
 age to come 487
 Ahithophel 371, 411
 Albinus 109
 Alexander Jannaeus 556
 Alexander the Great 569n15
 Alexandria 239
 allegory 302n18
 almsgiving 284, 418
 Alogoi 16
 Andrew 56, 76, 78, 93, 377–78
 angels 85–86, 383, 567, 568
 Annas 237, 502, 503, 510, 511, 512–14, 515–18
 anointed one 60n13, 76

emotional or psychological aspects (though the legal term “Counselor” or “Counsel” is more appropriate); “Helper” (NASB, ESV, ISV) is more neutral but conveys inferior status overtones not present in the text and lacks the legal connotation possibly present (cf. the discussion in Lindars 1972: 479); the fact that some translations give several alternative renderings in footnotes also suggests that any one English rendering may be inadequate (e.g., NLT: “the Counselor; or Comforter, or Encourager, or Advocate”). “Companion” (suggested by Brodie [1993: 466]) also falls short, as does Calvin’s (1961: 82) “Patron.” Some make reference to the root meaning of the word, “one called alongside to help,” but it is unclear whether first-century usage consciously drew on this background. There is evidence that the expression was used in a legal setting, but it is less clear that the meaning should be restricted to “Advocate” (so, consistently, the TNIV) or the like (standard Greek reference works cite the following meanings: LSJ—one called to one’s aid, legal assistant, advocate, summoned, intercessor; Behm, TDNT 5:800–814—legal advisor, helper, advocate in court [for a helpful survey, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.144–50]). Perhaps “helping presence” captures the import of the term better than any other (Köstenberger 1999a: 157) for the following reasons: (1) this is what Jesus was while with the disciples; (2) this encompasses the various functions laid out for the Spirit in John 14–16; (3) this transcends (but may include) the legal context of the term (see esp. 16:7–11). See the discussion by Ridderbos (1997: 503), who issues a plea to let the Johannine context (rather than alleged extrabiblical parallels) determine the meaning of παράκλητος and concludes that “the dominant idea is of someone who offers assistance in a situation in which help is needed.”

15 That Mary’s reaction is natural may be illustrated by one incident in the life of Alexander the Great (see Arrian, Anabasis 6.13.3 [cited in BDAG 126]). That it reveals misunderstanding is well argued by Lindars (1972: 607), who writes, “The desire to hold Jesus must be restrained, because it is an attempt to recapture the conditions of the incarnate life in place of the universal and abiding relationship which is the object of his mission.”

18 Stibbe (1993: 113) characterizes παροιμία as “a symbolic word-picture with a cryptic meaning ... essentially elusive discourse.” Morris (1995: 445) suggests that this is a rather unique form of allegory. Ridderbos (1997: 355 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 168]) opts for a parable with allegorical elements (cf. 10:7–9). Bultmann (1971: 375) describes the genre as a mixture between parable and riddle. See Köstenberger 2002b: 72–75. See also the long discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.284–88.

anointing 361–62
antichrist 266n75, 494 anti-Judaism 53n1
Antioch 239
Antiochus Epiphanes IV 154, 266n75, 309, 314n80, 316, 317n95, 350
anti-Semitic, John's Gospel as 119n14

13 The Greek word Χριστός, like its Hebrew counterpart, mešiah, means “anointed one.” Though the term was applied in the OT to a variety of men who were set apart and anointed to serve God and his people in a special capacity (such as priest or king), OT predictive prophecy gave rise to the expectation that there would be a future figure, the Anointed One, sent by God to deliver and rule his people. See especially Horbury 1998. For a convincing refutation of the claim that the present passage was written to counter a Baptist sect in the evangelist's day, see Ridderbos 1997: 64 (cf. R. Brown 1966: 48).

75 Antiochus Epiphanes IV, who erected the “abomination of desolation” in the temple in 167 B.C. and who serves as a type of the antichrist in biblical literature (see Dan. 9:27; 11:31; 12:11; cf. Matt. 24:15 par.) is called “murderer and blasphemer” in 2 Macc. 9:28 (see commentary at 10:36).

1 On the term Ἰουδαῖοι, see commentary at 1:19. The new BDAG entry on Ἰουδαῖος, which systematically recasts all “Jews” as “Judeans” in order to avoid “anti-Judaism” by modern-day readers, constitutes an unduly extreme reaction and results in demonstrably inaccurate renderings that equate all Jews with inhabitants of Judea. However, Jews lived also in Galilee and adjacent provinces, not to mention the Diaspora. Note the appropriate criticism by Lowery (2003: 120–21).

75 Antiochus Epiphanes IV, who erected the “abomination of desolation” in the temple in 167 B.C. and who serves as a type of the antichrist in biblical literature (see Dan. 9:27; 11:31; 12:11; cf. Matt. 24:15 par.) is called “murderer and blasphemer” in 2 Macc. 9:28 (see commentary at 10:36).

80 Moloney (1998: 316) notes that at the Feast of Dedication the Jews affirmed their desire to remain faithful to God, yet in the present instance they are acting in a manner similar to Antiochus IV, who tried to destroy the presence of God.

95 Some have seen a parallel to Jesus' assertion of oneness with God in Antiochus Epiphanes' boast that he was “God Manifest” (the meaning of the Greek epithet “Epiphanes”). This claim made by Antiochus may also lie behind the Jews' charge that Jesus (like the Seleucid ruler [see 2 Macc. 9:28]) was a blasphemer (cf. 10:33, 36; see VanderKam 1990: 211–14; followed by Moloney 1998: 321). See, however, the appropriate caution by Lindars (1972: 376), who distinguishes between Jesus' words here and the notion of family relationships among pagan gods. Lindars also points out that the present statement “preserves the logical priority of God, because the title Father is retained” and “denotes a personal intimacy which forestalls any suggestion of ditheism.”

14 Cf. Paulien (ABD 4:1106), who also refers to de Jonge 1971: 342; Sylva 1988: 148–49; Michel (1981: 231), who calls Nicodemus a “borderline character” (“personnage-frontière”); and Pamment (1985: 71, 73), who writes, “Nicodemus is the only individual character who fails to make a decision, remaining the good but uncommitted observer who tries to prevent injustice” (p. 73). Similarly, Conway (1999: 85–103) says that Nicodemus is a “pathetic character” who from beginning to end “is genuinely interested in Jesus, but is never able to gather the courage

anxiety 444
 apocalypticism 50, 86
 apocryphal literature 248 apostolic witnesses 78 appointment 459–60
 apprenticeship analogy 183
 Aramaic 545
 Arius 28
 arm of the Lord 391 ascent-descent pattern 127
 Askar 146–47, 148 atonement 9, 68, 297n2, 470, 496
 Augustus 164, 443
 authorial intention 4

 Babylon 262
 Babylonian exile 239 banquets 360
 baptism 63–64, 70, 123–24, 134
 Barabbas 300n10, 502, 520 barley 201
 Bartholomew 56, 79–80
 Batanea 65, 318, 328 bathing 407
 begging 284
 belief 34, 115–17, 140, 190, 207, 208
 believing 9, 38–39, 254, 564, 579–80, 581–82 and conviction to confess his belief openly” (p. 103). Note also Pazdan (1987), who sees Nicodemus’s portrayal as part of John’s reversal of the traditional geographical polemic regarding Judeans, Samaritans, and Galileans; and Burge (2000: 124), who contends that Nicodemus never became a model disciple, because “disciples confess Jesus’ identity, remain with him, and tell others.” If my assessment of Nicodemus is correct, it runs counter to the notion, popular in current scholarship, that John’s Gospel is “anti-Semitic,” for here we have a Jewish person who, though not a believer in Jesus the Messiah, represents a fair-minded, moral, kind Jewish leader, providing a counterpoint to the more hostile element on the Sanhedrin. It is also possible that John includes the Nicodemus account at least in part because he had access to individuals among the Jewish leadership (cf. 18:15b: “that disciple [the ‘other disciple’ of 18:15a, presumably the evangelist; cf. 20:2; 21:24] was known to the high priest”).

2 The reference is plainly to Jesus’ substitutionary atonement (ὑπέρ [hyper, for] in 10:11, 15; cf. 15:13). On the nature of Jesus’ work according to the Fourth Gospel, see Köstenberger 1998b: 74–81.

10 Later, Judas is called a thief (12:6), and Barabbas a robber (18:40; cf. Mark 15:7). At his arrest, Jesus asks why he is treated like a robber (Matt. 26:55 pars.), and in the end he is crucified with robbers on either side (Matt. 27:38, 44 pars.). The majority of commentators take both terms as referring to the same people (Ridderbos 1997: 354; Carson 1991: 381; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.281; contra Barrett 1978: 369). See further Hengel 1989a: 24–46; Simonis 1967: 101–3.

- and seeing 212–13
- beloved disciple 6, 32, 50, 327, 553, 600–606
 - and empty tomb 562–65
 - as John 7, 76, 584, 588n5
 - as Lazarus 322n6
 - and Mary (mother of Jesus) 540, 548–49
 - and Peter 7, 16, 413–18, 513–14, 591
 - as Thomas 331n44
- Bethany 65, 325–26, 328, 333, 359
- Bethel 86
- Bethesda 178–79, 181, 195
- Bethlehem 241–42
- Bethsaida 78–79
- Bible
 - inerrancy and inspiration 6
 - inviolability 315
- binding and loosing 575–76
- blasphemy 174, 183, 259, 273, 276, 313–14, 518, 526
- blessings 129, 304
- blood 216, 283, 552
- born again/from above 123
- born of flesh 124
- born of God 40
- Branch 83, 452
- bread 201, 411, 416
- bread of life 14, 194n104, 196, 200, 206–17, 594n37

5 The important implication for the authorship of John's Gospel is that since the "disciple Jesus loved" is identified as the author in 21:24 (cf. 21:20), and since he is one of the seven (21:7), the author must be one of the seven mentioned in 21:2. This makes it eminently plausible that the author (the "beloved disciple") is John, one of the two sons of Zebedee (Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24).

6 The conjecture that the designation "the one you love" in 11:3 points to Lazarus as the "disciple Jesus loved," the author of John's Gospel, is entirely speculative. Also, there is almost certainly no connection between this figure and the character in the parable about the rich man and Lazarus recorded in Luke 16:19–31 (rightly noted by Ridderbos 1997: 386 n. 14; Carson 1991: 404; contra Dunkerley 1959).

44 Though there is little to justify the conclusion by Charlesworth (1995) that Thomas is the "beloved disciple" (see the critique by Beck 1997: 127–31).

104 For a treatment of Moses as a character in the Fourth Gospel, see Harstine (2002: 40–75), who treats 1:17, 45; 3:14; 5:45–46; 6:32; 7:19, 22, 23; 9:28–29. According to Harstine, Moses' dominant function throughout the narrative is as a witness to Jesus (p. 72), whereby Moses serves as a historical/legendary figure similar to Jacob (4:5, 12), David (7:42), and Abraham (8:33–58). On Moses in the Fourth Gospel, see also Glasson 1963; Meeks 1967; and Boismard 1993. Keener (2003: 662) observes how, on a literary level, the closing appeal to Moses in 5:45–47 prepares the way for chapter 6, where Jesus is presented as the new Moses providing God's bridegroom 138

burial 333, 342–43, 364
Caiaphas 103n8
prophecy of death of Jesus 349, 351–52, 375 and trial of Jesus 503, 511, 512–14, 518, 535, 538
Cain 266
Caleb 273
calendar 400n1 calling 602
call narratives 71–73

people with the new “bread from heaven.”

37 On the strength of the fact that only here and in John 6 is there mention of fish and bread, and that John 6 includes Jesus’ “bread of life discourse,” which displays eucharistic overtones, Shaw (1974) contends that the present pericope and Jesus’ encounter with Mary Magdalene (seeing parallels between 20:17 and 3:13; 6:62) constitute “eucharistic narratives.” He also perceives the presence of a “quasi-eucharistic meal” in the Lukan Emmaus narrative (24:13–35). According to Shaw, the point made in the two Johannine “eucharistic narratives” is that believers on this side of the ascension are able to encounter Christ by way of participation in the Eucharist. Despite its considerable sophistication, however, Shaw’s effort represents an unsuccessful effort to impose eucharistic theology onto the narratives in question. Not only are the links between chapter 6 and chapters 20 and 21 not as pronounced as he alleges, but also there is in fact a rather stark contrast between the extensive elaboration on Jesus as the “bread of life” in chapter 6 and the absence of such “eucharistic” elaboration in chapters 20 and 21.

8 Evans (1989: 265–67, citing Eppstein 1964) concludes that Caiaphas may have been the first high priest to authorize the sale of sacrificial animals in the temple precincts (perhaps because of a quarrel with the Sanhedrin), which may have provoked Jesus’ response. Eppstein places this quarrel at A.D. 30, which would be precisely the time at which, according to my reconstruction, Jesus cleared the temple (the spring of A.D. 30; but see the cautionary comments in Evans 1989: 266–67).

1 Cf. “six days before the Passover” in 12:1; “the next day” in 12:12. Carson (1991: 455–58) rightly concludes that Jesus and his disciples ate a true paschal meal on Thursday, 15 Nisan (contra Barrett 1978: 50–51; R. Brown 1970: 556; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.36). On the chronology of the passion narrative in John and the Synoptics (siding with Carson, despite Morris 1995: 688–90), see the sidebar in Köstenberger 1999a: 146, with further bibliographical references (see also Köstenberger 2002c: 130, 164, 173; Blomberg 1987: 175–80; Carson 1984: 530–32). Some seek to adjudicate apparent differences between the presentations in John and the Synoptics by the theory that differences in chronology are due to the use of different calendars. John, it is suggested, like the Judeans and the Sadducees, uses a lunar sunset-to-sunset calendar, while the Synoptics, like the Galileans, the Pharisees, and Jesus and his followers, employ a solar sunrise-to-sunrise reckoning (Hoehner 1977: 85–90; see chart on p. 89; Morris 1995: 684–95); or, John’s calendric usage shifts: his light-darkness theme (rooted in the Genesis account) is conveyed by way of a solar calendar, while elsewhere a lunar system is found (building on exodus redemptive motifs) (Busada 2003). However, these theories seem to lack a clear textual base in the Gospels themselves and are unnecessarily complicated if the solution argued here is adopted.

Calvary 543
 Cana 54, 56, 81, 87, 92, 100, 138, 168–69, 170
 canon 4, 16–17, 437
 Capernaum 79, 100, 166, 170, 206 capital punishment 526–27 centurion 169
 Cephas 77
 character 454, 455 charitable deeds 284
 chiasm 20–21, 23
 chief priests 237, 348–49, 355, 365, 506 chief shepherds 300 childbirth 476
 p 642 children of Abraham 264 children of God 39–40, 268, 353
 Christ (term) 582, 583
 Christology 1, 13, 49n95, 236, 479n76 circumcision 184, 234 cleansing 96, 399, 406–7 cockcrow 520 cohort 505
 common grace 30n36
 Companion, Spirit as 436n70

95 On the level of the original readers of John's Gospel, Keener (2003: 426) observes that "[t]o Jewish Christians needing to lay even their lives on the line because of their Christology, John reminds them that Christology is at the heart of their faith in Israel's God."

76 Carson (1991: 548) notes how 16:28 sums up Jesus' entire mission, from his sending from the Father (3:16–17) through the incarnation (1:10–11, 14) to his departure from the world (14:19) and his return to the Father (the dominant theme of chs. 14–17). Similarly, Borchert 2002: 179. Barrett (1978: 496) even calls the verse "a complete summary ... of the Christian faith,"

Beasley-Murray (1999: 287) "at once a summary of Johannine Christology and the heart of this Gospel" (combined by Burge 2000: 443), and Stibbe (1996: 174) "the parade example of this theme of the eternal origin and destiny of Jesus the Messiah."

36 Hence, the present reference is to light that only believers possess; contra Calvin (1959: 11), who speaks of the "light" of common grace given to humans, that is, ethical rationality, which animals lack: "I think that this is a reference to that part of life in which men surpass the other animate creatures. It is as if he were saying that the life given to men was not life in general but life united with the light of reason."

70 The translation of the term has proved particularly difficult since there does not seem to be an exact equivalent in the English language (see discussion in Carson 1991: 499). None of the expressions chosen in English translations seems fully adequate: "Counselor" (NIV) smacks of contemporary notions of counseling (marriage counselor, camp counselor), focusing primarily on emotional or psychological aspects (though the legal term "Counselor" or "Counsel" is more appropriate); "Helper" (NASB, ESV, ISV) is more neutral but conveys inferior status overtones not present in the text and lacks the legal connotation possibly present (cf. the discussion in Lindars

compatibilism 391, 535
consecration 495–96
consummation 476
Cornelius 172
Counselor, Spirit as 436n70

1972: 479); the fact that some translations give several alternative renderings in footnotes also suggests that any one English rendering may be inadequate (e.g., NLT: “the Counselor; or Comforter, or Encourager, or Advocate”). “Companion” (suggested by Brodie [1993: 466]) also falls short, as does Calvin’s (1961: 82) “Patron.” Some make reference to the root meaning of the word, “one called alongside to help,” but it is unclear whether first-century usage consciously drew on this background. There is evidence that the expression was used in a legal setting, but it is less clear that the meaning should be restricted to “Advocate” (so, consistently, the TNIV) or the like (standard Greek reference works cite the following meanings: LSJ—one called to one’s aid, legal assistant, advocate, summoned, intercessor; Behm, TDNT 5:800–814—legal advisor, helper, advocate in court [for a helpful survey, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.144–50]). Perhaps “helping presence” captures the import of the term better than any other (Köstenberger 1999a: 157) for the following reasons: (1) this is what Jesus was while with the disciples; (2) this encompasses the various functions laid out for the Spirit in John 14–16; (3) this transcends (but may include) the legal context of the term (see esp. 16:7–11). See the discussion by Ridderbos (1997: 503), who issues a plea to let the Johannine context (rather than alleged extrabiblical parallels) determine the meaning of παράκλητος and concludes that “the dominant idea is of someone who offers assistance in a situation in which help is needed.”

70 The translation of the term has proved particularly difficult since there does not seem to be an exact equivalent in the English language (see discussion in Carson 1991: 499). None of the expressions chosen in English translations seems fully adequate: “Counselor” (NIV) smacks of contemporary notions of counseling (marriage counselor, camp counselor), focusing primarily on emotional or psychological aspects (though the legal term “Counselor” or “Counsel” is more appropriate); “Helper” (NASB, ESV, ISV) is more neutral but conveys inferior status overtones not present in the text and lacks the legal connotation possibly present (cf. the discussion in Lindars 1972: 479); the fact that some translations give several alternative renderings in footnotes also suggests that any one English rendering may be inadequate (e.g., NLT: “the Counselor; or Comforter, or Encourager, or Advocate”). “Companion” (suggested by Brodie [1993: 466]) also falls short, as does Calvin’s (1961: 82) “Patron.” Some make reference to the root meaning of the word, “one called alongside to help,” but it is unclear whether first-century usage consciously drew on this background. There is evidence that the expression was used in a legal setting, but it is less clear that the meaning should be restricted to “Advocate” (so, consistently, the TNIV) or the like (standard Greek reference works cite the following meanings: LSJ—one called to one’s aid, legal assistant, advocate, summoned, intercessor; Behm, TDNT 5:800–814—legal advisor, helper, advocate in court [for a helpful survey, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.144–50]). Perhaps “helping presence” captures the import of the term better than any other (Köstenberger 1999a: 157) for the following reasons: (1) this is what Jesus was while with the disciples; (2) this encompasses the various functions laid out for the Spirit in John 14–16; (3) this transcends (but may include) the legal context of the term (see esp. 16:7–11). See the discussion by Ridderbos (1997: 503), who issues a plea to let the Johannine context (rather than alleged extrabiblical parallels) determine the meaning of παράκλητος and concludes that “the dominant idea is of courtroom terminology 131 covenant 430, 501 cowardice 116n6, 444 creation 13, 19–22, 25–27, 30, 161, 185, 258 critical realism 6 cross 375–76 crowds 200, 231, 364–65, 372 crown of thorns 532 crucifixion 241, 385, 526–27, 543, 546, 598–99 crypto-believers 392 cup of wrath 509

 curses 129

 darkness 27, 31–32, 36, 254, 282, 418, 561n3
 David 273, 413n8
 as king 84, 263, 370, 386
 as shepherd 300, 305
 as type 411, 467
 Day of Atonement 229, 263 day of the Lord 272
 death 270, 336, 339, 343, 345, 457, 509 demons 2, 268–69, 270, 308, 403, 416–17 demythologization 2, 439n80

someone who offers assistance in a situation in which help is needed.”

6 As Michaels (1989: 53) notes, the problem is not signs-based faith, but cowardice and failure to acknowledge one’s faith openly. Whitacre (1999: 86) similarly notes that signs-based faith is not the problem (citing 10:38; 12:37; 14:12; 20:30–31; cf. R. Brown 1966: 525–29), but that by its very nature, all faith prior to Jesus’ glorification and the coming of the Spirit is immature. Borchert (1996: 167–69) wrongly includes even the disciples of 2:11 among the group whose faith is illegitimately signs-based in 2:23.

3 Often, though not always, in John, darkness connotes evil or unbelief (see 1:5; 8:12; 9:4; 11:10; 12:35, 46; 13:30). It is not clear that it does so here (contra Maccini 1996: 208; Carson 1991: 635–36; Borchert 2002: 291; R. Brown 1970: 981; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.308; Moloney 1998: 518).

8 Jesus’ experience closely parallels that of David, who expressed extreme anguish over the betrayal of a close friend (Ps. 55:2–14; see also Ps. 31:9–10; 38:10; and other references to Davidic psalms noted in commentary at 11:33).

80 See Morris (1995: 579), who says that “if this is accepted it must be in the sense of 20:22, where the Spirit was in some sense given on the day of resurrection”; and Bruce (1983: 303), who points out that the resurrection appearances were but brief and temporary. See also Barrett (1978: 464), who maintains that the primary reference is to the resurrection but the expression also extends to the presence of Christ in his disciples (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 258). In the patristic period, the Eastern church fathers understood the phrase “in a little while” to refer to the resurrection, while the Latin church thought that Jesus meant the parousia. Bultmann (1971: 619) contends that John’s source referred to the latter, with the evangelist demythologizing his source by reinterpreting it as the former. Hence, the second coming is swallowed up in Easter. However,

denarius 201, 363
 destruction 494
 devil 267
 Diaspora 239, 258
Diatessaron 16
Didascalia apostolorum 248
 Didymus 331. See also Thomas dinner 359–60
 Dionysos 449
 dirt 283
 disciple Jesus loved. See beloved disciple disciples 7, 9, 101, 143, 158, 220–24, 233, 413, 459 calling of 71–78 commissioning 412, 496, 575 defection and restoration 218, 480 humility 464
 as Jesus’ successors 433 love for Jesus 434
 misunderstanding 475, 479–80 and resurrection appearance 588–93
 self-sacrifice 379
 discipleship 118, 159, 233, 261, 379, 455, 602
 disobedience 129
 Docetism 41, 341n95, 552n67, 578
 Domitian 465, 528n37

this reconstruction is predicated upon Bultmann’s source theory regarding John’s Gospel as well as upon his existential approach to interpretation, including the categories of “myth” and “demythologization.” Yet note how even after his resurrection, Jesus refers to a future time at which he will return (21:22, 23). Moloney (1998: 403) implausibly contends that “that day” is Jesus’ hour and departure.

95 Contra the unilateral docetic emphasis on Jesus’ deity (see Ridderbos 1997: 402–3). See the brief discussion and references to Jesus’ thirst, tiredness, and so on in Köstenberger 1998b: 50. See also Stibbe (1993: 124–25), who notes that Jesus “is not some mystical, neo-Platonic God who stands far beyond the harsh realities endured by those trapped within a frail mortality,” but rather is “the deity who sheds tears, who feels anger, and who dares to look through the dark threshold of a place which he himself will have to enter.”

67 See Lev. Rab. 15.2 on Lev. 13:2. Commentators disagree as to whether or not the present reference is intended to counter incipient Docetism, which denied Jesus’ full humanity at his death. Some consider this unlikely (Ridderbos [1997: 620], who thinks that the present passage is simply designed to further support the reliability and eyewitness nature of the account; R. Brown 1970: 949–52), while a majority favors such a polemic purpose (e.g., Carson [1991: 623], who sees this verse as the “counterpoint” to 1:14; Barrett 1978: 556; Morris 1995: 724; Beasley-Murray 1999: 356; Borchert 2002: 276–77; Burge 2000: 532).

37 The answer given by the grandchildren of Jude, Jesus’ half-brother, at a trial before Domitian echoes Jesus’ words (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.20.6 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 166]). Jesus’

donkey 370–71
 doubting 579 dove 69
 dwelling 425–26, 440–41, 501 earth 126, 138–39, 258–59 eating and drinking 216 eating bread 411

 Ehud 165
 Eighteen Benedictions 288, 335n64, 539
 Eleazar 325
 election 222, 459, 487, 490n34
 Eliezer, Rabbi 346
 Elijah 127, 203, 244, 270, 495, 564n24
 John the Baptist as 60–61, 191 miracles of 171, 187, 196, 316n92, 321n4

description of the nature of his kingdom is reminiscent of certain passages in Daniel (e.g., 2:44; 7:14, 27).

64 The resurrection of the dead was the subject of lively debate between the Pharisees and their opponents (e.g., b. Sanh. 90b, referring to Deut. 31:16; Isa. 26:19; and Song 7:9). Other mishnaic passages likewise denounce those who refuse to affirm the resurrection of the dead (m. Sanh. 10.1; cf. m. Ber. 9.5). Belief in the resurrection is also evident from the second of the Eighteen Benedictions: “Lord, you are almighty forever, who makes the dead alive. . . . Blessed are you, Lord, who makes the dead alive” (cf. m. Ber. 5.2; m. Soṭah 9.15; see Schürer 1973–79: 2.456). 34 On “your name,” see also 17:26 (see commentary at 14:13). On “those whom you gave me,” see 17:2. Regarding “out of the world,” see 1:9–10; 15:19. Regarding the phrase “they were yours, and you gave them to me,” Calvin (1961: 139) comments that this speaks of “the eternity of election,” “not by faith, nor by any merit, but by pure grace.” It might be added that God’s election is presented here as the grounds for the perseverance of those so chosen (“they have kept your word”).

24 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 638; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Borchert 2002: 295; R. Brown 1970: 987; Bultmann 1971: 684; Burge 2000: 554; Laney 1992: 360. Witherington (1995: 325) suggests, less plausibly, that the beloved disciple believed that Jesus had been taken by God similar to Elijah. Morris (1995: 736) notes that the two verbs do not have explicit objects, supplying the graveclothes as the object of the beloved disciple’s “seeing” and Jesus’ resurrection as that of the disciple’s “believing” (albeit without understanding its full theological significance). Hardly plausible is the suggestion by Minear (1983: 91 n. 14, with reference to 1976 [followed by Conway 1999: 189–90]) that what the disciples believed was the statement of Mary Magdalene in 20:2.

92 Old Testament figures recognized for performing unusual works were Elisha (who was given the key to the womb and enabled a barren woman to conceive), Elijah (who was given the key to the rain in answer to prayer), and both prophets together with Ezekiel (who were given the key to the graves and who raised the dead)—all three works usually being reserved for God’s direct intervention (Midr. Ps. 78 §5).

4 Old Testament instances of raisings of the dead include Elijah’s raising of the widow’s son (1 Kings 17:17–24); Elisha’s raising of the son of the Shunammite woman (2 Kings 4:32–37);

Elisha 196, 203, 283, 316n92, 321n4

“elusive Christ” 52n2, 64n29, 146, 203, 228, 274, 446n104, 507n26, 558n6

Elisha’s “posthumous” raising of a dead man (2 Kings 13:21); and the witch of Endor’s illicit summoning of Samuel from the dead at King Saul’s request (1 Sam. 28) (see also Ezekiel’s vision of the valley of dry bones [Ezek. 37:1–14]). Raisings of the dead were generally viewed in light of the final resurrection and as an expression of God’s power to bring it about.

92 Old Testament figures recognized for performing unusual works were Elisha (who was given the key to the womb and enabled a barren woman to conceive), Elijah (who was given the key to the rain in answer to prayer), and both prophets together with Ezekiel (who were given the key to the graves and who raised the dead)—all three works usually being reserved for God’s direct intervention (Midr. Ps. 78 §5).

4 Old Testament instances of raisings of the dead include Elijah’s raising of the widow’s son (1 Kings 17:17–24); Elisha’s raising of the son of the Shunammite woman (2 Kings 4:32–37); Elisha’s “posthumous” raising of a dead man (2 Kings 13:21); and the witch of Endor’s illicit summoning of Samuel from the dead at King Saul’s request (1 Sam. 28) (see also Ezekiel’s vision of the valley of dry bones [Ezek. 37:1–14]). Raisings of the dead were generally viewed in light of the final resurrection and as an expression of God’s power to bring it about.

2 Stibbe, in a fascinating article entitled “The Elusive Christ,” has shown that John portrays Jesus as elusive both in his language (chs. 2–4) and in his movements (chs. 5–10). In chapters 11 and 12, “tension mounts as Jesus openly returns to the place of maximum danger and as the Sanhedrin formally plot to have Jesus killed” (Stibbe 1991: 36). Stibbe’s literary analysis further confirms the divisions sketched above into an initial “Cana cycle” in chapters 2–4 and a “festival cycle” in chapters 5–10, with chapters 11–12 occupying a bridge function. Even the pivotal defection in chapter 6, followed by the narration of opposition in Jesus’ family in chapter 7, seems to be borne out by Stibbe’s study in that all but one of the references to the Jews seeking Jesus in order to kill (or arrest) him are found after this pivot (5:18; 7:1, 19, 20, 25, 30; 8:37, 40; 10:39; 11:8) (Stibbe 1991: 22).

29 Stibbe (1993: 33) again points to the theme of the “elusive Christ”: “Even though Jesus is not visibly on stage, his elusive presence is felt in the Baptist’s rather obscure remark. . . . The reference here is clearly to the mysterious and elusive presence of Jesus himself.” Beyond this, the phrase “one whom you do not know” may also allude to the view held by some in that day that before commencing his public ministry, the Messiah would live a hidden life on earth (see commentary at 1:31; 7:27; see also Ridderbos 1997: 68; Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. d). The word “stand” (ἔστηκεν, hestēken), a perfect, has present force (cf. Mark 10:19; Acts 26:27; Heb. 6:9; see Wallace 1996: 579–80).

104 The transition from 14:31 to 15:1 is frequently labeled an aporia, which is commonly taken to indicate a literary seam indicating the presence of different underlying sources (one of the first to see such a difficulty was C. H. Weiss 1856: 116; cf. Wellhausen 1907 and the influential series of essays by E. Schwartz 1907; 1908; see the historical survey in Kellum 2005: 10–78). However, this conclusion seems premature and unwarranted in light of preferable alternate explanations. Thielman (1991: 180), for instance, suggests that the present passage may be an instance of a “purposeful attempt at obscurity” common in ancient writers (he cites the transition from 5:47 to 6:1 as another possible example). Recently, Kellum (2005: 230) has suggested that statements indicating movement in the Fourth Gospel regularly serve as ways to move along the narrative. Stibbe (1993: 159), too, is able to make “very good sense” of the narrative as it stands empty tomb 346, 558, 560, 561–65

 encouragement 437
 English deists 2
 Enlightenment 2, 5
 Enoch 85, 127, 270
 Ephesus 7, 34, 91n6
 Ephraim 354
 Esau 281n13
 eschatological dualism 13
 eschatological grace 47
 eschatology 212
 Essenes 415
 eternal death 393 eternal life 9, 18, 122–23, 129–30, 140, 142, 152, 184, 193, 207, 212, 214, 215, 304, 486–87, 581 eternal sonship 445
 Et-Taiyibeh 354
 evil 131, 281, 403, 494–95, 561n3

without resorting to source-critical theories. For him, 14:31 is part of the Johannine theme of “the elusive Christ.” After saying in 14:30 that the devil “has no hold” on him, Jesus, knowing that the “prince of this world” is now coming, is evading his captors for one final time. Schlatter (1948: 304), finally, makes the improbable suggestion that the unevenness may be due to a break in dictation.

26 This, then, becomes the climax of the “elusive Christ” motif in John’s Gospel. However, Stibbe (1993: 184) unduly dichotomizes when he says that the soldiers drew back in amazement “not so much because Jesus is divine as because they have at last apprehended the elusive Christ.” It is unclear to me how this reading can be firmly established from the text.

6 Apart from the connections mentioned below, Stibbe (1993: 204) detects aspects of “the elusive Christ” again in John 20 (he says that this is the “primary characteristic” of the portrayal of Jesus in this chapter). As Stibbe notes, “Jesus’ resurrection body is not immediately recognizable as the same as his pre-resurrection body,” which makes him “a Messiah who is not easy to grasp in any conventional sense.”

6 Some in John’s Ephesian audience may also have read the present account in light of the myth of Dionysus, the Greek god of wine and most popular deity in the Hellenistic world (Hengel 1995).

13 Regarding the possibility that the man’s blindness from birth may be the result of prenatal sin, compare Jewish speculation surrounding the struggle of Jacob and Esau in their mother Rebecca’s womb (Gen. 25:22; cf. Gen. Rab. 63.6). There are also several parallels regarding the possibility that the man’s blindness was the result of his parents’ sin prior to his birth (Cant. Rab. 1.6 §3; Ruth Rab. 6.4; Tg. Ps.-J. of Deut. 21:20). However, several passages in the OT and Second Temple literature strongly challenge the notion that children suffer for their parents’ sin (e.g., Jer. 31:29–30; Ezek. 18; cf. Tob. 3:3).

3 Often, though not always, in John, darkness connotes evil or unbelief (see 1:5; 8:12; 9:4; 11:10; 12:35, 46; 13:30). It is not clear that it does so here (contra Maccini 1996: 208; Carson 1991: 635–36; Borchert 2002: 291; R. Brown 1970: 981; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.308; Moloney

example 408
exodus 41n66, 104, 170, 207, 209, 215, 217, 218, 237, 254, 390 eyewitnesses 33, 75, 81–82, 96 faith 34, 39n60, 128, 317, 390, 449, 488n21, 553 falsehood 438

false prophets 193–94, 286n43, 516
farewell discourse 395, 396–98, 399, 419, 422–23, 468, 483, 485, 495
Father 9, 186, 191, 265, 313, 381–82, 445, 493. See also God drawing action 213
 glory 455
 love for Son 187, 397, 456, 478 as one who sent Jesus 470 as righteous 499–500
 as vinedresser 450–51
 will 212
 as witness 192
fear 288, 444, 567
Feast of Booths 229

1998: 518).

66 While some see the tabernacle parallel (see Exod. 35–40), others look to the tent of meeting in Exod. 33 (Morris 1995: 92) or the exodus in general (Beasley-Murray 1999: 14).

60 Some identify “children of God,” not “those who believe,” as the antecedent of the relative clause beginning 1:13 in order not to make faith follow regeneration (Bultmann 1971: 59 nn. 4–5). However, this is both syntactically awkward and implausible, as well as theologically unnecessary. In the Greek syntax, “those who believe” immediately precedes the relative clause and is thus most naturally taken as the antecedent, and the relationship between faith and rebirth is not easily reduced to a set sequential formula. The statement in 1 John 5:1, “Everyone who believes that Jesus is the Christ is born of God,” allows one to deduce from a person’s belief that person’s regenerate state; regeneration (being “born of God”) and saving faith thus go together and cannot be separated. Spiritual rebirth takes place at God’s initiative; people are called to faith based on God’s revelation in Christ. John nowhere elaborates on the precise temporal relationship of these two aspects. Here and elsewhere in his Gospel (6:44–45; 10:26; 12:37–40), he affirms both divine sovereignty and human responsibility, and interpreters should do no less (see Carson 1981).

21 Carson (1991: 556) writes, “Knowledge of God and of Jesus Christ entails fellowship, trust, personal relationship, faith.” Similarly, Barrett (1978: 504) comments, “Saving knowledge is rooted in knowledge of a historical person; it is therefore objective and at the same time a personal relation.” This is in keeping with the Hebrew use of the term “to know,” which encompasses even the most intimate human relationship, sexual intercourse. Thus, Gen. 4:1 LXX says that Adam “knew” (ἐγνων, egnō) his wife, Eve, and she became pregnant and gave birth to her son.

43 Incidentally, the second group apparently disregards the fact that Pharaoh’s magicians were able to perform miracles as well (Exod. 7:11, 22; 8:7; but cf. 8:18–19). As Kruse (2003: 224) points out, their reasoning was defective—false prophets sometimes do perform miracles—but their conclusion was correct.

Feast of Dedication 224, 226, 229, 278, 298, 309, 313, 314n80, 316, 329
 Feast of Lights 309
 Feast of Tabernacles 14, 150, 168, 177, 195, 224–25, 226, 229, 232, 239–40, 257, 278, 309, 369
 Feast of Unleavened Bread 417, 524 p 643 feeding of the multitude 173, 196, 199–203 festivals 168, 173, 298
 fig tree 83
 fire 454
 fish 202
 fishing 589–93
 flesh 40, 41, 124, 215–17, 219
 flock 15, 299–300, 301, 307 flogging 531, 552
 following 254
 follow me 379
 food 161
 footwashing 395, 399, 400–409, 424 forgiveness 575
 fornication 153
 Fourth Gospel. See John, Gospel of freedom 261–62, 263 friendship 458–59 friends of God 458–59 fruit 452–55, 460, 477
 fruitlessness 455n31
 fruit of the Spirit 443n96 fulfillment of Tabernacles symbolism 226, 250, 253, 277 fulfillment quotations 390–92, 547n37

80 Moloney (1998: 316) notes that at the Feast of Dedication the Jews affirmed their desire to remain faithful to God, yet in the present instance they are acting in a manner similar to Antiochus IV, who tried to destroy the presence of God.

31 Conversely, fruitlessness fails to give God the glory that he so amply deserves (Carson 1991: 518). The use of ἐδοξάσθη (edoxasthē, lit., he was glorified) resembles the similar instances of passive aorist forms (with the agents remaining unspecified) in 15:6 (Borchert 2002: 145). The conjunction ἵνα (hina) functions appositionally, meaning “namely” or “that” (Wallace 1996: 475–76).

96 Along with his peace, the departing Jesus also bestows on his followers his love (15:9–10) and joy (15:11). This triad is found also in the Pauline teaching on the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22).

37 See the extensive discussion by Carson (1991: 614), who contends that “the Evangelist sees in the entire distribution of Jesus’ clothes a fulfillment of both lines of Psalm 22:18, but mentions the peculiarity of the decision about the tunic because he was an eyewitness, and possibly because he saw something symbolic in the seamless garment.” Regarding the use of Ps. 22 in ancient Jewish writings, see Str-B 2:574–80. Regarding the “fulfillment quotations” in the latter fullness 46

Gabath 537

Galilee 167–68, 172, 224, 228–29, 241–42, 244, 318, 378, 587

Gallio 525

Gamaliel II, Rabbi 288, 346, 555

garden 556

gate 300, 302–3

gatekeeper 300

gate of heaven 303

general revelation 35

Gentiles 63–64, 169, 239, 306–7, 353, 355, 377, 384–85

worship of 103, 106

Gethsemane 504

gift of God 150

glory 42, 489

gnosticism 2, 8, 17, 18, 41, 46, 488n22, 490, 578

God. See also Father faithfulness 45, 480

as Father 27–28, 44, 185

glory 42, 90, 99, 289, 328, 343–44, 381

holiness 102

judgment 509

love 128–29, 402, 457–58, 487

name 490–91, 493

power 382, 391n5

sovereignty 38, 39n60, 130, 328, 526, 535

half of John's Gospel, which reach their crescendo in the passion narrative, see commentary at 12:38. "So this is what the soldiers did" seeks to bring closure to the section narrating the soldiers' actions (19:16b–24).

22 In his first epistle, John disputes the communion with God falsely claimed by gnostic teachers. In the DSS, "life" and "eternal knowledge" are set in close parallelism (1QS 2:3; cf. 1QS 4:22; 11:3–4). The expression "eternal life" is found in those writings as well (CD 3:20). In Hellenistic and oriental cults, it was the vision of God received by the initiate that was considered to be the source of life and salvation. Philo spoke of "holding that the knowledge of him is the consummation of happiness. It is also age-long life" (Spec. Laws 1.63 §345; cf. Unchang. 30 §143).

5 The phrase "arm of the Lord" frequently serves as a figurative expression for God's power in the OT. See Deut. 5:15; Isa. 40:10; 51:9; 52:10; 63:5; cf. Luke 1:51.

60 Some identify "children of God," not "those who believe," as the antecedent of the relative clause beginning 1:13 in order not to make faith follow regeneration (Bultmann 1971: 59 nn. 4–5). However, this is both syntactically awkward and implausible, as well as theologically unnecessary. In the Greek syntax, "those who believe" immediately precedes the relative clause and is thus most naturally taken as the antecedent, and the relationship between faith and rebirth is not easily reduced to a set sequential formula. The statement in 1 John 5:1, "Everyone who believes that Jesus is the Christ is born of God," allows one to deduce from a person's belief that as spirit 156

wrath 140, 258, 393
God-fearers 377
Golgotha 543
good shepherd 68, 173, 297–98, 299–307, 507n23, 508 grace 44–45, 46–47 grain of wheat 378
grave robbers 563–64, 568 greater things 87, 184, 294n79, 433
Greece 262
Greek diaspora 238
Greek dualism 31n38, 41
Greek language 545
Greeks 239, 375, 376, 377–78 grief 475

person's regenerate state; regeneration (being "born of God") and saving faith thus go together and cannot be separated. Spiritual rebirth takes place at God's initiative; people are called to faith based on God's revelation in Christ. John nowhere elaborates on the precise temporal relationship of these two aspects. Here and elsewhere in his Gospel (6:44–45; 10:26; 12:37–40), he affirms both divine sovereignty and human responsibility, and interpreters should do no less (see Carson 1981).

23 Stibbe (1993: 182–84) takes this one step further when he says that in 18:1–11, Jesus "plays the part" of the good shepherd, and Judas that of the thief; and that in 18:15–27, the beloved disciple "plays the part" of the shepherd who walks in and out of the fold; the girl at the gate "plays the part" of the gatekeeper; and Peter is equated with the role of the hired hand who runs away in the hour of danger. Stibbe may be right in the case of Jesus acting as the good shepherd, Judas as the thief, and Peter as the hired hand. But if the beloved disciple is said to play the part of the shepherd just because he is shown to walk in and out of the high priest's courtyard, one may perhaps also argue that Pilate is portrayed as a shepherd, since he too is shown repeatedly going in and out of his palace when oscillating back and forth between the crowds and Jesus. Stibbe's reading here is too allegorical and lacks restraint; construing John 18 as, in essence, an allegorical outplaying of John 10 seems to take careful literary analysis a step too far.

79 Though Carson (1991: 376 [cf. Morris 1995: 439]) also notes the judging role of the Son of Man (5:27), which coheres well with 9:39–41. Ridderbos (1997: 348) points out how Jesus repeatedly shifts to this title to reveal "greater things" about himself (1:51; 3:13; 6:27, 62; 8:28).

38 Some believe that John is alluding here to the Greek dualism between light and darkness. Rather than affirming belief in a personal God who is sovereign, all-powerful, and good, the Greeks viewed reality in terms of polar opposites, such as light and darkness or good and evil. John, however, refutes this kind of thinking in his first epistle, where he states emphatically, "God is light; in him there is no darkness at all" (1 John 1:5). Another kind of light/darkness dualism is found in the DSS, particularly the War Scroll (1QM) depicting the battle between the "sons of light" and the "sons of darkness." Yet, because of the sectarian nature of the Qumran community, light is never offered to those who live in darkness (cf. 1QS 3:21; 4:9–14) (Bauckham 1997). In John, on the other hand, Jesus urges his listeners, "Put your trust in the light while you have it, so that you may become sons of light" (12:36; cf. 8:12; 9:5).

hardening, of opposition 348, 391
harvest 161–63
Hasmoneans 350, 527, 530ⁿ⁴² hatred 379, 466 healing of lame man 173, 174–83 of man born blind 173, 181ⁿ³², 250, 277–78, 280–85, 292, 311 of royal officer's son 166–72 hearts 425 heaven 85–86, 126–27, 137, 138–39, 210, 258–59, 426ⁿ²⁶ heavenly voice 381–82
Hebrew Scriptures. See Old Testament heel 411
Hellenistic philosophy 26
helping presence 397, 436ⁿ⁷⁰, 438, 471, 475. See also Paraclete

42 The practice may go back to Hasmonean times and may have been continued by the Romans after taking over Palestine. See Josephus, Ant. 20.9.3 §209; Livy, Roman History 5.13; b. Pesah. 91a. See Blinzler 1959: 218–21.

32 Compare and contrast this healing especially with that of the blind man in John 9, which also takes place on a Sabbath (see the chart in Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 109). The Synoptics include at least five incidents that involve healing on the Sabbath and incur the wrath of the Jewish leaders: (1) Mark 1:21–28 par.; (2) Matt. 8:14–15 pars.; (3) Matt. 12:9–14 pars.; (4) Luke 13:10–17; (5) Luke 14:1–6 (Matthew features two, Mark three, and Luke all five incidents).

26 Apocalyptic Second Temple literature provides descriptions of heavenly dwelling places for the saints (e.g., 1 Enoch 39:4–5; 41:2; 71:16; 2 Enoch 61:2–3). Note Luke 16:9, where Jesus speaks of his disciples' being “welcomed into eternal dwellings.” Philo regards heaven as a paternal house or city to which the soul returns after death (Dreams 1.39 §256; cf. Conf. Tong. 17 §78; Heir 55 §274; Mos. 2.51 §288). The rabbis believed that there were seven classes or departments, graded according to merit, in the heavenly garden of Eden (Midr. Ps. 11 §6); the church fathers held similar views. John, however, is decidedly nonapocalyptic (the exception may be 1:51), and his treatment is much more restrained than Philo's existential allegorizing. The rabbinic notion of a compartmentalized heaven is likewise foreign to John.

70 The translation of the term has proved particularly difficult since there does not seem to be an exact equivalent in the English language (see discussion in Carson 1991: 499). None of the expressions chosen in English translations seems fully adequate: “Counselor” (NIV) smacks of contemporary notions of counseling (marriage counselor, camp counselor), focusing primarily on emotional or psychological aspects (though the legal term “Counselor” or “Counsel” is more appropriate); “Helper” (NASB, ESV, ISV) is more neutral but conveys inferior status overtones not present in the text and lacks the legal connotation possibly present (cf. the discussion in Lindars 1972: 479); the fact that some translations give several alternative renderings in footnotes also suggests that any one English rendering may be inadequate (e.g., NLT: “the Counselor; or Comforter, or Encourager, or Advocate”). “Companion” (suggested by Brodie [1993: 466]) also falls short, as does Calvin's (1961: 82) “Patron.” Some make reference to the root meaning of the word, “one called alongside to help,” but it is unclear whether first-century usage consciously drew on this background. There is evidence that the expression was used in a legal setting, but it

Heracleon 17
Herakles 481n84
hermeneutic of belief 4n9
hermeneutic of suspicion 4n9

is less clear that the meaning should be restricted to “Advocate” (so, consistently, the TNIV) or the like (standard Greek reference works cite the following meanings: LSJ—one called to one’s aid, legal assistant, advocate, summoned, intercessor; Behm, TDNT 5:800–814—legal advisor, helper, advocate in court [for a helpful survey, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.144–50]). Perhaps “helping presence” captures the import of the term better than any other (Köstenberger 1999a: 157) for the following reasons: (1) this is what Jesus was while with the disciples; (2) this encompasses the various functions laid out for the Spirit in John 14–16; (3) this transcends (but may include) the legal context of the term (see esp. 16:7–11). See the discussion by Ridderbos (1997: 503), who issues a plea to let the Johannine context (rather than alleged extrabiblical parallels) determine the meaning of παράκλητος and concludes that “the dominant idea is of someone who offers assistance in a situation in which help is needed.”

84 This is the only instance of the term νικάω (nikaō, triumph) in John’s Gospel. The expression occurs several times in John’s first epistle (2:13, 14; 4:4; 5:4, 5) and over a dozen times in the Book of Revelation (esp. in the letters to the seven churches in chs. 2 and 3; see Schlatter 1948: 317). The related noun νίκη (nikē, victory) occurs in 1 John 5:4. Other NT references to the victory won by Jesus (extended to believers) include John 12:31; Rom. 8:37 (ὑπερνικάω, hypernikaō); 1 Cor. 15:57 (νίκος, nikos). The verb occurs rarely in the OT, with Ps. 50:6 LXX showing God as conqueror (cited in Rom. 3:4). It is also found in apocryphal and pseudepigraphical literature (see Wis. 4:2; 16:10; 18:22; 1 Esdr. 3:12). Bruns (1967) contends that John’s portrayal of Jesus as victor echoes the pagan myth of Herakles, the conqueror of death and evil.

9 An exceedingly clever defense of the author in general and of the author of John’s Gospel in particular is provided by Vanhoozer’s (1993 [= 2002: 257–74]) “hermeneutical exposition” of John 21:20–24. According to Vanhoozer, “The ethos of the Fourth Gospel largely depends on the identification of the author with the Beloved Disciple” (1993: 372). The “double Anselmian hermeneutics of ‘I-witness testimony’ ” advocated by Vanhoozer urges that the beloved disciple’s testimony be received on its own terms; unless it is believed, it is not understood. Over against the “death of the author” in much of recent scholarship and the prevailing “hermeneutic of suspicion,” Vanhoozer asserts “authorial rights” and advocates a “hermeneutic of belief” that seems all the more justified because the beloved disciple is consistently identified in the Fourth Gospel as an eyewitness. In this context it may be significant that as late as the very last verse of the Gospel, the authorial “I” is still heard (see commentary at 21:20–25).

9 An exceedingly clever defense of the author in general and of the author of John’s Gospel in particular is provided by Vanhoozer’s (1993 [= 2002: 257–74]) “hermeneutical exposition” of John 21:20–24. According to Vanhoozer, “The ethos of the Fourth Gospel largely depends on the identification of the author with the Beloved Disciple” (1993: 372). The “double Anselmian hermeneutics of ‘I-witness testimony’ ” advocated by Vanhoozer urges that the beloved disciple’s testimony be received on its own terms; unless it is believed, it is not understood. Over against the “death of the author” in much of recent scholarship and the prevailing “hermeneutic of suspicion,” Vanhoozer asserts “authorial rights” and advocates a “hermeneutic of belief” that seems all the more justified because the beloved disciple is consistently identified in the Fourth

Herod Agrippa I 351, 461
Herod Agrippa II 109
Herod Antipas 56, 59n9, 166, 169, 199, 229, 318, 510, 535
Herodians 350
Herod Philip II 56
Herod the Great 102, 109, 178, 523, 527 high priest 351, 352–53, 506, 511, 512, 514, 515–16 high-priestly prayer 482n1 Hillel 286, 418, 423 hired hand 305–6, 312
holiness 493, 496–97
Holocaust 5
Holy Spirit. See Spirit hope 194n99 hosanna 369 household 426–27
household conversions 172
human responsibility 38, 39n60, 130, 391, 535

Gospel as an eyewitness. In this context it may be significant that as late as the very last verse of the Gospel, the authorial “I” is still heard (see commentary at 21:20–25).

9 As it turns out, Herod Antipas’s act, recorded in the Synoptics, of imprisoning John and having him beheaded makes any further action on the part of the Jerusalem authorities to curb John’s ministry unnecessary. Their attention consequently shifts to Jesus.

1 The prayer is often called Jesus’ “high-priestly prayer” (a designation reaching back at least as far as the sixteenth century), though this label hardly fits with Johannine thought, which does not picture Jesus as a high priest (Ridderbos 1997: 546; Carson 1991: 552–53; though see commentary at 17:19 below). Westcott’s and E. C. Hoskyns’s title “prayer of consecration,” though not without merit (see below), fails to encompass the contents of the entire prayer (Carson 1991: 553; Barrett 1978: 500). Hence, commentators now frequently opt for more generic titles of the present prayer, such as “The Farewell Prayer” (Ridderbos) or “The Prayer of Jesus” (Carson). Witherington (1995: 266) calls it “The Sage’s Prayer,” based on his view that the Fourth Evangelist portrays Jesus as a sage.

99 This is the only instance of the term “hope” (be it verb or noun) in John’s Gospel (but the expression is also virtually absent from the Synoptics). The intensive perfect tense (ἤλπικατε, ēlpikate) underscores the settled state of the Jews’ hope set on Moses.

60 Some identify “children of God,” not “those who believe,” as the antecedent of the relative clause beginning 1:13 in order not to make faith follow regeneration (Bultmann 1971: 59 nn. 4–5). However, this is both syntactically awkward and implausible, as well as theologically unnecessary. In the Greek syntax, “those who believe” immediately precedes the relative clause and is thus most naturally taken as the antecedent, and the relationship between faith and rebirth is not easily reduced to a set sequential formula. The statement in 1 John 5:1, “Everyone who believes that Jesus is the Christ is born of God,” allows one to deduce from a person’s belief that person’s regenerate state; regeneration (being “born of God”) and saving faith thus go together and cannot be separated. Spiritual rebirth takes place at God’s initiative; people are called to faith based on God’s revelation in Christ. John nowhere elaborates on the precise temporal

humility 361, 371
hyperbole 606
hyssop 550, 553

“I am” sayings 9, 14–15, 210, 253, 256, 273n106, 335, 428, 430n39, 450, 454 idolatry 265 idols 156
image field 302
inaugurated eschatology 477n67 incarnation 25, 34, 40, 41, 47, 489, 579
“in Christ”, 498n71 individualism 211 inheritance 406 insanity 308
intimacy 493n46

relationship of these two aspects. Here and elsewhere in his Gospel (6:44–45; 10:26; 12:37–40), he affirms both divine sovereignty and human responsibility, and interpreters should do no less (see Carson 1981).

106 Wallace (1996: 515, 530–31) contends that the present reference does not constitute an instance of the historical present of εἰμί (eimi, I am). Lindars (1972: 336) notes how the “striking change of tense and the use of the simple verb einai put all the emphasis on the timeless condition of eternal existence,” drawing attention also to the escalating force of the “I am” sayings of the present chapter (8:12, 24, 28, 58).

39 The expression “truth,” while virtually absent from the Synoptics (the only significant reference is Matt. 22:16 pars.), is found frequently in John’s Gospel with reference to Jesus (1:14, 17; 5:33; 18:37; cf. 8:40, 45, 46; see also 1:9; 6:32; 15:1), the liberating effect of his word (8:31–32; cf. 17:17, 19), and the ministry of the Holy Spirit (16:13; cf. 14:17; 15:26). “Life” frequently is said to be the result of a person’s coming to, and believing in, Jesus (e.g., 3:15, 16; 20:31) (Köstenberger 1998b: 75–76). The giving of life is said to be Jesus’ purpose for coming (10:10) and is linked with two “I am” statements, “I am the bread of life” (6:35, 48) and “I am the resurrection and the life” (11:25).

67 Bultmann (1971: 583) declares, “That ... is the eschatological situation: to have no more questions!” Bultmann, of course, believes that the Fourth Evangelist has so conflated Easter and the parousia that for him they are one and the same. This, however, fails to understand the nature of Johannine-inaugurated (though not radically realized) eschatology, in which the end is shown to be anticipated in the here and now without the future being entirely swallowed up by the present.

71 The notion of being “in Christ” is found elsewhere in the NT especially in Paul’s writings (e.g., Rom. 8:10; 2 Cor. 13:5; Gal. 2:20; 4:19), though it is not unknown to other NT authors, such as Peter (cf. 1 Pet. 5:14). Barrett (1978: 512) believes that the final phrase of 17:21 implies universalism, though this is arguably not the case. The statement speaks to Jesus’ desire rather than to his actual expectation.

46 Carson (1991: 561) rightly notes that not only does the present address combine the notions of transcendence (holy) and familial intimacy (Father), but also it provides the foundation on the basis of which the Son and believers are consecrated for service (see 17:17–19; see Barrett 1978: 507).

irony 242, 243–44, 260, 293n76, 350. See also Johannine irony

Isaac 43, 44, 66, 67, 272n100

Isaiah 127, 192, 390–92, 431, 448

Iscariot 222

Israel 315

 failure to produce fruit 450

 rejection of Jesus 37–38

 p 644 Jacob 47, 85, 153, 192, 270–71, 281n13, 411

Jacob's well 141, 147, 150–51

James 461

Jehovah's Witnesses 28

Jeremiah 316

Jericho 369

Jerusalem 62n21, 154, 177, 241, 349, 367

Jesus

 anger 340

 anointing 357–58, 360–64

 as apocalyptic warrior 66–67n35 ascension 219, 569–70

 authority 233, 486–87

 baptism 44, 66, 69

 as bridegroom 99n35, 133, 138n12, 427

76 Keener (2003: 793–94) notes that the Pharisees' conclusion that the man must be a sinner (9:34) contradicts Jesus' affirmation that the man's blindness was not a result of personal sin (9:2–3). The fine irony will not escape the alert reader that the Pharisees themselves have not been born from God (3:3) but rather were born in sin as the devil's heirs (8:44) and destined to die in sin (8:21).

100 It has been suggested (e.g., Michaels 1989: 153; cf. Brodie 1993: 335) that the reference here may be to Abraham's rejoicing when he announced to Isaac on the way to the sacrifice, "God himself will provide the lamb for the burnt offering, my son" (Gen. 22:8). See also T. Levi 18:2, 6 (cf. 18:14; Matt. 8:11).

13 Regarding the possibility that the man's blindness from birth may be the result of prenatal sin, compare Jewish speculation surrounding the struggle of Jacob and Esau in their mother Rebecca's womb (Gen. 25:22; cf. Gen. Rab. 63.6). There are also several parallels regarding the possibility that the man's blindness was the result of his parents' sin prior to his birth (Cant. Rab. 1.6 §3; Ruth Rab. 6.4; Tg. Ps.-J. of Deut. 21:20). However, several passages in the OT and Second Temple literature strongly challenge the notion that children suffer for their parents' sin (e.g., Jer. 31:29–30; Ezek. 18; cf. Tob. 3:3).

21 Laney (1992: 48) remarks that John's voice crying out in the wilderness "is the first indication that things were not quite right in Jerusalem. The religious establishment of first-century Judaism was corrupt. The voice has abandoned Jerusalem and was calling out in the desert."

35 Moloney (1998: 69) notes that the next time a bridegroom is mentioned in this Gospel, it is Jesus who is identified as the bridegroom by John the Baptist.

12 Jesus calls himself "the bridegroom" in Matt. 9:15 pars. For the role of the bridegroom's friend, see Gower 1987: 64–66; Zimmermann and Zimmermann 1999. Joy was the overriding brothers 101, 229–30

burial 554–57
as chosen one 71
as consummate Israelite 69 crucifixion 260n45, 422, 475, 538, 540, 541–49
death 9, 102, 306, 308, 363, 549–54 deity 28n27, 256, 271, 507n21 divine sonship 44 dwelling with his people 501 emotions 412–13 entrance into Jerusalem 367–74 eternal existence 273
exaltation 260n45, 382n31, 384n38, 433

theme at Jewish weddings; the verb πληρόω (plēroō, fulfill, complete) is associated with joy throughout this Gospel (Carson 1991: 211–12; Barrett 1978: 223). The Baptist's words χαρᾷ χαίρει (chara chairei, lit., rejoices with joy), a Hebraism (χαρᾷ is a cognate dative [Wallace 1996: 168–69]), serve to intensify the verb (Ridderbos 1997: 147 n. 132; Morris 1995: 213 n. 112).

45 John is the only NT writer to use this term in a dual sense with reference both to Jesus' crucifixion (his literal "lifting up") and to his exaltation (metaphorical use). For NT instances of the verb ὑψόω, with the meaning "exalted" or "honored," see Matt. 23:12 (= Luke 14:11 = 18:14); Luke 1:52; Acts 2:33; 5:31; James 4:10; 1 Pet. 5:6. On the phrase "I am the one I claim to be," see commentary at 8:24 and at 8:58.

27 See Hartley 1999 for an interaction with the arguments by Jehovah's Witnesses against Jesus' deity from 1:1c. Hartley first surveys the history of the debate, starting with Colwell (1933: 12–21), followed by contributions by Harner (1973: 75–87), P. Dixon (1975), and Hartley himself (1996). Hartley concludes that "the Word was theos (1:1c) in every sense the Father was ton theon (1:1b), rather than a god in a particular sense the Father was not" (1999: 1, summarizing 1996). See also MacLeod 2003: 59–60; and Keener 2003: 372–74, who points to the anarthrous instances of θεός designating God the Father later in the prologue (1:6, 12, 13, 18) and the articular use of θεός with reference to Jesus in 20:28 (p. 373).

21 As Whitacre (1999: 426) notes, in the present passage we find juxtaposed references to Jesus' humble humanity and his exalted deity: he acknowledges that he is Jesus "the Nazarene," and in doing so he evokes the paradigmatic OT self-designation of God, "I am" (see further commentary below).

45 John is the only NT writer to use this term in a dual sense with reference both to Jesus' crucifixion (his literal "lifting up") and to his exaltation (metaphorical use). For NT instances of the verb ὑψόω, with the meaning "exalted" or "honored," see Matt. 23:12 (= Luke 14:11 = 18:14); Luke 1:52; Acts 2:33; 5:31; James 4:10; 1 Pet. 5:6. On the phrase "I am the one I claim to be," see commentary at 8:24 and at 8:58.

31 Ridderbos (1997: 437) understands "I have glorified it" to refer to "the whole of Jesus' earthly activity." Carson (1991: 441) includes Jesus' earthly ministry, the incarnation, and the signs. Morris (1995: 530) seems to think that "I will glorify it" refers solely to the cross. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.388, citing Ps. 138:2; Ezek. 36:23; 38:23) takes the same phrase to point to the Son's exaltation and vindication: "He will justify the Son, raise him above the power of flesh 215–16

 friends of 458–59
 as fulfillment of Old Testament 14, 18, 35 glorification 99, 435, 486, 489, 565, 570 glorification on cross 375, 378, 380, 422, 490 as good shepherd 508 heavenly origin 210 humanity 99, 141, 151, 412, 507n21, 533
 humility 403–4
 intercession 492–93 isolation 231 kingship 502
 knowledge of people 116–17
 as light of the world 253–54, 277, 282, 284
 love 327, 402–3, 422–24, 456, 458
 as Messiah 9, 85, 91, 99, 158, 230, 235–37, 259, 582 mission 13–15, 53, 307, 329–30, 382, 489–90
 name 38, 478
 as new Moses 398
 as new temple 313, 491 obedience to Father 269, 381, 394, 445, 486 as only begotten 42–44 passion 345, 378 paternity 251, 265
 power over death 343 prayer 344–35, 482–84
 for followers 490–97 for future believers 497–501 for himself 485–90
 preexistence 19, 25, 45, 68
 prescience 412, 506
 as Prophet 153, 155, 203, 482n1

evil, and give him glory and saving power.”

38 The term “lifted up” (see 3:14; 8:28) is likely chosen by John because of its potential double reference to physical lifting up as well as figurative lifting up, that is, exaltation (see esp. Isa. 52:13; see also R. Brown 1966: 146, 478; cf. Acts 2:33; 5:31; Luke 9:51; Phil. 2:9; Heb. 1:3; 1 Tim. 3:16).

21 As Whitacre (1999: 426) notes, in the present passage we find juxtaposed references to Jesus’ humble humanity and his exalted deity: he acknowledges that he is Jesus “the Nazarene,” and in doing so he evokes the paradigmatic OT self-designation of God, “I am” (see further commentary below).

1 The prayer is often called Jesus’ “high-priestly prayer” (a designation reaching back at least as far as the sixteenth century), though this label hardly fits with Johannine thought, which does not picture Jesus as a high priest (Ridderbos 1997: 546; Carson 1991: 552–53; though see commentary at 17:19 below). Westcott’s and E. C. Hoskyns’s title “prayer of consecration,”

- as prosecutor 255n17
- as rabbi 74, 120, 569
- rejection of 23, 36, 37, 51
- resurrection 322, 343, 346, 439, 475, 479, 560–65, 573, 594
- resurrection appearances 9, 566–70, 571, 587
- sacrifice 306–7, 359, 385
- as savior of the world 164–65
- sent by Father 483, 492
- sinlessness 267, 445
- “stirred up inside” 410, 412–13
- as teacher 405
- temptation 230
- time 378, 402
- trial 512–39
- triumph over world 481
- as true vine 448
- trustworthiness of sayings 85
- unity with Father 216, 312–13, 316–17, 414, 431–32, 445, 493–94, 497–98
- walks on water 204–5
- weeping 341
- as Word 40
- work 14, 161
- works 192, 311, 313, 316
- wounds 579
- Jesus Christ (expression), 489n26
- Jewish monotheism 28, 185, 194, 265, 312
- Jewish Passover 104n9

though not without merit (see below), fails to encompass the contents of the entire prayer (Carson 1991: 553; Barrett 1978: 500). Hence, commentators now frequently opt for more generic titles of the present prayer, such as “The Farewell Prayer” (Ridderbos) or “The Prayer of Jesus” (Carson). Witherington (1995: 266) calls it “The Sage’s Prayer,” based on his view that the Fourth Evangelist portrays Jesus as a sage.

17 Stibbe (1993: 101) comments, “The irony of the chapter is the fact that Jesus himself becomes the prosecutor. Having begun a process of questioning and prosecuting Jesus, the three Jewish groups find themselves almost imperceptibly taking on the role of defendants. The old irony of the judged becoming the judge is played out here.”

26 The expression “Jesus Christ” is used in this Gospel only here and in 1:17 (see also 1 John 4:2), and it perhaps reveals hindsight: “Christ” has now become Jesus’ last name (but see Ridderbos 1997: 549). It may strike the modern reader as curious that Jesus would call himself “Jesus Christ”; however, self-reference in the third person was common in antiquity (cf. 21:24; see Jackson 1999: esp. 24–31).

9 The phrase “Jewish Passover” has caused some controversy. Barrett (1978: 197) conjectures that the phrase may presuppose the existence of a Christian Passover at the time of writing (so, earlier, Westcott 1908: 1.89; cf. Borchert 1996: 162). Schnackenburg (1991: 1.345) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 39) suggest that the evangelist or the church had stopped participating in the Jewish weddings 92

Jews 15

 persecution of Christians 469

 rejection of God's words 390–91

 rejection of Jesus 224–25, 266–67

 rejection of Messiah 51, 90, 352, 385, 389, 395, 539n89

 unbelief 309–17, 320, 393

Job 182

Johannine community 3, 4, 277n1, 605

Johannine Great Commission 395

Johannine irony 81, 149, 151, 157, 164, 168, 181, 208, 213, 234, 235, 238, 270, 278, 289,

 290, 431n46, 472. See also irony

Johannine misunderstanding 96n28, 257, 259, 290, 431, 479

John, Gospel of authorship 1, 3, 6–8, 33

 chronology in 11–13 hermeneutical presuppositions 3–6 historical setting 5, 6–8

 historicity of 2n5

Jewish Passover. Witherington (1995: 86–87) notes that the phrase indicates a certain distance between the author and Judaism and at least a partial Gentile audience (similarly, Morris 1995: 169). Carson (1991: 176) thinks that “Jewish” refers to the Jews of Judea in contrast to Galileans and Diaspora Jews.

89 As Westcott (1908: 2.306) points out, the Jews' words here amount not merely to a rejection of Jesus as the Jewish Messiah but to a denial of their messianic hope per se: “The kingdom of God, in the confession of its rulers, has become the kingdom of the world. In the place of the Christ they have found the emperor. They first rejected Jesus as the Christ, and then, driven by the irony of circumstances, they rejected the Christ altogether.”

1 For a survey of source-critical scholarship on John 9, see Borchert (1996: 310–12). Carson (1991: 360–61) provides a brief summary and critique of Martyn's “two-level” reading of the chapter in light of the history of the putative “Johannine community.” See also Bauckham (2001: esp. 103–6), who contends that Martyn's hermeneutic violates the genre of the Fourth Gospel.

46 Again, “this will suffice” probably represents Johannine irony. Philip claims to be modest in his request—a direct vision of God—while in fact asking for something greater than the amazing revelation already provided in Jesus. On Philip, see commentary at 1:44; 12:21–22. The verb ἀρκέω (arkeō, suffice) occurs elsewhere in this Gospel only in 6:7, there, as in the present passage, on the lips of Philip (Moloney 1998: 399).

28 In the context of John's theology, Mary's actions nonetheless seem to be characterized by a certain amount of ambiguity. On the one hand, she clearly expects Jesus to find a way to help (which does not necessarily mean that she expects him to do a miracle). If Joseph was dead by then, Mary, as a widow, would have relied on the labors and resourcefulness of Jesus, her firstborn (as the Synoptics indicate, Jesus had taken up Joseph's trade of a craftsman [Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3]). On the other hand, Mary is shown to share in the “misunderstanding” motif that pervades the entire Gospel: she fails to see that Jesus' “time” has not yet come.

5 The essays on history and theology in the Fourth Gospel and on the question of the Fourth

- literary features 9–13
- original audience 8
- place in canonicity 16–17
- theological themes 13–16
- John Hyrcanus 523, 556
- John son of Zebedee 7, 414, 602
- John the apostle 1, 7, 32
- John the Baptist 22, 32–34, 133–40, 145, 271, 435, 457
 - p 645 as “best man” 133, 138, 458n51
 - as Elijah 60–61, 191
 - lack of signs 173, 318
 - testimony of 9, 21, 23, 45, 53–54, 55–57, 58–73, 317
- John the elder 7n17

Gospel’s authorship by Morris (1969: 65–292) still repay careful study. For an interesting application of Clement’s statement, see Thielman 1991: 183 in the context of his entire article. The reference to Clement’s Hypotyposeis is found in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14. See also Thompson (2002: 2), who rightly notes, “Whatever Clement meant in calling John ‘a spiritual Gospel,’ it is doubtful that he meant to contrast ‘facts’ in the modern sense and ‘interpretation.’ ... [A] ‘spiritual’ Gospel gives the inner meaning of an event or reality and, hence, its truth must be spiritually discerned.” Thompson rightly maintains that “the modern view” that calls into question the historicity of any item in John that “stands in the service of his theological or interpretive agenda” constitutes “a very strange way to imagine that theology works, and perhaps could only have been thought of by people actually not doing theology.” Thompson (2002: 3) proceeds to call for greater sophistication in biblical scholars’ philosophy of history. Carson (1991: 29) similarly disavows attributing to Clement a dichotomy between “spiritual” and “historical”; he suggests that “spiritual” may mean “allegorical” or “symbol-laden.”

51 In the only two previous instances of φίλος (philos, friend) in John’s Gospel, John the Baptist is the “friend of the bridegroom” (3:29) and Jesus calls Lazarus “our friend” (11:11). On friendship in the ancient world, see also Keener 2003: 1004–15.

17 One tricky piece of evidence concerns the second-century writer Papias (cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.4–5), a contemporary of Polycarp, who, in turn, was a disciple of the apostle John (on the date of Papias, see Yarbrough 1983; Munck 1959). Papias (at least to Eusebius) seems to refer to two separate Johns, the apostle and a “John the elder.” On this basis some have conjectured that the latter, rather than the former, wrote the Fourth Gospel. However, there is no need to drive a wedge between the two references to John in the passage in question. To the contrary, John may be designated “the elder” in the latter part of the quotation precisely because he is grouped with the elders mentioned earlier in the same passage. For a sound critique of the “John the elder” hypothesis, see Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 141–43. Keener (2003: 95–98) likewise challenges the reliability of Eusebius’s interpretation of Papias, owing to the former’s agenda of seeking to denigrate the Apocalypse. Keener (2003: 102–3) also includes an insightful discussion of the plausibility of John writing the Gospel at an advanced age. See also the works cited in Bauckham 1993: 27 n. 17 and the important essay by Hill (1998), who adduces from Eusebius’s (Hist. eccl. 3.24.5–13, esp. 11) reference to Papias (without naming him) that Papias held John the apostle to be the author of the Fourth Gospel (contra Bauckham 1993; Hengel 1989a; note my review of Hengel’s more extensive 1993 German monograph on the subject,

Jonah 109, 151, 244, 495
Joseph (husband of Mary) 80, 96n28, 186
Joseph (son of Jacob) 96, 146–47, 450
Joseph of Arimathea 392, 503, 540, 551, 554–55
Joshua 193, 273, 304, 460
joy 443n96, 456–57, 475–77, 495
Judas 130, 202n19, 222, 402–3, 494–95 betrayal of Jesus 358, 410, 505–9 exposure and departure of 395, 411–18, 420, 424–25
 fruitlessness 452, 454n28, 455
 objections to anointing 362–63
 as thief 300n10, 507n23

Köstenberger 1996). For studies of the external evidence regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, see Bauckham 1993: 24 n. 1.

28 In the context of John's theology, Mary's actions nonetheless seem to be characterized by a certain amount of ambiguity. On the one hand, she clearly expects Jesus to find a way to help (which does not necessarily mean that she expects him to do a miracle). If Joseph was dead by then, Mary, as a widow, would have relied on the labors and resourcefulness of Jesus, her firstborn (as the Synoptics indicate, Jesus had taken up Joseph's trade of a craftsman [Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3]). On the other hand, Mary is shown to share in the "misunderstanding" motif that pervades the entire Gospel: she fails to see that Jesus' "time" has not yet come.

96 Along with his peace, the departing Jesus also bestows on his followers his love (15:9–10) and joy (15:11). This triad is found also in the Pauline teaching on the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22).

19 Similarly, it is said of Ruth, "She ate all she wanted and had some left over" (Ruth 2:14; see Daube 1956: 46–51). The concern that nothing "perish" (ἀπόληται, apolētai) may establish a link with the fate of Judas, who is described as "son of destruction" (ἀπωλείας, apōleias) in John 17:12. There may also be a link with the apostasy of most of Jesus' "disciples" in 6:66 (Anderson 1996: 174).

28 As mentioned, Judas seems to be the prime example (cf. 13:10–11; 15:2; see Stibbe 1996: 161–62). Both verbs ἐβλήθη (eblēthē) and ἐξηράνθη (exēranthē) are in the Greek aorist (lit., "has been thrown" and "has been withered"), indicating the completeness of the divine judgment (see the discussion in Carson 1991: 519). Of the four verbs in 15:6, the first two are passive and the second two active in the Greek, which is a bit awkward in English. Hence, several translations (such as the NIV, NLT, RSV, NRSV, and TNIV) render συνάγουσιν (synagousin, they gather), for example, as a passive (but see KJV, ASV, NASB, NKJV; Ridderbos 1997: 518). In either case, the agents are left unspecified.

10 Later, Judas is called a thief (12:6), and Barabbas a robber (18:40; cf. Mark 15:7). At his arrest, Jesus asks why he is treated like a robber (Matt. 26:55 pars.), and in the end he is crucified with robbers on either side (Matt. 27:38, 44 pars.). The majority of commentators take both terms as referring to the same people (Ridderbos 1997: 354; Carson 1991: 381; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.281; contra Barrett 1978: 369). See further Hengel 1989a: 24–46; Simonis 1967: 101–3.

23 Stibbe (1993: 182–84) takes this one step further when he says that in 18:1–11, Jesus "plays the part" of the good shepherd, and Judas that of the thief; and that in 18:15–27, the beloved disciple "plays the part" of the shepherd who walks in and out of the fold; the girl at the gate

Judas (not Iscariot) 428, 440
Jude (Jesus' half-brother) 528n37
Judea 224, 228–29, 329
Judeans 53n1
judgment 63, 67n36, 102, 105, 187–88, 255, 258, 260, 348

Kerioth 222
keys of the kingdom 596n2
Khirbet 92
Kidron Valley 485, 504 killing 304 kingdom of God 18, 122–23, 134, 303, 487, 529 king of Israel 83–84, 87, 370 king of the Jews 527–28, 530, 538, 544, 546 Kinnereth 199
knowing God 430, 488 knowledge 261

lamb of God 66–68, 72 lame man, healing of 173, 174–83 lamp 191 lanterns 506
last day 212, 334
Last Supper 360, 538
Latin language 545

“plays the part” of the gatekeeper; and Peter is equated with the role of the hired hand who runs away in the hour of danger. Stibbe may be right in the case of Jesus acting as the good shepherd, Judas as the thief, and Peter as the hired hand. But if the beloved disciple is said to play the part of the shepherd just because he is shown to walk in and out of the high priest's courtyard, one may perhaps also argue that Pilate is portrayed as a shepherd, since he too is shown repeatedly going in and out of his palace when oscillating back and forth between the crowds and Jesus. Stibbe's reading here is too allegorical and lacks restraint; construing John 18 as, in essence, an allegorical outplaying of John 10 seems to take careful literary analysis a step too far.

37 The answer given by the grandchildren of Jude, Jesus' half-brother, at a trial before Domitian echoes Jesus' words (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.20.6 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 166]). Jesus' description of the nature of his kingdom is reminiscent of certain passages in Daniel (e.g., 2:44; 7:14, 27).

1 On the term Ἰουδαῖοι, see commentary at 1:19. The new BDAG entry on Ἰουδαῖος, which systematically recasts all “Jews” as “Judeans” in order to avoid “anti-Judaism” by modern-day readers, constitutes an unduly extreme reaction and results in demonstrably inaccurate renderings that equate all Jews with inhabitants of Judea. However, Jews lived also in Galilee and adjacent provinces, not to mention the Diaspora. Note the appropriate criticism by Lowery (2003: 120–21).

2 There is some affinity between the present passage and Peter being given the “keys of the kingdom” in Matt. 16:19. Note also the primacy of Peter in the early stages of the Christian movement as seen in the Book of Acts.

law 48, 210, 234–36, 244, 254, 256, 290, 291, 314 “law and the prophets” 80 lawsuit motif 33n40, 277n4, 502n2
Lazarus 360 death of 325–32
 as friend 458n51 raising of 320–23, 342–47, 348, 349, 357–58, 372, 390, 563 legalism 48
lesser to the greater argument 126, 195, 219, 234, 315, 378
Levites 58, 242, 459 liberal German scholars 2 lies 267
life 27, 254n13, 281, 304, 429–30, 435, 454. See also eternal life lifted up 127–28, 260, 375, 378, 384, 527 light 27, 30–32, 35–36, 55, 253–54, 257 light-darkness motif 13, 114, 131, 250, 277–78, 386–87, 393, 418 literary analysis 183n41

40 As Lincoln (2000: 21) notes, not only does the lawsuit motif (see Isa. 40–55, esp. 42:18–25; 43:22–28; 50:1–3) occur in each of the five main sections of John’s narrative (prologue; 1:19–12:50; 13–17; 18–20; epilogue), but it does so in highly significant ways, forming the narrative framework of the Gospel (p. 141). According to Lincoln, just as there are seven signs and seven discourses in John’s Gospel, there are seven witnesses: John the Baptist, Jesus himself, Jesus’ works, God the Father, the Scriptures, the Samaritan woman, and the crowd. For a summary and appraisal of Lincoln’s important monograph, see Köstenberger 2001a.

4 For an analysis of John 9 in light of the Johannine lawsuit motif, see Lincoln 2000: 96–105.

2 For Jesus’ trial before Pilate in the context of the “lawsuit motif” in the Fourth Gospel (with echoes of Isa. 40–55), see Lincoln 2000: 123–38 (with further bibliography on p. 123 n. 93).

51 In the only two previous instances of φίλος (philos, friend) in John’s Gospel, John the Baptist is the “friend of the bridegroom” (3:29) and Jesus calls Lazarus “our friend” (11:11). On friendship in the ancient world, see also Keener 2003: 1004–15.

13 Morris (1995: 389 n. 10 [similarly, Laney 1992: 159]) suggests the following possibilities: “gives life,” “is life,” “springs from life,” or “illuminates life.” Schnackenburg (1990: 2.191) adds that this may be an instance of an exegetical genitive in the sense of “the life which frees a person from the sphere of death.”

41 Moloney 1998: 173; cf. Metzner 1999; Lee 1994: 110; Witkamp 1985: 24; Leidig 1979: 211; contra Thomas 1995: 18. Moloney (1998: 173) rightly notes, contra Beck (1993 [cf. 1997: 86–90]), who argues that anonymous characters in the Fourth Gospel draw the reader into an identification with the character, “The reader of the Fourth Gospel, however, hardly identifies with a man who is in league with ‘the Jews’ (vs. 15).” Keener (2003: 87), similarly, contends that a list of Johannine models of faith is not entirely coextensive with anonymous characters (citing esp. 5:14–15) and registers this as his only serious disagreement with Beck (p. 87 n. 49). Beck, in a review (2001), indirectly responds to my earlier criticism (Köstenberger 1999b, reviewing Beck 1997) that the man in John 5 disproves his theory by alleging, in effect, that I have no place for literary analysis in my hermeneutical method. Nothing could be further from the truth. My concern, rather, lies with an unqualified wholesale adoption of reader-response living water 142, 148, 150–52, 226, 240–41, 253

 Logos 26–27
 Lord (designation) 408, 573, 579–80, 591
 Lord’s Day 578n4
 Lord’s Prayer 486
 Lord’s Supper 217 love 327n25, 402, 423–24, 443n96, 454, 455–56, 497–99, 596–98 commandment 460 for enemies 464 for Jesus 434
 loyalty 411

 Maccabeans 107, 309, 351, 369
 macrochiasm 52n3
 Magdala 205, 561
 Malchus 508–9, 519
 man born blind, healing of 181n32, 250, 277–78, 280–85, 292, 311 criticism by evangelicals who fail to realize that this methodology is part and parcel of a postmodern hermeneutic that is left with nothing but subjective readings devoid of any claim to authority or universal applicability. Moreover, I was concerned to point out that Beck’s central thesis (i.e., that anonymity necessarily equals ideal function and positive characterization) is invalid. Note further this puzzling conclusion by Brodie (1993: 238): “The final picture ... is ... open to a positive interpretation: the man has finally come to mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus, and he is announcing the good news to the Jews.” Precisely where Brodie finds the man “announcing the good news to the Jews” is unclear to me, nor can I see textual evidence for the man coming to “mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus.”

4 Schlatter (1948: 361, citing Rev. 1:10) thinks that the celebration of Sunday as the Lord’s Day is in view. Carson (1991: 657) suggests that the continued reference to the Lord’s Day in the resurrection narrative may represent a polemical attempt to demonstrate the basis of Christian worship to John’s Jewish readers.

25 The Greek word for “love” used here is ἀγαπάω (agapaō); in 11:3 and 11:36 it is φιλέω (phileō). However, there appears to be little distinction in meaning between these two words, and the use of two different words for “to love” is best taken as an instance of the evangelist’s penchant for stylistic variation.

96 Along with his peace, the departing Jesus also bestows on his followers his love (15:9–10) and joy (15:11). This triad is found also in the Pauline teaching on the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22).

3 Talbert (1970 [see esp. p. 343]) proposes unconvincingly that 1:19–5:47 displays the pattern of a macrochiasm. However, this comes at the expense of virtually ignoring the clear inclusio of 2:11 and 4:54, which marks this section off as a structural unit. Moreover, the very notion of a macrochiasm is far from established. An additional weakness is that at the heart of the chiasm Talbert groups 3:22–36 and 4:1–42 under the rubric “ritual and life,” hardly a self-evident categorization. On the microlevel, however, Talbert’s unit divisions are generally on target: 1:19–2:11; 2:13–22 (though there is no need to skip 2:12); 2:23–3:22; 3:23–36; 4:1–42; 4:43–54; 5:1–30; 5:31–47 (see the outline in the introduction above).

32 Compare and contrast this healing especially with that of the blind man in John 9, which also manna 14, 35, 201n10, 209–10, 253, 316 mansions 426n24

 Marcion 16
 Martha 326, 332, 334–37, 343, 360, 363n²⁰
 martyrdom 379
 Mary (mother of Jesus) 92, 94–95, 99–100, 327, 457, 540, 548–49
 Mary (of Bethany) 326, 332, 334, 337–39, 347 anointing of Jesus 326, 357–58, 360–64
 Mary (wife of Clopas) 548
 Mary Magdalene 395, 548, 558, 560, 561–62, 566–70, 580 master of the banquet 97–98, 99 mat 180
 meals 402, 415, 416, 593
 Mephibosheth 371
 Messiah 69, 76, 83–84, 194, 235–37, 241–42, 259, 263 as clandestine 69 expectations 210 political connotations 311 rejection of 539n89
 Samaritans on 157, 158
 self-sacrifice 305
 speculation about 385–86

takes place on a Sabbath (see the chart in Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 109). The Synoptics include at least five incidents that involve healing on the Sabbath and incur the wrath of the Jewish leaders: (1) Mark 1:21–28 par.; (2) Matt. 8:14–15 pars.; (3) Matt. 12:9–14 pars.; (4) Luke 13:10–17; (5) Luke 14:1–6 (Matthew features two, Mark three, and Luke all five incidents).

10 See Num. 11:13 (cf. R. Brown 1966: 233; Moloney 1998: 197; Burge 2000: 193). There are several other parallels between John 6 and Num. 11: the grumbling of the people (Num. 11:1; John 6:41, 43); the description of the manna (Num. 11:7–9; John 6:31); the reference to the eating of meat/[Jesus'] flesh (Num. 11:13; John 6:51); and the striking disproportion between the existing need and the available resources (Num. 11:22; John 6:7–9).

24 The rendering “mansions” (rather than “rooms”), which crept into English translations through William Tyndale (1526) via the Vulgate, mistakenly suggests luxurious accommodations in modern parlance (the Latin word mansio referred to a stopover place, which was still the meaning of “mansion” in Tyndale’s day). See R. Brown 1970: 619; Carson 1991: 489.

²⁰ Moloney (1998: 349) sees a contrast between Martha’s objection in 11:39 and her acting in “a position of recognition” in 12:2b, on the one hand, and Mary’s performance of “a humble act of love” in the present instance, but there is no explicit textual evidence to suggest that this contrast was intended by the Fourth Evangelist.

89 As Westcott (1908: 2.306) points out, the Jews’ words here amount not merely to a rejection of Jesus as the Jewish Messiah but to a denial of their messianic hope per se: “The kingdom of God, in the confession of its rulers, has become the kingdom of the world. In the place of the Christ they have found the emperor. They first rejected Jesus as the Christ, and then, driven by the irony of circumstances, they rejected the Christ altogether.”

messianic community 9, 15–16, 53, 575–76 cleansing of 395, 410, 420, 424 miracles 95, 98, 171, 226, 237, 268, 316 as sign 174
 moneychangers 105–6
 Mosaic law 47n90, 291, 355, 440, 501. See also law
 Moses 127, 147, 192, 196, 201, 203, 273, 390, 495
 farewell discourse 15, 396, 397–98
 as friend of God 458–59
 Jesus’ superiority to 47, 50, 151, 271 as lawgiver 316
 lifted up serpent 128
 Pharisees on 184, 233–34, p 646 290–91
 as prophet 237 and provision of manna 201, 209–10, 213
 as shepherd 305
 signs and wonders 121, 170, 432
 vision of God’s glory 431
 as witness 9, 194–95
 mountainside 200
 Mount Ebal 146
 Mount Gerizim 141, 146–47, 153–55, 157, 268n84
 Mount of Olives 504–5
 Mount Sinai 210, 440, 501
 Mount Zion 154
 mourning 333–34, 338, 340
 Muratorian Canon 76n69

90 R. Edwards (1988: 7 nn. 17–21) cites the following leading fathers of the Greek church as holding that the phrase “grace for grace” referred to a replacement of the Mosaic law by the gospel: Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, Origen, and Theophylact (also Jerome, the most learned of the Latin fathers). Somewhat curiously, Michaels (1989: 24) contends that “grace and truth” is “a circumlocution for the Holy Spirit” (with reference to passages in John and elsewhere that connect the Spirit with grace or truth; cf. John 4:23–24; 14:17; 15:26; 16:13; 1 John 5:6).
 84 Keener (2003: 764) seems to think that the present charge represents an extrapolation from reports of the welcome Jesus received in Samaria (4:40). He notes that the informed reader, who knows that Jesus denied the legitimacy of worship on Mount Gerizim and affirmed that salvation was from the Jews (4:21–22), recognizes the charge as slanderous (and perhaps motivated by envy).

69 Ridderbos (1997: 84) thinks that this identification is all the more likely since Peter learns about Jesus from his brother Andrew and this unnamed disciple (1:41) and since Peter and John are closely associated in this and the other Gospels (so also Schlatter 1948: 55; more cautious assessments are found in Borchert 1996: 143; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.310; Carson 1991: 154). Note also the connection between Andrew and John in the Muratorian Canon (Bettenson 1967: 28). Michaels (1989: 37) thinks that the second disciple is Philip. Keener (2003: 468) likewise sees “no reason” to identify the other disciple with the beloved disciple, since he is not mutual indwelling 216, 451, 453, 455

myrrh 555

mysticism 50

Naaman 283

Nahum 244

nard 360

Nathanael 56, 69, 74, 79–82, 83–87, 90, 93, 579, 585n9, 588 nationalism 107, 200, 372

natural descent 39–40

Nazarene 507

Nazareth 80–81, 92, 100, 544

Nero 164

new commandment 424n10, 457, 460n61

new covenant 398

new creation 123

new exodus 14, 62

new life 379

Nicodemus 302

mentioned until 13:23. On a literary level, this is self-evident, but the absence of “beloved disciple” language prior to 13:23 does not seem to rule out the possibility that the apostle John appears in the Johannine narrative as a historical character that is left unnamed.

9 See Schlatter 1948: 363–77. Note, for example, the references to a charcoal fire in 21:9 and 18:18 and to “drawing” in 21:8 and 12:32, as well as the links between 21:20; 13:23; 1:18 (see Ellis 1992: 18–19). See also the common elements between the good shepherd discourse in chapter 10 and Peter’s commissioning in 21:15–19 (Cassian 1956–57: 132–36 [cited in Minear 1983: 95 n. 24]). Minear (1983: 96–97) further notes the appellation of Thomas as “the twin” in 20:24 and 11:16; the references to Nathanael in 21:2 and 1:45–51 and to Cana in chapters 2, 4, and 21; and several other terminological and thematic connections. Gaventa (1996: 245) notes the similarity between μετὰ ταῦτα (meta tauta, after these things) in 21:1 and 19:38. To this may be added the term “Sea of Tiberias” (21:1; cf. 6:1); Simon Peter “son of John” (21:15; cf. 1:42); Jesus’ taking (λαμβάνω, lambanō) and distributing (δίδωμι, didōmi) bread (21:13; cf. 6:11 [close verbal parallels with 6:11, where Jesus’ giving thanks is explicitly mentioned, may imply thanksgiving in 21:13]); the double ἀμὴν (amēn, truly) (21:18; cf., e.g., 1:51); the connection between Peter’s and Jesus’ death established by the evangelist’s parenthetical comment (21:19; cf. 12:33); Jesus’ call for his disciples to “follow” him (21:19, 22; cf. 1:43); and other verbal links, grammatical features, and thematic connections (Osborne 1981: 294). Spencer (1999) finds the following “narrative echoes” of earlier portions in John’s narrative: (1) the feeding of the five thousand (ch. 6); (2) Peter’s threefold denial (18:15–18, 25–27); (3) the footwashing and the final meal (13:3–5, 36–38); and (4) the good shepherd discourse (10:1–18). Note, however, that Spencer considers chapter 21 to be a “later redactional addition” (p. 68).

10 Schlatter (1948: 289) notes that Jesus was first one who gave (Gebende) and only then one who commanded (Gebietende). Schlatter relates the “new commandment” to the “new grace of the new covenant” (p. 288, contra Calvin).

61 Also, “my commandment” (called a “new” commandment in 13:34) is replaced by “I command” (ἐντέλλομαι, entellomai [elsewhere in John only in 14:31; 15:14]).

before Sanhedrin 159, 243–44, 291, 392 and burial of Jesus 503, 540, 551, 555 encounter with Jesus 54, 74, 112, 113–28 night 120n17, 282, 589n10
 Noah 192
 numerical symbolism 593

 obedience 129, 304, 316, 434, 453, 454n26, 455, 456, 458–59, 477
 Old Testament 27, 30, 80, 174, 256 prophets 64, 100, 121, 214, 271 resurrection accounts 321n4 theology 13–15
 only child 42–43 opposition 461, 465, 466–67 oral tradition 256, 291 orphans 438–39
 Othniel 165 outer garment 404, 546, 591 outreach 454, 455

 pacifism 529n39

17 Contra several commentators (Barrett 1978: 205; Moloney 1998: 91; R. Brown 1966: 130; Witherington 1995: 94; Burge 2000: 114; Carson 1995: 187 n. 8; Blomberg 1995: 6), “by night” is likely not symbolic in the sense that Nicodemus came from darkness to light, while Judas went from light to darkness (cf. 6:70–71; 12:4–8; 13:2, 26–30; 18:2–5)—a view held by R. Brown (1966: 130) and Auwers (1990). Wallace (1996: 123–24) overreaches when he finds in the genitive of time an indication of “the kind of time in which Nicodemus came to see the Lord.” Morris (1995: 187) suggests that John may have had more than one meaning in mind.

10 Carson (1991: 670) here (as elsewhere) detects symbolism in the “night” reference, citing 3:2, 19–21; 13:30; 20:1. However, though 3:19–21 and 13:30 qualify, it is less clear that 3:2, 20:1, and the present instance do. Stibbe (1993: 210) draws attention to the fact that “the time between night and the early hours of the morning was precisely the time when Peter denied Jesus in 18.15–27.” Brodie’s (1993: 583) casting of the symbolism as setting “their boat in an atmosphere of alien darkness” seems overdone, as does Whitacre’s (1999: 490) contention that the early morning hour symbolizes “the dawning of spiritual light.”

26 Carson (1991: 517) lists as among the “fruit” obedience to Jesus’ commands (15:10); experience of Jesus’ joy (15:11; and peace [14:27]); love for one another (15:12); and witness to the world (15:16, 27).

4 Old Testament instances of raisings of the dead include Elijah’s raising of the widow’s son (1 Kings 17:17–24); Elisha’s raising of the son of the Shunammite woman (2 Kings 4:32–37); Elisha’s “posthumous” raising of a dead man (2 Kings 13:21); and the witch of Endor’s illicit summoning of Samuel from the dead at King Saul’s request (1 Sam. 28) (see also Ezekiel’s vision of the valley of dry bones [Ezek. 37:1–14]). Raisings of the dead were generally viewed in light of the final resurrection and as an expression of God’s power to bring it about.

39 But since Jesus’ kingdom is otherworldly, the use of force is uncalled for in the present instance. Lindars (1972: 559) remarks, “For the Kingdom understood in this way military action

palms 369, 372

Palm Sunday 367n4, 368

parables 18, 110, 297

Paraclete 435nn67-68, 436-37, 467. See also helping presence is not appropriate—a fact which the Church has not always remembered.” Yet one must be careful not to construe Jesus’ statement here as a wholesale endorsement of pacifism. Though the institutional church ought to be cautious about endorsing military action, Christians are at times in their capacity as citizens called on to take up arms; in that sense, “the church” may well engage in military action and not be in any conflict with Jesus’ refusal (in a very different if not unique situation). One thinks here of the forceful abolition of slavery in the United States and of Dietrich Bonhoeffer’s participation in a plot to assassinate Adolf Hitler.

4 The popular observance of Jesus’ triumphal entry on “Palm Sunday” does not adequately recognize that the crowd’s waving of palm branches, rather than being based on a true understanding of Jesus, was in fact based on a misconception of Jesus’ identity (editor’s note following Farmer 1952: 66). Hence, it would be more proper to mourn people’s inadequate notion of the Messiah at the present occasion than to perpetrate such misunderstanding by focusing on the externals of the event (waving of palm branches, celebration, etc.). Ironically, this kind of observance of Palm Sunday risks placing contemporary believers on par with the original Jerusalem crowd. But such an observance would miss the evangelists’ universal portrayal of the triumphal entry as mistaken (though unwittingly fulfilling OT prophecy) rather than reflecting a true knowledge of Jesus’ messianic calling and mission.

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If

parallelism 20
parousia 477
passion narrative 502, 503
Passover 14, 68, 103–4, 168, 196, 200, 209, 354–55, 368, 537–39 paternity dispute 173, 214, 236, 251 pathetic fallacy 36n52
Patron, Spirit as 436n70
peace 371, 443–44, 454n26, 480, 572, 573

the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete's ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

68 For a treatment of the Spirit-Paraclete in the context of the references to the Spirit in the entire Gospel narrative, see M. Davies 1992: 139–53. For a comparison of the treatments of the Spirit in John and the Synoptics, see Köstenberger 1999a: 156. On the Johannine Paraclete and Spirit of truth, see also the extended treatment in Keener 2003: 951–82.

52 Stibbe (1993: 27) observes, “The fact that the world does not acknowledge Jesus shows that John has no time for what literary theorists call ‘the pathetic fallacy’—the fallacious view that nature sympathizes with the poet and/or the hero. The world in John’s story is actively hostile to the protagonist.”

70 The translation of the term has proved particularly difficult since there does not seem to be an exact equivalent in the English language (see discussion in Carson 1991: 499). None of the expressions chosen in English translations seems fully adequate: “Counselor” (NIV) smacks of contemporary notions of counseling (marriage counselor, camp counselor), focusing primarily on emotional or psychological aspects (though the legal term “Counselor” or “Counsel” is more appropriate); “Helper” (NASB, ESV, ISV) is more neutral but conveys inferior status overtones not present in the text and lacks the legal connotation possibly present (cf. the discussion in Lindars 1972: 479); the fact that some translations give several alternative renderings in footnotes also suggests that any one English rendering may be inadequate (e.g., NLT: “the Counselor; or Comforter, or Encourager, or Advocate”). “Companion” (suggested by Brodie [1993: 466]) also falls short, as does Calvin’s (1961: 82) “Patron.” Some make reference to the root meaning of the word, “one called alongside to help,” but it is unclear whether first-century usage consciously drew on this background. There is evidence that the expression was used in a legal setting, but it is less clear that the meaning should be restricted to “Advocate” (so, consistently, the TNIV) or the like (standard Greek reference works cite the following meanings: LSJ—one called to one’s aid, legal assistant, advocate, summoned, intercessor; Behm, TDNT 5:800–814—legal advisor, helper, advocate in court [for a helpful survey, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.144–50]). Perhaps “helping presence” captures the import of the term better than any other (Köstenberger 1999a: 157) for the following reasons: (1) this is what Jesus was while with the disciples; (2) this encompasses the various functions laid out for the Spirit in John 14–16; (3) this transcends (but may include) the legal context of the term (see esp. 16:7–11). See the discussion by Ridderbos (1997: 503), who issues a plea to let the Johannine context (rather than alleged extrabiblical parallels) determine the meaning of παράκλητος and concludes that “the dominant idea is of someone who offers assistance in a situation in which help is needed.”

26 Carson (1991: 517) lists as among the “fruit” obedience to Jesus’ commands (15:10); experience of Jesus’ joy (15:11; and peace [14:27]); love for one another (15:12); and witness to the world (15:16, 27).

Pentecost 168, 574
 perfume 360–61, 362
 perishing 129–30, 202
 persecution 461, 465n7, 469
 Persia 262
 Peter 56, 71, 76, 77–78, 93, 95, 399, 589 at arrest of Jesus 508–9 and beloved disciple 9, 16, 413, 415, 584, 601 denial of Jesus 332, 424, 425, 507, 510, 513–14, 519–20
 and empty tomb 562–64
 martyrdom 385n41, 461, 527, 598–99, 601n5, 603 misunderstanding of Christ’s glory 422
 Pentecost sermon 471 protest over footwashing 405–6 restoration of 520n44, 595–99
 Pharaoh 96
 Pharisees 58, 63, 107, 145, 212, 231, 237, 254–57, 303 on Abraham 251
 and betrayal of Jesus 506 on blind man’s healing 285–94 on John the Baptist 63
 on Moses 48, 233 opposition to revolt 350
 plot to kill Jesus 355

7 The Synoptics likewise record Jesus’ warning that his followers would be persecuted (Matt. 10:16–25 pars.). In this, too, the principle was true that a student is not above the teacher (e.g., Luke 6:40). To persecute the church was to persecute Jesus himself (Acts 9:4). At the end of his life, Paul wrote to Timothy, “In fact, everyone who wants to live a godly life in Christ Jesus will be persecuted” (2 Tim. 3:12).

41 The evangelist editorializes that “this was to show the kind of death Jesus was going to die” (with σημαίνων [sēmainōn, indicating] serving as a participle indicating purpose [Wallace 1996: 635]). “Kind of death” in the first instance refers to crucifixion (as opposed to, e.g., stoning) but also hints at the fact that Jesus’ death is also “the pathway to his glorification, indeed an integral part of it” (Carson 1991: 444). The same phrase is used regarding Peter’s eventual martyr’s death in 21:19 (Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61, 168). It occurs frequently in connection with Greek oracles (e.g., Plutarch, De Pythiae oraculis 404.D.10), but also in regard to the meaning of names or prophecy (Josephus, Ant. 1.19.8 §308; 7.9.5 §214).

5 Most likely, Peter, just having been told that he would be martyred in the future, wants to know if, once again, the beloved disciple will fare better and be spared a similar fate. Contra Morris (1995: 774), who construes Peter’s motivation much more positively: “Happy in his own position, Peter now gave thought to his friend.” The words “if I want him to remain” emphasize Jesus’ authority and power, which is not accountable to Peter (Ridderbos 1997: 668–69).

44 The Fourth Evangelist’s omission of Peter’s tears probably assumes what everyone knew at that point: Peter subsequently repented, and he had been restored to service by Jesus, as is recorded in the epilogue in John 21.

- on popularity of Jesus 373
- on resurrection 335
- and Sanhedrin 117–18, 121, 348
- spiritual blindness 250, 278, 294–96, 297
- Philip 56, 78, 79, 81, 83, 93, 377–78, 428, 431, 432
- Philippian jailor 172
- Philo 26
- physical death 336
- piercing, of Jesus 305, 553–54
- Pilate 55, 502, 507n23, 510, 521, 523–39, 544–45, 554
- pilgrims 368, 370
- Place of the Skull 540, 543
- pluralism 428–29, 430
- polytheism 185–86
- Pompey 350
- pool of Bethesda 178–79, 181
- pool of Siloam 283–84
- poor 363, 364
- postmodernism 4, 5, 183n41, 429n35

23 Stibbe (1993: 182–84) takes this one step further when he says that in 18:1–11, Jesus “plays the part” of the good shepherd, and Judas that of the thief; and that in 18:15–27, the beloved disciple “plays the part” of the shepherd who walks in and out of the fold; the girl at the gate “plays the part” of the gatekeeper; and Peter is equated with the role of the hired hand who runs away in the hour of danger. Stibbe may be right in the case of Jesus acting as the good shepherd, Judas as the thief, and Peter as the hired hand. But if the beloved disciple is said to play the part of the shepherd just because he is shown to walk in and out of the high priest’s courtyard, one may perhaps also argue that Pilate is portrayed as a shepherd, since he too is shown repeatedly going in and out of his palace when oscillating back and forth between the crowds and Jesus. Stibbe’s reading here is too allegorical and lacks restraint; construing John 18 as, in essence, an allegorical outplaying of John 10 seems to take careful literary analysis a step too far.

41 Moloney 1998: 173; cf. Metzner 1999; Lee 1994: 110; Witkamp 1985: 24; Leidig 1979: 211; contra Thomas 1995: 18. Moloney (1998: 173) rightly notes, contra Beck (1993 [cf. 1997: 86–90]), who argues that anonymous characters in the Fourth Gospel draw the reader into an identification with the character, “The reader of the Fourth Gospel, however, hardly identifies with a man who is in league with ‘the Jews’ (vs. 15).” Keener (2003: 87), similarly, contends that a list of Johannine models of faith is not entirely coextensive with anonymous characters (citing esp. 5:14–15) and registers this as his only serious disagreement with Beck (p. 87 n. 49). Beck, in a review (2001), indirectly responds to my earlier criticism (Köstenberger 1999b, reviewing Beck 1997) that the man in John 5 disproves his theory by alleging, in effect, that I have no place for literary analysis in my hermeneutical method. Nothing could be further from the truth. My concern, rather, lies with an unqualified wholesale adoption of reader-response criticism by evangelicals who fail to realize that this methodology is part and parcel of a postmodern hermeneutic that is left with nothing but subjective readings devoid of any claim to authority or universal applicability. Moreover, I was concerned to point out that Beck’s central thesis (i.e., that anonymity necessarily equals ideal function and positive characterization) is

Praetorium 523
prayer 344–45, 477, 478, 482–84
prayer of consecration 482n1, 482n5 predestination 211–12, 266n72, 391 present age 487 prince of this world 383, 445 promised land 65, 304 prophet 61, 203, 237, 241, 287
Protevangelium of James 248 pruning 451
Psalms 508, 553n75

invalid. Note further this puzzling conclusion by Brodie (1993: 238): “The final picture ... is ... open to a positive interpretation: the man has finally come to mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus, and he is announcing the good news to the Jews.” Precisely where Brodie finds the man “announcing the good news to the Jews” is unclear to me, nor can I see textual evidence for the man coming to “mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus.”

35 For a comprehensive treatment and critique of religious pluralism within the larger framework of postmodernism, see especially Carson 1996. See also Carson’s comments in his commentary (1991: 491–92) and his important rebuttal of Bruce (1983: 298–99 [picked up Beasley-Murray 1999: 253]), who alleges that “Jesus’ claim, understood in the light of the prologue to the Gospel, is inclusive, not exclusive.” On the exclusivism of 14:6, see also Keener 2003: 941–43.

1 The prayer is often called Jesus’ “high-priestly prayer” (a designation reaching back at least as far as the sixteenth century), though this label hardly fits with Johannine thought, which does not picture Jesus as a high priest (Ridderbos 1997: 546; Carson 1991: 552–53; though see commentary at 17:19 below). Westcott’s and E. C. Hoskyns’s title “prayer of consecration,” though not without merit (see below), fails to encompass the contents of the entire prayer (Carson 1991: 553; Barrett 1978: 500). Hence, commentators now frequently opt for more generic titles of the present prayer, such as “The Farewell Prayer” (Ridderbos) or “The Prayer of Jesus” (Carson). Witherington (1995: 266) calls it “The Sage’s Prayer,” based on his view that the Fourth Evangelist portrays Jesus as a sage.

5 Hence, it was common especially in older commentators to refer to the present prayer as Jesus’ “prayer of consecration” (e.g., Cullmann, E. C. Hoskyns, Bernard, W. F. Howard [cited in Agourides 1968: 138]; see also Westcott [1908: 2.238], who titles John 17 “The Prayer of Consecration” but later says that the chapter contains “what may be most properly called ‘the Lord’s Prayer’ ”). This designation has merit (esp. in light of 17:19 [so, rightly, Michaels 1989: 297]), as long as it is not used to imply a strong link between the prayer and the liturgical practices of the church toward the end of the first century A.D. More modestly and soberly, Calvin (1961: 134) calls the prayer “the seal of the preceding teaching” of Jesus.

72 On predestination in John’s Gospel, see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.214–15. Carson (1991: 353) suggests that ἀκούω (akouō, hear) has the connotation of “obey.” R. Brown (1966: 357) thinks that the verb means literally that the Jews “have become so obdurate that they cannot even hear him; they are deaf.” Ridderbos (1997: 314) notes that Jesus’ opponents’ spiritual incomprehension results from their failure to combine hearing with faith.

75 So R. Brown 1970: 952–53; Moloney 1998: 509. Beasley-Murray (1999: 355) suggests that pseudoprophets 303

purification 97, 150, 354–55

p 647 quest story 58n5

Qumran community 107, 415, 442, 498n75

dualism 13, 31n38, 213n68, 219n92, 438

the source of the Fourth Gospel was alluding to Passover typology, while the evangelist is alluding to the righteous sufferer of Ps. 34. Somewhat ironically, Barrett (1978: 558) proposes the exact converse: the source is alluding to the Psalms typology, while the evangelist is alluding to Passover typology. Ridderbos (1997: 622–23) opts for the Psalms typology but denies the Passover allusion.

5 Moloney (1998: 58) proposes that the question “Who are you?” could be taken as the leitmotif of John’s Gospel. Barrett (1978: 172) considers the phrase an allusion to Jesus’ “I am” statements in 6:35 and 8:24. Witherington (1995: 64) follows Painter in classifying the present pericope as a “quest story” that prepares the evangelist’s audience to properly answer subsequent questions about Jesus’ identity. He also contends—a rather dubious claim—that the evangelist presents Jesus as a Jewish sage à la Wisdom whom disciples were to seek and follow (adducing Sir. 51:23). The opening demonstrative “this” is classified by Wallace (1996: 334) as an instance of “inverse attraction,” where the pronominal subject is linked with the gender of the preceding nominative (cf. Matt. 7:12; 13:38; Luke 2:12; 8:11; Rom. 11:27; Gal. 4:24). More questionable is Wallace’s claim (1996: 532) that the present verb ἐστίν (estin, is) is a “testimonium present” (discussed under the rubric of “perfective present”). More likely, ἐστίν is a historical present (Wallace denies that εἰμί is ever used as a historical present in the NT).

75 The same verb, τελειόω (teleioō, complete) is used in 4:34; 5:36; 17:4; 19:28. Other Johannine parallels include the “one flock and one shepherd” (10:16) and the “gathering of the scattered children into one” (11:52). The Qumran covenanters, too, saw themselves as a yahad (union) and displayed a keen consciousness of their election (for a discussion of Qumran parallels to the notion of unity in John 17, see R. Brown 1970: 777).

38 Some believe that John is alluding here to the Greek dualism between light and darkness. Rather than affirming belief in a personal God who is sovereign, all-powerful, and good, the Greeks viewed reality in terms of polar opposites, such as light and darkness or good and evil. John, however, refutes this kind of thinking in his first epistle, where he states emphatically, “God is light; in him there is no darkness at all” (1 John 1:5). Another kind of light/darkness dualism is found in the DSS, particularly the War Scroll (1QM) depicting the battle between the “sons of light” and the “sons of darkness.” Yet, because of the sectarian nature of the Qumran community, light is never offered to those who live in darkness (cf. 1QS 3:21; 4:9–14) (Bauckham 1997). In John, on the other hand, Jesus urges his listeners, “Put your trust in the light while you have it, so that you may become sons of light” (12:36; cf. 8:12; 9:5).

68 There is a certain affinity between John’s teaching on predestination and the Qumran doctrine of the “two spirits” (1QS 3:14–4:6). The rabbinic view is summed up by a saying attributed to Rabbi Akiba (ca. A.D. 135): “All is foreseen, but freedom of choice is given” (m. Abot 3.16). Cf. Josephus, Ant. 18.1.3 §13; 18.1.4 §16; 18.1.5 §18; J.W. 2.8.14 §§162–65; see also the excursus in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.265–70.

92 At Qumran, the dualism is between two spirits; here and in 3:6, it is between flesh and spirit. Paul’s strikingly similar pronouncement in 2 Cor. 3:6 indicates either dependence on Jesus or common drawing on conventional Jewish wisdom.

hatred for enemies 464
on love 423 on Messiah 61, 63, 203, 241 sectarianism 128, 130 on “the way” 429n38

rabbi (designation) 74, 137, 329n30, 408 rabbinic Judaism 159, 182, 188, 213, 235, 263, 281, 457 reader-response criticism 4, 5, 183n41 realized (inaugurated) eschatology 188, 212 Reason 26, 41 reclining 360, 414–15
redaction criticism 605
regeneration 39n60, 118–19, 153, 435

38 The terms “way,” “truth,” and “life” frequently are combined in OT wisdom literature (e.g., Ps. 16:11; 86:11; Prov. 15:24). In the DSS, the ways of truth are contrasted with the ways of darkness and deceit. The Qumran covenanters considered themselves to be “the way” in absolute terms (perhaps on the basis of Isa. 40:3; cf. 1QS 8:12–16; 9:19–20), so that those who elected to join their ranks were said to have chosen “the way” (1QS 9:17–18). At Qumran, “the way” was understood to consist in strict legal observance as interpreted by the “Teacher of Righteousness.”
30 Morris (1995: 480) thinks that the present reference to returning to Judea (instead of the more specific Bethany) indicates that it is this entrance that is significant, for it will lead to Jesus’ crucifixion. On the address “rabbi,” see commentary at 1:38. The term is used here for the last time in John’s Gospel (but see 20:16). The expression also occurs in 9:2 (note the similarities between 9:2–5 and 11:8–10).

41 Moloney 1998: 173; cf. Metzner 1999; Lee 1994: 110; Witkamp 1985: 24; Leidig 1979: 211; contra Thomas 1995: 18. Moloney (1998: 173) rightly notes, contra Beck (1993 [cf. 1997: 86–90]), who argues that anonymous characters in the Fourth Gospel draw the reader into an identification with the character, “The reader of the Fourth Gospel, however, hardly identifies with a man who is in league with ‘the Jews’ (vs. 15).” Keener (2003: 87), similarly, contends that a list of Johannine models of faith is not entirely coextensive with anonymous characters (citing esp. 5:14–15) and registers this as his only serious disagreement with Beck (p. 87 n. 49). Beck, in a review (2001), indirectly responds to my earlier criticism (Köstenberger 1999b, reviewing Beck 1997) that the man in John 5 disproves his theory by alleging, in effect, that I have no place for literary analysis in my hermeneutical method. Nothing could be further from the truth. My concern, rather, lies with an unqualified wholesale adoption of reader-response criticism by evangelicals who fail to realize that this methodology is part and parcel of a postmodern hermeneutic that is left with nothing but subjective readings devoid of any claim to authority or universal applicability. Moreover, I was concerned to point out that Beck’s central thesis (i.e., that anonymity necessarily equals ideal function and positive characterization) is invalid. Note further this puzzling conclusion by Brodie (1993: 238): “The final picture ... is ... open to a positive interpretation: the man has finally come to mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus, and he is announcing the good news to the Jews.” Precisely where Brodie finds the man “announcing the good news to the Jews” is unclear to me, nor can I see textual evidence for the man coming to “mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus.”

60 Some identify “children of God,” not “those who believe,” as the antecedent of the relative remaining with Jesus 453 remembering 442 repentance 59, 63, 134 replacement theme 316 request-rebuke-assistance pattern 93 resurrection 91n7, 187, 189–90, 320, 334–36, 346, 365, 378, 440 revelation 431–32, 442, 473–74, 490, 497 rewards 427

 righteousness 46, 369, 472, 500 ritual purification 63, 136 robbers 300, 302–3, 306, 312
 Romans 350
 Rome 239, 262
 rooster 424, 519–20 royal officer's son 166–72 ruler of this world 471
 Ruth 202n19

 Sabbath 174, 181, 186, 234, 267, 316, 510, 537 and crucifixion 551
 healing on 181, 183–86, 285–86, 289

clause beginning 1:13 in order not to make faith follow regeneration (Bultmann 1971: 59 nn. 4–5). However, this is both syntactically awkward and implausible, as well as theologically unnecessary. In the Greek syntax, “those who believe” immediately precedes the relative clause and is thus most naturally taken as the antecedent, and the relationship between faith and rebirth is not easily reduced to a set sequential formula. The statement in 1 John 5:1, “Everyone who believes that Jesus is the Christ is born of God,” allows one to deduce from a person’s belief that person’s regenerate state; regeneration (being “born of God”) and saving faith thus go together and cannot be separated. Spiritual rebirth takes place at God’s initiative; people are called to faith based on God’s revelation in Christ. John nowhere elaborates on the precise temporal relationship of these two aspects. Here and elsewhere in his Gospel (6:44–45; 10:26; 12:37–40), he affirms both divine sovereignty and human responsibility, and interpreters should do no less (see Carson 1981).

7 It is doubtful that the reference to “the third day” represents an allusion to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 102; Carson 1991: 167; Burge 2000: 90; contra Borchert 1996: 153; Stibbe 1993: 46; Keener 2003: 497–98). The reference serves as a chronological connective with preceding events, perhaps indicating that the promise of 1:51 was quickly fulfilled (Beasley-Murray 1999: 34, citing Schnackenburg 1990: 1.325; cf. Talbert [1992: 86], who says that 2:1–11 serves as fulfillment of the prophecy in 1:51; and D. M. Smith [1999: 86], who speaks of the “first installment . . . of the revelation promised in 1:51”). The beginning of Jesus’ final week is signaled in 12:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 189–90).

19 Similarly, it is said of Ruth, “She ate all she wanted and had some left over” (Ruth 2:14; see Daube 1956: 46–51). The concern that nothing “perish” (ἀπόληται, apolētai) may establish a link with the fate of Judas, who is described as “son of destruction” (ἀπωλείας, apōleias) in John 17:12. There may also be a link with the apostasy of most of Jesus’ “disciples” in 6:66 (Anderson 1996: 174).

sacrifice 66, 67, 304
 Sadducees 118, 237, 291n59, 303, 314, 351, 516n24
 on resurrection 335
 on Sanhedrin 348, 365
 Salim 135–36, 137
 saliva 283
 Salome 548
 salvation 428n34, 430
 salvation history 22, 158, 196, 470, 478
 Samaria 141, 146
 Samaritans 61, 141, 149–50, 153–55, 163–64, 268–69
 Samaritan woman 54, 112, 141–58, 159–61, 164, 210, 287
 Samuel 192
 Samuel the Lesser 288
 sanctification 438, 496–97
 Sanhedrin 118, 231–32, 235, 237–38, 242–44, 348–49, 353
 and trial of Jesus 510, 526, 538
 Satan 32, 222, 254, 266–67, 383n37, 385, 403

59 The perceptive reader will note that the Phraisees' claim to being disciples of Moses is refuted by the earlier statement in 5:45–47 (Keener 2003: 791). There is some debate as to how common this self-designation was among the Jews of Jesus' day (cf., e.g., Matt. 23:2). In b. Yoma 4a, it is applied to Pharisees as opposed to Sadducees. In m. Abot 5.19, Jews are referred to as "the disciples of Abraham," while Christians are dismissed as "the disciples of Balaam the wicked" (that is, Jesus!). Schnackenburg (1990: 2.251) and Ridderbos (1997: 345 n. 287, referring to TDNT 4:443) consider this to be a characteristic rabbinic self-designation, while Carson (1991: 373–74, apparently following Barrett 1978: 362–63) says that this self-designation was not common.

24 Among those viewing the present hearing in more unofficial terms are Carson (1991: 584), Ridderbos (1997: 582), and R. Brown (1970: 826). Most other major commentators consider this to be an official trial (e.g., Morris, Barrett). On the Sadducees' reputation for judging in general, Josephus writes that "the school of the Sadducees ... are indeed more heartless than any of the other Jews ... when they sit in judgment" (Ant. 20.9.1 §199).

34 The importance of 14:6 in the context of the entire Gospel (not to mention Christian theology at large) can hardly be exaggerated. Ridderbos (1997: 493) calls it "the core statement of this entire Gospel." Schnackenburg (1990: 3.65 [cited approvingly by Beasley-Murray 1999: 252]) says that this text "forms a classical summary of the Johannine doctrine of salvation." Burge (2000: 392) calls it the premier expression of the Gospel's theology.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase "prince of the world" with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title "prince of this world" occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, "Mastema" is called "chief of the spirits" or simply "prince" (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the "dominion of Belial" extends to his entire "lot" (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter's crucifixion.

- and betrayal of Jesus 416–18
- enters Judas 414
- scapegoat 67n36
- scars, of Jesus 572–73
- scourgings 531–33, 542
- scribes 303
- sealing 139
- Sea of Galilee 196, 204–5
- Sea of Tiberias 588
- second coming 425, 427, 439n80
- Second Temple period 42, 326
 - literature 188, 263, 394n18, 396–97, 458n50
- seeing 81–82, 208, 565
 - and believing 212–13
- seeing God 48–50
- Sejanus 524–25
- sending terminology 573–74n13
- servant 63, 361, 408, 459, 465
- set apart 315–16

80 See Morris (1995: 579), who says that “if this is accepted it must be in the sense of 20:22, where the Spirit was in some sense given on the day of resurrection”; and Bruce (1983: 303), who points out that the resurrection appearances were but brief and temporary. See also Barrett (1978: 464), who maintains that the primary reference is to the resurrection but the expression also extends to the presence of Christ in his disciples (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 258). In the patristic period, the Eastern church fathers understood the phrase “in a little while” to refer to the resurrection, while the Latin church thought that Jesus meant the parousia. Bultmann (1971: 619) contends that John’s source referred to the latter, with the evangelist demythologizing his source by reinterpreting it as the former. Hence, the second coming is swallowed up in Easter. However, this reconstruction is predicated upon Bultmann’s source theory regarding John’s Gospel as well as upon his existential approach to interpretation, including the categories of “myth” and “demythologization.” Yet note how even after his resurrection, Jesus refers to a future time at which he will return (21:22, 23). Moloney (1998: 403) implausibly contends that “that day” is Jesus’ hour and departure.

18 This emphasis is in keeping with instances in Second Temple literature, where the law seems to take a more active part in the process of judging (2 Bar. 48:47; 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 13:30–35; Wis. 9:3; cf. Philo, Mos. 2.10 §53). John 12:48–50 contains echoes of the Book of Deuteronomy (cf. Deut. 18:19; 31:19, 26; see O’Connell 1960; cf. R. Brown 1966: 491–92). There, it is God who takes vengeance on those who refuse to hear; in the Targumim, it is God’s memra, or word: “And the man who does not listen to his words which he [the future prophet] will speak in the name of my memra, I in my memra will be avenged of him” (Tg. Neof. on Deut. 18:19); “my memra will take revenge on him” (Tg. Ps.-J. on Deut. 18:19). For “the last day,” see 6:39–40, 44; 11:24 (the phrase, with “day” in the singular, does not occur elsewhere in the NT).

50 Friendship was also the subject of extended reflection in Second Temple wisdom literature (esp. Sir. 6:5–17). For a study of the concept of friendship in Greco-Roman, Jewish, and early Christian literature with special focus on John’s Gospel, see Ford 1997.

shame 554
Shammai school 286, 289
Shechem 146–47
sheep 297, 299, 301, 304, 311–12, 480, 487n18, 597
Sheep Gate 177–78
shekinah 40n63
Shema 488
Shemaiah 193
Sheol 190
shepherd. See good shepherd shepherd imagery 597 shepherding 599
shock 543n14
Sicarii 107
sign from heaven 208 sign of Jonah 109
signs 9–11, 87, 108–10, 174, 192, 208, 349, 395, 581–82
signs and wonders 14, 121, 170, 578
Simon of Cyrene 542
Simon Peter 513n11, 562n8. See also Peter sin 258, 267, 466, 472
 bondage to 131

18 According to 6:37–40, everyone who “looks to the Son and believes in him shall have eternal life” (cf. 1 John 2:23–25). In 10:27–28, Jesus is said to give life to “his sheep” who “listen to his voice.” Morris (1995: 636 n. 6) notes the frequency of the term δίδωμι (didōmi, give) in the present prayer and elaborates on its significance. The neuter πᾶν ὅ (pan ho, all that) focuses less on the persons as such and more on the God-given nature of Jesus’ authority (Morris 1995: 636 n. 9); R. Brown (1970: 741) suggests that it may “give a certain unity to the group.”

63 Grappe (2000: 153–69) discusses 1:14–18 in light of Second Temple literature. He identifies the shekinah motif as the focal point of the passage, taking its point of departure from the revelation granted to Moses at Mount Sinai. For John, Jesus is the place where God’s presence, glory, grace, and truth are revealed. “By virtue of his unique nature, he is the one who transcends the most prestigious figures and institutions of the past” (p. 153).

14 Shock as the cause of death is strongly argued by Zugibe (1989: 41): “Shock is unquestionably the cause of Jesus’ death on the cross,” referring also to the opinion of a surgeon who contends, “There is overwhelming evidence that Christ died from heart failure due to extreme shock caused by exhaustion, pain and loss of blood.”

11 John never uses the short form “Peter” at the beginning of a narrative. In the present passage, he starts with “Simon Peter” (18:15), followed by “Peter” (18:16, 17, 18). When the courtyard scene is resumed, it is again “Simon Peter” (18:25), then “Peter” (18:26, 27).

8 The repetition of the preposition πρὸς (pros, to) may indicate that Peter and the beloved disciple were at different locations (see Whitacre 1999: 472; Brodie 1993: 561). The reference to “Simon Peter” is the first mention of this disciple since his denial of Jesus (18:27). As is his custom, John uses Peter’s full name when reintroducing him into his narrative (see commentary at 18:15).

and suffering 182, 281, 293 six (number) 96 slaves 263, 405, 459
 sleep, as death 330–31
 Society of Biblical Literature 3
 Solomon 151
 Song of the Vineyard 448, 449
 Son of David 122, 385–86 son of destruction 202n19, 494, 508n30
 Son of God 83–84, 255, 315, 533–34, 582, 583
 Son of Man 18, 84–87, 113, 127–28, 189, 212, 216, 294, 372n21, 375, 386–87, 422, 486 sonship 263 sons of Zebedee 588 source criticism 605
 sowing and reaping 162–63, 378 speech, plain vs. figurative 478–79 spices for burial 555
 Spirit 9, 47n90, 69–71, 97n31, 124, 156–57, 213, 241, 441 gives life 219 judgment of world 471–72
 residence in believers 450

19 Similarly, it is said of Ruth, “She ate all she wanted and had some left over” (Ruth 2:14; see Daube 1956: 46–51). The concern that nothing “perish” (ἀπόληται, apolētai) may establish a link with the fate of Judas, who is described as “son of destruction” (ἀπωλείας, apōleias) in John 17:12. There may also be a link with the apostasy of most of Jesus’ “disciples” in 6:66 (Anderson 1996: 174).

30 Moloney (1998: 485), rather idiosyncratically, claims that the “son of perdition” in 17:12 is not Judas but Satan and that Jesus does not exclude anyone, even Judas, from his request to the soldiers (p. 483). R. Brown (1970: 811–12) suggests that Judas was not given to Jesus by the Father. Borchert (2002: 220) rightly notes that the exception is already stated in 17:12.

21 Though the rabbis had difficulty reconciling this humble notion of the Messiah with that of the Danielic Son of Man “coming on the clouds of heaven” (b. Sanh. 98a). However, riding on a donkey does appear as one of the three signs of the Messiah in Eccles. Rab. 1.9, where the latter redeemer in Zech. 9:9 is featured as the counterpart to Moses in Exod. 4:20.

90 R. Edwards (1988: 7 nn. 17–21) cites the following leading fathers of the Greek church as holding that the phrase “grace for grace” referred to a replacement of the Mosaic law by the gospel: Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, Origen, and Theophylact (also Jerome, the most learned of the Latin fathers). Somewhat curiously, Michaels (1989: 24) contends that “grace and truth” is “a circumlocution for the Holy Spirit” (with reference to passages in John and elsewhere that connect the Spirit with grace or truth; cf. John 4:23–24; 14:17; 15:26; 16:13; 1 John 5:6).

31 So, for example, Ridderbos 1997: 107; Morris 1995: 162; Carson 1991: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 35; R. Brown 1966: 105; Kruse 2003: 94–95. Ridderbos (1997: 108) cites OT allusions to the abundance of wine in the new age (Gen. 49:11; Isa. 25:6; Amos 9:13–14; Jer. 31:12–14; see also Joel 3:18). Keener (2003: 512) suggests a (proleptic) connection between the abundant “measure” of water turned into wine in 2:6 and the unlimited provision of the Spirit in 3:34.

p 648 resting on Jesus 139
 revelational ministry 473–74 sending of 397, 434–44, 470–71, 574–75 of truth 438, 467, 473–74, 496
 as witness 467
 spirit and truth 156–57 spirit baptism 70–71, 123, 435 spiritual birth 39, 123–25, 126 spiritual blindness 131, 278, 294–95, 297 spiritual cleansing 406–7 spiritual darkness 418 spiritual death 250 spiritual life 250, 454
 stadion 205n31
 staircase parallelism 20
 Stephen 273
 Stoicism 26 stone 96
 stoning 273, 312–14, 526, 543 substitutionary atonement 67, 68 suffering 182, 281, 422, 498 suffering Servant 260, 535 suggestion-negative response-positive action pattern 93 Sychar 146–47, 148, 164 symbolic discourse 297, 302 synagogue 217, 288, 292, 468n28 synergism 592n28
 Synoptic Gospels 17–18, 168n5, 173, 221, 400n1, 542, 558n3

31 “Three or three and a half miles” translates “twenty-five or thirty stadia.” A stadion was equivalent to 606.75 feet. The lake was about sixty-one stadia at its greatest width. If the multiplication of the loaves took place at the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee, then the shortest distance to Capernaum would be five to six miles.

28 On being “put out of the synagogue,” see commentary at 9:22, 34 and at 12:42–43. There is no need to tie the present reference to the birkat ha-minim (Moloney 1998: 434). See also the references to “those who say they are Jews and are not, but are a synagogue of Satan” in the Book of Revelation (2:9; 3:9). Some rabbis taught that prayer was not effective unless offered in the synagogue.

28 Ridderbos (1997: 662) notes how Jesus involves his followers as those who will continue his work on earth (more restrained is Morris [1995: 764]). This, of course, has already been his practice during his earthly ministry (e.g., 6:5–13). Moreover, care must be taken not to overreach in finding symbolism in every detail of this or other Johannine narratives. For instance, it would be wrong to infer from the present instance a kind of synergism in which believers collaborate with Jesus in his provision as if what Jesus provides were insufficient to meet their needs.

5 John may assume here his readers’ familiarity with Synoptic tradition, according to which Jesus was rejected in his native Galilee, including Nazareth (Matt. 13:53–58 par.; Luke 4:16–30;

on eternal life 487
on John the Baptist 33, 136, 318
on kingdom 122, 303 on miracles 174 on Spirit 435

tabernacle 41–42, 441, 491, 501 Taheb 157, 159n63, 164 teacher 125, 408
“teacher of Israel” 113, 125
Teacher of Righteousness 442 teaching cycles 173
temple 217, 309–10, 313, 349–50, 426n25, 491, 516–17

cf. Matt. 11:19 par.). Other instances in which John appears to expect his readers’ familiarity with Synoptic tradition include 1:40; 3:24; 6:67; 11:1–2. The present saying is found also in Gos. Thom. 31 and P.Oxy. 1.6 (van Belle 1998: 27–44). Michaels (1989: 78–79) links the present “welcome” to the Didache guideline that itinerant teachers not stay in a locale more than two days (cf. John 4:40). However, this seems to be both anachronistic and contextually far-fetched. 1 Cf. “six days before the Passover” in 12:1; “the next day” in 12:12. Carson (1991: 455–58) rightly concludes that Jesus and his disciples ate a true paschal meal on Thursday, 15 Nisan (contra Barrett 1978: 50–51; R. Brown 1970: 556; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.36). On the chronology of the passion narrative in John and the Synoptics (siding with Carson, despite Morris 1995: 688–90), see the sidebar in Köstenberger 1999a: 146, with further bibliographical references (see also Köstenberger 2002c: 130, 164, 173; Blomberg 1987: 175–80; Carson 1984: 530–32). Some seek to adjudicate apparent differences between the presentations in John and the Synoptics by the theory that differences in chronology are due to the use of different calendars. John, it is suggested, like the Judeans and the Sadducees, uses a lunar sunset-to-sunset calendar, while the Synoptics, like the Galileans, the Pharisees, and Jesus and his followers, employ a solar sunrise-to-sunrise reckoning (Hoehner 1977: 85–90; see chart on p. 89; Morris 1995: 684–95); or, John’s calendric usage shifts: his light-darkness theme (rooted in the Genesis account) is conveyed by way of a solar calendar, while elsewhere a lunar system is found (building on exodus redemptive motifs) (Busada 2003). However, these theories seem to lack a clear textual base in the Gospels themselves and are unnecessarily complicated if the solution argued here is adopted.

3 Note the lack of consensus on the relationship between the Johannine empty tomb narrative and those found in the Synoptics: see, for example, the studies by Neirynck (1984), who detects a “determinative” Synoptic influence on the Fourth Evangelist; Lindars (1956), who says that John’s sources are traditions that lie behind the Synoptics rather than the Synoptics themselves; and Curtis (1971), who makes the implausible suggestion that Luke used John rather than vice versa.

63 On the Samaritan Taheb as prophet-revealer, see commentary at 4:25. On the woman’s witness in a Jewish-Samaritan context, see Maccini 1994.

25 The expression “my Father’s house” refers to the temple in 2:16 (cf. Luke 2:49), but there is no indication in the present context that the temple is in view (see McCaffrey 1988: 63). Note that even in 2:21 the temple is reinterpreted in terms of Jesus’ body. On “father’s house” as designating a (patriarchal) family in the LXX and extrabiblical literature, see McCaffrey 1988:

adorned with vine 450 clearing of 89, 102–3, 105–11, 322n7 destruction of 8, 155, 350 as dwelling of God 441 temple guards 237, 242
 Ten Commandments 440n85 tenth hour 75–76
 tent of meeting 41
 Tetragrammaton 314, 491n39
 Textus Receptus 248n10 thanksgiving 344
 theodicy 494–95, 526
 theophany 295n82, 431

50–51.

7 Though note that Jesus' resurrection also plays a role in the symbolism of the second sign recorded in John, the clearing of the temple (see 2:20–22). Stibbe (1994: 39; 1993: 121) points out that the seven signs of Jesus in John's Gospel span the whole gamut from the festive mood of a wedding to the aftermath of a funeral.

85 The synonymous use of the terms "word" and "commandment" harks back to the OT, where the Ten Commandments are called "words" (Hebrew dābār) of God (Exod. 20:1; cf. Deut. 5:5, 22). The expressions "commandments" and "word(s)" are used interchangeably in Ps. 119 (e.g., 119:10, 25, 28). Regarding Jesus' assertion "my Father will love him," see commentary at 14:21. 39 See also Isa. 62:2; 65:15–16. Speculation about the divine name was common in the Judaism of Jesus' day. In particular, people wondered about the angel of the Lord referred to in Exod. 23:20–21. In later Jewish literature, the name of God became enshrined in the sacred Tetragrammaton (YHWH), which served as a substitute for pronouncing the divine name. In fact, Schlatter (1948: 319–20) believes that John here alludes to the Jews' reluctance to pronounce God's name. In gnostic literature, "name" refers to the knowledge (γνῶσις, gnōsis) mediated by the redeemer. This name is revealed only to certain individuals who thereby acquire a share in God's life, light, and joy.

10 The unfortunate precedent of including the pericope may have been set by Erasmus, who, though doubting the originality of the passage, nonetheless included it in his 1516 edition of the Greek NT in deference to its popularity by readers of the Latin Vulgate. From there, the pericope found its way into the seventeenth-century Textus Receptus (Burge 1984: 148 n. 29). See also Beck (1997: 101–7, esp. 103–4), who concludes that the pericope is inauthentic but nonetheless incorporates it in his study by analyzing its effect on the reader. This judgment, however, is of doubtful merit in that it fails to consider the original and the earliest readers of the Gospel (who would not have read the Gospel with this pericope), and in that it unduly neglects issues such as canonicity, inspiration, and biblical authority.

82 Borchert (1996: 325) relates the present reference to 20:28 and believes that this confession is a high point in the festival cycle. The man's response to Jesus' self-revelation is in keeping with the standard OT reaction to theophany (e.g., Gen. 17:3). However, it is possible that the man's actions, while being "beyond that due to other men," fall "short of that due to God Almighty" (Beasley-Murray 1999: 160; similarly, Carson 1991: 377). Nevertheless, the majority of commentators favor a fuller sense of worship (Barrett 1978: 365; R. Brown 1966: 376; Bultmann

thieves 300, 302–3, 306, 507n23
Thomas 331–32, 428, 432, 558, 564n23, 565, 569n13, 571 “conversion” of 57, 577–80, 588 thorns 532 three days 108–9 thunder 382
Tiberias 206
Tiberius 55, 164, 199
time 75, 95, 99, 155, 230–31, 378, 383, 402, 469
tomb 556, 560
Torah 26, 193, 194, 209n54, 214 torches 506
transcendence 493n46

1971: 339 n. 3; Morris 1995: 440; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.254).

23 Stibbe (1993: 182–84) takes this one step further when he says that in 18:1–11, Jesus “plays the part” of the good shepherd, and Judas that of the thief; and that in 18:15–27, the beloved disciple “plays the part” of the shepherd who walks in and out of the fold; the girl at the gate “plays the part” of the gatekeeper; and Peter is equated with the role of the hired hand who runs away in the hour of danger. Stibbe may be right in the case of Jesus acting as the good shepherd, Judas as the thief, and Peter as the hired hand. But if the beloved disciple is said to play the part of the shepherd just because he is shown to walk in and out of the high priest’s courtyard, one may perhaps also argue that Pilate is portrayed as a shepherd, since he too is shown repeatedly going in and out of his palace when oscillating back and forth between the crowds and Jesus. Stibbe’s reading here is too allegorical and lacks restraint; construing John 18 as, in essence, an allegorical outplaying of John 10 seems to take careful literary analysis a step too far.

23 In this he compares favorably with Thomas later in this chapter (Moloney 1998: 538; see commentary at 20:24–29). Ridderbos (1997: 633 n. 15 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Beck 1997: 117–18]) suggests that ἐπίστευσεν (episteusen, he believed) is an ingressive aorist. He also contrasts Mary’s reaction (concern that the body had been stolen) with that of the beloved disciple (faith).

13 Lee (1995: 42) notes the interesting narrative tension introduced by the fact that Jesus asks Mary not to cling to him (20:17) but invites Thomas to touch him later on in the narrative (20:27). She also points out that in the end, it is inconsequential whether or not Thomas actually does touch Jesus (p. 43; see discussion below). For an alternate way of construing the syntax of 20:17 by taking γάρ (gar, for) to be anticipatory, see McGehee (1986), who translates, “Don’t cling to me. Since I have not yet ascended to the Father, go to my brothers and tell them I am ascending to my Father and your Father and my God and your God.” D’Angelo (1990) adduces Apoc. Mos. 31 as a parallel, taking the present passage to relate to a concern for purity “because the appearance takes place in some sort of intermediary stage.”

54 Since contemporary Judaism conceived of the Torah as “bread” from God (cf. Prov. 9:5), some suggest that Jesus may here claim to be superior to the Torah (Carson 1991: 286–87; cf. Barrett 1978: 290; R. Brown 1966: 262). However, in the Johannine context such a claim seems unduly dichotomous and probably unlikely.

46 Carson (1991: 561) rightly notes that not only does the present address combine the notions of transcendence (holy) and familial intimacy (Father), but also it provides the foundation on the trial scene 250n1

 tribulation 476
 triumph 481n84
 triumphal entry 367–74
 trust 302, 425
 truth 44–45, 131, 261, 266–67, 429–30, 437–38, 473, 495–96, 529 Twelve 220–24, 405. See also disciples typology 18, 35
 Tyrian currency 105–6

 unbelief 116–17, 130, 208, 211, 230, 388, 390, 393, 461, 472, 561n3 unbroken net 593
 uncleanness 149, 354
 undergarment 546–47
 undershepherds 300 union with Jesus 216 unity 307, 494
 universalism 35, 128, 211

 Valerius Gratus 351
 Vespasian 165
 vine allegory 15, 397, 446, 448–54 vinegar 550
 virgin birth 80
 voice crying in the wilderness 55, 59, 60, 62

basis of which the Son and believers are consecrated for service (see 17:17–19; see Barrett 1978: 507).

1 See Charles 1989; Lincoln 2000. Stibbe (1993: 99) contends that the present pericope constitutes a “trial scene,” whereby “the implicit commentary ... supports the narrator’s defence of the divinity of Jesus and the concomitant satire of the diabolism of the Jews.” According to Stibbe, much of the irony in this chapter comes from Jesus taking on the role of Yahweh, and the Jews that of the false, pagan gods.

84 This is the only instance of the term νικάω (nikaō, triumph) in John’s Gospel. The expression occurs several times in John’s first epistle (2:13, 14; 4:4; 5:4, 5) and over a dozen times in the Book of Revelation (esp. in the letters to the seven churches in chs. 2 and 3; see Schlatter 1948: 317). The related noun νίκη (nikē, victory) occurs in 1 John 5:4. Other NT references to the victory won by Jesus (extended to believers) include John 12:31; Rom. 8:37 (ὑπερνικάω, hypernikaō); 1 Cor. 15:57 (νίκος, nikos). The verb occurs rarely in the OT, with Ps. 50:6 LXX showing God as conqueror (cited in Rom. 3:4). It is also found in apocryphal and pseudepigraphical literature (see Wis. 4:2; 16:10; 18:22; 1 Esdr. 3:12). Bruns (1967) contends that John’s portrayal of Jesus as victor echoes the pagan myth of Herakles, the conqueror of death and evil.

3 Often, though not always, in John, darkness connotes evil or unbelief (see 1:5; 8:12; 9:4; 11:10; 12:35, 46; 13:30). It is not clear that it does so here (contra Maccini 1996: 208; Carson 1991: 635–36; Borchert 2002: 291; R. Brown 1970: 981; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.308; Moloney 1998: 518).

voice of God 192, 301 voice of shepherd 311, 487n18
Vulgate 248

Wadi en-Nar 504
walking 387 washing 407
watchman 300
water 135, 552. See also living water water baptism 70, 123, 150 water-pouring rite 239–40
Way, the 428–29 weakness 380
weeping 339, 341
wells 147
wilderness 62, 201, 209, 213–14, 218, 253, 390 wilderness wanderings 27, 229 wind 124–25
wine 90, 93, 97–98, 550
wisdom 26–27, 29, 36n50, 74n62, 450, 489n29, 516n28

18 According to 6:37–40, everyone who “looks to the Son and believes in him shall have eternal life” (cf. 1 John 2:23–25). In 10:27–28, Jesus is said to give life to “his sheep” who “listen to his voice.” Morris (1995: 636 n. 6) notes the frequency of the term δίδωμι (didōmi, give) in the present prayer and elaborates on its significance. The neuter πάν ὃ (pan ho, all that) focuses less on the persons as such and more on the God-given nature of Jesus’ authority (Morris 1995: 636 n. 9); R. Brown (1970: 741) suggests that it may “give a certain unity to the group.”

50 Schnackenburg (1990: 1.256) claims that the reference is not to Jesus’ earthly ministry but to Israel’s history prior to the incarnation. Similarly, R. Brown (1966: 30) cites the parallel of Wisdom in 1 Enoch 42:2: “Wisdom came to make her dwelling place among the children of men and found no dwelling place.” More likely, the reference is anticipatory of the Word’s incarnation in 1:14 (Culpepper 1980–81: 13–14; Carson 1991: 122; Ridderbos 1997: 43; Moloney 1998: 37). On a literal level, see the reference in Luke 2:7 that there was “no guest room available” (TNIV) for Jesus and his parents at his birth, which may have spiritual overtones as well.

62 Note that these are the first words of Jesus in John’s Gospel. Witherington (1995: 69) notes that in dramatic works the first words of the main character are often of special importance (more doubtful is Witherington’s association of Jesus with Wisdom beckoning for an audience [pp. 69–70]). Whitacre (1999: 71) observes John’s emphasis on Jesus’ “almost mysterious silence” in comparison with the other Gospels, where “Jesus teaches, preaches and calls people to follow him, yet here Jesus has said almost nothing. ... Compared with the Synoptics’ picture, Jesus in John appears as one hidden and aloof.” However, this comment surely must be balanced by the theme of Jesus’ humanity in John’s Gospel (see, e.g., Jesus’ weariness from travel in John 4 or his bursting into tears in John 11).

29 Westcott (1908: 2.245–46) distinguishes between the “glory of the Eternal Word” (spoken of here) and the “glory of Christ, the Incarnate Word” (spoken of in 17:22), though he notes that the two correspond to one another. Preexistence is ascribed also to Wisdom in Second Temple

witch of Endor 321n4
 witness 16, 62, 82, 159, 250, 289, 413, 416, 467–68 multiple 190–91, 256 women 159, 160
 women’s court 257
 Word 22, 25–31, 40, 41, 45, 193, 315
 works 131–32, 313
 works of Abraham 264 “works of God” 207–8, 281 works of the law 208 world 34–37, 373, 492–93, 495, 496 hatred of disciples 444, 461, 463–69, 480 hostility 495
 p 649 judgment of 471–72
 rejection of Jesus 131, 230
 spiritual darkness 282
 on trial 250, 131
 worldliness 492 worship 103, 148, 153–56, 435, 438
 wrath 140

 zeal 107, 193, 200, 469
 Zealots 107, 203, 208, 303, 530–31
 Zebedee 414, 513, 588
 Zechariah 32, 61, 83
 Zion 371

Index of Authors

Abbott, E. 261n48

literature (e.g., Wis. 7:25; 9:10–11) on the basis of its portrayal in the OT Book of Proverbs (esp. 8:23, 30). But see commentary at 1:1.

28 Some see in the present statement an echo of the motif of Wisdom speaking to the people in public (Prov. 8:2–3; 9:3; Wis. 6:14, 16; cf. Bar. 3:37).

4 Old Testament instances of raisings of the dead include Elijah’s raising of the widow’s son (1 Kings 17:17–24); Elisha’s raising of the son of the Shunammite woman (2 Kings 4:32–37); Elisha’s “posthumous” raising of a dead man (2 Kings 13:21); and the witch of Endor’s illicit summoning of Samuel from the dead at King Saul’s request (1 Sam. 28) (see also Ezekiel’s vision of the valley of dry bones [Ezek. 37:1–14]). Raisings of the dead were generally viewed in light of the final resurrection and as an expression of God’s power to bring it about.

48 A semantic distinction between πιστεῦω + εἰς (pisteuō + eis, believe + in) and the verb alone followed by an object in the dative case cannot be maintained (Carson [1991: 346–47] and the

Abbott, L. 96, 147
Abegg, M. G. 71, 77n73
Abrahams, I. 217, 241
Ådna, J. 103, 108n26, 111n37
Agourides, S. 482n5, 485n10
Albright, W. F. 136n8, 146n17, 326n14, 354n151 vast majority of commentators; see also Croteau 2002). Concerning the perfect participle πεπιστευκότας (pepisteukotas, having believed), Swetnam (1980 citing E. Abbott 1906: 365–66) notes that the perfect participle in Greek can also serve as a pluperfect. If so, the meaning here would be “those who had [previously] believed in him [but did so no longer].”

73 See Ps. Sol. 17:32; 1 Enoch 48:10; 52:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 12:32; 2 Bar. 29:3; 30:1; 40:1; 70:9; 72:2. See O’Neill 1995: 25–26; Abegg and Evans 1998: 191–94; Horbury 1998: chapter 2.

26 The terminology in 2:19 is similar to, but not identical with, Mark 14:58: John 2:19 uses λύω, ἐν + dative, and ἐγείρω; Mark 14:58 has καταλύω, διὰ + genitive, and οικοδομέω; τὸν ναὸν τοῦτον is shared. But note the use of ἐν + dative in Mark 15:29 (and Matt. 27:40), which leads Schlosser (1990: 400–402) to conclude that John depends on Mark in his account of the clearing of the temple. However, see the thorough analysis by Ådna (2000: 179–89), who comes to the opposite conclusion, that neither Mark nor Matthew/Luke served as literary sources for John’s account of the clearing of the temple. Jeremias (1971: 221) notes that both ἐν + dative and διὰ + genitive are based on the Semitic בְּ.

37 A third possibility (held by only a few) is that there was only one clearing, at the beginning of Jesus’ ministry, and John got it right (J. A. T. Robinson 1985: 127–31; Campbell 1982: 117). Finally, fourth, Buchanan (1991: 284) says, “Jesus never cleansed the temple at all but instead this event had been attributed to him from the necessity of the doctrines and messianic expectations” (cited in Ådna 2000: 21 n. 67).

5 Hence, it was common especially in older commentators to refer to the present prayer as Jesus’ “prayer of consecration” (e.g., Cullmann, E. C. Hoskyns, Bernard, W. F. Howard [cited in Agourides 1968: 138]; see also Westcott [1908: 2.238], who titles John 17 “The Prayer of Consecration” but later says that the chapter contains “what may be most properly called ‘the Lord’s Prayer’”). This designation has merit (esp. in light of 17:19 [so, rightly, Michaels 1989: 297]), as long as it is not used to imply a strong link between the prayer and the liturgical practices of the church toward the end of the first century A.D. More modestly and soberly, Calvin (1961: 134) calls the prayer “the seal of the preceding teaching” of Jesus.

10 Contra those who, like Barrett, consider the entire prayer to be a creation of the Fourth Evangelist, “the greatest theologian in all the history of the church” (cited in Hunter 1979: 285). Lindars (1971: 77), too, thinks that the concern for unity pervading the prayer is “nothing else than the deepest expression of John’s own personal experience” (cited in Hunter 1979: 302 n. 320). But see Hunter (1979), who argues that the prayer, including the “concept of the preexistent Son,” is firmly rooted in “Jesus’ own consciousness” (p. 301); and Agourides (1968: 138–39), who likewise contends that “no one can deny that what we really have is the formulation of the words, deeds, self-consciousness and evaluation of the work of Jesus by Himself” (p. 139; note also: “the Evangelist’s recollections of an essential historic truth about Jesus’ concern for the circle of His disciples before the Passion” [p. 141]).

8 The first is mentioned as early as Eusebius’s Onomasticon (fourth century A.D.). The second is

Alexander, P. S. 8n19, 518
Alter, R. 181n30, 577n1
Anderson, P. N. 196n1, 200n9, 202n19, 203n24, 223 defended by the eminent archaeologist Albright (1924), followed by Bacon (1929); see also Finegan (1992: 70). Yet another site is suggested in Riesner, DJG 35: Ain Farah, eight miles northwest of Shechem.

17 See Hengel 1999: 299–300; contra Albright 1956: 160.

14 The name “Bethany” arose from a combination of the Hebrew word for “house,” beth, and the name ananyah, whereby one of the two an syllables dropped out—a phenomenon known among linguists as syllabic haplology (so Albright 1923). Borchert (1996: 349) avers that Bethany means “house of suffering” and that this symbolic meaning may have been significant for the evangelist. However, even if Borchert’s reconstruction of the etymology is correct, there is little evidence for his contention.

151 See Riesner, DJG 49; Carson 1991: 423–24. But see Albright (1922–23), who argues that the Ephraim mentioned in John is not Et-Taiyibeh, but Ain Samieh, slightly to the northeast and lower in a valley. Cf. Schwank 1977.

19 See especially Alexander 1992 and Goodman 1992. For a fuller development and further bibliography, see Köstenberger forthcoming. For a critique of the Martyn/Brown-style “Johannine community” hypothesis, see Köstenberger 1998b: 200–210; Carson 1991: 35–36, 87–88, 369–72; and commentary at 9:22 below.

30 Lee (1994: 102, citing Robert Alter in n. 4) notes that the delayed reference to the Sabbath in 5:9b is in keeping with typical Hebrew narrative style.

1 The present unit is introduced by δέ (de, and, but), perhaps creating a contrast between Thomas and the disciples in the previous narrative (Moloney 1998: 538). The existence of the Twelve is in this Gospel presupposed rather than explicitly narrated (see commentary at 6:67; see also the brief excursus in Borchert 2002: 311). The reference to Thomas’s designation “the twin” hardly constitutes an allusion to his double-mindedness (so, rightly, Borchert 2002: 312; cf. R. Brown 1970: 1024; Bultmann 1971: 694 n. 2). Lee (1995: 43, citing Robert Alter) notes that “absence is a favourite literary device of this narrator.”

1 A comparison between John’s account of the feeding of the five thousand and that of the Synoptics makes clear that John provides his own independent account (see esp. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.23–24; and the table in Anderson 1996: 187–88). John mentions several details that are not found in any of the other Gospels, such as the crossing of the sea (6:1); the approaching Passover (6:4); the involvement of Philip and Andrew (6:7–8); the fact that the five loaves contributed by the boy were made of barley (6:9); and Jesus’ command to his disciples to gather all the fragments so that nothing would be lost (6:12).

9 Jesus’ question is the first of several indications that he uses the present event to prepare and instruct his disciples (6:5–9, 12–13, 16–21; cf. 4:27–38). Anderson (1996: 173) notes that it is only in John that the source of the food is mentioned; see also Laney 1992: 121. The verb πειράζω (peirazō, test) occurs only here in John (cf. 8:6 in the non-Johannine pericope 7:53–8:11). It has negative connotations elsewhere in the Gospels but is used here in a neutral sense.

19 Similarly, it is said of Ruth, “She ate all she wanted and had some left over” (Ruth 2:14; see Daube 1956: 46–51). The concern that nothing “perish” (ἀπολήται, apolētai) may establish a link with the fate of Judas, who is described as “son of destruction” (ἀπωλείας, apōleias) in John 17:12. There may also be a link with the apostasy of most of Jesus’ “disciples” in 6:66

Appold, M. L. 353n149, 483n7
Arav, R. 79n86
Argyle, A. W. 161n72
Ashton, J. 19n4, 29n29, 29n32, 100n39

(Anderson 1996: 174).

24 For an extensive discussion of the “prophet like Moses” theme, see Anderson 1996: 174–77. 149 See also Odes Sol. 10:5–6 (cf. Beutler 1994: 399–404). On the phrase “make them one,” see commentary at 10:16; 17:21 (cf. Appold 1976: 236–45).

7 See Morris 1995: 634; with further delineation of subunits, Hunter 1979: 326–28. Lindars (1972: 515) further divides 17:20–26 into 17:20–23 and 17:24–26. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.168–69, with reference to a 1973 German article) provides a more complicated proposal, dividing at 17:1–2, 4–5, 6–11a, 11b–16, 17–19, 22–23, 24–26 (he considers 17:3 and 17:20–21 to be secondary glosses). Others favor division at 17:1–8, 9–19, 20–26 (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 748–51). Malatesta (1971: 191–92) divides at 17:1–5, 6–8, 9–19, 20–24, 25–26 and proposes a strophic arrangement. More eccentric is the suggestion by Appold (1976: 204) that there is an oscillating pattern of petition and review, featuring six petition and six review units. A survey of structural proposals for John 17 up to the late 1970s is found in Hunter 1979: 312–28. More recently, Borchert (2002: 185–89) has favored seven petitions, based on the address “Father.” Yet, as Ridderbos (1997: 547) remarks, “The structure is not severe enough and the transitions are too fluid for us to speak of a detailed and sharply delineated thought scheme.”

86 For general (including archaeological) information on Bethsaida, see Strickert 1998; Kuhn and Arav 1991; and Pixner 1985.

72 Argyle (1971: 247–48) argues for a Greek background, but most believe that the proverb is Semitic.

4 Culpepper (1980–81: 1) quotes Barrett (1971: 27): “The Prologue is ... one piece of solid theological writing. The evangelist wrote it all” (cf. Barrett 1975a: 20–35). Keener (2003: 333–34) maintains that the prologue is an original part of the Gospel, probably added by the author (the apostle John) after completing the first draft of the Gospel. According to Keener (2003: 333–34), ancient writers commonly introduced the main themes at the beginning of their work (see Keener 2003: 334 n. 10 for examples). Bultmann believed that the prologue originated as a pre-Christian gnostic hymn that stemmed from Baptist circles and was taken over and adapted by the Fourth Evangelist (Bultmann 1923: 4; summarized by Ashton 1986: 161). Valentine (1996), in contrast to many other Johannine scholars, argues that the prologue is an organic part of the book, a genuine preface intended to preview important theological themes, rather than a mere afterthought or postscript written after the body of the Gospel had been completed. E. Harris (1994: 26) contends that the prologue “was from the first the construction of the evangelist himself.” See the survey in MacLeod 2003: 49–52.

29 Though note that Jesus is not explicitly mentioned until 1:17. “All things” (τὰ πάντα, ta panta) may echo Gen. 1:31 (cf. Gen. 9:3; Ashton 1986: 184 n. 37). Though startling, the substance of the present assertion is in no way unique to John; it pervades much of the NT (cf. 1 Cor. 8:6; Col. 1:16; Heb. 1:2). For extrabiblical parallels, see Köstenberger 2002c: 6. For a survey of possible backgrounds for 1:3, see Keener 2003: 375–81.

32 Note the comment on this alternative by Metzger (1994: 168): “whatever that may be supposed to mean.” In Metzger’s dissenting opinion (the majority of the UBS translation committee favors taking the phrase with what follows) he states, “Despite valiant attempts of commentators to bring sense out of taking ὁ γέγονεν with what follows, the passage remains intolerably clumsy and opaque” (similarly, Schnackenburg, cited by Ashton 1986: 172). Among the major translations, only the NRSV prefers this alternative. Commentators who advocate this option are R. Brown (1966: 6–7), Bultmann (1971: 39–40, esp. n. 4), Beasley-Murray (1999: 1–2, esp. n. a), and Whitacre (1999: 52). See also E. Miller (1989), who integrates his belief that the phrase is to be taken with what follows into his larger thesis that 1:1a–b and 1:3–5 constitute a christological hymn in four strophes extolling the salvation-historical activity of the Word (he considers 1:1c and 1:2 to be interpolations). Brodie (1993: 138), because of the lack of punctuation, sees the text as inherently ambiguous and as being “part of a careful literary strategy” designed to focus on “the continuity between creation and the incarnation, between creation and redemption.”

39 Carson (1991: 169) rightly notes that there is little contextual support for the notion that Mary is here presented as a mediatrix between humanity and Jesus (contra those who see Mary here as representative of the people [e.g., Brodie 1993: 174]). Witherington (1995: 79, 378, referring to Ashton) may read too much into John’s presentation when he sees Mary here depicted as a fledgling disciple who later becomes an “archetypal female disciple.” Ridderbos (1997: 108) likewise seems to overreach when he suggests that Mary is symbolic of believing Israel, which has eagerly awaited the coming of the Savior. Another dubious suggestion is made by Stibbe (1993: 44), who proposes that Jesus’ use of γύναι may constitute an allusion to Gen. 3:15, “in which case she is to be seen as the New Eve in the New Creation of Jesus’ ministry.”

4 For an unfavorable comparison between this character and the man born blind in John 9, see the discussion there. Keener (2003: 639, following Culpepper 1983: 139) contends that 5:1–15 serves as a (negative) foil for the (positive) characterization in chapter 9 of the man born blind, calling the contrasting of characters a common rhetorical device. See also Asiedu-Pepurah 2001; Staley 1991. For a discussion of the similarities and differences between John 5 and 9, see Lee 1994: 105–7.

4 The Fourth Gospel’s integrity is not compromised by the inimitable Johannine style, enveloping narrative as well as discourse portions. For positive assessments of the historical reliability of John’s Gospel, see Köstenberger 2002c; Blomberg 1993; 2001; 2002; contra M. Casey 1996. Nevertheless, there continues to be skepticism on the part of many; see the recent survey by Kysar (2002a), the largely positive assessment by Thompson (2002), and the very negative evaluation by Attridge (2002b).

3 Ridderbos (1997: 253) considers chapters 7–10 to constitute a unit, marked by Jesus’ “encounters, conversations, and confrontations” with the Jews. More in depth is the analysis by Schenke (1989: esp. 186), who likewise defends the unity of chapters 7–10 dramatically developing the escalating conflict regarding Jesus. Schenke discerns three major scenes (7:10–8:59; 9:1–10:21; 10:22–39) plus a prologue (7:1–9) and an epilogue (10:40–42). In chapters 7–8 (scene I, taking place in the Jerusalem temple), Schenke finds seven smaller scenes (7:10–13, 14–31, 32–36, 37–44, 45–52; 8:12–20, 21–59) moving from diversity of opinion regarding Jesus to a united front against him. Scene II is staged in Jerusalem and can also be divided into seven smaller scenes (9:1–7, 8–12, 13–17, 18–23, 24–34, 35–39; 9:40–10:21). The location of scene III is once again the temple. A very similar division of chapter 7 is found in Neyrey 1996 (followed in the discussion below). On the thematic unity of the present unit, see also Dodd 1953: 345–54.

Augenstein, J. 256n24
Aus, R. 98
Auwers, J.-M. 120n17
Avi-Yonah, M. 92, 146, 154, 177n11, 199n3, 229n5, 326n16, 342n104, 369, 532n55, 537n80, 545n23, 552n65, 591

On the thematic unity and development of 7:1–36, see Attridge 1980.

5 For some of the following comments I am indebted to Attridge (2002a: esp. 9–10, 17–18), who points to differences between the Johannine farewell discourses and other ancient instances of this genre and says that John “bends” the genre here and elsewhere in his Gospel (i.e., the discourses in chs. 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, and 10).

24 Cf. 10:34; see also 6:49: “your ancestors”; 8:56: “your father Abraham”; 15:25: “their law” (see Augenstein 1997). Barrett (1978: 339) seems to deny the historicity of the words “in your law,” suggesting that they are a creation of the evangelist intended to show the separation that occurred between Christianity and official Judaism. However, in light of the consistent pattern throughout John’s Gospel, and the undeniable acrimony between Jesus and his Jewish opponents historically, this expedient is unnecessary. In favor of historicity are Morris (1995: 392 n. 19) and Carson (1991: 340).

17 Contra several commentators (Barrett 1978: 205; Moloney 1998: 91; R. Brown 1966: 130; Witherington 1995: 94; Burge 2000: 114; Carson 1995: 187 n. 8; Blomberg 1995: 6), “by night” is likely not symbolic in the sense that Nicodemus came from darkness to light, while Judas went from light to darkness (cf. 6:70–71; 12:4–8; 13:2, 26–30; 18:2–5)—a view held by R. Brown (1966: 130) and Auwers (1990). Wallace (1996: 123–24) overreaches when he finds in the genitive of time an indication of “the kind of time in which Nicodemus came to see the Lord.” Morris (1995: 187) suggests that John may have had more than one meaning in mind.

11 Helpful treatments include Avi-Yonah 1974: 142; Jeremias 1966b; Mackowski 1980: 79–83; Vardaman 1963; and Wieand 1965–66. Riesner (DJG 41) prefers the translation “There is in Jerusalem by the Sheep Pool the [site] with five porticoes called in Hebrew [i.e., Aramaic] Bethesda.”

3 The name “Sea of Tiberias” is attested in first-century literature (Sib. Or. 12:104). It is also preserved in Jewish tradition (Yamma shel Tiberya [t. Sukkah 3.9]) and by the Arabs, who call the lake Bahr Tabariyeh (Avi-Yonah 1964: 143).

5 For helpful information on the particulars of the feast, see Avi-Yonah 1964: 144. See also the mishnaic tractate Sukkah (esp. m. Sukkah 5.2–4). Old Testament references include Lev. 23:33–43; Num. 29:12–39; Neh. 8:13–18; Hos. 12:9; Zech. 14:16–19.

16 See Clermont-Ganneau 1874; Kraeling 1946 [cited in Bruce 1983: 253 n. 1]; Avi-Yonah 1964: 146.

104 See Avi-Yonah 1964: 147 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 112). For more information and examples of tombs from this period, see Mackowski 1980: 20–21, 157–59.

55 The former is favored by Ha-Reubéni 1933; the latter by Hart 1952. Goodenough and Welles (1953) and Avi-Yonah (1964: 151) suggest acanthus.

80 A paved court measuring about 2,300 square yards has been excavated on the lower level of the fortress of Antonia, one of the two possible sites of the governor’s residence (the other is Herod’s Palace in the northwest part of the upper city; see commentary at 18:28; Avi-Yonah 1964: 152). The blocks making up this pavement are more than a yard square and a foot thick. This kind of structure may well have been famous as “the stone pavement.” However, it is

Bacchiocchi, S. 185
Bacon, B. W. 136n8, 583n3
Badcock, F. J. 109n29, 109n30, 110n30
Baird, W. 6n12
Ball, D. M. 158, 205, 256, 273n105, 507n22
Balz, H. 330
Bammel, E. 157n56, 286n44, 318, 348n133, 396n2, 443, 510n1, 527, 536n75

unclear whether the excavated pavement was part of the fortress of Antonia in Jesus' time or not (Kopp [1963: 372–73] suggests a date ca. A.D. 135).

23 For a reconstruction of the sign, see Köstenberger 2002c: 177; Avi-Yonah 1964: 153.

65 Roman soldiers used primarily two kinds of weapons: a short sword for close combat and a lance or javelin for attacks from a distance. The lance (pilum) was about three and a half feet long and was made up of an iron point or spearhead (λόγχη, lonchē) joined to a shaft of light wood (Avi-Yonah 1964: 154). Later, the term λόγχη (the word used in the present passage) came to be used for a spear or lance itself.

8 The first is mentioned as early as Eusebius's Onomasticon (fourth century A.D.). The second is defended by the eminent archaeologist Albright (1924), followed by Bacon (1929); see also Finegan (1992: 70). Yet another site is suggested in Riesner, DJG 35: Ain Farah, eight miles northwest of Shechem.

29 Assuming a three-year ministry, we see that this puts the crucifixion at A.D. 33. This reading of John 2:20, and a date of A.D. 30 for Jesus' first Passover and the temple clearing, were advocated by Badcock (1935: 40–41). See also P. Maier (1968: 4–5); Hoehner (1977: 38–43; followed by Laney 1992: 72; cf. Hoehner, DJG 119); Humphreys and Waddington (1992: 351). MacAdam (1999: 31–33) concurs, but believes that this was Jesus' final Passover and that the Fourth Evangelist has transposed the temple clearing to the beginning of Jesus' ministry. Zahn (1921: 126–27 n. 23) comes close, arriving at the year A.D. 28 or 29.

30 The translation adopted here was adopted long ago by Badcock (1935: 40–41): “‘Forty and six years was this temple in building’ (A.V. and R.V.). ... This is an impossible translation on two counts; the substantive is in the dative of a point, and not duration, of time; and the verb is in the aorist and not in the imperfect, so the only possible translation is: ‘This temple (or sanctuary) was built (before you were born) forty and six years ago.’” Badcock also, rightly in my opinion, dates the current Passover to A.D. 30 and the crucifixion to A.D. 33.

12 Karl Gottlieb Bretschneider (1776–1848) pioneered an approach to John's Gospel that dated it to the late second century and rejected its veracity at most points (see Baird 1992: 312–14). In contrast, Bretschneider's contemporary Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834) believed that “the Gospel of John bears such undeniable signs of authenticity, and so reveals on every page the eyewitness and personal participant, that one must be prejudiced and diverted from the natural course so as to doubt its authenticity” (cited in Baird 1992: 214).

105 Cf. Isa. 43:10, 13; so Ball 1996: 195–96; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.224; Burge 2000: 263.

22 So Ridderbos 1997: 576; with reference to the threefold repetition of this phrase in this section, Morris 1995: 658 and Ball 1996: 201; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 322; Moloney 1998: 485; R. Brown 1970: 818; Borchert 2002: 219; Burge 2000: 492.

56 See Bammel 1957: 381–85; Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 264–65; Kippenberg 1971: 276–327.

44 Contrast this with their contempt for the “people of the land” displayed in 7:49

Barbet, P. 552n66
Barclay, W. 302n22, 464n3
Barkay, G. 556n88
Barker, M. 352n142
Barnett, P. W. 60n11, 194n98

(Schnackenburg 1990: 2.248). For a discussion of the reading σεαντοῦ instead of αὐτοῦ in Codex Sinaiticus and P⁷⁵, see Bammel 1994: 455–56; Swanson 1995: 4.130.

133 See Bammel 1970; J. A. T. Robinson 1985: 223–24. Inclusion of this account may explain John’s omission of the later Jewish trial of Jesus before Caiaphas, implied in 18:24, 28 and narrated in Matt. 27:1–2 and Mark 15:1 (cf. Luke 23:1).

2 The following material is adapted from Moloney 1998: 377–78 (for further bibliography, see pp. 389–91). See also Bammel 1993; Kurz 1985; 1990; Lacomara 1974; Paschal, DJG 229–33, esp. 232.

1 See Bammel 1970; Corley, DJG 841–54.

75 See Bammel (1952), who consequently insists on a post–A.D. 31 crucifixion date for Jesus. On “Caesar” as a title for the Roman emperor in Jesus’ day, see Köstenberger 2002c: 172.

66 See the summary in Carson 1991: 623–24, and the fuller treatment in Beasley-Murray 1999: 355–58. For further discussion, see Barbet 1953; W. Edwards, Gabel, and Hosmer 1986; Sava 1960.

22 For an interesting reconstruction of the background, see Barclay 1975: 2.58 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 99); cf. Bishop 1959–60. For links between “the door” and “the shepherd” in wisdom traditions, see Scott 1992: 121–23.

3 The world’s hatred was experienced by Christians long before John wrote. The Roman historians Tacitus (Annales 15.44) and Suetonius (Nero 16) both called Christianity “a mischievous superstition.” See also the charges leveled against the early Christians listed in Köstenberger 2002c: 147, citing Barclay 1975: 2.183–85. Still useful are Frend 1967 and Workman 1923. Keener (2003: 1017) claims that the worldview presupposed in 15:18–25 is “one common to sectarian groups, in which apocalyptic ideologies (in the modern sense of that expression) often prevail” (though he later acknowledges degrees of “sectarian” outlook [quotation marks his]). In his following paragraph, Keener does concede, however, that John’s emphasis here “probably [but perhaps not?] stems from authentic Jesus tradition.” Did Jesus, then, propagate a sectarian worldview? And, if so, in what sense?

88 The location of the tomb is probably on the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (built by Constantine) rather than the popular “garden tomb” (Taylor 1998: 180, referring also to Barkay 1986). The vestiges of a nearby garden were still visible in Cyril of Jerusalem’s day (Catechesis 14.5 [ca. A.D. 350]).

142 The same case is taken up in the Jerusalem Talmud (y. Ter. 8.10). Another incident involved Ulla the son of Koshar, who was wanted by the government (Gen. Rab. 94.9; see also Gen. Rab. 91.10 on Gen. 48:10 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 117]). Cf. Daube 1966a: 18–47. M. Barker (1970) links Caiaphas’s words with current messianic expectations.

11 Ironically, in John’s case it was virtuous to confess not to be someone. Humility prevented him from elevating himself as a messianic pretender (Ridderbos 1997: 65; cf. Barnett 1980–81).

98 See Barnett 1980–81; Schlatter 1948: 160; Piper, ISBE 3:332–33; van der Woude, TDNT 9:509–27. However, calling these figures “messianic pretenders” goes beyond the evidence.

Thus, Meier (1994: 611–12 n. 75) and R. Brown (1997: 820 n. 6) emphatically deny that any Jew

Barr, J. 45n78, 596

Barrett, C. K. xii, 7n15, 19n4, 29n31, 33, 34, 34n44, 36n51, 38, 40, 42n68, 45n79, 50n98,

(other than Jesus) claimed or was said to be the Messiah prior to, contemporaneous with, or even in the decades immediately following Jesus' ministry.

78 On "truth," see the discerning study by Barr (1961: 161–205).

15 The epithet "the disciple Jesus loved" is plausibly understood as an instance of authorial modesty (see Vanhoozer 1993: 374, who cites Augustine and Westcott, contra Barrett 1978: 117). On authorial modesty, see also Köstenberger 2004.

4 Culpepper (1980–81: 1) quotes Barrett (1971: 27): "The Prologue is ... one piece of solid theological writing. The evangelist wrote it all" (cf. Barrett 1975a: 20–35). Keener (2003: 333–34) maintains that the prologue is an original part of the Gospel, probably added by the author (the apostle John) after completing the first draft of the Gospel. According to Keener (2003: 333–34), ancient writers commonly introduced the main themes at the beginning of their work (see Keener 2003: 334 n. 10 for examples). Bultmann believed that the prologue originated as a pre-Christian gnostic hymn that stemmed from Baptist circles and was taken over and adapted by the Fourth Evangelist (Bultmann 1923: 4; summarized by Ashton 1986: 161). Valentine (1996), in contrast to many other Johannine scholars, argues that the prologue is an organic part of the book, a genuine preface intended to preview important theological themes, rather than a mere afterthought or postscript written after the body of the Gospel had been completed. E. Harris (1994: 26) contends that the prologue "was from the first the construction of the evangelist himself." See the survey in MacLeod 2003: 49–52.

31 So the majority of commentators, including Morris 1995: 66; Carson 1991: 137; Haenchen 1984: 1.113–14; Schnackenburg 1970: 1.239–40; Barrett 1978: 156–57; and Schlatter 1948: 5–6. Among the translations that construe ὁ γέγονεν with what precedes are the NASB, NIV, NKJV, ISV, NLT, HCSB, ESV, and TNIV.

44 Contra Wallace (1996: 477), who says that this may be an "imperative ἴνα"—a conclusion called unlikely by Barrett (1978: 160).

51 Barrett (1978: 162) sees only one sense of κόσμος in this verse. Morris (1995: 85) contends that the first two instances refer to everyone, while the third reference is to those who came in contact with Jesus. Beasley-Murray (1999: 12) sees a progression from "the world inhabited by humankind" in 1:10a to "the world including human beings" in 1:10b to "humanity, fallen and in darkness" in 1:10c. Carson (1991: 123) demonstrates that the word κόσμος never has a positive usage (contra Burge 2000: 57) and only a few neutral ones.

68 R. Brown (1966: 13) contends that "us" refers to humanity, and "we" to the apostolic witness (contra Barrett 1978: 166); Haenchen (1984: 1.119) takes "we" as a reference to the Christian community. Bultmann (1971: 69) unduly dichotomizes and dehistoricizes when he takes "seeing" as the unhistorical sight of faith.

79 As in the case of 1:6–8, some see 1:15 as an addition to a preexisting hymn (R. Brown 1966: 15; contra Barrett 1978: 167); but again, this is unnecessary. Brodie (1993: 143) comments, "John appears to be ... the embodiment of the OT. ... John's crying, therefore, far from being an illogical interpolation, is altogether appropriate. It is as though, when the incarnation finally arrived, full of covenant love, the OT stood up and cheered."

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV ("God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

5 Moloney (1998: 58) proposes that the question “Who are you?” could be taken as the leitmotif of John’s Gospel. Barrett (1978: 172) considers the phrase an allusion to Jesus’ “I am” statements in 6:35 and 8:24. Witherington (1995: 64) follows Painter in classifying the present pericope as a “quest story” that prepares the evangelist’s audience to properly answer subsequent questions about Jesus’ identity. He also contends—a rather dubious claim—that the evangelist presents Jesus as a Jewish sage à la Wisdom whom disciples were to seek and follow (adducing Sir. 51:23). The opening demonstrative “this” is classified by Wallace (1996: 334) as an instance of “inverse attraction,” where the pronominal subject is linked with the gender of the preceding nominative (cf. Matt. 7:12; 13:38; Luke 2:12; 8:11; Rom. 11:27; Gal. 4:24). More questionable is Wallace’s claim (1996: 532) that the present verb ἐστίν (estin, is) is a “testimonium present” (discussed under the rubric of “perfective present”). More likely, ἐστίν is a historical present (Wallace denies that εἰμί is ever used as a historical present in the NT).

12 The emphatic pronoun ἐγώ adds further firmness to the Baptist’s denial (Barrett 1978: 172; Morris 1995: 117; Bultmann 1971: 88). Morris (1995: 117) renders the sense well: “It is not I who am the Christ.”

22 The quotation from Isa. 40:3 follows the LXX (Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. b) except that John uses εὐθύνετε instead of ἐτοιμάσατε (Barrett 1978: 173). This may be because (1) John was translating straight from the Hebrew; (2) he was influenced by the sound of εὐθείαν in the LXX shortly after the quotation; or (3) he took his cue from the use of εὐθύνειν with ὁδός in Sir. 2:6; 37:15; 49:9. Menken (1985: 202–3) suggests that the change was motivated by his desire “to make John the Baptist not so much the precursor of Jesus as a witness contemporaneous with Jesus.”

24 So Ridderbos 1997: 66 n. 10; Morris 1995: 122; Carson 1991: 144; Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292; contra R. Brown 1966: 44; Moloney 1998: 52. While thus the delegation included some Pharisees, this does not mean that the Pharisees were responsible for sending out the delegation, since the Sadducees had a majority on the Sanhedrin (Carson 1991: 144). This is true especially if an article is to be added (or implied) before ἀπεσταλμένοι (Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Barrett 1978: 174; R. Brown 1966: 43–44; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292). Ἀπεσταλμένοι ἦσαν (apestalmenoi ēsan, they had been sent) is a periphrastic pluperfect (Wallace [1996: 586] calls it “consummative”).

27 So Ridderbos 1997: 67; Burge 2000: 71; Barrett 1978: 174; R. Brown 1966: 51; Borchert 1996: 126.

28 In contrast to Mark 1:7, John uses ἄξιος not ἱκανός, does not use κύψας (Schlatter 1948: 45), and uses ἵνα plus subjunctive rather than an infinitive (Barrett 1978: 175). Staley (1988: 60) detects a progression from the Baptist's more active role in relation to Jesus in 1:26–34 to his taking a more passive role after 1:35 until the shift is completed in 3:22–36. See also the insightful comments on the nature of the Baptist's witness by Westcott 1908: 1.37.

32 Moloney (1998: 53) notes, "Nowhere else in 1:19–51 is a day brought to such a formal close as this first day." Note also the periphrastic imperfect ἦν ... βαπτίζων ("was baptizing"), indicating the continual nature of the Baptist's ministry (Barrett 1978: 175; Wallace 1996: 648).

38 For a thorough discussion of several additional alternatives, see Morris 1995: 127–29; see also Barrett 1978: 176; Ridderbos 1997: 73–74.

39 Barrett (1978: 176–77) notes the LXX's tendency (except in Psalms) to translate the Hebrew verb nāsā with a compound of αἰεῖν. He also cites several OT parallels pertaining to the forgiveness of sin (Exod. 29:38; 34:7; Num. 14:18; 1 Sam. 15:25; Ps. 32:5; 85:3; Mic. 7:18).

52 There seems to be little basis for the assertion by Barrett (1978: 178, citing G. Bornkamm) that "I have seen and I have testified" is a baptismal confession.

61 See the discussions in Morris 1995: 137; R. Brown 1966: 78; Carson 1991: 154; Barrett 1978: 180. See also comments on the term μένω (menō, stay) at 1:39.

66 Contra Barrett (1978: 181), who comments that this is not a "natural point for the beginning of a day's stay."

79 Cf. Matt. 16:16–19; see Schnackenburg 1990: 1.312–13; R. Brown 1966: 80; Beasley-Murray 1987: 27; Carson 1984: 368. It must be noted, however, that the evangelist himself does not comment explicitly, apparently leaving it up to the reader to draw the proper inference (see Barrett 1978: 183).

85 In Jesus' day, the term "Galilee" was used with reference to the territory east of the Jordan River (Carson 1991: 158; cf. Barrett 1978: 183; R. Brown 1966: 82; Morris 1995: 143 n. 100). After the beginning of the Jewish war in A.D. 66, apparently the entire region around the lake was called Galilee. If this is correct, John here follows contemporary usage (Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. k).

89 The identification of Nathanael with Bartholomew is favored by Ridderbos 1997: 87–88; Morris 1995: 143; Carson 1991: 159; Burge 2000: 77; contra Barrett 1978: 184; R. Brown 1966: 82; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.314. Barrett (1978: 179, 184) conjectures that the meaning of the name "Nathanael," "God has given," indicates that he represents an "ideal disciple" and that the passage should be interpreted allegorically. Somewhat along similar lines, Witherington (1995: 71) suggests that Nathanael's name implies that the disciples are the Father's gift to Jesus. It seems, however, that these kinds of conjectures leave the realm of well-founded exegesis and veer into the sphere of ultimately unverifiable speculation (see the critiques by Morris [1995: 143] and Carson [1991: 159], both of whom defend Nathanael's and the event's historicity). Hanhart (1970: 24–25) identifies Nathanael as Matthew; Hill (1997) somewhat cautiously advances the theory that Nathanael is identical with James of Alphaeus (cf. Epistle to the Apostles 2 [second century A.D.]).

105 C. Koester 1990a: 23–34; cf. Barrett 1978: 185; Nicklas (2000b: 201–2) is less than convinced. Other commentators consider the reference to be incidental, intended to show merely that Jesus "knew" Nathanael prior to their actual encounter (Ridderbos 1997: 90; cf. Burge 2000: 78; R. Brown 1966: 83; Moloney 1998: 56; contra Morris 1995: 146; Witherington 1995: 71; Borchert 1996: 148; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.317). Keener (2003: 486), too, rejects any deeper significance in the identification, suggesting that the fig tree may be mentioned simply because a specific landmark was necessary for some reason. Witherington's suggestion that Nathanael is being portrayed as an expert in the law who thus would know that the Messiah could not come from Nazareth seems far-fetched.

88n122, 91n7, 96n29, 98, 99, 100, 103n7, 104, 104n9, 106n20, 106n22, 107n24, 108, 110, 111n34, 116n5, 117n7, 118, 120n17, 121, 122n20, 123, 123n26, 125, 125n33,

122 The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. 65, was published in 1998 by the Egypt Exploration Society (see pp. 12–13). Among commentators, “Chosen One of God” is favored by Morris 1995: 134; Carson 1991: 152; Burge 1987: 59–61; 2000: 74; Barrett 1978: 178; R. Brown 1966: 57; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.305. “Son of God” is the reading advocated by Bultmann 1971: 92–93 n. 6; Borchert 1996: 139; Ridderbos 1997: 77; Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. g; Laney 1992: 53 (though all prior to the discovery of P¹⁰⁶). Rodgers (1999: 304) prefers both (“This is the only, the chosen Son of God”), while Michaels (1989: 36) proposes that the Baptist spoke “Chosen One of God” (hence the MS tradition), which the evangelist interpreted as “Son of God.”

7 It is doubtful that the reference to “the third day” represents an allusion to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 102; Carson 1991: 167; Burge 2000: 90; contra Borchert 1996: 153; Stibbe 1993: 46; Keener 2003: 497–98). The reference serves as a chronological connective with preceding events, perhaps indicating that the promise of 1:51 was quickly fulfilled (Beasley-Murray 1999: 34, citing Schnackenburg 1990: 1.325; cf. Talbert [1992: 86], who says that 2:1–11 serves as fulfillment of the prophecy in 1:51; and D. M. Smith [1999: 86], who speaks of the “first installment ... of the revelation promised in 1:51”). The beginning of Jesus’ final week is signaled in 12:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 189–90).

29 Though this is denied by most commentators (e.g., Morris 1995: 160–61; Barrett 1978: 191; Carson 1991: 174; R. Brown 1966: 100; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.332).

7 The term is used by Barrett (1975).

9 The phrase “Jewish Passover” has caused some controversy. Barrett (1978: 197) conjectures that the phrase may presuppose the existence of a Christian Passover at the time of writing (so, earlier, Westcott 1908: 1.89; cf. Borchert 1996: 162). Schnackenburg (1991: 1.345) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 39) suggest that the evangelist or the church had stopped participating in the Jewish Passover. Witherington (1995: 86–87) notes that the phrase indicates a certain distance between the author and Judaism and at least a partial Gentile audience (similarly, Morris 1995: 169). Carson (1991: 176) thinks that “Jewish” refers to the Jews of Judea in contrast to Galileans and Diaspora Jews.

20 So Ridderbos 1997: 116; Moloney 1998: 81; Barrett 1978: 197; Witherington 1995: 87; contra TNIV.

22 See commentary at 2:14. See also Barrett 1975b; Evans 1997. On Gentile worship at the Jerusalem temple, see the appendix on Gentile participation in worship at Jerusalem in Schürer 1973–79: 2.309–13. Neusner (1989) adds another possible reason: the understanding that the daily whole offering, which was financed by the temple tax, provided atonement and expiation of sin.

24 The LXX reads “has consumed me” (Moloney 1998: 77). Unlike in 2:22 and 12:16, the present reference does not refer to the postresurrection period, but to the actual situation (so Ridderbos 1997: 116; Carson 1991: 180; R. Brown 1966: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.347; Barrett 1978: 198; contra Witherington 1995: 88; Bultmann 1971: 122).

34 Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.344; Barrett 1978: 195; R. Brown 1966:

117; Witherington 1995: 85–86; Borchert 1996: 160; Bultmann 1971: 122; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38–39; Dodd 1963: 162; Lindars 1972: 135–37; Keener 2003: 518–19. Keener contends that it is historically implausible that Jesus would challenge the temple system by overturning tables and yet continue in public ministry for two or three years afterward, sometimes even visiting Jerusalem (though he notes that Jesus faces considerable hostility there when he does). On the contrary, an early temple cleansing accounts well for Jewish hostility toward Jesus early on (5:18), and Jesus’ continuing in ministry for two or three more years is eminently plausible historically in light of Jesus’ pattern of withdrawal (3:22; 6:15; 7:9–10; 8:59; 10:40) and his caution from the very inception of his ministry because his “time” has not yet come (2:4; 7:6). Borchert (1996: 160) contends that two temple clearings are “a historiographic monstrosity that has no basis in the texts of the Gospels.” Kreitzer (1998: 100–101) claims that the evangelist followed the motto “When the details of history no longer serve the functions of the story—discard them.” R. Brown (1966: 118) concludes that Jesus uttered some prophetic saying concerning the destruction of the temple on his first visit but actually cleansed the temple at the end of his ministry. Wallace (1996: 561 n. 20) notes that this would require a crucifixion date of A.D. 33.

5 Carson (1991: 184) notes that the converse is also true: Jesus promises to entrust himself to those who truly trust in him. Wallace (1996: 349) comments that the emphasizing pronoun in “its very repetition contrasts Jesus with the rest of humanity, setting him apart in his sinlessness.” Similar reflexive uses of πιστεύω in the NT include Luke 16:11; Rom. 3:2; 1 Cor. 9:17; Gal. 2:7; 1 Thess. 2:4; 1 Tim. 1:11; Titus 1:3 (Barrett 1978: 202).

7 See 1 Sam. 16:7; 1 Chron. 28:9; Ps. 139:1–18, 23–24; Jer. 17:10; Rom. 8:27; Heb. 4:12–13; Wis. 1:6; Ps. Sol. 14:8; 17:25. Barrett (1978: 202) further cites Mek. Exod. 16.32: “There is no man who knows what is in his neighbor’s heart.”

17 Contra several commentators (Barrett 1978: 205; Moloney 1998: 91; R. Brown 1966: 130; Witherington 1995: 94; Burge 2000: 114; Carson 1995: 187 n. 8; Blomberg 1995: 6), “by night” is likely not symbolic in the sense that Nicodemus came from darkness to light, while Judas went from light to darkness (cf. 6:70–71; 12:4–8; 13:2, 26–30; 18:2–5)—a view held by R. Brown (1966: 130) and Auwers (1990). Wallace (1996: 123–24) overreaches when he finds in the genitive of time an indication of “the kind of time in which Nicodemus came to see the Lord.” Morris (1995: 187) suggests that John may have had more than one meaning in mind.

20 “See” and “enter” are roughly synonymous (Barrett 1978: 207; R. Brown 1966: 130; Morris 1995: 189)—an instance of the Johannine penchant for stylistic variation (Barrett 1978: 208).

26 Note in 3:5 the single Greek preposition governing both “water” and “spirit” (Ridderbos 1997: 127). Some have suggested that “born of water” refers to water baptism, be it John the Baptist’s or Christian baptism, or both (Schnackenburg 1990: 1.369; Barrett 1978: 203, 208–9; R. Brown 1966: 141–42; Ridderbos 1997: 127–28; Beasley-Murray 1999: 49; Michaels 1989: 57). But it would hardly have been meaningful for Jesus to inform Nicodemus that he must be baptized in order to go to heaven. Nothing in the context indicates that this is the case, and it is unlikely that Jesus would have expected Nicodemus already to have known this. Moreover, the emphasis here is on the Spirit’s activity, not on human ritual observance (Morris 1995: 193).

33 Cf. Ezek. 11:19–20; 36:26–27; Isa. 44:3; 59:21; Jer. 31:31–34; Ps. 51:10; cf. Wis. 9:16–18; 1QS 3:13–4:26; see Ridderbos 1997: 132; Barrett 1978: 203; Moloney 1998: 94.

34 It may be too early in Jesus’ ministry for his disciples to be included (Carson 1991: 198–99; contra Ridderbos 1997: 134; Morris 1995: 196). Schnackenburg's (1990: 1.376) solution, that Jesus' statement is proleptic, looking "forward to the time when his disciples make his 'testimony' their own, as part of their preaching" (with reference to 3:22 and 9:4), likewise fails to convince. There is also no need to postulate that the "we" aligns Jesus with the OT prophets, reflects the Johannine community (Witherington 1995: 98; cf. Moloney 1998: 94), or denotes the church versus the synagogue (Barrett 1978: 211; Brodie 1993: 198).

37 Cf. Morris 1995: 196; Carson 1991: 199; R. Brown 1966: 132; Beasley-Murray 1999: 50; Witherington 1995: 98; Moloney 1998: 94; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.377; contra Barrett 1978: 212.

48 The use of μή with an indicative is extremely rare (cf. Luke 11:35; Gal. 4:11; Col. 2:8; contrast οὐ πεπίστευκεν in 1 John 5:10; see Barrett 1978: 217).

5 There is little evidence to support the various rearrangement theories that have been associated with these verses (Carson 1991: 209; Barrett 1978: 219).

9 It is not necessary to postulate that here the evangelist is addressing those who had remained followers of John the Baptist in his day (Carson 1991: 210; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 146; Morris 1995: 211; contra R. Brown 1966: 156; Barrett 1978: 219; Witherington 1995: 107; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.410).

12 Jesus calls himself "the bridegroom" in Matt. 9:15 pars. For the role of the bridegroom's friend, see Gower 1987: 64–66; Zimmermann and Zimmermann 1999. Joy was the overriding theme at Jewish weddings; the verb πληρόω (plēroō, fulfill, complete) is associated with joy throughout this Gospel (Carson 1991: 211–12; Barrett 1978: 223). The Baptist's words χαρᾷ χαίρει (chara chairei, lit., rejoices with joy), a Hebraism (χαρᾷ is a cognate dative [Wallace 1996: 168–69]), serve to intensify the verb (Ridderbos 1997: 147 n. 132; Morris 1995: 213 n. 112).

15 This represents the wide consensus of interpreters: see Ridderbos 1997: 153; Carson 1991: 215–16; Borchert 1996: 198–99; Beasley-Murray 1999: 59; Witherington 1995: 115; R. Brown 1966: 169; Morris 1995: 226; Barrett 1978: 230; Moloney 1998: 116, 120; Conway 1999: 105. 22 Barrett (1978: 231) suggests the translation "at once" or "without more ado"; Bultmann (1971: 177 n. 4) proposes the simple rendering "so."

23 So N. Walker 1960 and the vast majority of commentators, including Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. e; Witherington 1995: 120; Barrett 1978: 231; Moloney 1998: 116, 121; Bultmann 1971: 178; contra Borchert 1996: 201.

28 As Barrett (1978: 232) notes, Samaritans in John's Gospel call Jesus "a Jew," while the Jews call him "a Samaritan" (8:48). By way of Johannine irony, this attests to Jesus' otherworldly nature.

30 See Maccini 1996: 131–44. Daube (1956: 375–82) argues that "do not associate with" specifically refers to Jews not sharing vessels with Samaritans (cf. NIV text and note at 4:9). However, no common utensils (such as the woman's water jar) are specifically mentioned in 4:9. The explanatory aside, "For Jews have no dealings with [συγγρῶνται] Samaritans," probably is broader than the mere refusal to share drinking vessels (Ridderbos 1997: 154; Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. f; contra Carson 1991: 218; Borchert 1996: 203; Witherington 1995: 120; R. Brown 1966: 170; Morris 1995: 229; Barrett 1978: 232; Moloney 1998: 117, 121; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.425 n. 19).

55 The OT occasionally establishes a relationship between "word" and "spirit" (Neh. 9:20, 30; Ps. 33:6; 147:18; Isa. 59:21). In John's Gospel, Jesus is the Word (1:14), has received the fullness of the Spirit (3:34), and is himself the truth (14:6); in his final prayer, he affirms that God's Word is truth that sanctifies (17:17). Hence "spirit" and "truth" are part of a conceptual cluster that also includes "word" and "worship." On this connection, see Nelson 2001. See also Carson 1991: 226; Barrett 1978: 238–39; R. Brown 1966: 180.

77 Barrett (1978: 242) points to Greek parallels such as Aristophanes, Equites 392. Partial parallels include Josh. 24:13; Eccles. 2:18–21; Matt. 25:24; see also 1 Cor. 3:6.

4 One school of interpretation identifies πατρίς (patris, homeland, hometown) in 4:44 with Jerusalem (so Barrett 1978: 246; Dodd 1953: 352; 1963: 238–41; Meeks 1966; 1967: 39–40; see, much earlier, Origen, Commentarii in evangelium Joannis 13.54–56, cited in van Belle 1998: 30). However, see the critiques by W. Davies (1974: 321–31) and Stimpfle (1992: 89) as summarized by van Belle (1998: 30–32). The Galilee/Nazareth explanation is found already in Augustine (cited by van Belle 1998: 33) and is defended by Stimpfle (1992: 86–96 [followed by van Belle 1998: 27–44]) and others (see van Belle 1998: 32–33; see also Ridderbos 1997: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 73; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.463). Still others think that both Galilee and Judea are in view (Carson 1991: 235–36; Burge 2000: 151–52; Witherington 1995: 126; W. Davies 1974: 321–31).

7 So Carson 1991: 234; Ridderbos 1997: 174–75; Morris 1995: 255; Borchert 1996: 219–20; Burge 2000: 152–53; Witherington 1995: 127; contra R. Brown 1966: 193; Barrett 1978: 245; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.471–75; Bultmann 1971: 205.

9 So Mead 1985: 71; Barrett 1978: 245; Witherington 1995: 128; Moloney 1998: 153; Bultmann 1971: 206; but see the cautious assessment by Carson 1991: 234. Morris (1995: 255), somewhat idiosyncratically, suggests that the man was a Jew.

22 The numbering of the two Cana signs has suggested to some the existence of a "signs source" (Bultmann 1971: 206; Fortna 1970; 1989; Whitacre 1999: 116). However, this inference is not a necessary one (Ridderbos 1997: 178; Carson 1991: 178; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; contra Barrett 1978: 246; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.469–71).

1 In light of the apparently abrupt reference to Jesus "crossing to the far shore of the Sea of Galilee" in 6:1 (ch. 5 has him in Jerusalem), it has been speculated that chapters 5 and 6 should be reversed (see Bultmann 1971: 209, 237; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.92); but see Carson 1991: 240; Morris 1995: 264; cf. Barrett 1978: 23–24; Borchert 1996: 250; and especially Ridderbos 1997: 183.

13 A few commentators (Morris 1995: 265–66; Barrett 1978: 251; Moloney 1998: 171; R. Brown 1966: 206) think that προβατικῇ modifies κολυμβήθρα (kolymbēthra, pool); others think that the implied noun is "gate" (Carson 1991: 241; so also the TNIV).

17 See Barrett 1978: 252–53; Hengel 1999: 313, with further references in n. 74. On John's translation of Aramaic or Hebrew terms, see commentary at 1:38. "Aramaic" for the Greek Ἑβραϊστί is favored by Carson 1991: 242; Ridderbos 1997: 185; Barrett 1978: 253; Witherington 1995: 137; Burge 2000: 173. R. Brown (1966: 206) says that the term "is used loosely, often for names that are Aramaic." See also additional note.

23 Cf. 1:47–48; 4:17–18. So Barrett 1978: 254; Witherington 1995: 137; contra Morris 1995: 268 n. 18.

28 Carson 1991: 244; Barrett 1978: 254. Though Ridderbos (1997: 186) perhaps gets carried away slightly when he sees the act as a sign of victory, exulting, "No longer does the bed carry a powerless man but, with vitality to spare, he (triumphantly) carries the bed.”

182n39, 185n48, 186n52, 186n53, 186n54, 186n55, 187n56, 189, 189n67, 190, 191, 191n81, 191n82, 192n86, 195n108, 195n110, 200n7, 201, 202n15, 203, 204n28, 205,

39 God’s judgment: Ridderbos 1997: 189; Barrett 1978: 255; Gehenna or Hades: Beasley-Murray 1999: 74; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.98; eternal consequences: Morris 1995: 272; Witherington 1995: 139.

48 Cf. Matt. 12:1–14 pars. (R. Brown 1966: 217; Barrett 1978: 256; Carson 1991: 247–48).

52 Barrett (1978: 256) notes that those who had made themselves equal to God in past history included Hiram, Nebuchadnezzar, Pharaoh, and Joash. Ποιῶν (poiōn, making) is a participle of result (Wallace 1996: 638, 664).

53 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Borchert 1996: 236; Moloney 1998: 174; Bultmann 1971: 245; Morris 1995: 274–75 n. 48 (referring to Odeberg 1968: 203), 277; Barrett 1978: 259; Keener 1999: 42–43. The use of ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, that one) for God “lays stress upon the separate divine Person” in contrast with υἱός (huios, son). Also stressed is the Son’s inability to do anything apart from the Father (again in 5:30; see Moloney 1998: 178; Barrett 1978: 264).

54 Though calling this a “parable” (Dodd 1968a; Burge 2000: 177; cf. R. Brown 1966: 218) may be an overstatement (Carson 1991: 250; Ridderbos 1997: 192; Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Barrett 1978: 259–60).

55 Cf. 7:18; 11:51; 15:4; 16:13; 18:34; see Barrett 1978: 259; Bultmann 1971: 249; Carson 1991: 251; Borchert 1996: 237. Just as the Son depends on the Father, so believers can do nothing of eternal significance without Christ (15:5), but they can do all things through him who strengthens them (Phil. 4:13; see commentary at 5:23).

56 See Carson 1991: 251; Borchert 1996: 238; Barrett 1978: 259; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.104; Westcott 1908: 1.190.

67 “Whoever hears and believes” is one unit, with one definite article governing both participles in the Greek (Barrett 1978: 261).

81 That “another” refers to God the Father represents a broad consensus among commentators: so Ridderbos 1997: 202; Morris 1995: 288; Moloney 1998: 190; Beasley-Murray 1999: 78; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.121; Barrett 1978: 264; R. Brown 1966: 224.

82 “Have sent” and “have testified” are in the Greek perfect tense, indicating the settled condition resulting from the Baptist’s witness to Jesus (cf. Barrett 1978: 264; Carson 1991: 260; Beasley-Murray 1999: 78; Morris 1995: 288; R. Brown 1966: 224; Wallace [1996: 577] calls this an “extensive perfect”).

86 The aorist ἠθελήσατε (ēthelēsate, you chose) may be intended as a contrast to the perfect tense forms in 5:33, which indicate the settled condition of the Baptist’s witness (Barrett 1978: 265). The word here for “enjoy” (ἀγαλλιάω, agalliaō [found elsewhere in John only in 8:56]) also occurs in the Greek text of Ps. 132:16. Josephus (Ant. 18.5.2 §118) writes that people “were aroused to the highest degree [variant: ‘overjoyed’]” by the Baptist’s message.

108 So the majority of commentators, including Barrett 1978: 250–51; Carson 1991: 240; Morris 1995: 265 n. 6; R. Brown (1966: 206), who says that the evidence is “overwhelming”; Beasley-Murray 1999: 69 n. e; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.93.

110 So Fee 1982 and the vast majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 185; Carson 1991: 242; Morris 1995: 267; Barrett 1978: 253; R. Brown 1966: 207; Beasley-Murray 1999: 70 n. h; Bultmann 1971: 241 n. 4; Borchert 1996: 232; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94–95.

7 Though some of the acts and words in John 6 have eucharistic significance, the feeding of the multitudes does not in itself constitute a eucharistic meal (so, rightly, Brodie 1993: 263; cf. Barrett [1978: 274], who adds that, to the contrary, “the eucharist, like the last supper... , must be understood in the context of the Jewish Passover”). See also R. Brown (1966: 246–49), who speaks of “eucharistic elements” in all four Gospel versions and considers “the eucharistic coloring of the Johannine account of the multiplication” as beyond doubt.

206, 206n40, 207n41, 207n43, 208, 208n50, 209, 209n54, 211, 211n59, 211n60, 211n61, 212n64, 214, 215, 216n76, 216n77, 219, 219n94, 220, 220n95, 220n96, 220n98,

15 In light of the fact that the term ἰχθὺς came to have eucharistic significance, it may be significant that John uses a different word (E. Johnston 1962: 153).

28 The imperfect ἤρχοντο (ērchonto) indicates that the disciples “were on their way” or that they were “trying to go” (Barrett 1978: 280; cf. Morris 1995: 308 n. 36; Moloney 1998: 203). Morris (1995: 309 n. 41), followed by Keener (2003: 673), suggests that the disciples were probably crossing not at the widest part of the lake but from the northeast to the northwest shores, the distance stated in 6:19 indicating that they were most of the way across the lake.

40 Thus, in effect, “How long have you been here?” (Morris 1995: 316 n. 68; Barrett 1978: 286; R. Brown 1966: 261; Carson 1991: 283).

41 Contra Beasley-Murray (1999: 91), who takes εἶδετε (eidete, you saw) literally, concluding that Jesus’ present audience was not physically present when Jesus performed the sign. In the Synoptics, even the disciples are shown to misunderstand the implications of the miracle (Mark 6:52; cf. 8:14–21; see Carson 1991: 283). Barrett (1978: 286) views the use of ἐχορτάσθητε (echortasthēte, you had your fill) as evidence that John was familiar with Mark (cf. Mark 6:42; 8:8).

43 So Barrett 1978: 287; cf. Witherington 1995: 155; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.38; Burge 1987: 84–85. Less likely, the reference may be to his consecration (R. Brown 1966: 261) or to the incarnation (Moloney 1998: 211). On the phrase “seal of approval,” see commentary at 3:33.

50 Carson 1991: 285; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 91; Barrett 1978: 288; R. Brown 1966: 265; Moloney 1998: 212. The personal pronoun σύ (sy, you) is emphatic, possibly suggesting that people doubt Jesus’ ability to furnish such a sign (Morris 1995: 321).

54 Since contemporary Judaism conceived of the Torah as “bread” from God (cf. Prov. 9:5), some suggest that Jesus may here claim to be superior to the Torah (Carson 1991: 286–87; cf. Barrett 1978: 290; R. Brown 1966: 262). However, in the Johannine context such a claim seems unduly dichotomous and probably unlikely.

59 The significance of the shift from the aorist subjunctive πεινάσῃ (peinasē, hunger) to the future indicative διψήσῃ (dipsēsei, thirst) is unclear (noted by Morris 1995: 324 n. 100; Barrett [1978: 292–93] thinks that John’s use of the indicative is incorrect).

60 See discussion at 6:30. The second καί (kai, and) in 6:36 probably is adversative (so Barrett 1978: 293). The majority of commentators consider the word με (me, me) in 6:36 to be original (so Ridderbos 1997: 230 n. 120; Carson 1991: 289–90; Morris 1995: 325 n. 104; R. Brown 1966: 270; contra Barrett 1978: 293; Moloney 1998: 216; see also the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 85; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.46).

61 “Everything” (πάν, pan) in 6:37 and 6:39 is neuter, used in a qualitative, collective sense (R. Brown 1966: 270; Barrett 1978: 294; Borchert 1966: 265), though ultimately people (not things) are in mind (BDF §138.1, with specific reference to John 6:37; cf. Morris 1995: 325; Moloney 1998: 216).

64 Both expressions in the aorist subjunctive in 6:39, μὴ ἀπολέσω (mē apolesō, I may not lose) and ἀναστήσω (anastēsō, I may raise), are part of the purpose clause indicating the Father's will (Barrett 1978: 295). The same dynamic seems to be at work in 6:40 (though note R. Brown 1966: 270).

76 For the most part, 6:53 is a negative restatement of 6:51. However, 6:53 adds the reference to drinking Jesus' blood (a development of 6:35; see Beasley-Murray 1999: 94; Barrett 1978: 298).

77 John's use of τρώγω (trōgō, chew, eat) in 6:54 may be intended to heighten the vividness of Jesus' words (Ridderbos 1997: 242 n. 163; cf. Moloney 1998: 221; Bultmann 1971: 236), though it may merely be the evangelist's preferred verb for "eating" in the present tense (Carson 1991: 296; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 95; Barrett 1978: 299).

94 The absence of the article before πνεῦμα (pneuma, spirit) and ζωή (zōē, life) indicates the quality or essential nature of Jesus' words (cf. 4:24). Ἐγώ (egō, I) may be emphatic (Barrett 1978: 305); the perfect λελάληκα (lēlalēka, I have spoken), together with the plural ῥήματα (rhēmata, words), refers to the body of Jesus' teaching in its totality. The repetition of the stative verb (ἔστιν, estin) establishes "spirit" and "life" as distinct concepts (Morris 1995: 341 n. 152).

95 Ridderbos 1997: 248; Carson 1991: 302; Morris 1995: 342; Barrett 1978: 305. Elsewhere in this Gospel, Jesus is shown to reiterate his earlier teaching: 8:24 (cf. 8:21); 15:20 (cf. 13:16); 16:15 (cf. 16:14).

96 So Moloney 1998: 231; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.75; Wallace (1996: 658) translates it "as a result of this"; Barrett (1978: 306) opts for both.

98 Contra Barrett (1978: 306), who suggests that Jesus is venturing a hesitant question. This is grammatically possible but unlikely in light of the predestinarian language pervading this passage.

106 So Carson 1991: 267; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 208–9; Barrett 1978: 272; Witherington 1995: 385; contra R. Brown 1966: 235–36; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.5–9.

2 Carson 1991: 305; Borchert 1996: 279; Barrett 1978: 309; see commentary at 2:12 and at 7:2.

8 See Laney 1992: 138–39. The background for this may be the brothers' memory of Jesus' feat at the wedding of Cana (2:1–12) and his subsequent apparent popularity in Jerusalem (2:23–25; Ridderbos 1997: 257–58; Barrett 1978: 311). Kruse (2003: 182) proposes that the recent defection of many disciples may have been to the detriment of the family honor, which Jesus' brothers wanted restored. Ποιεῖ καὶ ζητεῖ in 7:4 represents Hebraic parataxis (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.139).

9 Note the inclusio of 7:4 and 8:59 (Keener 2003: 703). Cf. Matt. 10:26 and the "messianic secret" motif in the Synoptics (Barrett 1978: 311; Carson 1991: 310, referring to Lindars 1972: 283).

14 Schnackenburg 1990: 2.142. Barrett (1978: 313) notes the similar dynamic at a different time in Jesus' ministry (Mark 9:30; 10:1).

26 So Carson 1991: 312–13; R. Brown 1966: 316; Morris 1995: 360; Barrett 1978: 318; Kruse 2003: 185.

32 Παρησίᾳ (parrēsia, openly) is a dative of manner or adverbial dative (Wallace 1996: 162). "They are not saying a word to him" is a rabbinic expression reflecting tacit approval (R. Brown 1966: 313). "Said R. Judah, 'Helene's sukkah [tabernacle] was twenty cubits tall, and sages went in and out, when visiting her, and not one of them said a thing' " (t. Sukkah 1.1). The interrogative particle μήποτε (mēpote) signals a tentative question (Carson 1991: 317; Barrett 1978: 321), the gist being "Do the rulers perhaps actually [μήποτε ἄληθῶς] know that he is the

236n36, 236n37, 237n40, 237n41, 238, 238n44, 239n47, 240n53, 240n59, 242n67, 243, 244, 253, 253n6, 254n14, 255, 255n19, 255n20, 256, 256n24, 257n29, 258n32, 259,

Christ?”

35 Ἐκραξεν (ekraxen, he cried out) denotes a loud shout (Morris 1995: 366), indicating a public, solemn pronouncement (Carson 1991: 318; Barrett 1978: 322) (cf. 1:15; 7:37; 12:44).

36 The καί (kai, but) preceding ἀπ’ ἑμαυτοῦ (ap’ emautou, on my own accord) is adversative (Ridderbos 1997: 268 n. 45; Barrett 1978: 323; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.147). The ἐγώ (egō, I) at the beginning of 7:29 is emphatic, set against the ὑμεῖς (hymeis, you) in 7:28 (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.147). The alternating use of two words meaning “send,” πέμπω (pempō) and ἀποστέλλω (apostellō), in 7:28–29 represents stylistic variation (Morris 1995: 367 n. 58; Barrett 1978: 323; R. Brown 1966: 313).

37 This is the first time that this word occurs in John. It is used eight times in John’s Gospel (compared to only four times elsewhere in the NT), of which six refer to attempts to arrest Jesus (7:30, 32, 44; 8:20; 10:39; 11:57). In the present chapter, 7:30 may refer to an informal attempt, and 7:32 and 7:44 to formal attempts (Barrett 1978: 323), though the distinction should not be exaggerated.

40 Barrett (1978: 323) infers from the emphatic position of ἐκ τοῦ ὄχλου (ek tou ochlou, of the crowd) that the evangelist sets the crowd off from the Jerusalemites.

41 There is no need to charge the evangelist here with “ignorance” or lack of “concern for accuracy,” as do Barrett (1978: 324) and, less strongly, Schnackenburg (1990: 2.149).

44 The interrogative particle μή (mē) indicates a hesitant suggestion (Barrett 1978: 325).

47 See R. Brown 1966: 314; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.150; Schlatter 1948: 198. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 271), who opts for Greek-speaking Diaspora Jews. Carson (1991: 320 [cf. Barrett 1978: 325; Witherington 1995: 173]) thinks that Gentile proselytes probably are in view.

53 Most commentators favor a time immediately following cessation of ceremonies on the eighth day (Carson 1991: 321; Morris 1995: 373, esp. n. 79; Barrett 1978: 326; Moloney 1998: 256; Schlatter 1948: 199). Some believe that Jesus’ words fit better with the ceremonies of the seventh day (R. Brown 1966: 320; Bultmann 1971: 302 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.152; Ridderbos 1997: 272; Burge 2000: 227). On the water-drawing ceremony, see Keener 2003: 722–24.

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee’s observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus “from within him” refers to “whoever believes in me.” Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of “rivers of living water” (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987: 88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

67 The sharp disjunction drawn by several commentators between Jesus’ earthly and heavenly origins in John is overdrawn (cf. Ridderbos 1997: 278; Barrett 1978: 331; Schnackenburg 1980: 2.158). On the verb πιάζω (piazō, seize) in 7:44, see commentary at 7:30.

6 See Isa. 60:19–22; Zech. 14:5b–8; cf. Rev. 21:23–24. Contemporary Judaism applied the phrase “light of the world” not only to God but also to Israel, Jerusalem, the patriarchs, the Messiah, famous rabbis (e.g., Yohanan ben Zakkai), the Torah, the temple, and even Adam (Keener 1993: 285; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 128; R. Brown 1966: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.190; Moloney 1998: 266). The universality of “light” symbolism in religious language issues in numerous non-Jewish parallels (see Barrett 1978: 335–37; Bultmann 1971: 40–44, 342–43; Dodd 1953: 201–8; Odeberg 1968: 286–92).

14 Commentators vary as to whether to regard as synonyms the two words used in the present context for “true” or “valid,” ἀληθής (alēthēs; 8:13, 14, 17) and ἀληθινός (alēthinos; 8:16). Beasley-Murray (1999: 125 n. a [contra R. Brown 1966: 341; Lindars 1972: 317; Barrett 1978: 339]) opts to distinguish between the former meaning “true” or “valid” and the latter meaning “just” or “authentic” (similarly, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.194). Ridderbos (1997: 294) suggests the meaning “just” for ἀληθινός; Barrett (1978: 339) opts for “authentic”; and Carson (1991: 340) prefers “right.”

19 Cf. 2 Cor. 5:16; Isa. 53:2–3; 1 Sam. 16:7; see Barrett 1978: 338; Moloney 1998: 266–67.

20 Cf. 16:32. See also m. Abot 4.8. The conjunction δέ (de, but) serves to “reverse” the negative statement in 8:15b (Barrett 1978: 339). Morris (1995: 392) suggests that δέ (given its relationship with καί [kai, even]) means “even if.”

24 Cf. 10:34; see also 6:49: “your ancestors”; 8:56: “your father Abraham”; 15:25: “their law” (see Augenstein 1997). Barrett (1978: 339) seems to deny the historicity of the words “in your law,” suggesting that they are a creation of the evangelist intended to show the separation that occurred between Christianity and official Judaism. However, in light of the consistent pattern throughout John’s Gospel, and the undeniable acrimony between Jesus and his Jewish opponents historically, this expedient is unnecessary. In favor of historicity are Morris (1995: 392 n. 19) and Carson (1991: 340).

29 So Morris 1995: 394; Carson 1991: 341; Beasley-Murray 1999: 125 n. b; Burge 2000: 257. Barrett (1978: 340) alone seems to express some reservation.

32 “Sin” in 8:21 is in the singular, which may refer to the “cardinal sin of rejecting Jesus” (Barrett 1978: 340; Carson 1991: 341; R. Brown 1966: 350; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.197). Alternatively, “sin” may be used generically to refer to a person’s sinful state apart from Christ. The preposition ἐν (en, in) probably is locative (“in a state of sin”), though it also could be instrumental (“by reason of sin”) (Barrett 1978: 341; cf. Morris 1995: 395).

53 Morris 1995: 405; cf. R. Brown 1966: 355; Borchert 1996: 303. Carson (1991: 348–49) suggests that truth in 8:32 is similar to the notion of “gospel,” that is, “the truth that has been revealed in and by Jesus” (cf. Barrett 1978: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.205).

62 Barrett (1978: 346) suggests that ὅντως (ontōs, indeed) in 8:36 is roughly equivalent to ἀληθῶς (alēthōs, truly) in 8:31.

64 Carson (1991: 351 n. 1) suggests the translations “my word has no place in you” or “my word does not operate in you” (cf. Barrett 1978: 346).

68 So Carson 1991: 352; R. Brown 1966: 357; Barrett 1978: 348; contra Ridderbos 1997: 313; Borchert 1996: 305; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.212.

71 Morris (1995: 410) and Barrett (1978: 348) claim to detect a contrast between Jesus’ λαλία (lalia, speech) and his λόγος (logos, word), but it is hard to see why these two terms should not be understood as rough synonyms, in keeping with Johannine style.

74 So Morris 1995: 411; Ridderbos 1997: 315; Carson 1991: 353; Barrett 1978: 349; Beasley-Murray 1999: 135; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.213; Moloney 1998: 280; Borchert 1996: 305–6. It was commonly recognized in Second Temple literature that death was the result of Satan’s initiative (Wis. 2:23–24; Sir. 25:24; cf. Rom. 5:12).

76 The phrase means, more literally, “not standing in the truth,” which may imply that “the truth was not his starting point or standpoint” (Ridderbos 1997: 315; Barrett 1978: 349). The phrase “truth is not in him” asserts that Satan “has nothing in common with truth” (Barrett [1978: 349], who notes the absence of the article).

76 The phrase means, more literally, “not standing in the truth,” which may imply that “the truth was not his starting point or standpoint” (Ridderbos 1997: 315; Barrett 1978: 349). The phrase “truth is not in him” asserts that Satan “has nothing in common with truth” (Barrett [1978: 349], who notes the absence of the article).

85 This implies that Jesus neglects the traditional ways of Judaism and so is perceived as acting more like a Samaritan than like a true Jew (Morris 1995: 414; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 318). Morris (1995: 414) suggests that the Jews might be addressing Jesus’ failure to recognize their relationship with Abraham. Barrett (1978: 350) notes that since Dositheus and Simon Magus (both Samaritans who claimed to be sons of God) were described as demon-possessed, Jesus’ opponents might be making a similar connection with him (cf. Moloney 1998: 286; R. Brown 1966: 358).

94 The majority of commentators believe that there is no significance in the slight alteration of Jesus’ words in 8:52 (Morris 1995: 416 n. 104; Barrett 1978: 350–51; R. Brown 1966: 359; Borchert 1996: 307). Note, however, that “taste death” replaces “see death” (see Laney 1992: 168; cf. 5:24). The expression “taste death” is not found in the OT, but “to see death” is (see commentary at 8:51). The expression “taste death” occurs in the NT also in Mark 9:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 351) and Heb. 2:9. See further Acts 2:27, 31 (citing Ps. 16:10); 1 Cor. 15:54–55 (citing Isa. 25:8; Hos. 13:14); 1 John 3:14. On other minor differences, see footnote for commentary at John 8:51.

95 Morris 1995: 416; Carson 1991: 356; Barrett 1978: 351. The pronoun ἡμῶν (hēmōn, our) in the phrase “our father Abraham” is likely exclusive, with Jesus not included as ancestor of Abraham (Wallace 1996: 398). Note also the relative pronoun ὅστις (hostis, who), which is both indefinite (R. Brown 1966: 359) and qualitative (Morris 1995: 416 n. 105) in import. Abraham serves as a type of others like him, and all of those were “of such a quality as to die” (Morris 1995: 416 n. 105).

96 The conjunction καί (kai, but) at the beginning of 8:55 is adversative (“yet” [Ridderbos 1997: 320 n. 209; Barrett 1978: 351]). Γινώσκω (ginōskō) and οἶδα (oida) for “know” are synonymous (Barrett 1978: 351; Borchert 1996: 307).

97 The term ἀγαλλιάω (agalliaō, be glad) occurs in this Gospel elsewhere only in 5:35. The sense is that of being “overjoyed” (Morris 1995: 417). The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) is variously classified as referring to the content of Abraham’s joy (Morris 1995: 417); as introducing “the ground of the rejoicing” (Barrett 1978: 351); as causal or explanatory (Beasley-Murray 1999: 126 n. 1); or as conveying purpose (R. Brown 1966: 359).

102 Ridderbos 1997: 321–22; cf. Carson 1991: 357; Barrett 1978: 352; R. Brown 1966: 367; Burge 2000: 263.

111 Cf. 1:14; Ezek. 10–11; see Carson 1991: 358, citing W. Davies 1974: 290–96; Barrett 1978: 353. Keener (2003: 774) concurs that Jesus’ withdrawing from the temple may “evoke a state of Ichabod, God’s glory withdrawing from a polluted and rebellious sanctuary” (citing Ezek. 5:11; 8:4; 9:3; 10:4, 18). Ridderbos (1997: 324 n. 225) suggests that the meanings of the verbs ἐκρύβη and ἐξῆλθεν (exēlthen, he left) “mutually determine each other.”

283n25, 283n26, 284n30, 285n37, 286, 286n40, 287n45, 287n48, 289n53, 289n54, 290, 290n57, 291n59, 291n61, 292, 294n80, 295, 295n82, 296, 300n9, 300n10, 301, 301n13,

25 The double imperative constitutes a Semitism (Barrett 1978: 358). Ridderbos (1997: 336) lists three reasons why the blind man was sent to Siloam: (1) to wash the mud out of his eyes; (2) to evoke the blind man’s faith; and (3) to carry out ritual purification (cf. Luke 7:14). Carson (1991: 365) adds (4) to correlate the Pharisees’ unbelief with a prophecy of judgment in Isa. 8:6 (though he rejects any prefiguration of baptism, contra Lindars [1972: 344], who sees the man’s bath as a “quasi-baptismal washing”; see also Ridderbos 1997: 337). Grigsby (1985) argues that the washing in the pool of Siloam constitutes a thematic anticipation of the Johannine cross.

26 Morris (1995: 428) notes the nonchalant fashion in which the miracle is described. Barrett (1978: 359) comments, “The man’s obedience was complete and so was his cure.” A connection with the previous chapters is established by the fact that the water for the water-pouring rites of the Feast of Tabernacles was drawn from the pool of Siloam (cf. m. Sukkah 4.9–10).

30 Barrett 1978: 358–59; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.243 (cited in Lee [1994: 167 n. 1], who also refers to Isa. 8:6 LXX). See Gen. Rab. 98.8; 99.8.

37 See Ridderbos 1997: 335; Morris 1995: 427; Barrett 1978: 359; R. Brown 1966: 373; Borchert 1996: 318.

40 The separation of οὗτος (houtos, this) from ὁ ἄνθρωπος (ho anthrōpos, the man) suggests that the comment is meant contemptuously (Morris 1995: 431). Barrett (1978: 360) construes the intent underlying the statement as follows: “‘He is not from God—this man’; and certainly he is no more than [a] man.” Both Morris (1995: 431) and Schnackenburg (1990: 2.248) believe that the word order is chosen by the evangelist to highlight the Pharisees’ ignorance of the incarnation and ill-conceived notion of distance between Jesus and God.

45 Ridderbos (1997: 339 n. 267) favors the sense “since you say he opened your eyes”; Barrett (1978: 360, citing LSJ) advocates ὅτι meaning “with regard to the fact that.”

48 “He is old enough” probably means that the man is qualified to give legal testimony about himself—that is, he is at least thirteen (m. Nid. 5.6; Carson 1991: 369; Barrett 1978: 361; Kruse 2003: 225; Keener 2003: 788). Beyond this, his age is not known. The phrase may indicate that the man is sufficiently mature to reason and answer the Pharisees’ questions for himself (Morris 1995: 433 n. 34).

53 Ridderbos 1997: 343; similarly, Morris 1995: 434 n. 36; contra Barrett 1978: 361; R. Brown 1966: 380; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.250; Bultmann 1971: 335.

54 Conway (1999: 131) suggests the idiomatic translation “Tell us the truth.” See Josh. 7:19; 2 Chron. 30:8; Jer. 13:16; 1 Esdr. 9:8; m. Sanh. 6.2; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 344; Carson 1991: 372; Morris 1995: 436. Alternatively, the Jews exhort the man to give glory to God, who performed the miracle (but see Barrett 1978: 362).

57 This is the only instance of λοιδορέω (loidoreō, insult) in the Gospel (elsewhere in the NT only in Acts 23:4; 1 Cor. 4:12; 1 Pet. 2:23). Note the emphatic juxtaposition of the personal pronouns σύ (sy, you) and ἡμεῖς (hēmeis, we), an “antithesis [that] is intended to expose the utter inferiority of the discipleship to which the man born blind refers” (Ridderbos 1997: 345), and the contemptuous force of ἐκείνου (ekeinou, that one’s) (Carson 1991: 373; Morris 1995: 437 n. 42; Barrett 1978: 362).

59 The perceptive reader will note that the Pharisees’ claim to being disciples of Moses is refuted by the earlier statement in 5:45–47 (Keener 2003: 791). There is some debate as to how common this self-designation was among the Jews of Jesus' day (cf., e.g., Matt. 23:2). In b. Yoma 4a, it is applied to Pharisees as opposed to Sadducees. In m. Abot 5.19, Jews are referred to as "the disciples of Abraham," while Christians are dismissed as "the disciples of Balaam the wicked" (that is, Jesus!). Schnackenburg (1990: 2.251) and Ridderbos (1997: 345 n. 287, referring to TDNT 4:443) consider this to be a characteristic rabbinic self-designation, while Carson (1991: 373–74, apparently following Barrett 1978: 362–63) says that this self-designation was not common.

61 Carson (1991: 373) points out that on a formal level, the present statement stands in contradiction with the Pharisees' earlier comment in 7:27 (cf. 6:42; 8:14b). He rightly notes that "both 7:27 and 9:29 are simultaneously false and ironically true" (almost identically, Barrett 1978: 363; similarly, Morris 1995: 437; Keener 2003: 792).

80 Carson 1991: 376; Morris 1995: 440; R. Brown 1966: 375. D. M. Smith (1999: 199) suggests that the ambiguity may be intentional, while Barrett (1978: 364) doubts that John intentionally meant to distinguish between these two meanings in 9:36 and 9:38. Regarding the question "Who is he ...?" see 12:34 (cf. Acts 9:5).

82 Borchert (1996: 325) relates the present reference to 20:28 and believes that this confession is a high point in the festival cycle. The man's response to Jesus' self-revelation is in keeping with the standard OT reaction to theophany (e.g., Gen. 17:3). However, it is possible that the man's actions, while being "beyond that due to other men," fall "short of that due to God Almighty" (Beasley-Murray 1999: 160; similarly, Carson 1991: 377). Nevertheless, the majority of commentators favor a fuller sense of worship (Barrett 1978: 365; R. Brown 1966: 376; Bultmann 1971: 339 n. 3; Morris 1995: 440; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.254).

9 Barrett (1978: 368) suggests that ἀναβαίνων ἀλλαχόθεν (anabainōn allachōthen, going up another way) refers to individuals who attempt to reach the heavenly realm through a method other than the cross, but it is doubtful that the symbolism can be extended this far. See the appropriate cautions against pressing an allegorical reading of every detail in the present discourse registered by Ridderbos 1997: 355 (Morris 1995: 447 cites the doorkeeper as an example; see below).

10 Later, Judas is called a thief (12:6), and Barabbas a robber (18:40; cf. Mark 15:7). At his arrest, Jesus asks why he is treated like a robber (Matt. 26:55 pars.), and in the end he is crucified with robbers on either side (Matt. 27:38, 44 pars.). The majority of commentators take both terms as referring to the same people (Ridderbos 1997: 354; Carson 1991: 381; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.281; contra Barrett 1978: 369). See further Hengel 1989a: 24–46; Simonis 1967: 101–3.

13 The wording is reminiscent of OT passages such as Num. 27:15–17 and Ezek. 34:13. Carson (1991: 383 [cf. Barrett 1978: 369]) understands Num. 27:15–18 as a typological allusion to Christ (contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.293; Moloney 1998: 308). Ridderbos (1997: 354) also mentions Ps. 80:1.

16 So Barrett 1978: 370; contra Ridderbos 1997: 354. See commentary at 10:8 and 10:10.

20 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.288) suggests that πάλιν (palin, again) starts a new discussion. Carson (1991: 384) perceives that 10:7–9 does not necessarily expand on 10:1–5 but that it represents a treatment of the three dominant motifs (gate, shepherd, sheep) in those verses (cf. Barrett 1978: 370–71).

21 Some (e.g., Morris 1995: 450 n. 27; Barrett 1978: 371) seek to make a distinction between the meaning of ἡ θύρα τῶν προβάτων (hē thyra tōn probatōn, the door for the sheep) in 10:7 and ἡ θύρα (hē thyra, the gate) in 10:9, contending that in 10:7 Jesus is presented as the gate to the sheep, while in 10:9 he is the gate for the sheep. However, such a distinction is unnecessary (Carson 1991: 384; cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.289; Moloney 1998: 309).

36 Isa. 63:11; cf. Ps. 77:20; Midr. Rab. 2.2 on Exod. 3:1. Philo speaks of a “good” (ἀγαθός) shepherd (Husb. 10 §44; 12 §49) and applies shepherd terminology not only to kings and wise men but also to both God and his firstborn Son or Word (Husb. 12 §§50–53; Post. Cain 19 §§67–68). In non-Jewish circles, too, gods and great men were described as shepherds (Barrett 1978: 374).

37 The preposition ὑπέρ (hyper, for) here, as elsewhere in this Gospel, has the connotation of a sacrificial, substitutionary death (Carson 1991: 386; Barrett 1978: 375; Borchert 1996: 334; Burge 2000: 291).

41 Barrett (1978: 370) notes how this deepens the Synoptic teaching on the kingdom of God by focusing on the personal, christological dimension of the relationship.

45 So the vast majority of commentators, including Barrett, Beasley-Murray, Burge, Carson, Moloney, Morris, Ridderbos, Schnackenburg, and Witherington. For Jewish material indicating that the Messiah would gather the Gentiles, see Hofius 1967.

47 Cf. Matt. 28:18–20; see Carson 1991: 388; cf. Barrett 1978: 376; Beasley-Murray 1999: 171. John 10:16 presupposes Jesus’ resurrection, which is referred to explicitly and repeatedly in the following verses (10:17, 18; cf. Michaels 1989: 181).

57 Barrett (1978: 379) suggests that the reference to the feast is meant to indicate that only a short period of time has elapsed since the events described in the previous narrative. See also the additional note to 10:22 below.

59 For discussions of the Feast of Dedication, see Barrett 1978: 378–79; Beasley-Murray 1999: 172–73. Moloney (1998: 317–19) suggests that 10:22–39 is a summary of John 5–10. See also his treatment of the narrative’s structure on p. 314. Keener (2003: 822) notes the irony of Jesus the Messiah being rejected at a festival commemorating national deliverance.

60 See Josephus, J.W. 5.5.1 §§184–85; Ant. 15.11.3 §§396–401; 20.9.7 §§220–21. So the vast majority of commentators, including Carson, Barrett, Morris, Beasley-Murray, R. Brown, Moloney, and Burge; contra Ridderbos 1997: 368.

62 Some see here a possible allusion to Ps. 118:10–12 (though not Barrett [1978: 380]). Burge (2000: 295) notes the presence of the same verb in Luke 21:20 with reference to Rome encircling Jerusalem before its destruction.

65 So Carson 1991: 392; Burge 2000: 295. Compare the “messianic secret” motif in Mark (e.g., Mark 1:34; 5:43; 7:36; 8:30; 9:9; see Ridderbos 1997: 368; Barrett 1978: 378–80).

73 So, rightly, Carson (1991: 394–95), whose entire discussion repays careful reading (see also Morris 1995: 465; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174; Moloney 1998: 320; Burge 2000: 296; Laney 1992: 195; Stibbe 1993: 118; Westcott 1908: 2.68). Michaels (1989: 187) seems to conceive of Jesus’ unity with the Father in functional terms (whether primarily or exclusively so), as both of them doing “the same work.” Barrett (1978: 382) notes that the unity between the Father and the Son is also a unity of love and obedience.

77 R. Brown (1966: 403) suggests that καλός (kalos, good) here may also be intended to hark back to the description of Jesus as the “good” shepherd (10:11, 14) in the preceding narrative. The renderings by Carson (1991: 396) as “noble” or “beautiful,” and by Barrett (1978: 383) as “deeds of power and moral excellence, resulting in health and well-being,” may overreach as expositions of the meaning conveyed by the term.

84 See b. Abod. Zar. 5a. For a variation of the first view, see Jungkuntz 1964; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311; Morris 1995: 467; Beasley-Murray 1999: 176–77. The second position is held by Emerton 1960; 1966. For a variation of the third view, see Hanson 1964–65; 1967. See further Oepke, TDNT 4:1022–32, 1054–55. Most major commentators seem to favor the third view as well (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 373; Carson 1991: 398; Barrett 1978: 384; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311).

85 The presence of an argument from the lesser to the greater is denied by Ridderbos (1997: 374) against the overwhelming majority of commentators (e.g., R. Brown 1966: 410; Morris 1995: 469; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.310; Moloney 1998: 316). Carson (1991: 399, perhaps following Barrett 1978: 385), calls this an ad hominem argument, which he defines (somewhat idiosyncratically, it seems) as an argument that “does not require Jesus to subscribe to the same literal exegesis as his opponents.”

87 Barrett (1978: 385) appropriately describes the syntax of ὃν ὁ πατήρ ἡγίασεν (hon ho patēr hēgiasen, whom the Father set apart) as “an accusative of reference, governed by λέγετε, and explaining the ὅτι clause.” The verb rendered “set apart as his very own” is often translated “sanctified” or “consecrated.” It occurs in John’s Gospel only here and in 17:17, 19.

89 In the LXX, variants of the term τὰ ἐγκαίνια (ta enkainia, Feast of Dedication [John 10:22]) refer to the dedication of the tabernacle altar (Num. 7:10–11), Solomon’s temple (1 Kings 8:63), and the second temple (Ezra 6:16–17). A connection between the present statement and the Feast of Tabernacles is made in, among others, Carson 1991: 399; R. Brown 1966: 411; Witherington 1995: 191; Moloney 1998: 317. Commentators differ as to the sacerdotal connotation of the term ἀγιάζω (hagiazō, set apart). R. Brown (1966: 411) is favorably disposed, while Barrett (1978: 385) denies such an association.

94 The distinction between γνῶτε (gnōte) and γινώσκητε (ginōskēte) is that of “coming to know” and “understanding” (Carson 1991: 400; Barrett 1978: 386; Morris 1995: 470; Laney 1992: 198). See also additional note to 10:38.

11 This does not keep Ridderbos (1997: 386) from calling the introduction “choppy and cumbersome,” or Barrett (1978: 387) from describing it as “clumsy.”

12 Barrett (1978: 389) thinks it unlikely (though not impossible) that the etymological significance of Lazarus’s name was in the mind of the evangelist.

19 R. Brown (1966: 423 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.322]) claims that this verse is “clearly a parenthesis added by an editor,” though it is unclear why the author himself (rather than a later editor) could not have added this kind of parenthetical statement. Carson (1991: 405 [approvingly cited by Borchert 1996: 349]) contends, against Barrett (1978: 390), that it does not follow that the intended audience was Christian, though clearly Carson’s case is difficult here. More likely is the reconstruction by Witherington (1995: 201), who says that this verse may serve as “a simple reminder of Mary’s identity to the Christians who would be using this Gospel as a missionary tool to bring outsiders to Christ.” Yet Carson (1991: 405) rightly points out that regardless of this issue, and even if the anointing was unknown to the reader, the proleptic reference to Mary still serves as a fine literary device, urging the first-time reader onward in the narrative.

28 This is why Carson (1991: 407 [cf. Morris 1995: 479 n. 16]) is right in rejecting the NIV’s rendering of 11:6 as “Yet when he heard” (retained in the TNIV), proposing instead the translation

“When therefore he heard.” Ridderbos (1997: 388 n. 24) avers that the particle μέν (men) in 11:6b is “more or less concessive” (“he [it is true] stayed where he was”). Similarly, Barrett (1978: 390) suggests that τότε μέν (tote men, then) in 11:6b anticipates the ἔπειτα μετὰ τοῦτο (epeita meta touto, then after this) in 11:7, stressing Jesus’ deliberate delay.

37 See Morris (1995: 482), who refers to the universal fear regarding death in the ancient world. There is no reason to follow Barrett (1978: 392 [cf. R. Brown 1966: 431]), who, on the basis that φίλος (philos, friend) is a technical term for a Christian in the NT, proposes that this is the “true meaning” of this “pregnant saying.” Carson (1991: 409) notes the “not accidental” switch from the plural “our friend” to the singular “I am going,” saying that this indicates that Jesus alone is the resurrection and the life. “I am going” is identified as a futuristic present by Wallace (1996: 536).

40 For a defense of the historicity of this incident, see Carson (1991: 409), who points out that the disciples did not have the advantage of knowing the end of the story; that the messenger had announced sickness but not death; and that the disciples’ anxiety about returning to Judea might have led to a certain amount of denseness. Carson also, rightly in my opinion, sees no double meaning in σωθήσεται (sōthēsetai, he will get well) (1991: 410; contra Barrett 1978: 393; R. Brown 1966: 424; Moloney 1998: 337; Westcott 1908: 2.84).

42 See the reference to God’s glory in 11:4; see also 2:11; cf. Barrett 1978: 393; R. Brown 1966: 432. Note the aorist subjunctive πιστεύσητε (pisteusēte, you may believe), which here refers to the strengthening of the disciples’ faith (rather than the creation of new faith). This observation is significant in relation to the question of how the purpose statement in 20:30–31 should be construed. Morris (1995: 483) struggles to accommodate this form within his somewhat outmoded verbal theory.

43 Alternatively, the sentence should read, “Lazarus has died—and I am glad for your sake, in order that you may believe—because I was not there” (cf. Carson 1991: 411, citing Delebecque 1986; cf. Barrett 1978: 393).

58 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 411; Barrett 1978: 394; Conway 1999: 139; Stibbe 1994: 48 (though he notes the return to a negative portrayal in 11:36, 45). Contra Morris (1995: 486), who finds the use of “the Jews” here “unusual” and suggests that it may imply that “though the mourners could bring themselves to sympathize with Martha and Mary, they were hostile to Jesus.”

61 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 412; Ridderbos 1997: 395, with reference to 2:5; similarly, Keener 2003: 106–7, citing Barrett 1978: 390. The term κύριος (kyrios) probably means “Lord,” as in 11:3 (Carson 1991: 411). Regarding the statement “God will give you whatever you ask,” see commentary at 9:31.

75 Though compare this designation with the immediately preceding confession of Jesus as the Christ and Son of God (noted by Barrett 1978: 397). The term is given as the Greek equivalent of rabbi in 1:38 and 20:16 and is used for Jesus in 3:2; 13:13, 14.

85 The juxtaposition of the terms ἐνεβριμήσατο τῷ πνεύματι (enebrimēsato tō pneumati, bristled in spirit) and ἐτάραξεν ἑαυτόν (etaraxen heauton, was stirred inside) may well express the Johannine penchant for stylistic variation. If not, “it must be intended to underline the contention that Jesus was always master of himself and his circumstances” (Barrett 1978: 399).

91 Barrett (1978: 399) asserts that Jesus was angry “beyond question.” Schnackenburg (1990: 2.335) calls attempts to render ἐμβριμάομαι as an emotional experience such as grief, pain, or sympathy “illegitimate.” Beasley-Murray (1987 = 1999: 192–93, followed by Lindars 1992b: 89–90, noting that he changed his view from Lindars 1972: 398) marshals considerable evidence to support the reading “became angry in spirit.” See also Carson (1991: 415), who contends that ἐμβριμάομαι means more than “deeply moved in spirit” and says that the term refers to “anger, outrage, or emotional indignation.” Brodie (1993: 395), starting with Schnackenburg’s view that Jesus was angry at the unbelief of Mary and the Jews, maintains that his anger is directed also at sin and death, and thus ultimately against the realm of Satan.

94 The term δακρύω occurs occasionally in the LXX (Job 3:24; Ezek. 27:35; Mic. 2:6; 2 Macc. 4:37; Sir. 12:16; 31:13). Owing to the force of the verb tense in the Greek original (an “ingressive aorist”), “Jesus burst into tears” is a better translation than the customary “wept” (Morris 1995: 495 n. 77; cf. Barrett 1978: 400; Pollard 1973: 441; Stibbe 1994: 45). This is suggested by comparison with instances of δακρύω in the same grammatical form in Greco-Roman and Hellenistic Jewish literature, where the term is regularly rendered this way (see Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 17.66.4; 27.6.1; Plutarch, Camillus 5.5; Pyrrhus 34.4; Pompeius 80.5; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162; J.W. 5.10.5 §445; 6.5.3 §304).

100 As Barrett (1978: 401) writes, “They think of Jesus not as the Son of God who is light and life ... but as a thaumaturge whose capacities, authenticated by the cure of the blind man, might conceivably have been expected to rise to this extremity.” Carson (1991: 417 [cf. Morris 1995: 496]) says that we need not suppose that their attitude was “sneering,” but Schnackenburg (1990: 2.337) points to the introductory δέ (de, but) and the negative connotation of οὐκ ἐδύνάτο (ouk edynato, could he not have?).

103 Again, Ridderbos (1997: 401), rightly in my opinion, dismisses attempts to link Jesus’ anger to the unbelief of the Jews. Carson (1991: 417) perhaps construes the relationship between 11:38 and 11:37 too tightly when he states, “This unbelief is the reason the next verse [v. 38] reports that Jesus’ quiet outrage flares up again.” Similarly, Barrett (1978: 401) speaks of “inchoate faith” that draws Jesus’ wrath.

129 Barrett (1978: 404) thinks that “apparently” this section was substituted for the Synoptic accounts of Jesus’ trial before the high priest, deeming it of “dubious historical value.” He says that the present unit serves to raise the “dramatic tension of the gospel to a climax which is resolved only in the passion narrative.” However, in light of the striking nature of the raising of Lazarus, it is entirely plausible historically that Jesus’ opponents would have convened a meeting to respond to the perceived and increasing threat that Jesus represented to their own status and position.

131 On the Pharisees, see commentary at 1:19, 24. On the chief priests and Pharisees, see commentary at 7:32. Ridderbos (1997: 407 n. 84) plausibly argues that the evangelist’s reference to the Pharisees as the key leaders of the people is a function not only of their influence in Jesus’ day but also of their significance in the post-temple period in which the evangelist wrote. Thus, “Their name was particularly useful to him as a general term for the Jewish authorities.” Carson (1991: 420), too, sees no hint of anachronism, pointing out also the Pharisees’ more direct access to the people. This stands in marked contrast to the provocative statement by Barrett (1978: 405) that if the evangelist conceived of the Pharisees as an official body, “he was ignorant of Judaism as it was before A.D. 70.” R. Brown (1966: 439) notes, “The reference to the Pharisees is more a question of simplification than of error.”

144 Barrett (1978: 407) observes, “Caiaphas was made an unconscious vehicle of truth.”

359n8, 360n9, 361n12, 363, 365, 365n30, 365n34, 369n11, 370, 371n19, 371n20, 372n23, 373, 373n28, 377n4, 377n6, 377n9, 378, 379n14, 379n15, 380, 381n22, 382n32,

156 Barrett (1978: 410) opts for the rendering “He will not come, will he?” The imperfect verb forms ἐζήτουν (ezētoun, they were looking) and ἔλεγον (elegon, they were saying) indicate the ongoing search for Jesus and his being the subject of discussion. The former term need not be understood negatively but reflects “curious looking about for Jesus” (Ridderbos 1997: 411–12).

8 The fronted ἐποίησαν (epoiēsan, they prepared) (which may be equivalent to a passive [so R. Brown 1966: 448]) is taken by some as indication of a very public occasion. If so, then the dinner may not have been prepared by Martha and her family and may not even have taken place at their house (Carson 1991: 428; Morris 1995: 511; contra Barrett 1978: 411; Moloney 1998: 356).

9 The vast majority of commentators holds that the dinner probably was eaten on Saturday at some point during the day, presumably in the evening. See Carson 1991: 427; Barrett 1978: 410; Morris 1995: 510 n. 10; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 208; R. Brown 1966: 447; Burge 2000: 337. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.366) says that the meal could have been on Sunday or possibly Saturday evening.

12 The meaning “genuine” or “pure” is supported by most commentators (e.g., Carson 1991: 428; Barrett 1978: 412; Beasley-Murray 1999: 204 n. b; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.367; Ridderbos 1997: 414). Michaels (1989: 217), on the other hand, thinks that “it may have been the trade name under which the product was marketed” (i.e., “pistic nard”).

30 Ἐγνώ (egnō, learned) is best understood as an ingressive aorist (Morris 1995: 517). Most commentators (rightly, in my opinion) hold that the term “Jews” is not used in a negative sense here (so, e.g., Carson 1991: 431; Barrett 1978: 415; R. Brown 1966: 456; contra Morris 1995: 517). See also the additional note on 12:9.

34 Contra Barrett (1978: 415 [cf. Morris 1995: 517]), who contends that the Jews mentioned here abandoned Judaism and aligned themselves with Christ.

11 Ridderbos (1997: 423 n. 137) says that “hosanna” literally means, “Please help!”; Carson (1991: 432) prefers the meaning “Give salvation now!” But probably Barrett (1978: 417–18) is correct that at the time of Christ, the phrase might have been no more than a “joyful shout of praise” as part of a “spontaneous ovation” (cf. Morris 1995: 516; R. Brown 1966: 457). Beasley-Murray (1999: 210) adds that it may have been a greeting as well.

19 See commentary at 1:49–51 and at 6:14–15 (where both terms, “the one who comes” and “king,” are used). Both Ridderbos (1997: 423) and Barrett (1978: 418) contend that by mounting the donkey, Jesus sought to correct the mistaken nationalism of the crowd (see also R. Brown 1966: 462; Witherington 1995: 221); though note Coakley (1995: 461–82), who contends that there is no evidence that the crowd understood at the time, so that, “if Jesus tried to make the crowd understand his actions in this way, he failed” (p. 463). Ridderbos (1997: 423) also points to the salvific context of Zech. 9 and notes that Jesus’ action was intended to convey the fact that the time of salvation described in Zechariah (and other relevant OT texts) had arrived.

20 The possible reference to Isa. 40:9 is noted by Carson (1991: 433); cf. Barrett 1978: 418; contra Morris 1995: 521 n. 48. R. Brown (1966: 458) points to Zeph. 3:16. This kind of conflation of quotations from the OT is not uncommon in the NT (e.g., Matt. 27:9–10; Mark 1:2–3).

23 Barrett (1978: 419) notes that it is unlikely that the crowds would have understood the implications of Jesus’ actions, when even his disciples did not.

28 Barrett (1978: 420) and, very tentatively, Morris (1995: 523) suggest that θεωρεῖτε (theōreite, see) is probably an indicative (rather than an imperative). Whitacre (1999: 308) notes that both verbs θεωρεῖτε and ὠφελεῖτε (ōpheleite, you accomplish) in 12:19 are in the second-person plural, suggesting that this captures “the mutual condemnation they are throwing at one another: ‘You guys see that you are doing no good.’ ”

4 Ridderbos (1997: 427 n. 154) notes that ἀναβαίνω (anabainō, go up) and προσκυνέω (proskyneō, worship) are often used with reference to pilgrims going to participate in cultic ceremonies. Barrett (1978: 421) suggests that the former expression may have a frequentative sense, indicating that these people regularly went up to these festivals.

6 See commentary at 7:35, the only other occurrence of the term in John’s Gospel. A look at the remaining NT references indicates that in virtually all instances the term is used in contrast with “Jews” (Ἰουδαῖοι, Ioudaioi; see Acts 14:1; 16:1; 18:4; 19:10, 17; 20:21; Rom. 1:16; 2:9, 10; 3:9; 10:12; 1 Cor. 1:22, 24; 10:32; 12:13; Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11). That the “Greeks” mentioned here were not Diaspora Jews (as Calvin [1961: 35] thought) is accepted by virtually all major commentators (e.g., Westcott [1908: 2.120], who likens these to the Gentile magi at the beginning of Matthew’s Gospel; Ridderbos 1997: 427; Carson 1991: 436; Barrett 1978: 421; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.381; Witherington 1995: 223; Moloney 1998: 351; Burge 2000: 342).

9 The address κύριε (kyrie) is best rendered “sir” (Carson 1991: 437; Barrett 1978: 422). The verb ἰδεῖν (idein) here means “to visit with, to meet” (R. Brown 1966: 466) or “to have an interview with” (Carson 1991: 437; Barrett 1978: 422). Stibbe (1993: 136) contends that “the use of the verb ‘see’ points to the depth of their [the ‘Greeks’] seeking.” Moloney (1998: 352, 359) lists numerous instances in this Gospel where that verb is used with reference to “the acceptance or the refusal of Jesus’ role as the revealer.”

14 Barrett (1978: 424) notes that εἰς (eis) in 12:25 has connotations of “with a view to” as well as “for the purpose of.”

15 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 439; cf. Barrett 1978: 424; Beasley-Murray 1999: 211; R. Brown 1966: 467; Burge 2000: 344 n. 19. See Gen. 29:31, 33; Deut. 21:15; Matt. 6:24 par.; compare Luke 14:26 with Matt. 10:37.

22 Commentators almost universally consider the present pericope to be the Johannine equivalent to the Synoptic account of Gethsemane (e.g., Morris 1995: 529; Barrett 1978: 424; R. Brown 1966: 475–76; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.386), though Ridderbos (1997: 435–36, pointing to Ps. 6) and Carson (1991: 440) rightly reject the notion that the Fourth Evangelist has simply refashioned the Synoptic Gethsemane scene to suit his purposes.

32 “Since the death of the last prophets, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, the Holy Spirit [of prophetic inspiration] departed from Israel; yet they were still able to avail themselves of the bath qol” (b. Sanh. 11a; cf. t. Soṭah 13.3; see Barrett 1970: 39–40; Dalman 1902: 204–5).

35 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.390) here sees Jesus commenting on people’s incomprehension and urging them to believe. Ridderbos (1997: 437), on the other hand, argues that Jesus refers to the sound of the voice, not the words, maintaining that Jesus “is not holding the crowd answerable for what it could not understand.” Neither Barrett (1978: 426) nor R. Brown (1966: 477) seems able to reconcile the apparent tension in the voice being for the crowd yet unintelligible to the crowd. Carson (1991: 442) offers four points, most importantly that even if the crowd had not understood the voice, the voice itself should be a signal of divine activity.

7 For a helpful comparison and brief discussion of the MT, LXX, and Johannine forms of Isa.

6:10, see R. Brown 1966: 486. The Hebrew original moves from heart to ears to eyes and then back from sight to hearing to understanding. John does not refer to hearing but instead focuses on sight, probably owing to his mention of Jesus' signs in 12:37 (Carson 1991: 449; cf. Barrett 1978: 431). Keener (2003: 833) detects verbal ties between the quote of Isa. 6:9–10 (John 12:40) and John 9:39–41 (blindness) and 4:47; 5:13 (healing). The Jews considered the heart to be the seat of mental as well as physical life (cf. Mark 8:17–21).

13 Barrett (1978: 433) aptly notes that these individuals allowed “the decision of faith to be affected by a desire for personal security,” yet that “the desire for the praise of men is a form of idolatry.”

1 Cf. “six days before the Passover” in 12:1; “the next day” in 12:12. Carson (1991: 455–58) rightly concludes that Jesus and his disciples ate a true paschal meal on Thursday, 15 Nisan (contra Barrett 1978: 50–51; R. Brown 1970: 556; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.36). On the chronology of the passion narrative in John and the Synoptics (siding with Carson, despite Morris 1995: 688–90), see the sidebar in Köstenberger 1999a: 146, with further bibliographical references (see also Köstenberger 2002c: 130, 164, 173; Blomberg 1987: 175–80; Carson 1984: 530–32). Some seek to adjudicate apparent differences between the presentations in John and the Synoptics by the theory that differences in chronology are due to the use of different calendars. John, it is suggested, like the Judeans and the Sadducees, uses a lunar sunset-to-sunset calendar, while the Synoptics, like the Galileans, the Pharisees, and Jesus and his followers, employ a solar sunrise-to-sunrise reckoning (Hoehner 1977: 85–90; see chart on p. 89; Morris 1995: 684–95); or, John's calendric usage shifts: his light-darkness theme (rooted in the Genesis account) is conveyed by way of a solar calendar, while elsewhere a lunar system is found (building on exodus redemptive motifs) (Busada 2003). However, these theories seem to lack a clear textual base in the Gospels themselves and are unnecessarily complicated if the solution argued here is adopted.

7 This is favored by Morris (1995: 545 n. 9) and Ridderbos (1997: 452); cf. Barrett 1978: 438; R. Brown 1970: 550. Carson (1991: 461), at least explicitly, remains undecided, though his translation reflects an intensive force.

42 This is noted by Morris (1995: 551), who says that the reversal “may be significant.” R. Brown (1970: 553) theorizes that “the order in which the two titles are mentioned may reflect the development of the disciples' understanding, for 'Teacher' is more common in the earlier chapters of the Gospel and 'Lord' in the later chapters.” Morris (1995: 551 n. 34, citing BDF §147 [cf. Barrett 1978: 443; Beasley-Murray 1999: 229 n. g]) says that the nominative ὁ διδάσκαλος καὶ κύριος “is equivalent to a vocative,” though the phrase clearly functions as an apposition to ἐγώ in the present context.

48 Cf. Matt. 10:24; Luke 6:40 (cf. 22:27). Jesus refers back to this saying in John 15:20. “Aphoristic parenthesis” is the term used by Carson (1991: 469); cf. Barrett 1978: 444; Beasley-Murray 1999: 236.

52 So Morris 1995: 549 n. 27; apparently, Carson 1991: 464–66; and the UBS committee (Metzger 1994: 204), adducing the “preponderant weight of external attestation”; contra Barrett 1978: 442; Beasley-Murray 1999: 229 n. f; Lindars 1972: 451; D. M. Smith 1999: 254; Dunn 1970: 250–51.

6 Ridderbos (1997: 467) notes that at the outset, 13:20 does not seem to fit the apologetic thrust of 13:18–19. Barrett (1978: 445) observes the rapidly oscillating movement of thought between the intimate union sustained by Jesus with his disciples and the prediction of Judas's betrayal. 12 Barrett (1978: 446) maintains that "the specially favoured disciple is represented as standing in the same relation to Christ as Christ to the Father" (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 238). Morris (1995: 555 n. 53) argues that Barrett goes too far and that there is only "a tender regard" between Jesus and the "disciple he loved." Indeed, Barrett's statement seems somewhat hyperbolic, though Morris's reaction leads him to a wording that appears unduly minimalistic. The verbal allusion does suggest that an analogy is intended with regard to intimacy of relationship, without implying that the beloved disciple's relationship with Jesus is identical to Jesus' relationship with the Father in every respect.

18 Carson (1991: 474) suggests that "the momentous nature of Jesus' confidence left him temporarily paralysed." Barrett (1978: 447) says that the disciple's "inactivity is incomprehensible." Morris (1995: 558) thinks that the disciple "did not grasp the significance of the sop," an option sharply rejected by Barrett (1978: 447), who objects that "to say that he failed to grasp the meaning of the sign is to make him an imbecile."

21 The present verb ποιεῖς (poieis, you are doing) is conative (Wallace 1996: 535), denoting an action not yet begun but about to be attempted. Carson (1991: 475) and Morris (1995: 557 n. 63; cf. Barrett 1978: 448) suggest that τάχιον (tachion, quickly) should be construed as a genuine comparative and rendered "more quickly" (than Judas had planned). This would be in keeping with the way the comparative form of this word is used in its only other Johannine reference (20:4), though in its other two NT instances the form is simply elative, to be rendered "soon" or "quickly" (Heb. 13:19, 23). Hence, caution seems to be called for in drawing conclusions from the comparative form of the term in the present passage.

65 As Carson (1991: 498, citing Barrett 1978: 461) notes, the conditional clause of 14:15 controls the grammar of the next two verses and the thought of the next six. The condition is third class, with no assumption made as to its veracity.

73 Though, as Moloney (1998: 407) points out, there are differences between Jesus and the Spirit as well: the latter neither becomes flesh nor dies for our sins. Alternatively, the statement refers to Jesus' postresurrection appearances to his followers (so Ridderbos 1997: 505; Carson 1991: 501; Morris 1995: 578–59; Beasley-Murray 1999: 258; Borchert 2002: 126). Barrett (1978: 464) says that the passage refers neither to Jesus coming in the person of the Holy Spirit nor to the parousia but rather is using language appropriate to both the resurrection and the parousia to refer to both.

79 Plato wrote regarding the followers of Socrates that in the face of their teacher's imminent death, "they felt that he was like a father to us and that when bereft of him we should pass the rest of our lives as orphans" (Phaedrus 65). A similar phrase is also found in Lucian, De mort. Peregrini 6. See Barrett 1978: 463.

80 See Morris (1995: 579), who says that "if this is accepted it must be in the sense of 20:22, where the Spirit was in some sense given on the day of resurrection"; and Bruce (1983: 303), who points out that the resurrection appearances were but brief and temporary. See also Barrett (1978: 464), who maintains that the primary reference is to the resurrection but the expression also extends to the presence of Christ in his disciples (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 258). In the patristic period, the Eastern church fathers understood the phrase "in a little while" to refer to the resurrection, while the Latin church thought that Jesus meant the parousia. Bultmann (1971: 619) contends that John's source referred to the latter, with the evangelist demythologizing his source by reinterpreting it as the former. Hence, the second coming is swallowed up in Easter. However, this reconstruction is predicated upon Bultmann's source theory regarding John's Gospel as well as upon his existential approach to interpretation, including the categories of "myth" and "demythologization." Yet note how even after his resurrection, Jesus refers to a future time at which he will return (21:22, 23). Moloney (1998: 403) implausibly contends that "that day" is Jesus' hour and departure.

91 The vast majority of commentators (including R. Brown, Barrett, Borchert, Morris, Carson, and Ridderbos) believe that teaching and reminding are in synonymous parallelism. On the Spirit's teaching ministry, see the parallel in 16:13. Both verses together (14:26 and 16:13) echo Ps. 25:5 (cf. 25:9). See also Neh. 9:20 (cf. 1 John 2:20, 27). Regarding Jesus' teaching, see John 6:59; 7:14, 28, 35; 8:20; 18:20. It is often argued that the use of the Greek masculine pronoun ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, he) for the Spirit in passages such as John 14:26; 15:26; and 16:13–14 affirms the personality of the Holy Spirit (Barrett 1978: 482; Borchert 2002: 159; Morris 1995: 583 n. 73 [citing Westcott]; 606 n. 64; 621 n. 27; and others cited in Wallace 1996: 331 n. 42). However, the most likely reason for John's use of the masculine pronoun in these passages is that the antecedent is the masculine noun ὁ παράκλητος (ho paraklētos, the helping presence). If so, John's use of a masculine pronoun to refer to the Spirit is best explained as a function of grammar rather than theology, and arguments for the personality of the Holy Spirit must be made on other grounds (so rightly Wallace 1996: 331–32, who points out that it is difficult to find any text where the neuter noun πνεῦμα [pneuma, spirit/Spirit] is grammatically referred to by the masculine).

106 Barrett (1978: 457) agrees that treating the sentence as a statement "does not seem to make good sense" but construes "and if it had not been so I would have told you" as a parenthesis in a sentence that otherwise reads, "There will be many abiding-places, for I am going to prepare a place for you" (see also Morris 1995: 568). But it is hard to see how this makes any better sense than the option Barrett rejects.

9 See Barrett 1978: 472. The term ἄμπελος (ampelos, vine) occurs elsewhere in the NT only in Matt. 26:29 pars.; James 3:12; Rev. 14:18–19. References to vines and vineyards occur frequently in Synoptic parables (Matt. 20:1–16; 21:28–32; 21:33–44 pars.; Luke 13:6–9).

11 Some interpreters (e.g., Barrett 1978: 473; Carson 1991: 514; Witherington 1995: 258) view the depiction of the Son as the vine and the Father as the vinedresser in terms of the Son's subordination to the Father. Indeed, this seems to be the implication in the present allegory, though it is not at the front of the message. Borchert (2002: 140) affirms the functional, though not essential, subordination of the Son to the Father.

18 Contra Barrett (1978: 473 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 675]), who believes that the reference is to apostate Christians, perhaps with unfruitful Jews in the background as well. But see Carson (1991: 515), who rightly notes that in John, true disciples by definition persevere (6:37–40; 10:28), while on the other hand, the NT as a whole acknowledges the existence of those who sustain some type of connection with Jesus but who nonetheless end up failing to exemplify the perseverance that would mark them as truly transformed, spiritually reborn individuals (e.g., 8:31–59; 1 John 2:19; 2 John 9; Matt. 13:18–23; 24:12).

24 See Barrett 1978: 474; R. Brown 1970: 678. Contra commentators who view the statement in 15:4a as merely entailing a comparison (e.g., Bultmann 1971: 536).

39 The theme of joy is also found elsewhere in John, in the illustration of the woman giving birth in 16:20–24 and in 17:13 (cf. 1 John 1:4; 2 John 12; see Barrett 1978: 476; R. Brown 1970: 681). The noun χάρα (chara, joy) occurs nine times in this Gospel (all but one of the references are in the farewell discourse), more than in any other NT writing (the verb χαίρω [chairō, rejoice] occurs nine times in John's Gospel as well). Similar to Jesus, Paul later expressed the hope that his joy might also be the joy of his followers (2 Cor. 2:3; cf. Phil. 2:2). As in the case of love, John's treatment of joy is remarkably restrained in comparison with other writings such as the Odes of Solomon (e.g., 15:1; 23:1; 31:3, 6; 40:4).

47 That is, for those he loves (Carson 1991: 521; R. Brown 1970: 664; Barrett 1978: 477; Witherington 1995: 259; Borchert 2002: 149). See 10:11, 15, 17–18; 1 John 3:16; cf. Rom. 5:6–8. The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) in the present verse is epexegetical (R. Brown 1970: 664).

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for “love” is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo's (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as “my friend” (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

57 See Borchert 2002: 150; Carson 1991: 523; and Calvin (1961: 101), who notes that this “is as good as saying that they did not obtain by their own skill or industry whatever they have.” The pronoun ἐγώ (egō, I) is emphatic (Barrett 1978: 478); the conjunction ἀλλά (alla, but) is strongly adversative and stresses the contrast between Jesus choosing his disciples and the contemporary practice of disciples choosing to attach themselves to a particular rabbi.

59 See the discussions in Ridderbos 1997: 522 (greater emphasis on fruitbearing, but missionary activity is part of it); Barrett 1978: 478 (reference to apostles' mission to the world); and Schnackenburg 1990: 3.112 (leans against reference to missionary activity).

60 There is some debate as to whether the two ἵνα-clauses in 15:16 are coordinate (Ridderbos 1997: 521 n. 132; Barrett 1978: 478) or subordinate (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.112). The former seems more likely.

2 Keener (2003: 1019) finds another micro-chiasm in 15:18–25, with 15:20ab (a servant is not greater than his master) at the center. The six conditional clauses in 15:18–24 represent warnings pertaining to the future (or present) of the Christian community in relation to the world. Such parting exhortations are a common feature of farewell discourses (Moloney 1998: 433). The present condition is second class: “If the world hates you—and it does” (Wallace 1996: 696; Borchert 2002: 154). On the “world,” see commentary at 1:9; the same phrase occurs in 1 John 3:13 (see also John 17:14). On the contrast between “above” and “below,” see 3:31; 8:23 (cf. 18:36–37). The form γινώσκετε (ginōskete, you know) can be read as an imperative (NIV; NRSV; NLT; ISV; ESV; HCSB; TNIV; Barrett 1978: 480) or an indicative (NASB; KJV), though admittedly the difference is marginal (R. Brown 1970: 686). The pronoun με is emphatic (Morris 1995: 602 n. 42). The perfect verb form μεμίσηκεν (memisēken, it hated) stresses the settled, completed state of the world's hatred toward Jesus (Barrett 1978: 480; R. Brown 1970: 686; Morris 1995: 602 n. 44).

4 Ridderbos (1997: 524) and Barrett (1978: 480) note the formal contradiction between Jesus' statement that he no longer calls his followers “servants” in 15:15 and his application of the saying quoted in 15:20 to the disciples. Both conclude that there is no actual contradiction here.

6 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 525–26, with reference to 17:20, the NIV, and many major commentators (e.g., Barrett 1978: 480; Bultmann 1971: 549; Lindars 1970: 494; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.115; Bruce 1980: 313; contra Borchert 2002: 156; Dodd 1963: 409; R. Brown 1970: 687; and the NLT). See the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 275; Carson 1991: 525–26.

11 The finality of the sin of the world’s unbelief in Jesus is stressed also by Barrett (1978: 481, citing 16:9) and Bultmann (1971: 550).

13 The implied object of “seen” is Jesus’ works (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.116; Barrett 1978: 481; R. Brown 1970: 688).

16 So Ridderbos 1997: 525; R. Brown 1970: 688; Morris 1995: 605; Barrett 1978: 482; Carson 1991: 527 n. 2.

18 So Ridderbos 1997: 525–26; Barrett 1978: 482; Carson 1991: 527; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276; contra Moloney (1998: 434), who contends that “most” favor Ps. 35. Cf. the citation of Ps. 69:9 in John 2:17. See also Ps. 119:161. Extrabiblical parallels include Ps. Sol. 7:1; b. Yoma 9b (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 147; cf. Barrett 1978: 482; R. Brown 1970: 689).

19 Regarding the phrase “whom I will send to you,” see 14:16, 26 (where the Son is said to be the sender of the Paraclete) and 16:7. “Whom I will send from the Father” and “who proceeds from the Father” are parallel (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.118; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276). Carson (1991: 528–29) rightly notes that what is in view is not ontological procession, but the mission of the Spirit is parallel to the mission of the Son (cf. Barrett 1978: 482). On “the Spirit of truth,” see commentary at 14:17 (see also 16:13; 1 John 4:6).

30 See Carson 1991: 530; Barrett 1978: 484. Though note the lack of the article in the present instance (Morris 1995: 615 n. 4). The same phrase, ὥρα ἔρχεται (hōra erchetai, a time, hour is coming), occurs in John also in 4:21, 23; 5:25, 28; 16:25, 32.

32 See the use of λατρεία (latreia, service, worship) with reference to Jewish worship in Rom. 9:4; Heb. 9:1, 6. On Roman persecution, see Sordi 1994. The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) is explanatory (Barrett 1978: 484).

60 See, for example, 1:47–48; 2:24–25; 4:17–18; 6:61, 64. See Barrett 1978: 492.

68 Morris (1995: 628) notes the present tense of the imperative αἰτεῖτε (aiteite, ask) in 16:24, conveying the continual nature of the asking. Note also the presence of two different words for “ask,” ἐρωτάω (erōtaō) in 16:23 and αἰτέω (aiteō) three times in 16:23–24, whereby the former refers to the barrage of questions that the disciples had for Jesus prior to the crucifixion (cf. 16:5, 30), and the latter to prayer requests subsequent to his exaltation (see Carson 1991: 545, apparently dependent on Barrett 1978: 494; contra Borchert 2002: 176).

69 So Carson 1991: 546; Barrett 1978: 495; R. Brown 1970: 735; Beasley-Murray 1999: 286; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.161.

72 Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25; 1 John 2:1; cf. John 14:16; 17:9, 15, 20. See Carson 1991: 547; Ridderbos 1997: 543; Morris 1995: 629; Barrett 1978: 496.

76 Carson (1991: 548) notes how 16:28 sums up Jesus’ entire mission, from his sending from the Father (3:16–17) through the incarnation (1:10–11, 14) to his departure from the world (14:19) and his return to the Father (the dominant theme of chs. 14–17). Similarly, Borchert 2002: 179. Barrett (1978: 496) even calls the verse “a complete summary . . . of the Christian faith,” Beasley-Murray (1999: 287) “at once a summary of Johannine Christology and the heart of this Gospel” (combined by Burge 2000: 443), and Stibbe (1996: 174) “the parade example of this theme of the eternal origin and destiny of Jesus the Messiah.”

1 The prayer is often called Jesus’ “high-priestly prayer” (a designation reaching back at least as far as the sixteenth century), though this label hardly fits with Johannine thought, which does not picture Jesus as a high priest (Ridderbos 1997: 546; Carson 1991: 552–53; though see commentary at 17:19 below). Westcott’s and E. C. Hoskyns’s title “prayer of consecration,” though not without merit (see below), fails to encompass the contents of the entire prayer (Carson 1991: 553; Barrett 1978: 500). Hence, commentators now frequently opt for more generic titles of the present prayer, such as “The Farewell Prayer” (Ridderbos) or “The Prayer of Jesus” (Carson). Witherington (1995: 266) calls it “The Sage’s Prayer,” based on his view that the Fourth Evangelist portrays Jesus as a sage.

10 Contra those who, like Barrett, consider the entire prayer to be a creation of the Fourth Evangelist, “the greatest theologian in all the history of the church” (cited in Hunter 1979: 285). Lindars (1971: 77), too, thinks that the concern for unity pervading the prayer is “nothing else than the deepest expression of John’s own personal experience” (cited in Hunter 1979: 302 n. 320). But see Hunter (1979), who argues that the prayer, including the “concept of the preexistent Son,” is firmly rooted in “Jesus’ own consciousness” (p. 301); and Agourides (1968: 138–39), who likewise contends that “no one can deny that what we really have is the formulation of the words, deeds, self-consciousness and evaluation of the work of Jesus by Himself” (p. 139; note also: “the Evangelist’s recollections of an essential historic truth about Jesus’ concern for the circle of His disciples before the Passion” [p. 141]).

19 The explanatory phrase “now this is” is in keeping with Johannine style (cf., e.g., 3:19: “this is the verdict”). The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) here, in typical Johannine idiom, is appositional (Wallace 1996: 475). Morris (1995: 638) notes that ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) here precedes the noun (elsewhere in John also in 4:23), and he proposes that this indicates emphasis. The verse is regularly seen by critical scholars as a Johannine insertion (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 741; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.172; Barrett 1978: 503; but see Carson 1991: 556; Ridderbos 1997: 549).

21 Carson (1991: 556) writes, “Knowledge of God and of Jesus Christ entails fellowship, trust, personal relationship, faith.” Similarly, Barrett (1978: 504) comments, “Saving knowledge is rooted in knowledge of a historical person; it is therefore objective and at the same time a personal relation.” This is in keeping with the Hebrew use of the term “to know,” which encompasses even the most intimate human relationship, sexual intercourse. Thus, Gen. 4:1 LXX says that Adam “knew” (ἐγνων, egnō) his wife, Eve, and she became pregnant and gave birth to her son.

40 As Carson (1991: 559) rightly points out, the point of comparison here is not between the disciples’ faith before and after the resurrection but between the disciples’ faith and the world’s unbelief prior to the resurrection. Barrett (1978: 505) thinks that hindsight has shaded the presentation of the disciples’ faith in the present passage.

46 Carson (1991: 561) rightly notes that not only does the present address combine the notions of transcendence (holy) and familial intimacy (Father), but also it provides the foundation on the basis of which the Son and believers are consecrated for service (see 17:17–19; see Barrett 1978: 507).

53 Barrett (1978: 508) seems to go further, apparently suggesting that the Fourth Evangelist identified Judas and the antichrist. Note also Moloney’s (1998: 467) startling assertion that what happened through “the son of perdition is beyond the control of Jesus.” How does that cohere with the immediately ensuing assertion that Judas's betrayal occurred in fulfillment of Scripture? 60 Barrett (1978: 510) rightly contends that "truth" here "means the saving truth revealed in the teaching and activity of Jesus." Earlier references to the word in this chapter are 17:6 and 17:14 (see also 17:20, and 14:23–24; 15:3, 20, earlier in the farewell discourse). The present phrase is similar to Ps. 119:142: "Your law is true" (cf. 119:151, 160). David likewise acknowledged, "Your words are trustworthy" (2 Sam. 7:28; cf. Ps. 19:7). D. M. Smith (1999: 315) perceptively observes that the reference to God's word here seems sudden, since according to the prologue it is Jesus who is the Word. As Smith duly notes, however, the difficulty is alleviated by the fact that "after Jesus is named (1:17), he is never again called the Word in the Gospel."

71 The notion of being "in Christ" is found elsewhere in the NT especially in Paul's writings (e.g., Rom. 8:10; 2 Cor. 13:5; Gal. 2:20; 4:19), though it is not unknown to other NT authors, such as Peter (cf. 1 Pet. 5:14). Barrett (1978: 512) believes that the final phrase of 17:21 implies universalism, though this is arguably not the case. The statement speaks to Jesus' desire rather than to his actual expectation.

86 Beasley-Murray (1999: 293 n. k [contra Barrett 1978: 515]), following J. N. Sanders, suggests "that the καὶ ... δὲ construction has been combined with the καὶ ... καὶ construction used to introduce a contrast, so giving the sequence καὶ ... δὲ ... καὶ ... , which should be rendered, 'although ... yet ... and ...' " (all accents contextual).

3 So Carson 1991: 576; Barrett 1978: 517; Beasley-Murray 1999: 321.

5 Morris (1995: 655) suggests that ἐξῆλθεν (exēlthen, they left) means they "went out of the house" (cf. Barrett 1978: 517). Carson (1991: 576) proposes that it means they left the city (cf. Bultmann 1971: 638).

11 The participle λαβών (labōn) here has the sense of "leading" rather than "taking" (Carson 1991: 577; Barrett 1978: 518).

29 As Barrett (1978: 521) notes, by failing to mention the disciples' flight (cf. Mark 14:50), John presents them in more sympathetic terms than do the Synoptists.

6 Though Annas is also mentioned by Luke (Luke 3:2; Acts 4:6). On the historical plausibility of such a trial, see Ridderbos 1997: 579–80. See also the excursus on the political and judicial situation in Israel during the time of Jesus in Borchert 2002: 224–26 and the chart showing the relationship of the four Gospels to one another concerning Jesus before the Jewish authorities in R. Brown 1970: 830–31. John 18:12a–b can be construed either with 18:1–11 (Beasley-Murray 1999: 324; Moloney 1998: 486; Barrett 1978: 523) or with 18:12c–14 (so Ridderbos 1997: 578; Morris 1995: 664; R. Brown 1970: 819).

16 So Morris 1995: 665–66 n. 35, citing Dodd; Carson 1991: 581; Barrett 1978: 526; but see Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 3. The term is used for a "close friend" in the LXX (e.g., 2 Kings 10:11; Ps. 54:14 [55:13 Eng.]; cf. Luke 2:44; see also NewDocs 4.44; Homer, Iliad 15.350).

24 Among those viewing the present hearing in more unofficial terms are Carson (1991: 584), Ridderbos (1997: 582), and R. Brown (1970: 826). Most other major commentators consider this to be an official trial (e.g., Morris, Barrett). On the Sadducees' reputation for judging in general, Josephus writes that "the school of the Sadducees ... are indeed more heartless than any of the other Jews ... when they sit in judgment" (Ant. 20.9.1 §199).

41 Though note that in the third instance Peter's exact words are not cited (Morris 1995: 673). Barrett (1978: 529) considers John's "abrupt ending" even more effective than Mark's presentation.

1 R. Brown (1970: 861) comments, “With all its drama and its theology, John’s account of the trial is the most consistent and intelligible we have.” Further positive evaluations of John’s historicity are offered by Ridderbos (1997: 587–88) and by Carson (1991: 587), who suggests as possible Johannine sources Jesus after the resurrection, court attendants who later became believers, or possibly some public court records. Barrett (1978: 530) believes that most of the material is based on the Markan passion narrative.

21 Barrett 1978: 533–35; Morris 1995: 695–97; Hengel 1999: 330; Winter 1974. See especially the references in Josephus (J.W. 2.8.1 §117; Ant. 20.9.1 §§197–203 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 164]). Cf. the acknowledgment in talmudic literature that the Jews had lost this power “forty years” before the destruction of Jerusalem (y. Sanh. 1.1; 7.2; on “forty years,” see commentary at 18:24 above; loss of this power may have occurred as early as A.D. 6; see also Legasse 1997: 54–56).

63 “We have a law” may refer to Lev. 24:16: “Anyone who blasphemes the name of the Lord must be put to death” (Carson 1991: 599; Barrett 1978: 541; Ridderbos 1997: 602).

65 Similarly most translations (including the TNIV, NASB, NLT, NKJV); alternatively, the meaning is “very afraid,” since there is no previous reference to Pilate being afraid (see Carson 1991: 600; Morris 1995: 704; Barrett 1978: 542; Conway 1999: 159).

72 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 601; cf. Morris 1995: 705; Beasley-Murray 1999: 340; Burge 2000: 505; Borchert 2002: 254. Contra Barrett (1978: 543), who thinks that the singular participle constructed from the verb παραδίδωμι (paradidōmi, I hand over) suggests Judas. See also the discussions by Schnackenburg (1990: 3.261–63) and Ridderbos (1997: 603), both of whom ultimately point to the Jews as the most likely referent. Stibbe (1992: 170) concludes that “the one” in 19:11 probably refers to Caiaphas as a representative of the Jewish nation, as the evangelist has a propensity to implicate the Jews in Jesus’ death.

78 The verb ἐκάθισεν (ekathisen, he sat) is intransitive, with Pilate, not Jesus, being the one sitting down (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 605; Carson 1991: 608; Morris 1995: 707 n. 31). Barrett (1978: 544) thinks that this is an instance of Johannine double meaning, though, as R. Brown (1970: 881) rightly objects, “the phenomenon [of double meaning] has not been based on syntactical ambiguity, nor is it usual for the second meaning to be opposite of the first.”

84 So, correctly, the NIV; see also Carson 1991: 604; contra Barrett 1978: 545; R. Brown 1970: 882–83, 895. Also contra those who, like Morris (1995: 684–95, esp. 604–95), contend that Jesus and the temple authorities followed different calendars, with the Synoptics using Jesus’ calendar (according to which the meal was the Passover) and John using that of the temple authorities (according to whom the sacrificial animals were slain the following day; hence, Jesus was sacrificed as our Passover).

86 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 605. Unlikely proposals are those of Barrett (1978: 545), who suggests that confusion of the Greek numerals for 3 and 6 may have led to the apparent discrepancies; and Witherington (1995: 294), who believes “that a Roman form of reckoning is being used, in which case the sixth hour is near dawn, at six in the morning.”

1 For discussions of this passage’s relationship to the Synoptics, see Barrett 1978: 546–48 (on the assumption of John’s use of Mark and the superiority of Markan material); Beasley-Murray 1999: 343–44; Bultmann 1971: 667; R. Brown 1970: 913–16. R. Brown (1970: 910–12) divides 19:16b–42 into five chiastically arranged episodes plus introduction and conclusion; Moloney

(1998: 502, following Donald Senior) sees the five scenes but not the chiasm (see also Moloney's literary analysis of John 18–19 on pp. 511–12).

4 This most likely is to describe the custom that called for those who were to be crucified to carry their own cross (see the primary references cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 174–75; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 608 n. 128; Beasley-Murray 1999: 345). “By himself” is probably more accurate than the TNIV's “carrying his own cross.” Note also the emphatic position of ἐαυτῷ (Barrett 1978: 548).

6 So, with a variety of nuances, Witherington 1995: 308; R. Brown 1970: 917; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270; and Moloney 1998: 502, 506. Carson (1991: 609), who says that the omission is due to John's desire to further highlight Jesus' willing obedience to the Father, dismisses as unduly speculative the view that the omission is part of a polemic against the theory that Simon of Cyrene was himself crucified (contra Beasley-Murray 1999: 345). Barrett (1978: 548) proposes that the omission is due to the evangelist's effort to highlight the “all-sufficiency of Jesus ... in effecting the redemption of the world.” Beasley-Murray (1999: 345 [cf. Borchert 2002: 261; R. Brown 1970: 917–18; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270]) suggests that the omission serves to create an allusion to Isaac carrying the wood for his sacrifice.

20 Cf. the causative use of “flogged” in 19:1. So the majority of commentators, including R. Brown 1970: 901; Carson 1991: 610; Morris 1995: 713; Barrett 1978: 549 (but see Borchert 2002: 265). See also commentary at 19:40.

22 Bultmann (1971: 669) suggests that the title serves as a universal judgment of Judaism and the world, which have rejected their Savior; Barrett (1978: 549) notes that the title is symbolic of the world's universal condemnation of Jesus.

28 “Do not write” in 19:21 somewhat unexpectedly involves a present-tense verb (γράφε, graphe). Wallace (1996: 487–88) classifies the form as an imperative of entreaty. Barrett (1978: 549, following N. Turner 1963) proposes the translation “Alter what you have written” (i.e., “Do not go on writing [what you have written]”; cf. R. Brown 1970: 902).

31 If a later collection of Roman law also reflects earlier practice, then the soldiers were to take Jesus' clothes into custody but not necessarily keep them for themselves. See Justinian, Digesta 48.20 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; contra Barrett 1978: 550).

35 The general conclusion of commentators is that the reference to the “seamless robe” may not necessarily have theological significance (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 610 n. 136; cf. Morris 1995: 715, esp. n. 56; Bultmann 1971: 671). Both Witherington (1995: 309) and R. Brown (1970: 920–22) note several possibilities yet caution against dogmatic conclusions (see also Carson 1991: 614). Barrett (1978: 550) sees an allusion to Jesus' death resulting in “the scattered children of God.”

38 There is no agreement, however, on the exact way in which soldiers and bystanders are related by the evangelist. Ridderbos (1997: 610 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 903]) thinks that there is no implied contrast between these two groups. Other commentators believe that the construction does imply such a contrast (e.g., Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.273, 276). If a contrast is intended, it is hardly a sharp one; more likely, the two groups are distinguished as the narrative moves from one to the other.

41 The historicity of 19:25 is buttressed by several factors (Carson 1991: 615; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 349; Witherington 1995: 309; contra Barrett 1978: 551–52): (1) the Roman soldiers most likely would not have cared to remove women from the vicinity of the cross; (2)

Jesus' disciples would not have been seen as a threat by the Roman administration; (3) the fact that the sign affixed to the cross was intended to be read, and in fact was read (19:20), by many implies that people could get close enough to the cross to read it; (4) the Gospels record as many as seven statements by Jesus on the cross, suggesting that people were close enough to hear him speak.

43 So also the vast majority of commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Morris 1995: 716–17; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Bultmann 1971: 672; Borchert 2002: 268; R. Brown 1970: 904; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.276. Ridderbos (1997: 611 n. 142) notes that in light of Mark 15:40 and Matt. 27:56, there could have been other women there as well. See also Luke 23:49.

44 See Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 616; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Burge 2000: 528; contra Barrett 1978: 551–52; Bultmann 1971: 672 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.277. Carson (1991: 616 [cf. Morris 1995: 717]) notes that, like Jesus' mother's sister, Jesus' mother is also unnamed here and elsewhere in the Gospel (as is the “disciple Jesus loved” in 19:26–27).

52 The verb used here for “fulfill” is τελειόω (teleioō) rather than πληρόω (plēroō), perhaps to connect it with the cognate form τελέω in the previous clause and in 19:30 (Carson 1991: 620; Barrett 1978: 553).

53 The vast majority of commentators connect the reference to Scripture being fulfilled with Jesus' statement (e.g., Carson 1991: 619; Barrett 1978: 553; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; though Morris [1995: 719] seems to suggest that it might be deliberately ambiguous). Contra R. Brown (1970: 908), who seems to prefer linking Jesus' statement with his words to Mary and the beloved disciple.

54 So Ridderbos 1997: 616; Carson 1991: 619; Barrett 1978: 553; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; Schlatter 1948: 351. Psalm 69:21 is also cited in the Qumran hymn 1QH 12:11. Another relevant passage is Ps. 22:15 (Schlatter 1948: 351; Kruse 2003: 369). The suggestion that Jesus here refers back to his statement in 18:11 is improbable (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 617; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; R. Brown 1970: 930).

61 So the vast majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 618; Carson 1991: 622; Barrett 1978: 555; Morris 1995: 730; Bultmann 1971: 676). Contra Borchert (2002: 273 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 933]), who seems to suggest that Jesus died on Nisan 14 and thus was being portrayed as the Passover lamb.

67 See Lev. Rab. 15.2 on Lev. 13:2. Commentators disagree as to whether or not the present reference is intended to counter incipient Docetism, which denied Jesus' full humanity at his death. Some consider this unlikely (Ridderbos [1997: 620], who thinks that the present passage is simply designed to further support the reliability and eyewitness nature of the account; R. Brown 1970: 949–52), while a majority favors such a polemic purpose (e.g., Carson [1991: 623], who sees this verse as the “counterpoint” to 1:14; Barrett 1978: 556; Morris 1995: 724; Beasley-Murray 1999: 356; Borchert 2002: 276–77; Burge 2000: 532).

68 Homeric mythology held that the gods were bloodless and had a kind of blood-water flowing through their veins (Iliad 5.339–42; cf. Plutarch, Moralia 180E). Stibbe (1992: 118, with reference to Barrett) sees in the flow of blood and water “the paradoxical association of life-giving properties with a dead man's body.” Less likely is Whitacre's (1999: 466) “sacramental” interpretation of blood and water symbolizing the Eucharist and baptism.

75 So R. Brown 1970: 952–53; Moloney 1998: 509. Beasley-Murray (1999: 355) suggests that the source of the Fourth Gospel was alluding to Passover typology, while the evangelist is alluding to the righteous sufferer of Ps. 34. Somewhat ironically, Barrett (1978: 558) proposes the exact converse: the source is alluding to the Psalms typology, while the evangelist is alluding to Passover typology. Ridderbos (1997: 622–23) opts for the Psalms typology but denies the Passover allusion.

86 So Carson 1991: 631; Barrett 1978: 560. Cf. 18:1: “olive grove.” Note also the later mention of a gardener in 20:15.

2 Cf. Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; cf. 1 Cor. 15:4; see Carson 1991: 635. The expression “on the first day of the week” reads more literally, “on one of the Sabbath [week]” and may allude to the week of creation (cf. Gen. Rab. 11.9 on Gen. 2:3). Morris (1991: 733 n. 7 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. a]) notes that σαββάτων (sabbatōn) can mean either “Sabbath” or “week” (contra R. Brown [1970: 980], who claims that the meaning “week” emerged only later). The use of the cardinal numeral (“one”) for the ordinal (“first”) may represent a Semitism (Barrett 1978: 562; cf. Morris 1995: 733 n. 6; Beasley-Murray 1999: 366; Moloney 1998: 521; Lindars 1972: 599).

10 The verbs ἐφίλει (ephilei) and ἠγάπα (ēgapa) are used synonymously for “loved” in this expression (cf. 13:23; 19:26; 21:20; see Ridderbos 1997: 632 n. 7; Carson 1991: 636; Barrett 1978: 562).

13 An inscription discovered in the neighborhood of Nazareth indicates that the emperor Claudius (A.D. 41–54) subsequently ordered capital punishment for those convicted of this crime (Barrett 1978: 562–63).

22 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 637; Barrett 1978: 563; Morris 1995: 735; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.311; Moloney 1998: 523. Carson also suggests that the fact that the graveclothes were still in the tomb is intended to create a contrast with Lazarus, who left the tomb with his graveclothes on (11:44) (cf. Barrett 1978: 563; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.311; Beasley-Murray 1999: 372; Moloney 1998: 519–20).

28 Cf. Luke 24:25–27, 32, 44–47; see commentary at 2:19–22; Ridderbos 1997: 634; Barrett 1978: 564.

2 Cf. Luke 24:33. Barrett (1978: 568) contends that it is impossible to know the extent of the gathering but that even if only “the ten” were present, they are still representative of the entire church. Morris (1995: 745) and R. Brown (1970: 1022, 1034) favor a larger group beyond the apostles including also other disciples (contra Carson 1991: 646, 656).

13 The vast majority of the instances of “sending” in John’s Gospel relate to Jesus’ having been sent by the Father. “Sending” terminology also occurs with regard to God’s sending of the Baptist, the Father’s and the Son’s sending of the Spirit, and Jesus’ sending of his disciples. The present passage features two “sending” verbs, πέμπω (pempō) and ἀποστέλλω (apostellō), with no apparent difference in meaning (as is the virtual consensus among major commentators, including Ridderbos, Morris, Carson, Barrett, Schnackenburg, and R. Brown; see also Köstenberger 1999c: 125–43). Morris (1995: 746 n. 56) notes that this is already suggested by the use of καθώς (kathōs, just as) linking the two verbs.

16 The critique by Hatina (1993), who says that the reference is to the indwelling Paraclete, fails to convince. Contrary to the view of many commentators, the present pericope does not constitute the Johannine equivalent to Pentecost (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1038; Barrett [1978: 570], who says that the present passage cannot be harmonized with Acts 2; Bultmann 1971: 691), nor is Calvin's (1961: 205) proposal satisfactory that at 20:22 the disciples "were only sprinkled with His grace and not [as at Pentecost] saturated with full power." Beasley-Murray (1999: 382 [followed by Borchert 2002: 307–8]) believes that John telescoped the giving of the Spirit without concern for chronology (citing the reference to the ascension in 20:17 as a parallel). M. Turner (1977) thinks that the reference is not to the Spirit at all but to Jesus' message as Spirit and life. The treatment by Moloney (1998: 532, 535) is rather idiosyncratic. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.325), too, surprisingly contends that the Johannine instance involves all believers, while the events in Acts 2 pertain to the apostles. If anything, one might have expected the opposite kind of reasoning, with John's account anticipating the general outpouring narrated in Acts 2. Against the view of Burge (2000: 558 [cf. Burge 1987: 148–49]), who notes the connection between the present passage and Jesus' promise to send the Spirit in John 14 and 16, the present event does not mark the actual fulfillment of these promises other than by way of anticipatory sign. Keener's (2003: 1196–1200, see also 1204–6) discussion, including an attempted refutation of M. Turner (1998), remains inconclusive and, on the whole, fails to convince.

20 This "new creation" theme is noted by several commentators, including Morris 1995: 747 n. 58 (who also cites Ezek. 37:9); Barrett 1978: 570; R. Brown 1970: 1035, 1037; Witherington 1995: 342; Keener 2003: 1204. Whitacre (1999: 482) speaks of the event in John 20:22 as the church's "conception," and of Pentecost as its "birth."

6 So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 647) and most major commentators (e.g., Morris 1995: 753; Witherington 1995: 344; Carson 1991: 657; Moloney 1998: 537; Barrett 1978: 572; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.332; contra Borchert 2002: 314; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

14 So, rightly, the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 197: 648; Morris 1995: 754; Carson 1991: 659; Beasley-Murray 1999: 386; Burge 2000: 563; Barrett 1978: 573; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.334; contra Borchert 2002: 316; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

8 See Ridderbos (1997: 656 n. 3), who cites Schlatter: "The attribution of the new narrative to another author is impossible, however, since the identical linguistic conventions have been fully maintained." Even Bultmann (1971: 700) declares, "Language and style admittedly afford no sure proof." Similarly, Neirynck (1990: 336) concludes that "the evidence of style and vocabulary ... is ambiguous and not decisive." Barrett (1978: 576) provides a list of words used in chapter 21 but not in chapters 1–20. See also Breck (1992: 36), who notes that words unique to chapter 21 in John's Gospel are either "technical expressions linked to the fishing trade" (ἀλιεύω, πιάζω, αἰγιαλός, προσφάγιον, δίκτυον, σύρω, ἀποβαίνω) or particular expressions required by their respective contexts (πρωῖα, ἐπενδύτης, γυμνός, βόσκω, ἄρνιον, ποιμαίνω, προβάτιον [variant of πρόβατα, the more likely reading in 21:16–17]).

10 Carson's (1991: 666) comments are particularly insightful: "But as in a 'whodunit' where all the pieces have finally come together ... , there remains certain authorial discretion: the book may end abruptly ... or it may wind down through a postscript that tells what happens to the characters, especially if what happens to them sheds a certain light backward onto the principal plot of the work." Contra Barrett (1978: 577), who expresses doubt that an author would spoil the effect of the commissioning in 20:21–23 by representing the disciples thereafter as returning to their former employment and as at first being unable to recognize their Lord; and R. Brown (1970: 1078) who attributes chapter 21 to a later redactor.

7 This, incidentally, is yet another argument against reading 20:22 as indicating an actual impartation of the Spirit at that point. Had they already received the Spirit, it would be almost inexplicable why Peter went back to fishing so soon after that event. So, rightly, Carson (1991:

669–70 [cf. Morris 1995: 760]): “It is impossible to imagine any of this taking place in Acts, after Pentecost ... this is not the portrait of believers who have received the promised Paraclete.” Barrett (1978: 579) considers it “unthinkable” that Peter and his fellow disciples “should contemplate a return to their former occupation after the events of chapter 20.” Contra Keener (2003: 1227), who argues against negative interpretations of the disciples’ return to fishing in 21:3, saying that the disciples simply made use of free time (citing Bruce 1983: 399). Keener also cites Beasley-Murray’s (1999: 399) contention that, even though Jesus had risen from the dead, the disciples must still eat.

14 Barrett (1978: 579) and R. Brown (1970: 1070) have difficulty accommodating this statement within a unified authorial framework. The former finds it hard to fathom the disciples’ failing to recognize Jesus, on the assumption that they had seen him twice since the resurrection. The latter uses the opportunity to reaffirm his belief that the present pericope represents Jesus’ first resurrection appearance rather than a later incident.

24 So, rightly, Barrett 1978: 580–81; Morris 1995: 762 n. 19 (though Soards [1983: 283] may have a point when he says “that the impetuous Peter met in this story would not have modesty uppermost in his mind”). Cf. t. Ber. 2.20.

27 The heading “The Banquet” for 21:9–14 in Keener (2003: 1230) seems overdone; one would hardly call a few fried fish at a lakeshore a banquet. Barrett (1978: 581), seeking to resolve the apparent difficulty of Jesus already cooking fish before the disciples had brought the fish ashore, suggests a literary solution in which two stories, one featuring the disciples catching and bringing the fish and another describing Jesus providing the meal, were being combined. More likely, the presence of fish prior to the disciples bringing theirs is yet another hint at Jesus’ supernatural powers of provision.

1 On the way in which 21:15–23 brings closure to the entire Gospel narrative, see the introduction to John 21 above. For interesting thoughts on the contribution of 21:15–25, see Barrett 1982b.

13 Note also that patristic interpreters read Isa. 65:2 with reference to the crucifixion (Barn. 12; Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 35; Irenaeus, Epid. 79; see Barrett 1978: 585).

14 Note further the verbal link between the reference to Jesus’ “lifting up” (i.e., crucifixion) in 12:32–33 and the reference to Peter’s future destiny in 21:19. See Carson 1991: 679–80; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Barrett 1978: 585. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 667); Morris (1995: 773); and Schnackenburg (1990: 3.366–67), who believe that the reference is more generally to martyrdom.

3 Barrett (1978: 586) detects in the reference to the beloved disciple as “following” Jesus (and Peter) in 21:20 yet another hint at this disciple’s superiority over Peter: “The beloved disciple was already doing what Peter had just been bidden to do” (yet see the skepticism voiced by R. Brown [1970: 1108]). Schlatter (1948: 372–73) notes how the beloved disciple here, as elsewhere in the Gospel (at his first recorded encounter with Jesus [1:37], at his entry into the high priest’s courtyard, and at the cross), is the silent listener.

7 So Barrett 1978: 587; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.371; R. Brown 1970: 1117–19.

13 See Blomberg (1995: 5–7), who lists seven factors in favor of seeing John’s portrait of Nicodemus as “substantially more negative” than the dominant view alleges: (1) the introduction of 2:23–25; (2) the labels “Pharisee” and “ruler of the Jews”; (3) Nicodemus’s coming by night; (4) the identification of Jesus as a mere “teacher”; (5) Nicodemus’s dependence on signs; (6) his astonishing ignorance; and (7) the evidence adduced by Cotterell regarding the increasingly negative portrayal of Nicodemus. According to Blomberg (cf. Bassler 1989), Nicodemus remains an ambivalent character, in contrast with the more positive progression found in the Samaritan woman in John 4. This overall conclusion is against Cotterell (1985: 241), who in his otherwise excellent discourse analysis exceeds the evidence when he credits Nicodemus with a “gradual dawning of true faith [culminating] in the presence of Nicodemus at the cross and in his ultimate identification with Jesus in his death.” Rather than “take his place at Calvary,” Nicodemus simply ensured giving Jesus a decent burial. (As Meeks [1972: 55] contends, Nicodemus’s “ludicrous ‘one hundred pounds’ of embalming spices indicate clearly enough that he has not understood the ‘lifting up’ of the Son of Man.”) Cotterell is on surer footing when he concludes that in the present narrative, “Nicodemus chose not to understand Jesus,” characterizing the outcome of the present conversation as “inconclusive.” Likewise mistaken, I believe, is Saayman (1995: 45), who detects in Nicodemus “a growing loyalty to Jesus.”

15 Though note Goulder (1991: 154), who contends that “the tone [in the present passage] sounds greasy,” and who adduces the parallel in Matt. 22:16, “a similarly insincere compliment, and one which led to a trap” (the second-century A.D. P.Eger. 2 links the present encounter with the question regarding paying tribute to Caesar in the Synoptics; see Bassler 1989: 636).

Goulder, too, thinks that Nicodemus’s portrayal in John’s Gospel is “solidly negative” (p. 153), noting that “all Nicodemus can manage is two crass questions (3.4, 9) which show that he is totally without spiritual insight; and Jesus says so (3.10)”; that “at 7.50f Nicodemus speaks up weakly to his fellow Pharisees ... but he is firmly snubbed, and does not stick to his point. ... He is no real Christian: he is ‘one of them’ (7.50)”; and finally, that at the burial Nicodemus brings a large amount of spices, but Jesus has already been anointed for burial (12:7), and the ointments will be laid aside at the resurrection (pp. 155–56).

17 One tricky piece of evidence concerns the second-century writer Papias (cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.4–5), a contemporary of Polycarp, who, in turn, was a disciple of the apostle John (on the date of Papias, see Yarbrough 1983; Munck 1959). Papias (at least to Eusebius) seems to refer to two separate Johns, the apostle and a “John the elder.” On this basis some have conjectured that the latter, rather than the former, wrote the Fourth Gospel. However, there is no need to drive a wedge between the two references to John in the passage in question. To the contrary, John may be designated “the elder” in the latter part of the quotation precisely because he is grouped with the elders mentioned earlier in the same passage. For a sound critique of the “John the elder” hypothesis, see Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 141–43. Keener (2003: 95–98) likewise challenges the reliability of Eusebius’s interpretation of Papias, owing to the former’s agenda of seeking to denigrate the Apocalypse. Keener (2003: 102–3) also includes an insightful discussion of the plausibility of John writing the Gospel at an advanced age. See also the works cited in Bauckham 1993: 27 n. 17 and the important essay by Hill (1998), who adduces from Eusebius’s (Hist. eccl. 3.24.5–13, esp. 11) reference to Papias (without naming him) that Papias held John the apostle to be the author of the Fourth Gospel (contra Bauckham 1993; Hengel 1989a; note my review of Hengel’s more extensive 1993 German monograph on the subject, Köstenberger 1996). For studies of the external evidence regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, see Bauckham 1993: 24 n. 1.

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon's work is given extensive coverage in Origen's commentary on John's Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John's Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάραξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that “the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel's] use”; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges “the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

38 Some believe that John is alluding here to the Greek dualism between light and darkness. Rather than affirming belief in a personal God who is sovereign, all-powerful, and good, the Greeks viewed reality in terms of polar opposites, such as light and darkness or good and evil. John, however, refutes this kind of thinking in his first epistle, where he states emphatically, “God is light; in him there is no darkness at all” (1 John 1:5). Another kind of light/darkness dualism is found in the DSS, particularly the War Scroll (1QM) depicting the battle between the “sons of light” and the “sons of darkness.” Yet, because of the sectarian nature of the Qumran community, light is never offered to those who live in darkness (cf. 1QS 3:21; 4:9–14) (Bauckham 1997). In John, on the other hand, Jesus urges his listeners, “Put your trust in the light while you have it, so that you may become sons of light” (12:36; cf. 8:12; 9:5).

1 For a survey of source-critical scholarship on John 9, see Borchert (1996: 310–12). Carson (1991: 360–61) provides a brief summary and critique of Martyn's “two-level” reading of the chapter in light of the history of the putative “Johannine community.” See also Bauckham (2001: esp. 103–6), who contends that Martyn's hermeneutic violates the genre of the Fourth Gospel.

1 Carson (1991: 513) terms it “extended metaphor” or “illustrative comparison.” He is not convinced that the parallels adduced by Bauckham (1987: 84–101) establish that the present passage constitutes a commentary on one of Jesus' parables (Carson 1991: 512). R. Brown (1970: 668) labels this a māšāl (so also Borchert 2002: 138; cf. 1996: 329); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.96) calls it “figurative discourse.”

12 This is illustrated by the following passages: Epictetus, Diatribai 3.26.22; Seneca, Ad Marciam de consolatione 20.3; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 7.69; Tertullian, De pudicitia 22 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 194). See Bauer (1925: 232) and Haenchen (1984: 2.226–27), who also note passages in Artemidorus and Plautus; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Hengel 1977: esp. chapter 4.

47 Commentators have detected various types of symbolism in this scene. Bultmann (1971: 673), true to F. C. Baur, sees Mary as representative of Jewish Christianity, and the beloved disciple of Gentile Christianity, the latter being charged to honor the former as its “mother,” from whom it originated (cf. Brodie 1993: 549). Witherington (1995: 309) views these two characters as symbolic of a new Adam and Eve, who are obedient whereas the former were not. Carson (1991: 618, following M. Gourgues) suggests that Mary, on account of her faith in Christ, is now able metaphorically to become a mother to a new son supplied for her by Jesus (cf. Matt. 19:29; see also Witherington 1995: 310). Beasley-Murray (1999: 350, following Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278) sees Mary as representing that part of Israel that is willing to believe in Jesus as the Messiah. Refreshingly, and refusing to resort to symbolism or allegory, Morris (1995: 718) says the beloved disciple simply “provided her [Mary] with a roof” and took her under his care. Others focus on lessons (to be) learned by Mary, such as needing to “step back in submission to the law of life that the Father has set for her son” (Ridderbos 1997: 612) or to receive the gift of salvation that she desired to receive at the wedding in Cana (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278; Beasley-Murray 1999: 350; Borchert 2002: 269).

BDF (F. Blass, A. Debrunner, and R. W. Funk) 143n7, 211n61, 274n109, 381n23, 408n42, 467, 497n67, 532n56, 563

7 O’Day (1986: 76) says that the question “is not a denial, but neither is it a full affirmative.” BDAG 649 identifies 4:29b as a hesitant question, citing Matt. 12:23 as closest parallel; BDF §221: “perhaps this is the Messiah.” See also the discussion in Beck 1997: 75–76.

61 “Everything” (πᾶν, pan) in 6:37 and 6:39 is neuter, used in a qualitative, collective sense (R. Brown 1966: 270; Barrett 1978: 294; Borchert 1966: 265), though ultimately people (not things) are in mind (BDF §138.1, with specific reference to John 6:37; cf. Morris 1995: 325; Moloney 1998: 216).

109 The passive verb ἐκρύβη (ekrybē) in 8:59 and 12:36 is customarily translated in English Bibles as reflexive/middle (“hid himself”; KJV; NKJV; NIV; TNIV; ISV; ESV; NLT; NET; NRSV; NASB) or even actively (“hid”; NAB; CEV). The sole exception is the HCSB, which renders the expression as a genuine passive. See also Morris (1995: 421), who contends that the NT usage is to take the form as a real passive and consequently argues that the passive form may imply the agency of God the Father in concealing Jesus. This is possible; ekrybē does function as a genuine passive in Luke 19:42 and Heb. 11:23, the only other two NT instances (besides here and in John 12:36) of the aorist passive indicative form of kryptō. But cf. BDAG 571, which treats both references as instances of the passive used in an active sense (“to hide”). Similarly, BDF §471 (4).

23 Ridderbos (1997: 435 n. 185) cites BDF §448.4 as evidence that ἀλλά after a question posed to oneself could be rendered more strongly as “No!” (cf. NRSV; Bultmann 1971: 427), though Ridderbos himself does not adopt this rendering. Cf. Whitacre 1999: 312, following Carson.

42 This is noted by Morris (1995: 551), who says that the reversal “may be significant.”

R. Brown (1970: 553) theorizes that “the order in which the two titles are mentioned may reflect the development of the disciples’ understanding, for ‘Teacher’ is more common in the earlier chapters of the Gospel and ‘Lord’ in the later chapters.” Morris (1995: 551 n. 34, citing BDF §147 [cf. Barrett 1978: 443; Beasley-Murray 1999: 229 n. g]) says that the nominative ὁ διδάσκαλος καὶ κύριος “is equivalent to a vocative,” though the phrase clearly functions as an apposition to ἐγώ in the present context.

67 See the parallel in Deut. 29:14–15. The present participle πιστευόντων (pisteuontōn, believing) clearly is future-referring (Ridderbos 1997: 558 n. 248, citing BDF §339.2b). “Message” translates the term λόγος, logos (see commentary at 17:17).

56 Wallace (1996: 58, citing BDF §147) says that articular nominatives with simple substantives were used in Attic Greek only to address inferiors: “Thus, although they call him ‘King,’ the form in which they make this proclamation denies the address.”

1 J. A. T. Robinson (1962–63) observes that “the themes of the gospel are played over beforehand, as in the overture to an opera” (cited in Viviano 1998: 183). Beasley-Murray (1992: 1867) calls it “an anticipatory description of the Mission of the Logos-Son to the World.” The bibliography on the Johannine prologue is vast: see van der Watt 1995: 311 n. 1; Kurz 1997: 179 n. 1. For a chart showing themes anticipated in the prologue, see p. 586 below.

32 Note the comment on this alternative by Metzger (1994: 168): “whatever that may be supposed to mean.” In Metzger’s dissenting opinion (the majority of the UBS translation committee favors taking the phrase with what follows) he states, “Despite valiant attempts of commentators to bring sense out of taking ὁ γέγονεν with what follows, the passage remains intolerably clumsy and opaque” (similarly, Schnackenburg, cited by Ashton 1986: 172). Among the major translations, only the NRSV prefers this alternative. Commentators who advocate this option are R. Brown (1966: 6–7), Bultmann (1971: 39–40, esp. n. 4), Beasley-Murray (1999: 1–2, esp. n. a), and Whitacre (1999: 52). See also E. Miller (1989), who integrates his belief that the phrase is to be taken with what follows into his larger thesis that 1:1a–b and 1:3–5 constitute a christological hymn in four strophes extolling the salvation-historical activity of the Word (he considers 1:1c and 1:2 to be interpolations). Brodie (1993: 138), because of the lack of punctuation, sees the text as inherently ambiguous and as being “part of a careful literary strategy” designed to focus on “the continuity between creation and the incarnation, between creation and redemption.”

51 Barrett (1978: 162) sees only one sense of κόσμος in this verse. Morris (1995: 85) contends that the first two instances refer to everyone, while the third reference is to those who came in contact with Jesus. Beasley-Murray (1999: 12) sees a progression from “the world inhabited by humankind” in 1:10a to “the world including human beings” in 1:10b to “humanity, fallen and in darkness” in 1:10c. Carson (1991: 123) demonstrates that the word κόσμος never has a positive usage (contra Burge 2000: 57) and only a few neutral ones.

66 While some see the tabernacle parallel (see Exod. 35–40), others look to the tent of meeting in Exod. 33 (Morris 1995: 92) or the exodus in general (Beasley-Murray 1999: 14).

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’ ” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84– 87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

85 See also Bultmann 1971: 78; Lindars 1972: 97; Bruce 1983: 43; Beasley-Murray 1999: 15; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.275–76.

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

3 For an extensive summary of reconstructions, see Beasley-Murray 1999: 22; cf.

Schnackenburg 1990: 1.285. Witherington (1995: 68) proposes that 1:35–2:11 describes three days, the first being narrated in 1:35–42, the second in 1:43–51, and the third in 2:1–12. Note also Moloney (1998: 50–51), who suggests that 1:19–2:11 represents an allusion to the giving of the law in Exod. 19.

22 The quotation from Isa. 40:3 follows the LXX (Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. b) except that John uses εὐθύνετε instead of ἐτοιμάσατε (Barrett 1978: 173). This may be because (1) John was translating straight from the Hebrew; (2) he was influenced by the sound of εὐθείαν in the LXX shortly after the quotation; or (3) he took his cue from the use of εὐθύνειν with ὁδός in Sir. 2:6; 37:15; 49:9. Menken (1985: 202–3) suggests that the change was motivated by his desire “to make John the Baptist not so much the precursor of Jesus as a witness contemporaneous with Jesus.”

24 So Ridderbos 1997: 66 n. 10; Morris 1995: 122; Carson 1991: 144; Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292; contra R. Brown 1966: 44; Moloney 1998: 52. While thus the delegation included some Pharisees, this does not mean that the Pharisees were responsible for sending out the delegation, since the Sadducees had a majority on the Sanhedrin (Carson 1991: 144). This is true especially if an article is to be added (or implied) before ἀπεσταλμένοι (Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Barrett 1978: 174; R. Brown 1966: 43–44; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292). Ἀπεσταλμένοι ἦσαν (apestalmenoi ēsan, they had been sent) is a periphrastic pluperfect (Wallace [1996: 586] calls it “consummative”).

26 Cf. Mark 1:2–5; Matt. 3:1–10; Luke 3:3–14. So Morris 1995: 123; Beasley-Murray 1999: 24; Carson 1991: 145–46; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.293.

29 Stibbe (1993: 33) again points to the theme of the “elusive Christ”: “Even though Jesus is not visibly on stage, his elusive presence is felt in the Baptist’s rather obscure remark. ... The reference here is clearly to the mysterious and elusive presence of Jesus himself.” Beyond this, the phrase “one whom you do not know” may also allude to the view held by some in that day that before commencing his public ministry, the Messiah would live a hidden life on earth (see commentary at 1:31; 7:27; see also Ridderbos 1997: 68; Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. d). The word “stand” (ἔστηκεν, hestēken), a perfect, has present force (cf. Mark 10:19; Acts 26:27; Heb. 6:9; see Wallace 1996: 579–80).

43 The reference to a previous statement is a recurring stylistic feature in this Gospel (Schlatter [1948: 50] cites 3:26, 28; 4:54; 5:33; 7:21; 8:24; 11:37; 13:33; 15:20; 18:9, 14, 32; 21:14). The statement is largely unchanged from 1:15 and 1:27, though the context is now Jesus’ actual appearance (Ridderbos 1997: 75; Morris 1995: 132). The form of the verbs has been changed from participles to indicatives, enabling the author to stress the reality of the thought more forcefully (Morris 1995: 132). The inference that John includes this statement as a polemic against elements elevating the Baptist over Jesus in the evangelist’s day (Beasley-Murray 1999: 25) is unnecessary.

79 Cf. Matt. 16:16–19; see Schnackenburg 1990: 1.312–13; R. Brown 1966: 80; Beasley-Murray 1987: 27; Carson 1984: 368. It must be noted, however, that the evangelist himself does not comment explicitly, apparently leaving it up to the reader to draw the proper inference (see Barrett 1978: 183).

85 In Jesus’ day, the term “Galilee” was used with reference to the territory east of the Jordan River (Carson 1991: 158; cf. Barrett 1978: 183; R. Brown 1966: 82; Morris 1995: 143 n. 100). After the beginning of the Jewish war in A.D. 66, apparently the entire region around the lake was called Galilee. If this is correct, John here follows contemporary usage (Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. k).

122 The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. 65, was published in 1998 by the Egypt Exploration Society (see pp. 12–13). Among commentators, “Chosen One of God” is favored by Morris 1995: 134; Carson 1991: 152; Burge 1987: 59–61; 2000: 74; Barrett 1978: 178; R. Brown 1966: 57; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.305. “Son of God” is the reading advocated by Bultmann 1971: 92–93 n. 6; Borchert 1996: 139; Ridderbos 1997: 77; Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. g; Laney 1992: 53 (though all prior to the discovery of P¹⁰⁶). Rodgers (1999: 304) prefers both (“This is the only, the chosen Son of God”), while Michaels (1989: 36) proposes that the Baptist spoke “Chosen One of God” (hence the MS tradition), which the evangelist interpreted as “Son of God.”

7 It is doubtful that the reference to “the third day” represents an allusion to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 102; Carson 1991: 167; Burge 2000: 90; contra Borchert 1996: 153; Stibbe 1993: 46; Keener 2003: 497–98). The reference serves as a chronological connective with preceding events, perhaps indicating that the promise of 1:51 was quickly fulfilled (Beasley-Murray 1999: 34, citing Schnackenburg 1990: 1.325; cf. Talbert [1992: 86], who says that 2:1–11 serves as fulfillment of the prophecy in 1:51; and D. M. Smith [1999: 86], who speaks of the “first installment ... of the revelation promised in 1:51”). The beginning of Jesus’ final week is signaled in 12:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 189–90).

22 See 4:21; 20:13, 15; cf. Matt. 15:28; Luke 13:12; 22:57. Beasley-Murray (1999: 34) cites Josephus, Ant. 17.4.2 §74, as evidence that the address “woman” may be affectionate (but there it is ὦ γύναι).

31 So, for example, Ridderbos 1997: 107; Morris 1995: 162; Carson 1991: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 35; R. Brown 1966: 105; Kruse 2003: 94–95. Ridderbos (1997: 108) cites OT allusions to the abundance of wine in the new age (Gen. 49:11; Isa. 25:6; Amos 9:13–14; Jer. 31:12–14; see also Joel 3:18). Keener (2003: 512) suggests a (proleptic) connection between the abundant “measure” of water turned into wine in 2:6 and the unlimited provision of the Spirit in 3:34.

9 The phrase “Jewish Passover” has caused some controversy. Barrett (1978: 197) conjectures that the phrase may presuppose the existence of a Christian Passover at the time of writing (so, earlier, Westcott 1908: 1.89; cf. Borchert 1996: 162). Schnackenburg (1991: 1.345) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 39) suggest that the evangelist or the church had stopped participating in the Jewish Passover. Witherington (1995: 86–87) notes that the phrase indicates a certain distance between the author and Judaism and at least a partial Gentile audience (similarly, Morris 1995: 169). Carson (1991: 176) thinks that “Jewish” refers to the Jews of Judea in contrast to Galileans and Diaspora Jews.

19 Several commentators also mention that Tyrian coinage would have been preferred because it did not bear effigies (Moloney 1998: 76; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38 n. c; R. Brown 1966: 115; Borchert 1996: 163). However, this is disputed by Murphy-O’Connor (2000: 47, referring to Ben-David 1969), who cites evidence that Tyrian shekels “carried the head of the god Melkart (or Herakles) on the obverse and a Tyrian (Ptolemaic) eagle on the reverse with the inscription ‘Tyre the holy and inviolable.’ ” Murphy-O’Connor also notes the minting of Jewish shekels carrying the legend “shekel of Israel/Jerusalem [is/the] holy” at the onset of the Jewish war in A.D. 66 (pp. 47–48, citing Schürer 1973–79: 1.605), and he points to the Qumran interpretation of a one-time requirement in 4Q159 frag. 1, col. 2, lines 6–7 (p. 49).

34 Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.344; Barrett 1978: 195; R. Brown 1966: 117; Witherington 1995: 85–86; Borchert 1996: 160; Bultmann 1971: 122; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38–39; Dodd 1963: 162; Lindars 1972: 135–37; Keener 2003: 518–19. Keener contends that it is historically implausible that Jesus would challenge the temple system by overturning tables and yet continue in public ministry for two or three years afterward, sometimes even visiting Jerusalem (though he notes that Jesus faces considerable hostility there when he does). On the contrary, an early temple cleansing accounts well for Jewish hostility toward Jesus early on (5:18), and Jesus’ continuing in ministry for two or three more years is eminently plausible historically in light of Jesus’ pattern of withdrawal (3:22; 6:15; 7:9–10; 8:59; 10:40) and his caution from the very inception of his ministry because his “time” has not yet come (2:4; 7:6). Borchert (1996: 160) contends that two temple clearings are “a historiographic monstrosity that has no basis in the texts of the Gospels.” Kreitzer (1998: 100–101) claims that the evangelist followed the motto “When the details of history no longer serve the functions of the story—discard them.” R. Brown (1966: 118) concludes that Jesus uttered some prophetic saying concerning the destruction of the temple on his first visit but actually cleansed the temple at the end of his ministry. Wallace (1996: 561 n. 20) notes that this would require a crucifixion date of A.D. 33.

26 Note in 3:5 the single Greek preposition governing both “water” and “spirit” (Ridderbos 1997: 127). Some have suggested that “born of water” refers to water baptism, be it John the Baptist’s or Christian baptism, or both (Schnackenburg 1990: 1.369; Barrett 1978: 203, 208–9; R. Brown 1966: 141–42; Ridderbos 1997: 127–28; Beasley-Murray 1999: 49; Michaels 1989: 57). But it would hardly have been meaningful for Jesus to inform Nicodemus that he must be baptized in order to go to heaven. Nothing in the context indicates that this is the case, and it is unlikely that Jesus would have expected Nicodemus already to have known this. Moreover, the emphasis here is on the Spirit’s activity, not on human ritual observance (Morris 1995: 193).

37 Cf. Morris 1995: 196; Carson 1991: 199; R. Brown 1966: 132; Beasley-Murray 1999: 50; Witherington 1995: 98; Moloney 1998: 94; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.377; contra Barrett 1978:

212.

3 Beasley-Murray (1999: 58–59), after noting several lines of connection between chapters 2 and 4—the water/wine contrast in chapter 2, the well water/living water contrast in chapter 4, the Jerusalem temple versus Jesus’ body in chapter 2, worship at Jerusalem/Mount Gerizim versus worship in spirit and truth in chapter 4—concludes that the form of chapter 4 is “controlled by the preceding signs,” but the narrative is “set in a new dimension of mission to non-Israel.”

4 See the various structural proposals in Beasley-Murray 1999: 59; R. Brown 1966: 176–78; Moloney 1998: 115. See also Carson 1991: 214.

15 This represents the wide consensus of interpreters: see Ridderbos 1997: 153; Carson 1991: 215–16; Borchert 1996: 198–99; Beasley-Murray 1999: 59; Witherington 1995: 115; R. Brown 1966: 169; Morris 1995: 226; Barrett 1978: 230; Moloney 1998: 116, 120; Conway 1999: 105.

23 So N. Walker 1960 and the vast majority of commentators, including Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. e; Witherington 1995: 120; Barrett 1978: 231; Moloney 1998: 116, 121; Bultmann 1971: 178; contra Borchert 1996: 201.

30 See Maccini 1996: 131–44. Daube (1956: 375–82) argues that “do not associate with” specifically refers to Jews not sharing vessels with Samaritans (cf. NIV text and note at 4:9). However, no common utensils (such as the woman’s water jar) are specifically mentioned in 4:9. The explanatory aside, “For Jews have no dealings with [συγγρῶνται] Samaritans,” probably is broader than the mere refusal to share drinking vessels (Ridderbos 1997: 154; Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. f; contra Carson 1991: 218; Borchert 1996: 203; Witherington 1995: 120; R. Brown 1966: 170; Morris 1995: 229; Barrett 1978: 232; Moloney 1998: 117, 121; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.425 n. 19).

83 An implied contrast with the Roman emperor is favored in Morris 1995: 251 n. 98; Beasley-Murray 1999: 65; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 1.458. C. Koester (1990b: 678) contends that the Samaritans’ designation of Jesus as “Savior of the world” is part of the Johannine kingship theme, in contrast to the Jews’ disavowal of Jesus as their king in 19:15 (“We have no king but Caesar”). Koester also points to the Roman presence in Samaria as evidence for the countercultural nature of the Samaritans’ confession of Jesus (rather than the Roman emperor) as “Savior of the world” (pp. 678–79).

4 One school of interpretation identifies πατρίς (patris, homeland, hometown) in 4:44 with Jerusalem (so Barrett 1978: 246; Dodd 1953: 352; 1963: 238–41; Meeks 1966; 1967: 39–40; see, much earlier, Origen, Commentarii in evangelium Joannis 13.54–56, cited in van Belle 1998: 30). However, see the critiques by W. Davies (1974: 321–31) and Stimpfle (1992: 89) as summarized by van Belle (1998: 30–32). The Galilee/Nazareth explanation is found already in Augustine (cited by van Belle 1998: 33) and is defended by Stimpfle (1992: 86–96 [followed by van Belle 1998: 27–44]) and others (see van Belle 1998: 32–33; see also Ridderbos 1997: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 73; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.463). Still others think that both Galilee and Judea are in view (Carson 1991: 235–36; Burge 2000: 151–52; Witherington 1995: 126; W. Davies 1974: 321–31).

7 So Carson 1991: 234; Ridderbos 1997: 174–75; Morris 1995: 255; Borchert 1996: 219–20; Burge 2000: 152–53; Witherington 1995: 127; contra R. Brown 1966: 193; Barrett 1978: 245; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.471–75; Bultmann 1971: 205.

18 Note the threefold repetition of the fact that the son is “alive” (John 4:50, 51, 43), emphasizing that Jesus is able to give/restore life (Morris 1995: 259; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999:

186n54, 188n66, 190, 191n81, 191n82, 192, 194n100, 195, 195n108, 195n110, 203n25, 205n34, 206, 206n41, 208n50, 209, 211n60, 215, 216n76, 216n77, 217, 217n80, 219, 73).

22 The numbering of the two Cana signs has suggested to some the existence of a “signs source” (Bultmann 1971: 206; Fortna 1970; 1989; Whitacre 1999: 116). However, this inference is not a necessary one (Ridderbos 1997: 178; Carson 1991: 178; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; contra Barrett 1978: 246; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.469–71).

39 God’s judgment: Ridderbos 1997: 189; Barrett 1978: 255; Gehenna or Hades: Beasley-Murray 1999: 74; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.98; eternal consequences: Morris 1995: 272; Witherington 1995: 139.

53 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Borchert 1996: 236; Moloney 1998: 174; Bultmann 1971: 245; Morris 1995: 274–75 n. 48 (referring to Odeberg 1968: 203), 277; Barrett 1978: 259; Keener 1999: 42–43. The use of ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, that one) for God “lays stress upon the separate divine Person” in contrast with υἱός (huios, son). Also stressed is the Son’s inability to do anything apart from the Father (again in 5:30; see Moloney 1998: 178; Barrett 1978: 264).

54 Though calling this a “parable” (Dodd 1968a; Burge 2000: 177; cf. R. Brown 1966: 218) may be an overstatement (Carson 1991: 250; Ridderbos 1997: 192; Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Barrett 1978: 259–60).

66 So Carson 1991: 256; Moloney 1998: 183; Ridderbos 1997: 197; Morris 1995: 280; Beasley-Murray 1999: 76.

81 That “another” refers to God the Father represents a broad consensus among commentators: so Ridderbos 1997: 202; Morris 1995: 288; Moloney 1998: 190; Beasley-Murray 1999: 78; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.121; Barrett 1978: 264; R. Brown 1966: 224.

82 “Have sent” and “have testified” are in the Greek perfect tense, indicating the settled condition resulting from the Baptist’s witness to Jesus (cf. Barrett 1978: 264; Carson 1991: 260; Beasley-Murray 1999: 78; Morris 1995: 288; R. Brown 1966: 224; Wallace [1996: 577] calls this an “extensive perfect”).

100 See Exod. 32:11–14, 30–32; Num. 12:13; 14:19–20; 21:7; Deut. 9:18–20, 25–29. See also As. Mos. 11:17 (cf. 12:6; Jub. 1:19–21; cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 62; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 79; Ridderbos 1997: 207; Carson 1991: 266).

108 So the majority of commentators, including Barrett 1978: 250–51; Carson 1991: 240; Morris 1995: 265 n. 6; R. Brown (1966: 206), who says that the evidence is “overwhelming”; Beasley-Murray 1999: 69 n. e; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.93.

110 So Fee 1982 and the vast majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 185; Carson 1991: 242; Morris 1995: 267; Barrett 1978: 253; R. Brown 1966: 207; Beasley-Murray 1999: 70 n. h; Bultmann 1971: 241 n. 4; Borchert 1996: 232; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94–95.

25 Beasley-Murray (1999: 88) comments, “The step from a prophet like Moses (v 14), the first Redeemer and worker of miracles, to a messianic deliverer was a short one for enthusiasts in contemporary Israel to make” (cf. Horsley 1984).

34 So Beasley-Murray 1999: 89–90; Witherington 1995: 153; Burge 2000: 193, 195. See further the discussion of ἐγώ εἶμι sayings in ancient culture and the OT in Beasley-Murray 1999: 89–90.

41 Contra Beasley-Murray (1999: 91), who takes εἶδετε (eidete, you saw) literally, concluding that Jesus’ present audience was not physically present when Jesus performed the sign. In the Synoptics, even the disciples are shown to misunderstand the implications of the miracle (Mark 6:52; cf. 8:14–21; see Carson 1991: 283). Barrett (1978: 286) views the use of ἐχορτάσθητε (echortasthēte, you had your fill) as evidence that John was familiar with Mark (cf. Mark 6:42; 8:8).

50 Carson 1991: 285; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 91; Barrett 1978: 288; R. Brown 1966: 265; Moloney 1998: 212. The personal pronoun σύ (sy, you) is emphatic, possibly suggesting that people doubt Jesus' ability to furnish such a sign (Morris 1995: 321).

60 See discussion at 6:30. The second καί (kai, and) in 6:36 probably is adversative (so Barrett 1978: 293). The majority of commentators consider the word με (me, me) in 6:36 to be original (so Ridderbos 1997: 230 n. 120; Carson 1991: 289–90; Morris 1995: 325 n. 104; R. Brown 1966: 270; contra Barrett 1978: 293; Moloney 1998: 216; see also the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 85; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.46).

76 For the most part, 6:53 is a negative restatement of 6:51. However, 6:53 adds the reference to drinking Jesus' blood (a development of 6:35; see Beasley-Murray 1999: 94; Barrett 1978: 298).

77 John's use of τρώγω (trōgō, chew, eat) in 6:54 may be intended to heighten the vividness of Jesus' words (Ridderbos 1997: 242 n. 163; cf. Moloney 1998: 221; Bultmann 1971: 236), though it may merely be the evangelist's preferred verb for "eating" in the present tense (Carson 1991: 296; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 95; Barrett 1978: 299).

80 The construction καὶ ὁ ζῶ ... κακεῖνος ζήσει harks back to previous statements in 5:21, 24–30. Once again, however, the analogy breaks down in that believers do not have life in themselves (as does Jesus), even though they partake of Jesus' flesh and blood (Carson 1991: 299; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 95).

4 Beasley-Murray (1999: 106 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.143]) plausibly suggests that the references to the Jews in 7:1 and 7:13 form an inclusio, rendering the passage an introduction to the following narrative.

24 In the post-Jamnia period (after ca. A.D. 90), the term "rabbi" came to refer exclusively to those who had undergone formal rabbinic training. See b. Soṭah 22a (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 74–75; cf. Str-B 2:486; Beasley-Murray 1999: 108). See also commentary at 7:49.

45 Cf. 11:50–52. So Beasley-Murray 1999: 112; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.150; Bultmann 1971: 309. Ridderbos (1997: 271–72) thinks that it merely indicates a presumed place of refuge for Jesus. Schlatter (1948: 150) sees in 7:35 not only an objection that Jesus' departure from Jerusalem would compromise the Jews' privilege as God's chosen people but also an acknowledgment of the oppressive superiority of Greek learning, the profundity of the Greeks' antipathy toward the Jews, and the firmness of religious traditions in Greek-speaking areas.

54 Cf. Isa. 55:1; also Ps. 42–43; Matt. 5:6; John 4:10–14; 6:35; Rev. 22:1–2, 17; Sir. 24:19–21; 51:23–24. Beasley-Murray (1999: 113 [cf. Burge 2000: 227]) sees a close parallel in form and content between 6:35 and 7:37–38.

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee's observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus "from within him" refers to "whoever believes in me." Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of "rivers of living water" (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987: 88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

255n16, 257n29, 259, 259n37, 259n41, 260, 260n47, 262, 264, 266n74, 269, 271, 272n97, 274, 275, 275n112, 282n19, 285, 289, 291, 295, 295n82, 296, 302n18, 306n45,

68 Beasley-Murray (1999: 119) notes that those who are exposed to God's revelation cannot remain neutral and connects the division here to the division that will occur before the judgment seat. On "schisma" as a unifying formal element in John 7–10, see Schenke 1989: 177–78.

6 See Isa. 60:19–22; Zech. 14:5b–8; cf. Rev. 21:23–24. Contemporary Judaism applied the phrase "light of the world" not only to God but also to Israel, Jerusalem, the patriarchs, the Messiah, famous rabbis (e.g., Yohanan ben Zakkai), the Torah, the temple, and even Adam (Keener 1993: 285; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 128; R. Brown 1966: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.190; Moloney 1998: 266). The universality of "light" symbolism in religious language issues in numerous non-Jewish parallels (see Barrett 1978: 335–37; Bultmann 1971: 40–44, 342–43; Dodd 1953: 201–8; Odeberg 1968: 286–92).

11 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 128–29. Moloney (1998: 268, citing Talbert) notes that there was an expectation that the pillar of fire would return "at the end of time." For Qumran and Second Temple parallels, see Köstenberger 2002c: 82.

14 Commentators vary as to whether to regard as synonyms the two words used in the present context for "true" or "valid," ἀληθής (alēthēs; 8:13, 14, 17) and ἀληθινός (alēthinos; 8:16). Beasley-Murray (1999: 125 n. a [contra R. Brown 1966: 341; Lindars 1972: 317; Barrett 1978: 339]) opts to distinguish between the former meaning "true" or "valid" and the latter meaning "just" or "authentic" (similarly, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.194). Ridderbos (1997: 294) suggests the meaning "just" for ἀληθινός; Barrett (1978: 339) opts for "authentic"; and Carson (1991: 340) prefers "right."

16 See Ridderbos 1997: 294; Carson 1991: 339; Beasley-Murray 1999: 129; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.192.

29 So Morris 1995: 394; Carson 1991: 341; Beasley-Murray 1999: 125 n. b; Burge 2000: 257. Barrett (1978: 340) alone seems to express some reservation.

37 So Carson 1991: 344; Beasley-Murray 1999: 130–31; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.200. See especially Isa. 41:4; 43:10, 13, 25; 46:4; 48:12; cf. Deut. 32:39.

41 Beasley-Murray (1999: 131, following M. Zerwick) prefers "Just what I am telling you." See also Michaels (1989: 149): "Just what I have been claiming all along."

47 So the majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 305–6; Carson 1991: 346–47; Morris 1995: 404; Beasley-Murray 1999: 132; D. M. Smith 1999: 185; Borchert 1996: 301 n. 182; Burge 2000: 259; Bultmann 1971: 252 n. 2; contra R. Brown 1966: 354–55, 358; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.204–5; Moloney 1998: 277; Westcott 1908: 2.13–14.

74 So Morris 1995: 411; Ridderbos 1997: 315; Carson 1991: 353; Barrett 1978: 349; Beasley-Murray 1999: 135; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.213; Moloney 1998: 280; Borchert 1996: 305–6. It was commonly recognized in Second Temple literature that death was the result of Satan's initiative (Wis. 2:23–24; Sir. 25:24; cf. Rom. 5:12).

97 The term ἀγαλλιάω (agalliaō, be glad) occurs in this Gospel elsewhere only in 5:35. The sense is that of being "overjoyed" (Morris 1995: 417). The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) is variously classified as referring to the content of Abraham's joy (Morris 1995: 417); as introducing "the ground of the rejoicing" (Barrett 1978: 351); as causal or explanatory (Beasley-Murray 1999: 126 n. l); or as conveying purpose (R. Brown 1966: 359).

112 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 126 n. m; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.223; R. Brown 1966: 360; Bultmann 1971: 327 n. 3; contra Burge 2000: 263.

19 Michaels (1989: 160) comments, “Like a laborer determined to finish his job before nightfall, Jesus summons his disciples to join him in taking full advantage of the remaining daylight hours.” D. M. Smith (1999: 192) notes that the time is short both for Jesus, who must complete his work on earth before his hour of departure arrives, and for his hearers, whose opportunity to respond positively to Jesus is close to gone (12:35–36). In this regard, compare the repeated references to Jesus’ appointed “time” in John’s Gospel (Beasley-Murray 1999: 155).

82 Borchert (1996: 325) relates the present reference to 20:28 and believes that this confession is a high point in the festival cycle. The man’s response to Jesus’ self-revelation is in keeping with the standard OT reaction to theophany (e.g., Gen. 17:3). However, it is possible that the man’s actions, while being “beyond that due to other men,” fall “short of that due to God Almighty” (Beasley-Murray 1999: 160; similarly, Carson 1991: 377). Nevertheless, the majority of commentators favor a fuller sense of worship (Barrett 1978: 365; R. Brown 1966: 376; Bultmann 1971: 339 n. 3; Morris 1995: 440; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.254).

18 Stibbe (1993: 113) characterizes παροιμία as “a symbolic word-picture with a cryptic meaning ... essentially elusive discourse.” Morris (1995: 445) suggests that this is a rather unique form of allegory. Ridderbos (1997: 355 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 168]) opts for a parable with allegorical elements (cf. 10:7–9). Bultmann (1971: 375) describes the genre as a mixture between parable and riddle. See Köstenberger 2002b: 72–75. See also the long discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.284–88.

45 So the vast majority of commentators, including Barrett, Beasley-Murray, Burge, Carson, Moloney, Morris, Ridderbos, Schnackenburg, and Witherington. For Jewish material indicating that the Messiah would gather the Gentiles, see Hofius 1967.

47 Cf. Matt. 28:18–20; see Carson 1991: 388; cf. Barrett 1978: 376; Beasley-Murray 1999: 171. John 10:16 presupposes Jesus’ resurrection, which is referred to explicitly and repeatedly in the following verses (10:17, 18; cf. Michaels 1989: 181).

55 So Morris 1995: 457; cf. Carson 1991: 390; Beasley-Murray 1999: 172; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.303; Burge 2000: 293.

59 For discussions of the Feast of Dedication, see Barrett 1978: 378–79; Beasley-Murray 1999: 172–73. Moloney (1998: 317–19) suggests that 10:22–39 is a summary of John 5–10. See also his treatment of the narrative’s structure on p. 314. Keener (2003: 822) notes the irony of Jesus the Messiah being rejected at a festival commemorating national deliverance.

60 See Josephus, J.W. 5.5.1 §§184–85; Ant. 15.11.3 §§396–401; 20.9.7 §§220–21. So the vast majority of commentators, including Carson, Barrett, Morris, Beasley-Murray, R. Brown, Moloney, and Burge; contra Ridderbos 1997: 368.

67 So, in effect, Ridderbos 1997: 368; Carson 1991: 392–93; Morris 1995: 462; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174. Borchert (1996: 338) suggests that the “interplay between paroimia and parrësia allows Jesus to tell the Pharisees that he has already answered their question.”

73 So, rightly, Carson (1991: 394–95), whose entire discussion repays careful reading (see also Morris 1995: 465; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174; Moloney 1998: 320; Burge 2000: 296; Laney 1992: 195; Stibbe 1993: 118; Westcott 1908: 2.68). Michaels (1989: 187) seems to conceive of Jesus’ unity with the Father in functional terms (whether primarily or exclusively so), as both of them doing “the same work.” Barrett (1978: 382) notes that the unity between the Father and the Son is also a unity of love and obedience.

84 See b. Abod. Zar. 5a. For a variation of the first view, see Jungkuntz 1964; Schnackenburg

1990: 2.311; Morris 1995: 467; Beasley-Murray 1999: 176–77. The second position is held by Emerton 1960; 1966. For a variation of the third view, see Hanson 1964–65; 1967. See further Oepke, TDNT 4:1022–32, 1054–55. Most major commentators seem to favor the third view as well (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 373; Carson 1991: 398; Barrett 1978: 384; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311).

48 For Witherington (1995: 202), Thomas’s comment “sounds more like fatalistic resignation to what seemed inevitable” (I would agree). Bultmann (1971: 400) speaks of “blind devotion” (with reference to 14:5 and 20:24–25); the exact same term is picked up by Beasley-Murray (1999: 189), who also notes the veiled irony in Thomas’s statement. Stibbe (1993: 125) says that Thomas’s comment “reveals an element of misunderstanding,” manifesting “naiveté at best, insincerity at worst.”

63 John is the only NT author to use the expression “the last day” (cf. 6:39, 40, 44, 54; 12:48; cf. 5:29). Other writers prefer the plural, “the last days,” usually referring to the times preceding the end (cf. Acts 2:17; 2 Tim. 3:1; James 5:3)—language that harks back to OT terminology (e.g., Isa. 2:2; Mic. 4:1; see Beasley-Murray 1999: 190).

91 Barrett (1978: 399) asserts that Jesus was angry “beyond question.” Schnackenburg (1990: 2.335) calls attempts to render ἐμβριμάομαι as an emotional experience such as grief, pain, or sympathy “illegitimate.” Beasley-Murray (1987 = 1999: 192–93, followed by Lindars 1992b: 89–90, noting that he changed his view from Lindars 1972: 398) marshals considerable evidence to support the reading “became angry in spirit.” See also Carson (1991: 415), who contends that ἐμβριμάομαι means more than “deeply moved in spirit” and says that the term refers to “anger, outrage, or emotional indignation.” Brodie (1993: 395), starting with Schnackenburg’s view that Jesus was angry at the unbelief of Mary and the Jews, maintains that his anger is directed also at sin and death, and thus ultimately against the realm of Satan.

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, “The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death.” See also Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999: 289. The mourners’ unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999: 192–93), several of whom adduce Paul’s statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus’ anger is directed toward both “the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow” and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus’ anger as occasioned by Mary’s turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either “misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition,” to mean “moved in spirit.” Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus’ struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, “He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself” (11:38 is translated “bearing the rebuke within himself"). According to Story, at the sight of people's grief, Jesus was overcome by "momentary self-regret," thinking, "Why did I not come sooner ... ? I have only myself to blame. ... Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?" However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

99 More negative are Morris (1995: 496), who says, "As always the Jews fail to enter the mind of Christ," and Beasley-Murray (1999: 194), who exclaims, "They did not perceive that the tears were more over them than over Lazarus!" Very possibly, Morris (1995: 496) is correct when he contends that the Jews misunderstood Jesus' tears to represent frustration.

120 "The corpse was customarily laid on a sheet of linen, wide enough to envelop the body completely and more than twice the length of the corpse. The body was so placed on the sheet that the feet were at one end, and then the sheet was drawn over the head and back down to the feet. The feet were bound at the ankles, and the arms were tied to the body with linen strips. ... Jesus' body was apparently prepared for burial in the same way (cf. 19:40; 20:5, 7)" (Carson 1991: 418–19; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 195). For mishnaic references to burial clothes and wrappings for corpses, see Kruse 2003: 256.

9 The vast majority of commentators holds that the dinner probably was eaten on Saturday at some point during the day, presumably in the evening. See Carson 1991: 427; Barrett 1978: 410; Morris 1995: 510 n. 10; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 208; R. Brown 1966: 447; Burge 2000: 337. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.366) says that the meal could have been on Sunday or possibly Saturday evening.

12 The meaning "genuine" or "pure" is supported by most commentators (e.g., Carson 1991: 428; Barrett 1978: 412; Beasley-Murray 1999: 204 n. b; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.367; Ridderbos 1997: 414). Michaels (1989: 217), on the other hand, thinks that "it may have been the trade name under which the product was marketed" (i.e., "pistic nard").

15 So Beasley-Murray 1999: 208–9; contra R. Brown 1966: 454. Witherington (1995: 207) notes the irony of Jesus being anointed at the same place where he raised someone from the dead. Carson (1991: 428) points out that in the following chapter, Jesus' disciples are told to "wash one another's feet," a command that may be anticipated by Mary anointing Jesus' feet in the present pericope.

26 Beasley-Murray (1999: 209) notes that there is no way of knowing whether or not Mary was aware of the significance of her act, while Laney (1992: 221) thinks that "Mary must have sensed the darkness of the hour." Calvin (1961: 27) observes that "a thing is said to be kept when it is held in store to be brought out appropriately and opportunely."

11 Ridderbos (1997: 423 n. 137) says that "hosanna" literally means, "Please help!"; Carson (1991: 432) prefers the meaning "Give salvation now!" But probably Barrett (1978: 417–18) is correct that at the time of Christ, the phrase might have been no more than a "jubilant shout of praise" as part of a "spontaneous ovation" (cf. Morris 1995: 516; R. Brown 1966: 457). Beasley-Murray (1999: 210) adds that it may have been a greeting as well.

30 The ironic nature of the final part of the Pharisees' statement is noted by, among others, Ridderbos (1997: 426), Carson (1991: 435), and Beasley-Murray (1999: 211). Carson (1991: 435) further suggests that there is actually "irony within irony," given the reference to unbelief in 12:37–40.

15 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 439; cf. Barrett 1978: 424; Beasley-Murray 1999: 211; R. Brown 1966: 467; Burge 2000: 344 n. 19. See Gen. 29:31, 33; Deut. 21:15; Matt. 6:24 par.; compare

Luke 14:26 with Matt. 10:37.

24 Contra Carson (1991: 440 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 212; Burge 2000: 345]), who understands this to be a genuine question (“What shall I say?”) and takes the following statement as a positive prayer (“Father, save me from this hour!”). As Morris (1995: 528) rightly notes, this interpretation, in an effort to do justice to the genuineness of Jesus’ struggle, is unlikely in that it has Jesus utter a prayer and then immediately repudiate it. Moreover, even if the question is seen as rhetorical, this does not deny the reality of Jesus’ struggle but simply shows how he overcomes succumbing to merely human reasoning.

27 Carson (1991: 441) finds it tempting to subsume this passage, and indeed all of Christ’s redemptive work along with the new covenant, under Ezek. 36, particularly 36:22, 32. On Jesus’ desire to glorify the Father, see further 13:31–32; 14:13; 17:1, 4–5 (cf. 15:8; 21:19). R. Brown (1966: 476 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.387]) sees 12:28 as analogous to the Lord’s Prayer (“Hallowed be your name”); Beasley-Murray (1999: 207) regards it as the equivalent of Mark 14:36a.

42 This is noted by Morris (1995: 551), who says that the reversal “may be significant.” R. Brown (1970: 553) theorizes that “the order in which the two titles are mentioned may reflect the development of the disciples’ understanding, for ‘Teacher’ is more common in the earlier chapters of the Gospel and ‘Lord’ in the later chapters.” Morris (1995: 551 n. 34, citing BDF §147 [cf. Barrett 1978: 443; Beasley-Murray 1999: 229 n. g]) says that the nominative ὁ διδάσκαλος καὶ κύριος “is equivalent to a vocative,” though the phrase clearly functions as an apposition to ἐγώ in the present context.

48 Cf. Matt. 10:24; Luke 6:40 (cf. 22:27). Jesus refers back to this saying in John 15:20. “Aphoristic parenthesis” is the term used by Carson (1991: 469); cf. Barrett 1978: 444; Beasley-Murray 1999: 236.

52 So Morris 1995: 549 n. 27; apparently, Carson 1991: 464–66; and the UBS committee (Metzger 1994: 204), adducing the “preponderant weight of external attestation”; contra Barrett 1978: 442; Beasley-Murray 1999: 229 n. f; Lindars 1972: 451; D. M. Smith 1999: 254; Dunn 1970: 250–51.

12 Barrett (1978: 446) maintains that “the specially favoured disciple is represented as standing in the same relation to Christ as Christ to the Father” (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 238). Morris (1995: 555 n. 53) argues that Barrett goes too far and that there is only “a tender regard” between Jesus and the “disciple he loved.” Indeed, Barrett’s statement seems somewhat hyperbolic, though Morris’s reaction leads him to a wording that appears unduly minimalistic. The verbal allusion does suggest that an analogy is intended with regard to intimacy of relationship, without implying that the beloved disciple’s relationship with Jesus is identical to Jesus’ relationship with the Father in every respect.

19 The Greek present imperative implies that the disciples were anxious already; the phrase therefore may be rendered as “stop being troubled” (Morris 1995: 565; Beasley-Murray 1999: 249; Köstenberger 1999a: 152).

22 Most commentators take both occurrences of πιστεύετε (pisteute, believe, trust) in 14:1 as imperatives (e.g., Carson 1991: 488; Morris 1995: 566; Beasley-Murray 1999: 249; Burge 2000: 391; Westcott 1908: 2.167; Köstenberger 1999a: 163). Alternatively, the first form may be an indicative: “You trust in God; trust also in me” (NIV footnote) or interrogative (Bultmann 1971: 600). Schnackenburg (1990: 3.59) notes that 14:1b forms a chiasm (“[You] Trust in God, also in me trust”).

34 The importance of 14:6 in the context of the entire Gospel (not to mention Christian theology at large) can hardly be exaggerated. Ridderbos (1997: 493) calls it “the core statement of this entire Gospel.” Schnackenburg (1990: 3.65 [cited approvingly by Beasley-Murray 1999: 252]) says that this text “forms a classical summary of the Johannine doctrine of salvation.” Burge (2000: 392) calls it the premier expression of the Gospel’s theology.

35 For a comprehensive treatment and critique of religious pluralism within the larger framework of postmodernism, see especially Carson 1996. See also Carson’s comments in his commentary (1991: 491–92) and his important rebuttal of Bruce (1983: 298–99 [picked up Beasley-Murray 1999: 253]), who alleges that “Jesus’ claim, understood in the light of the prologue to the Gospel, is inclusive, not exclusive.” On the exclusivism of 14:6, see also Keener 2003: 941–43.

40 See the additional note on 14:7. The rendering “certainly” takes ἀπάρτι (aparti) as one word (so, tentatively, Carson 1991: 493, with reference to A. Debrunner and Beasley-Murray; contra Moloney 1998: 399). This is also a possibility in 13:19 (note further the variant in 1:51; cf. Matt. 26:29, 64; Rev. 14:13; see BDAG 97).

49 Beasley-Murray (1999: 253) calls 14:10–11 “the needed counterpart of v 6b.” Burge (2000: 393) contends that the present passage “at last explains statements hinted [at] in the public ministry” (10:30, 37–38).

50 Beasley-Murray (1999: 253–54) comments, “The reality is greater than human language can express.” Contra Bultmann (1971: 609), who says that Jesus’ unity with the Father must be understood exclusively in terms of revelation, and who, in turn, concludes that the “works” are all about Jesus’ “words” because Jesus’ miracles are superfluous.

73 Though, as Moloney (1998: 407) points out, there are differences between Jesus and the Spirit as well: the latter neither becomes flesh nor dies for our sins. Alternatively, the statement refers to Jesus’ postresurrection appearances to his followers (so Ridderbos 1997: 505; Carson 1991: 501; Morris 1995: 578–59; Beasley-Murray 1999: 258; Borchert 2002: 126). Barrett (1978: 464) says that the passage refers neither to Jesus coming in the person of the Holy Spirit nor to the parousia but rather is using language appropriate to both the resurrection and the parousia to refer to both.

80 See Morris (1995: 579), who says that “if this is accepted it must be in the sense of 20:22, where the Spirit was in some sense given on the day of resurrection”; and Bruce (1983: 303), who points out that the resurrection appearances were but brief and temporary. See also Barrett (1978: 464), who maintains that the primary reference is to the resurrection but the expression also extends to the presence of Christ in his disciples (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 258). In the patristic period, the Eastern church fathers understood the phrase “in a little while” to refer to the resurrection, while the Latin church thought that Jesus meant the parousia. Bultmann (1971: 619) contends that John’s source referred to the latter, with the evangelist demythologizing his source by reinterpreting it as the former. Hence, the second coming is swallowed up in Easter. However, this reconstruction is predicated upon Bultmann’s source theory regarding John’s Gospel as well as upon his existential approach to interpretation, including the categories of “myth” and “demythologization.” Yet note how even after his resurrection, Jesus refers to a future time at which he will return (21:22, 23). Moloney (1998: 403) implausibly contends that “that day” is Jesus’ hour and departure.

5 See Ridderbos 1997: 523; Carson 1991: 525. Compare Matt. 10:24 par. (Beasley-Murray 1999: 275). See also the additional note on 15:20.

6 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 525–26, with reference to 17:20, the NIV, and many major commentators (e.g., Barrett 1978: 480; Bultmann 1971: 549; Lindars 1970: 494; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.115; Bruce 1980: 313; contra Borchert 2002: 156; Dodd 1963: 409; R. Brown 1970: 687; and the NLT). See the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 275; Carson 1991: 525–26.

8 See 7:28; 8:19, 27, 55; 16:3. Ταῦτα πάντα (tauta panta, all these things) presumably includes both hatred (15:18–19) and the resulting persecution (15:20; cf. 16:1–3; see Bultmann 1971: 550 n. 1; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276; Ridderbos 1997: 524). The expression “because of my name” reflects OT terminology pertaining to God and his great name (cf. 1 Sam. 12:22; 2 Chron. 6:32; Jer. 14:21; cf. Acts 5:41; 1 Pet. 4:14; 1 John 2:12; Rev. 2:3; see R. Brown 1970: 687), though in the present context it is essentially synonymous with “me” (Carson 1991: 526; Moloney 1998: 433).

18 So Ridderbos 1997: 525–26; Barrett 1978: 482; Carson 1991: 527; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276; contra Moloney (1998: 434), who contends that “most” favor Ps. 35. Cf. the citation of Ps. 69:9 in John 2:17. See also Ps. 119:161. Extrabiblical parallels include Ps. Sol. 7:1; b. Yoma 9b (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 147; cf. Barrett 1978: 482; R. Brown 1970: 689).

19 Regarding the phrase “whom I will send to you,” see 14:16, 26 (where the Son is said to be the sender of the Paraclete) and 16:7. “Whom I will send from the Father” and “who proceeds from the Father” are parallel (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.118; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276). Carson (1991: 528–29) rightly notes that what is in view is not ontological procession, but the mission of the Spirit is parallel to the mission of the Son (cf. Barrett 1978: 482). On “the Spirit of truth,” see commentary at 14:17 (see also 16:13; 1 John 4:6).

35 On the surface, 13:36 and 14:5 seem to contradict Jesus’ statement here, but in both previous passages the illocutionary force of the questions is a protest of Jesus’ announced departure rather than a sincere inquiry as to his destination or the implications of his leaving (Carson 1991: 532–33; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.126; R. Brown 1970: 710, followed by Beasley-Murray 1999: 279; note also the curious attempt at resolving the difficulty by Borchert 2002: 164). Burge (2000: 436) notes the present tense ἐρωτᾷ (erōta, asks).

69 So Carson 1991: 546; Barrett 1978: 495; R. Brown 1970: 735; Beasley-Murray 1999: 286; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.161.

76 Carson (1991: 548) notes how 16:28 sums up Jesus’ entire mission, from his sending from the Father (3:16–17) through the incarnation (1:10–11, 14) to his departure from the world (14:19) and his return to the Father (the dominant theme of chs. 14–17). Similarly, Borchert 2002: 179. Barrett (1978: 496) even calls the verse “a complete summary . . . of the Christian faith,” Beasley-Murray (1999: 287) “at once a summary of Johannine Christology and the heart of this Gospel” (combined by Burge 2000: 443), and Stibbe (1996: 174) “the parade example of this theme of the eternal origin and destiny of Jesus the Messiah.”

81 Some find the present reference to the Father’s presence with Jesus to contradict Jesus’ cry of dereliction on the cross (Mark 15:34 = Matt. 27:46). However, the present passage simply contrasts the disciples’ fickleness with the Father’s faithfulness (Beasley-Murray 1999: 288), which does not rule out “Jesus’ sense of total abandonment, for some brief period of time” (Carson 1991: 549). See also Borchert’s (2002: 181–83) effort to adjudicate this issue in an excursus titled “Nonabandonment in John and the Cry of Dereliction.”

4 Beasley-Murray (1999: 294) and others believe that the prayer of John 17 constitutes an expansion of the much shorter prayer in 12:27–28, but this is rightly rejected by Carson (1991: 552).

28 The phrase καὶ νῦν (kai nyn, and now) is also found in the OT in Yahweh’s instructions to Moses (Exod. 19:5) and in the conclusion of David’s prayer (2 Sam. 7:25–26) with reference to a result that should follow on the basis of the truth of certain facts (Beasley-Murray 1999: 292 n. c).

70 Carson (1991: 568) maintains that such unity is achieved not by finding “the lowest common theological denominator, but by common adherence to the apostolic gospel, by love that is joyfully self-sacrificing, by undaunted commitment to the shared goals of the mission.”

Similarly, Morris (1995: 644) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 306–7). Schlatter (1948: 325) points out that unity is all the more important as the circle of believers in Jesus grows. He also notes the contrast between such unity and the existence of various sects in contemporary Judaism.

86 Beasley-Murray (1999: 293 n. k [contra Barrett 1978: 515]), following J. N. Sanders, suggests “that the καὶ ... δὲ construction has been combined with the καὶ ... καὶ construction used to introduce a contrast, so giving the sequence καὶ ... δὲ ... καὶ ..., which should be rendered, ‘although ... yet ... and ...’ ” (all accents contextual).

3 So Carson 1991: 576; Barrett 1978: 517; Beasley-Murray 1999: 321.

15 Ridderbos (1997: 574) suggests that the two groups are mentioned jointly here to underscore Jesus’ authority. Carson (1991: 577) concludes that the two groups are described to imply that the whole world is against Jesus (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 322). See the further references in 18:12, 18, 22; 19:6 (cf. 18:36).

22 So Ridderbos 1997: 576; with reference to the threefold repetition of this phrase in this section, Morris 1995: 658 and Ball 1996: 201; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 322; Moloney 1998: 485; R. Brown 1970: 818; Borchert 2002: 219; Burge 2000: 492.

6 Though Annas is also mentioned by Luke (Luke 3:2; Acts 4:6). On the historical plausibility of such a trial, see Ridderbos 1997: 579–80. See also the excursus on the political and judicial situation in Israel during the time of Jesus in Borchert 2002: 224–26 and the chart showing the relationship of the four Gospels to one another concerning Jesus before the Jewish authorities in R. Brown 1970: 830–31. John 18:12a–b can be construed either with 18:1–11 (Beasley-Murray 1999: 324; Moloney 1998: 486; Barrett 1978: 523) or with 18:12c–14 (so Ridderbos 1997: 578; Morris 1995: 664; R. Brown 1970: 819).

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235). Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

9 See Carson 1991: 588; Beasley-Murray 1999: 317 n. h; Morris 1995: 674–75. R. Brown (1970: 844) sees the hearing before Annas as concluding at 3:00 A.M., Jesus before Caiaphas from 3:00 to 6:00 A.M., and before Pilate from 6:00 A.M. until noon.

72 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 601; cf. Morris 1995: 705; Beasley-Murray 1999: 340; Burge 2000: 505; Borchert 2002: 254. Contra Barrett (1978: 543), who thinks that the singular participle constructed from the verb παραδίδωμι (paradidōmi, I hand over) suggests Judas. See also the discussions by Schnackenburg (1990: 3.261–63) and Ridderbos (1997: 603), both of whom ultimately point to the Jews as the most likely referent. Stibbe (1992: 170) concludes that “the one” in 19:11 probably refers to Caiaphas as a representative of the Jewish nation, as the evangelist has a propensity to implicate the Jews in Jesus’ death.

1 For discussions of this passage’s relationship to the Synoptics, see Barrett 1978: 546–48 (on the assumption of John’s use of Mark and the superiority of Markan material); Beasley-Murray 1999: 343–44; Bultmann 1971: 667; R. Brown 1970: 913–16. R. Brown (1970: 910–12) divides 19:16b–42 into five chiastically arranged episodes plus introduction and conclusion; Moloney (1998: 502, following Donald Senior) sees the five scenes but not the chiasm (see also Moloney’s literary analysis of John 18–19 on pp. 511–12).

2 So, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 608; Carson 1991: 608; Morris 1995: 711; Beasley-Murray 1999: 344; Borchert 2002: 260; Burge 2000: 524. Contra Moloney (1998: 506, following R. Brown), who contends that “the Jews” are the subject of the verb.

4 This most likely is to describe the custom that called for those who were to be crucified to carry their own cross (see the primary references cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 174–75; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 608 n. 128; Beasley-Murray 1999: 345). “By himself” is probably more accurate than the TNIV’s “carrying his own cross.” Note also the emphatic position of ἐαυτοῦ (Barrett 1978: 548).

6 So, with a variety of nuances, Witherington 1995: 308; R. Brown 1970: 917; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270; and Moloney 1998: 502, 506. Carson (1991: 609), who says that the omission is due to John’s desire to further highlight Jesus’ willing obedience to the Father, dismisses as unduly speculative the view that the omission is part of a polemic against the theory that Simon of Cyrene was himself crucified (contra Beasley-Murray 1999: 345). Barrett (1978: 548) proposes that the omission is due to the evangelist’s effort to highlight the “all-sufficiency of Jesus ... in effecting the redemption of the world.” Beasley-Murray (1999: 345 [cf. Borchert 2002: 261; R. Brown 1970: 917–18; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270]) suggests that the omission serves to create an allusion to Isaac carrying the wood for his sacrifice.

16 The passage may also echo Isa. 53:12: “numbered with the transgressors” (Beasley-Murray 1999: 346; Bultmann 1971: 669 n. 1; R. Brown 1970: 900; more cautious is Carson [1991: 611–12]).

17 So, for example, Ridderbos 1997: 608; Beasley-Murray 1999: 346; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270; Moloney 1998: 502; Schlatter 1948: 348; Westcott 1908: 2.308.

30 Carson (1991: 611) notes that Caiaphas and Pilate unwittingly serve a prophetic function in the Johannine narrative (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 346; Bultmann 1971: 669).

36 See Repond 1922; Dalman 1928–39: 5.126–29. Josephus notes that the high priestly robe (χιτών, chiton) was “not composed of two pieces, ... [but] one long woven cloth” (Ant. 3.7.4 §161; cf. Exod. 28:31; Rev. 1:13), while Philo uses a robe as symbolic of the Logos, which binds all things together in unity (Flight 20 §§110–12). However, it is far from certain whether the present passage alludes to the high-priestly garment (or the unity of the church, for that matter) (so, rightly, Carson 1991: 614; contra Moloney 1998: 503, 507). Carson (1991: 614–15) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 347–48), following Schnackenburg (1990: 3.274), see in the preservation of the seamless tunic an allusion to the Father's preservation of the Son; Carson also sees a connection with the footwashing.

38 There is no agreement, however, on the exact way in which soldiers and bystanders are related by the evangelist. Ridderbos (1997: 610 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 903]) thinks that there is no implied contrast between these two groups. Other commentators believe that the construction does imply such a contrast (e.g., Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.273, 276). If a contrast is intended, it is hardly a sharp one; more likely, the two groups are distinguished as the narrative moves from one to the other.

40 Beasley-Murray (1999: 348–39) actually suggests that the women who stood afar could have been different women.

41 The historicity of 19:25 is buttressed by several factors (Carson 1991: 615; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 349; Witherington 1995: 309; contra Barrett 1978: 551–52): (1) the Roman soldiers most likely would not have cared to remove women from the vicinity of the cross; (2) Jesus' disciples would not have been seen as a threat by the Roman administration; (3) the fact that the sign affixed to the cross was intended to be read, and in fact was read (19:20), by many implies that people could get close enough to the cross to read it; (4) the Gospels record as many as seven statements by Jesus on the cross, suggesting that people were close enough to hear him speak.

43 So also the vast majority of commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Morris 1995: 716–17; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Bultmann 1971: 672; Borchert 2002: 268; R. Brown 1970: 904; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.276. Ridderbos (1997: 611 n. 142) notes that in light of Mark 15:40 and Matt. 27:56, there could have been other women there as well. See also Luke 23:49.

44 See Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 616; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Burge 2000: 528; contra Barrett 1978: 551–52; Bultmann 1971: 672 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.277. Carson (1991: 616 [cf. Morris 1995: 717]) notes that, like Jesus' mother's sister, Jesus' mother is also unnamed here and elsewhere in the Gospel (as is the "disciple Jesus loved" in 19:26–27).

47 Commentators have detected various types of symbolism in this scene. Bultmann (1971: 673), true to F. C. Baur, sees Mary as representative of Jewish Christianity, and the beloved disciple of Gentile Christianity, the latter being charged to honor the former as its "mother," from whom it originated (cf. Brodie 1993: 549). Witherington (1995: 309) views these two characters as symbolic of a new Adam and Eve, who are obedient whereas the former were not. Carson (1991: 618, following M. Gourgues) suggests that Mary, on account of her faith in Christ, is now able metaphorically to become a mother to a new son supplied for her by Jesus (cf. Matt. 19:29; see also Witherington 1995: 310). Beasley-Murray (1999: 350, following Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278) sees Mary as representing that part of Israel that is willing to believe in Jesus as the Messiah. Refreshingly, and refusing to resort to symbolism or allegory, Morris (1995: 718) says the beloved disciple simply "provided her [Mary] with a roof" and took her under his care. Others focus on lessons (to be) learned by Mary, such as needing to "step back in submission to the law of life that the Father has set for her son" (Ridderbos 1997: 612) or to receive the gift of salvation that she desired to receive at the wedding in Cana (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278; Beasley-Murray 1999: 350; Borchert 2002: 269).

59 Beasley-Murray (1999: 353) suggests that this might be the "loud cry" referred to in Mark 15:37. Westcott (1908: 2.317) provides a helpful chronological synthesis of Jesus' "seven words” from the cross.

66 See the summary in Carson 1991: 623–24, and the fuller treatment in Beasley-Murray 1999: 355–58. For further discussion, see Barbet 1953; W. Edwards, Gabel, and Hosmer 1986; Sava 1960.

67 See Lev. Rab. 15.2 on Lev. 13:2. Commentators disagree as to whether or not the present reference is intended to counter incipient Docetism, which denied Jesus’ full humanity at his death. Some consider this unlikely (Ridderbos [1997: 620], who thinks that the present passage is simply designed to further support the reliability and eyewitness nature of the account; R. Brown 1970: 949–52), while a majority favors such a polemic purpose (e.g., Carson [1991: 623], who sees this verse as the “counterpoint” to 1:14; Barrett 1978: 556; Morris 1995: 724; Beasley-Murray 1999: 356; Borchert 2002: 276–77; Burge 2000: 532).

75 So R. Brown 1970: 952–53; Moloney 1998: 509. Beasley-Murray (1999: 355) suggests that the source of the Fourth Gospel was alluding to Passover typology, while the evangelist is alluding to the righteous sufferer of Ps. 34. Somewhat ironically, Barrett (1978: 558) proposes the exact converse: the source is alluding to the Psalms typology, while the evangelist is alluding to Passover typology. Ridderbos (1997: 622–23) opts for the Psalms typology but denies the Passover allusion.

84 Ridderbos 1997: 628; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 360; Bultmann 1971: 680.

1 On the structure of John 20, see the discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 3.301–2. See also Beasley-Murray 1999: 367–70; Moloney 1998: 517; Borchert 2002: 289; R. Brown 1970: 995–96. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.321) considers 20:11–18 to be a “prelude” to 20:19–29. Borchert (2002: 289–90, 296) perceives in 20:1–18 an “envelope effect or sandwich pattern” whereby the narratives involving Mary have been framed around 20:3–10, with the statement about the beloved disciple in 20:8 serving as the focal point of this chapter. Moloney (1998: 515–16) finds an inclusio between 1:35–51 and chapter 20.

2 Cf. Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; cf. 1 Cor. 15:4; see Carson 1991: 635. The expression “on the first day of the week” reads more literally, “on one of the Sabbath [week]” and may allude to the week of creation (cf. Gen. Rab. 11.9 on Gen. 2:3). Morris (1991: 733 n. 7 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. a]) notes that σαββάτων (sabbatōn) can mean either “Sabbath” or “week” (contra R. Brown [1970: 980], who claims that the meaning “week” emerged only later). The use of the cardinal numeral (“one”) for the ordinal (“first”) may represent a Semitism (Barrett 1978: 562; cf. Morris 1995: 733 n. 6; Beasley-Murray 1999: 366; Moloney 1998: 521; Lindars 1972: 599).

4 Carson (1991: 635–36 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 371]) suggests that Mary was alone during her first trip to the tomb (contra Morris 1995: 734; Moloney 1998: 522; Witherington 1995: 323; Burge 2000: 553). Mary’s witness was not used as significantly in the preaching of the early church as that of Peter, doubtless because evidence provided by a woman was held in lesser esteem (e.g., m. Roš Haš. 1.8). This is underscored by the fact that Jesus’ encounter with Mary is not included in the resurrection appearances to the disciples cited in 21:14.

17 This is disputed by Brodie (1993: 561), who says that the beloved disciple is “in better running order,” which he takes to be symbolic of superior discipleship (though on p. 564 he sees both disciples as symbolic of the unity achieved through faith in the ascending Christ). Beasley-Murray (1999: 371–72) contends that the beloved disciple’s speed was due to the extent of his love for Jesus; Moloney (1998: 522) suggests that he had stronger faith that a miracle had occurred. Yet others have seen in this statement an affirmation of John's superiority over Peter (e.g., Schnackenburg 1990: 3.310, 312; Moloney 1998: 520; R. Brown 1970: 1004–7). More likely, however, both the beloved disciple and Peter are presented here as a duo of eyewitnesses to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 632; Carson 1991: 636–37; Bultmann 1971: 684).

21 Carson (1991: 637) denies that the burial cloths still retained the shape of Jesus' body (cf. Morris 1995: 735; Beasley-Murray 1999: 372; R. Brown 1970: 1007–8). But Whitacre (1999: 473) says, "With the body gone, the clothes were presumably collapsed, though perhaps retaining much of their shape due to the spices."

22 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 637; Barrett 1978: 563; Morris 1995: 735; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.311; Moloney 1998: 523. Carson also suggests that the fact that the graveclothes were still in the tomb is intended to create a contrast with Lazarus, who left the tomb with his graveclothes on (11:44) (cf. Barrett 1978: 563; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.311; Beasley-Murray 1999: 372; Moloney 1998: 519–20).

26 Note the plural "they" (Beasley-Murray 1999: 373). As Lee (1995: 40) points out, the present pericope thus acts as a prolepsis to John 21. Specifically, the beloved disciple recognizes the risen Jesus in 21:7.

14 Commentators are not agreed as to whether Mary had already touched Jesus or was about to do so. Some say that Mary had already touched him (e.g., Morris 1995: 742; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.318; Witherington 1995: 331; R. Brown 1970: 992; Burge 2000: 555), while others seem to allow for the possibility that she was about to but had not yet done so (e.g., Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. g, 376; Bultmann 1971: 687). Regarding Mary's devotion, see Ruth 1:16. Stibbe (1993: 205) says that the present passage is "most stylized" and detects intertextual echoes with Song 3:1–3.

7 See commentary at 14:27; 16:33. So Beasley-Murray 1999: 379; Carson 1991: 647; Witherington 1995: 339–40; Moloney 1998: 530.

9 See Carson 1991: 656; R. Brown 1970: 1022; Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. i.

16 The critique by Hatina (1993), who says that the reference is to the indwelling Paraclete, fails to convince. Contrary to the view of many commentators, the present pericope does not constitute the Johannine equivalent to Pentecost (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1038; Barrett [1978: 570], who says that the present passage cannot be harmonized with Acts 2; Bultmann 1971: 691), nor is Calvin's (1961: 205) proposal satisfactory that at 20:22 the disciples "were only sprinkled with His grace and not [as at Pentecost] saturated with full power." Beasley-Murray (1999: 382 [followed by Borchert 2002: 307–8]) believes that John telescoped the giving of the Spirit without concern for chronology (citing the reference to the ascension in 20:17 as a parallel). M. Turner (1977) thinks that the reference is not to the Spirit at all but to Jesus' message as Spirit and life. The treatment by Moloney (1998: 532, 535) is rather idiosyncratic. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.325), too, surprisingly contends that the Johannine instance involves all believers, while the events in Acts 2 pertain to the apostles. If anything, one might have expected the opposite kind of reasoning, with John's account anticipating the general outpouring narrated in Acts 2. Against the view of Burge (2000: 558 [cf. Burge 1987: 148–49]), who notes the connection between the present passage and Jesus' promise to send the Spirit in John 14 and 16, the present event does not mark the actual fulfillment of these promises other than by way of anticipatory sign. Keener's (2003: 1196–1200, see also 1204–6) discussion, including an attempted refutation of M. Turner (1998), remains inconclusive and, on the whole, fails to convince.

23 See Schlatter 1959: 511; Beasley-Murray 1999: 383; Borchert 2002: 310. The rabbis used the terms “binding” and “loosing” to declare what was forbidden or permitted by the law. See Str-B 1:738–41; Büchsel, TDNT 2:60–61; J. Lightfoot 1859: 2.237–41; Dalman 1902: 213–17.

7 Stibbe (1996: 203) comments, “Like Mary Magdalene, Thomas has made the journey to ‘owned’ faith ... his own faith in Jesus as Yahweh, ‘Lord and God.’ ” Note the double personal pronoun μου (mou, my), which accentuates the personal nature of Thomas’s confession (Carson 1991: 659; Beasley-Murray 1999: 386; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.332; Wallace 1995: 82).

14 So, rightly, the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 197: 648; Morris 1995: 754; Carson 1991: 659; Beasley-Murray 1999: 386; Burge 2000: 563; Barrett 1978: 573; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.334; contra Borchert 2002: 316; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

4 Contra Carson (1991: 661), who contends that the preeminent sign is Jesus’ death, resurrection, and exaltation; and Beasley-Murray (1999: 387), who maintains that the resurrection appearances should also be viewed as signs.

5 Contra those who would see ταῦτα (tauta, these) in 20:31 referring not to the antecedent πολλὰ ἄλλα σημεῖα (polla alla sēmeia, many other signs) in 20:30 but, on the contrary, to “these things” other than those signs. The term “Christ” is mentioned with possible or definite reference to Jesus in 1:41; 4:25, 29; 7:26, 27, 31, 41, 42; 9:22; 10:24; 11:27; 12:34; 20:31. “Son of God” occurs in 1:34, 49; 3:18; 5:25; 10:36; 11:4, 27; 19:7; 20:31. Though closely related, the two terms are not synonymous (Ridderbos 1997: 653; contra Beasley-Murray 1999: 388). “Christ” primarily relates to Jewish messianic expectations; “Son of God” also has messianic connotations but beyond this accentuates more keenly relationship with God, especially in the context of the Johannine characterization of Jesus as the Son of the Father.

6 Ridderbos (1997: 658–59) detects in this a reference to “the unity they [the disciples] recovered after Jesus’ resurrection.” Similarly, Talbert (1992: 259) sees in this “unity” an answer to Jesus’ prayer in 17:11 and a result of the Spirit’s enabling. This seems to rest too much interpretive weight on the rather inconspicuous expression “were together,” however. Little else in the context suggests that these disciples are Spirit-filled (note that they caught no fish). The presence of symbolism in the number seven is doubtful as well (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 650; Carson 1991: 669; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.352; Beasley-Murray 1999: 399; Borchert 2002: 324); it is hard to see what would connote “completeness” in the present instance (contra Brodie 1993: 582).

7 This, incidentally, is yet another argument against reading 20:22 as indicating an actual impartation of the Spirit at that point. Had they already received the Spirit, it would be almost inexplicable why Peter went back to fishing so soon after that event. So, rightly, Carson (1991: 669–70 [cf. Morris 1995: 760]): “It is impossible to imagine any of this taking place in Acts, after Pentecost ... this is not the portrait of believers who have received the promised Paraclete.” Barrett (1978: 579) considers it “unthinkable” that Peter and his fellow disciples “should contemplate a return to their former occupation after the events of chapter 20.” Contra Keener (2003: 1227), who argues against negative interpretations of the disciples’ return to fishing in 21:3, saying that the disciples simply made use of free time (citing Bruce 1983: 399). Keener also cites Beasley-Murray’s (1999: 399) contention that, even though Jesus had risen from the dead, the disciples must still eat.

13 So, rightly, Beasley-Murray 1999: 400: “The Jesus whom they were meeting in his Easter glory was living in a different mode of existence from that of his former earthly conditions.”

34 Witherington (1995: 354) considers this to be “a fellowship meal, a family reunion of a sort” (similarly, Michaels 1989: 356, 358), contra those who would detect the presence of “eucharistic symbolism” (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1098–1100; D. M. Smith 1999: 394; Stibbe 1993: 212; Whitacre 1999: 494). In fact, Beasley-Murray (1999: 404) points out that what is celebrated here is not Jesus’ death but his resurrection, which enabled his followers to enjoy fellowship with their Lord subsequent to his death. He classifies the present meal as “an epiphany celebration of the risen Lord” (following Rissi 1979: 81–86). Schlatter (1948: 369) says that the disciples’ present disposition fulfills 16:23.

12 This is illustrated by the following passages: Epictetus, Diatribai 3.26.22; Seneca, Ad Marciam de consolatione 20.3; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 7.69; Tertullian, De pudicitia 22 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 194). See Bauer (1925: 232) and Haenchen (1984: 2.226–27), who also note passages in Artemidorus and Plautus; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Hengel 1977: esp. chapter 4.

14 Note further the verbal link between the reference to Jesus’ “lifting up” (i.e., crucifixion) in 12:32–33 and the reference to Peter’s future destiny in 21:19. See Carson 1991: 679–80; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Barrett 1978: 585. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 667); Morris (1995: 773); and Schnackenburg (1990: 3.366–67), who believe that the reference is more generally to martyrdom.

11 Carson (1991: 682 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 410]) suggests that the Fourth Evangelist may be encountering a situation similar to the one Paul faced in Corinth (see 1 Cor. 1–4, esp. 1:10–11). Thus, the evangelist is stressing that the mode of Christian service will vary from person to person and that the important thing is to follow Christ as his disciple. Hence, there will be one flock (John 10:16) in unity (ch. 17).

10 See Köstenberger 1999a: 30–31. There has been a virtual avalanche of literary explorations of Johannine themes or specific Johannine portions of text pouring from the presses in the last two decades. Among those are Culpepper 1983; Duke 1985; Staley 1988; M. Davies 1992; Stibbe 1992; 1994; Lee 1994; Tovey 1997; Beck 1997; Conway 1999; and Harstine 2002, to list but a few.

39 Except, of course, for Simon’s father (1:42; 21:15–17). For a list of named individual characters in the Fourth Gospel, see Beck 1997: 30. For a discussion of all the significant named characters in John (plus the mother of Jesus and the “beloved disciple”), see M. Davies 1992: 316–49.

12 The use of a compound subject with a singular verb suggests that Jesus was invited to the wedding while his disciples simply accompanied him (Wallace 1996: 344). T. Martin (1998), surveying references to mothers in ancient writings, demonstrates that Mary is not mentioned by name because John assumed knowledge of her name among his readers (contra symbolic or polemical interpretations; see Beck 1993). For a list of unnamed characters in this Gospel, see Beck 1997: 31 (significant instances are the mother of Jesus, the Samaritan woman, the royal official, the lame man at the pool, the man born blind, and the beloved disciple). See also Beck’s (1997: 54–62) treatment of the characterization of the mother of Jesus in John’s Gospel.

12 Arguably, repeated reference does not necessarily imply progression. For a mediating position, see Beck (1997: 63–70, esp. 69), who concludes that Nicodemus’s “ambiguous characterization” is intended to challenge the reader to deeper faith. Beck (1997: 63) believes that Nicodemus's placement between two anonymous female characters suggests that his failure to respond positively serves as a foil for the positive responses of those two characters.

12 Arguably, repeated reference does not necessarily imply progression. For a mediating position, see Beck (1997: 63–70, esp. 69), who concludes that Nicodemus's "ambiguous characterization" is intended to challenge the reader to deeper faith. Beck (1997: 63) believes that Nicodemus's placement between two anonymous female characters suggests that his failure to respond positively serves as a foil for the positive responses of those two characters.

7 O'Day (1986: 76) says that the question "is not a denial, but neither is it a full affirmative." BDAG 649 identifies 4:29b as a hesitant question, citing Matt. 12:23 as closest parallel; BDF §221: "perhaps this is the Messiah." See also the discussion in Beck 1997: 75–76.

8 On the characterization of this official in John's Gospel, see the discussion in Beck 1997: 78–82.

41 Moloney 1998: 173; cf. Metzner 1999; Lee 1994: 110; Witkamp 1985: 24; Leidig 1979: 211; contra Thomas 1995: 18. Moloney (1998: 173) rightly notes, contra Beck (1993 [cf. 1997: 86–90]), who argues that anonymous characters in the Fourth Gospel draw the reader into an identification with the character, "The reader of the Fourth Gospel, however, hardly identifies with a man who is in league with 'the Jews' (vs. 15)." Keener (2003: 87), similarly, contends that a list of Johannine models of faith is not entirely coextensive with anonymous characters (citing esp. 5:14–15) and registers this as his only serious disagreement with Beck (p. 87 n. 49). Beck, in a review (2001), indirectly responds to my earlier criticism (Köstenberger 1999b, reviewing Beck 1997) that the man in John 5 disproves his theory by alleging, in effect, that I have no place for literary analysis in my hermeneutical method. Nothing could be further from the truth. My concern, rather, lies with an unqualified wholesale adoption of reader-response criticism by evangelicals who fail to realize that this methodology is part and parcel of a postmodern hermeneutic that is left with nothing but subjective readings devoid of any claim to authority or universal applicability. Moreover, I was concerned to point out that Beck's central thesis (i.e., that anonymity necessarily equals ideal function and positive characterization) is invalid. Note further this puzzling conclusion by Brodie (1993: 238): "The final picture ... is ... open to a positive interpretation: the man has finally come to mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus, and he is announcing the good news to the Jews." Precisely where Brodie finds the man "announcing the good news to the Jews" is unclear to me, nor can I see textual evidence for the man coming to "mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus."

10 The unfortunate precedent of including the pericope may have been set by Erasmus, who, though doubting the originality of the passage, nonetheless included it in his 1516 edition of the Greek NT in deference to its popularity by readers of the Latin Vulgate. From there, the pericope found its way into the seventeenth-century Textus Receptus (Burge 1984: 148 n. 29). See also Beck (1997: 101–7, esp. 103–4), who concludes that the pericope is inauthentic but nonetheless incorporates it in his study by analyzing its effect on the reader. This judgment, however, is of doubtful merit in that it fails to consider the original and the earliest readers of the Gospel (who would not have read the Gospel with this pericope), and in that it unduly neglects issues such as canonicity, inspiration, and biblical authority.

44 Though there is little to justify the conclusion by Charlesworth (1995) that Thomas is the "beloved disciple" (see the critique by Beck 1997: 127–31).

10 So, among others, Schlatter 1948: 286. On the "disciple Jesus loved," see Köstenberger

Becker, U. 247n6, 419n2
Bede 601n6
Beetham, F. G. 550n56
Beetham, P. A. 550n56
Behm, J. 270, 436n70

1998b: 154–61 (including further bibliographic references). For the identification of the “disciple Jesus loved” with John the son of Zebedee, see chapter 1 in Köstenberger 1999a; for the identification of the “disciple Jesus loved” with the Fourth Evangelist, see Jackson 1999. See also the discussion of authorial modesty in Vanhoozer 1993: 374, citing Augustine and Westcott. Contra Culpepper (1983: 121–23), who views the “beloved disciple” not only as an “ideal disciple” but also as the physical personification of the Paraclete. Beck (1997: 108–36) essentially aligns himself with Culpepper in characterizing this disciple as “the paradigm” or “embodiment of discipleship” (pp. 135–36).

23 In this he compares favorably with Thomas later in this chapter (Moloney 1998: 538; see commentary at 20:24–29). Ridderbos (1997: 633 n. 15 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Beck 1997: 117–18]) suggests that ἐπίστευσεν (episteusen, he believed) is an ingressive aorist. He also contrasts Mary’s reaction (concern that the body had been stolen) with that of the beloved disciple (faith).

6 A briefer and more dated (but still helpful) survey is found in Burge 1984: 142–43. Further bibliographic references to materials dealing with both external and internal evidence can be found in Wallace 1993: 290 n. 2; J. A. Sanders 1990: 346 n. 1; Burge 1984: 141 n. 5. Also regularly cited is the monograph by Becker (1963).

2 The outline of the structure of the first unit (13:31–14:31) below follows Carson (1991: 498) and Blomberg (2002: 199), who take 14:15–31 as a single unit. Others divide this section between 14:24 and 14:25 (e.g., Moloney 1998: 391–92; R. Brown 1970: 623). Schnackenburg (1990: 3.58), following Becker, sees a break between 14:17 and 14:18.

6 Augustine (In Iohannis Evangelium 124.1 [cited in Volting 2001: 51 n. 79]) already acknowledges the difficulty of understanding the import of Jesus’ words. While presupposing Peter’s martyrdom and John’s dying a natural death, he follows an allegorical line of interpretation, seeing the two apostles as representing, respectively, the vita activa (“active life”) and the vita contemplativa (“contemplative life”), with the latter being superior to the former (Volting 2001: 51–53). Literal interpretations are advocated by Bede and Rupert of Deutz (Volting 2001: 53 n. 83). Some patristic and medieval authors also seek to alleviate the apparent difficulty that Jesus predicted that both sons of Zebedee would drink from his bitter cup (Matt. 20:23; see references in Volting 2001: 55).

56 There is some uncertainty as to the exact species of hyssop referred to here; see the discussion in Wilkinson 1964: 77; Shewell-Cooper 1962: 75–76; Beetham 1993.

56 There is some uncertainty as to the exact species of hyssop referred to here; see the discussion in Wilkinson 1964: 77; Shewell-Cooper 1962: 75–76; Beetham 1993.

70 The translation of the term has proved particularly difficult since there does not seem to be an exact equivalent in the English language (see discussion in Carson 1991: 499). None of the expressions chosen in English translations seems fully adequate: “Counselor” (NIV) smacks of contemporary notions of counseling (marriage counselor, camp counselor), focusing primarily on emotional or psychological aspects (though the legal term “Counselor” or “Counsel” is more appropriate); “Helper” (NASB, ESV, ISV) is more neutral but conveys inferior status overtones not

Behr, J. 25n19, 40n62
Bell, H. I. 413n9
Belle, G. van 168, 168n4
Ben-David, A. 106n19

present in the text and lacks the legal connotation possibly present (cf. the discussion in Lindars 1972: 479); the fact that some translations give several alternative renderings in footnotes also suggests that any one English rendering may be inadequate (e.g., NLT: “the Counselor; or Comforter, or Encourager, or Advocate”). “Companion” (suggested by Brodie [1993: 466]) also falls short, as does Calvin’s (1961: 82) “Patron.” Some make reference to the root meaning of the word, “one called alongside to help,” but it is unclear whether first-century usage consciously drew on this background. There is evidence that the expression was used in a legal setting, but it is less clear that the meaning should be restricted to “Advocate” (so, consistently, the TNIV) or the like (standard Greek reference works cite the following meanings: LSJ—one called to one’s aid, legal assistant, advocate, summoned, intercessor; Behm, TDNT 5:800–814—legal advisor, helper, advocate in court [for a helpful survey, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.144–50]). Perhaps “helping presence” captures the import of the term better than any other (Köstenberger 1999a: 157) for the following reasons: (1) this is what Jesus was while with the disciples; (2) this encompasses the various functions laid out for the Spirit in John 14–16; (3) this transcends (but may include) the legal context of the term (see esp. 16:7–11). See the discussion by Ridderbos (1997: 503), who issues a plea to let the Johannine context (rather than alleged extrabiblical parallels) determine the meaning of παράκλητος and concludes that “the dominant idea is of someone who offers assistance in a situation in which help is needed.”

19 See the allusion to the tabernacle in 1:14 and the reference to God’s giving the law through Moses in 1:17 (see also 5:46). As Behr (2000: 94 [cf. M. Edwards 1995]) notes, for the second-century church fathers, including Justin Martyr, “The revelation of God in the incarnate Logos is the last, even if the most important, in a series of discrete revelations.” According to Irenaeus, “[t]he pre-existence of Christ, the Word of God, is inextricably connected with his seminal presence in Scripture, the word of God” (inseminatus est ubique in Scripturis ejus Filius Dei; Behr 2000: 98).

62 The second-century church father Irenaeus considered 1:14 to be a “summary” of 1:1–13 (cited in Behr 2000: 102).

9 This is the only instance of the verb ἀπορέω (aporeō, be at a loss) in this Gospel. The verb’s other NT occurrences convey the notion of perplexity (Mark 6:20; Luke 24:4 [cf. 21:25]; Acts 25:20; 2 Cor. 4:8; Gal. 4:20). See also 1 Macc. 3:31; Josephus, Ant. 2.12.2 §271; Life 32 §161; the “Unknown Gospel” 1.63 (mid-second century A.D.) (see Bell and Skeat 1935: 13).

4 One school of interpretation identifies πατρίς (patris, homeland, hometown) in 4:44 with Jerusalem (so Barrett 1978: 246; Dodd 1953: 352; 1963: 238–41; Meeks 1966; 1967: 39–40; see, much earlier, Origen, Commentarii in evangelium Joannis 13.54–56, cited in van Belle 1998: 30). However, see the critiques by W. Davies (1974: 321–31) and Stimpfle (1992: 89) as summarized by van Belle (1998: 30–32). The Galilee/Nazareth explanation is found already in Augustine (cited by van Belle 1998: 33) and is defended by Stimpfle (1992: 86–96 [followed by van Belle 1998: 27–44]) and others (see van Belle 1998: 32–33; see also Ridderbos 1997: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 73; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.463). Still others think that both Galilee and Judea are in view (Carson 1991: 235–36; Burge 2000: 151–52; Witherington 1995: 126; W. Davies 1974: 321–31).

Berger, K. 157n56, 165n80, 179n20, 185n47, 283n22, 300n8, 302, 306n43, 307n51, 382n34
Bernard, J. H. 314n81, 348n130, 411, 482n5, 520, 562n15

19 Several commentators also mention that Tyrian coinage would have been preferred because it did not bear effigies (Moloney 1998: 76; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38 n. c; R. Brown 1966: 115; Borchert 1996: 163). However, this is disputed by Murphy-O'Connor (2000: 47, referring to Ben-David 1969), who cites evidence that Tyrian shekels “carried the head of the god Melkart (or Herakles) on the obverse and a Tyrian (Ptolemaic) eagle on the reverse with the inscription ‘Tyre the holy and inviolable.’ ” Murphy-O'Connor also notes the minting of Jewish shekels carrying the legend “shekel of Israel/Jerusalem [is/the] holy” at the onset of the Jewish war in A.D. 66 (pp. 47–48, citing Schürer 1973–79: 1.605), and he points to the Qumran interpretation of a one-time requirement in 4Q159 frag. 1, col. 2, lines 6–7 (p. 49).

56 See Bammel 1957: 381–85; Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 264–65; Kippenberg 1971: 276–327.

80 C. Koester 1990b: 665–80, esp. 667; cf. Deissmann 1927: 364–65; Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 268.

20 Mackowski (1980: 81–83) even believes that behind 5:2–9 is the story of a pagan sanctuary that he believes to have been an Asclepieum; but this is categorically ruled out by Hengel (1999: 313), who nonetheless points to the significance of the Asclepius cult for John’s Asia Minor audience (p. 315, referring also to a work by K. H. Rengstorf in n. 84). See also the ancient and bibliographic references cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 266–67.

47 See Gen. Rab. 11.10; Exod. Rab. 30.9, citing Isa. 6:3; Jer. 23:24. The Letter of Aristeas (second century B.C.) says that God “is continually at work in everything” (210). See also Eusebius, Praeparatio evangelica 13.12.11, frg. 5 (cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 267).

22 Most frequently cited is the healing of the blind soldier Valerius Aper, apparently by Asclepius, in which an eye-salve was used (Deissmann 1927: 135; Rengstorf, TDNT 6:119). According to Boring, Berger, and Colpe (1995: 284), the inscription probably comes from the Asclepius temple on the island in the Tiber in Rome and dates to A.D. 138.

8 Though the OT is doubtless John’s primary point of reference, the kind of imagery employed by the evangelist would not have been unknown to his Hellenistic audience. Cf. Themistius, Peri Philanthr. 9d–10c (fourth century A.D.), cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 286.

43 See Exod. 3:7; 33:12, 17; Jer. 31:34; Hos. 6:6; 13:5; Nah. 1:7. For additional references and discussion, see Ridderbos 1997: 361. The saying “I know those who are mine, and those who are mine know me” has a proverbial ring to it; Boring, Berger, and Colpe (1995: 288) cite a Greek parallel: “I know Simon and Simon knows me.”

51 Leaders who promoted unity were also prized in the Hellenistic world (e.g., Plutarch, De Alexandri magni fortuna aut virtute 6 [cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 288]).

34 The Sibylline Oracles speak of a “heavenly crash of thunder, the voice of God” (5:344–45). The notion of heaven answering human speech in thunder is also found in the ancient Greek world (Homer, Odyssey 20.97–104 [cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 292]).

81 The antecedent of εἶπεν (eipen, said) in 10:35 could be God (“he”) or the law (“it”). The former alternative is chosen by the vast majority of versions, including the NIV = TNIV, NASB, ISV, ESV, HCSB, and KJV; the latter is preferred by the NAB. The issue is almost universally ignored by commentators, who apparently are almost exclusively preoccupied with adjudicating the appropriation of Ps. 82:6 in the present context. One of the few exceptions is Bernard (1928:

2.368), who favors the law as antecedent: “if then the Law (i.e. the Scripture) called them gods” (so also, apparently, Borchert 1996: 343). Against the majority of translations, there seems to be good reason to favor the law as antecedent, especially since the present passage is immediately followed by the statement that “Scripture cannot be broken,” which thus would provide for a continuity of subjects in 10:34–35: “Is it not written in your law. . . If it called . . . and Scripture cannot be broken. . . .”

130 Their signs-based response is reminiscent of 2:23. Morris (1995: 499) construes the relationship between “many of the Jews” and “who had come to Mary” in narrow terms as appositional, so that it would have been the Jews who had come to Mary who believed. However, R. Brown (1966: 438 [contra Bernard 1928: 2.401–2]) cogently contends that there is no need to overemphasize the agreement of the participle so as to conclude that all the Jews who had come to comfort Mary believed in Jesus.

5 Hence, it was common especially in older commentators to refer to the present prayer as Jesus’ “prayer of consecration” (e.g., Cullmann, E. C. Hoskyns, Bernard, W. F. Howard [cited in Agourides 1968: 138]; see also Westcott [1908: 2.238], who titles John 17 “The Prayer of Consecration” but later says that the chapter contains “what may be most properly called ‘the Lord’s Prayer’”). This designation has merit (esp. in light of 17:19 [so, rightly, Michaels 1989: 297]), as long as it is not used to imply a strong link between the prayer and the liturgical practices of the church toward the end of the first century A.D. More modestly and soberly, Calvin (1961: 134) calls the prayer “the seal of the preceding teaching” of Jesus.

15 Morris 1995: 734; cf. Bernard 1928: 2:262. Contra Carson (1991: 635, following Bultmann), who maintains that the plural “we” is “merely a mode of speech, without plural referent.”

69 Ridderbos (1997: 84) thinks that this identification is all the more likely since Peter learns about Jesus from his brother Andrew and this unnamed disciple (1:41) and since Peter and John are closely associated in this and the other Gospels (so also Schlatter 1948: 55; more cautious assessments are found in Borchert 1996: 143; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.310; Carson 1991: 154). Note also the connection between Andrew and John in the Muratorian Canon (Bettenson 1967: 28). Michaels (1989: 37) thinks that the second disciple is Philip. Keener (2003: 468) likewise sees “no reason” to identify the other disciple with the beloved disciple, since he is not mentioned until 13:23. On a literary level, this is self-evident, but the absence of “beloved disciple” language prior to 13:23 does not seem to rule out the possibility that the apostle John appears in the Johannine narrative as a historical character that is left unnamed.

68 There are no similar texts in Second Temple literature. Paul refers to “the God who gives life to the dead and calls things that are not as though they were” (Rom. 4:17; cf. Eph. 2:1–5). On φωνή (phōnē, voice), see Betz, TDNT 9:285–86; McCann, ISBE 4:997; see also Rev. 1:10, 15.

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

146 Cf. Matt. 23:37 = Luke 13:34 (noted by Beutler 1994: 403). Morris (1995: 504 n. 117) suggests that the perfect participle διεσκορπισμένα (dieskorpismena, scattered) may “indicate the permanence of the scattering, apart from Christ’s work.” The notion of the gathering of scattered “children of God” in the context of John’s Gospel seems to presuppose the notion of divine election and predestination. R. Brown (1966: 443) sees eucharistic overtones in the term “gathered together,” adducing 6:13 where fragments are gathered subsequent to the miraculous feeding. This reading seems far-fetched.

149 See also Odes Sol. 10:5–6 (cf. Beutler 1994: 399–404). On the phrase “make them one,” see commentary at 10:16; 17:21 (cf. Appold 1976: 236–45).

5 Beutler (1990: 335–45) contends that John 12:20 echoes Isa. 52:15 LXX and suggests that John 12:20–50 may constitute a “great inclusion” with 1:19–34. Contra E. Schwartz’s famous dictum (quoted in Busse 1992: 2085) that the Greeks here seem “ghostlike,” Busse (1992) argues that 12:20–36 is part of the evangelist’s literary strategy and consciously anticipates the epilogue in John 21 (compare esp. 21:18 with 10:11, 15, and 21:19 with 12:33).

19 On the possible influence of Ps. 42 here and elsewhere in John’s Gospel (11:33, 35, 37; 14:1–9, 27; 19:28), see the interchange between Beutler (1979, modifying Freed 1965b: 117–30) and Freed (1983a). See also Carson (1991: 440), who says that τετάρακται signifies “revulsion, horror, anxiety, agitation.” This emphasis on the precrucifixion turmoil suffered by Jesus stands over against those who, in an effort to focus on the “glory” aspect of Jesus’ death, overlook the real agony and anxiety he endured. So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 434), who argues, contra Witkamp, that 12:27a can “hardly refer to anything other than the natural human reaction in confrontation with death”; and Carson (1991: 439–40), who contends, contra E. Käsemann and G. C. Nicholson, that “even in John [with its realized eschatology], Jesus cannot contemplate the cross as a docetic actor, steeped in dispassionate unconcern.” R. Brown (1966: 475) notes that here “we see the true humanity of the Johannine Jesus.”

Billerbeck, P. See StrB
Billington, A. 435n67, 472
Bishop, E. F. F. 125, 302n22, 411

6 Greek, Ἰουδαῖοι. Here and elsewhere in the Fourth Gospel, this Greek term ought to be rendered in keeping with the connotative meaning supplied by the respective context (see the TNIV). In a recent paper, S. Porter (2002), taking as his point of departure the recent compendium edited by Bieringer et al. (2001a; 2001b), contends that no single proposal explains all instances of the term in John's Gospel. He notes that only twenty-six out of seventy instances of Ἰουδαῖοι in John are negative (including 11:8, 54, but not 1:19; 5:10, 15; 8:22; 10:24; 18:12; 19:31). According to Porter, the singular referent of the term in John's Gospel is the Jewish people as a religious, ethnic group. However, a given context may limit the reference to a subgroup. A case in point is an articular, demonstrative use: "those Jews there." Anaphoric usage provides discourse continuity and cohesion. Partitive uses are found as well. Both literalistic views and "politically correct" views, according to Porter, are to be eschewed in favor of an understanding that is linguistically informed and contextually sensitive. When applied as part of a salvation-historical reading of the Johannine narrative and supplemented by other related terms, such as οἱ ἴδιοι in 1:11, the approach advocated by Porter is superior to woodenly literal or ideologically driven alternatives (see also Köstenberger 2003).

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus "our advocate" with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning "supporter" or "sponsor." The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning "advocate" (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man's Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is "a kind of angel ... in human form," be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the "alter ego of Jesus" [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source's figure of "helper"; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the "spirit of prophecy." For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel's lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete's role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete's ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

22 For an interesting reconstruction of the background, see Barclay 1975: 2.58 (cited in

Black, D. A. 132, 483n6, 497n68

Blass, F. See BDF

Blinzler, J. 518, 530n42, 545n26

Blomberg, C. L. xi, 2n4, 3, 6, 7n16, 113, 119n13, 120n17, 142, 142n5, 153n40, 158n57, Köstenberger 2002c: 99); cf. Bishop 1959–60. For links between “the door” and “the shepherd” in wisdom traditions, see Scott 1992: 121–23.

6 Hence, Bultmann (1971: 486, cf. 460–61) places chapter 17 between 13:30 and 13:31, with 13:1 serving as the introduction to the prayer. As R. Brown (1970: 745) rightly notes, however, although chapters 13 and 17 are indeed closely related, they are so by way of inclusion rather than direct sequence. Brown himself, incidentally, believes that chapter 17 was not part of the original Gospel but was added at the same time as chapters 15 and 16. He conjectures that the prayer may have been written by the same circle as the prologue. For a discussion of the literary structure of John 17, see also Malatesta 1971. Black (1988) breaks up the prayer into ninety-five “nuclear structures ... embedded into 52 cola” (p. 145), also noting the frequent occurrence of ellipsis, anacolouthon, and parallelism (see also his chart of rhetorical features on pp. 149–53, listing instances of repetition, omission, and shifts in expectancy).

68 R. Brown (1970: 769) notes a “grammatical parallelism” between six lines of 17:20–21 and six lines of 17:22–23. Morris (1995: 649) points to structural similarities between 17:21 and 17:23 and says the effect is to “add solemnity and emphasis.” See also the helpful thoughts in Black 1988: 155–59 on the kind of unity envisioned by Jesus.

42 The practice may go back to Hasmonean times and may have been continued by the Romans after taking over Palestine. See Josephus, Ant. 20.9.3 §209; Livy, Roman History 5.13; b. Pesah. 91a. See Blinzler 1959: 218–21.

26 Polyglot notices were quite common in the Hellenistic era. Examples include those cited by Josephus (Ant. 14.10.2 §191; J.W. 6.2.4 §125) and the Res Gestae Divi Augusti, which existed in both Latin and Greek. Schlatter (1948: 349) also refers to m. Git. 9.8 (bills of divorce written in both Greek and Hebrew). See also Esth. 8:9. Blinzler (1959: 254–55) refers to still extant Roman tombstones.

4 The Fourth Gospel’s integrity is not compromised by the inimitable Johannine style, enveloping narrative as well as discourse portions. For positive assessments of the historical reliability of John’s Gospel, see Köstenberger 2002c; Blomberg 1993; 2001; 2002; contra M. Casey 1996. Nevertheless, there continues to be skepticism on the part of many; see the recent survey by Kysar (2002a), the largely positive assessment by Thompson (2002), and the very negative evaluation by Attridge (2002b).

16 See Blomberg 2001: 72, referring to Westcott. Nevertheless, it should be acknowledged that apostolic authorship remains a hypothesis. In an essay surveying scholarship from the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries on the issue, I have shown that the apostolic paradigm was challenged on largely philosophical rather than evidential grounds and that there is therefore compelling reason to doubt that the Fourth Gospel’s Johannine authorship has ever been refuted by actual argument (Köstenberger 2001b: 17–47). To assert the superiority of alternative hypotheses as virtually self-evident without adducing supporting evidence, as is commonly done today, hardly constitutes evenhanded scholarship. Cf. Keener 2003: 81–139, who at the outset of his thorough investigation of the authorship of John’s Gospel (which concludes, tentatively, in favor of apostolic authorship) states that the Fourth Gospel’s apostolic authorship has often been opposed out of dogmatism (p. 81) but that “traditional conservative scholars have made a better case for Johannine authorship of the Gospel ... than other scholars have made against it" (p. 82).

13 See Blomberg (1995: 5–7), who lists seven factors in favor of seeing John's portrait of Nicodemus as "substantially more negative" than the dominant view alleges: (1) the introduction of 2:23–25; (2) the labels "Pharisee" and "ruler of the Jews"; (3) Nicodemus's coming by night; (4) the identification of Jesus as a mere "teacher"; (5) Nicodemus's dependence on signs; (6) his astonishing ignorance; and (7) the evidence adduced by Cotterell regarding the increasingly negative portrayal of Nicodemus. According to Blomberg (cf. Bassler 1989), Nicodemus remains an ambivalent character, in contrast with the more positive progression found in the Samaritan woman in John 4. This overall conclusion is against Cotterell (1985: 241), who in his otherwise excellent discourse analysis exceeds the evidence when he credits Nicodemus with a "gradual dawning of true faith [culminating] in the presence of Nicodemus at the cross and in his ultimate identification with Jesus in his death." Rather than "take his place at Calvary," Nicodemus simply ensured giving Jesus a decent burial. (As Meeks [1972: 55] contends, Nicodemus's "ludicrous 'one hundred pounds' of embalming spices indicate clearly enough that he has not understood the 'lifting up' of the Son of Man.") Cotterell is on surer footing when he concludes that in the present narrative, "Nicodemus chose not to understand Jesus," characterizing the outcome of the present conversation as "inconclusive." Likewise mistaken, I believe, is Saayman (1995: 45), who detects in Nicodemus "a growing loyalty to Jesus."

17 Contra several commentators (Barrett 1978: 205; Moloney 1998: 91; R. Brown 1966: 130; Witherington 1995: 94; Burge 2000: 114; Carson 1995: 187 n. 8; Blomberg 1995: 6), "by night" is likely not symbolic in the sense that Nicodemus came from darkness to light, while Judas went from light to darkness (cf. 6:70–71; 12:4–8; 13:2, 26–30; 18:2–5)—a view held by R. Brown (1966: 130) and Auwers (1990). Wallace (1996: 123–24) overreaches when he finds in the genitive of time an indication of "the kind of time in which Nicodemus came to see the Lord." Morris (1995: 187) suggests that John may have had more than one meaning in mind.

5 Blomberg (1995: 8), with reference to Dockery (1988), lists five approaches to the present narrative: (1) allegorical (cf. 2 Kings 17:30–31); (2) existential (Bultmann 1971: 175–202); (3) pastoral (Milne 1993: 85–86); (4) salvation-historical (W. Davies 1974; Carson 1993); and (5) intertextual (focusing on OT parallels such as Gen. 24:10–61; 29:1–20; Exod. 2:15b–21) (Neyrey 1979). Acknowledging that all of these approaches capture elements of truth, Blomberg nevertheless finds them wanting and proposes a seven-pronged approach of his own. Stibbe (1993: 68–69) advocates a symbolic reading: "If the woman has had five husbands and is living de facto with a sixth, then Jesus is the seventh man in her life. Since seven is the perfect number in Judaism, the implicit commentary must be that Jesus is the man which she has been waiting for, the man in whose presence she will find wholeness." In the same vein, Brodie (1993: 217–18) sees this as a betrothal-type scene. See also Dockery (1988: 127–40), who distinguishes between author-, text-, and reader-oriented approaches, and Marshall 1974. R. Lightfoot (1956: 122) detects certain parallels between John 4 and 19.

40 Some interpreters (such as Lindars [1972: 186]) argue that "five men/husbands" alludes to a tradition cited in Josephus, according to which the Samaritans had five gods (Ant. 9.14.3 §288; cf. 2 Kings 17:24, 30–31), just as "five colonnades" in 5:2 is taken to refer to the Jewish Pentateuch (Hengel 1999: 307, 315). As Blomberg (1995: 8 [cf. Schlatter 1948: 122]) points out, however, in reality the text lists seven gods of five nations (but see Prest 1992: 368; see also the discussion in C. Koester 1990b: 675–77).

57 Blomberg (1995: 9), observing the woman's reputation of sexual immorality, contends that the pericope focuses “not nearly so much on the how of evangelism but on the who.” If this presupposes that the Samaritan woman is the focus here, it must be said in response that Jesus is more properly in the center of the present passage, and if so, then the how of evangelism is certainly in view just the same.

7 E.g., Ps. 74:1; 78:52; 79:13; 95:7; 100:3; Ezek. 34:31. A roughly contemporaneous passage, 2 Bar. 77:11–16, portrays the law as true shepherd (as well as light and water). Thus, Jesus here claims to fulfill the function that Jews generally attributed to the Torah (Moloney 1998: 307 [cited in Blomberg 2002: 158]). For a detailed treatment of John’s appropriation of Ezekiel’s shepherd motif in Ezek. 33–37, see Deeley 1997.

1 Cf. “six days before the Passover” in 12:1; “the next day” in 12:12. Carson (1991: 455–58) rightly concludes that Jesus and his disciples ate a true paschal meal on Thursday, 15 Nisan (contra Barrett 1978: 50–51; R. Brown 1970: 556; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.36). On the chronology of the passion narrative in John and the Synoptics (siding with Carson, despite Morris 1995: 688–90), see the sidebar in Köstenberger 1999a: 146, with further bibliographical references (see also Köstenberger 2002c: 130, 164, 173; Blomberg 1987: 175–80; Carson 1984: 530–32). Some seek to adjudicate apparent differences between the presentations in John and the Synoptics by the theory that differences in chronology are due to the use of different calendars. John, it is suggested, like the Judeans and the Sadducees, uses a lunar sunset-to-sunset calendar, while the Synoptics, like the Galileans, the Pharisees, and Jesus and his followers, employ a solar sunrise-to-sunrise reckoning (Hoehner 1977: 85–90; see chart on p. 89; Morris 1995: 684–95); or, John’s calendric usage shifts: his light-darkness theme (rooted in the Genesis account) is conveyed by way of a solar calendar, while elsewhere a lunar system is found (building on exodus redemptive motifs) (Busada 2003). However, these theories seem to lack a clear textual base in the Gospels themselves and are unnecessarily complicated if the solution argued here is adopted.

2 The outline of the structure of the first unit (13:31–14:31) below follows Carson (1991: 498) and Blomberg (2002: 199), who take 14:15–31 as a single unit. Others divide this section between 14:24 and 14:25 (e.g., Moloney 1998: 391–92; R. Brown 1970: 623). Schnackenburg (1990: 3.58), following Becker, sees a break between 14:17 and 14:18.

12 So Blomberg 2002: 228–30; Burge 2000: 491; Morris 1995: 656 (though both the LXX and Josephus use the term also with reference to non-Roman military [2 Macc. 8:23; 12:20, 22; Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §215; J.W. 2.1.3 §11]). Cf. the cautious assessment by Ridderbos (1997: 575). Contra Keener (1993: 306), who maintains that both the “detachment of soldiers” and the “officials from the chief priests and Pharisees” refer to the temple police.

3 For a narrative exegesis of 18:15–19:22, see Larsen 2001: 122–39. Larsen views Pilate as an archetypal tragic figure, in application of the work of Northrop Frye with further reference to Culpepper (1983) and Stibbe (1992; 1994). Keener (2003: 1097) proposes another chiasm for 18:29–19:16, with 19:1–3 (scourging and crown of thorns) at the center. On John’s Passover chronology, see Keener 2003: 1100–1103. Keener (2003: 1103) does not favor Blomberg’s and Carson’s harmonization and concludes that the Synoptics and John “at least imply (perhaps for theological reasons) the Passover on different days.” I have similar problems here with Keener’s reconstruction as with his view on the temple cleansing.

83 Cf. Did. 8:1; Mart. Pol. 7:1. See Torrey 1931 (including his critique of Str-B 2:834–85 on pp. 235–36); Higgins 1954–55: 206–9; Story 1989: 318; Blomberg 1987: 177–78; Morris 1995: 708;

Bock, D. L. 314n79
Boers, H. 153n42
Boismard, M.-E. 21, 21n9, 48, 56, 194n104, 389n1
Bokser, B. M. 171n17

Ridderbos 1997: 606.

17 Scorpiace 15 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 214 n. 666). Blomberg (2002: 278) also cites Acts Pet. 37–39 and Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.1.

79 Cf. Mark 14:64 par.; see Bock 1998: es p. 234–37. See the brief discussion of Synoptic parallels in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.310. John 10:33 is the only occurrence of the term βλασφημία (blasphēmia, blasphemy) in this Gospel; the verb βλασφημέω (blasphēmeō, blaspheme) occurs only in 10:36. The expression καὶ ὅτι (kai hoti, even because) (adverbial καὶ) further clarifies the charge made by the Jews (Morris 1995: 467 n. 92). The participle ὄν (ōn, being) in 10:33 is concessive: “even though you are a mere man” (Wallace 1996: 634–35).

Ποιεῖς (poieis, you make) is identified by Ridderbos (1997: 372 n. 375) as a durative present. 42 Conway (1999: 118, citing Boers 1988: 171, 182) points out that whereas Jesus does not launch his revelatory monologue in John 3 until Nicodemus has faded from view, he does so here in the Samaritan woman’s presence.

9 Boismard (1957: 79–80)—and many writers after him—notes that while 1:1–11 deals with the Word’s descent, 1:14–18 is characterized by a dynamic of ascent.

104 For a treatment of Moses as a character in the Fourth Gospel, see Harstine (2002: 40–75), who treats 1:17, 45; 3:14; 5:45–46; 6:32; 7:19, 22, 23; 9:28–29. According to Harstine, Moses’ dominant function throughout the narrative is as a witness to Jesus (p. 72), whereby Moses serves as a historical/legendary figure similar to Jacob (4:5, 12), David (7:42), and Abraham (8:33–58). On Moses in the Fourth Gospel, see also Glasson 1963; Meeks 1967; and Boismard 1993. Keener (2003: 662) observes how, on a literary level, the closing appeal to Moses in 5:45–47 prepares the way for chapter 6, where Jesus is presented as the new Moses providing God’s people with the new “bread from heaven.”

1 For a discussion of 12:37–50 in the context of the Johannine lawsuit motif (cf. Isa. 40–55), see Lincoln 2000: 105–10. Keener (2003: 882) notes that many find in 12:37–43 a theological summary of people’s responses to Jesus’ public ministry and in 12:44–50 an anthology of representative sayings. Whitacre (1999: 326) suggests that 12:37–43 emphasizes Jesus’ deeds, and 12:44–50 his words (also adducing Moses’ final words in Deut. 32:45–47 as a parallel). Both Ridderbos (1997: 443) and Schnackenburg (1990: 2.411) stress the relevance of this section for the evangelist’s own day and the historical distance from which this section was presumably written. This surely is true but should not be exaggerated. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.421) also provides a defense of Johannine authorship against Boismard, who claims that 12:44–50 is non-Johannine. Bultmann (1971: ix), in a hardly defensible move, relocates both 12:34–36 and 12:44–50 to John 8, with only 12:37–43 remaining in the traditional position.

17 On the unusual nature of Jesus’ signs selected by John, see commentary at 2:10. A similar remarkable incident (that of the healing of the centurion’s servant in Capernaum) is narrated in Matt. 8:5–13 par. Vermes (1972–73) seeks to adduce parallels with the first-century Jewish miracle worker and faith healer Ḥanina ben Dosa (cf. b. Ber. 34b; much more cautious is Bokser 1985). However, as Meier (1994: 581–88, citing Freyne 1980) points out, not only is Ḥanina ben Dosa not mentioned in Josephus, but also none of the three mishnaic references attribute miracle-working power to him; this takes place only in the talmudic tradition. Hence, all that can be said

Bonhoeffer, D. 529n39

Bonner, C. 532

Bonney, W. 580n15

Booser, K. D. 19n2, 21

Borchert, G. L. 29, 35n45, 36, 37n54, 40, 40n61, 43n72, 46, 46n81, 50n98, 55, 62, 64n27, confidently about the “historical” Ḥanina is that he probably was a first-century Palestinian Jew who was noted for his efficacious prayers over the sick; there is not even early historical evidence linking him to Galilee.

39 But since Jesus’ kingdom is otherworldly, the use of force is uncalled for in the present instance. Lindars (1972: 559) remarks, “For the Kingdom understood in this way military action is not appropriate—a fact which the Church has not always remembered.” Yet one must be careful not to construe Jesus’ statement here as a wholesale endorsement of pacifism. Though the institutional church ought to be cautious about endorsing military action, Christians are at times in their capacity as citizens called on to take up arms; in that sense, “the church” may well engage in military action and not be in any conflict with Jesus’ refusal (in a very different if not unique situation). One thinks here of the forceful abolition of slavery in the United States and of Dietrich Bonhoeffer’s participation in a plot to assassinate Adolf Hitler.

15 For an in-depth study of the Thomas narrative, see Bonney 2002, who argues that 20:24–29 “serves to reveal Jesus’ identity rather than to criticize the manner in which Thomas comes to faith” (p. 172).

2 This is why the prologue has also been called the “proleptic quintessence” (Harnack 1892: 191), a “microcosm” (Valentine 1996), and an “adumbration” (Booser 1998: 13) of the entire Gospel (cited in MacLeod 2003: 48 n. 1).

45 Among those who take 1:9 as a preliminary reference to the incarnation are Ridderbos 1997: 43; Carson 1991: 122; Borchert 1996: 112–13; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.255; Laney 1992: 41. Moloney (1998: 37) sees a hint to the incarnation already in 1:3c–4. There also may be an implied contrast with Hellenistic religions that offered false “light.”

54 This is the view of, among others, Carson 1991: 125; Dodd 1953: 402; R. Brown 1966: 10; Morris 1995: 85; Borchert 1996: 114; Burge 2000: 59. For a demonstration that 1:11, properly interpreted and understood (particularly the world as God’s property), refutes the notion, advanced by Bultmann, that John reflects gnostic thought, see Jervell 1956: 17–18. But see also the interaction with Jervell in Pryor 1990: 210–14.

61 Cf. Borchert (1996: 118), who says that spiritual birth is not the result of bloodline relations. Witherington (1995: 56) paraphrases this as “ethnic origins,” Carson (1991: 126) as “natural descent.”

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

81 Borchert (1996: 122) thinks that this verse constitutes evidence that the prologue was written after the Gospel proper.

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

27 So Ridderbos 1997: 67; Burge 2000: 71; Barrett 1978: 174; R. Brown 1966: 51; Borchert 1996: 126.

30 Borchert’s argument (1996: 133) that John’s “not knowing” is to be linked with the world’s failure to recognize Jesus in 1:10, resulting in a “steady drumbeat of a dirgelike march of rejection,” is not only unduly melodramatic but also fails to acknowledge the all-important difference between the world’s intransigence to divine revelation and the Baptist’s receptivity to it.

69 Ridderbos (1997: 84) thinks that this identification is all the more likely since Peter learns about Jesus from his brother Andrew and this unnamed disciple (1:41) and since Peter and John are closely associated in this and the other Gospels (so also Schlatter 1948: 55; more cautious assessments are found in Borchert 1996: 143; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.310; Carson 1991: 154). Note also the connection between Andrew and John in the Muratorian Canon (Bettenson 1967: 28). Michaels (1989: 37) thinks that the second disciple is Philip. Keener (2003: 468) likewise sees “no reason” to identify the other disciple with the beloved disciple, since he is not mentioned until 13:23. On a literary level, this is self-evident, but the absence of “beloved disciple” language prior to 13:23 does not seem to rule out the possibility that the apostle John appears in the Johannine narrative as a historical character that is left unnamed.

78 See Cullmann, TDNT 6:100–101; Borchert 1996: 143–44; Burge 2000: 76; Morris 1995: 140.

80 The suggestion by Borchert (1996: 145–46) that the three days mentioned in 1:29, 35, and 43 are meant to evoke in the reader’s mind the fact that Jesus rose from the dead on the third day is improbable.

105 C. Koester 1990a: 23–34; cf. Barrett 1978: 185; Nicklas (2000b: 201–2) is less than convinced. Other commentators consider the reference to be incidental, intended to show merely that Jesus “knew” Nathanael prior to their actual encounter (Ridderbos 1997: 90; cf. Burge 2000: 78; R. Brown 1966: 83; Moloney 1998: 56; contra Morris 1995: 146; Witherington 1995: 71; Borchert 1996: 148; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.317). Keener (2003: 486), too, rejects any deeper significance in the identification, suggesting that the fig tree may be mentioned simply because a specific landmark was necessary for some reason. Witherington’s suggestion that Nathanael is being portrayed as an expert in the law who thus would know that the Messiah could not come from Nazareth seems far-fetched.

110 Morris 1995: 147; cf. Witherington 1995: 72; R. Brown 1966: 87; Borchert 1996: 148.

122 The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. 65, was published in 1998 by the Egypt Exploration Society (see pp. 12–13). Among commentators, “Chosen One of God” is favored by Morris 1995: 134; Carson 1991: 152; Burge 1987: 59–61; 2000: 74; Barrett 1978: 178; R. Brown 1966: 57; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.305. “Son of God” is the reading advocated by Bultmann 1971: 92–93 n. 6; Borchert 1996: 139; Ridderbos 1997: 77; Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. g; Laney 1992: 53 (though all prior to the discovery of P¹⁰⁶). Rodgers (1999: 304) prefers both (“This is the only, the chosen Son of God”), while Michaels (1989: 36) proposes that the Baptist spoke “Chosen One of God” (hence the MS tradition), which the evangelist interpreted as “Son of God.”

7 It is doubtful that the reference to “the third day” represents an allusion to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 102; Carson 1991: 167; Burge 2000: 90; contra Borchert 1996: 153; Stibbe 1993: 46; Keener 2003: 497–98). The reference serves as a chronological connective with preceding events, perhaps indicating that the promise of 1:51 was quickly fulfilled (Beasley-Murray 1999: 34, citing Schnackenburg 1990: 1.325; cf. Talbert [1992: 86], who says that 2:1–11 serves as fulfillment of the prophecy in 1:51; and D. M. Smith [1999: 86], who speaks of the “first installment ... of the revelation promised in 1:51”). The beginning of Jesus’ final week is signaled in 12:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 189–90).

9 The phrase “Jewish Passover” has caused some controversy. Barrett (1978: 197) conjectures that the phrase may presuppose the existence of a Christian Passover at the time of writing (so, earlier, Westcott 1908: 1.89; cf. Borchert 1996: 162). Schnackenburg (1991: 1.345) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 39) suggest that the evangelist or the church had stopped participating in the Jewish Passover. Witherington (1995: 86–87) notes that the phrase indicates a certain distance between the author and Judaism and at least a partial Gentile audience (similarly, Morris 1995: 169). Carson (1991: 176) thinks that “Jewish” refers to the Jews of Judea in contrast to Galileans and Diaspora Jews.

19 Several commentators also mention that Tyrian coinage would have been preferred because it did not bear effigies (Moloney 1998: 76; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38 n. c; R. Brown 1966: 115; Borchert 1996: 163). However, this is disputed by Murphy-O’Connor (2000: 47, referring to Ben-David 1969), who cites evidence that Tyrian shekels “carried the head of the god Melkart (or Herakles) on the obverse and a Tyrian (Ptolemaic) eagle on the reverse with the inscription ‘Tyre the holy and inviolable.’ ” Murphy-O’Connor also notes the minting of Jewish shekels carrying the legend “shekel of Israel/Jerusalem [is/the] holy” at the onset of the Jewish war in A.D. 66 (pp. 47–48, citing Schürer 1973–79: 1.605), and he points to the Qumran interpretation of a one-time requirement in 4Q159 frag. 1, col. 2, lines 6–7 (p. 49).

21 Witherington (1995: 87) contends that in light of the large area—the outer court measured 300 by 450 meters—it is probable that some, but not all, were driven out. Many commentators (e.g., Borchert 1996: 164; Schlatter 1948: 75) mention that weapons (such as clubs) were not allowed in the temple courts.

34 Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.344; Barrett 1978: 195; R. Brown 1966: 117; Witherington 1995: 85–86; Borchert 1996: 160; Bultmann 1971: 122; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38–39; Dodd 1963: 162; Lindars 1972: 135–37; Keener 2003: 518–19. Keener contends that it is historically implausible that Jesus would challenge the temple system by overturning tables and yet continue in public ministry for two or three years afterward, sometimes even visiting Jerusalem (though he notes that Jesus faces considerable hostility there when he does). On the contrary, an early temple cleansing accounts well for Jewish hostility toward Jesus early on (5:18), and Jesus’ continuing in ministry for two or three more years is eminently plausible historically in light of Jesus’ pattern of withdrawal (3:22; 6:15; 7:9–10; 8:59; 10:40) and his caution from the very inception of his ministry because his “time” has not yet come (2:4; 7:6). Borchert (1996: 160) contends that two temple clearings are “a historiographic monstrosity that has no basis in the texts of the Gospels.” Kreitzer (1998: 100–101) claims that the evangelist followed the motto “When the details of history no longer serve the functions of the story—discard them.” R. Brown (1966: 118) concludes that Jesus uttered some prophetic saying concerning the destruction of the temple on his first visit but actually cleansed the temple at the end of his ministry. Wallace (1996: 561 n. 20) notes that this would require a crucifixion date of A.D. 33.

6 As Michaels (1989: 53) notes, the problem is not signs-based faith, but cowardice and failure to acknowledge one’s faith openly. Whitacre (1999: 86) similarly notes that signs-based faith is not the problem (citing 10:38; 12:37; 14:12; 20:30–31; cf. R. Brown 1966: 525–29), but that by its very nature, all faith prior to Jesus’ glorification and the coming of the Spirit is immature. Borchert (1996: 167–69) wrongly includes even the disciples of 2:11 among the group whose faith is illegitimately signs-based in 2:23.

15 “No one” in 3:32 is hyperbolic; cf. 3:33 and see the similar progression in 1:11–12 (Morris 1995: 216–17; Borchert 1996: 193; Ridderbos 1997: 150).

13 Cf., in the Synoptics, Matt. 12:15; Mark 3:7; Luke 5:16 (see Borchert 1996: 198).

15 This represents the wide consensus of interpreters: see Ridderbos 1997: 153; Carson 1991: 215–16; Borchert 1996: 198–99; Beasley-Murray 1999: 59; Witherington 1995: 115; R. Brown 1966: 169; Morris 1995: 226; Barrett 1978: 230; Moloney 1998: 116, 120; Conway 1999: 105.

21 See Ridderbos 1997: 153; cf. Carson 1991: 217; Borchert 1996: 201; Morris 1995: 228; Burge 2000: 142.

23 So N. Walker 1960 and the vast majority of commentators, including Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. e; Witherington 1995: 120; Barrett 1978: 231; Moloney 1998: 116, 121; Bultmann 1971: 178; contra Borchert 1996: 201.

30 See Maccini 1996: 131–44. Daube (1956: 375–82) argues that “do not associate with” specifically refers to Jews not sharing vessels with Samaritans (cf. NIV text and note at 4:9). However, no common utensils (such as the woman’s water jar) are specifically mentioned in 4:9. The explanatory aside, “For Jews have no dealings with [συγγρῶνται] Samaritans,” probably is broader than the mere refusal to share drinking vessels (Ridderbos 1997: 154; Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. f; contra Carson 1991: 218; Borchert 1996: 203; Witherington 1995: 120; R. Brown

161n69, 163, 169n7, 169n11, 173, 173n1, 179, 184, 184n46, 186, 186n53, 186n55, 187, 187n56, 188n62, 189, 190, 193, 195n109, 195n110, 203, 204n29, 206, 211n61, 212, 213,

1966: 170; Morris 1995: 229; Barrett 1978: 232; Moloney 1998: 117, 121; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.425 n. 19).

34 Borchert (1996: 203) sees the “gift of God” as the realization of God’s promises; Morris (1995: 230) and Carson (1991: 218) identify it as eternal life, the latter with reference to the Torah (cf. R. Brown 1966: 176, 178–79); Schnackenburg (1990: 1.431) suggests that the gift is either the Holy Spirit or eternal life, or both; Burge (2000: 144) thinks that the reference is to the Spirit.

65 Borchert (1996: 211) is correct in pointing out that a person does not need to be fully convinced to function as a witness.

69 The present statement may echo Deut. 8:3; cf. Matt. 4:4; Luke 4:4; see Carson 1991: 228; Borchert 1996: 213; see also Jer. 15:16. Here the term used for “food” is βρῶσις (brōsis); in 4:34 it is βρῶμα (brōma). Apart from stylistic variation, the use of the latter term in 4:34 may be due to a desire to create assonance with θέλημα (thelēma, will) (R. Brown 1966: 173).

7 So Carson 1991: 234; Ridderbos 1997: 174–75; Morris 1995: 255; Borchert 1996: 219–20; Burge 2000: 152–53; Witherington 1995: 127; contra R. Brown 1966: 193; Barrett 1978: 245; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.471–75; Bultmann 1971: 205.

11 So Carson 1991: 238; Morris 1995: 256; Borchert 1996: 219; R. Brown 1966: 190; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.465.

1 In light of the apparently abrupt reference to Jesus “crossing to the far shore of the Sea of Galilee” in 6:1 (ch. 5 has him in Jerusalem), it has been speculated that chapters 5 and 6 should be reversed (see Bultmann 1971: 209, 237; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.92); but see Carson 1991: 240; Morris 1995: 264; cf. Barrett 1978: 23–24; Borchert 1996: 250; and especially Ridderbos 1997: 183.

46 “Jesus said to them” (5:17; see additional note): the Greek has “answered,” not merely “said” (TNIV). The grammatical form of “answered” may suggest legal overtones (cf. 5:19; see Carson 1991: 247; Borchert 1996: 237).

53 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Borchert 1996: 236; Moloney 1998: 174; Bultmann 1971: 245; Morris 1995: 274–75 n. 48 (referring to Odeberg 1968: 203), 277; Barrett 1978: 259; Keener 1999: 42–43. The use of ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, that one) for God “lays stress upon the separate divine Person” in contrast with υἱός (huios, son). Also stressed is the Son’s inability to do anything apart from the Father (again in 5:30; see Moloney 1998: 178; Barrett 1978: 264).

55 Cf. 7:18; 11:51; 15:4; 16:13; 18:34; see Barrett 1978: 259; Bultmann 1971: 249; Carson 1991: 251; Borchert 1996: 237. Just as the Son depends on the Father, so believers can do nothing of eternal significance without Christ (15:5), but they can do all things through him who strengthens them (Phil. 4:13; see commentary at 5:23).

56 See Carson 1991: 251; Borchert 1996: 238; Barrett 1978: 259; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.104; Westcott 1908: 1.190.

62 The present verse stands in apparent tension with 3:17, which is resolved by the semantic range of κρίνω (krinō, judge), which in 3:17 refers to “outright condemnation,” while in this passage it talks about the judicial “principle of discrimination” (Carson 1991: 254; cf. Borchert 1996: 239). Also, 3:17 has as its subject the purpose for the Son’s coming into the world, whereas 5:22 addresses the issue of the distinctiveness of the Father’s and Son’s respective roles (Carson 1991: 254).

109 Hengel (1999: 309) comments, “One should by all means read ‘Bethesda’ ”; so also Carson 1991: 241; Morris 1995: 267; Witherington 1995: 137; Borchert 1996: 231; Moloney 1998: 171; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94; Schlatter 1948: 142; undecided are Ridderbos 1997: 185; R. Brown 1966: 206–7.

110 So Fee 1982 and the vast majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 185; Carson 1991: 242; Morris 1995: 267; Barrett 1978: 253; R. Brown 1966: 207; Beasley-Murray 1999: 70 n. h; Bultmann 1971: 241 n. 4; Borchert 1996: 232; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94–95.

29 Cf. 3:2 and especially 21:3 (though note 13:30). So Moloney 1998: 203; contra Borchert 1996: 258; Carson 1991: 274. Ἐγγύονει (egegonei, had come) is an intensive pluperfect (Wallace 1996: 585).

61 “Everything” (πάν, pan) in 6:37 and 6:39 is neuter, used in a qualitative, collective sense (R. Brown 1966: 270; Barrett 1978: 294; Borchert 1966: 265), though ultimately people (not things) are in mind (BDF §138.1, with specific reference to John 6:37; cf. Morris 1995: 325; Moloney 1998: 216).

72 So Ridderbos 1997: 235–37; cf. Carson 1991: 295; Morris 1995: 331–32; contra Moloney 1998: 223; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.55; Lindars 1972: 267; Talbert 1992: 140. As Keener (2003: 690) observes, “John’s words [in 6:27–63] invite his audience to look to Christ’s death itself, not merely those symbols which point to his death.” At best, any such overtones are derivative (Borchert 1996: 270–71; cf. Brodie 1993: 286; Calvin 1959: 170).

2 Carson 1991: 305; Borchert 1996: 279; Barrett 1978: 309; see commentary at 2:12 and at 7:2.

5 So Morris 1995: 388; R. Brown 1966: 344; Burge 2000: 255; Moloney 1998: 268; Borchert 1996: 295.

47 So the majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 305–6; Carson 1991: 346–47; Morris 1995: 404; Beasley-Murray 1999: 132; D. M. Smith 1999: 185; Borchert 1996: 301 n. 182; Burge 2000: 259; Bultmann 1971: 252 n. 2; contra R. Brown 1966: 354–55, 358; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.204–5; Moloney 1998: 277; Westcott 1908: 2.13–14.

53 Morris 1995: 405; cf. R. Brown 1966: 355; Borchert 1996: 303. Carson (1991: 348–49) suggests that truth in 8:32 is similar to the notion of “gospel,” that is, “the truth that has been revealed in and by Jesus” (cf. Barrett 1978: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.205).

68 So Carson 1991: 352; R. Brown 1966: 357; Barrett 1978: 348; contra Ridderbos 1997: 313; Borchert 1996: 305; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.212.

74 So Morris 1995: 411; Ridderbos 1997: 315; Carson 1991: 353; Barrett 1978: 349; Beasley-Murray 1999: 135; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.213; Moloney 1998: 280; Borchert 1996: 305–6. It was commonly recognized in Second Temple literature that death was the result of Satan’s initiative (Wis. 2:23–24; Sir. 25:24; cf. Rom. 5:12).

94 The majority of commentators believe that there is no significance in the slight alteration of Jesus’ words in 8:52 (Morris 1995: 416 n. 104; Barrett 1978: 350–51; R. Brown 1966: 359; Borchert 1996: 307). Note, however, that “taste death” replaces “see death” (see Laney 1992: 168; cf. 5:24). The expression “taste death” is not found in the OT, but “to see death” is (see commentary at 8:51). The expression “taste death” occurs in the NT also in Mark 9:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 351) and Heb. 2:9. See further Acts 2:27, 31 (citing Ps. 16:10); 1 Cor. 15:54–55 (citing Isa. 25:8; Hos. 13:14); 1 John 3:14. On other minor differences, see footnote for commentary at John 8:51.

277n1, 285n36, 285n37, 295n82, 302n17, 304n32, 305n37, 310n61, 311n66, 311n67, 314n81, 315n86, 326n14, 326n19, 330n38, 336n69, 336n73, 337n80, 340n92, 341n97,

1 For a survey of source-critical scholarship on John 9, see Borchert (1996: 310–12). Carson (1991: 360–61) provides a brief summary and critique of Martyn’s “two-level” reading of the chapter in light of the history of the putative “Johannine community.” See also Bauckham (2001: esp. 103–6), who contends that Martyn’s hermeneutic violates the genre of the Fourth Gospel. 36 Morris (1995: 430) thinks it plain that the examination of the man before the Pharisees occurs “on a day subsequent to that of the cure.” Borchert (1996: 317) perceives that the reference to the Sabbath “gives the effect of sounding a piercing alarm in the story.”

37 See Ridderbos 1997: 335; Morris 1995: 427; Barrett 1978: 359; R. Brown 1966: 373; Borchert 1996: 318.

82 Borchert (1996: 325) relates the present reference to 20:28 and believes that this confession is a high point in the festival cycle. The man’s response to Jesus’ self-revelation is in keeping with the standard OT reaction to theophany (e.g., Gen. 17:3). However, it is possible that the man’s actions, while being “beyond that due to other men,” fall “short of that due to God Almighty” (Beasley-Murray 1999: 160; similarly, Carson 1991: 377). Nevertheless, the majority of commentators favor a fuller sense of worship (Barrett 1978: 365; R. Brown 1966: 376; Bultmann 1971: 339 n. 3; Morris 1995: 440; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.254).

17 The word is absent from the Synoptics, where the roughly equivalent expression παραβολή (parabolē, parable) is found (not used in John; see Carson 1984: 301–4). Both terms apparently render the broad Hebrew expression māšāl (Borchert 1996: 329). They occur side by side in a few instances (e.g., Sir. 39:3; 47:17) and do not differ significantly in meaning (Dewey 1980).

32 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.294) proposes a translation “right” or “true.” Similarly, Borchert (1996: 333) suggests that the meaning of καλός is similar to that of ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) (cf. Moloney 1998: 310; Bultmann 1971: 364). Carson (1991: 386) contends that the “good shepherd” should be thought of as “noble or worthy” but not “sentimental or effeminate.” Lindars (1972: 361) favors the rendering “an ideal shepherd.”

37 The preposition ὑπέρ (hyper, for) here, as elsewhere in this Gospel, has the connotation of a sacrificial, substitutionary death (Carson 1991: 386; Barrett 1978: 375; Borchert 1996: 334; Burge 2000: 291).

61 Cf. 18:18: “it was cold.” If so, he is referring to the Jews’ “chilling response” to Jesus (Hengel 1999: 319). See also Borchert 1996: 337. Contra Ridderbos 1997: 368; Carson 1991: 391–92. Stibbe (1993: 116) comments that the “sense of impending doom in 10.1–21 is heightened by the atmospheric statement of the narrator in v. 22.” Bultmann (1971: 361) suggests that the reference to the season serves to indicate that “the end is near,” as the “seasons of the year reflect the progress of the revelation.”

66 Borchert (1996: 338) suggests that the evangelist is relating Jesus’ revelation by way of παροιμία (paroimia, illustration [10:6]) with the Jews’ demand for παρρησία (parrēsia, frankness)—a possible play on words. Bultmann (1971: 361 n. 6), too, sees a contrast between these two terms (with reference to 16:25, 29; Mark 8:32).

67 So, in effect, Ridderbos 1997: 368; Carson 1991: 392–93; Morris 1995: 462; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174. Borchert (1996: 338) suggests that the “interplay between paroimia and parrēsia allows Jesus to tell the Pharisees that he has already answered their question.”

81 The antecedent of εἶπεν (eipen, said) in 10:35 could be God (“he”) or the law (“it”). The former alternative is chosen by the vast majority of versions, including the NIV = TNIV, NASB,

ISV, ESV, HCSB, and KJV; the latter is preferred by the NAB. The issue is almost universally ignored by commentators, who apparently are almost exclusively preoccupied with adjudicating the appropriation of Ps. 82:6 in the present context. One of the few exceptions is Bernard (1928: 2.368), who favors the law as antecedent: “if then the Law (i.e. the Scripture) called them gods” (so also, apparently, Borchert 1996: 343). Against the majority of translations, there seems to be good reason to favor the law as antecedent, especially since the present passage is immediately followed by the statement that “Scripture cannot be broken,” which thus would provide for a continuity of subjects in 10:34–35: “Is it not written in your law. . . If it called . . . and Scripture cannot be broken. . . .”

86 For the charge of blasphemy against Jesus, see Hurtado 1999, especially 36–37. Jesus’ practice of posing a question that proves too difficult for his opponents to answer is also attested repeatedly in the Synoptics (e.g., Matt. 22:41–46; Mark 12:35–37; Luke 20:41–44; see Borchert 1996: 343).

14 The name “Bethany” arose from a combination of the Hebrew word for “house,” beth, and the name ananyah, whereby one of the two an syllables dropped out—a phenomenon known among linguists as syllabic haplology (so Albright 1923). Borchert (1996: 349) avers that Bethany means “house of suffering” and that this symbolic meaning may have been significant for the evangelist. However, even if Borchert’s reconstruction of the etymology is correct, there is little evidence for his contention.

19 R. Brown (1966: 423 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.322]) claims that this verse is “clearly a parenthesis added by an editor,” though it is unclear why the author himself (rather than a later editor) could not have added this kind of parenthetical statement. Carson (1991: 405 [approvingly cited by Borchert 1996: 349]) contends, against Barrett (1978: 390), that it does not follow that the intended audience was Christian, though clearly Carson’s case is difficult here. More likely is the reconstruction by Witherington (1995: 201), who says that this verse may serve as “a simple reminder of Mary’s identity to the Christians who would be using this Gospel as a missionary tool to bring outsiders to Christ.” Yet Carson (1991: 405) rightly points out that regardless of this issue, and even if the anointing was unknown to the reader, the proleptic reference to Mary still serves as a fine literary device, urging the first-time reader onward in the narrative.

38 Further references are provided by Borchert (1996: 352) and Lindars (1972: 394).

69 Ridderbos (1997: 396) persuasively argues that 11:25b refers to “death in the natural sense and to living in the sense of eternal life,” while “lives” in 11:26a “refers to natural human existence, while ‘never die’ refers to the eternal life that natural death can neither prevent nor affect” (so also Bultmann 1971: 403, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.331; Stibbe 1994: 51). Contra Carson (1991: 413), R. Brown (1966: 425), and Borchert (1996: 356) (also Calvin and Schlatter), who maintain that “lives” in 11:26a refers to eternal life. Wuellner (1991: 182) calls the present statement an oxymoron.

73 Morris (1995: 490 n. 62) perceptively notes that λάθρα (lathra, privately) could modify ἐφώνησεν (ephōnēsen, she called) or εἰποῦσα (eipousa, saying), meaning either that Martha called her sister secretly or that she secretly (or privately) talked to her. The former is perhaps more likely. Morris also is critical of the NIV’s gloss “aside.” Borchert (1996: 358) suggests that Martha’s statement to Mary may have been “an indication of Martha’s controlling temperament.”

80 An egregious example comes from Schnackenburg (1990: 2.333), who says that Mary “gives the impression of being nothing but a complaining woman,” a comment for which he is sharply rebuked by Borchert (1996: 359), who calls this “a Western male’s misunderstanding.” Pollard (1973: 438–41) strongly contends that Martha’s and Mary’s responses are diametrically opposed (cautioning against reading the present pericope in light of Luke 10:38–42): Martha exemplifies “confident trust,” but Mary demonstrates “hysterical weeping,” eliciting Jesus’ reaction of “bitter disappointment” (p. 440). Similarly, Stibbe (1994: 47), who maintains that these two women “exhibit different types of grief,” with Martha evincing “growth in resurrection faith,” and Mary’s grief being a “desperate, passionate and forlorn affair.” For Pollard (1973: 441), “the lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews who were with her” is the actual reason why Jesus decides to raise Lazarus.

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, “The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death.” See also Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999: 289. The mourners’ unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999: 192–93), several of whom adduce Paul’s statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus’ anger is directed toward both “the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow” and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus’ anger as occasioned by Mary’s turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either “misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition,” to mean “moved in spirit.” Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus’ struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, “He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself” (11:38 is translated “bearing the rebuke within himself”). According to Story, at the sight of people’s grief, Jesus was overcome by “momentary self-regret,” thinking, “Why did I not come sooner ... ? I have only myself to blame. ... Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?” However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

97 So, essentially, Carson (1991: 416) and Morris (1995: 495), though both (in my view, illegitimately) speak of “unbelief” or “the misconceptions of those around him” as the primary target (similarly, Kruse [2003: 254] believes Jesus wept out of “deep disappointment” with the “faithless weeping and wailing” of Mary and “the Jews”). Schnackenburg (1990: 2.337) insightfully adduces the reference to Jesus’ “tears” during his “life on earth” in Heb. 5:7, which there, as well as in the present reference, are related to the presence of and the need for salvation from death. The comment by Borchert (1996: 360) that Jesus’ weeping is “directly related to the failure of his followers to recognize his mission as the agent of God” is sheer conjecture, as is Moloney’s contention (1998: 331) that “he weeps because of the danger that his unconditional gift of himself in love ... will never be understood or accepted.”

72 “The Spirit is the divine presence when Jesus’ physical presence is taken away from his followers” (Morris 1989: 159). Startlingly, Borchert (2002: 121), on the basis of the second-person plural pronoun, seems to deny that 14:17 should be understood with reference to the personal experience of believers. By his logic, believers are to show their love for Jesus by obeying him corporately but not individually—a transparent absurdity.

73 Though, as Moloney (1998: 407) points out, there are differences between Jesus and the Spirit as well: the latter neither becomes flesh nor dies for our sins. Alternatively, the statement refers to Jesus’ postresurrection appearances to his followers (so Ridderbos 1997: 505; Carson 1991: 501; Morris 1995: 578–59; Beasley-Murray 1999: 258; Borchert 2002: 126). Barrett (1978: 464) says that the passage refers neither to Jesus coming in the person of the Holy Spirit nor to the parousia but rather is using language appropriate to both the resurrection and the parousia to refer to both.

91 The vast majority of commentators (including R. Brown, Barrett, Borchert, Morris, Carson, and Ridderbos) believe that teaching and reminding are in synonymous parallelism. On the Spirit’s teaching ministry, see the parallel in 16:13. Both verses together (14:26 and 16:13) echo Ps. 25:5 (cf. 25:9). See also Neh. 9:20 (cf. 1 John 2:20, 27). Regarding Jesus’ teaching, see John 6:59; 7:14, 28, 35; 8:20; 18:20. It is often argued that the use of the Greek masculine pronoun ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, he) for the Spirit in passages such as John 14:26; 15:26; and 16:13–14 affirms the personality of the Holy Spirit (Barrett 1978: 482; Borchert 2002: 159; Morris 1995: 583 n. 73 [citing Westcott]; 606 n. 64; 621 n. 27; and others cited in Wallace 1996: 331 n. 42). However, the most likely reason for John’s use of the masculine pronoun in these passages is that the antecedent is the masculine noun ὁ παράκλητος (ho paraklētos, the helping presence). If so, John’s use of a masculine pronoun to refer to the Spirit is best explained as a function of grammar rather than theology, and arguments for the personality of the Holy Spirit must be made on other grounds (so rightly Wallace 1996: 331–32, who points out that it is difficult to find any text where the neuter noun πνεῦμα [pneuma, spirit/Spirit] is grammatically referred to by the masculine).

1 Carson (1991: 513) terms it “extended metaphor” or “illustrative comparison.” He is not convinced that the parallels adduced by Bauckham (1987: 84–101) establish that the present passage constitutes a commentary on one of Jesus’ parables (Carson 1991: 512). R. Brown (1970: 668) labels this a māšāl (so also Borchert 2002: 138; cf. 1996: 329); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.96) calls it “figurative discourse.”

11 Some interpreters (e.g., Barrett 1978: 473; Carson 1991: 514; Witherington 1995: 258) view the depiction of the Son as the vine and the Father as the vinedresser in terms of the Son’s subordination to the Father. Indeed, this seems to be the implication in the present allegory, though it is not at the front of the message. Borchert (2002: 140) affirms the functional, though not essential, subordination of the Son to the Father.

31 Conversely, fruitlessness fails to give God the glory that he so amply deserves (Carson 1991: 518). The use of ἐδοξάσθη (edoxasthē, lit., he was glorified) resembles the similar instances of passive aorist forms (with the agents remaining unspecified) in 15:6 (Borchert 2002: 145). The conjunction ἵνα (hina) functions appositionally, meaning “namely” or “that” (Wallace 1996: 475–76).

47 That is, for those he loves (Carson 1991: 521; R. Brown 1970: 664; Barrett 1978: 477; Witherington 1995: 259; Borchert 2002: 149). See 10:11, 15, 17–18; 1 John 3:16; cf. Rom. 5:6–

8. The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) in the present verse is epexegetical (R. Brown 1970: 664). 52 Morris (1995: 599 n. 33) notes the emphatic personal pronouns ὑμεῖς (hymeis, you) and ἐγώ (egō, I), which set off Jesus' relationship with his disciples from the world. The converse does not follow: Jesus does not have to obey his followers in order to be called their friend (Carson 1991: 522; Kruse 2003: 321, who notes that Matt. 11:19 = Luke 7:34 is no real exception). Borchert (2002: 149) registers his concern that the hymn "What a Friend We Have in Jesus" may be unduly fraternizing.

57 See Borchert 2002: 150; Carson 1991: 523; and Calvin (1961: 101), who notes that this "is as good as saying that they did not obtain by their own skill or industry whatever they have." The pronoun ἐγώ (egō, I) is emphatic (Barrett 1978: 478); the conjunction ἀλλὰ (alla, but) is strongly adversative and stresses the contrast between Jesus choosing his disciples and the contemporary practice of disciples choosing to attach themselves to a particular rabbi.

2 Keener (2003: 1019) finds another micro-chiasm in 15:18–25, with 15:20ab (a servant is not greater than his master) at the center. The six conditional clauses in 15:18–24 represent warnings pertaining to the future (or present) of the Christian community in relation to the world. Such parting exhortations are a common feature of farewell discourses (Moloney 1998: 433). The present condition is second class: "If the world hates you—and it does" (Wallace 1996: 696; Borchert 2002: 154). On the "world," see commentary at 1:9; the same phrase occurs in 1 John 3:13 (see also John 17:14). On the contrast between "above" and "below," see 3:31; 8:23 (cf. 18:36–37). The form γινώσκετε (ginōskete, you know) can be read as an imperative (NIV; NRSV; NLT; ISV; ESV; HCSB; TNIV; Barrett 1978: 480) or an indicative (NASB; KJV), though admittedly the difference is marginal (R. Brown 1970: 686). The pronoun με is emphatic (Morris 1995: 602 n. 42). The perfect verb form μεμίσηκεν (memisēken, it hated) stresses the settled, completed state of the world's hatred toward Jesus (Barrett 1978: 480; R. Brown 1970: 686; Morris 1995: 602 n. 44).

6 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 525–26, with reference to 17:20, the NIV, and many major commentators (e.g., Barrett 1978: 480; Bultmann 1971: 549; Lindars 1970: 494; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.115; Bruce 1980: 313; contra Borchert 2002: 156; Dodd 1963: 409; R. Brown 1970: 687; and the NLT). See the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 275; Carson 1991: 525–26.

35 On the surface, 13:36 and 14:5 seem to contradict Jesus' statement here, but in both previous passages the illocutionary force of the questions is a protest of Jesus' announced departure rather than a sincere inquiry as to his destination or the implications of his leaving (Carson 1991: 532–33; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.126; R. Brown 1970: 710, followed by Beasley-Murray 1999: 279; note also the curious attempt at resolving the difficulty by Borchert 2002: 164). Burge (2000: 436) notes the present tense ἐρωτᾷ (erōta, asks).

59 So, rightly, Carson (1991: 543), who speaks of "Jesus' departure in death and his return after his resurrection" (cf. Morris 1995: 623; Burge 2000: 440), and makes the point that these verses cannot apply to the parousia, because according to Jesus' accompanying illustration in 16:20–24, there would have to be grief in the interim, while 15:11 promises joy. Contra Borchert (2002: 173 n. 295), who refers to Carson's view as "narrow."

68 Morris (1995: 628) notes the present tense of the imperative αἰτεῖτε (aiteite, ask) in 16:24, conveying the continual nature of the asking. Note also the presence of two different words for "ask," ἐρωτάω (erōtaō) in 16:23 and αἰτέω (aiteō) three times in 16:23–24, whereby the former refers to the barrage of questions that the disciples had for Jesus prior to the crucifixion (cf. 16:5, 30), and the latter to prayer requests subsequent to his exaltation (see Carson 1991: 545, apparently dependent on Barrett 1978: 494; contra Borchert 2002: 176).

76 Carson (1991: 548) notes how 16:28 sums up Jesus' entire mission, from his sending from the Father (3:16–17) through the incarnation (1:10–11, 14) to his departure from the world (14:19) and his return to the Father (the dominant theme of chs. 14–17). Similarly, Borchert 2002: 179. Barrett (1978: 496) even calls the verse “a complete summary ... of the Christian faith,” Beasley-Murray (1999: 287) “at once a summary of Johannine Christology and the heart of this Gospel” (combined by Burge 2000: 443), and Stibbe (1996: 174) “the parade example of this theme of the eternal origin and destiny of Jesus the Messiah.”

81 Some find the present reference to the Father's presence with Jesus to contradict Jesus' cry of dereliction on the cross (Mark 15:34 = Matt. 27:46). However, the present passage simply contrasts the disciples' fickleness with the Father's faithfulness (Beasley-Murray 1999: 288), which does not rule out “Jesus' sense of total abandonment, for some brief period of time” (Carson 1991: 549). See also Borchert's (2002: 181–83) effort to adjudicate this issue in an excursus titled “Nonabandonment in John and the Cry of Dereliction.”

7 See Morris 1995: 634; with further delineation of subunits, Hunter 1979: 326–28. Lindars (1972: 515) further divides 17:20–26 into 17:20–23 and 17:24–26. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.168–69, with reference to a 1973 German article) provides a more complicated proposal, dividing at 17:1–2, 4–5, 6–11a, 11b–16, 17–19, 22–23, 24–26 (he considers 17:3 and 17:20–21 to be secondary glosses). Others favor division at 17:1–8, 9–19, 20–26 (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 748–51). Malatesta (1971: 191–92) divides at 17:1–5, 6–8, 9–19, 20–24, 25–26 and proposes a strophic arrangement. More eccentric is the suggestion by Appold (1976: 204) that there is an oscillating pattern of petition and review, featuring six petition and six review units. A survey of structural proposals for John 17 up to the late 1970s is found in Hunter 1979: 312–28. More recently, Borchert (2002: 185–89) has favored seven petitions, based on the address “Father.” Yet, as Ridderbos (1997: 547) remarks, “The structure is not severe enough and the transitions are too fluid for us to speak of a detailed and sharply delineated thought scheme.”

47 R. Brown (1970: 759 [approvingly cited by Borchert 2002: 197]) says that ἐν (en, in, by) is both instrumental and local. Contra Carson (1991: 562) and Morris (1995: 644), who prefer a locative force (“in your name”).

66 “Truly” translates the phrase ἐν ἀληθείᾳ (en alētheia), which refers adverbially to the unique nature of the disciples' consecration (Ridderbos 1997: 556). Borchert (2002: 204) remarks, “In consecrating himself, Jesus modeled for his disciples what is meant to be both alien from the world and yet committed to a mission in and to the world, even to the point of death.” See also the short excursus in which Ridderbos (1997: 557) responds to the charge that the farewell discourse and prayer are world-avoiding.

88 So Carson 1991: 570; cf. R. Brown 1970: 781; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.197; Borchert 2002: 211. Contra Morris (1995: 653), who thinks that it is through the cross. Ridderbos (1997: 566) suggests that this is not so much an anticipation of the passion as it is a reference “to Jesus' continuing work in heaven.”

14 As presumably is the case here (so Morris 1995: 656 n. 5; cf. Carson 1991: 577; Witherington 1995: 285; Borchert 2002: 218).

22 So Ridderbos 1997: 576; with reference to the threefold repetition of this phrase in this section, Morris 1995: 658 and Ball 1996: 201; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 322; Moloney 1998:

485; R. Brown 1970: 818; Borchert 2002: 219; Burge 2000: 492.

30 Moloney (1998: 485), rather idiosyncratically, claims that the “son of perdition” in 17:12 is not Judas but Satan and that Jesus does not exclude anyone, even Judas, from his request to the soldiers (p. 483). R. Brown (1970: 811–12) suggests that Judas was not given to Jesus by the Father. Borchert (2002: 220) rightly notes that the exception is already stated in 17:12.

6 Though Annas is also mentioned by Luke (Luke 3:2; Acts 4:6). On the historical plausibility of such a trial, see Ridderbos 1997: 579–80. See also the excursus on the political and judicial situation in Israel during the time of Jesus in Borchert 2002: 224–26 and the chart showing the relationship of the four Gospels to one another concerning Jesus before the Jewish authorities in R. Brown 1970: 830–31. John 18:12a–b can be construed either with 18:1–11 (Beasley-Murray 1999: 324; Moloney 1998: 486; Barrett 1978: 523) or with 18:12c–14 (so Ridderbos 1997: 578; Morris 1995: 664; R. Brown 1970: 819).

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235). Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

15 Yet Borchert (2002: 230 n. 40, citing Culpepper 1994: 61–63) remains skeptical.

21 Morris (1995: 667 n. 44) sees this as a mark of the Fourth Evangelist’s “fondness for exact detail.” Borchert (2002: 231) notes the literary link established between the present verse and the reference to a “charcoal fire” in 21:9 (the only two occurrences of this term in the NT).

72 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 601; cf. Morris 1995: 705; Beasley-Murray 1999: 340; Burge 2000: 505; Borchert 2002: 254. Contra Barrett (1978: 543), who thinks that the singular participle constructed from the verb παράδιδωμι (paradidōmi, I hand over) suggests Judas. See also the discussions by Schnackenburg (1990: 3.261–63) and Ridderbos (1997: 603), both of whom ultimately point to the Jews as the most likely referent. Stibbe (1992: 170) concludes that “the one” in 19:11 probably refers to Caiaphas as a representative of the Jewish nation, as the evangelist has a propensity to implicate the Jews in Jesus’ death.

2 So, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 608; Carson 1991: 608; Morris 1995: 711; Beasley-Murray 1999: 344; Borchert 2002: 260; Burge 2000: 524. Contra Moloney (1998: 506, following R. Brown), who contends that “the Jews” are the subject of the verb.

6 So, with a variety of nuances, Witherington 1995: 308; R. Brown 1970: 917; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270; and Moloney 1998: 502, 506. Carson (1991: 609), who says that the omission is due to John’s desire to further highlight Jesus’ willing obedience to the Father, dismisses as unduly speculative the view that the omission is part of a polemic against the theory that Simon of Cyrene was himself crucified (contra Beasley-Murray 1999: 345). Barrett (1978: 548) proposes that the omission is due to the evangelist’s effort to highlight the “all-sufficiency of Jesus ... in effecting the redemption of the world.” Beasley-Murray (1999: 345 [cf. Borchert 2002: 261; R. Brown 1970: 917–18; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270]) suggests that the omission serves to create an allusion to Isaac carrying the wood for his sacrifice.

11 For an extensive discussion of Roman crucifixion, see Witherington 1995: 303–6. See also Borchert 2002: 263–64.

20 Cf. the causative use of “flogged” in 19:1. So the majority of commentators, including R. Brown 1970: 901; Carson 1991: 610; Morris 1995: 713; Barrett 1978: 549 (but see Borchert 2002: 265). See also commentary at 19:40.

43 So also the vast majority of commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Morris 1995: 716–17; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Bultmann 1971: 672; Borchert 2002: 268; R. Brown 1970: 904; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.276. Ridderbos (1997: 611 n. 142) notes that in light of Mark 15:40 and Matt. 27:56, there could have been other women there as well. See also Luke 23:49.

47 Commentators have detected various types of symbolism in this scene. Bultmann (1971: 673), true to F. C. Baur, sees Mary as representative of Jewish Christianity, and the beloved disciple of Gentile Christianity, the latter being charged to honor the former as its “mother,” from whom it originated (cf. Brodie 1993: 549). Witherington (1995: 309) views these two characters as symbolic of a new Adam and Eve, who are obedient whereas the former were not. Carson (1991: 618, following M. Gourgues) suggests that Mary, on account of her faith in Christ, is now able metaphorically to become a mother to a new son supplied for her by Jesus (cf. Matt. 19:29; see also Witherington 1995: 310). Beasley-Murray (1999: 350, following Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278) sees Mary as representing that part of Israel that is willing to believe in Jesus as the Messiah. Refreshingly, and refusing to resort to symbolism or allegory, Morris (1995: 718) says the beloved disciple simply “provided her [Mary] with a roof” and took her under his care. Others focus on lessons (to be) learned by Mary, such as needing to “step back in submission to the law of life that the Father has set for her son” (Ridderbos 1997: 612) or to receive the gift of salvation that she desired to receive at the wedding in Cana (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278; Beasley-Murray 1999: 350; Borchert 2002: 269).

48 In antiquity, a dying person ordinarily would entrust his mother to another with a direct charge such as this: “I leave to you my mother to be taken care of” (Lagrange 1925: 494 [cited in R. Brown 1970: 907]; cf. Lucian, Toxaris 22). In the LXX, the adoption formula is generally “you are” rather than “here is” as in the present passage (“‘Mother, here is your son’ ... ‘Here is your mother’”; cf. Ps. 2:7; Tob. 7:12). The form of expression used in John has a Semitic ring. Speaking of “the official formula of the old Jewish family law,” one commentator refers to a crucified man’s “right to make testamentary dispositions, even from the cross” (Stauffer 1960: 13; cf. Borchert 2002: 269; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278).

60 Borchert 2002: 272–73; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.284; contra Bultmann 1971: 675. The same word, παραδίδομι (paradidōmi, give up) is used in Isa. 53:12 to describe the death of the suffering Servant (Morris 1995: 721 n. 81).

61 So the vast majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 618; Carson 1991: 622; Barrett 1978: 555; Morris 1995: 730; Bultmann 1971: 676). Contra Borchert (2002: 273 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 933]), who seems to suggest that Jesus died on Nisan 14 and thus was being portrayed as the Passover lamb.

67 See Lev. Rab. 15.2 on Lev. 13:2. Commentators disagree as to whether or not the present reference is intended to counter incipient Docetism, which denied Jesus’ full humanity at his death. Some consider this unlikely (Ridderbos [1997: 620], who thinks that the present passage is simply designed to further support the reliability and eyewitness nature of the account; R. Brown 1970: 949–52), while a majority favors such a polemic purpose (e.g., Carson [1991: 623], who sees this verse as the “counterpoint” to 1:14; Barrett 1978: 556; Morris 1995: 724; Beasley-Murray 1999: 356; Borchert 2002: 276–77; Burge 2000: 532).

1 On the structure of John 20, see the discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 3.301–2. See also Beasley-Murray 1999: 367–70; Moloney 1998: 517; Borchert 2002: 289; R. Brown 1970: 995–96. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.321) considers 20:11–18 to be a “prelude” to 20:19–29. Borchert (2002: 289–90, 296) perceives in 20:1–18 an “envelope effect or sandwich pattern” whereby the narratives involving Mary have been framed around 20:3–10, with the statement about the beloved disciple in 20:8 serving as the focal point of this chapter. Moloney (1998: 515–16) finds an inclusio between 1:35–51 and chapter 20.

3 Often, though not always, in John, darkness connotes evil or unbelief (see 1:5; 8:12; 9:4; 11:10; 12:35, 46; 13:30). It is not clear that it does so here (contra Maccini 1996: 208; Carson 1991: 635–36; Borchert 2002: 291; R. Brown 1970: 981; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.308; Moloney 1998: 518).

24 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 638; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Borchert 2002: 295; R. Brown 1970: 987; Bultmann 1971: 684; Burge 2000: 554; Laney 1992: 360. Witherington (1995: 325) suggests, less plausibly, that the beloved disciple believed that Jesus had been taken by God similar to Elijah. Morris (1995: 736) notes that the two verbs do not have explicit objects, supplying the graveclothes as the object of the beloved disciple’s “seeing” and Jesus’ resurrection as that of the disciple’s “believing” (albeit without understanding its full theological significance). Hardly plausible is the suggestion by Minear (1983: 91 n. 14, with reference to 1976 [followed by Conway 1999: 189–90]) that what the disciples believed was the statement of Mary Magdalene in 20:2.

27 This is inadequately recognized by those who see in the “disciple Jesus loved” a model disciple par excellence. See Ridderbos 1997: 633; Whitacre 1999: 474; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; R. Brown 1970: 1005; Borchert 2002: 295.

1 The term κλαίω (klaiō, cry) denotes the loud wailing typical of people in the ancient Near East (Morris 1995: 739 n. 30; Borchert 2002: 297–98; see commentary at 11:31).

1 Note also the connective οὖν, oun (R. Brown 1970: 1019). The suggestion by Borchert (2002: 303) that the darkness of the evening corresponds to the darkness of the disciples’ understanding is of doubtful relevance.

16 The critique by Hatina (1993), who says that the reference is to the indwelling Paraclete, fails to convince. Contrary to the view of many commentators, the present pericope does not constitute the Johannine equivalent to Pentecost (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1038; Barrett [1978: 570], who says that the present passage cannot be harmonized with Acts 2; Bultmann 1971: 691), nor is Calvin’s (1961: 205) proposal satisfactory that at 20:22 the disciples “were only sprinkled with His grace and not [as at Pentecost] saturated with full power.” Beasley-Murray (1999: 382 [followed by Borchert 2002: 307–8]) believes that John telescoped the giving of the Spirit without concern for chronology (citing the reference to the ascension in 20:17 as a parallel). M. Turner (1977) thinks that the reference is not to the Spirit at all but to Jesus’ message as Spirit and life. The treatment by Moloney (1998: 532, 535) is rather idiosyncratic. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.325), too, surprisingly contends that the Johannine instance involves all believers, while the events in Acts 2 pertain to the apostles. If anything, one might have expected the opposite kind of reasoning, with John’s account anticipating the general outpouring narrated in Acts 2.

Against the view of Burge (2000: 558 [cf. Burge 1987: 148–49]), who notes the connection between the present passage and Jesus’ promise to send the Spirit in John 14 and 16, the present event does not mark the actual fulfillment of these promises other than by way of anticipatory sign. Keener’s (2003: 1196–1200, see also 1204–6) discussion, including an attempted refutation of M. Turner (1998), remains inconclusive and, on the whole, fails to convince.

23 See Schlatter 1959: 511; Beasley-Murray 1999: 383; Borchert 2002: 310. The rabbis used the terms “binding” and “loosing” to declare what was forbidden or permitted by the law. See Str-B 1:738–41; Büchsel, TDNT 2:60–61; J. Lightfoot 1859: 2.237–41; Dalman 1902: 213–17.

1 The present unit is introduced by δέ (de, and, but), perhaps creating a contrast between Thomas and the disciples in the previous narrative (Moloney 1998: 538). The existence of the Twelve is in this Gospel presupposed rather than explicitly narrated (see commentary at 6:67; see also the brief excursus in Borchert 2002: 311). The reference to Thomas’s designation “the twin” hardly constitutes an allusion to his double-mindedness (so, rightly, Borchert 2002: 312; cf. R. Brown 1970: 1024; Bultmann 1971: 694 n. 2). Lee (1995: 43, citing Robert Alter) notes that “absence is a favourite literary device of this narrator.”

6 So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 647) and most major commentators (e.g., Morris 1995: 753; Witherington 1995: 344; Carson 1991: 657; Moloney 1998: 537; Barrett 1978: 572; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.332; contra Borchert 2002: 314; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

11 Though this does not necessarily mean that Thomas (or the evangelist) consciously sought to allude to this or other similar OT passages in the present instance (so Ridderbos 1997: 647; contra Borchert 2002: 315). See also 2 Sam. 7:28; 1 Kings 18:39; Ps. 29:3; 86:15; 88:1; Jer. 31:18; Zech. 13:9.

14 So, rightly, the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 197: 648; Morris 1995: 754; Carson 1991: 659; Beasley-Murray 1999: 386; Burge 2000: 563; Barrett 1978: 573; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.334; contra Borchert 2002: 316; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

6 Ridderbos (1997: 658–59) detects in this a reference to “the unity they [the disciples] recovered after Jesus’ resurrection.” Similarly, Talbert (1992: 259) sees in this “unity” an answer to Jesus’ prayer in 17:11 and a result of the Spirit’s enabling. This seems to rest too much interpretive weight on the rather inconspicuous expression “were together,” however. Little else in the context suggests that these disciples are Spirit-filled (note that they caught no fish). The presence of symbolism in the number seven is doubtful as well (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 650; Carson 1991: 669; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.352; Beasley-Murray 1999: 399; Borchert 2002: 324); it is hard to see what would connote “completeness” in the present instance (contra Brodie 1993: 582).

11 “Early morning” is reminiscent of the similar phrase at the beginning of the previous chapter (see commentary at 20:1). Borchert’s (2002: 326) symbolic interpretation (“a new morning having arrived not only physically but also as a Johannine theological symbolization of the arrival of a new era”) fails to convince.

26 Borchert (2002: 329) insightfully compares the references to a charcoal fire in 18:18 and the present passage, commenting, “Although the earlier fire marked the symbol of an uninviting situation of cold, hostile questioning, this second fire with its fish and bread must be seen as an inviting setting ... providing a new commissioning for Peter.” Similarly, Stibbe (1993: 211–12) says, “Jesus is recreating the setting in which Peter denied him.”

Boring, M. E. 157n56, 165n80, 179n20, 185n47, 283n22, 300n8, 306n43, 307n51, 382n34, 435n67, 606n26

56 See Bammel 1957: 381–85; Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 264–65; Kippenberg 1971: 276–327.

80 C. Koester 1990b: 665–80, esp. 667; cf. Deissmann 1927: 364–65; Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 268.

20 Mackowski (1980: 81–83) even believes that behind 5:2–9 is the story of a pagan sanctuary that he believes to have been an Asclepieum; but this is categorically ruled out by Hengel (1999: 313), who nonetheless points to the significance of the Asclepius cult for John’s Asia Minor audience (p. 315, referring also to a work by K. H. Rengstorf in n. 84). See also the ancient and bibliographic references cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 266–67.

47 See Gen. Rab. 11.10; Exod. Rab. 30.9, citing Isa. 6:3; Jer. 23:24. The Letter of Aristaeas (second century B.C.) says that God “is continually at work in everything” (210). See also Eusebius, Praeparatio evangelica 13.12.11, frg. 5 (cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 267).

22 Most frequently cited is the healing of the blind soldier Valerius Aper, apparently by Asclepius, in which an eye-salve was used (Deissmann 1927: 135; Rengstorf, TDNT 6:119). According to Boring, Berger, and Colpe (1995: 284), the inscription probably comes from the Asclepius temple on the island in the Tiber in Rome and dates to A.D. 138.

8 Though the OT is doubtless John’s primary point of reference, the kind of imagery employed by the evangelist would not have been unknown to his Hellenistic audience. Cf. Themistius, Peri Philanthr. 9d–10c (fourth century A.D.), cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 286.

43 See Exod. 3:7; 33:12, 17; Jer. 31:34; Hos. 6:6; 13:5; Nah. 1:7. For additional references and discussion, see Ridderbos 1997: 361. The saying “I know those who are mine, and those who are mine know me” has a proverbial ring to it; Boring, Berger, and Colpe (1995: 288) cite a Greek parallel: “I know Simon and Simon knows me.”

51 Leaders who promoted unity were also prized in the Hellenistic world (e.g., Plutarch, De Alexandri magni fortuna aut virtute 6 [cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 288]).

34 The Sibylline Oracles speak of a “heavenly crash of thunder, the voice of God” (5:344–45). The notion of heaven answering human speech in thunder is also found in the ancient Greek world (Homer, Odyssey 20.97–104 [cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 292]).

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible

Bornkamm, G. 71n52
Bowman, J. 158
Braun, F.-M. 1, 2n3
Breck, J. 567, 583n3, 584n3, 585n8, 588n4, 603n14

hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

26 Examples in Philo (Post. Cain 43 §144; Drunk. 9 §32; Mos. 1.38 §213) are cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 195 (see also Boring 1995: 308).

52 There seems to be little basis for the assertion by Barrett (1978: 178, citing G. Bornkamm) that “I have seen and I have testified” is a baptismal confession.

3 On the Latin background, see Volfing 2001: 11–59. See also the works referenced in J. N. Sanders 1943; Pollard 1970; Braun 1959; and Grillmeier 1975.

3 On ancient epilogues, see Schenk 1992: esp. 528–30. Schenk argues that it is intrinsic to the nature of epilogues that they appear (at least at first glance) to be superfluous. According to Schenk, the function of John 21 is one of legitimation of the work by way of a conventional legal συγγραφή. Breck (1992) distinguishes between appendix, epilogue, and conclusion, contending that John 21 is a conclusion rather than an epilogue (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1081; Osborne 1981: 294) or an appendix (e.g., Bacon 1931: 71; Lindars 1972: 618). He points to the Johannine pattern of double endings (cf. 1 John 5:13, followed by vv. 14–21), contends that 20:30–31 and 21:25 form an “inclusion-conclusion” parallelism enveloping a macrochiasm, and claims that 20:30–31 is a more fitting conclusion to chapter 20 than to the Gospel as a whole (following Minear 1983: esp. 87; cf. Vorster 1992: 2219; but see Spencer 1999: 52). He also points to 21:14 as indicating that 21:24–25 rather than 20:30–31 serves as the conclusion of the Gospel. I concur that John 21 forms an integral part of the Gospel. However, I would add that labeling that chapter as an “epilogue” does not necessarily imply attributing it to later disciples; John, as the original author, could just as well have written it himself. Moreover, Breck’s proposal seems to diminish unduly the vital function and structural significance of 20:30–31 as embracing the entire Gospel rather than merely concluding chapter 20 (cf. esp. 12:37).

8 See Ridderbos (1997: 656 n. 3), who cites Schlatter: “The attribution of the new narrative to another author is impossible, however, since the identical linguistic conventions have been fully maintained.” Even Bultmann (1971: 700) declares, “Language and style admittedly afford no sure proof.” Similarly, Neirynck (1990: 336) concludes that “the evidence of style and vocabulary ... is ambiguous and not decisive.” Barrett (1978: 576) provides a list of words used in chapter 21 but not in chapters 1–20. See also Breck (1992: 36), who notes that words unique to chapter 21 in John’s Gospel are either “technical expressions linked to the fishing trade”

Bretschneider, K. G. 2, 6n12

Brodie, T. L. 30n32, 45n79, 59n8, 59n10, 61n18, 76n68, 79, 82, 100n39, 126n34, 142n5, (ἀλιεύω, πιάζω, αἰγιαλός, προσφάγιον, δίκτυον, σύρω, ἀποβαίνω) or particular expressions required by their respective contexts (πρωῖα, ἐπενδύτης, γυμνός, βόσκω, ἄρνιον, ποιμαίνω, προβάτιον [variant of πρόβατα, the more likely reading in 21:16–17]).

4 Breck (1992: 27–49, following Ellis 1984; 1992) lays out 1:19–51 and 20:19–21:25 in inverted parallelism involving Nathanael.

14 See Gal. 6:11; Col. 4:18; 2 Thess. 3:17; Philem. 19. Morris (1995: 776) notes the present participle ὁ μαρτυρῶν (ho martyrōn, the one testifying) as “another indication that he [the beloved disciple] was still living” (see also Breck 1992: 33; contra Schnackenburg [1990: 3.372], who says that the evangelist “lives on in his testimony”). On the Johannine “witness” motif, see commentary at 1:7.

12 Karl Gottlieb Bretschneider (1776–1848) pioneered an approach to John’s Gospel that dated it to the late second century and rejected its veracity at most points (see Baird 1992: 312–14). In contrast, Bretschneider’s contemporary Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834) believed that “the Gospel of John bears such undeniable signs of authenticity, and so reveals on every page the eyewitness and personal participant, that one must be prejudiced and diverted from the natural course so as to doubt its authenticity” (cited in Baird 1992: 214).

32 Note the comment on this alternative by Metzger (1994: 168): “whatever that may be supposed to mean.” In Metzger’s dissenting opinion (the majority of the UBS translation committee favors taking the phrase with what follows) he states, “Despite valiant attempts of commentators to bring sense out of taking ὁ γέγονεν with what follows, the passage remains intolerably clumsy and opaque” (similarly, Schnackenburg, cited by Ashton 1986: 172). Among the major translations, only the NRSV prefers this alternative. Commentators who advocate this option are R. Brown (1966: 6–7), Bultmann (1971: 39–40, esp. n. 4), Beasley-Murray (1999: 1–2, esp. n. a), and Whitacre (1999: 52). See also E. Miller (1989), who integrates his belief that the phrase is to be taken with what follows into his larger thesis that 1:1a–b and 1:3–5 constitute a christological hymn in four strophes extolling the salvation-historical activity of the Word (he considers 1:1c and 1:2 to be interpolations). Brodie (1993: 138), because of the lack of punctuation, sees the text as inherently ambiguous and as being “part of a careful literary strategy” designed to focus on “the continuity between creation and the incarnation, between creation and redemption.”

79 As in the case of 1:6–8, some see 1:15 as an addition to a preexisting hymn (R. Brown 1966: 15; contra Barrett 1978: 167); but again, this is unnecessary. Brodie (1993: 143) comments, “John appears to be ... the embodiment of the OT. ... John’s crying, therefore, far from being an illogical interpolation, is altogether appropriate. It is as though, when the incarnation finally arrived, full of covenant love, the OT stood up and cheered.”

8 Whitacre (1999: 65) notes the disingenuous nature of the questioning, since the leaders sent others rather than going themselves, and the delegation asks only in order to provide a response to the Jewish authorities: “So even when they ask what seems to be an open question (v. 22), they do so with a closed attitude of indifference.” Brodie (1993: 151) likewise notes that the delegation was concerned foremost with politics and bureaucracy: “to have some kind of manageable answer for some people back in Jerusalem.”

10 Brodie (1993: 148) uses “trial” terminology. Westcott (1908: 1.32) instead sees this as “in some sense, a Temptation of John corresponding to the (simultaneous) Temptation of Christ.”

18 Westcott (1908: 1.34) notes, “The replies grow shorter from time to time: ‘I am not the Christ,’ ‘I am not,’ ‘No.’ ” Indeed, the Baptist must “decrease” (cf. John 3:30). Brodie (1993: 150) observes, “There is a faint evoking of a process of self-emptying.”

68 Bultmann’s claim (1971: 100; accepted by Brodie 1993: 160) that “tenth hour” is the “hour of fulfillment” is very questionable. R. Brown (1966: 75) suggests that if the day was Friday, the disciples had to stay until Saturday evening in order to properly observe the Sabbath.

Alternatively, the disciples stayed overnight because of the nature of the desired conversation. If so, this could refer to any day during the week (Morris 1995: 139; cf. Burge 2000: 76).

39 Carson (1991: 169) rightly notes that there is little contextual support for the notion that Mary is here presented as a mediatrix between humanity and Jesus (contra those who see Mary here as representative of the people [e.g., Brodie 1993: 174]). Witherington (1995: 79, 378, referring to Ashton) may read too much into John’s presentation when he sees Mary here depicted as a fledgling disciple who later becomes an “archetypal female disciple.” Ridderbos (1997: 108) likewise seems to overreach when he suggests that Mary is symbolic of believing Israel, which has eagerly awaited the coming of the Savior. Another dubious suggestion is made by Stibbe (1993: 44), who proposes that Jesus’ use of γύναι may constitute an allusion to Gen. 3:15, “in which case she is to be seen as the New Eve in the New Creation of Jesus’ ministry.”

34 It may be too early in Jesus’ ministry for his disciples to be included (Carson 1991: 198–99; contra Ridderbos 1997: 134; Morris 1995: 196). Schnackenburg’s (1990: 1.376) solution, that Jesus’ statement is proleptic, looking “forward to the time when his disciples make his ‘testimony’ their own, as part of their preaching” (with reference to 3:22 and 9:4), likewise fails to convince. There is also no need to postulate that the “we” aligns Jesus with the OT prophets, reflects the Johannine community (Witherington 1995: 98; cf. Moloney 1998: 94), or denotes the church versus the synagogue (Barrett 1978: 211; Brodie 1993: 198).

5 Blomberg (1995: 8), with reference to Dockery (1988), lists five approaches to the present narrative: (1) allegorical (cf. 2 Kings 17:30–31); (2) existential (Bultmann 1971: 175–202); (3) pastoral (Milne 1993: 85–86); (4) salvation-historical (W. Davies 1974; Carson 1993); and (5) intertextual (focusing on OT parallels such as Gen. 24:10–61; 29:1–20; Exod. 2:15b–21) (Neyrey 1979). Acknowledging that all of these approaches capture elements of truth, Blomberg nevertheless finds them wanting and proposes a seven-pronged approach of his own. Stibbe (1993: 68–69) advocates a symbolic reading: “If the woman has had five husbands and is living de facto with a sixth, then Jesus is the seventh man in her life. Since seven is the perfect number in Judaism, the implicit commentary must be that Jesus is the man which she has been waiting for, the man in whose presence she will find wholeness.” In the same vein, Brodie (1993: 217–18) sees this as a betrothal-type scene. See also Dockery (1988: 127–40), who distinguishes between author-, text-, and reader-oriented approaches, and Marshall 1974. R. Lightfoot (1956: 122) detects certain parallels between John 4 and 19.

21 Brodie (1993: 233) sees “a coherent picture”: “Jesus’ withdrawal from a superficial and hostile Judaism (2:23, 4:1–3), ... followed ... by allusions to his orientation toward the Gentiles—the coming, bridelike, of ‘all’ (3:26), the coming, in a betrothal scene, of the Samaritan woman and her people, and finally, from a border town, the coming of the royal official and his whole household.” For Brodie, all of this adds up to “a journey to the Gentiles.”

6 Brodie (1993: 236) finds the setting “thoroughly semitic. ... The text evokes an image of the Jews as a suffering flock.”

24 Brodie (1993: 237) notes that Jesus here acts “with a Creator-like knowledge and authority.” The verb tenses focus on Jesus’ command for the man to get up and go, with the action of taking up his mat preceding his departure, and the three actions prescribed in sequential order.

35 Also contra Brodie (1993: 238), who takes the man’s presence “in the place of worship, the temple,” as indication of “some receptivity toward God.”

41 Moloney 1998: 173; cf. Metzner 1999; Lee 1994: 110; Witkamp 1985: 24; Leidig 1979: 211; contra Thomas 1995: 18. Moloney (1998: 173) rightly notes, contra Beck (1993 [cf. 1997: 86–90]), who argues that anonymous characters in the Fourth Gospel draw the reader into an identification with the character, “The reader of the Fourth Gospel, however, hardly identifies with a man who is in league with ‘the Jews’ (vs. 15).” Keener (2003: 87), similarly, contends that a list of Johannine models of faith is not entirely coextensive with anonymous characters (citing esp. 5:14–15) and registers this as his only serious disagreement with Beck (p. 87 n. 49). Beck, in a review (2001), indirectly responds to my earlier criticism (Köstenberger 1999b, reviewing Beck 1997) that the man in John 5 disproves his theory by alleging, in effect, that I have no place for literary analysis in my hermeneutical method. Nothing could be further from the truth. My concern, rather, lies with an unqualified wholesale adoption of reader-response criticism by evangelicals who fail to realize that this methodology is part and parcel of a postmodern hermeneutic that is left with nothing but subjective readings devoid of any claim to authority or universal applicability. Moreover, I was concerned to point out that Beck’s central thesis (i.e., that anonymity necessarily equals ideal function and positive characterization) is invalid. Note further this puzzling conclusion by Brodie (1993: 238): “The final picture ... is ... open to a positive interpretation: the man has finally come to mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus, and he is announcing the good news to the Jews.” Precisely where Brodie finds the man “announcing the good news to the Jews” is unclear to me, nor can I see textual evidence for the man coming to “mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus.”

7 Though some of the acts and words in John 6 have eucharistic significance, the feeding of the multitudes does not in itself constitute a eucharistic meal (so, rightly, Brodie 1993: 263; cf. Barrett [1978: 274], who adds that, to the contrary, “the eucharist, like the last supper... , must be understood in the context of the Jewish Passover”). See also R. Brown (1966: 246–49), who speaks of “eucharistic elements” in all four Gospel versions and considers “the eucharistic coloring of the Johannine account of the multiplication” as beyond doubt.

72 So Ridderbos 1997: 235–37; cf. Carson 1991: 295; Morris 1995: 331–32; contra Moloney 1998: 223; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.55; Lindars 1972: 267; Talbert 1992: 140. As Keener (2003: 690) observes, “John’s words [in 6:27–63] invite his audience to look to Christ’s death itself, not merely those symbols which point to his death.” At best, any such overtones are derivative (Borchert 1996: 270–71; cf. Brodie 1993: 286; Calvin 1959: 170).

11 A survey of major commentaries shows that about half provide a regular commentary (Carson, Laney, Lindars, Whitacre, Calvin, Westcott), while the other half refrain from comment (Michaels, Talbert, Stibbe, Brodie, D. M. Smith), in some cases choosing not to address the issue at all (e.g., Schlatter [1948: 205], who in his scholarly commentary moves directly from 7:52 to 8:12 without comment, though his popular commentary [1962: 139–41] does treat the pericope adulterae in deference to “ecclesiastical tradition”; see also Zahn [1921: 404], who, like Schlatter, moves immediately from 7:52 to 8:12 and deals with the pericope in a lengthy excursus on pp. 723–30).

8 Commentators also debate the ontological nature and implications of Jesus’ claim here. Talbert

(1992: 152) maintains that the statement is “not primarily ontological ... but soteriological,” yet Brodie (1993: 324) rightly notes that Jesus’ words are uttered “in the context of showing himself to be in union with the Father. The light, therefore, is not an isolated Jesus but a Jesus in relationship. The same is implied in the prologue: the light comes from the Word who is in relationship with God.”

100 It has been suggested (e.g., Michaels 1989: 153; cf. Brodie 1993: 335) that the reference here may be to Abraham’s rejoicing when he announced to Isaac on the way to the sacrifice, “God himself will provide the lamb for the burnt offering, my son” (Gen. 22:8). See also T. Levi 18:2, 6 (cf. 18:14; Matt. 8:11).

101 So Schnackenburg 1990: 2.222, citing 1 Enoch 61:5; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 13:52. Similarly, Bultmann (1971: 326 n. 2). Brodie (1993: 335) opts for a broader scope, suggesting that “Jesus’ day refers to the way in which, during his entire life, and especially in his death, he was revealed as the Anointed.” Similarly, Whitacre (1999: 230), who says that the expression encompasses Jesus’ “whole advent, ministry, death, resurrection and ascension.”

67 Westcott (1908: 2.90) observes, “Martha had spoken of a gift to be obtained from God and dispensed by Christ. Christ turns her thoughts to His own Person. He is that which men need.” See also the challenging question, “Do you believe this?” that concludes Jesus’ statement at the end of 11:26. Cf. Brodie 1993: 393.

91 Barrett (1978: 399) asserts that Jesus was angry “beyond question.” Schnackenburg (1990: 2.335) calls attempts to render ἐμβριμάομαι as an emotional experience such as grief, pain, or sympathy “illegitimate.” Beasley-Murray (1987 = 1999: 192–93, followed by Lindars 1992b: 89–90, noting that he changed his view from Lindars 1972: 398) marshals considerable evidence to support the reading “became angry in spirit.” See also Carson (1991: 415), who contends that ἐμβριμάομαι means more than “deeply moved in spirit” and says that the term refers to “anger, outrage, or emotional indignation.” Brodie (1993: 395), starting with Schnackenburg’s view that Jesus was angry at the unbelief of Mary and the Jews, maintains that his anger is directed also at sin and death, and thus ultimately against the realm of Satan.

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, “The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death.” See also Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999: 289. The mourners’ unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999: 192–93), several of whom adduce Paul’s statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus’ anger is directed toward both “the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow” and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus’ anger as occasioned by Mary’s turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either “misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition,” to mean “moved in spirit.” Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus’ struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, “He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself” (11:38 is translated “bearing the rebuke within himself”). According to Story, at the sight of people’s grief, Jesus was overcome by “momentary self-regret,” thinking, “Why did I not come sooner ... ? I have only myself to blame. ... Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?” However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

119 Brodie (1993: 397) draws a connection with 5:24–29 and speaks of Jesus’ exercise of “Creator-like power.” See especially 5:28–29, where Jesus speaks of a coming time “when all who are in their graves will hear his [the Son of Man’s] voice and come out.” Keener (2003: 839) distinguishes between Jesus’ “secret” sign in 2:1–11 and his public sign in chapter 11, the difference being that now his time is close at hand.

29 Literally, “from the Jews.” The construction is somewhat unusual, featuring Greek ἐκ (ek), a partitive genitive (contra Brodie 1993: 408).

10 Brodie (1993: 448) notes that the term βάλλω (ballō, throw, put) is used twice at the beginning of chapter 13 (13:2, 5) and not otherwise in chapters 13–17 except for twice at the beginning of chapter 15 (both in 15:6).

29 Brodie (1993: 449) finds in the triple exchange between Jesus and Peter echoes of earlier conversations, particularly of the opening triple exchange between Jesus and the Samaritan woman in 4:7–15.

38 A reference to Christian baptism is unlikely. Contra Moloney 1998: 375; Brodie 1993: 452; and R. Brown (1970: 562), who says that 13:6–10 represents a secondary allusion to baptism. Moreover, as Carson (1991: 466) notes, the washing of Judas’s feet proves that “no rite, even if performed by Jesus himself, ensures spiritual cleansing.” On “he knew,” see 6:70–71; 13:3, 26–27.

3 The diminutive τεκνία (teknia, little children) is used only here in John’s Gospel but seven times in John’s first epistle (1 John 2:1, 12, 28; 3:7, 18; 4:4; 5:21). See Brodie 1993: 456; Westcott 1908: 2.160–61.

70 The translation of the term has proved particularly difficult since there does not seem to be an exact equivalent in the English language (see discussion in Carson 1991: 499). None of the expressions chosen in English translations seems fully adequate: “Counselor” (NIV) smacks of contemporary notions of counseling (marriage counselor, camp counselor), focusing primarily on emotional or psychological aspects (though the legal term “Counselor” or “Counsel” is more appropriate); “Helper” (NASB, ESV, ISV) is more neutral but conveys inferior status overtones not present in the text and lacks the legal connotation possibly present (cf. the discussion in Lindars 1972: 479); the fact that some translations give several alternative renderings in footnotes also suggests that any one English rendering may be inadequate (e.g., NLT: “the Counselor; or Comforter, or Encourager, or Advocate”). “Companion” (suggested by Brodie [1993: 466]) also falls short, as does Calvin’s (1961: 82) “Patron.” Some make reference to the root meaning of the word, “one called alongside to help,” but it is unclear whether first-century usage consciously drew on this background. There is evidence that the expression was used in a legal setting, but it is less clear that the meaning should be restricted to “Advocate” (so, consistently, the TNIV) or the like (standard Greek reference works cite the following meanings: LSJ—one called to one’s aid, legal assistant, advocate, summoned, intercessor; Behm, TDNT 5:800–814—legal advisor, helper, advocate in court [for a helpful survey, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.144–50]). Perhaps “helping presence” captures the import of the term better than any other (Köstenberger 1999a: 157) for the following reasons: (1) this is what Jesus was while with the disciples; (2) this encompasses the various functions laid out for the Spirit in John 14–16; (3) this transcends (but may include) the legal context of the term (see esp. 16:7–11). See the discussion by Ridderbos (1997: 503), who issues a plea to let the Johannine context (rather than alleged extrabiblical parallels) determine the meaning of παράκλητος and concludes that “the dominant idea is of someone who offers assistance in a situation in which help is needed.”

95 Hence, 14:27 continues 14:25–26. See Kellum (2005: 164), who cites Witherington 1995: 253 and Brodie 1993: 469. In the Greek world, peace (εἰρήνη, eirēnē) was essentially a concept stated negatively, denoting the absence of war. Though this is also part of the term’s range of meaning in Hebrew thought (e.g., Josh. 9:15; 1 Sam. 7:14; 1 Kings 2:5), the expression shālôm usually had much richer connotations, conveying the notion of positive blessing, especially that of a right relationship with God (Morris 1965a: 237–44; Lindars 1972: 484). This is evident in the well-known blessing given by Moses and Aaron (Num. 6:24–26; cf. Ps. 29:11; Hag. 2:9). The OT prophetic writings in particular look forward to a period of peace inaugurated by the coming of the Messiah. The “prince of peace” (Isa. 9:6) would “command peace to the nations” (Zech. 9:10; cf. 9:9), and there would be good tidings of peace and salvation (Isa. 52:7; cf. 54:13; 57:19; Acts 10:36). Through the royal Messiah, God would make an everlasting “covenant of peace” with his people (Ezek. 37:26).

4 Though it seems far-fetched to see in the present passage a secondary reference to the Eucharist, as do Brodie (1993: 482) and D. M. Smith (1999: 281) (citing Matt. 26:29; Mark 14:25).

76 See 10:38; 14:10–11, 20, 23; 15:4–5; 1 John 1:3; 2:23–24; 5:20. On the relationships of mutual indwelling, see Whitacre 1999: 418–19. Brodie (1993: 516) contends that this “ideal” of “a community based on God and mutual care” is “the high point and synthesis of the discourse and of the chapter—indeed of the whole gospel. As the incarnation is the finale of the prologue, so is the idea of unity the finale of chap. 17.”

10 The present passage has been subjected to several highly creative but rather improbable readings (see esp. Whitacre 1999: 425; Brodie 1993: 529; Stibbe 1993: 182–84).

24 Brodie (1993: 526) draws attention to the fact that the only other previous reference to “drawing back” in the Johannine narrative was in 6:66, where many of Jesus’ followers left in unbelief. At that time Judas remained one of the Twelve; now he is the leader of the arresting forces.

36 As Brodie (1993: 535) points out, Jesus’ reference to the nature of his “kingdom” in the present passage coheres with the thrust of John 13–17: his washing of feet to set the example of humble service, the kind of union depicted by the vine, and the disciples’ sanctification by the truth of God’s word.

42 See the extensive discussions in Carson 1991: 616; R. Brown 1970: 905–6. Symbolic interpretations (such as Brodie 1993: 549; Stibbe 1993: 194) fail to convince.

47 Commentators have detected various types of symbolism in this scene. Bultmann (1971: 673), true to F. C. Baur, sees Mary as representative of Jewish Christianity, and the beloved disciple of Gentile Christianity, the latter being charged to honor the former as its “mother,” from whom it originated (cf. Brodie 1993: 549). Witherington (1995: 309) views these two characters as symbolic of a new Adam and Eve, who are obedient whereas the former were not. Carson (1991: 618, following M. Gourgues) suggests that Mary, on account of her faith in Christ, is now able metaphorically to become a mother to a new son supplied for her by Jesus (cf. Matt. 19:29; see also Witherington 1995: 310). Beasley-Murray (1999: 350, following Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278) sees Mary as representing that part of Israel that is willing to believe in Jesus as the Messiah. Refreshingly, and refusing to resort to symbolism or allegory, Morris (1995: 718) says the beloved disciple simply “provided her [Mary] with a roof” and took her under his care. Others focus on lessons (to be) learned by Mary, such as needing to “step back in submission to the law of life that the Father has set for her son” (Ridderbos 1997: 612) or to receive the gift of salvation that she desired to receive at the wedding in Cana (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278; Beasley-Murray 1999: 350; Borchert 2002: 269).

8 The repetition of the preposition πρός (pros, to) may indicate that Peter and the beloved disciple were at different locations (see Whitacre 1999: 472; Brodie 1993: 561). The reference to “Simon Peter” is the first mention of this disciple since his denial of Jesus (18:27). As is his custom, John uses Peter’s full name when reintroducing him into his narrative (see commentary at 18:15).

17 This is disputed by Brodie (1993: 561), who says that the beloved disciple is “in better running order,” which he takes to be symbolic of superior discipleship (though on p. 564 he sees both disciples as symbolic of the unity achieved through faith in the ascending Christ). Beasley-Murray (1999: 371–72) contends that the beloved disciple’s speed was due to the extent of his love for Jesus; Moloney (1998: 522) suggests that he had stronger faith that a miracle had occurred. Yet others have seen in this statement an affirmation of John’s superiority over Peter (e.g., Schnackenburg 1990: 3.310, 312; Moloney 1998: 520; R. Brown 1970: 1004–7). More likely, however, both the beloved disciple and Peter are presented here as a duo of eyewitnesses to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 632; Carson 1991: 636–37; Bultmann 1971: 684).

6 Ridderbos (1997: 658–59) detects in this a reference to “the unity they [the disciples] recovered after Jesus’ resurrection.” Similarly, Talbert (1992: 259) sees in this “unity” an answer to Jesus’ prayer in 17:11 and a result of the Spirit’s enabling. This seems to rest too much interpretive weight on the rather inconspicuous expression “were together,” however. Little else in the context suggests that these disciples are Spirit-filled (note that they caught no fish). The presence of symbolism in the number seven is doubtful as well (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 650; Carson 1991: 669; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.352; Beasley-Murray 1999: 399; Borchert 2002: 324); it is hard to see what would connote “completeness” in the present instance (contra Brodie 1993: 582).

10 Carson (1991: 670) here (as elsewhere) detects symbolism in the “night” reference, citing 3:2, 19–21; 13:30; 20:1. However, though 3:19–21 and 13:30 qualify, it is less clear that 3:2, 20:1, and the present instance do. Stibbe (1993: 210) draws attention to the fact that “the time between night and the early hours of the morning was precisely the time when Peter denied Jesus in 18.15–27.” Brodie’s (1993: 583) casting of the symbolism as setting “their boat in an atmosphere of alien darkness” seems overdone, as does Whitacre’s (1999: 490) contention that the early morning hour symbolizes “the dawning of spiritual light.”

18 See Matt. 25:33; cf., e.g., Xenophon, Cyropaedia 7.1.3. See Str-B 1:980; BDAG 217. Brodie (1993: 584) draws rather precarious conclusions from the fact that the only other instance of the term “right” in this Gospel is Peter’s cutting off of Malchus’s right ear in 18:10.

Broer, I. 178n15

Brooke, G. J. 593

Brown, C. 102n5, 109n27, 317n93

Brown, R. E. xii, 3, 8n19, 20, 25, 27, 27n23, 28, 29n32, 31, 34, 36, 36n49, 36n50, 37, 31 Contra efforts to unlock the alleged numerical symbolism, as does Brodie (1993: 586–88), who notes that 153 is the triangular number of 17, which is the sum of both 10+7 and 12+5, all four of which are significant numbers in the Gospel. Calvin (1961: 217) called these kinds of efforts “childish trifling.” On a different note, Ridderbos (1997: 663) categorically states that “carefully counting the fish after a catch was probably never done,” but it is unclear on what basis he can make such a sweeping pronouncement.

15 The northern, smaller pool may go back to monarchical times; the southern pool may be that established in the second century B.C. by Simon the high priest (Sir. 50:3). For ancient sources, see Hengel 1999: 310. The site favored by most scholars is located under the monastery of St. Anne in the northeast quarter of the Old City. See Jeremias 1966b; Vardaman 1963: 28.

Regarding the archaeological identification of Bethesda, see Wieand 1965–66: 396–400. The existence of the five porticoes is disputed by Broer (2001).

5 C. Brown (1984) notes that the Jews’ demand for a sign to justify Jesus’ clearing of the temple corresponds to their challenge of Jesus’ authority in the Synoptics, and Brown sees the miracles of Jesus as standing in the tradition of prophetic signs that embody Jesus’ message and personal identity.

27 C. Brown (1984: 321) says that Jesus’ response in 2:19–22 corresponds to the sign of Jonah in Matthew and Luke.

93 C. Brown (1984) contends that one cannot have Christ or Christianity without the miracle-working Jesus of the Gospels. Carson (1991: 400) perceptively notes that the Jews’ inability to discern God’s presence in Jesus and his acts ultimately demonstrates their ignorance of God and how he acts. R. Brown (1966: 411–12) relevantly relates the present passage to modern attempts to use evidences as an apologetic tool (though I do not endorse all of Brown’s comments here). Indeed, this verse does seem to suggest that evidence is helpful (if not necessary) in a person’s coming to faith, though at the same time it is shown to be but a (limited) aid to faith rather than compelling faith in and of itself.

19 See especially Alexander 1992 and Goodman 1992. For a fuller development and further bibliography, see Köstenberger forthcoming. For a critique of the Martyn/Brown-style “Johannine community” hypothesis, see Köstenberger 1998b: 200–210; Carson 1991: 35–36, 87–88, 369–72; and commentary at 9:22 below.

23 Seeking to combine the notions of “with” indicating accompaniment and “toward” signifying relationship, R. Brown (1966: 4–6) translates, “The Word was in God’s presence”; A. T. Robertson (1934: 623 [cited in MacLeod 2003: 57]) glosses, “face to face with God.”

32 Note the comment on this alternative by Metzger (1994: 168): “whatever that may be supposed to mean.” In Metzger’s dissenting opinion (the majority of the UBS translation committee favors taking the phrase with what follows) he states, “Despite valiant attempts of commentators to bring sense out of taking δ $\gamma\acute{\epsilon}\gamma\omicron\nu\epsilon\nu$ with what follows, the passage remains intolerably clumsy and opaque” (similarly, Schnackenburg, cited by Ashton 1986: 172). Among the major translations, only the NRSV prefers this alternative. Commentators who advocate this option are R. Brown (1966: 6–7), Bultmann (1971: 39–40, esp. n. 4), Beasley-Murray (1999: 1–2, esp. n. a), and Whitacre (1999: 52). See also E. Miller (1989), who integrates his belief that the phrase is to be taken with what follows into his larger thesis that 1:1a–b and 1:3–5 constitute a christological hymn in four strophes extolling the salvation-historical activity of the Word (he considers 1:1c and 1:2 to be interpolations). Brodie (1993: 138), because of the lack of punctuation, sees the text as inherently ambiguous and as being “part of a careful literary strategy” designed to focus on “the continuity between creation and the incarnation, between creation and redemption.”

49 Rather puzzlingly, R. Brown (1966: 10) claims that “he was” refers to the Word, not the light. But this surely is a false dichotomy, for the Word (1:1–2) is later in the prologue consistently referred to as the light.

50 Schnackenburg (1990: 1.256) claims that the reference is not to Jesus’ earthly ministry but to Israel’s history prior to the incarnation. Similarly, R. Brown (1966: 30) cites the parallel of Wisdom in 1 Enoch 42:2: “Wisdom came to make her dwelling place among the children of men and found no dwelling place.” More likely, the reference is anticipatory of the Word’s incarnation in 1:14 (Culpepper 1980–81: 13–14; Carson 1991: 122; Ridderbos 1997: 43; Moloney 1998: 37). On a literal level, see the reference in Luke 2:7 that there was “no guest room available” (TNIV) for Jesus and his parents at his birth, which may have spiritual overtones as well.

54 This is the view of, among others, Carson 1991: 125; Dodd 1953: 402; R. Brown 1966: 10; Morris 1995: 85; Borchert 1996: 114; Burge 2000: 59. For a demonstration that 1:11, properly interpreted and understood (particularly the world as God’s property), refutes the notion, advanced by Bultmann, that John reflects gnostic thought, see Jervell 1956: 17–18. But see also the interaction with Jervell in Pryor 1990: 210–14.

68 R. Brown (1966: 13) contends that “us” refers to humanity, and “we” to the apostolic witness (contra Barrett 1978: 166); Haenchen (1984: 1.119) takes “we” as a reference to the Christian community. Bultmann (1971: 69) unduly dichotomizes and dehistoricizes when he takes “seeing” as the unhistorical sight of faith.

71 Ridderbos (1997: 53) renders ὥς as “in keeping with his nature as” (cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270), R. Brown (1966: 13) as “in the quality of.”

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called

God's children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

77 The antecedent of πλήρης (plērēs, full) is subject to debate. If declinable, it refers to ὁ λόγος (R. Brown 1966: 14; Morris 1995: 94). If indeclinable, it should be taken with δόξαν (Carson 1991: 129) or αὐτοῦ, as is perhaps most likely (so BDAG 827; Ridderbos 1997: 54 n. 117). In any case, fullness of grace and truth is predicated of Jesus.

79 As in the case of 1:6–8, some see 1:15 as an addition to a preexisting hymn (R. Brown 1966: 15; contra Barrett 1978: 167); but again, this is unnecessary. Brodie (1993: 143) comments, “John appears to be ... the embodiment of the OT. ... John's crying, therefore, far from being an illogical interpolation, is altogether appropriate. It is as though, when the incarnation finally arrived, full of covenant love, the OT stood up and cheered.”

82 For this reason R. Brown (1966: 15) and Ridderbos (1997: 56) believe that this verse was inserted later by the evangelist.

86 See also Wallace 1996: 365–68, referring to Waltke 1958: 1.166–76; R. Brown 1966: 16; and especially the excellent, definitive discussion in Carson 1991: 131–34, referring also to R. Edwards 1988; La Potterie 1977: 1.145–50.

91 For the translation “true grace” I am indebted to R. Edwards (1988: 11, following R. Brown 1966: 16, with further reference to Montgomery 1939; Kuyper 1964), who notes that the Hebrew Vorlage hesed wa-emet constitutes a hendiadys meaning “faithful (or enduring) love.” Edwards (ibid.) rightly cautions that John's appropriation of these OT expressions must be allowed to have a “fresh nuance”: “The Old Testament symbols of God's gracious acts have been appropriated and Christianized.”

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

13 The Greek word Χριστός, like its Hebrew counterpart, mešiah, means “anointed one.” Though the term was applied in the OT to a variety of men who were set apart and anointed to serve God and his people in a special capacity (such as priest or king), OT predictive prophecy gave rise to the expectation that there would be a future figure, the Anointed One, sent by God to deliver and rule his people. See especially Horbury 1998. For a convincing refutation of the claim that the present passage was written to counter a Baptist sect in the evangelist's day, see Ridderbos 1997: 64 (cf. R. Brown 1966: 48).

23 Alternatively, R. Brown (1966: 50) suggests that the Baptist is to prepare a road so that God might be able to come to his people.

24 So Ridderbos 1997: 66 n. 10; Morris 1995: 122; Carson 1991: 144; Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292; contra R. Brown 1966: 44; Moloney 1998: 52. While thus the delegation included some Pharisees, this does not mean that the Pharisees were responsible for sending out the delegation, since the Sadducees had a majority on the Sanhedrin (Carson 1991: 144). This is true especially if an article is to be added (or implied) before ἀπεσταλμένοι (Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Barrett 1978: 174; R. Brown 1966: 43–44; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292). Ἀπεσταλμένοι ἦσαν (apestalmenoi ēsan, they had been sent) is a periphrastic pluperfect (Wallace [1996: 586] calls it “consummative”).

27 So Ridderbos 1997: 67; Burge 2000: 71; Barrett 1978: 174; R. Brown 1966: 51; Borchert 1996: 126.

35 A genitive of source. Alternatively, it may be a genitive of possession (“belonging to God”; see discussions in Morris 1995: 127; R. Brown 1966: 55). For a general survey of John’s teaching on Jesus as the lamb of God, see Marshall, DJG 432–34. See also the survey of various interpretive options by Keener (2003: 452–54), who cites the apocalyptic lamb (judged unlikely), the language of the suffering servant (probable allusion to Isa. 53), and the sacrificial Passover lamb (considered primary).

46 “I have seen” (τεθέαμαι, tetheamai) is in the perfect, indicating the settledness of John’s conviction (Carson 1991: 151). Less likely, the perfect points to the permanent effects of John’s encounter with the Christ (Morris 1995: 132–33; R. Brown 1966: 56). Morris (1995: 133 n. 72) thinks that John’s use of a different verb for seeing may be a mere instance of stylistic variation. More likely, θεάομαι in John conveys a more pronounced note of perception than other “seeing” verbs. This is borne out by all instances of θεάομαι in this Gospel: 1:14, 32, 38; 4:35; 6:5; 11:45. 61 See the discussions in Morris 1995: 137; R. Brown 1966: 78; Carson 1991: 154; Barrett 1978: 180. See also comments on the term μένω (menō, stay) at 1:39.

68 Bultmann’s claim (1971: 100; accepted by Brodie 1993: 160) that “tenth hour” is the “hour of fulfillment” is very questionable. R. Brown (1966: 75) suggests that if the day was Friday, the disciples had to stay until Saturday evening in order to properly observe the Sabbath. Alternatively, the disciples stayed overnight because of the nature of the desired conversation. If so, this could refer to any day during the week (Morris 1995: 139; cf. Burge 2000: 76).

76 R. Brown (1966: 74) agrees that this is the case in 1:42 (“to look with penetration and insight”), but disputes that this is the connotation in 1:29.

79 Cf. Matt. 16:16–19; see Schnackenburg 1990: 1.312–13; R. Brown 1966: 80; Beasley-Murray 1987: 27; Carson 1984: 368. It must be noted, however, that the evangelist himself does not comment explicitly, apparently leaving it up to the reader to draw the proper inference (see Barrett 1978: 183).

85 In Jesus’ day, the term “Galilee” was used with reference to the territory east of the Jordan River (Carson 1991: 158; cf. Barrett 1978: 183; R. Brown 1966: 82; Morris 1995: 143 n. 100). After the beginning of the Jewish war in A.D. 66, apparently the entire region around the lake was called Galilee. If this is correct, John here follows contemporary usage (Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. k).

89 The identification of Nathanael with Bartholomew is favored by Ridderbos 1997: 87–88; Morris 1995: 143; Carson 1991: 159; Burge 2000: 77; contra Barrett 1978: 184; R. Brown 1966: 82; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.314. Barrett (1978: 179, 184) conjectures that the meaning of the name “Nathanael,” “God has given,” indicates that he represents an “ideal disciple” and that the passage should be interpreted allegorically. Somewhat along similar lines, Witherington (1995: 71) suggests that Nathanael’s name implies that the disciples are the Father’s gift to Jesus. It seems, however, that these kinds of conjectures leave the realm of well-founded exegesis and veer into the sphere of ultimately unverifiable speculation (see the critiques by Morris [1995: 143] and Carson [1991: 159], both of whom defend Nathanael’s and the event’s historicity). Hanhart (1970: 24–25) identifies Nathanael as Matthew; Hill (1997) somewhat cautiously advances the theory that Nathanael is identical with James of Alphaeus (cf. Epistle to the Apostles 2 [second century A.D.]).

96 Though note the appearance of impostors in Galilee, such as Judas the Galilean (Acts 5:37), a man from Gamala in Gaulanitis who refused to pay tribute to Caesar in the days of the census in A.D. 6 (Josephus, Ant. 18.1.1 §4; 20.5.2 §102; J.W. 2.8.1 §118; see Burge 2000: 78; cf. R. Brown 1966: 83).

101 Contra Bultmann 1971: 104; R. Brown 1966: 83, 499–501. Schnackenburg (1990: 1.316) describes Nathanael as “a genuine Israelite,” then states in a footnote—wrongly—that this is an adverbial usage. Other instances of the adverb include 4:42; 6:14, 55 (v.l.); 7:26, 40; 8:31; 17:8.

105 C. Koester 1990a: 23–34; cf. Barrett 1978: 185; Nicklas (2000b: 201–2) is less than convinced. Other commentators consider the reference to be incidental, intended to show merely that Jesus “knew” Nathanael prior to their actual encounter (Ridderbos 1997: 90; cf. Burge 2000: 78; R. Brown 1966: 83; Moloney 1998: 56; contra Morris 1995: 146; Witherington 1995: 71; Borchert 1996: 148; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.317). Keener (2003: 486), too, rejects any deeper significance in the identification, suggesting that the fig tree may be mentioned simply because a specific landmark was necessary for some reason. Witherington’s suggestion that Nathanael is being portrayed as an expert in the law who thus would know that the Messiah could not come from Nazareth seems far-fetched.

110 Morris 1995: 147; cf. Witherington 1995: 72; R. Brown 1966: 87; Borchert 1996: 148.

122 The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. 65, was published in 1998 by the Egypt Exploration Society (see pp. 12–13). Among commentators, “Chosen One of God” is favored by Morris 1995: 134; Carson 1991: 152; Burge 1987: 59–61; 2000: 74; Barrett 1978: 178; R. Brown 1966: 57; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.305. “Son of God” is the reading advocated by Bultmann 1971: 92–93 n. 6; Borchert 1996: 139; Ridderbos 1997: 77; Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. g; Laney 1992: 53 (though all prior to the discovery of P¹⁰⁶). Rodgers (1999: 304) prefers both (“This is the only, the chosen Son of God”), while Michaels (1989: 36) proposes that the Baptist spoke “Chosen One of God” (hence the MS tradition), which the evangelist interpreted as “Son of God.”

2 For a defense of the temple clearing as a Johannine sign, see Köstenberger 1995b (cf. P. Trudinger 1997: 330), contra R. Brown (1966: 528), who claims that every use of σημεῖον (sēmeion, sign) refers to a “miraculous deed.” By referring to the “temple cleansing” as “temple clearing,” I take up a suggestion made by Mathews (1988–89: 101); cf. E. Sanders 1985: 61–76; Evans 1989: 237–70.

4 Witherington’s (1995: 77) suggestions that the wedding may have involved Nathanael’s family, and that Nathanael may have been the source of the story if the “disciple Jesus loved” was not present, are sheer conjecture, as is R. Brown’s (1966: 98) suggestion that the bridegroom was actually John, the son of Zebedee (or Nathanael).

29 Though this is denied by most commentators (e.g., Morris 1995: 160–61; Barrett 1978: 191; Carson 1991: 174; R. Brown 1966: 100; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.332).

31 So, for example, Ridderbos 1997: 107; Morris 1995: 162; Carson 1991: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 35; R. Brown 1966: 105; Kruse 2003: 94–95. Ridderbos (1997: 108) cites OT allusions to the abundance of wine in the new age (Gen. 49:11; Isa. 25:6; Amos 9:13–14; Jer. 31:12–14; see also Joel 3:18). Keener (2003: 512) suggests a (proleptic) connection between the abundant “measure” of water turned into wine in 2:6 and the unlimited provision of the Spirit in 3:34.

32 The performance of the miracle is not actually narrated. For the Johannine pattern of implying movement without actually narrating it, see also 5:10, where the Jewish leaders challenging the healed lame man appear out of nowhere; 5:17 and 5:19, where Jesus is shown to respond to charges never made explicit; 6:10, where compliance with Jesus’ command to have the people sit down is assumed but not stated; 6:59, where reference is made to Jesus’ teaching in the synagogue in Capernaum though his arrival there has not previously been narrated; 9:7, where the movements of the man born blind are traced while Jesus fades from view; 11:16, where Thomas exhorts his fellow disciples to join him in going to Judea to die with Jesus, with the ensuing verse recording the group’s arrival, but no reference being made to the actual departure or journey; 11:44, where the reader has to assume that some of the bystanders comply with Jesus’ directive to take Lazarus’s graveclothes off and let him go (note the shift signaled in both 11:16 and 11:44); 12:20, where the Greeks are shown to arrive, but their subsequent departure is not mentioned; Jesus’ hearing before Pilate, where there are certain gaps in the narration of these two characters’ movements (e.g., 19:5, 9); and 20:11, where Mary stands outside the tomb crying, without previous record of her approach. See Kellum 2005: 223–30, esp. 229, where he cites R. Brown 1966: 315.

34 Ridderbos (1997: 107–8) rightly notes that the master of the banquet’s ignorance is not intended to portray him as a symbol for unbelieving Israel. R. Brown (1966: 107) makes the dubious suggestion that the man epitomizes blindness vis-à-vis wisdom.

38 Cf. Ps. 97:6; 102:16; Isa. 60:1–2; Ps. Sol. 17:30–32; 1 Enoch 49:2; see R. Brown 1966: 104.

19 Several commentators also mention that Tyrian coinage would have been preferred because it did not bear effigies (Moloney 1998: 76; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38 n. c; R. Brown 1966: 115; Borchert 1996: 163). However, this is disputed by Murphy-O’Connor (2000: 47, referring to Ben-David 1969), who cites evidence that Tyrian shekels “carried the head of the god Melkart (or Herakles) on the obverse and a Tyrian (Ptolemaic) eagle on the reverse with the inscription ‘Tyre the holy and inviolable.’ ” Murphy-O’Connor also notes the minting of Jewish shekels carrying the legend “shekel of Israel/Jerusalem [is/the] holy” at the onset of the Jewish war in A.D. 66 (pp. 47–48, citing Schürer 1973–79: 1.605), and he points to the Qumran interpretation of a one-time requirement in 4Q159 frag. 1, col. 2, lines 6–7 (p. 49).

24 The LXX reads “has consumed me” (Moloney 1998: 77). Unlike in 2:22 and 12:16, the present reference does not refer to the postresurrection period, but to the actual situation (so Ridderbos 1997: 116; Carson 1991: 180; R. Brown 1966: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.347; Barrett 1978: 198; contra Witherington 1995: 88; Bultmann 1971: 122).

34 Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.344; Barrett 1978: 195; R. Brown 1966: 117; Witherington 1995: 85–86; Borchert 1996: 160; Bultmann 1971: 122; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38–39; Dodd 1963: 162; Lindars 1972: 135–37; Keener 2003: 518–19. Keener contends that it is historically implausible that Jesus would challenge the temple system by overturning tables and yet continue in public ministry for two or three years afterward, sometimes even visiting Jerusalem (though he notes that Jesus faces considerable hostility there when he does). On the contrary, an early temple cleansing accounts well for Jewish hostility toward Jesus early on (5:18), and Jesus' continuing in ministry for two or three more years is eminently plausible historically in light of Jesus' pattern of withdrawal (3:22; 6:15; 7:9–10; 8:59; 10:40) and his caution from the very inception of his ministry because his "time" has not yet come (2:4; 7:6). Borchert (1996: 160) contends that two temple clearings are "a historiographic monstrosity that has no basis in the texts of the Gospels." Kreitzer (1998: 100–101) claims that the evangelist followed the motto "When the details of history no longer serve the functions of the story—discard them." R. Brown (1966: 118) concludes that Jesus uttered some prophetic saying concerning the destruction of the temple on his first visit but actually cleansed the temple at the end of his ministry. Wallace (1996: 561 n. 20) notes that this would require a crucifixion date of A.D. 33.

3 Moloney (1998: 90) and R. Brown (1966: 149) believe that Jesus' words continue through 3:21; Witherington (1995: 99) thinks that the evangelist takes over in 3:12, or at least by 3:16. Schnackenburg (1990: 1.360, citing others as well) places the start of the evangelist's reflections at 3:13.

6 As Michaels (1989: 53) notes, the problem is not signs-based faith, but cowardice and failure to acknowledge one's faith openly. Whitacre (1999: 86) similarly notes that signs-based faith is not the problem (citing 10:38; 12:37; 14:12; 20:30–31; cf. R. Brown 1966: 525–29), but that by its very nature, all faith prior to Jesus' glorification and the coming of the Spirit is immature. Borchert (1996: 167–69) wrongly includes even the disciples of 2:11 among the group whose faith is illegitimately signs-based in 2:23.

17 Contra several commentators (Barrett 1978: 205; Moloney 1998: 91; R. Brown 1966: 130; Witherington 1995: 94; Burge 2000: 114; Carson 1995: 187 n. 8; Blomberg 1995: 6), "by night" is likely not symbolic in the sense that Nicodemus came from darkness to light, while Judas went from light to darkness (cf. 6:70–71; 12:4–8; 13:2, 26–30; 18:2–5)—a view held by R. Brown (1966: 130) and Auwers (1990). Wallace (1996: 123–24) overreaches when he finds in the genitive of time an indication of "the kind of time in which Nicodemus came to see the Lord." Morris (1995: 187) suggests that John may have had more than one meaning in mind.

20 "See" and "enter" are roughly synonymous (Barrett 1978: 207; R. Brown 1966: 130; Morris 1995: 189)—an instance of the Johannine penchant for stylistic variation (Barrett 1978: 208).

26 Note in 3:5 the single Greek preposition governing both "water" and "spirit" (Ridderbos 1997: 127). Some have suggested that "born of water" refers to water baptism, be it John the Baptist's or Christian baptism, or both (Schnackenburg 1990: 1.369; Barrett 1978: 203, 208–9; R. Brown 1966: 141–42; Ridderbos 1997: 127–28; Beasley-Murray 1999: 49; Michaels 1989: 57). But it would hardly have been meaningful for Jesus to inform Nicodemus that he must be baptized in order to go to heaven. Nothing in the context indicates that this is the case, and it is unlikely that Jesus would have expected Nicodemus already to have known this. Moreover, the emphasis here is on the Spirit's activity, not on human ritual observance (Morris 1995: 193).

37 Cf. Morris 1995: 196; Carson 1991: 199; R. Brown 1966: 132; Beasley-Murray 1999: 50; Witherington 1995: 98; Moloney 1998: 94; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.377; contra Barrett 1978: 212.

50 The translation "preferred" captures the Semitism underlying the more literal translation "loved more than" (R. Brown 1966: 134).

142n4, 146n15, 146n16, 147, 149n30, 150n34, 151, 155, 156, 157n55, 158, 159, 160, 161, 161n69, 169n7, 169n11, 177n9, 178n13, 179, 179n17, 180n25, 181, 182, 184,

2 There is no need to believe that the present verses were dislodged from their context (Morris 1995: 208–9; contra R. Brown 1966: 154–55) or to suppose that the placement of this section after 3:1–21 indicates that the prior section pertains to the rite of baptism (so, rightly, Carson 1991: 209).

3 Contra R. Brown (1966: 160), who suggests that these are actually the words of Jesus removed from their original context. Bultmann (1971: 160 n. 2) contends, without warrant, that these verses originally were located after 3:21.

9 It is not necessary to postulate that here the evangelist is addressing those who had remained followers of John the Baptist in his day (Carson 1991: 210; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 146; Morris 1995: 211; contra R. Brown 1966: 156; Barrett 1978: 219; Witherington 1995: 107; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.410).

13 Note the reference to John by Jesus as a “lamp” in 5:35. See Ridderbos 1997: 147–48; cf. R. Brown 1966: 153; Moloney 1998: 110.

4 See the various structural proposals in Beasley-Murray 1999: 59; R. Brown 1966: 176–78; Moloney 1998: 115. See also Carson 1991: 214.

15 This represents the wide consensus of interpreters: see Ridderbos 1997: 153; Carson 1991: 215–16; Borchert 1996: 198–99; Beasley-Murray 1999: 59; Witherington 1995: 115; R. Brown 1966: 169; Morris 1995: 226; Barrett 1978: 230; Moloney 1998: 116, 120; Conway 1999: 105.

16 See Potter 1959: 331; Kippenberg 1971: 94; Riesner, DJG 40. A few late sources (such as Jerome) substitute “Shechem” for “Sychar,” but this is clearly secondary (contra R. Brown 1966: 169; Burge 2000: 141).

30 See Maccini 1996: 131–44. Daube (1956: 375–82) argues that “do not associate with” specifically refers to Jews not sharing vessels with Samaritans (cf. NIV text and note at 4:9). However, no common utensils (such as the woman’s water jar) are specifically mentioned in 4:9. The explanatory aside, “For Jews have no dealings with [συγγρῶνται] Samaritans,” probably is broader than the mere refusal to share drinking vessels (Ridderbos 1997: 154; Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. f; contra Carson 1991: 218; Borchert 1996: 203; Witherington 1995: 120; R. Brown 1966: 170; Morris 1995: 229; Barrett 1978: 232; Moloney 1998: 117, 121; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.425 n. 19).

34 Borchert (1996: 203) sees the “gift of God” as the realization of God’s promises; Morris (1995: 230) and Carson (1991: 218) identify it as eternal life, the latter with reference to the Torah (cf. R. Brown 1966: 176, 178–79); Schnackenburg (1990: 1.431) suggests that the gift is either the Holy Spirit or eternal life, or both; Burge (2000: 144) thinks that the reference is to the Spirit.

55 The OT occasionally establishes a relationship between “word” and “spirit” (Neh. 9:20, 30; Ps. 33:6; 147:18; Isa. 59:21). In John’s Gospel, Jesus is the Word (1:14), has received the fullness of the Spirit (3:34), and is himself the truth (14:6); in his final prayer, he affirms that God’s Word is truth that sanctifies (17:17). Hence “spirit” and “truth” are part of a conceptual cluster that also includes “word” and “worship.” On this connection, see Nelson 2001. See also Carson 1991: 226; Barrett 1978: 238–39; R. Brown 1966: 180.

69 The present statement may echo Deut. 8:3; cf. Matt. 4:4; Luke 4:4; see Carson 1991: 228; Borchert 1996: 213; see also Jer. 15:16. Here the term used for “food” is βρῶσις (brōsis); in 4:34 it is βρῶμα (brōma). Apart from stylistic variation, the use of the latter term in 4:34 may be due to a desire to create assonance with θέλημα (thelēma, will) (R. Brown 1966: 173).

185n48, 186, 186n54, 187n58, 187n59, 189, 191n81, 191n82, 193, 194n98, 195,
195n108, 195n109, 195n110, 200n7, 201n10, 201n11, 203, 205, 206, 206n40, 207n43,

7 So Carson 1991: 234; Ridderbos 1997: 174–75; Morris 1995: 255; Borchert 1996: 219–20; Burge 2000: 152–53; Witherington 1995: 127; contra R. Brown 1966: 193; Barrett 1978: 245; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.471–75; Bultmann 1971: 205.

11 So Carson 1991: 238; Morris 1995: 256; Borchert 1996: 219; R. Brown 1966: 190; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.465.

9 See Carson 1991: 240. Bultmann (1971: 240) claims that the festival is Passover, based on his switching the order of John 5 and 6, but this is unlikely, since the evangelist clearly identifies Passover everywhere else in his Gospel. Also unlikely is Michaels's (1989: 85) theory that the present pericope was transposed from Jesus' first Passover in Jerusalem (cf. 2:23; 3:2). Many commentators choose to remain agnostic on which feast is in view (Keener 2003: 635), regarding its identity as either unknown (Ridderbos 1997: 184; Morris 1995: 265 n. 6) or of secondary interest (R. Brown 1966: 206), or both (Carson 1991: 241). Calvin (1959: 116) thinks that the feast probably is Pentecost.

13 A few commentators (Morris 1995: 265–66; Barrett 1978: 251; Moloney 1998: 171; R. Brown 1966: 206) think that προβατικὴ modifies κολυμβήθρα (kolymbēthra, pool); others think that the implied noun is “gate” (Carson 1991: 241; so also the TNIV).

25 Εὐθέως (eutheōs, immediately), rare in John, stresses immediacy (Morris 1995: 269 n. 23; cf. R. Brown 1966: 208).

48 Cf. Matt. 12:1–14 pars. (R. Brown 1966: 217; Barrett 1978: 256; Carson 1991: 247–48).

54 Though calling this a “parable” (Dodd 1968a; Burge 2000: 177; cf. R. Brown 1966: 218) may be an overstatement (Carson 1991: 250; Ridderbos 1997: 192; Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Barrett 1978: 259–60).

58 The ὑμεῖς in the final phrase in 5:20 is emphatic (Morris 1995: 278 n. 65; R. Brown 1966: 214) and “perhaps derogatory” (R. Brown 1966: 214).

59 The term ζῶοποιέω (zōopoieō, give life) is used elsewhere in this Gospel only in 6:63, there with reference to Jesus' words. The fact that ὥσπερ (hōsper, just as) is used only here and in 5:26 constitutes the latter passage, which talks about the Son as well as the Father having life in himself, as a close parallel (R. Brown 1966: 214).

81 That “another” refers to God the Father represents a broad consensus among commentators: so Ridderbos 1997: 202; Morris 1995: 288; Moloney 1998: 190; Beasley-Murray 1999: 78; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.121; Barrett 1978: 264; R. Brown 1966: 224.

82 “Have sent” and “have testified” are in the Greek perfect tense, indicating the settled condition resulting from the Baptist's witness to Jesus (cf. Barrett 1978: 264; Carson 1991: 260; Beasley-Murray 1999: 78; Morris 1995: 288; R. Brown 1966: 224; Wallace [1996: 577] calls this an “extensive perfect”).

98 See Barnett 1980–81; Schlatter 1948: 160; Piper, ISBE 3:332–33; van der Woude, TDNT 9:509–27. However, calling these figures “messianic pretenders” goes beyond the evidence. Thus, Meier (1994: 611–12 n. 75) and R. Brown (1997: 820 n. 6) emphatically deny that any Jew (other than Jesus) claimed or was said to be the Messiah prior to, contemporaneous with, or even in the decades immediately following Jesus' ministry.

108 So the majority of commentators, including Barrett 1978: 250–51; Carson 1991: 240; Morris 1995: 265 n. 6; R. Brown (1966: 206), who says that the evidence is “overwhelming”; Beasley-

Murray 1999: 69 n. e; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.93.

109 Hengel (1999: 309) comments, “One should by all means read ‘Bethesda’ ”; so also Carson 1991: 241; Morris 1995: 267; Witherington 1995: 137; Borchert 1996: 231; Moloney 1998: 171; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94; Schlatter 1948: 142; undecided are Ridderbos 1997: 185; R. Brown 1966: 206–7.

110 So Fee 1982 and the vast majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 185; Carson 1991: 242; Morris 1995: 267; Barrett 1978: 253; R. Brown 1966: 207; Beasley-Murray 1999: 70 n. h; Bultmann 1971: 241 n. 4; Borchert 1996: 232; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94–95.

7 Though some of the acts and words in John 6 have eucharistic significance, the feeding of the multitudes does not in itself constitute a eucharistic meal (so, rightly, Brodie 1993: 263; cf. Barrett [1978: 274], who adds that, to the contrary, “the eucharist, like the last supper... , must be understood in the context of the Jewish Passover”). See also R. Brown (1966: 246–49), who speaks of “eucharistic elements” in all four Gospel versions and considers “the eucharistic coloring of the Johannine account of the multiplication” as beyond doubt.

10 See Num. 11:13 (cf. R. Brown 1966: 233; Moloney 1998: 197; Burge 2000: 193). There are several other parallels between John 6 and Num. 11: the grumbling of the people (Num. 11:1; John 6:41, 43); the description of the manna (Num. 11:7–9; John 6:31); the reference to the eating of meat/[Jesus’] flesh (Num. 11:13; John 6:51); and the striking disproportion between the existing need and the available resources (Num. 11:22; John 6:7–9).

11 See Carson 1991: 269; also R. Brown 1966: 233; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.15. Note the personal pronoun setting Jesus apart from Philip and the verbs ᾔδει (ēdei, he knew; indicating prior knowledge) and ἔμελλεν (emellen, he was about; conveying certainty not associated with simple future) (Morris 1995: 304 n. 16). Compare also the reference to Jesus’ supernatural insight in 2:24.

40 Thus, in effect, “How long have you been here?” (Morris 1995: 316 n. 68; Barrett 1978: 286; R. Brown 1966: 261; Carson 1991: 283).

43 So Barrett 1978: 287; cf. Witherington 1995: 155; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.38; Burge 1987: 84–85. Less likely, the reference may be to his consecration (R. Brown 1966: 261) or to the incarnation (Moloney 1998: 211). On the phrase “seal of approval,” see commentary at 3:33.

50 Carson 1991: 285; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 91; Barrett 1978: 288; R. Brown 1966: 265; Moloney 1998: 212. The personal pronoun σύ (sy, you) is emphatic, possibly suggesting that people doubt Jesus’ ability to furnish such a sign (Morris 1995: 321).

54 Since contemporary Judaism conceived of the Torah as “bread” from God (cf. Prov. 9:5), some suggest that Jesus may here claim to be superior to the Torah (Carson 1991: 286–87; cf. Barrett 1978: 290; R. Brown 1966: 262). However, in the Johannine context such a claim seems unduly dichotomous and probably unlikely.

58 There is no need to resort to a sapiential interpretation here, understanding Christ as the true Wisdom (Carson 1991: 289; contra R. Brown 1966: 274–75; Witherington 1995: 149–50).

60 See discussion at 6:30. The second καί (kai, and) in 6:36 probably is adversative (so Barrett 1978: 293). The majority of commentators consider the word με (me, me) in 6:36 to be original (so Ridderbos 1997: 230 n. 120; Carson 1991: 289–90; Morris 1995: 325 n. 104; R. Brown 1966: 270; contra Barrett 1978: 293; Moloney 1998: 216; see also the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 85; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.46).

61 “Everything” (πάν, pan) in 6:37 and 6:39 is neuter, used in a qualitative, collective sense

221n101, 222n106, 230, 230n11, 231n15, 232, 233, 233n26, 235n32, 236n36, 239n47, 240n53, 241n59, 243, 253n5, 253n6, 254, 254n14, 255, 255n21, 256, 258n32, 259,

(R. Brown 1966: 270; Barrett 1978: 294; Borchert 1966: 265), though ultimately people (not things) are in mind (BDF §138.1, with specific reference to John 6:37; cf. Morris 1995: 325; Moloney 1998: 216).

65 Another important element in this regard is the giving of the Spirit, for “it is the Spirit who gives life,” just as Jesus’ words are “spirit and life” (6:63; cf. 1:33; 3:3–8, 34; 4:10–11; 7:38–39).

66 The personal pronoun ἡμεῖς (hēmeis, we) may be emphatic, underscoring the certainty of people’s conviction (Morris 1995: 328). R. Brown (1966: 270) detects a degree of animosity in the pronoun οὗτος (houtos, this one) and translates it “this fellow.” Similarly, Westcott (1908: 233), who finds “perhaps a tinge of contemptuous surprise in the pronoun.”

101 The words “believe” and “come to know” are roughly equivalent in John’s Gospel (cf. 17:8; see Carson 1991: 303; R. Brown 1966: 298).

106 So Carson 1991: 267; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 208–9; Barrett 1978: 272; Witherington 1995: 385; contra R. Brown 1966: 235–36; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.5–9.

11 Paraphrased, this may mean “You can go anywhere you please, any time you want; I cannot” (cf. Ridderbos 1997: 258–59). Only in the present context is the term καιρός (kairos, time) used to denote Jesus’ (God-appointed) “time”; elsewhere the expression is ὥρα, hōra (e.g., 2:4; see R. Brown 1966: 306; Carson 1991: 307–8; Morris 1995: 351–53).

15 To “go up” (ἀναβαίνω, anabainō) to Jerusalem is a common expression no matter what one’s geographical origination (cf. 5:1). Because the term is used later with reference to Jesus’ ascension to the Father, some see an allusion to Jesus’ glorification (Carson 1991: 309: “just possible”). This is unlikely (Michaels 1989: 127; Lindars 1972: 285) and in any case is not the primary referent (contra R. Brown 1966: 308).

26 So Carson 1991: 312–13; R. Brown 1966: 316; Morris 1995: 360; Barrett 1978: 318; Kruse 2003: 185.

32 Παρησίᾳ (parrēsia, openly) is a dative of manner or adverbial dative (Wallace 1996: 162). “They are not saying a word to him” is a rabbinic expression reflecting tacit approval (R. Brown 1966: 313). “Said R. Judah, ‘Helene’s sukkah [tabernacle] was twenty cubits tall, and sages went in and out, when visiting her, and not one of them said a thing’ ” (t. Sukkah 1.1). The interrogative particle μήποτε (mēpote) signals a tentative question (Carson 1991: 317; Barrett 1978: 321), the gist being “Do the rulers perhaps actually [μήποτε ἀληθῶς] know that he is the Christ?”

36 The καί (kai, but) preceding ἀπ’ ἐμαυτοῦ (ap’ emautou, on my own accord) is adversative (Ridderbos 1997: 268 n. 45; Barrett 1978: 323; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.147). The ἐγώ (egō, I) at the beginning of 7:29 is emphatic, set against the ὑμεῖς (hymeis, you) in 7:28 (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.147). The alternating use of two words meaning “send,” πέμπω (pempō) and ἀποστέλλω (apostellō), in 7:28–29 represents stylistic variation (Morris 1995: 367 n. 58; Barrett 1978: 323; R. Brown 1966: 313).

47 See R. Brown 1966: 314; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.150; Schlatter 1948: 198. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 271), who opts for Greek-speaking Diaspora Jews. Carson (1991: 320 [cf. Barrett 1978: 325; Witherington 1995: 173]) thinks that Gentile proselytes probably are in view.

53 Most commentators favor a time immediately following cessation of ceremonies on the eighth day (Carson 1991: 321; Morris 1995: 373, esp. n. 79; Barrett 1978: 326; Moloney 1998: 256; Schlatter 1948: 199). Some believe that Jesus’ words fit better with the ceremonies of the seventh day (R. Brown 1966: 320; Bultmann 1971: 302 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.152; Ridderbos 1997: 272; Burge 2000: 227). On the water-drawing ceremony, see Keener 2003: 722–24.

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee’s observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus “from within him” refers to “whoever believes in me.” Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of “rivers of living water” (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987: 88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

5 So Morris 1995: 388; R. Brown 1966: 344; Burge 2000: 255; Moloney 1998: 268; Borchert 1996: 295.

6 See Isa. 60:19–22; Zech. 14:5b–8; cf. Rev. 21:23–24. Contemporary Judaism applied the phrase “light of the world” not only to God but also to Israel, Jerusalem, the patriarchs, the Messiah, famous rabbis (e.g., Yohanan ben Zakkai), the Torah, the temple, and even Adam (Keener 1993: 285; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 128; R. Brown 1966: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.190; Moloney 1998: 266). The universality of “light” symbolism in religious language issues in numerous non-Jewish parallels (see Barrett 1978: 335–37; Bultmann 1971: 40–44, 342–43; Dodd 1953: 201–8; Odeberg 1968: 286–92).

14 Commentators vary as to whether to regard as synonyms the two words used in the present context for “true” or “valid,” ἀληθής (alēthēs; 8:13, 14, 17) and ἀληθινός (alēthinos; 8:16). Beasley-Murray (1999: 125 n. a [contra R. Brown 1966: 341; Lindars 1972: 317; Barrett 1978: 339]) opts to distinguish between the former meaning “true” or “valid” and the latter meaning “just” or “authentic” (similarly, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.194). Ridderbos (1997: 294) suggests the meaning “just” for ἀληθινός; Barrett (1978: 339) opts for “authentic”; and Carson (1991: 340) prefers “right.”

21 Schnackenburg 1990: 2.194; cf. Moloney 1998: 267; R. Brown 1966: 345. Carson (1991: 339 [cf. Burge 2000: 257]) denies the suggestion that κρίνω (krinō, judge) has the meaning “to pass judicial sentence” and the conclusion on that basis that Jesus came not to convict but to save.

32 “Sin” in 8:21 is in the singular, which may refer to the “cardinal sin of rejecting Jesus” (Barrett 1978: 340; Carson 1991: 341; R. Brown 1966: 350; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.197). Alternatively, “sin” may be used generically to refer to a person’s sinful state apart from Christ. The preposition ἐν (en, in) probably is locative (“in a state of sin”), though it also could be instrumental (“by reason of sin”) (Barrett 1978: 341; cf. Morris 1995: 395).

40 So Carson 1991: 344; R. Brown 1966: 347; cf. Motyer 1997: 159, referring to 8:12 and 5:19–30.

42 Ridderbos 1997: 303. The expression καὶ γὰρ (kagō, and I) creates a close link between Jesus and the Father (Morris 1995: 401 n. 54). The use of εἰς (eis, to) in the phrase “to the world” is interesting. R. Brown (1966: 348) suggests that it has an “aspect of motion.”

47 So the majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 305–6; Carson 1991: 346–47; Morris 1995: 404; Beasley-Murray 1999: 132; D. M. Smith 1999: 185; Borchert 1996: 301 n. 182; Burge 2000: 259; Bultmann 1971: 252 n. 2; contra R. Brown 1966: 354–55, 358;

Schnackenburg 1990: 2.204–5; Moloney 1998: 277; Westcott 1908: 2.13–14.

53 Morris 1995: 405; cf. R. Brown 1966: 355; Borchert 1996: 303. Carson (1991: 348–49) suggests that truth in 8:32 is similar to the notion of “gospel,” that is, “the truth that has been revealed in and by Jesus” (cf. Barrett 1978: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.205).

68 So Carson 1991: 352; R. Brown 1966: 357; Barrett 1978: 348; contra Ridderbos 1997: 313; Borchert 1996: 305; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.212.

72 On predestination in John’s Gospel, see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.214–15. Carson (1991: 353) suggests that ἀκούω (akouō, hear) has the connotation of “obey.” R. Brown (1966: 357) thinks that the verb means literally that the Jews “have become so obdurate that they cannot even hear him; they are deaf.” Ridderbos (1997: 314) notes that Jesus’ opponents’ spiritual incomprehension results from their failure to combine hearing with faith.

85 This implies that Jesus neglects the traditional ways of Judaism and so is perceived as acting more like a Samaritan than like a true Jew (Morris 1995: 414; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 318). Morris (1995: 414) suggests that the Jews might be addressing Jesus’ failure to recognize their relationship with Abraham. Barrett (1978: 350) notes that since Dositheus and Simon Magus (both Samaritans who claimed to be sons of God) were described as demon-possessed, Jesus’ opponents might be making a similar connection with him (cf. Moloney 1998: 286; R. Brown 1966: 358).

94 The majority of commentators believe that there is no significance in the slight alteration of Jesus’ words in 8:52 (Morris 1995: 416 n. 104; Barrett 1978: 350–51; R. Brown 1966: 359; Borchert 1996: 307). Note, however, that “taste death” replaces “see death” (see Laney 1992: 168; cf. 5:24). The expression “taste death” is not found in the OT, but “to see death” is (see commentary at 8:51). The expression “taste death” occurs in the NT also in Mark 9:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 351) and Heb. 2:9. See further Acts 2:27, 31 (citing Ps. 16:10); 1 Cor. 15:54–55 (citing Isa. 25:8; Hos. 13:14); 1 John 3:14. On other minor differences, see footnote for commentary at John 8:51.

95 Morris 1995: 416; Carson 1991: 356; Barrett 1978: 351. The pronoun ἡμῶν (hēmōn, our) in the phrase “our father Abraham” is likely exclusive, with Jesus not included as ancestor of Abraham (Wallace 1996: 398). Note also the relative pronoun ὅστις (hostis, who), which is both indefinite (R. Brown 1966: 359) and qualitative (Morris 1995: 416 n. 105) in import. Abraham serves as a type of others like him, and all of those were “of such a quality as to die” (Morris 1995: 416 n. 105).

97 The term ἀγαλλιάω (agalliaō, be glad) occurs in this Gospel elsewhere only in 5:35. The sense is that of being “overjoyed” (Morris 1995: 417). The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) is variously classified as referring to the content of Abraham’s joy (Morris 1995: 417); as introducing “the ground of the rejoicing” (Barrett 1978: 351); as causal or explanatory (Beasley-Murray 1999: 126 n. 1); or as conveying purpose (R. Brown 1966: 359).

99 So Moloney 1998: 286; R. Brown 1966: 360.

102 Ridderbos 1997: 321–22; cf. Carson 1991: 357; Barrett 1978: 352; R. Brown 1966: 367; Burge 2000: 263.

108 Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §216; J.W. 2.1.3 §§11–12; see Morris 1995: 420–21; R. Brown 1966: 360; cf. Laney 1992: 169.

112 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 126 n. m; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.223; R. Brown 1966: 360; Bultmann 1971: 327 n. 3; contra Burge 2000: 263.

285n37, 288n50, 289n53, 293, 293n77, 294n80, 295n82, 295n84, 296, 299, 304, 306, 307, 310n60, 310n63, 311, 313n77, 315n85, 316, 316n89, 317n93, 317n98, 318, 318n99,

37 See Ridderbos 1997: 335; Morris 1995: 427; Barrett 1978: 359; R. Brown 1966: 373; Borchert 1996: 318.

50 See especially Martyn 1977; 1979; R. Brown 1979. But see the critique in Stibbe 1992: 59–61.

53 Ridderbos 1997: 343; similarly, Morris 1995: 434 n. 36; contra Barrett 1978: 361; R. Brown 1966: 380; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.250; Bultmann 1971: 335.

77 See Michaels 1989: 170. Contra R. Brown (1966: 375), who believes that the man was only cast from their presence rather than being formally expelled. Burge (2000: 275) and Laney (1992: 180) also seem to hold this view.

80 Carson 1991: 376; Morris 1995: 440; R. Brown 1966: 375. D. M. Smith (1999: 199) suggests that the ambiguity may be intentional, while Barrett (1978: 364) doubts that John intentionally meant to distinguish between these two meanings in 9:36 and 9:38. Regarding the question “Who is he ... ?” see 12:34 (cf. Acts 9:5).

82 Borchert (1996: 325) relates the present reference to 20:28 and believes that this confession is a high point in the festival cycle. The man’s response to Jesus’ self-revelation is in keeping with the standard OT reaction to theophany (e.g., Gen. 17:3). However, it is possible that the man’s actions, while being “beyond that due to other men,” fall “short of that due to God Almighty” (Beasley-Murray 1999: 160; similarly, Carson 1991: 377). Nevertheless, the majority of commentators favor a fuller sense of worship (Barrett 1978: 365; R. Brown 1966: 376; Bultmann 1971: 339 n. 3; Morris 1995: 440; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.254).

84 R. Brown (1966: 381–82) seeks to make a case for the baptismal significance of the healing of the blind man in this chapter (but see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.257–58; see also Ridderbos 1997: 337).

60 See Josephus, J.W. 5.5.1 §§184–85; Ant. 15.11.3 §§396–401; 20.9.7 §§220–21. So the vast majority of commentators, including Carson, Barrett, Morris, Beasley-Murray, R. Brown, Moloney, and Burge; contra Ridderbos 1997: 368.

63 More literally, the Greek may be rendered “take away our life” (Ridderbos 1997: 368 n. 358). This translation is favored also by Morris (1995: 461, with reference to the same verb, αἶρω [airō, take away], in 10:18), who believes that the Jews are suggesting that Jesus is attempting to destroy Judaism. But in 10:18, αἶρω means “take up,” not “take away.” Bultmann (1971: 361 n. 5) thinks that this is “scarcely credible” and adduces the parallel expression in Josephus, Ant. 3.2.3 §48: οἱ δ’ ἦσαν ἐπὶ τὸν κίνδυνον τὰς ψυχὰς ἡρμένον (LCL translation: “hearts elated”). R. Brown (1966: 403) proposes that Jesus is creating a pun on the word ψυχή (psychē, life), using it both with reference to Jesus’ giving his life for his sheep and, ironically, to refer to Jesus’ “taking away the life” of those who refuse to acknowledge him. In light of the fact that John’s Gospel is laden with irony, this is possible but hard to verify.

77 R. Brown (1966: 403) suggests that καλός (kalos, good) here may also be intended to hark back to the description of Jesus as the “good” shepherd (10:11, 14) in the preceding narrative. The renderings by Carson (1991: 396) as “noble” or “beautiful,” and by Barrett (1978: 383) as “deeds of power and moral excellence, resulting in health and well-being,” may overreach as expositions of the meaning conveyed by the term.

85 The presence of an argument from the lesser to the greater is denied by Ridderbos (1997: 374) against the overwhelming majority of commentators (e.g., R. Brown 1966: 410; Morris 1995:

469; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.310; Moloney 1998: 316). Carson (1991: 399, perhaps following Barrett 1978: 385), calls this an ad hominem argument, which he defines (somewhat idiosyncratically, it seems) as an argument that “does not require Jesus to subscribe to the same literal exegesis as his opponents.”

89 In the LXX, variants of the term τὰ ἐγκαίνια (ta enkainia, Feast of Dedication [John 10:22]) refer to the dedication of the tabernacle altar (Num. 7:10–11), Solomon’s temple (1 Kings 8:63), and the second temple (Ezra 6:16–17). A connection between the present statement and the Feast of Tabernacles is made in, among others, Carson 1991: 399; R. Brown 1966: 411; Witherington 1995: 191; Moloney 1998: 317. Commentators differ as to the sacerdotal connotation of the term ἁγιάζω (hagiazō, set apart). R. Brown (1966: 411) is favorably disposed, while Barrett (1978: 385) denies such an association.

93 C. Brown (1984) contends that one cannot have Christ or Christianity without the miracle-working Jesus of the Gospels. Carson (1991: 400) perceptively notes that the Jews’ inability to discern God’s presence in Jesus and his acts ultimately demonstrates their ignorance of God and how he acts. R. Brown (1966: 411–12) relevantly relates the present passage to modern attempts to use evidences as an apologetic tool (though I do not endorse all of Brown’s comments here). Indeed, this verse does seem to suggest that evidence is helpful (if not necessary) in a person’s coming to faith, though at the same time it is shown to be but a (limited) aid to faith rather than compelling faith in and of itself.

98 R. Brown (1966: 414–15) seems to suggest that these verses are included to show that Jesus would not die until his hour had come and that he would go back to Jerusalem when the hour had come. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.314) lists as many as six reasons why the evangelist included this portion: (1) to show that Jerusalem was too dangerous for Jesus; (2) to point out that Jesus received a more favorable response when he did not face opposition from the Jews; (3) to link Jesus’ ministry in Jerusalem with the beginning of the Gospel when his identity was at issue as well; (4) to recall the Baptist’s witness, which is fulfilled in Jesus’ signs; (5) to indicate Jesus’ supremacy over John the Baptist; and (6) to create a bridge to the following section.

99 The verb μένω (menō, remain) harks back to earlier similar uses with reference to Jesus in 1:38–39 and 2:12. The reading ἔμεινεν (aorist) rather than ἔμενεν (imperfect) is likely original (R. Brown 1966: 413; Morris 1995: 471 n. 111).

101 R. Brown (1966: 415, referring to Glasson) notes that after 3:30 (“He must increase, but I must decrease”), the references to the Baptist grow progressively shorter. However, this interesting observation should not be pressed too far.

2 Though see the reference to “all the miracles” that the people of Jerusalem had seen in Luke 19:37 (noted by Ridderbos 1997: 383; R. Brown 1966: 429). For a defense of the historicity of the raising of Lazarus, see M. Harris 1986: 310–15. See also Morris (1995: 474–76), who, arguing for the historicity of the raising of Lazarus, presents several lines of reasoning: (1) the impressive amount of detail given, including names and geographical references; (2) Peter’s absence from the Johannine narrative in 7:1–13:6 (cf. Matt. 19:27–26:33; Mark 10:28–11:21; Luke 18:28–22:8), which may account, at least in part, for the omission of the raising of Lazarus in Mark and Matthew; and (3) all the Jerusalem miracles are excluded from the Synoptic tradition, and Jerusalem itself is excluded, with the exception of the final week. Keener (2003: 836) conjectures that Mark may have “suppressed” (an infelicitous word choice) the Lazarus story to protect Lazarus and his sisters, who still lived near Jerusalem at the time of publication.

Keener (2003: 837) also observes that the account of Jesus' raising of Lazarus is critical for John's plot development (the Lazarus account is at the heart of John's message: Jesus dies most immediately because he has given life to a disciple [11:14–16; cf. 3:16–17]); it constitutes the longest single sign account in the Fourth Gospel; and, apart from the passion narrative, it represents the longest narrative without a substantial discourse section.

8 There is no reason to drive a wedge between history and theology and to diminish the historicity of the raising of Lazarus along the lines suggested by R. Brown (1966: 428–30 [but see Ridderbos 1997: 382]). R. Brown proposes that chapters 10–11 comprises a “later addition to the plan of the Gospel” (p. 427), attributing the present pericope more to “Johannine pedagogical and theological purpose than ... historical reminiscence” (p. 430). Also precarious is the type of source-critical reconstruction attempted by Schnackenburg (1990: 2.316–21). Ridderbos (1997: 382) helpfully points to the “agains” in 11:7–8 (presupposing a long prior stay in Judea and Jerusalem) and the disciples' remarks about earlier attempts on Jesus' life by the Jews in 11:8 as evidence that chapter 11 constitutes an integral structural component of the overall Gospel. Ridderbos (1997: 386) rightly notes that the reality of the miracle and its theological significance cannot be separated (referring to 1:14). For a rebuttal of existentialist interpretations of chapter 11, see Carson 1991: 404.

19 R. Brown (1966: 423 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.322]) claims that this verse is “clearly a parenthesis added by an editor,” though it is unclear why the author himself (rather than a later editor) could not have added this kind of parenthetical statement. Carson (1991: 405 [approvingly cited by Borchert 1996: 349]) contends, against Barrett (1978: 390), that it does not follow that the intended audience was Christian, though clearly Carson's case is difficult here. More likely is the reconstruction by Witherington (1995: 201), who says that this verse may serve as “a simple reminder of Mary's identity to the Christians who would be using this Gospel as a missionary tool to bring outsiders to Christ.” Yet Carson (1991: 405) rightly points out that regardless of this issue, and even if the anointing was unknown to the reader, the proleptic reference to Mary still serves as a fine literary device, urging the first-time reader onward in the narrative.

26 R. Brown (1966: 423) postulates that 11:5 was added by a later editor, intending to “assure the reader that Jesus' failure to go to Lazarus does not reflect indifference.” Brown may be right in construing the underlying intention, but once again it is hard to see why it could not have been the author himself rather than a later editor who was guided by this motivation.

37 See Morris (1995: 482), who refers to the universal fear regarding death in the ancient world. There is no reason to follow Barrett (1978: 392 [cf. R. Brown 1966: 431]), who, on the basis that φίλος (philos, friend) is a technical term for a Christian in the NT, proposes that this is the “true meaning” of this “pregnant saying.” Carson (1991: 409) notes the “not accidental” switch from the plural “our friend” to the singular “I am going,” saying that this indicates that Jesus alone is the resurrection and the life. “I am going” is identified as a futuristic present by Wallace (1996: 536).

40 For a defense of the historicity of this incident, see Carson (1991: 409), who points out that the disciples did not have the advantage of knowing the end of the story; that the messenger had announced sickness but not death; and that the disciples' anxiety about returning to Judea might have led to a certain amount of denseness. Carson also, rightly in my opinion, sees no double meaning in σωθήσεται (sōthēsetai, he will get well) (1991: 410; contra Barrett 1978: 393; R. Brown 1966: 424; Moloney 1998: 337; Westcott 1908: 2.84).

42 See the reference to God's glory in 11:4; see also 2:11; cf. Barrett 1978: 393; R. Brown 1966: 432. Note the aorist subjunctive πιστεύσητε (pisteusēte, you may believe), which here refers to the strengthening of the disciples' faith (rather than the creation of new faith). This observation is significant in relation to the question of how the purpose statement in 20:30–31 should be construed. Morris (1995: 483) struggles to accommodate this form within his somewhat outmoded verbal theory.

69 Ridderbos (1997: 396) persuasively argues that 11:25b refers to "death in the natural sense and to living in the sense of eternal life," while "lives" in 11:26a "refers to natural human existence, while 'never die' refers to the eternal life that natural death can neither prevent nor affect" (so also Bultmann 1971: 403, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.331; Stibbe 1994: 51). Contra Carson (1991: 413), R. Brown (1966: 425), and Borchert (1996: 356) (also Calvin and Schlatter), who maintain that "lives" in 11:26a refers to eternal life. Wuellner (1991: 182) calls the present statement an oxymoron.

72 For this reason Witherington (1995: 203), who calls Martha's confession "the least inadequate confession yet in this Gospel," and R. Brown (1966: 433), who labels her belief "inadequate," are overly negative. More positive are Morris (1995: 489), who says, "She may not understand fully the implications of what he has just said, but as far as she can she accepts it," and Carson (1991: 414), who labels her faith as "a rich mixture of personal trust (fiducia) and of confidence that certain things about Jesus are true (assensus)." Keener (2003: 844–45) suggests that John, by including Martha's confession, likely sought to balance gender the way Luke does (cf. Peter's confession in 6:68–69). See also Stibbe (1994: 47), who perceives movement from two "I know's" (11:22, 24) to a climactic "I believe" (11:27); from propositional to personal understanding; and from confessor to witness. Ridderbos (1997: 399–400) calls the confession "spontaneous and uninhibited" and sees it as reminiscent of the man blind from birth, who confessed despite his lack of understanding concerning the Son of Man (9:38). On "the Christ," see commentary at 1:41; on "Son of God," see commentary at 1:34 and 1:49.

86 The term, in verb or noun form, occurs rarely in the LXX (Dan. 11:30; Lam. 2:6; cf. Sir. 13:3), though the evidence is probably late and hardly conclusive (see Lindars 1992b: 94–95). For primary Greek references, see Lindars (1992b: 92–96), who cites Aeschylus, Seven against Thebes 1.461 (sixth to fifth century B.C.) as the only extracanonical reference preceding the present one. The term occurs three times in the Synoptics (Mark 1:43: Jesus "rebukes" a demon; Mark 14:5: some "reproach" a woman for wasting ointment; Matt. 9:30: Jesus "sternly warns" healed men to tell no one). Both τῷ πνεύματι (tō pneumati, in spirit) in John 11:33 and ἐν ἑαυτῷ (en heautō, in himself) in 11:38 represent Semitisms "for expressing the internal impact of the emotions" (R. Brown 1966: 425).

101 Termed "narrative echo effect" by Stibbe 1994: 39, following R. C. Tannehill. R. Brown (1966: 436) further notes that this verse "calls forth the memory of the blind man, so that Jesus as the light and Jesus as the life will be juxtaposed."

112 R. Brown (1966: 436) thinks that the mention of "glory" here forms an inclusio within the chapter, an inclusio with the wine miracle at Cana, tying together the first and last signs, and serving to transition into "the Book of Glory." Schnackenburg (1990: 2.338) comments, "The two sayings, in v. 4 and v. 40, are like corner-posts supporting the interpretation of the raising as the greatest sign of the presence of God's saving power in Jesus."

130 Their signs-based response is reminiscent of 2:23. Morris (1995: 499) construes the relationship between “many of the Jews” and “who had come to Mary” in narrow terms as appositional, so that it would have been the Jews who had come to Mary who believed.

However, R. Brown (1966: 438 [contra Bernard 1928: 2.401–2]) cogently contends that there is no need to overemphasize the agreement of the participle so as to conclude that all the Jews who had come to comfort Mary believed in Jesus.

131 On the Pharisees, see commentary at 1:19, 24. On the chief priests and Pharisees, see commentary at 7:32. Ridderbos (1997: 407 n. 84) plausibly argues that the evangelist’s reference to the Pharisees as the key leaders of the people is a function not only of their influence in Jesus’ day but also of their significance in the post-temple period in which the evangelist wrote. Thus, “Their name was particularly useful to him as a general term for the Jewish authorities.” Carson (1991: 420), too, sees no hint of anachronism, pointing out also the Pharisees’ more direct access to the people. This stands in marked contrast to the provocative statement by Barrett (1978: 405) that if the evangelist conceived of the Pharisees as an official body, “he was ignorant of Judaism as it was before A.D. 70.” R. Brown (1966: 439) notes, “The reference to the Pharisees is more a question of simplification than of error.”

134 Note also the absence of the definite article before συνέδριον in the Greek (which may imply “a gathering” rather than “the Sanhedrin”), though not too much should be made of this (Morris 1995: 501 n. 99). For a complete list of high priests from 200 B.C. to A.D. 70, see Jeremias 1969: 377–78. For a list of high priests from 37 B.C. to A.D. 68, see Smallwood 1962: 31–32. For a list of the most important high priests from 200 B.C. to the time of Jesus, see Köstenberger 2002c: 114. R. Brown (1966: 439) suggests that there may be an intentional contrast between the gathering of the Sanhedrin here and the gathering of the children of God in 11:52.

146 Cf. Matt. 23:37 = Luke 13:34 (noted by Beutler 1994: 403). Morris (1995: 504 n. 117) suggests that the perfect participle διεσκορπισμένα (dieskorpismena, scattered) may “indicate the permanence of the scattering, apart from Christ’s work.” The notion of the gathering of scattered “children of God” in the context of John’s Gospel seems to presuppose the notion of divine election and predestination. R. Brown (1966: 443) sees eucharistic overtones in the term “gathered together,” adducing 6:13 where fragments are gathered subsequent to the miraculous feeding. This reading seems far-fetched.

8 The fronted ἐποίησαν (epoiēsan, they prepared) (which may be equivalent to a passive [so R. Brown 1966: 448]) is taken by some as indication of a very public occasion. If so, then the dinner may not have been prepared by Martha and her family and may not even have taken place at their house (Carson 1991: 428; Morris 1995: 511; contra Barrett 1978: 411; Moloney 1998: 356).

9 The vast majority of commentators holds that the dinner probably was eaten on Saturday at some point during the day, presumably in the evening. See Carson 1991: 427; Barrett 1978: 410; Morris 1995: 510 n. 10; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 208; R. Brown 1966: 447; Burge 2000: 337. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.366) says that the meal could have been on Sunday or possibly Saturday evening.

10 Martha’s serving suggests to some (e.g., Moloney 1998: 356) that the dinner was given at her (and Lazarus’s) house. Others object that if the dinner had been at Lazarus’s house, it likely would not have been stated that he was reclining with Jesus; his presence at the house would have been assumed (Morris 1995: 511; R. Brown 1966: 448; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 414). As on previous occasions, Martha is mentioned before her sister Mary (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.366).

15 So Beasley-Murray 1999: 208–9; contra R. Brown 1966: 454. Witherington (1995: 207) notes the irony of Jesus being anointed at the same place where he raised someone from the dead. Carson (1991: 428) points out that in the following chapter, Jesus’ disciples are told to “wash one another’s feet,” a command that may be anticipated by Mary anointing Jesus’ feet in the present pericope.

22 Morris (1995: 513 n. 21 [cf. R. Brown 1966: 448]) draws attention to the similarity between the wording of the phrase οὐχ ὅτι περὶ τῶν πτωχῶν ἐμελεν αὐτῷ in 12:6 and οὐ μέλει αὐτῷ περὶ τῶν προβάτων, the description of the hireling, in 10:13, noting that both are impersonal in tone.

30 Ἐγνώ (egnō, learned) is best understood as an ingressive aorist (Morris 1995: 517). Most commentators (rightly, in my opinion) hold that the term “Jews” is not used in a negative sense here (so, e.g., Carson 1991: 431; Barrett 1978: 415; R. Brown 1966: 456; contra Morris 1995: 517). See also the additional note on 12:9.

31 See the discussion in R. Brown 1966: 456.

11 Ridderbos (1997: 423 n. 137) says that “hosanna” literally means, “Please help!”; Carson (1991: 432) prefers the meaning “Give salvation now!” But probably Barrett (1978: 417–18) is correct that at the time of Christ, the phrase might have been no more than a “jubilant shout of praise” as part of a “spontaneous ovation” (cf. Morris 1995: 516; R. Brown 1966: 457). Beasley-Murray (1999: 210) adds that it may have been a greeting as well.

19 See commentary at 1:49–51 and at 6:14–15 (where both terms, “the one who comes” and “king,” are used). Both Ridderbos (1997: 423) and Barrett (1978: 418) contend that by mounting the donkey, Jesus sought to correct the mistaken nationalism of the crowd (see also R. Brown 1966: 462; Witherington 1995: 221); though note Coakley (1995: 461–82), who contends that there is no evidence that the crowd understood at the time, so that, “if Jesus tried to make the crowd understand his actions in this way, he failed” (p. 463). Ridderbos (1997: 423) also points to the salvific context of Zech. 9 and notes that Jesus’ action was intended to convey the fact that the time of salvation described in Zechariah (and other relevant OT texts) had arrived.

20 The possible reference to Isa. 40:9 is noted by Carson (1991: 433); cf. Barrett 1978: 418; contra Morris 1995: 521 n. 48. R. Brown (1966: 458) points to Zeph. 3:16. This kind of conflation of quotations from the OT is not uncommon in the NT (e.g., Matt. 27:9–10; Mark 1:2–3).

22 Ridderbos (1997: 424 n. 145) notes that the first two occurrences of ταῦτα (tauta, these things) refer to the events narrated in 12:12–15. As to the third ταῦτα in 12:16, Morris (1995: 521) suggests that as the object of ἐποίησαν (epoiēsan, they had done), it refers to the role that the disciples played in acquiring the donkey (but see R. Brown [1966: 458], who proposes a general, passive sense of ἐποίησαν in 12:16, while Ridderbos [1997: 424] prefers to take it with reference to the manner in which the crowd greeted Jesus as he entered Jerusalem).

1 R. Brown (1966: 469) notes that this narrative provides an excellent conclusion to this section, suggesting numerous correspondences between the present section and John 11.

9 The address κύριε (kyrie) is best rendered “sir” (Carson 1991: 437; Barrett 1978: 422). The verb ἰδεῖν (idein) here means “to visit with, to meet” (R. Brown 1966: 466) or “to have an interview with” (Carson 1991: 437; Barrett 1978: 422). Stibbe (1993: 136) contends that “the use of the verb ‘see’ points to the depth of their [the ‘Greeks’] seeking.” Moloney (1998: 352, 359) lists numerous instances in this Gospel where that verb is used with reference to “the acceptance or the refusal of Jesus’ role as the revealer.”

11 Philip's provenance from a bilingual region is cited by many commentators, including Ridderbos (1997: 427), Carson (1991: 436), Schnackenburg (1990: 2.382), R. Brown (1966: 470), Witherington (1995: 223), and Moloney (1998: 352).

13 See the discussion of the relationship between 12:24 and the Synoptics in R. Brown 1966: 473–74, and of the relationship between 12:25 and the Synoptics in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.384.

15 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 439; cf. Barrett 1978: 424; Beasley-Murray 1999: 211; R. Brown 1966: 467; Burge 2000: 344 n. 19. See Gen. 29:31, 33; Deut. 21:15; Matt. 6:24 par.; compare Luke 14:26 with Matt. 10:37.

19 On the possible influence of Ps. 42 here and elsewhere in John's Gospel (11:33, 35, 37; 14:1–9, 27; 19:28), see the interchange between Beutler (1979, modifying Freed 1965b: 117–30) and Freed (1983a). See also Carson (1991: 440), who says that τετράρακται signifies "revulsion, horror, anxiety, agitation." This emphasis on the precrucifixion turmoil suffered by Jesus stands over against those who, in an effort to focus on the "glory" aspect of Jesus' death, overlook the real agony and anxiety he endured. So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 434), who argues, contra Witkamp, that 12:27a can "hardly refer to anything other than the natural human reaction in confrontation with death"; and Carson (1991: 439–40), who contends, contra E. Käsemann and G. C. Nicholson, that "even in John [with its realized eschatology], Jesus cannot contemplate the cross as a docetic actor, steeped in dispassionate unconcern." R. Brown (1966: 475) notes that here "we see the true humanity of the Johannine Jesus."

22 Commentators almost universally consider the present pericope to be the Johannine equivalent to the Synoptic account of Gethsemane (e.g., Morris 1995: 529; Barrett 1978: 424; R. Brown 1966: 475–76; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.386), though Ridderbos (1997: 435–36, pointing to Ps. 6) and Carson (1991: 440) rightly reject the notion that the Fourth Evangelist has simply refashioned the Synoptic Gethsemane scene to suit his purposes.

27 Carson (1991: 441) finds it tempting to subsume this passage, and indeed all of Christ's redemptive work along with the new covenant, under Ezek. 36, particularly 36:22, 32. On Jesus' desire to glorify the Father, see further 13:31–32; 14:13; 17:1, 4–5 (cf. 15:8; 21:19). R. Brown (1966: 476 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.387]) sees 12:28 as analogous to the Lord's Prayer ("Hallowed be your name"); Beasley-Murray (1999: 207) regards it as the equivalent of Mark 14:36a.

35 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.390) here sees Jesus commenting on people's incomprehension and urging them to believe. Ridderbos (1997: 437), on the other hand, argues that Jesus refers to the sound of the voice, not the words, maintaining that Jesus "is not holding the crowd answerable for what it could not understand." Neither Barrett (1978: 426) nor R. Brown (1966: 477) seems able to reconcile the apparent tension in the voice being for the crowd yet unintelligible to the crowd. Carson (1991: 442) offers four points, most importantly that even if the crowd had not understood the voice, the voice itself should be a signal of divine activity.

38 The term "lifted up" (see 3:14; 8:28) is likely chosen by John because of its potential double reference to physical lifting up as well as figurative lifting up, that is, exaltation (see esp. Isa. 52:13; see also R. Brown 1966: 146, 478; cf. Acts 2:33; 5:31; Luke 9:51; Phil. 2:9; Heb. 1:3; 1 Tim. 3:16).

40 Ridderbos (1997: 439) rightly notes that this is more than a mere proleptic reference to a future event, which effectively reduces 12:31b to a "prophetic vision" (contra Bultmann [1971: 431], who argues that the "nows" of 12:31 necessitate the purgation of traditional Christian eschatology). As Carson (1991: 444–45) aptly notes, “The end times have begun already. It is not that there is nothing reserved for the consummation; rather, it is that the decisive step is about to be taken in the death/exaltation of Jesus.” See also R. Brown 1966: 477.

7 For a helpful comparison and brief discussion of the MT, LXX, and Johannine forms of Isa. 6:10, see R. Brown 1966: 486. The Hebrew original moves from heart to ears to eyes and then back from sight to hearing to understanding. John does not refer to hearing but instead focuses on sight, probably owing to his mention of Jesus’ signs in 12:37 (Carson 1991: 449; cf. Barrett 1978: 431). Keener (2003: 833) detects verbal ties between the quote of Isa. 6:9–10 (John 12:40) and John 9:39–41 (blindness) and 4:47; 5:13 (healing). The Jews considered the heart to be the seat of mental as well as physical life (cf. Mark 8:17–21).

9 This is the view of the majority of major commentators: e.g., Carson 1991: 449; Morris 1995: 538; Ridderbos 1997: 445; R. Brown 1966: 484.

18 This emphasis is in keeping with instances in Second Temple literature, where the law seems to take a more active part in the process of judging (2 Bar. 48:47; 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 13:30–35; Wis. 9:3; cf. Philo, Mos. 2.10 §53). John 12:48–50 contains echoes of the Book of Deuteronomy (cf. Deut. 18:19; 31:19, 26; see O’Connell 1960; cf. R. Brown 1966: 491–92). There, it is God who takes vengeance on those who refuse to hear; in the Targumim, it is God’s memra, or word: “And the man who does not listen to his words which he [the future prophet] will speak in the name of my memra, I in my memra will be avenged of him” (Tg. Neof. on Deut. 18:19); “my memra will take revenge on him” (Tg. Ps.-J. on Deut. 18:19). For “the last day,” see 6:39–40, 44; 11:24 (the phrase, with “day” in the singular, does not occur elsewhere in the NT).

1 Cf. “six days before the Passover” in 12:1; “the next day” in 12:12. Carson (1991: 455–58) rightly concludes that Jesus and his disciples ate a true paschal meal on Thursday, 15 Nisan (contra Barrett 1978: 50–51; R. Brown 1970: 556; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.36). On the chronology of the passion narrative in John and the Synoptics (siding with Carson, despite Morris 1995: 688–90), see the sidebar in Köstenberger 1999a: 146, with further bibliographical references (see also Köstenberger 2002c: 130, 164, 173; Blomberg 1987: 175–80; Carson 1984: 530–32). Some seek to adjudicate apparent differences between the presentations in John and the Synoptics by the theory that differences in chronology are due to the use of different calendars. John, it is suggested, like the Judeans and the Sadducees, uses a lunar sunset-to-sunset calendar, while the Synoptics, like the Galileans, the Pharisees, and Jesus and his followers, employ a solar sunrise-to-sunrise reckoning (Hoehner 1977: 85–90; see chart on p. 89; Morris 1995: 684–95); or, John’s calendric usage shifts: his light-darkness theme (rooted in the Genesis account) is conveyed by way of a solar calendar, while elsewhere a lunar system is found (building on exodus redemptive motifs) (Busada 2003). However, these theories seem to lack a clear textual base in the Gospels themselves and are unnecessarily complicated if the solution argued here is adopted.

7 This is favored by Morris (1995: 545 n. 9) and Ridderbos (1997: 452); cf. Barrett 1978: 438; R. Brown 1970: 550. Carson (1991: 461), at least explicitly, remains undecided, though his translation reflects an intensive force.

38 A reference to Christian baptism is unlikely. Contra Moloney 1998: 375; Brodie 1993: 452; and R. Brown (1970: 562), who says that 13:6–10 represents a secondary allusion to baptism. Moreover, as Carson (1991: 466) notes, the washing of Judas’s feet proves that “no rite, even if performed by Jesus himself, ensures spiritual cleansing.” On “he knew,” see 6:70–71; 13:3, 26–

27.

42 This is noted by Morris (1995: 551), who says that the reversal “may be significant.” R. Brown (1970: 553) theorizes that “the order in which the two titles are mentioned may reflect the development of the disciples’ understanding, for ‘Teacher’ is more common in the earlier chapters of the Gospel and ‘Lord’ in the later chapters.” Morris (1995: 551 n. 34, citing BDF §147 [cf. Barrett 1978: 443; Beasley-Murray 1999: 229 n. g]) says that the nominative ὁ διδάσκαλος καὶ κύριος “is equivalent to a vocative,” though the phrase clearly functions as an apposition to ἐγώ in the present context.

1 John’s quotation is closer to the MT than to the LXX. Menken (1990) contends that the rendering of Ps. 41:9 in the present passage represents the evangelist’s own translation from the Hebrew. Moloney (1998: 384), on the strength of the evangelist’s choice of the verb τρώγω (trōgō [used also in 6:54–58]) in the place of the LXX’s ἐσθίω (esthiō) for “eat,” postulates “eucharistic overtones” to the meal. On fulfillment quotations, see commentary at 12:38. Similar texts in the Psalms include 31:9–13; 38:10–12; 55:13–14 (see commentary at 13:21). Ridderbos (1997: 467 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 554]) rightly argues for a general sense of “this is to fulfill the scripture” rather than taking the statement to imply that Jesus chose Judas in order to fulfill Scripture. This latter view seems to be held by Carson (1991: 470), who writes, “The reason Jesus chose one who would betray him was to fulfill the Scripture.”

2 The outline of the structure of the first unit (13:31–14:31) below follows Carson (1991: 498) and Blomberg (2002: 199), who take 14:15–31 as a single unit. Others divide this section between 14:24 and 14:25 (e.g., Moloney 1998: 391–92; R. Brown 1970: 623). Schnackenburg (1990: 3.58), following Becker, sees a break between 14:17 and 14:18.

24 The rendering “mansions” (rather than “rooms”), which crept into English translations through William Tyndale (1526) via the Vulgate, mistakenly suggests luxurious accommodations in modern parlance (the Latin word mansio referred to a stopover place, which was still the meaning of “mansion” in Tyndale’s day). See R. Brown 1970: 619; Carson 1991: 489.

37 Keener (2003: 943) contends that “truth” and “life” in the present passage “merely clarify the ‘way’ ” (following R. Brown 1970: 621).

41 See Hos. 13:4; Jer. 24:7; 31:34. Cf. Huffmon 1966 (cited by R. Brown 1970: 631).

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible

hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

74 As R. Brown (1970: 642) points out, the promise of the divine presence with Jesus’ followers in 14:15–24 includes the Spirit (14:15–17), Jesus (14:18–21), and the Father (14:22–24), hence involving all three persons of the Godhead in the indwelling of believers.

86 Again, Bultmann (1971: 617–18) argues that the present reference collapses Easter and the parousia into one. This conclusion, however, is unwarranted. Rather, according to Jesus’ statements in John, believers need not wait for the parousia to experience the indwelling presence of Christ. Just as the incarnate Lord’s presence was with them during the time of his earthly ministry (1:14), his emissary, the Spirit (14:16), and the Father and the Son with him (14:23), will be present with the believer already in the here and now. As R. Brown (1970: 648) notes, the implicit message is “that in indwelling are fulfilled some of the expectations of the last period.”

91 The vast majority of commentators (including R. Brown, Barrett, Borchert, Morris, Carson, and Ridderbos) believe that teaching and reminding are in synonymous parallelism. On the Spirit’s teaching ministry, see the parallel in 16:13. Both verses together (14:26 and 16:13) echo Ps. 25:5 (cf. 25:9). See also Neh. 9:20 (cf. 1 John 2:20, 27). Regarding Jesus’ teaching, see John 6:59; 7:14, 28, 35; 8:20; 18:20. It is often argued that the use of the Greek masculine pronoun ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, he) for the Spirit in passages such as John 14:26; 15:26; and 16:13–14 affirms the personality of the Holy Spirit (Barrett 1978: 482; Borchert 2002: 159; Morris 1995: 583 n. 73 [citing Westcott]; 606 n. 64; 621 n. 27; and others cited in Wallace 1996: 331 n. 42). However, the most likely reason for John’s use of the masculine pronoun in these passages is that the antecedent is the masculine noun ὁ παράκλητος (ho paraklētos, the helping presence). If so, John’s use of a masculine pronoun to refer to the Spirit is best explained as a function of grammar rather than theology, and arguments for the personality of the Holy Spirit must be made on other grounds (so rightly Wallace 1996: 331–32, who points out that it is difficult to find any text where the neuter noun πνεῦμα [pneuma, spirit/Spirit] is grammatically referred to by the masculine).

1 Carson (1991: 513) terms it “extended metaphor” or “illustrative comparison.” He is not convinced that the parallels adduced by Bauckham (1987: 84–101) establish that the present passage constitutes a commentary on one of Jesus’ parables (Carson 1991: 512). R. Brown (1970: 668) labels this a māšāl (so also Borchert 2002: 138; cf. 1996: 329); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.96) calls it “figurative discourse.”

2 Although vine imagery is widespread in ancient literature, an OT background for the present passage is favored by the vast majority of commentators, primarily owing to the frequent OT references or allusions and the replacement motif in this Gospel (e.g., Carson 1991: 513; R. Brown 1970: 669–71; Morris 1995: 593; Ridderbos 1997: 515; contra Bultmann 1971: 530; Witherington 1995: 255–57).

18 Contra Barrett (1978: 473 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 675]), who believes that the reference is to apostate Christians, perhaps with unfruitful Jews in the background as well. But see Carson (1991: 515), who rightly notes that in John, true disciples by definition persevere (6:37–40; 10:28), while on the other hand, the NT as a whole acknowledges the existence of those who sustain some type of connection with Jesus but who nonetheless end up failing to exemplify the perseverance that would mark them as truly transformed, spiritually reborn individuals (e.g., 8:31–59; 1 John 2:19; 2 John 9; Matt. 13:18–23; 24:12).

24 See Barrett 1978: 474; R. Brown 1970: 678. Contra commentators who view the statement in 15:4a as merely entailing a comparison (e.g., Bultmann 1971: 536).

29 Lang, TDNT 6:934–47, especially 936–37, 942; Carson 1991: 517; R. Brown 1970: 679; Ridderbos 1997: 518. See, for example, Isa. 30:27; Matt. 3:12 par.; 5:22; 18:8; 25:41; Luke 12:49; Heb. 12:29; 2 Pet. 3:10; Jude 7, 23; Rev. 20:14.

35 Similarly, Jude 21 (R. Brown 1970: 663). The noun ἀγάπη (agapē, love) occurred earlier in John's Gospel in 5:42 and, more significantly, in 13:35. It is found four times in 15:9–13 and once in 17:26. The corresponding verb ἀγαπάω (agapaō, love) is much more frequent; twenty-six of its thirty-seven occurrences in John are in the farewell discourse. The sober use of “love” terminology distinguishes John's Gospel from other writings such as the Odes of Solomon (e.g., 8:1, 11, 20–21).

36 The perfect τετήρακα (tetēraka, I have kept) sounds the notion of completeness (R. Brown 1970: 663; Morris 1995: 597 n. 26).

39 The theme of joy is also found elsewhere in John, in the illustration of the woman giving birth in 16:20–24 and in 17:13 (cf. 1 John 1:4; 2 John 12; see Barrett 1978: 476; R. Brown 1970: 681). The noun χάρα (chara, joy) occurs nine times in this Gospel (all but one of the references are in the farewell discourse), more than in any other NT writing (the verb χαίρω [chairō, rejoice] occurs nine times in John's Gospel as well). Similar to Jesus, Paul later expressed the hope that his joy might also be the joy of his followers (2 Cor. 2:3; cf. Phil. 2:2). As in the case of love, John's treatment of joy is remarkably restrained in comparison with other writings such as the Odes of Solomon (e.g., 15:1; 23:1; 31:3, 6; 40:4).

42 Several commentators note that joy in the present passage is akin to peace (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 681; Burge 2000: 418, with reference to 14:27–28). R. Brown (1970: 681) also notes that joy is presented here as a salvific gift and points to 3:29; 4:36; 8:56; 11:15; 14:28.

44 The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) functions appositionally (Wallace 1996: 476). The distinction made by Moloney (1998: 424 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 663]) between the disciples being commanded to love “continuously” (present subjunctive) on the basis of Jesus' crucifixion, a single act of love (aorist), founders because of reliance on outmoded notions of Greek verbal theory.

47 That is, for those he loves (Carson 1991: 521; R. Brown 1970: 664; Barrett 1978: 477; Witherington 1995: 259; Borchert 2002: 149). See 10:11, 15, 17–18; 1 John 3:16; cf. Rom. 5:6–8. The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) in the present verse is exegetical (R. Brown 1970: 664).

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for “love” is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo's (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as “my friend” (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

2 Keener (2003: 1019) finds another micro-chiasm in 15:18–25, with 15:20ab (a servant is not greater than his master) at the center. The six conditional clauses in 15:18–24 represent warnings pertaining to the future (or present) of the Christian community in relation to the world. Such parting exhortations are a common feature of farewell discourses (Moloney 1998: 433). The present condition is second class: “If the world hates you—and it does” (Wallace 1996: 696; Borchert 2002: 154). On the “world,” see commentary at 1:9; the same phrase occurs in 1 John 3:13 (see also John 17:14). On the contrast between “above” and “below,” see 3:31; 8:23 (cf. 18:36–37). The form γινώσκετε (ginōskete, you know) can be read as an imperative (NIV; NRSV; NLT; ISV; ESV; HCSB; TNIV; Barrett 1978: 480) or an indicative (NASB; KJV), though admittedly the difference is marginal (R. Brown 1970: 686). The pronoun με is emphatic (Morris 1995: 602 n. 42). The perfect verb form μεμίσηκεν (memisēken, it hated) stresses the settled, completed state of the world’s hatred toward Jesus (Barrett 1978: 480; R. Brown 1970: 686; Morris 1995: 602 n. 44).

6 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 525–26, with reference to 17:20, the NIV, and many major commentators (e.g., Barrett 1978: 480; Bultmann 1971: 549; Lindars 1970: 494; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.115; Bruce 1980: 313; contra Borchert 2002: 156; Dodd 1963: 409; R. Brown 1970: 687; and the NLT). See the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 275; Carson 1991: 525–26.

8 See 7:28; 8:19, 27, 55; 16:3. Ταῦτα πάντα (tauta panta, all these things) presumably includes both hatred (15:18–19) and the resulting persecution (15:20; cf. 16:1–3; see Bultmann 1971: 550 n. 1; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276; Ridderbos 1997: 524). The expression “because of my name” reflects OT terminology pertaining to God and his great name (cf. 1 Sam. 12:22; 2 Chron. 6:32; Jer. 14:21; cf. Acts 5:41; 1 Pet. 4:14; 1 John 2:12; Rev. 2:3; see R. Brown 1970: 687), though in the present context it is essentially synonymous with “me” (Carson 1991: 526; Moloney 1998: 433).

13 The implied object of “seen” is Jesus’ works (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.116; Barrett 1978: 481; R. Brown 1970: 688).

16 So Ridderbos 1997: 525; R. Brown 1970: 688; Morris 1995: 605; Barrett 1978: 482; Carson 1991: 527 n. 2.

18 So Ridderbos 1997: 525–26; Barrett 1978: 482; Carson 1991: 527; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276; contra Moloney (1998: 434), who contends that “most” favor Ps. 35. Cf. the citation of Ps. 69:9 in John 2:17. See also Ps. 119:161. Extrabiblical parallels include Ps. Sol. 7:1; b. Yoma 9b (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 147; cf. Barrett 1978: 482; R. Brown 1970: 689).

22 Μαρτυρεῖτε (martyreite) is best taken as an imperative, “you must bear witness” (Carson 1991: 529; NIV; NLT; NRSV; TNIV), rather than as an indicative (ASV; RSV) or a future (NASB; NKJV), though there is little distinction in meaning (so, rightly, R. Brown 1970: 689). The imperative here is addressed to the Eleven, who in turn serve as representatives of later generations of believers (Köstenberger 1998b: 151 n. 33, as a mild corrective to Carson 1991: 505). On the implications (or lack thereof) of the use of the masculine form ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, he) for the personality of the Spirit, see commentary at 14:26 (see also 16:13–14).

24 So Carson 1991: 529; Ridderbos 1997: 527; R. Brown 1970: 690; Moloney 1998: 434. See 16:4; 6:64; 8:25. See also Luke 1:2; Acts 1:21–22; 10:37. The present tense ἐστέ (este, you are) is perfective in meaning, “you have been” (R. Brown 1970: 690; contra Bultmann 1971: 554).

35 On the surface, 13:36 and 14:5 seem to contradict Jesus’ statement here, but in both previous passages the illocutionary force of the questions is a protest of Jesus’ announced departure rather than a sincere inquiry as to his destination or the implications of his leaving (Carson 1991: 532–33; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.126; R. Brown 1970: 710, followed by Beasley-Murray 1999: 279; note also the curious attempt at resolving the difficulty by Borchert 2002: 164). Burge (2000: 436) notes the present tense ἐρωτᾷ (erōta, asks).

55 The verb ἀναγγέλλω (anangellō, proclaim), which is used thrice in 16:13–15, occurs over forty times in the Book of Isaiah (cf. R. Brown 1970: 708, citing Young 1955: 224–26), where declaring things to come is the exclusive domain of Yahweh (48:14). A close parallel to the present passage is Isa. 44:7 where Yahweh challenges anyone to declare the things to come (cf. 42:9; 46:10). Another striking parallel is found in 41:21–29 (esp. vv. 22–23; see also 45:19).

69 So Carson 1991: 546; Barrett 1978: 495; R. Brown 1970: 735; Beasley-Murray 1999: 286; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.161.

6 Hence, Bultmann (1971: 486, cf. 460–61) places chapter 17 between 13:30 and 13:31, with 13:1 serving as the introduction to the prayer. As R. Brown (1970: 745) rightly notes, however, although chapters 13 and 17 are indeed closely related, they are so by way of inclusion rather than direct sequence. Brown himself, incidentally, believes that chapter 17 was not part of the original Gospel but was added at the same time as chapters 15 and 16. He conjectures that the prayer may have been written by the same circle as the prologue. For a discussion of the literary structure of John 17, see also Malatesta 1971. Black (1988) breaks up the prayer into ninety-five “nuclear structures ... embedded into 52 cola” (p. 145), also noting the frequent occurrence of ellipsis, anacolouthon, and parallelism (see also his chart of rhetorical features on pp. 149–53, listing instances of repetition, omission, and shifts in expectancy).

7 See Morris 1995: 634; with further delineation of subunits, Hunter 1979: 326–28. Lindars (1972: 515) further divides 17:20–26 into 17:20–23 and 17:24–26. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.168–69, with reference to a 1973 German article) provides a more complicated proposal, dividing at 17:1–2, 4–5, 6–11a, 11b–16, 17–19, 22–23, 24–26 (he considers 17:3 and 17:20–21 to be secondary glosses). Others favor division at 17:1–8, 9–19, 20–26 (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 748–51). Malatesta (1971: 191–92) divides at 17:1–5, 6–8, 9–19, 20–24, 25–26 and proposes a strophic arrangement. More eccentric is the suggestion by Appold (1976: 204) that there is an oscillating pattern of petition and review, featuring six petition and six review units. A survey of structural proposals for John 17 up to the late 1970s is found in Hunter 1979: 312–28. More recently, Borchert (2002: 185–89) has favored seven petitions, based on the address “Father.” Yet, as Ridderbos (1997: 547) remarks, “The structure is not severe enough and the transitions are too fluid for us to speak of a detailed and sharply delineated thought scheme.”

18 According to 6:37–40, everyone who “looks to the Son and believes in him shall have eternal life” (cf. 1 John 2:23–25). In 10:27–28, Jesus is said to give life to “his sheep” who “listen to his voice.” Morris (1995: 636 n. 6) notes the frequency of the term δίδωμι (didōmi, give) in the present prayer and elaborates on its significance. The neuter πᾶν ὃ (pan ho, all that) focuses less on the persons as such and more on the God-given nature of Jesus’ authority (Morris 1995: 636

n. 9); R. Brown (1970: 741) suggests that it may “give a certain unity to the group.”

19 The explanatory phrase “now this is” is in keeping with Johannine style (cf., e.g., 3:19: “this is the verdict”). The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) here, in typical Johannine idiom, is appositional (Wallace 1996: 475). Morris (1995: 638) notes that ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) here precedes the noun (elsewhere in John also in 4:23), and he proposes that this indicates emphasis. The verse is regularly seen by critical scholars as a Johannine insertion (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 741; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.172; Barrett 1978: 503; but see Carson 1991: 556; Ridderbos 1997: 549). 36 Cf. Exod. 3:13–15. See R. Brown 1970: 755; Carson 1991: 558; Morris 1995: 640; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.175.

47 R. Brown (1970: 759 [approvingly cited by Borchert 2002: 197]) says that ἐν (en, in, by) is both instrumental and local. Contra Carson (1991: 562) and Morris (1995: 644), who prefer a locative force (“in your name”).

49 See 6:37, 39, 70; 10:28–29; 18:8–9. The juxtaposition of the verbs “protect” and “keep safe” reflects Semitic parallelism (cf. Prov. 18:10). The verb ἐφύλαξα (ephylaxa, I guarded) may conjure up the image of a shepherd guarding his flock (Ridderbos 1997: 553). On “the name you gave me,” see 17:11. R. Brown (1970: 764) views the events of 18:5–8 as a demonstration of how God’s name protects the disciples: when Jesus identifies himself as ἐγώ εἰμι (egō eimi, I am [he]), his arresters fall down, and the disciples are allowed to leave. Similarly, Stibbe (1993: 176–77), who notes how both of Jesus’ statements in his final prayer, that he protected his own (17:12) and that he completed his mission (17:4), anticipate realities still future from the vantage point of the Johannine narrative (cf. 18:1–11 and 19:30, respectively).

61 R. Brown (1970: 766) notes the lack of explicit reference to the Spirit in the present passage and suggests that “truth” in 17:17 ought to be identified not only with God’s word but also with the Spirit, who makes God’s word intelligible.

68 R. Brown (1970: 769) notes a “grammatical parallelism” between six lines of 17:20–21 and six lines of 17:22–23. Morris (1995: 649) points to structural similarities between 17:21 and 17:23 and says the effect is to “add solemnity and emphasis.” See also the helpful thoughts in Black 1988: 155–59 on the kind of unity envisioned by Jesus.

75 The same verb, τελειόω (teleioō, complete) is used in 4:34; 5:36; 17:4; 19:28. Other Johannine parallels include the “one flock and one shepherd” (10:16) and the “gathering of the scattered children into one” (11:52). The Qumran covenanters, too, saw themselves as a yahad (union) and displayed a keen consciousness of their election (for a discussion of Qumran parallels to the notion of unity in John 17, see R. Brown 1970: 777).

88 So Carson 1991: 570; cf. R. Brown 1970: 781; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.197; Borchert 2002: 211. Contra Morris (1995: 653), who thinks that it is through the cross. Ridderbos (1997: 566) suggests that this is not so much an anticipation of the passion as it is a reference “to Jesus’ continuing work in heaven.”

1 Stibbe (1992: 111–12) contends that John’s characterization of Jesus in his passion narrative consists of three aspects: Jesus as judge, king, and elusive God. Stibbe also suggests that 18:1–27 serves as an “implicit commentary on the truth enunciated in 1:5” (i.e., the victory of the light over the darkness [p. 100]). On the relationship between the Johannine and the Synoptic passion narratives, see Ridderbos 1996: 569–72; Carson 1991: 571–76; Westcott 1908: 2.262–64. Burge (2000: 485–86) addresses the historical trustworthiness of the Johannine passion narrative. Moloney (1998: 482) divides 18:1–19:42 into five scenes on the basis of the introduction of new people and places. He also notes that this section begins and ends with κῆπος (kēpos, garden). R. Brown (1970: 813–17), too, has an extensive discussion of the structure and historicity of John’s passion narrative. See also the examination of theological and literary features of this section in Schnackenburg 1990: 3.218–19.

22 So Ridderbos 1997: 576; with reference to the threefold repetition of this phrase in this section, Morris 1995: 658 and Ball 1996: 201; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 322; Moloney 1998: 485; R. Brown 1970: 818; Borchert 2002: 219; Burge 2000: 492.

30 Moloney (1998: 485), rather idiosyncratically, claims that the “son of perdition” in 17:12 is not Judas but Satan and that Jesus does not exclude anyone, even Judas, from his request to the soldiers (p. 483). R. Brown (1970: 811–12) suggests that Judas was not given to Jesus by the Father. Borchert (2002: 220) rightly notes that the exception is already stated in 17:12.

35 Hence the suggestion that Malchus was an Arab; cf. 1 Macc. 11:39: “Imalkue the Arab”; Josephus, Ant. 13.5.1 §131: “Malchus the Arab,” referring to an earlier namesake. Cf. R. Brown 1970: 812; BDAG 614.

6 Though Annas is also mentioned by Luke (Luke 3:2; Acts 4:6). On the historical plausibility of such a trial, see Ridderbos 1997: 579–80. See also the excursus on the political and judicial situation in Israel during the time of Jesus in Borchert 2002: 224–26 and the chart showing the relationship of the four Gospels to one another concerning Jesus before the Jewish authorities in R. Brown 1970: 830–31. John 18:12a–b can be construed either with 18:1–11 (Beasley-Murray 1999: 324; Moloney 1998: 486; Barrett 1978: 523) or with 18:12c–14 (so Ridderbos 1997: 578; Morris 1995: 664; R. Brown 1970: 819).

12 Peter’s three denials are recorded in all four Gospels. See the comparison chart in R. Brown 1970: 838–39.

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235). Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

18 This construes the “other disciple” as the subject of εἰσήγαγεν (eisēgagen, he/she brought in) (Schlatter 1948: 333); alternatively, it is the slave girl who led Peter in. On women gatekeepers, see 2 Sam. 4:6 LXX; Acts 12:13 (R. Brown 1970: 824). MM 295 cites inscriptions dating from 14 B.C. and A.D. 34. The word παιδίσκη (paidiskē, servant girl) in John 18:17 is rendered “bondwoman” (in distinction from “free woman”) in Gal. 4:22–31.

24 Among those viewing the present hearing in more unofficial terms are Carson (1991: 584), Ridderbos (1997: 582), and R. Brown (1970: 826). Most other major commentators consider this to be an official trial (e.g., Morris, Barrett). On the Sadducees’ reputation for judging in general, Josephus writes that “the school of the Sadducees ... are indeed more heartless than any of the other Jews ... when they sit in judgment” (Ant. 20.9.1 §199).

27 As R. Brown (1970: 826) points out, the only previous reference to Jesus teaching in a synagogue in this Gospel is found in 6:59 (though there are other instances recorded in the Synoptics). The perfects λελάληκα (lelalēka, I have spoken) in 18:20 and ἀκηκοότας (akēkootas, [those who] heard) in 18:21 present Jesus' teaching from the perspective of having been completed, so that it is now possible to look at it as a finished product in terms of both delivery and reception (though not everything that commentators deduce from the perfects here seems warranted [see, e.g., Moloney 1998: 488]).

45 The former is suggested by Kosmala 1963; 1967–68; the latter by Lattey 1953–54; R. Brown 1970: 828 (both citing Lagrange). See also commentary at 13:36–38.

1 R. Brown (1970: 861) comments, "With all its drama and its theology, John's account of the trial is the most consistent and intelligible we have." Further positive evaluations of John's historicity are offered by Ridderbos (1997: 587–88) and by Carson (1991: 587), who suggests as possible Johannine sources Jesus after the resurrection, court attendants who later became believers, or possibly some public court records. Barrett (1978: 530) believes that most of the material is based on the Markan passion narrative.

2 See R. Brown 1970: 858–59, followed by Lincoln 2000: 124; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.220, 242; Moloney 1998: 493.

5 Acts 21:35, 40; see the extensive description in J.W. 5.5.8 §§238–46; both locations are mentioned in Ant. 15.8.5 §292. Cf. the discussion in R. Brown 1970: 845.

7 See also Kopp 1963: 368–39. R. Brown (1970: 845) also notes that the term αὐλή (aulē, palace), used in Mark 15:16 to describe the Praetorium, occurs frequently in Josephus with reference to the Herodian palace but never with regard to the Fortress of Antonia.

9 See Carson 1991: 588; Beasley-Murray 1999: 317 n. h; Morris 1995: 674–75. R. Brown (1970: 844) sees the hearing before Annas as concluding at 3:00 A.M., Jesus before Caiaphas from 3:00 to 6:00 A.M., and before Pilate from 6:00 A.M. until noon.

10 Ridderbos 1997: 589; Carson 1991: 589; Duke 1985: 127–28. Duke (1985: 128 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 866]) notes the further irony that the Jews are concerned about not being able to eat the Passover, yet they ultimately kill the true Passover.

22 Sherwin-White 1965: 99 (summarized by R. Brown [1970: 848]).

45 For a chart comparing the Synoptic and Johannine accounts of the Barabbas scene, see R. Brown 1970: 870–71.

50 On Pilate, see commentary at 18:29. Ἐμαστίγωσεν (emastigōsen) is a causative active form: "Pilate caused Jesus to be scourged, but did not perform the act himself" (Wallace 1996: 412). The juxtaposed expressions ἐμαστίγωσεν (scourged [19:1]) and ῥαπίσματα (rhapismata, blows [19:3]) echo the Servant Song in Isa. 50:6 LXX, where the same two words (the former in noun form) are featured (Ridderbos 1997: 599 n. 102; cf. R. Brown 1970: 874).

52 Sherwin-White 1963: 27–28; Carson 1991: 596–97. Contra Schnackenburg (1990: 3.254), who believes that John misplaced the scourging and who, seeing only one scourging, believes that this scourging was the verberatio. R. Brown (1970: 858–59) thinks that John has moved the scourging from its original position (cf. Mark and Matthew) in order to fashion a chiasmic arrangement.

61 R. Brown (1970: 890) draws attention to the verbal connection between the Jews' calling for Jesus' crucifixion in the present passage and the crowd hailing Jesus as the king of Israel in 12:13.

68 See Hoehner, DJG 121. Contra Keener (1993: 311) and R. Brown (1970: 891), who conjectures, "Perhaps the tremors that presaged the fall of Sejanus were already felt by sensitive political observers, and Pilate feared that soon he would have no protector at court” (thus placing Jesus’ trial and crucifixion prior to Sejanus’s demise in October, A.D. 31). Another pertinent issue is the designation “friend of Caesar,” on which, see commentary at 19:12. Regarding “the palace,” see commentary at 18:28.

78 The verb ἐκάθισεν (ekathisen, he sat) is intransitive, with Pilate, not Jesus, being the one sitting down (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 605; Carson 1991: 608; Morris 1995: 707 n. 31). Barrett (1978: 544) thinks that this is an instance of Johannine double meaning, though, as R. Brown (1970: 881) rightly objects, “the phenomenon [of double meaning] has not been based on syntactical ambiguity, nor is it usual for the second meaning to be opposite of the first.”

84 So, correctly, the NIV; see also Carson 1991: 604; contra Barrett 1978: 545; R. Brown 1970: 882–83, 895. Also contra those who, like Morris (1995: 684–95, esp. 604–95), contend that Jesus and the temple authorities followed different calendars, with the Synoptics using Jesus’ calendar (according to which the meal was the Passover) and John using that of the temple authorities (according to whom the sacrificial animals were slain the following day; hence, Jesus was sacrificed as our Passover).

1 For discussions of this passage’s relationship to the Synoptics, see Barrett 1978: 546–48 (on the assumption of John’s use of Mark and the superiority of Markan material); Beasley-Murray 1999: 343–44; Bultmann 1971: 667; R. Brown 1970: 913–16. R. Brown (1970: 910–12) divides 19:16b–42 into five chiastically arranged episodes plus introduction and conclusion; Moloney (1998: 502, following Donald Senior) sees the five scenes but not the chiasm (see also Moloney’s literary analysis of John 18–19 on pp. 511–12).

2 So, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 608; Carson 1991: 608; Morris 1995: 711; Beasley-Murray 1999: 344; Borchert 2002: 260; Burge 2000: 524. Contra Moloney (1998: 506, following R. Brown), who contends that “the Jews” are the subject of the verb.

6 So, with a variety of nuances, Witherington 1995: 308; R. Brown 1970: 917; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270; and Moloney 1998: 502, 506. Carson (1991: 609), who says that the omission is due to John’s desire to further highlight Jesus’ willing obedience to the Father, dismisses as unduly speculative the view that the omission is part of a polemic against the theory that Simon of Cyrene was himself crucified (contra Beasley-Murray 1999: 345). Barrett (1978: 548) proposes that the omission is due to the evangelist’s effort to highlight the “all-sufficiency of Jesus ... in effecting the redemption of the world.” Beasley-Murray (1999: 345 [cf. Borchert 2002: 261; R. Brown 1970: 917–18; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270]) suggests that the omission serves to create an allusion to Isaac carrying the wood for his sacrifice.

8 Later Jewish literature draws parallels between the crucifixion and Isaac’s carrying the wood “like one carries his stake [= cross] on his shoulder” (Gen. Rab. 56.3 on Gen. 22:6; see R. Brown 1970: 917–18).

16 The passage may also echo Isa. 53:12: “numbered with the transgressors” (Beasley-Murray 1999: 346; Bultmann 1971: 669 n. 1; R. Brown 1970: 900; more cautious is Carson [1991: 611–12]).

20 Cf. the causative use of “flogged” in 19:1. So the majority of commentators, including R. Brown 1970: 901; Carson 1991: 610; Morris 1995: 713; Barrett 1978: 549 (but see Borchert 2002: 265). See also commentary at 19:40.

24 R. Brown (1970: 901) notes that some MSS alter the order by placing Greek before Latin, in which case the Latin would occupy the “place of dignity at the end.”

28 “Do not write” in 19:21 somewhat unexpectedly involves a present-tense verb (γράφει, graphe). Wallace (1996: 487–88) classifies the form as an imperative of entreaty. Barrett (1978: 549, following N. Turner 1963) proposes the translation “Alter what you have written” (i.e., “Do not go on writing [what you have written]”; cf. R. Brown 1970: 902).

29 The double perfect of γέγραφα (gegrapha, I have written) conveys a sense of finality, portraying Pilate’s action as a fait accompli (Ridderbos 1997: 609 n. 134; Morris 1995: 714 n. 54). Bultmann (1971: 670 n. 2 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 902]) suggests that the first perfect is aoristic; Wallace (1996: 577) lists 19:22 as an example of an extensive perfect focusing on the completion of an action in the past. Similar word combinations are found also in the LXX (Gen. 43:14; Esth. 4:16; 1 Macc. 13:38) and in rabbinic literature (b. Menah. 3a; b. Ketub. 96a; b. Yebam. 106b) (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; further instances are cited in Schlatter 1948: 349). Perhaps significantly, similar phrases are found also in a Roman context (note Cicero, Epistulae ad Quintum fratrem 1.2.2; 1.2.13: scripsi, scripsi). Keener’s (2003: 1138) observation that every other instance of “written” in this Gospel refers to Scripture (2:17; 6:31, 45; 8:17; 10:34; 12:14, 16; 15:25), which cannot be broken (10:35), seems of doubtful relevance here.

35 The general conclusion of commentators is that the reference to the “seamless robe” may not necessarily have theological significance (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 610 n. 136; cf. Morris 1995: 715, esp. n. 56; Bultmann 1971: 671). Both Witherington (1995: 309) and R. Brown (1970: 920–22) note several possibilities yet caution against dogmatic conclusions (see also Carson 1991: 614). Barrett (1978: 550) sees an allusion to Jesus’ death resulting in “the scattered children of God.”

38 There is no agreement, however, on the exact way in which soldiers and bystanders are related by the evangelist. Ridderbos (1997: 610 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 903]) thinks that there is no implied contrast between these two groups. Other commentators believe that the construction does imply such a contrast (e.g., Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.273, 276). If a contrast is intended, it is hardly a sharp one; more likely, the two groups are distinguished as the narrative moves from one to the other.

42 See the extensive discussions in Carson 1991: 616; R. Brown 1970: 905–6. Symbolic interpretations (such as Brodie 1993: 549; Stibbe 1993: 194) fail to convince.

43 So also the vast majority of commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Morris 1995: 716–17; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Bultmann 1971: 672; Borchert 2002: 268; R. Brown 1970: 904; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.276. Ridderbos (1997: 611 n. 142) notes that in light of Mark 15:40 and Matt. 27:56, there could have been other women there as well. See also Luke 23:49.

48 In antiquity, a dying person ordinarily would entrust his mother to another with a direct charge such as this: “I leave to you my mother to be taken care of” (Lagrange 1925: 494 [cited in R. Brown 1970: 907]; cf. Lucian, Toxaris 22). In the LXX, the adoption formula is generally “you are” rather than “here is” as in the present passage (“ ‘Mother, here is your son’ ... ‘Here is your mother’ ”; cf. Ps. 2:7; Tob. 7:12). The form of expression used in John has a Semitic ring. Speaking of “the official formula of the old Jewish family law,” one commentator refers to a crucified man’s “right to make testamentary dispositions, even from the cross” (Stauffer 1960: 13; cf. Borchert 2002: 269; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278).

53 The vast majority of commentators connect the reference to Scripture being fulfilled with Jesus’ statement (e.g., Carson 1991: 619; Barrett 1978: 553; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; though Morris [1995: 719] seems to suggest that it might be deliberately ambiguous). Contra R. Brown (1970: 908), who seems to prefer linking Jesus' statement with his words to Mary and the beloved disciple.

54 So Ridderbos 1997: 616; Carson 1991: 619; Barrett 1978: 553; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; Schlatter 1948: 351. Psalm 69:21 is also cited in the Qumran hymn 1QH 12:11. Another relevant passage is Ps. 22:15 (Schlatter 1948: 351; Kruse 2003: 369). The suggestion that Jesus here refers back to his statement in 18:11 is improbable (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 617; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; R. Brown 1970: 930).

61 So the vast majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 618; Carson 1991: 622; Barrett 1978: 555; Morris 1995: 730; Bultmann 1971: 676). Contra Borchert (2002: 273 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 933]), who seems to suggest that Jesus died on Nisan 14 and thus was being portrayed as the Passover lamb.

67 See Lev. Rab. 15.2 on Lev. 13:2. Commentators disagree as to whether or not the present reference is intended to counter incipient Docetism, which denied Jesus' full humanity at his death. Some consider this unlikely (Ridderbos [1997: 620], who thinks that the present passage is simply designed to further support the reliability and eyewitness nature of the account; R. Brown 1970: 949–52), while a majority favors such a polemic purpose (e.g., Carson [1991: 623], who sees this verse as the “counterpoint” to 1:14; Barrett 1978: 556; Morris 1995: 724; Beasley-Murray 1999: 356; Borchert 2002: 276–77; Burge 2000: 532).

75 So R. Brown 1970: 952–53; Moloney 1998: 509. Beasley-Murray (1999: 355) suggests that the source of the Fourth Gospel was alluding to Passover typology, while the evangelist is alluding to the righteous sufferer of Ps. 34. Somewhat ironically, Barrett (1978: 558) proposes the exact converse: the source is alluding to the Psalms typology, while the evangelist is alluding to Passover typology. Ridderbos (1997: 622–23) opts for the Psalms typology but denies the Passover allusion.

76 R. Brown (1970: 939) conjectures that Pilate's releasing the body to Joseph suggests that he was not an overt disciple of Jesus, because the Roman governor would not have done this for an ardent follower of Jesus. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 625, reacting against Martyn), who claims that Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus are symbolic of the “true Israel.”

87 Carson (1991: 631 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 959]) suggests that by mentioning that no one had previously been placed in the tomb, the evangelist intends to help the reader realize that only one person was in the tomb and that only that same person could have been resurrected three days later. This may find support in the emphatic way in which this is stated in the original Greek: οὐδέπω οὐδέις (oudepō oudeis, no one ever before) (Morris 1995: 730 n. 115). Matthew 27:60 indicates that this was Joseph of Arimathea's “own new tomb, which he had cut in the rock.”

1 On the structure of John 20, see the discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 3.301–2. See also Beasley-Murray 1999: 367–70; Moloney 1998: 517; Borchert 2002: 289; R. Brown 1970: 995–96. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.321) considers 20:11–18 to be a “prelude” to 20:19–29. Borchert (2002: 289–90, 296) perceives in 20:1–18 an “envelope effect or sandwich pattern” whereby the narratives involving Mary have been framed around 20:3–10, with the statement about the beloved disciple in 20:8 serving as the focal point of this chapter. Moloney (1998: 515–16) finds an inclusio between 1:35–51 and chapter 20.

1 For a discussion of this pericope's relationship to the Synoptics, see Ridderbos 1997: 629–30 (see also Morris 1995: 732; R. Brown 1970: 996). Ridderbos (1997: 630–31) also defends the historicity of the event over against Bultmann (1971: 685), who denies historicity and takes an allegorical approach. On historical questions surrounding the Johannine account of Jesus' resurrection and appearances, see also Keener 2003: 1167–78.

2 Cf. Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; cf. 1 Cor. 15:4; see Carson 1991: 635. The expression “on the first day of the week” reads more literally, “on one of the Sabbath [week]” and may allude to the week of creation (cf. Gen. Rab. 11.9 on Gen. 2:3). Morris (1991: 733 n. 7 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. a]) notes that σαββάτων (sabbatōn) can mean either “Sabbath” or “week” (contra R. Brown [1970: 980], who claims that the meaning “week” emerged only later). The use of the cardinal numeral (“one”) for the ordinal (“first”) may represent a Semitism (Barrett 1978: 562; cf. Morris 1995: 733 n. 6; Beasley-Murray 1999: 366; Moloney 1998: 521; Lindars 1972: 599).

3 Often, though not always, in John, darkness connotes evil or unbelief (see 1:5; 8:12; 9:4; 11:10; 12:35, 46; 13:30). It is not clear that it does so here (contra Maccini 1996: 208; Carson 1991: 635–36; Borchert 2002: 291; R. Brown 1970: 981; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.308; Moloney 1998: 518).

12 Carson (1991: 636) rightly notes that Mary's use of κύριος (kyrios, lord, master) here does not constitute a christological confession and that she simply spoke “better than she knew” (cf. Moloney 1998: 521; contra R. Brown 1970: 984).

14 Cf. Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:1; Luke 24:10. See R. Brown 1970: 984. Contra Bultmann (1971: 684 n. 1), who suggests that the term is an Oriental idiom. Also contra Moloney (1998: 518–19), who claims that the term suggests that Mary is being associated with the two disciples.

17 This is disputed by Brodie (1993: 561), who says that the beloved disciple is “in better running order,” which he takes to be symbolic of superior discipleship (though on p. 564 he sees both disciples as symbolic of the unity achieved through faith in the ascending Christ). Beasley-Murray (1999: 371–72) contends that the beloved disciple's speed was due to the extent of his love for Jesus; Moloney (1998: 522) suggests that he had stronger faith that a miracle had occurred. Yet others have seen in this statement an affirmation of John's superiority over Peter (e.g., Schnackenburg 1990: 3.310, 312; Moloney 1998: 520; R. Brown 1970: 1004–7). More likely, however, both the beloved disciple and Peter are presented here as a duo of eyewitnesses to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 632; Carson 1991: 636–37; Bultmann 1971: 684).

21 Carson (1991: 637) denies that the burial cloths still retained the shape of Jesus' body (cf. Morris 1995: 735; Beasley-Murray 1999: 372; R. Brown 1970: 1007–8). But Whitacre (1999: 473) says, “With the body gone, the clothes were presumably collapsed, though perhaps retaining much of their shape due to the spices.”

24 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 638; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Borchert 2002: 295; R. Brown 1970: 987; Bultmann 1971: 684; Burge 2000: 554; Laney 1992: 360. Witherington (1995: 325) suggests, less plausibly, that the beloved disciple believed that Jesus had been taken by God similar to Elijah. Morris (1995: 736) notes that the two verbs do not have explicit objects, supplying the graveclothes as the object of the beloved disciple's “seeing” and Jesus' resurrection as that of the disciple's “believing” (albeit without understanding its full theological significance). Hardly plausible is the suggestion by Minear (1983: 91 n. 14, with reference to 1976 [followed by Conway 1999: 189–90]) that what the disciples believed was the statement of Mary Magdalene in 20:2.

27 This is inadequately recognized by those who see in the “disciple Jesus loved” a model disciple par excellence. See Ridderbos 1997: 633; Whitacre 1999: 474; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; R. Brown 1970: 1005; Borchert 2002: 295.

11 Similar recognition scenes are found in stories of Greco-Roman gods walking among people (Dibelius 1918 [cited in R. Brown 1970: 1008–9]).

14 Commentators are not agreed as to whether Mary had already touched Jesus or was about to do so. Some say that Mary had already touched him (e.g., Morris 1995: 742; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.318; Witherington 1995: 331; R. Brown 1970: 992; Burge 2000: 555), while others seem to allow for the possibility that she was about to but had not yet done so (e.g., Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. g, 376; Bultmann 1971: 687). Regarding Mary’s devotion, see Ruth 1:16. Stibbe (1993: 205) says that the present passage is “most stylized” and detects intertextual echoes with Song 3:1–3.

18 R. Brown (1970: 1012, 1015–16) relates Jesus’ words to Mary with his promised giving of the Spirit. In 14:18–19, Jesus promised that he would return to his disciples. On the basis of these words, Mary may have thought that Jesus had returned and would continue their former relationship on a permanent basis. Jesus corrects her misunderstanding in the present passage by showing that this permanent relationship would be established by the giving of the Spirit (see Burge 2000: 556–57, with further reference to the “not yet” in 7:39).

1 Note also the connective οὐν, oun (R. Brown 1970: 1019). The suggestion by Borchert (2002: 303) that the darkness of the evening corresponds to the darkness of the disciples’ understanding is of doubtful relevance.

2 Cf. Luke 24:33. Barrett (1978: 568) contends that it is impossible to know the extent of the gathering but that even if only “the ten” were present, they are still representative of the entire church. Morris (1995: 745) and R. Brown (1970: 1022, 1034) favor a larger group beyond the apostles including also other disciples (contra Carson 1991: 646, 656).

9 See Carson 1991: 656; R. Brown 1970: 1022; Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. i.

13 The vast majority of the instances of “sending” in John’s Gospel relate to Jesus’ having been sent by the Father. “Sending” terminology also occurs with regard to God’s sending of the Baptist, the Father’s and the Son’s sending of the Spirit, and Jesus’ sending of his disciples. The present passage features two “sending” verbs, πέμπω (pempō) and ἀποστέλλω (apostellō), with no apparent difference in meaning (as is the virtual consensus among major commentators, including Ridderbos, Morris, Carson, Barrett, Schnackenburg, and R. Brown; see also Köstenberger 1999c: 125–43). Morris (1995: 746 n. 56) notes that this is already suggested by the use of καθώς (kathōs, just as) linking the two verbs.

16 The critique by Hatina (1993), who says that the reference is to the indwelling Paraclete, fails to convince. Contrary to the view of many commentators, the present pericope does not constitute the Johannine equivalent to Pentecost (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1038; Barrett [1978: 570], who says that the present passage cannot be harmonized with Acts 2; Bultmann 1971: 691), nor is Calvin’s (1961: 205) proposal satisfactory that at 20:22 the disciples “were only sprinkled with His grace and not [as at Pentecost] saturated with full power.” Beasley-Murray (1999: 382 [followed by Borchert 2002: 307–8]) believes that John telescoped the giving of the Spirit without concern for chronology (citing the reference to the ascension in 20:17 as a parallel). M. Turner (1977) thinks that the reference is not to the Spirit at all but to Jesus’ message as Spirit and life. The treatment by Moloney (1998: 532, 535) is rather idiosyncratic. Schnackenburg

(1990: 3.325), too, surprisingly contends that the Johannine instance involves all believers, while the events in Acts 2 pertain to the apostles. If anything, one might have expected the opposite kind of reasoning, with John's account anticipating the general outpouring narrated in Acts 2. Against the view of Burge (2000: 558 [cf. Burge 1987: 148–49]), who notes the connection between the present passage and Jesus' promise to send the Spirit in John 14 and 16, the present event does not mark the actual fulfillment of these promises other than by way of anticipatory sign. Keener's (2003: 1196–1200, see also 1204–6) discussion, including an attempted refutation of M. Turner (1998), remains inconclusive and, on the whole, fails to convince.

20 This "new creation" theme is noted by several commentators, including Morris 1995: 747 n. 58 (who also cites Ezek. 37:9); Barrett 1978: 570; R. Brown 1970: 1035, 1037; Witherington 1995: 342; Keener 2003: 1204. Whitacre (1999: 482) speaks of the event in John 20:22 as the church's "conception," and of Pentecost as its "birth."

1 The present unit is introduced by δέ (de, and, but), perhaps creating a contrast between Thomas and the disciples in the previous narrative (Moloney 1998: 538). The existence of the Twelve is in this Gospel presupposed rather than explicitly narrated (see commentary at 6:67; see also the brief excursus in Borchert 2002: 311). The reference to Thomas's designation "the twin" hardly constitutes an allusion to his double-mindedness (so, rightly, Borchert 2002: 312; cf. R. Brown 1970: 1024; Bultmann 1971: 694 n. 2). Lee (1995: 43, citing Robert Alter) notes that "absence is a favourite literary device of this narrator."

6 So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 647) and most major commentators (e.g., Morris 1995: 753; Witherington 1995: 344; Carson 1991: 657; Moloney 1998: 537; Barrett 1978: 572; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.332; contra Borchert 2002: 314; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

14 So, rightly, the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 197: 648; Morris 1995: 754; Carson 1991: 659; Beasley-Murray 1999: 386; Burge 2000: 563; Barrett 1978: 573; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.334; contra Borchert 2002: 316; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

10 Carson's (1991: 666) comments are particularly insightful: "But as in a 'whodunit' where all the pieces have finally come together ... , there remains certain authorial discretion: the book may end abruptly ... or it may wind down through a postscript that tells what happens to the characters, especially if what happens to them sheds a certain light backward onto the principal plot of the work." Contra Barrett (1978: 577), who expresses doubt that an author would spoil the effect of the commissioning in 20:21–23 by representing the disciples thereafter as returning to their former employment and as at first being unable to recognize their Lord; and R. Brown (1970: 1078) who attributes chapter 21 to a later redactor.

1 Perhaps the gloss is added with a view toward the Gospel's Greek-speaking readership, though there is no reason why this should be relegated to the redactional (rather than authorial) level (contra R. Brown 1970: 1067; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.351; Witherington 1995: 405).

8 The definite article with πλοῖον (ploion, boat) may imply that "this is the boat habitually used for fishing" (R. Brown 1970: 1069).

14 Barrett (1978: 579) and R. Brown (1970: 1070) have difficulty accommodating this statement within a unified authorial framework. The former finds it hard to fathom the disciples' failing to recognize Jesus, on the assumption that they had seen him twice since the resurrection. The latter uses the opportunity to reaffirm his belief that the present pericope represents Jesus' first resurrection appearance rather than a later incident.

19 In that sense, but only in that sense, R. Brown is right in seeing parallels between the present incident and Luke 5. Regarding the interpretation taken here, compare especially Ridderbos 1997: 660, though he sees more overt symbolism in the present pericope than I do.

23 Note the translation by R. Brown (1970: 1066): “Simon Peter tucked in his outer garment (for he was otherwise naked).” Similarly, Morris (1995: 763) contends “that here the word means that parts of the body normally covered were exposed, so that Peter was not naked but rather ‘stripped for work.’”

30 For example, R. Brown (1970: 1097), who interprets the full net allegorically as the absence of schism in the Christian community; Bultmann (1971: 709), who speaks of the “indestructible unity of the Church”; Michaels (1989: 354–55), who contends that the full net indicates the successful completion of Jesus’ mission; and Talbert (1992: 260), who says that the 153 fish symbolize the universal outreach of the church. For a virtually exhaustive list of interpretations of the number 153, no matter how implausible, see Keener (2003: 1231–33). He properly concludes that “the number could simply stem from an accurate memory of a careful count on the occasion, because fish had to be counted to be divided among fishermen.” Keener (2003: 1233) also notes that 153 fish may be no more symbolic than Peter swimming 100 yards in 21:8.

32 So, for example, R. Brown (1970: 1076), who sees the origin of the number in authentic eyewitness, citing 21:24. Note also the presence of the sons of Zebedee, according to 21:2. Large numbers elsewhere in John are meant literally as well (e.g., 2:6; 12:3); Schlatter (1948: 368) notes that the large number of fish caught points to Jesus’ generous, abundant provision, citing 2:6; 6:13. More questionable are Burge’s (2000: 586) reference to 153 being “numerically important” for “Greek mathematicians” and Bultmann’s (1971: 709) assertion that the number is allegorical “since it is not a round number.” For proper cautions against allegorical interpretations, see Ridderbos 1997: 663.

33 The unbroken net frequently is interpreted symbolically as conveying the preservation of all that is caught (Ridderbos 197: 663, adducing 6:12; Witherington 1995: 355; Michaels 1989: 354–55), or the limitless number of Christian converts (Carson 1991: 673, following Bruce 1983: 401–2), or the unity of the church (Talbert 1992: 260). For surveys, see Carson 1991: 672–73; R. Brown 1970: 1074–76.

34 Witherington (1995: 354) considers this to be “a fellowship meal, a family reunion of a sort” (similarly, Michaels 1989: 356, 358), contra those who would detect the presence of “eucharistic symbolism” (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1098–1100; D. M. Smith 1999: 394; Stibbe 1993: 212; Whitacre 1999: 494). In fact, Beasley-Murray (1999: 404) points out that what is celebrated here is not Jesus’ death but his resurrection, which enabled his followers to enjoy fellowship with their Lord subsequent to his death. He classifies the present meal as “an epiphany celebration of the risen Lord” (following Rissi 1979: 81–86). Schlatter (1948: 369) says that the disciples’ present disposition fulfills 16:23.

3 Though see the disclaimers by R. Brown (1970: 1112–17), who says that Peter’s authority is not absolute, and Schnackenburg (1990: 3.365), who cautions that later Roman Catholic exegesis should not be read into this passage.

3 Barrett (1978: 586) detects in the reference to the beloved disciple as “following” Jesus (and Peter) in 21:20 yet another hint at this disciple’s superiority over Peter: “The beloved disciple was already doing what Peter had just been bidden to do” (yet see the skepticism voiced by R. Brown [1970: 1108]). Schlatter (1948: 372–73) notes how the beloved disciple here, as elsewhere in the Gospel (at his first recorded encounter with Jesus [1:37], at his entry into the high priest's courtyard, and at the cross), is the silent listener.

Brownlee, W. H. 325n13, 327n23, 476n66

Bruce, F. F. 16, 46n85, 50n98, 77, 193n95, 326n16, 411, 429n35, 439n80, 465n6, 584n5,

7 So Barrett 1978: 587; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.371; R. Brown 1970: 1117–19.

13 Noted by Carson 1991: 405. On the relationship between the two Bethanys referred to in John's Gospel, see Brownlee 1972: 167–74. Morris (1995: 477 n. 10) rightly rejects the distinction made between “Bethany” as their present home and “the village” as their place of origin on the basis of the prepositions ἀπό (apo) and ἐκ (ek) in 11:1.

23 In any case, the mere reference to Lazarus as “the one you love” in the present passage hardly warrants the conclusion by Eller (1987), Brownlee (1990: 191–94), and Stibbe (1992: 79–81) that the beloved disciple is Lazarus. See the discussion in Charlesworth 1995: xiii (who advances the hardly more plausible theory that the beloved disciple is the apostle Thomas).

66 For example, 1QH 11:8–12; cf. Rev. 12:2–5. See Brownlee 1956–57: esp. 29.

85 See also Bultmann 1971: 78; Lindars 1972: 97; Bruce 1983: 43; Beasley-Murray 1999: 15; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.275–76.

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

95 See John 1:45; 2:22; 3:10; 5:45–47; 12:41; 20:9; cf. Luke 24:27, 44–45; and Matthew's “fulfillment quotations.” See Bruce 1978: 35–53.

16 See Clermont-Ganneau 1874; Kraeling 1946 [cited in Bruce 1983: 253 n. 1]; Avi-Yonah 1964: 146.

35 For a comprehensive treatment and critique of religious pluralism within the larger framework of postmodernism, see especially Carson 1996. See also Carson's comments in his commentary (1991: 491–92) and his important rebuttal of Bruce (1983: 298–99 [picked up Beasley-Murray 1999: 253]), who alleges that “Jesus' claim, understood in the light of the prologue to the Gospel, is inclusive, not exclusive.” On the exclusivism of 14:6, see also Keener 2003: 941–43.

80 See Morris (1995: 579), who says that “if this is accepted it must be in the sense of 20:22, where the Spirit was in some sense given on the day of resurrection”; and Bruce (1983: 303), who points out that the resurrection appearances were but brief and temporary. See also Barrett (1978: 464), who maintains that the primary reference is to the resurrection but the expression also extends to the presence of Christ in his disciples (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 258). In the patristic period, the Eastern church fathers understood the phrase “in a little while” to refer to the resurrection, while the Latin church thought that Jesus meant the parousia. Bultmann (1971: 619) contends that John's source referred to the latter, with the evangelist demythologizing his source by reinterpreting it as the former. Hence, the second coming is swallowed up in Easter. However, this reconstruction is predicated upon Bultmann's source theory regarding John's Gospel as well as upon his existential approach to interpretation, including the categories of "myth" and "demythologization." Yet note how even after his resurrection, Jesus refers to a future time at which he will return (21:22, 23). Moloney (1998: 403) implausibly contends that "that day" is Jesus' hour and departure.

6 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 525–26, with reference to 17:20, the NIV, and many major commentators (e.g., Barrett 1978: 480; Bultmann 1971: 549; Lindars 1970: 494; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.115; Bruce 1980: 313; contra Borchert 2002: 156; Dodd 1963: 409; R. Brown 1970: 687; and the NLT). See the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 275; Carson 1991: 525–26.

5 So Ridderbos (1997: 656), who states, "There is much that argues for ascribing the majority of ch. 21 to the Evangelist, as the completion of his narrative, albeit as a striking ... addition to a provisionally concluded whole." Among the tie-ins between chapters 21 and 1–20, Ridderbos cites 21:1, 14 (referring back to the preceding resurrection account, in which Peter and the beloved disciple are linked) and the connection between Peter's reinstatement in 21:15–23 and 13:38/18:16ff. According to Ridderbos (1997: 658), the chapter "was added to describe the passage from Jesus' work on earth to its continuation through his disciples." Keener (2003: 1219–22), too, makes a strong case for the literary unity of John 21 as a chapter and as an integral part of the entire Gospel. He notes that, apart from special vocabulary needed for the matters at hand (such as fishing terminology), chapter 21 does not differ significantly from the rest of the Gospel. Keener (2003: 1219, citing Bruce 1983: 398) lists the following commonalities: the variation of synonymous terms in 21:15–17; the double ἀμήν (21:18); the construction "This he said, indicating" (21:19; cf. 12:33); and the reference to the Sea of Tiberias (21:1; cf. 6:1). Contra, for example, Dodd (1953: 290), who claims that chapter 21 "falls outside the design of the book as a whole" (cited in Minear 1983: 87 n. 11).

7 This, incidentally, is yet another argument against reading 20:22 as indicating an actual impartation of the Spirit at that point. Had they already received the Spirit, it would be almost inexplicable why Peter went back to fishing so soon after that event. So, rightly, Carson (1991: 669–70 [cf. Morris 1995: 760]): "It is impossible to imagine any of this taking place in Acts, after Pentecost ... this is not the portrait of believers who have received the promised Paraclete." Barrett (1978: 579) considers it "unthinkable" that Peter and his fellow disciples "should contemplate a return to their former occupation after the events of chapter 20." Contra Keener (2003: 1227), who argues against negative interpretations of the disciples' return to fishing in 21:3, saying that the disciples simply made use of free time (citing Bruce 1983: 399). Keener also cites Beasley-Murray's (1999: 399) contention that, even though Jesus had risen from the dead, the disciples must still eat.

33 The unbroken net frequently is interpreted symbolically as conveying the preservation of all that is caught (Ridderbos 197: 663, adducing 6:12; Witherington 1995: 355; Michaels 1989: 354–55), or the limitless number of Christian converts (Carson 1991: 673, following Bruce 1983: 401–2), or the unity of the church (Talbert 1992: 260). For surveys, see Carson 1991: 672–73; R. Brown 1970: 1074–76.

15 The most natural way to take the participle ὁ γράψας (ho grapsas, the one who wrote) is to

Bruns, J. E. 481n84
Bryan, S. M. 14n24
Bucer, M. 499n78
Buchanan, G. W. 111n37
Büchsel, F. 576n23
Buehler, W. W. 199n2
Bultmann, R. xii, 2, 3, 17n27, 17n28, 19n4, 22n14, 26n20, 27n22, 28, 29, 29n32, 31, 36, see it as affirming that the evangelist himself wrote the Gospel. See the important critique of amanuensis theories formed on the basis of a suggested parallel with 19:19 (where Pilate caused things to be written down rather than writing them down himself) in Carson 1991: 685 (with reference to Bruce 1983: 3). As Carson points out, it is especially dubious to construe an amanuensis theory on the basis of later disciples writing down material on behalf of their deceased master.

84 This is the only instance of the term νικάω (nikaō, triumph) in John's Gospel. The expression occurs several times in John's first epistle (2:13, 14; 4:4; 5:4, 5) and over a dozen times in the Book of Revelation (esp. in the letters to the seven churches in chs. 2 and 3; see Schlatter 1948: 317). The related noun νίκη (nikē, victory) occurs in 1 John 5:4. Other NT references to the victory won by Jesus (extended to believers) include John 12:31; Rom. 8:37 (ὑπερνικάω, hypernikaō); 1 Cor. 15:57 (νίκος, nikos). The verb occurs rarely in the OT, with Ps. 50:6 LXX showing God as conqueror (cited in Rom. 3:4). It is also found in apocryphal and pseudepigraphical literature (see Wis. 4:2; 16:10; 18:22; 1 Esdr. 3:12). Bruns (1967) contends that John's portrayal of Jesus as victor echoes the pagan myth of Herakles, the conqueror of death and evil.

24 On Jesus as the replacement and fulfillment of the temple in John's Gospel, see especially Coloe 2001; Johnson 2001; Hoskins 2002; and Kerr 2002. For a treatment that links this Johannine motif with the composition of the Fourth Gospel, see Motyer 1997 and Köstenberger forthcoming. On Jesus and Israel's traditions of judgment and restoration, see Bryan 2002.

78 Lindars (1972: 530) asserts, "A disunited Christian community denies by its behaviour the message which it proclaims." For an interesting example of the use of John 17 in church history, see Payton 1992: 26–38 on Martin Bucer's 1531 sermon on John 17 in the context of the Reformation controversy regarding the Eucharist. Bucer reminded his listeners that Jesus himself is the one praying, and God alone is all-knowing.

37 A third possibility (held by only a few) is that there was only one clearing, at the beginning of Jesus' ministry, and John got it right (J. A. T. Robinson 1985: 127–31; Campbell 1982: 117). Finally, fourth, Buchanan (1991: 284) says, "Jesus never cleansed the temple at all but instead this event had been attributed to him from the necessity of the doctrines and messianic expectations" (cited in Ådna 2000: 21 n. 67).

23 See Schlatter 1959: 511; Beasley-Murray 1999: 383; Borchert 2002: 310. The rabbis used the terms "binding" and "loosing" to declare what was forbidden or permitted by the law. See Str-B 1:738–41; Büchsel, TDNT 2:60–61; J. Lightfoot 1859: 2.237–41; Dalman 1902: 213–17.

2 Another explanation for the name is the proximity of the nearby town Tell el-Oreimeth, which was lyrelike in shape. See Buehler, ISBE 2:391–92. For general information, see Riesner, DJG 37.

27 See the introduction above. There is no good reason to believe that John's Gospel itself is based on a gnostic Vorlage, as Bultmann (1971: 25–31, and passim) held, or that it reflects

Docetism and was erroneously included in the canon (the view of Käsemann 1968: 76–77 [cited in Sloyan 1996: 127, 129–30]).

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon's work is given extensive coverage in Origen's commentary on John's Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John's Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάραξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that “the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel's] use”; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges “the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

4 Culpepper (1980–81: 1) quotes Barrett (1971: 27): “The Prologue is ... one piece of solid theological writing. The evangelist wrote it all” (cf. Barrett 1975a: 20–35). Keener (2003: 333–34) maintains that the prologue is an original part of the Gospel, probably added by the author (the apostle John) after completing the first draft of the Gospel. According to Keener (2003: 333–34), ancient writers commonly introduced the main themes at the beginning of their work (see Keener 2003: 334 n. 10 for examples). Bultmann believed that the prologue originated as a pre-Christian gnostic hymn that stemmed from Baptist circles and was taken over and adapted by the Fourth Evangelist (Bultmann 1923: 4; summarized by Ashton 1986: 161). Valentine (1996), in contrast to many other Johannine scholars, argues that the prologue is an organic part of the book, a genuine preface intended to preview important theological themes, rather than a mere afterthought or postscript written after the body of the Gospel had been completed. E. Harris (1994: 26) contends that the prologue “was from the first the construction of the evangelist himself.” See the survey in MacLeod 2003: 49–52.

14 Haenchen (1984: 1.117) holds that 1:6–8 represents a rather clumsy insertion into the original hymn. Bultmann (1971: 49) believes that the material is inserted to counter veneration of John the Baptist (cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.249–50). Ridderbos (1997: 42) ardently defends the prologue's unity. Moloney (1998: 37) notes that 1:6–8 is essential to the prologue in its current form.

20 For a more thorough discussion, see E. Miller (1993: 448–49), who lists as many as nine different theories: (1) the OT dbar; (2) Wisdom (R. Harris 1917); (3) Greek philosophy (Stoicism); (4) Philo (Evans 1993: 100–145; Tobin 1990); (5) the Aramaic mmr (Hayward 1978); (6) rabbinic speculation on the Torah; (7) gnostic sources, such as the Hermetic literature, especially Poimandres (Pagels 1999); (8) the Hellenistic-gnostic redeemer myth, Mandeans, and the Odes of Solomon (Bultmann 1923; 1973; 1971); and (9) the breaking of divine silence (Jeremias). Some, such as Epp (1975), combine two or more of the above (in Epp's case, Wisdom and Torah). Miller himself (1993: 452), building on his earlier work (1989), advances the thesis that the uses of λόγος in the Gospel proper, while not a christological title, are invested “with a certain christological transparency” (B. Reicke's term). Thus, startlingly, Miller, who believes that the prologue was written not only after the Gospel proper, but even after John's first epistle, finds the origin of the prologue's λόγος in the Fourth Gospel itself: "The one of whom it was said in John 7:46, 'Never has a man spoken like this!' eventually came to be called, appropriately, 'the Word.'" I find this thesis entirely unconvincing (Miller [1999] attempts to make the same case for ἀρχή). It is quite a tour de force to brush aside the massive OT substructure pervading the entire prologue. Not surprisingly, Miller's thesis has found few followers.

22 Moloney (1998: 35) says that πρὸς connotes motion, not just "with," and translates it "turned toward." Yet any force of motion inherent in πρὸς is overridden by the stative verb (Wallace 1996: 358–59; Schnackenburg [1990: 1.234] also rejects the idea). Lindars (1972: 84) proposes "in company with," while Westcott (1908: 1.6) writes, "The personal being of the Word was realised in active intercourse with and in perfect communion with God." Bultmann (1971: 32–33) suggests that ἢν πρὸς is a Semitism equivalent to παρά plus the dative.

32 Note the comment on this alternative by Metzger (1994: 168): "whatever that may be supposed to mean." In Metzger's dissenting opinion (the majority of the UBS translation committee favors taking the phrase with what follows) he states, "Despite valiant attempts of commentators to bring sense out of taking ὃ γέγονεν with what follows, the passage remains intolerably clumsy and opaque" (similarly, Schnackenburg, cited by Ashton 1986: 172). Among the major translations, only the NRSV prefers this alternative. Commentators who advocate this option are R. Brown (1966: 6–7), Bultmann (1971: 39–40, esp. n. 4), Beasley-Murray (1999: 1–2, esp. n. a), and Whitacre (1999: 52). See also E. Miller (1989), who integrates his belief that the phrase is to be taken with what follows into his larger thesis that 1:1a–b and 1:3–5 constitute a christological hymn in four strophes extolling the salvation-historical activity of the Word (he considers 1:1c and 1:2 to be interpolations). Brodie (1993: 138), because of the lack of punctuation, sees the text as inherently ambiguous and as being "part of a careful literary strategy" designed to focus on "the continuity between creation and the incarnation, between creation and redemption."

54 This is the view of, among others, Carson 1991: 125; Dodd 1953: 402; R. Brown 1966: 10; Morris 1995: 85; Borchert 1996: 114; Burge 2000: 59. For a demonstration that 1:11, properly interpreted and understood (particularly the world as God's property), refutes the notion, advanced by Bultmann, that John reflects gnostic thought, see Jervell 1956: 17–18. But see also the interaction with Jervell in Pryor 1990: 210–14.

55 Pryor (1990: 217) contends that "his own" here is "not a status term but a relational one," referring to the Jews as Jesus' "own kinsfolk," "his own people according to the flesh," "the people of his homeland," but that "nothing in the verse is implied of Israel as God's covenant people." For Pryor, 1:11 is thus equivalent to 4:44. But surely this dichotomy is unnecessary: consider the parallelism between 1:11 and 13:1 and the salvation-historical references pervading the prologue (e.g., tabernacle in 1:14, giving of the law through Moses in 1:17). On a different note, "did not recognize" in 1:10 and "did not receive" in 1:11 are equivalent in meaning (Bultmann 1971: 56), a Semitism (cf. "did receive" in 1:12; see Bultmann 1971: 57 n. 2).

60 Some identify "children of God," not "those who believe," as the antecedent of the relative clause beginning 1:13 in order not to make faith follow regeneration (Bultmann 1971: 59 nn. 4–5). However, this is both syntactically awkward and implausible, as well as theologically unnecessary. In the Greek syntax, "those who believe" immediately precedes the relative clause and is thus most naturally taken as the antecedent, and the relationship between faith and rebirth is not easily reduced to a set sequential formula. The statement in 1 John 5:1, “Everyone who believes that Jesus is the Christ is born of God,” allows one to deduce from a person’s belief that person’s regenerate state; regeneration (being “born of God”) and saving faith thus go together and cannot be separated. Spiritual rebirth takes place at God’s initiative; people are called to faith based on God’s revelation in Christ. John nowhere elaborates on the precise temporal relationship of these two aspects. Here and elsewhere in his Gospel (6:44–45; 10:26; 12:37–40), he affirms both divine sovereignty and human responsibility, and interpreters should do no less (see Carson 1981).

68 R. Brown (1966: 13) contends that “us” refers to humanity, and “we” to the apostolic witness (contra Barrett 1978: 166); Haenchen (1984: 1.119) takes “we” as a reference to the Christian community. Bultmann (1971: 69) unduly dichotomizes and dehistoricizes when he takes “seeing” as the unhistorical sight of faith.

85 See also Bultmann 1971: 78; Lindars 1972: 97; Bruce 1983: 43; Beasley-Murray 1999: 15; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.275–76.

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

12 The emphatic pronoun ἐγώ adds further firmness to the Baptist’s denial (Barrett 1978: 172; Morris 1995: 117; Bultmann 1971: 88). Morris (1995: 117) renders the sense well: “It is not I who am the Christ.”

68 Bultmann’s claim (1971: 100; accepted by Brodie 1993: 160) that “tenth hour” is the “hour of fulfillment” is very questionable. R. Brown (1966: 75) suggests that if the day was Friday, the disciples had to stay until Saturday evening in order to properly observe the Sabbath.

Alternatively, the disciples stayed overnight because of the nature of the desired conversation. If so, this could refer to any day during the week (Morris 1995: 139; cf. Burge 2000: 76).

101 Contra Bultmann 1971: 104; R. Brown 1966: 83, 499–501. Schnackenburg (1990: 1.316) describes Nathanael as “a genuine Israelite,” then states in a footnote—wrongly—that this is an adverbial usage. Other instances of the adverb include 4:42; 6:14, 55 (v.l.); 7:26, 40; 8:31; 17:8.

122 The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. 65, was published in 1998 by the Egypt Exploration Society (see pp. 12–13). Among commentators, “Chosen One of God” is favored by Morris 1995: 134; Carson 1991: 152; Burge 1987: 59–61; 2000: 74; Barrett 1978: 178; R. Brown 1966: 57; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.305. “Son of God” is the reading advocated by Bultmann 1971: 92–93

n. 6; Borchert 1996: 139; Ridderbos 1997: 77; Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. g; Laney 1992: 53 (though all prior to the discovery of P¹⁰⁶). Rodgers (1999: 304) prefers both (“This is the only, the chosen Son of God”), while Michaels (1989: 36) proposes that the Baptist spoke “Chosen One of God” (hence the MS tradition), which the evangelist interpreted as “Son of God.”

24 The LXX reads “has consumed me” (Moloney 1998: 77). Unlike in 2:22 and 12:16, the present reference does not refer to the postresurrection period, but to the actual situation (so Ridderbos 1997: 116; Carson 1991: 180; R. Brown 1966: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.347; Barrett 1978: 198; contra Witherington 1995: 88; Bultmann 1971: 122).

34 Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.344; Barrett 1978: 195; R. Brown 1966: 117; Witherington 1995: 85–86; Borchert 1996: 160; Bultmann 1971: 122; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38–39; Dodd 1963: 162; Lindars 1972: 135–37; Keener 2003: 518–19. Keener contends that it is historically implausible that Jesus would challenge the temple system by overturning tables and yet continue in public ministry for two or three years afterward, sometimes even visiting Jerusalem (though he notes that Jesus faces considerable hostility there when he does). On the contrary, an early temple cleansing accounts well for Jewish hostility toward Jesus early on (5:18), and Jesus’ continuing in ministry for two or three more years is eminently plausible historically in light of Jesus’ pattern of withdrawal (3:22; 6:15; 7:9–10; 8:59; 10:40) and his caution from the very inception of his ministry because his “time” has not yet come (2:4; 7:6). Borchert (1996: 160) contends that two temple clearings are “a historiographic monstrosity that has no basis in the texts of the Gospels.” Kreitzer (1998: 100–101) claims that the evangelist followed the motto “When the details of history no longer serve the functions of the story—discard them.” R. Brown (1966: 118) concludes that Jesus uttered some prophetic saying concerning the destruction of the temple on his first visit but actually cleansed the temple at the end of his ministry. Wallace (1996: 561 n. 20) notes that this would require a crucifixion date of A.D. 33.

3 Contra R. Brown (1966: 160), who suggests that these are actually the words of Jesus removed from their original context. Bultmann (1971: 160 n. 2) contends, without warrant, that these verses originally were located after 3:21.

5 Blomberg (1995: 8), with reference to Dockery (1988), lists five approaches to the present narrative: (1) allegorical (cf. 2 Kings 17:30–31); (2) existential (Bultmann 1971: 175–202); (3) pastoral (Milne 1993: 85–86); (4) salvation-historical (W. Davies 1974; Carson 1993); and (5) intertextual (focusing on OT parallels such as Gen. 24:10–61; 29:1–20; Exod. 2:15b–21) (Neyrey 1979). Acknowledging that all of these approaches capture elements of truth, Blomberg nevertheless finds them wanting and proposes a seven-pronged approach of his own. Stibbe (1993: 68–69) advocates a symbolic reading: “If the woman has had five husbands and is living de facto with a sixth, then Jesus is the seventh man in her life. Since seven is the perfect number in Judaism, the implicit commentary must be that Jesus is the man which she has been waiting for, the man in whose presence she will find wholeness.” In the same vein, Brodie (1993: 217–18) sees this as a betrothal-type scene. See also Dockery (1988: 127–40), who distinguishes between author-, text-, and reader-oriented approaches, and Marshall 1974. R. Lightfoot (1956: 122) detects certain parallels between John 4 and 19.

22 Barrett (1978: 231) suggests the translation “at once” or “without more ado”; Bultmann (1971: 177 n. 4) proposes the simple rendering “so.”

23 So N. Walker 1960 and the vast majority of commentators, including Beasley-Murray 1999:

58 n. e; Witherington 1995: 120; Barrett 1978: 231; Moloney 1998: 116, 121; Bultmann 1971: 178; contra Borchert 1996: 201.

7 So Carson 1991: 234; Ridderbos 1997: 174–75; Morris 1995: 255; Borchert 1996: 219–20; Burge 2000: 152–53; Witherington 1995: 127; contra R. Brown 1966: 193; Barrett 1978: 245; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.471–75; Bultmann 1971: 205.

9 So Mead 1985: 71; Barrett 1978: 245; Witherington 1995: 128; Moloney 1998: 153; Bultmann 1971: 206; but see the cautious assessment by Carson 1991: 234. Morris (1995: 255), somewhat idiosyncratically, suggests that the man was a Jew.

22 The numbering of the two Cana signs has suggested to some the existence of a “signs source” (Bultmann 1971: 206; Fortna 1970; 1989; Whitacre 1999: 116). However, this inference is not a necessary one (Ridderbos 1997: 178; Carson 1991: 178; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; contra Barrett 1978: 246; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.469–71).

1 In light of the apparently abrupt reference to Jesus “crossing to the far shore of the Sea of Galilee” in 6:1 (ch. 5 has him in Jerusalem), it has been speculated that chapters 5 and 6 should be reversed (see Bultmann 1971: 209, 237; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.92); but see Carson 1991: 240; Morris 1995: 264; cf. Barrett 1978: 23–24; Borchert 1996: 250; and especially Ridderbos 1997: 183.

9 See Carson 1991: 240. Bultmann (1971: 240) claims that the festival is Passover, based on his switching the order of John 5 and 6, but this is unlikely, since the evangelist clearly identifies Passover everywhere else in his Gospel. Also unlikely is Michaels’s (1989: 85) theory that the present pericope was transposed from Jesus’ first Passover in Jerusalem (cf. 2:23; 3:2). Many commentators choose to remain agnostic on which feast is in view (Keener 2003: 635), regarding its identity as either unknown (Ridderbos 1997: 184; Morris 1995: 265 n. 6) or of secondary interest (R. Brown 1966: 206), or both (Carson 1991: 241). Calvin (1959: 116) thinks that the feast probably is Pentecost.

36 Some (such as Bultmann [1971: 243]) view 5:14 as being in contradiction with 9:2–3 (see discussion in Ridderbos 1997: 188). Though the ailment in the present passage may be the result of specific personal sin, and that in John 9 may not, however, this merely illustrates that caution must be exercised in individual cases and that sweeping theories must be avoided (cf. Carson 1991: 246; Morris 1995: 272).

45 Ridderbos (1997: 190) speaks of “the continuing position of ‘the Jews’ vis-à-vis Jesus.” Bultmann (1971: 243–44) says that it shows “that the narrator is less interested in the details of the story than in portraying the Jews’ habitual bearing towards the normal (or repeated) activity of Jesus.”

53 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Borchert 1996: 236; Moloney 1998: 174; Bultmann 1971: 245; Morris 1995: 274–75 n. 48 (referring to Odeberg 1968: 203), 277; Barrett 1978: 259; Keener 1999: 42–43. The use of ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, that one) for God “lays stress upon the separate divine Person” in contrast with υἱός (huios, son). Also stressed is the Son’s inability to do anything apart from the Father (again in 5:30; see Moloney 1998: 178; Barrett 1978: 264).

55 Cf. 7:18; 11:51; 15:4; 16:13; 18:34; see Barrett 1978: 259; Bultmann 1971: 249; Carson 1991: 251; Borchert 1996: 237. Just as the Son depends on the Father, so believers can do nothing of eternal significance without Christ (15:5), but they can do all things through him who strengthens them (Phil. 4:13; see commentary at 5:23).

110 So Fee 1982 and the vast majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 185; Carson

238n45, 240n53, p 653 253n6, 257n28, 260, 260n47, 261, 262, 272n101, 274, 275, 275n112, 282, 282n20, 287n47, 288n49, 289n53, 294n81, 295n82, 296, 302n18, 304n32, 1991: 242; Morris 1995: 267; Barrett 1978: 253; R. Brown 1966: 207; Beasley-Murray 1999: 70 n. h; Bultmann 1971: 241 n. 4; Borchert 1996: 232; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94–95.

74 There is no reason to assume, as Bultmann (1971: 218–19) does, that these verses (starting with 6:51c) are the work of an “ecclesiastical redactor.” See also the discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.56–59.

77 John’s use of τρώω (trōgō, chew, eat) in 6:54 may be intended to heighten the vividness of Jesus’ words (Ridderbos 1997: 242 n. 163; cf. Moloney 1998: 221; Bultmann 1971: 236), though it may merely be the evangelist’s preferred verb for “eating” in the present tense (Carson 1991: 296; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 95; Barrett 1978: 299).

45 Cf. 11:50–52. So Beasley-Murray 1999: 112; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.150; Bultmann 1971: 309. Ridderbos (1997: 271–72) thinks that it merely indicates a presumed place of refuge for Jesus. Schlatter (1948: 150) sees in 7:35 not only an objection that Jesus’ departure from Jerusalem would compromise the Jews’ privilege as God’s chosen people but also an acknowledgment of the oppressive superiority of Greek learning, the profundity of the Greeks’ antipathy toward the Jews, and the firmness of religious traditions in Greek-speaking areas.

53 Most commentators favor a time immediately following cessation of ceremonies on the eighth day (Carson 1991: 321; Morris 1995: 373, esp. n. 79; Barrett 1978: 326; Moloney 1998: 256; Schlatter 1948: 199). Some believe that Jesus’ words fit better with the ceremonies of the seventh day (R. Brown 1966: 320; Bultmann 1971: 302 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.152; Ridderbos 1997: 272; Burge 2000: 227). On the water-drawing ceremony, see Keener 2003: 722–24.

6 See Isa. 60:19–22; Zech. 14:5b–8; cf. Rev. 21:23–24. Contemporary Judaism applied the phrase “light of the world” not only to God but also to Israel, Jerusalem, the patriarchs, the Messiah, famous rabbis (e.g., Yohanan ben Zakkai), the Torah, the temple, and even Adam (Keener 1993: 285; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 128; R. Brown 1966: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.190; Moloney 1998: 266). The universality of “light” symbolism in religious language issues in numerous non-Jewish parallels (see Barrett 1978: 335–37; Bultmann 1971: 40–44, 342–43; Dodd 1953: 201–8; Odeberg 1968: 286–92).

28 The preposition ἐν (en) is to be rendered “at,” “near,” or “by,” since not just anyone would have been allowed inside (Ridderbos 1997: 298 n. 137). There may be irony in the location where the Jews manifest their ignorance of Jesus’ true identity (Moloney 1998: 298). There may also be an element of judgment (Bultmann 1971: 283).

47 So the majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 305–6; Carson 1991: 346–47; Morris 1995: 404; Beasley-Murray 1999: 132; D. M. Smith 1999: 185; Borchert 1996: 301 n. 182; Burge 2000: 259; Bultmann 1971: 252 n. 2; contra R. Brown 1966: 354–55, 358; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.204–5; Moloney 1998: 277; Westcott 1908: 2.13–14.

101 So Schnackenburg 1990: 2.222, citing 1 Enoch 61:5; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 13:52. Similarly, Bultmann (1971: 326 n. 2). Brodie (1993: 335) opts for a broader scope, suggesting that “Jesus’ day refers to the way in which, during his entire life, and especially in his death, he was revealed as the Anointed.” Similarly, Whitacre (1999: 230), who says that the expression encompasses Jesus’ “whole advent, ministry, death, resurrection and ascension.”

112 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 126 n. m; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.223; R. Brown 1966: 360; Bultmann 1971: 327 n. 3; contra Burge 2000: 263.

-
- 20 Bultmann (1971: 332 n. 1) finds this problematic and attributes the alleged difficulty to disparate sources; but see the responses by Ridderbos (1997: 334) and Carson (1991: 363).
- 47 Bultmann (1971: 335) states that the authorities “now hit on the idea of questioning the fact of the miracle, as being the easiest way of putting an end to the whole business.” Keener (2003: 786) notes how, incredibly, the Pharisees repeatedly ignore the testimony of the miracle itself, focusing instead on Jesus’ alleged Sabbath violation. On “the Jews,” see commentary at 5:10. Carson (1991: 368) attributes the shift from “Pharisees” to “the Jews” to John’s penchant for stylistic variation. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.249) thinks that the change serves to indicate the “official character” of the inquiry. Duke (1985: 120, following Schnackenburg 1990: 2.248) suggests that the uneasiness of the Pharisees in 9:17–18 “is evident in the abrupt close of scene and their immediate change of tactic in what follows.”
- 49 Duke (1985: 120–21) detects irony in the fact that the parents’ fear of the Jewish authorities sends the interrogators back to the man born blind, whom they had already questioned, yet it was precisely the Jews’ dissatisfaction with that man’s version that had caused them to change their tactic in the first place. This well illustrates not only the authorities’ dilemma but also the cycle of futility in their investigation (cf. Bultmann 1971: 335). Confession of Jesus as Christ was the mark of the early Christians (e.g., Acts 9:22; 18:28; see Hurtado 1988b: 112–13). The phrase “fear of the Jews” occurs in this Gospel also at 7:13; 19:38; 20:19. The expression ἀποσυνάγωγος (apосynagōgos, expelled from the synagogue) occurs in the NT elsewhere only in John 12:42 and 16:2 (there with a future reference). Expulsion from the assembly of the exiles is reported already in Ezra 10:8 (Morris [1995: 434 n. 36], who also refers to Exod. 31:14).
- 53 Ridderbos 1997: 343; similarly, Morris 1995: 434 n. 36; contra Barrett 1978: 361; R. Brown 1966: 380; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.250; Bultmann 1971: 335.
- 81 Ridderbos 1997: 348; Bultmann 1971: 339 n. 1. On the phrase “he is the one speaking with you,” see 4:26.
- 82 Borchert (1996: 325) relates the present reference to 20:28 and believes that this confession is a high point in the festival cycle. The man’s response to Jesus’ self-revelation is in keeping with the standard OT reaction to theophany (e.g., Gen. 17:3). However, it is possible that the man’s actions, while being “beyond that due to other men,” fall “short of that due to God Almighty” (Beasley-Murray 1999: 160; similarly, Carson 1991: 377). Nevertheless, the majority of commentators favor a fuller sense of worship (Barrett 1978: 365; R. Brown 1966: 376; Bultmann 1971: 339 n. 3; Morris 1995: 440; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.254).
- 18 Stibbe (1993: 113) characterizes παροιμία as “a symbolic word-picture with a cryptic meaning ... essentially elusive discourse.” Morris (1995: 445) suggests that this is a rather unique form of allegory. Ridderbos (1997: 355 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 168]) opts for a parable with allegorical elements (cf. 10:7–9). Bultmann (1971: 375) describes the genre as a mixture between parable and riddle. See Köstenberger 2002b: 72–75. See also the long discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.284–88.
- 32 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.294) proposes a translation “right” or “true.” Similarly, Borchert (1996: 333) suggests that the meaning of καλός is similar to that of ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) (cf. Moloney 1998: 310; Bultmann 1971: 364). Carson (1991: 386) contends that the “good shepherd” should be thought of as “noble or worthy” but not “sentimental or effeminate.” Lindars (1972: 361) favors the rendering “an ideal shepherd.”
- 46 Note the present tense ἔχω (echō, I have), which points to Christ’s current possession of these sheep despite their absence from the fold (Morris 1995: 455). There is no basis for the supposition by some (e.g., Bultmann 1971: 383) that 10:16 represents a later addition (see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.299; ambivalent is Ridderbos 1997: 362). As a study of the Johannine mission theme makes clear (not to mention the mission theme in the other Gospels), this passage, far from representing an isolated reference to Jesus' anticipation of a future (Gentile) mission, coheres with a repeated and consistent emphasis on the extension of the scope of God's salvation beyond the boundaries of national Israel to the other nations (e.g., Matt. 28:19; Acts 1:8). See Köstenberger 1998b; Köstenberger and O'Brien 2001: 73–127, 203–26.

61 Cf. 18:18: “it was cold.” If so, he is referring to the Jews' “chilling response” to Jesus (Hengel 1999: 319). See also Borchert 1996: 337. Contra Ridderbos 1997: 368; Carson 1991: 391–92. Stibbe (1993: 116) comments that the “sense of impending doom in 10.1–21 is heightened by the atmospheric statement of the narrator in v. 22.” Bultmann (1971: 361) suggests that the reference to the season serves to indicate that “the end is near,” as the “seasons of the year reflect the progress of the revelation.”

63 More literally, the Greek may be rendered “take away our life” (Ridderbos 1997: 368 n. 358). This translation is favored also by Morris (1995: 461, with reference to the same verb, αἶρω [airō, take away], in 10:18), who believes that the Jews are suggesting that Jesus is attempting to destroy Judaism. But in 10:18, αἶρω means “take up,” not “take away.” Bultmann (1971: 361 n. 5) thinks that this is “scarcely credible” and adduces the parallel expression in Josephus, Ant. 3.2.3 §48: οἱ δ' ἦσαν ἐπὶ τὸν κίνδυνον τὰς ψυχὰς ἡρμέντοι (LCL translation: “hearts elated”). R. Brown (1966: 403) proposes that Jesus is creating a pun on the word ψυχή (psychē, life), using it both with reference to Jesus' giving his life for his sheep and, ironically, to refer to Jesus' “taking away the life” of those who refuse to acknowledge him. In light of the fact that John's Gospel is laden with irony, this is possible but hard to verify.

66 Borchert (1996: 338) suggests that the evangelist is relating Jesus' revelation by way of παροιμία (paroimia, illustration [10:6]) with the Jews' demand for παρρησία (parrēsia, frankness)—a possible play on words. Bultmann (1971: 361 n. 6), too, sees a contrast between these two terms (with reference to 16:25, 29; Mark 8:32).

45 See Larsen 2001: 215–20; Zahn 1921: 482 (called “a bizarre idea” by Bultmann [1971: 400 n. 6]); acknowledged as grammatically possible but rejected by Michaels (1989: 199).

48 For Witherington (1995: 202), Thomas's comment “sounds more like fatalistic resignation to what seemed inevitable” (I would agree). Bultmann (1971: 400) speaks of “blind devotion” (with reference to 14:5 and 20:24–25); the exact same term is picked up by Beasley-Murray (1999: 189), who also notes the veiled irony in Thomas's statement. Stibbe (1993: 125) says that Thomas's comment “reveals an element of misunderstanding,” manifesting “naiveté at best, insincerity at worst.”

68 Morris (1995: 489) and Carson (1991: 413) note the one article tying closely together “everyone who lives and believes.” Οὐ μὴ ... εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (ou mē ... eis ton aiōna) is an emphatic negative: “never, ever” (plus subjunctive; see Wallace 1996: 468). In the question “Do you believe this?” the verb πιστεύω (pisteuō, believe) is followed by the accusative, which is unique in this Gospel (Bultmann 1971: 404 n. 1; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.332).

69 Ridderbos (1997: 396) persuasively argues that 11:25b refers to “death in the natural sense and to living in the sense of eternal life,” while “lives” in 11:26a “refers to natural human existence, while ‘never die’ refers to the eternal life that natural death can neither prevent nor affect” (so also Bultmann 1971: 403, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.331; Stibbe 1994: 51). Contra

Carson (1991: 413), R. Brown (1966: 425), and Borchert (1996: 356) (also Calvin and Schlatter), who maintain that “lives” in 11:26a refers to eternal life. Wuellner (1991: 182) calls the present statement an oxymoron.

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, “The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death.” See also Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999: 289. The mourners’ unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999: 192–93), several of whom adduce Paul’s statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus’ anger is directed toward both “the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow” and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus’ anger as occasioned by Mary’s turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either “misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition,” to mean “moved in spirit.” Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus’ struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, “He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself” (11:38 is translated “bearing the rebuke within himself”). According to Story, at the sight of people’s grief, Jesus was overcome by “momentary self-regret,” thinking, “Why did I not come sooner ... ? I have only myself to blame. ... Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?” However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

152 Schwank (1977) helpfully points out that in the final analysis, the reason for the mention of Ephraim in 11:54 is most likely the Fourth Evangelist’s conviction that Jesus did in fact withdraw to this location at this juncture of his ministry, whether or not this served the purpose of geographical symbolism or other theological purposes (cf. Olsson 1974: 28 [cited in Schwank 1977: 380]). He rejects the view of Bultmann (1971: 412 n. 3) that the reference is merely “schematic” (i.e., literary but not historical in nature) and also the contention by Kundsinn (1925: 49–50) that the evangelist chose the name because the location was significant for Christians at the end of the first century (unsupported by evidence, as is admitted by Kundsinn [p. 49]; see the discussions in Katz 1997: 131 n. 7; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.351).

5 See Köstenberger 2001b: 49–63. Ridderbos (1997: 413 [cf. Burge 2000: 336]) rightly contends that Mary is not the woman described in Luke 7 (though he perceives some degree of dependence on Mark 14:3–9 = Matt. 26:6–13). This view is rather common, though not universally so. Contra Holst (1976: 435–46), who on form-critical grounds believes that there is only one underlying historical event and that “variations arose in the course of oral transmission” (citing Dodd 1963: 172; other proponents include D. F. Strauss, Dibelius, and Bultmann).

23 Ridderbos (1997: 435 n. 185) cites BDF §448.4 as evidence that ἀλλά after a question posed to oneself could be rendered more strongly as “No!” (cf. NRSV; Bultmann 1971: 427), though

Ridderbos himself does not adopt this rendering. Cf. Whitacre 1999: 312, following Carson. 28 Bultmann (1971: 427 n. 6) seems to draw the line too narrowly when he identifies the Father's name with the person of the Father himself and contends that "the Father is glorified precisely when he is acknowledged or named as Father."

40 Ridderbos (1997: 439) rightly notes that this is more than a mere proleptic reference to a future event, which effectively reduces 12:31b to a "prophetic vision" (contra Bultmann [1971: 431], who argues that the "nows" of 12:31 necessitate the purgation of traditional Christian eschatology). As Carson (1991: 444–45) aptly notes, "The end times have begun already. It is not that there is nothing reserved for the consummation; rather, it is that the decisive step is about to be taken in the death/exaltation of Jesus." See also R. Brown 1966: 477.

1 For a discussion of 12:37–50 in the context of the Johannine lawsuit motif (cf. Isa. 40–55), see Lincoln 2000: 105–10. Keener (2003: 882) notes that many find in 12:37–43 a theological summary of people's responses to Jesus' public ministry and in 12:44–50 an anthology of representative sayings. Whitacre (1999: 326) suggests that 12:37–43 emphasizes Jesus' deeds, and 12:44–50 his words (also adducing Moses' final words in Deut. 32:45–47 as a parallel). Both Ridderbos (1997: 443) and Schnackenburg (1990: 2.411) stress the relevance of this section for the evangelist's own day and the historical distance from which this section was presumably written. This surely is true but should not be exaggerated. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.421) also provides a defense of Johannine authorship against Boismard, who claims that 12:44–50 is non-Johannine. Bultmann (1971: ix), in a hardly defensible move, relocates both 12:34–36 and 12:44–50 to John 8, with only 12:37–43 remaining in the traditional position.

22 Most commentators take both occurrences of πιστεύετε (pisteute, believe, trust) in 14:1 as imperatives (e.g., Carson 1991: 488; Morris 1995: 566; Beasley-Murray 1999: 249; Burge 2000: 391; Westcott 1908: 2.167; Köstenberger 1999a: 163). Alternatively, the first form may be an indicative: "You trust in God; trust also in me" (NIV footnote) or interrogative (Bultmann 1971: 600). Schnackenburg (1990: 3.59) notes that 14:1b forms a chiasm ("[You] Trust in God, also in me trust").

50 Beasley-Murray (1999: 253–54) comments, "The reality is greater than human language can express." Contra Bultmann (1971: 609), who says that Jesus' unity with the Father must be understood exclusively in terms of revelation, and who, in turn, concludes that the "works" are all about Jesus' "words" because Jesus' miracles are superfluous.

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus "our advocate" with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning "supporter" or "sponsor." The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning "advocate" (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man's Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

80 See Morris (1995: 579), who says that “if this is accepted it must be in the sense of 20:22, where the Spirit was in some sense given on the day of resurrection”; and Bruce (1983: 303), who points out that the resurrection appearances were but brief and temporary. See also Barrett (1978: 464), who maintains that the primary reference is to the resurrection but the expression also extends to the presence of Christ in his disciples (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 258). In the patristic period, the Eastern church fathers understood the phrase “in a little while” to refer to the resurrection, while the Latin church thought that Jesus meant the parousia. Bultmann (1971: 619) contends that John’s source referred to the latter, with the evangelist demythologizing his source by reinterpreting it as the former. Hence, the second coming is swallowed up in Easter. However, this reconstruction is predicated upon Bultmann’s source theory regarding John’s Gospel as well as upon his existential approach to interpretation, including the categories of “myth” and “demythologization.” Yet note how even after his resurrection, Jesus refers to a future time at which he will return (21:22, 23). Moloney (1998: 403) implausibly contends that “that day” is Jesus’ hour and departure.

86 Again, Bultmann (1971: 617–18) argues that the present reference collapses Easter and the parousia into one. This conclusion, however, is unwarranted. Rather, according to Jesus’ statements in John, believers need not wait for the parousia to experience the indwelling presence of Christ. Just as the incarnate Lord’s presence was with them during the time of his earthly ministry (1:14), his emissary, the Spirit (14:16), and the Father and the Son with him (14:23), will be present with the believer already in the here and now. As R. Brown (1970: 648) notes, the implicit message is “that in indwelling are fulfilled some of the expectations of the last period.”

2 Although vine imagery is widespread in ancient literature, an OT background for the present passage is favored by the vast majority of commentators, primarily owing to the frequent OT references or allusions and the replacement motif in this Gospel (e.g., Carson 1991: 513; R. Brown 1970: 669–71; Morris 1995: 593; Ridderbos 1997: 515; contra Bultmann 1971: 530; Witherington 1995: 255–57).

24 See Barrett 1978: 474; R. Brown 1970: 678. Contra commentators who view the statement in 15:4a as merely entailing a comparison (e.g., Bultmann 1971: 536).

48 Some may object that love for one’s enemies would be greater; but the present passage is concerned only with the greatest possible way to show love for one’s friends (Bultmann 1971: 542 n. 4; Morris 1995: 599; Carson 1991: 522).

54 The disciples' role as servants is intimated in 13:16 and implied in 13:13. On friends, see commentary at 15:13 and 15:14. The contrast between servants and sons is also found in Gal. 4:1–7 and Heb. 3:5–6. There are some interesting parallels between the present verse and John 8:31–36 (noted by Bultmann 1971: 543; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.110). The distinction between φίλοι (philoï, friends) and δούλοι (douloi, servants) is also found in Gnosticism and the mystery religions. See also Clement of Alexandria, Stromata 7.2.

6 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 525–26, with reference to 17:20, the NIV, and many major commentators (e.g., Barrett 1978: 480; Bultmann 1971: 549; Lindars 1970: 494; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.115; Bruce 1980: 313; contra Borchert 2002: 156; Dodd 1963: 409; R. Brown 1970: 687; and the NLT). See the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 275; Carson 1991: 525–26.

8 See 7:28; 8:19, 27, 55; 16:3. Ταῦτα πάντα (tauta panta, all these things) presumably includes both hatred (15:18–19) and the resulting persecution (15:20; cf. 16:1–3; see Bultmann 1971: 550 n. 1; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276; Ridderbos 1997: 524). The expression “because of my name” reflects OT terminology pertaining to God and his great name (cf. 1 Sam. 12:22; 2 Chron. 6:32; Jer. 14:21; cf. Acts 5:41; 1 Pet. 4:14; 1 John 2:12; Rev. 2:3; see R. Brown 1970: 687), though in the present context it is essentially synonymous with “me” (Carson 1991: 526; Moloney 1998: 433).

11 The finality of the sin of the world's unbelief in Jesus is stressed also by Barrett (1978: 481, citing 16:9) and Bultmann (1971: 550).

24 So Carson 1991: 529; Ridderbos 1997: 527; R. Brown 1970: 690; Moloney 1998: 434. See 16:4; 6:64; 8:25. See also Luke 1:2; Acts 1:21–22; 10:37. The present tense ἐστέ (este, you are) is perfective in meaning, “you have been” (R. Brown 1970: 690; contra Bultmann 1971: 554).

67 Bultmann (1971: 583) declares, “That ... is the eschatological situation: to have no more questions!” Bultmann, of course, believes that the Fourth Evangelist has so conflated Easter and the parousia that for him they are one and the same. This, however, fails to understand the nature of Johannine-inaugurated (though not radically realized) eschatology, in which the end is shown to be anticipated in the here and now without the future being entirely swallowed up by the present.

6 Hence, Bultmann (1971: 486, cf. 460–61) places chapter 17 between 13:30 and 13:31, with 13:1 serving as the introduction to the prayer. As R. Brown (1970: 745) rightly notes, however, although chapters 13 and 17 are indeed closely related, they are so by way of inclusion rather than direct sequence. Brown himself, incidentally, believes that chapter 17 was not part of the original Gospel but was added at the same time as chapters 15 and 16. He conjectures that the prayer may have been written by the same circle as the prologue. For a discussion of the literary structure of John 17, see also Malatesta 1971. Black (1988) breaks up the prayer into ninety-five “nuclear structures ... embedded into 52 cola” (p. 145), also noting the frequent occurrence of ellipsis, anacolouthon, and parallelism (see also his chart of rhetorical features on pp. 149–53, listing instances of repetition, omission, and shifts in expectancy).

5 Morris (1995: 655) suggests that ἐξῆλθεν (exēlthen, they left) means they “went out of the house” (cf. Barrett 1978: 517). Carson (1991: 576) proposes that it means they left the city (cf. Bultmann 1971: 638).

27 See Ezek. 1:28; 44:4; Dan. 2:46; 8:18; 10:9; Acts 9:4; 22:7; 26:14; Rev. 1:17; 19:10; 22:8. Contra Carson (1991: 578–79), who argues that the evangelist is not attempting to describe a theophanic manifestation, concluding that the soldiers simply responded “better than they knew”

(cf. Witherington [1995: 286], who calls this an example of “Johannine double-entendre”; but see Bultmann 1971: 639; Burge 2000: 492; Conway 1999: 173). See also the legend cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 158.

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235). Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

16 So Morris 1995: 665–66 n. 35, citing Dodd; Carson 1991: 581; Barrett 1978: 526; but see Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 3. The term is used for a “close friend” in the LXX (e.g., 2 Kings 10:11; Ps. 54:14 [55:13 Eng.]; cf. Luke 2:44; see also NewDocs 4.44; Homer, Iliad 15.350).

66 Two instances of such fear on the part of a judge of one accused whom he came to recognize as a higher being are relayed by Philostratus (Vita Apollonii 1.21; 4.44 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 212 n. 596]). See Bultmann 1971: 661 n. 4.

1 For discussions of this passage’s relationship to the Synoptics, see Barrett 1978: 546–48 (on the assumption of John’s use of Mark and the superiority of Markan material); Beasley-Murray 1999: 343–44; Bultmann 1971: 667; R. Brown 1970: 913–16. R. Brown (1970: 910–12) divides 19:16b–42 into five chiastically arranged episodes plus introduction and conclusion; Moloney (1998: 502, following Donald Senior) sees the five scenes but not the chiasm (see also Moloney’s literary analysis of John 18–19 on pp. 511–12).

16 The passage may also echo Isa. 53:12: “numbered with the transgressors” (Beasley-Murray 1999: 346; Bultmann 1971: 669 n. 1; R. Brown 1970: 900; more cautious is Carson [1991: 611–12]).

22 Bultmann (1971: 669) suggests that the title serves as a universal judgment of Judaism and the world, which have rejected their Savior; Barrett (1978: 549) notes that the title is symbolic of the world’s universal condemnation of Jesus.

29 The double perfect of γέγραφα (gegrapha, I have written) conveys a sense of finality, portraying Pilate’s action as a fait accompli (Ridderbos 1997: 609 n. 134; Morris 1995: 714 n. 54). Bultmann (1971: 670 n. 2 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 902]) suggests that the first perfect is aoristic; Wallace (1996: 577) lists 19:22 as an example of an extensive perfect focusing on the completion of an action in the past. Similar word combinations are found also in the LXX (Gen. 43:14; Esth. 4:16; 1 Macc. 13:38) and in rabbinic literature (b. Menah. 3a; b. Ketub. 96a; b. Yebam. 106b) (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; further instances are cited in Schlatter 1948: 349). Perhaps significantly, similar phrases are found also in a Roman context (note Cicero, Epistulae ad Quintum fratrem 1.2.2; 1.2.13: scripsi, scripsi). Keener’s (2003: 1138) observation that every other instance of “written” in this Gospel refers to Scripture (2:17; 6:31, 45; 8:17; 10:34; 12:14, 16; 15:25), which cannot be broken (10:35), seems of doubtful relevance here.

30 Carson (1991: 611) notes that Caiaphas and Pilate unwittingly serve a prophetic function in the Johannine narrative (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 346; Bultmann 1971: 669).

35 The general conclusion of commentators is that the reference to the “seamless robe” may not necessarily have theological significance (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 610 n. 136; cf. Morris 1995: 715, esp. n. 56; Bultmann 1971: 671). Both Witherington (1995: 309) and R. Brown (1970: 920–22) note several possibilities yet caution against dogmatic conclusions (see also Carson 1991: 614). Barrett (1978: 550) sees an allusion to Jesus’ death resulting in “the scattered children of God.”

43 So also the vast majority of commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Morris 1995: 716–17; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Bultmann 1971: 672; Borchert 2002: 268; R. Brown 1970: 904; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.276. Ridderbos (1997: 611 n. 142) notes that in light of Mark 15:40 and Matt. 27:56, there could have been other women there as well. See also Luke 23:49.

44 See Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 616; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Burge 2000: 528; contra Barrett 1978: 551–52; Bultmann 1971: 672 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.277. Carson (1991: 616 [cf. Morris 1995: 717]) notes that, like Jesus’ mother’s sister, Jesus’ mother is also unnamed here and elsewhere in the Gospel (as is the “disciple Jesus loved” in 19:26–27).

47 Commentators have detected various types of symbolism in this scene. Bultmann (1971: 673), true to F. C. Baur, sees Mary as representative of Jewish Christianity, and the beloved disciple of Gentile Christianity, the latter being charged to honor the former as its “mother,” from whom it originated (cf. Brodie 1993: 549). Witherington (1995: 309) views these two characters as symbolic of a new Adam and Eve, who are obedient whereas the former were not. Carson (1991: 618, following M. Gourgues) suggests that Mary, on account of her faith in Christ, is now able metaphorically to become a mother to a new son supplied for her by Jesus (cf. Matt. 19:29; see also Witherington 1995: 310). Beasley-Murray (1999: 350, following Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278) sees Mary as representing that part of Israel that is willing to believe in Jesus as the Messiah. Refreshingly, and refusing to resort to symbolism or allegory, Morris (1995: 718) says the beloved disciple simply “provided her [Mary] with a roof” and took her under his care. Others focus on lessons (to be) learned by Mary, such as needing to “step back in submission to the law of life that the Father has set for her son” (Ridderbos 1997: 612) or to receive the gift of salvation that she desired to receive at the wedding in Cana (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278; Beasley-Murray 1999: 350; Borchert 2002: 269).

60 Borchert 2002: 272–73; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.284; contra Bultmann 1971: 675. The same word, παράδιδωμι (paradidōmi, give up) is used in Isa. 53:12 to describe the death of the suffering Servant (Morris 1995: 721 n. 81).

61 So the vast majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 618; Carson 1991: 622; Barrett 1978: 555; Morris 1995: 730; Bultmann 1971: 676). Contra Borchert (2002: 273 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 933]), who seems to suggest that Jesus died on Nisan 14 and thus was being portrayed as the Passover lamb.

73 Contra Bultmann (1971: 678), who seems to suggest that the pronoun refers to Jesus. See the extensive discussion of this verse in Carson 1991: 625–26.

84 Ridderbos 1997: 628; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 360; Bultmann 1971: 680.

1 For a discussion of this pericope’s relationship to the Synoptics, see Ridderbos 1997: 629–30 (see also Morris 1995: 732; R. Brown 1970: 996). Ridderbos (1997: 630–31) also defends the historicity of the event over against Bultmann (1971: 685), who denies historicity and takes an allegorical approach. On historical questions surrounding the Johannine account of Jesus’ resurrection and appearances, see also Keener 2003: 1167–78.

14 Cf. Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:1; Luke 24:10. See R. Brown 1970: 984. Contra Bultmann (1971: 684 n. 1), who suggests that the term is an Oriental idiom. Also contra Moloney (1998: 518–19), who claims that the term suggests that Mary is being associated with the two disciples.

15 Morris 1995: 734; cf. Bernard 1928: 2:262. Contra Carson (1991: 635, following Bultmann), who maintains that the plural “we” is “merely a mode of speech, without plural referent.”

17 This is disputed by Brodie (1993: 561), who says that the beloved disciple is “in better running order,” which he takes to be symbolic of superior discipleship (though on p. 564 he sees both disciples as symbolic of the unity achieved through faith in the ascending Christ). Beasley-Murray (1999: 371–72) contends that the beloved disciple’s speed was due to the extent of his love for Jesus; Moloney (1998: 522) suggests that he had stronger faith that a miracle had occurred. Yet others have seen in this statement an affirmation of John’s superiority over Peter (e.g., Schnackenburg 1990: 3.310, 312; Moloney 1998: 520; R. Brown 1970: 1004–7). More likely, however, both the beloved disciple and Peter are presented here as a duo of eyewitnesses to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 632; Carson 1991: 636–37; Bultmann 1971: 684).

24 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 638; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Borchert 2002: 295; R. Brown 1970: 987; Bultmann 1971: 684; Burge 2000: 554; Laney 1992: 360. Witherington (1995: 325) suggests, less plausibly, that the beloved disciple believed that Jesus had been taken by God similar to Elijah. Morris (1995: 736) notes that the two verbs do not have explicit objects, supplying the graveclothes as the object of the beloved disciple’s “seeing” and Jesus’ resurrection as that of the disciple’s “believing” (albeit without understanding its full theological significance). Hardly plausible is the suggestion by Minear (1983: 91 n. 14, with reference to 1976 [followed by Conway 1999: 189–90]) that what the disciples believed was the statement of Mary Magdalene in 20:2.

25 Carson (1991: 638–39 [contra Bultmann 1971: 684]) suggests, on the basis of Luke 24:12, that Peter did not believe at this time (cf. D. M. Smith 1999: 374). Byrne (1985: 92) calls him “the odd-man-out” within the context of John 20. Morris (1995: 737, following Michaels 1989: 336) says that Peter could have believed, and the evangelist may have chosen to present the beloved disciple’s reaction as his own while describing Peter from an external point of view.

14 Commentators are not agreed as to whether Mary had already touched Jesus or was about to do so. Some say that Mary had already touched him (e.g., Morris 1995: 742; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.318; Witherington 1995: 331; R. Brown 1970: 992; Burge 2000: 555), while others seem to allow for the possibility that she was about to but had not yet done so (e.g., Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. g, 376; Bultmann 1971: 687). Regarding Mary’s devotion, see Ruth 1:16. Stibbe (1993: 205) says that the present passage is “most stylized” and detects intertextual echoes with Song 3:1–3.

16 The critique by Hatina (1993), who says that the reference is to the indwelling Paraclete, fails to convince. Contrary to the view of many commentators, the present pericope does not constitute the Johannine equivalent to Pentecost (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1038; Barrett [1978: 570], who says that the present passage cannot be harmonized with Acts 2; Bultmann 1971: 691), nor is Calvin’s (1961: 205) proposal satisfactory that at 20:22 the disciples “were only sprinkled with His grace and not [as at Pentecost] saturated with full power.” Beasley-Murray (1999: 382 [followed by Borchert 2002: 307–8]) believes that John telescoped the giving of the Spirit without concern for chronology (citing the reference to the ascension in 20:17 as a parallel).

M. Turner (1977) thinks that the reference is not to the Spirit at all but to Jesus' message as Spirit and life. The treatment by Moloney (1998: 532, 535) is rather idiosyncratic. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.325), too, surprisingly contends that the Johannine instance involves all believers, while the events in Acts 2 pertain to the apostles. If anything, one might have expected the opposite kind of reasoning, with John's account anticipating the general outpouring narrated in Acts 2. Against the view of Burge (2000: 558 [cf. Burge 1987: 148–49]), who notes the connection between the present passage and Jesus' promise to send the Spirit in John 14 and 16, the present event does not mark the actual fulfillment of these promises other than by way of anticipatory sign. Keener's (2003: 1196–1200, see also 1204–6) discussion, including an attempted refutation of M. Turner (1998), remains inconclusive and, on the whole, fails to convince.

1 The present unit is introduced by δέ (de, and, but), perhaps creating a contrast between Thomas and the disciples in the previous narrative (Moloney 1998: 538). The existence of the Twelve is in this Gospel presupposed rather than explicitly narrated (see commentary at 6:67; see also the brief excursus in Borchert 2002: 311). The reference to Thomas's designation "the twin" hardly constitutes an allusion to his double-mindedness (so, rightly, Borchert 2002: 312; cf. R. Brown 1970: 1024; Bultmann 1971: 694 n. 2). Lee (1995: 43, citing Robert Alter) notes that "absence is a favourite literary device of this narrator."

3 Parallels to this type of concluding statement can be documented from both secular and intertestamental Jewish literature (Bultmann 1971: 697–98 n. 2). After describing God's creative work and the marvels of nature, one intertestamental book concludes a section with these words: "We could say more but could never say enough; let the final word be: 'He is the all' " (Sir. 43:27). Even closer in wording is 1 Macc. 9:22: "Now the rest of the acts of Judas ... and the brave deeds that he did ... have not been recorded, but they were very many." Schlatter (1948: 362) also refers to Luke 3:17; Josephus, Ant. 3.15.3 §318; 7.7.5 §161; he also notes the exact verbal parallel of γεγραμμένα ἐν τῷ βιβλίῳ τούτῳ found in Rev. 22:19.

6 So, rightly, Bultmann 1971: 698–99. The question does not hinge on adjudicating which of the textual variants, πιστεύητε or πιστεύσητε, is original (see additional note), for verb tenses are less distinctive in nonindicative moods (cf. 19:35, where most MSS have the aorist reading). It is sometimes alleged that the present subjunctive would imply a purpose of strengthening the faith of believing readers, while the aorist would imply an evangelistic purpose (Metzger 1994: 219–20). However, as Carson (1991: 662) points out, the present tense of πιστεύω (pisteuō, believe) is used in this Gospel with reference to both coming to faith and continuing in faith. Carson also notes that the aorist subjunctive is more common after ἵνα (hina, that) than the present subjunctive.

8 See Ridderbos (1997: 656 n. 3), who cites Schlatter: "The attribution of the new narrative to another author is impossible, however, since the identical linguistic conventions have been fully maintained." Even Bultmann (1971: 700) declares, "Language and style admittedly afford no sure proof." Similarly, Neirynck (1990: 336) concludes that "the evidence of style and vocabulary ... is ambiguous and not decisive." Barrett (1978: 576) provides a list of words used in chapter 21 but not in chapters 1–20. See also Breck (1992: 36), who notes that words unique to chapter 21 in John's Gospel are either "technical expressions linked to the fishing trade" (ἀλιεύω, πιάζω, αἰγιαλός, προσφάγιον, δίκτυον, σύρω, ἀποβαίνω) or particular expressions required by their respective contexts (πρωῖα, ἐπενδύτης, γυμνός, βόσκω, ἄρνιον, ποιμαίνω, προβάτιον [variant of πρόβατα, the more likely reading in 21:16–17]).

30 For example, R. Brown (1970: 1097), who interprets the full net allegorically as the absence of schism in the Christian community; Bultmann (1971: 709), who speaks of the “indestructible unity of the Church”; Michaels (1989: 354–55), who contends that the full net indicates the successful completion of Jesus’ mission; and Talbert (1992: 260), who says that the 153 fish symbolize the universal outreach of the church. For a virtually exhaustive list of interpretations of the number 153, no matter how implausible, see Keener (2003: 1231–33). He properly concludes that “the number could simply stem from an accurate memory of a careful count on the occasion, because fish had to be counted to be divided among fishermen.” Keener (2003: 1233) also notes that 153 fish may be no more symbolic than Peter swimming 100 yards in 21:8. 32 So, for example, R. Brown (1970: 1076), who sees the origin of the number in authentic eyewitness, citing 21:24. Note also the presence of the sons of Zebedee, according to 21:2. Large numbers elsewhere in John are meant literally as well (e.g., 2:6; 12:3); Schlatter (1948: 368) notes that the large number of fish caught points to Jesus’ generous, abundant provision, citing 2:6; 6:13. More questionable are Burge’s (2000: 586) reference to 153 being “numerically important” for “Greek mathematicians” and Bultmann’s (1971: 709) assertion that the number is allegorical “since it is not a round number.” For proper cautions against allegorical interpretations, see Ridderbos 1997: 663.

11 Bultmann (1971: 713) sees the origin of this saying in a proverb; but see the critique by Carson (1991: 679).

37 “Overcome” or an equivalent is favored also by Morris 1995: 76; Moloney 1998: 36; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.245–46; Laney 1992: 39; Lindars 1972: 87; Schlatter 1948: 9 (“καταλαμβάνω never means ‘understand’ in John”); and Westcott 1908: 1.9–10. Carson (1991: 138) thinks that John might have both meanings (“overcome” and “comprehend”) in mind (so also Whitacre 1999: 53) and likes the ambiguity in BAGD’s translation, “master” (see BDAG 520). Keener (2003: 387) believes that John’s use of κατέλαβεν in 1:5 is an instance of truductio, a play on the multiple meanings of a word (here “comprehend” and “overcome”). Keener notes that the word occurs in Wis. 7:30 but admits that there the term clearly means “overcome” and no wordplay is present. Burge (2000: 56) agrees that both are at work, but he sees “overcome” as being dominant. Calvin (1959: 12) translates “comprehend.” The major translations divide more or less evenly between the two options, usually mentioning the one not chosen in a footnote: (1) NIV: “understood”; NASB, NKJV: “comprehend”; (2) NLT: “extinguish”; NET: “mastered”; ISV: “put out”; HCSB, ESV, NRSV: “overcome.” Notably, the TNIV changed the NIV’s “understood” to “overcome.”

51 Barrett (1978: 162) sees only one sense of κόσμος in this verse. Morris (1995: 85) contends that the first two instances refer to everyone, while the third reference is to those who came in contact with Jesus. Beasley-Murray (1999: 12) sees a progression from “the world inhabited by humankind” in 1:10a to “the world including human beings” in 1:10b to “humanity, fallen and in darkness” in 1:10c. Carson (1991: 123) demonstrates that the word κόσμος never has a positive usage (contra Burge 2000: 57) and only a few neutral ones.

54 This is the view of, among others, Carson 1991: 125; Dodd 1953: 402; R. Brown 1966: 10; Morris 1995: 85; Borchert 1996: 114; Burge 2000: 59. For a demonstration that 1:11, properly interpreted and understood (particularly the world as God’s property), refutes the notion, advanced by Bultmann, that John reflects gnostic thought, see Jervell 1956: 17–18. But see also the interaction with Jervell in Pryor 1990: 210–14.

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

27 So Ridderbos 1997: 67; Burge 2000: 71; Barrett 1978: 174; R. Brown 1966: 51; Borchert 1996: 126.

49 Burge (1987: 50–52) notes that the Johannine account of Jesus’ baptism focuses not on the baptism per se but on the Spirit’s role in anointing Jesus and inaugurating his ministry. He suggests that this underscores the precrucifixion unity between Jesus and the Spirit.

68 Bultmann’s claim (1971: 100; accepted by Brodie 1993: 160) that “tenth hour” is the “hour of fulfillment” is very questionable. R. Brown (1966: 75) suggests that if the day was Friday, the disciples had to stay until Saturday evening in order to properly observe the Sabbath.

Alternatively, the disciples stayed overnight because of the nature of the desired conversation. If so, this could refer to any day during the week (Morris 1995: 139; cf. Burge 2000: 76).

78 See Cullmann, TDNT 6:100–101; Borchert 1996: 143–44; Burge 2000: 76; Morris 1995: 140.

89 The identification of Nathanael with Bartholomew is favored by Ridderbos 1997: 87–88; Morris 1995: 143; Carson 1991: 159; Burge 2000: 77; contra Barrett 1978: 184; R. Brown 1966: 82; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.314. Barrett (1978: 179, 184) conjectures that the meaning of the name “Nathanael,” “God has given,” indicates that he represents an “ideal disciple” and that the passage should be interpreted allegorically. Somewhat along similar lines, Witherington (1995: 71) suggests that Nathanael’s name implies that the disciples are the Father’s gift to Jesus. It seems, however, that these kinds of conjectures leave the realm of well-founded exegesis and veer into the sphere of ultimately unverifiable speculation (see the critiques by Morris [1995: 143] and Carson [1991: 159], both of whom defend Nathanael’s and the event’s historicity). Hanhart (1970: 24–25) identifies Nathanael as Matthew; Hill (1997) somewhat cautiously advances the theory that Nathanael is identical with James of Alphaeus (cf. Epistle to the Apostles 2 [second century A.D.]).

96 Though note the appearance of impostors in Galilee, such as Judas the Galilean (Acts 5:37), a man from Gamala in Gaulanitis who refused to pay tribute to Caesar in the days of the census in A.D. 6 (Josephus, Ant. 18.1.1 §4; 20.5.2 §102; J.W. 2.8.1 §118; see Burge 2000: 78; cf. R. Brown 1966: 83).

105 C. Koester 1990a: 23–34; cf. Barrett 1978: 185; Nicklas (2000b: 201–2) is less than convinced. Other commentators consider the reference to be incidental, intended to show merely that Jesus “knew” Nathanael prior to their actual encounter (Ridderbos 1997: 90; cf. Burge 2000:

78; R. Brown 1966: 83; Moloney 1998: 56; contra Morris 1995: 146; Witherington 1995: 71; Borchert 1996: 148; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.317). Keener (2003: 486), too, rejects any deeper significance in the identification, suggesting that the fig tree may be mentioned simply because a specific landmark was necessary for some reason. Witherington's suggestion that Nathanael is being portrayed as an expert in the law who thus would know that the Messiah could not come from Nazareth seems far-fetched.

122 The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. 65, was published in 1998 by the Egypt Exploration Society (see pp. 12–13). Among commentators, “Chosen One of God” is favored by Morris 1995: 134; Carson 1991: 152; Burge 1987: 59–61; 2000: 74; Barrett 1978: 178; R. Brown 1966: 57; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.305. “Son of God” is the reading advocated by Bultmann 1971: 92–93 n. 6; Borchert 1996: 139; Ridderbos 1997: 77; Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. g; Laney 1992: 53 (though all prior to the discovery of P¹⁰⁶). Rodgers (1999: 304) prefers both (“This is the only, the chosen Son of God”), while Michaels (1989: 36) proposes that the Baptist spoke “Chosen One of God” (hence the MS tradition), which the evangelist interpreted as “Son of God.”

7 It is doubtful that the reference to “the third day” represents an allusion to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 102; Carson 1991: 167; Burge 2000: 90; contra Borchert 1996: 153; Stibbe 1993: 46; Keener 2003: 497–98). The reference serves as a chronological connective with preceding events, perhaps indicating that the promise of 1:51 was quickly fulfilled (Beasley-Murray 1999: 34, citing Schnackenburg 1990: 1.325; cf. Talbert [1992: 86], who says that 2:1–11 serves as fulfillment of the prophecy in 1:51; and D. M. Smith [1999: 86], who speaks of the “first installment ... of the revelation promised in 1:51”). The beginning of Jesus’ final week is signaled in 12:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 189–90).

14 Cf. Paulien (ABD 4:1106), who also refers to de Jonge 1971: 342; Sylva 1988: 148–49; Michel (1981: 231), who calls Nicodemus a “borderline character” (“personnage-frontière”); and Pamment (1985: 71, 73), who writes, “Nicodemus is the only individual character who fails to make a decision, remaining the good but uncommitted observer who tries to prevent injustice” (p. 73). Similarly, Conway (1999: 85–103) says that Nicodemus is a “pathetic character” who from beginning to end “is genuinely interested in Jesus, but is never able to gather the courage and conviction to confess his belief openly” (p. 103). Note also Pazdan (1987), who sees Nicodemus’s portrayal as part of John’s reversal of the traditional geographical polemic regarding Judeans, Samaritans, and Galileans; and Burge (2000: 124), who contends that Nicodemus never became a model disciple, because “disciples confess Jesus’ identity, remain with him, and tell others.” If my assessment of Nicodemus is correct, it runs counter to the notion, popular in current scholarship, that John’s Gospel is “anti-Semitic,” for here we have a Jewish person who, though not a believer in Jesus the Messiah, represents a fair-minded, moral, kind Jewish leader, providing a counterpoint to the more hostile element on the Sanhedrin. It is also possible that John includes the Nicodemus account at least in part because he had access to individuals among the Jewish leadership (cf. 18:15b: “that disciple [the ‘other disciple’ of 18:15a, presumably the evangelist; cf. 20:2; 21:24] was known to the high priest”).

17 Contra several commentators (Barrett 1978: 205; Moloney 1998: 91; R. Brown 1966: 130; Witherington 1995: 94; Burge 2000: 114; Carson 1995: 187 n. 8; Blomberg 1995: 6), “by night” is likely not symbolic in the sense that Nicodemus came from darkness to light, while Judas went from light to darkness (cf. 6:70–71; 12:4–8; 13:2, 26–30; 18:2–5)—a view held by R. Brown (1966: 130) and Auwers (1990). Wallace (1996: 123–24) overreaches when he finds in the genitive of time an indication of “the kind of time in which Nicodemus came to see the Lord.” Morris (1995: 187) suggests that John may have had more than one meaning in mind.

150n34, 151, 154, 156, 158, 162, 168n4, 169n7, 170n16, 172, 179n17, 186n54, 201n10, 205n34, 207n43, 209, 211, 240n53, 240n54, 241n59, 243, 246, 247, 247n6, 247n8, 248,

16 So, e.g., Lee 1994: 41–42. It is possible that “he” refers to Jesus rather than God (Burge 1987: 83–84; cf. Hofius 1999: 131–34).

16 See Potter 1959: 331; Kippenberg 1971: 94; Riesner, DJG 40. A few late sources (such as Jerome) substitute “Shechem” for “Sychar,” but this is clearly secondary (contra R. Brown 1966: 169; Burge 2000: 141).

21 See Ridderbos 1997: 153; cf. Carson 1991: 217; Borchert 1996: 201; Morris 1995: 228; Burge 2000: 142.

25 See Carson 1991: 217; Witherington 1995: 120; Morris 1995: 228; Burge 2000: 142; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.424. As part of a series of putative “wisdom” parallels, Witherington (1995: 119) proposes that the Samaritan woman is depicted as the maidservant of Wisdom. I find this background reconstruction unconvincing.

34 Borchert (1996: 203) sees the “gift of God” as the realization of God’s promises; Morris (1995: 230) and Carson (1991: 218) identify it as eternal life, the latter with reference to the Torah (cf. R. Brown 1966: 176, 178–79); Schnackenburg (1990: 1.431) suggests that the gift is either the Holy Spirit or eternal life, or both; Burge (2000: 144) thinks that the reference is to the Spirit.

4 One school of interpretation identifies πατρίς (patris, homeland, hometown) in 4:44 with Jerusalem (so Barrett 1978: 246; Dodd 1953: 352; 1963: 238–41; Meeks 1966; 1967: 39–40; see, much earlier, Origen, Commentarii in evangelium Joannis 13.54–56, cited in van Belle 1998: 30). However, see the critiques by W. Davies (1974: 321–31) and Stimpfle (1992: 89) as summarized by van Belle (1998: 30–32). The Galilee/Nazareth explanation is found already in Augustine (cited by van Belle 1998: 33) and is defended by Stimpfle (1992: 86–96 [followed by van Belle 1998: 27–44]) and others (see van Belle 1998: 32–33; see also Ridderbos 1997: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 73; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.463). Still others think that both Galilee and Judea are in view (Carson 1991: 235–36; Burge 2000: 151–52; Witherington 1995: 126; W. Davies 1974: 321–31).

7 So Carson 1991: 234; Ridderbos 1997: 174–75; Morris 1995: 255; Borchert 1996: 219–20; Burge 2000: 152–53; Witherington 1995: 127; contra R. Brown 1966: 193; Barrett 1978: 245; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.471–75; Bultmann 1971: 205.

16 The expression “child” indicates the close bond between father and son—a more emotional term than “son” in 4:47 (Morris 1995: 257; Moloney 1998: 153; Burge 2000: 158).

54 Though calling this a “parable” (Dodd 1968a; Burge 2000: 177; cf. R. Brown 1966: 218) may be an overstatement (Carson 1991: 250; Ridderbos 1997: 192; Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Barrett 1978: 259–60).

10 See Num. 11:13 (cf. R. Brown 1966: 233; Moloney 1998: 197; Burge 2000: 193). There are several other parallels between John 6 and Num. 11: the grumbling of the people (Num. 11:1; John 6:41, 43); the description of the manna (Num. 11:7–9; John 6:31); the reference to the eating of meat/[Jesus’] flesh (Num. 11:13; John 6:51); and the striking disproportion between the existing need and the available resources (Num. 11:22; John 6:7–9).

34 So Beasley-Murray 1999: 89–90; Witherington 1995: 153; Burge 2000: 193, 195. See further the discussion of ἐγώ εἰμι sayings in ancient culture and the OT in Beasley-Murray 1999: 89–90.

43 So Barrett 1978: 287; cf. Witherington 1995: 155; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.38; Burge 1987: 84–85. Less likely, the reference may be to his consecration (R. Brown 1966: 261) or to the incarnation (Moloney 1998: 211). On the phrase “seal of approval,” see commentary at 3:33.

53 Most commentators favor a time immediately following cessation of ceremonies on the eighth day (Carson 1991: 321; Morris 1995: 373, esp. n. 79; Barrett 1978: 326; Moloney 1998: 256; Schlatter 1948: 199). Some believe that Jesus’ words fit better with the ceremonies of the seventh day (R. Brown 1966: 320; Bultmann 1971: 302 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.152; Ridderbos 1997: 272; Burge 2000: 227). On the water-drawing ceremony, see Keener 2003: 722–24.

54 Cf. Isa. 55:1; also Ps. 42–43; Matt. 5:6; John 4:10–14; 6:35; Rev. 22:1–2, 17; Sir. 24:19–21; 51:23–24. Beasley-Murray (1999: 113 [cf. Burge 2000: 227]) sees a close parallel in form and content between 6:35 and 7:37–38.

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee’s observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus “from within him” refers to “whoever believes in me.” Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of “rivers of living water” (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987: 88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

6 A briefer and more dated (but still helpful) survey is found in Burge 1984: 142–43. Further bibliographic references to materials dealing with both external and internal evidence can be found in Wallace 1993: 290 n. 2; J. A. Sanders 1990: 346 n. 1; Burge 1984: 141 n. 5. Also regularly cited is the monograph by Becker (1963).

8 The attribution, recorded by Eusebius and reported by Papias (Hist. eccl. 3.39.17), of a similar pericope to a contemporary source probably refers to the sinful woman in Luke 7:36–50 rather than to the adulterous woman considered here (Petersen 1997: 196–97; contra Burge 1984: 143).

10 The unfortunate precedent of including the pericope may have been set by Erasmus, who, though doubting the originality of the passage, nonetheless included it in his 1516 edition of the Greek NT in deference to its popularity by readers of the Latin Vulgate. From there, the pericope found its way into the seventeenth-century Textus Receptus (Burge 1984: 148 n. 29). See also Beck (1997: 101–7, esp. 103–4), who concludes that the pericope is inauthentic but nonetheless incorporates it in his study by analyzing its effect on the reader. This judgment, however, is of doubtful merit in that it fails to consider the original and the earliest readers of the Gospel (who would not have read the Gospel with this pericope), and in that it unduly neglects issues such as canonicity, inspiration, and biblical authority.

5 So Morris 1995: 388; R. Brown 1966: 344; Burge 2000: 255; Moloney 1998: 268; Borchert 1996: 295.

21 Schnackenburg 1990: 2.194; cf. Moloney 1998: 267; R. Brown 1966: 345. Carson (1991: 339 [cf. Burge 2000: 257]) denies the suggestion that κρίνω (krinō, judge) has the meaning “to pass judicial sentence” and the conclusion on that basis that Jesus came not to convict but to save.

29 So Morris 1995: 394; Carson 1991: 341; Beasley-Murray 1999: 125 n. b; Burge 2000: 257. Barrett (1978: 340) alone seems to express some reservation.

281n14, 293n77, 305n37, 306n45, 308n55, 310n60, 310n62, 312n73, 314, 319, 326, 326n17, 327n20, 339n88, 344, 358n5, 360n9, 363n23, 369, 377n6, 377n8, 379n15,

47 So the majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 305–6; Carson 1991: 346–47; Morris 1995: 404; Beasley-Murray 1999: 132; D. M. Smith 1999: 185; Borchert 1996: 301 n. 182; Burge 2000: 259; Bultmann 1971: 252 n. 2; contra R. Brown 1966: 354–55, 358; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.204–5; Moloney 1998: 277; Westcott 1908: 2.13–14.

102 Ridderbos 1997: 321–22; cf. Carson 1991: 357; Barrett 1978: 352; R. Brown 1966: 367; Burge 2000: 263.

105 Cf. Isa. 43:10, 13; so Ball 1996: 195–96; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.224; Burge 2000: 263.

112 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 126 n. m; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.223; R. Brown 1966: 360; Bultmann 1971: 327 n. 3; contra Burge 2000: 263.

14 Poirier (1996), Burge (2000: 273), and Kruse (2003: 220–21) take the purpose clause in 9:3b with 9:4, which is less likely.

77 See Michaels 1989: 170. Contra R. Brown (1966: 375), who believes that the man was only cast from their presence rather than being formally expelled. Burge (2000: 275) and Laney (1992: 180) also seem to hold this view.

37 The preposition ὑπέρ (hyper, for) here, as elsewhere in this Gospel, has the connotation of a sacrificial, substitutionary death (Carson 1991: 386; Barrett 1978: 375; Borchert 1996: 334; Burge 2000: 291).

45 So the vast majority of commentators, including Barrett, Beasley-Murray, Burge, Carson, Moloney, Morris, Ridderbos, Schnackenburg, and Witherington. For Jewish material indicating that the Messiah would gather the Gentiles, see Hofius 1967.

55 So Morris 1995: 457; cf. Carson 1991: 390; Beasley-Murray 1999: 172; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.303; Burge 2000: 293.

60 See Josephus, J.W. 5.5.1 §§184–85; Ant. 15.11.3 §§396–401; 20.9.7 §§220–21. So the vast majority of commentators, including Carson, Barrett, Morris, Beasley-Murray, R. Brown, Moloney, and Burge; contra Ridderbos 1997: 368.

62 Some see here a possible allusion to Ps. 118:10–12 (though not Barrett [1978: 380]). Burge (2000: 295) notes the presence of the same verb in Luke 21:20 with reference to Rome encircling Jerusalem before its destruction.

73 So, rightly, Carson (1991: 394–95), whose entire discussion repays careful reading (see also Morris 1995: 465; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174; Moloney 1998: 320; Burge 2000: 296; Laney 1992: 195; Stibbe 1993: 118; Westcott 1908: 2.68). Michaels (1989: 187) seems to conceive of Jesus' unity with the Father in functional terms (whether primarily or exclusively so), as both of them doing "the same work." Barrett (1978: 382) notes that the unity between the Father and the Son is also a unity of love and obedience.

17 Burge (2000: 312), contrary to conventional assumptions, insists that one must not assume that the three lived together and suggests that it would be natural for each of them to have been married.

20 Burge (2000: 312) notes the interesting fact that the women knew how to locate Jesus.

88 Other occurrences in John are 12:27; 13:21; 14:1, 27. Burge (2000: 318 n. 18) may take things a bit too far when he says that the word's "active use here may refer to the Spirit (as living water) within him."

5 See Köstenberger 2001b: 49–63. Ridderbos (1997: 413 [cf. Burge 2000: 336]) rightly contends that Mary is not the woman described in Luke 7 (though he perceives some degree of dependence on Mark 14:3–9 = Matt. 26:6–13). This view is rather common, though not universally so. Contra Holst (1976: 435–46), who on form-critical grounds believes that there is only one underlying historical event and that “variations arose in the course of oral transmission” (citing Dodd 1963: 172; other proponents include D. F. Strauss, Dibelius, and Bultmann).

9 The vast majority of commentators holds that the dinner probably was eaten on Saturday at some point during the day, presumably in the evening. See Carson 1991: 427; Barrett 1978: 410; Morris 1995: 510 n. 10; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 208; R. Brown 1966: 447; Burge 2000: 337. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.366) says that the meal could have been on Sunday or possibly Saturday evening.

23 This is the only NT passage in which Judas is called a thief, indeed, where he is charged with anything other than his ultimate betrayal of Jesus (though see Schnackenburg [1990: 2.368], who notes that the Synoptists, too, hint at Judas’s greed: Matt. 26:14–15; 27:3–10; Mark 14:10–11; Luke 22:3–5). Carson (1991: 428–29 [cf. Burge 2000: 339]) suggests that the consistent description of Judas as the one who betrayed Jesus resulted from the “shocking force of their hindsight.” It is as if the disciples’ minds had been permanently seared by their memory of him as the one who betrayed their master.

6 See commentary at 7:35, the only other occurrence of the term in John’s Gospel. A look at the remaining NT references indicates that in virtually all instances the term is used in contrast with “Jews” (Ἰουδαῖοι, Ioudaioi; see Acts 14:1; 16:1; 18:4; 19:10, 17; 20:21; Rom. 1:16; 2:9, 10; 3:9; 10:12; 1 Cor. 1:22, 24; 10:32; 12:13; Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11). That the “Greeks” mentioned here were not Diaspora Jews (as Calvin [1961: 35] thought) is accepted by virtually all major commentators (e.g., Westcott [1908: 2.120], who likens these to the Gentile magi at the beginning of Matthew’s Gospel; Ridderbos 1997: 427; Carson 1991: 436; Barrett 1978: 421; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.381; Witherington 1995: 223; Moloney 1998: 351; Burge 2000: 342).

8 So, for example, Burge 2000: 343. Levinskaya (1996) demonstrates the presence of God-fearers in Jewish assemblies during the first-century Roman Empire. Cf. Josephus, J.W. 6.9.3 §§420–27; Acts 8:27–28.

15 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 439; cf. Barrett 1978: 424; Beasley-Murray 1999: 211; R. Brown 1966: 467; Burge 2000: 344 n. 19. See Gen. 29:31, 33; Deut. 21:15; Matt. 6:24 par.; compare Luke 14:26 with Matt. 10:37.

24 Contra Carson (1991: 440 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 212; Burge 2000: 345]), who understands this to be a genuine question (“What shall I say?”) and takes the following statement as a positive prayer (“Father, save me from this hour!”). As Morris (1995: 528) rightly notes, this interpretation, in an effort to do justice to the genuineness of Jesus’ struggle, is unlikely in that it has Jesus utter a prayer and then immediately repudiate it. Moreover, even if the question is seen as rhetorical, this does not deny the reality of Jesus’ struggle but simply shows how he overcomes succumbing to merely human reasoning.

5 “New command” is in the emphatic position (Morris 1995: 562). The command probably harks back to the footwashing earlier in the chapter (Carson 1991: 484; Burge 2000: 376).

22 Most commentators take both occurrences of πιστεύετε (pisteute, believe, trust) in 14:1 as imperatives (e.g., Carson 1991: 488; Morris 1995: 566; Beasley-Murray 1999: 249; Burge 2000: 391; Westcott 1908: 2.167; Köstenberger 1999a: 163). Alternatively, the first form may be an indicative: “You trust in God; trust also in me” (NIV footnote) or interrogative (Bultmann 1971: 600). Schnackenburg (1990: 3.59) notes that 14:1b forms a chiasm (“[You] Trust in God, also in me trust”).

34 The importance of 14:6 in the context of the entire Gospel (not to mention Christian theology at large) can hardly be exaggerated. Ridderbos (1997: 493) calls it “the core statement of this entire Gospel.” Schnackenburg (1990: 3.65 [cited approvingly by Beasley-Murray 1999: 252]) says that this text “forms a classical summary of the Johannine doctrine of salvation.” Burge (2000: 392) calls it the premier expression of the Gospel’s theology.

49 Beasley-Murray (1999: 253) calls 14:10–11 “the needed counterpart of v 6b.” Burge (2000: 393) contends that the present passage “at last explains statements hinted [at] in the public ministry” (10:30, 37–38).

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

42 Several commentators note that joy in the present passage is akin to peace (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 681; Burge 2000: 418, with reference to 14:27–28). R. Brown (1970: 681) also notes that joy is presented here as a salvific gift and points to 3:29; 4:36; 8:56; 11:15; 14:28.

35 On the surface, 13:36 and 14:5 seem to contradict Jesus’ statement here, but in both previous passages the illocutionary force of the questions is a protest of Jesus’ announced departure rather than a sincere inquiry as to his destination or the implications of his leaving (Carson 1991: 532–33; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.126; R. Brown 1970: 710, followed by Beasley-Murray 1999: 279; note also the curious attempt at resolving the difficulty by Borchert 2002: 164). Burge (2000: 436) notes the present tense ἐρωτᾷ (erōta, asks).

57 Burge (2000: 450) ventures into precarious territory when he suggests that the Spirit may “also lead into new territory, new doctrines, and new activities unknown in Jesus’ historical ministry” (see, more fully, Burge 1987: 211–17). Clearly, the Spirit’s ministry may lead believers to see the significance and relevance of Jesus’ teaching in a way that would be impossible without his illuminating work, but it is less clear that the present passage should be construed along the lines of the mediation of substantively new revelation or even “new doctrines.” For a critique of this view, see especially Carson (1991: 542), who rightly cautions against diminishing the salvation-historical uniqueness of the vantage point assumed in the present passage.

59 So, rightly, Carson (1991: 543), who speaks of “Jesus’ departure in death and his return after his resurrection” (cf. Morris 1995: 623; Burge 2000: 440), and makes the point that these verses cannot apply to the parousia, because according to Jesus’ accompanying illustration in 16:20–24, there would have to be grief in the interim, while 15:11 promises joy. Contra Borchert (2002: 173 n. 295), who refers to Carson’s view as “narrow.”

76 Carson (1991: 548) notes how 16:28 sums up Jesus’ entire mission, from his sending from the Father (3:16–17) through the incarnation (1:10–11, 14) to his departure from the world (14:19) and his return to the Father (the dominant theme of chs. 14–17). Similarly, Borchert 2002: 179. Barrett (1978: 496) even calls the verse “a complete summary ... of the Christian faith,” Beasley-Murray (1999: 287) “at once a summary of Johannine Christology and the heart of this Gospel” (combined by Burge 2000: 443), and Stibbe (1996: 174) “the parade example of this theme of the eternal origin and destiny of Jesus the Messiah.”

1 Stibbe (1992: 111–12) contends that John’s characterization of Jesus in his passion narrative consists of three aspects: Jesus as judge, king, and elusive God. Stibbe also suggests that 18:1–27 serves as an “implicit commentary on the truth enunciated in 1:5” (i.e., the victory of the light over the darkness [p. 100]). On the relationship between the Johannine and the Synoptic passion narratives, see Ridderbos 1996: 569–72; Carson 1991: 571–76; Westcott 1908: 2.262–64. Burge (2000: 485–86) addresses the historical trustworthiness of the Johannine passion narrative. Moloney (1998: 482) divides 18:1–19:42 into five scenes on the basis of the introduction of new people and places. He also notes that this section begins and ends with κήπος (kēpos, garden). R. Brown (1970: 813–17), too, has an extensive discussion of the structure and historicity of John’s passion narrative. See also the examination of theological and literary features of this section in Schnackenburg 1990: 3.218–19.

12 So Blomberg 2002: 228–30; Burge 2000: 491; Morris 1995: 656 (though both the LXX and Josephus use the term also with reference to non-Roman military [2 Macc. 8:23; 12:20, 22; Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §215; J.W. 2.1.3 §11]). Cf. the cautious assessment by Ridderbos (1997: 575). Contra Keener (1993: 306), who maintains that both the “detachment of soldiers” and the “officials from the chief priests and Pharisees” refer to the temple police.

22 So Ridderbos 1997: 576; with reference to the threefold repetition of this phrase in this section, Morris 1995: 658 and Ball 1996: 201; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 322; Moloney 1998: 485; R. Brown 1970: 818; Borchert 2002: 219; Burge 2000: 492.

27 See Ezek. 1:28; 44:4; Dan. 2:46; 8:18; 10:9; Acts 9:4; 22:7; 26:14; Rev. 1:17; 19:10; 22:8. Contra Carson (1991: 578–79), who argues that the evangelist is not attempting to describe a theophanic manifestation, concluding that the soldiers simply responded “better than they knew” (cf. Witherington [1995: 286], who calls this an example of “Johannine double-entendre”; but see Bultmann 1971: 639; Burge 2000: 492; Conway 1999: 173). See also the legend cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 158.

12 That is, “the many meals and celebrations that week in the Passover season” (Burge 2000: 499; cf. Carson 1991: 590; see also Torrey 1931: 239–40). Contra Keener (1993: 307–308), who says that different calendars or John’s “making a symbolic point” account for the apparent discrepancy between John and the Synoptics (different calendars are also the “solution” presented by Laney [1992: 330, following Hoehner]).

72 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 601; cf. Morris 1995: 705; Beasley-Murray 1999: 340; Burge 2000: 505; Borchert 2002: 254. Contra Barrett (1978: 543), who thinks that the singular participle constructed from the verb παραδίδωμι (paradidōmi, I hand over) suggests Judas. See also the discussions by Schnackenburg (1990: 3.261–63) and Ridderbos (1997: 603), both of whom ultimately point to the Jews as the most likely referent. Stibbe (1992: 170) concludes that “the one” in 19:11 probably refers to Caiaphas as a representative of the Jewish nation, as the evangelist has a propensity to implicate the Jews in Jesus’ death.

2 So, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 608; Carson 1991: 608; Morris 1995: 711; Beasley-Murray 1999: 344; Borchert 2002: 260; Burge 2000: 524. Contra Moloney (1998: 506, following R. Brown), who contends that “the Jews” are the subject of the verb.

44 See Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 616; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Burge 2000: 528; contra Barrett 1978: 551–52; Bultmann 1971: 672 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.277. Carson (1991: 616 [cf. Morris 1995: 717]) notes that, like Jesus’ mother’s sister, Jesus’ mother is also unnamed here and elsewhere in the Gospel (as is the “disciple Jesus loved” in 19:26–27).

67 See Lev. Rab. 15.2 on Lev. 13:2. Commentators disagree as to whether or not the present reference is intended to counter incipient Docetism, which denied Jesus’ full humanity at his death. Some consider this unlikely (Ridderbos [1997: 620], who thinks that the present passage is simply designed to further support the reliability and eyewitness nature of the account; R. Brown 1970: 949–52), while a majority favors such a polemic purpose (e.g., Carson [1991: 623], who sees this verse as the “counterpoint” to 1:14; Barrett 1978: 556; Morris 1995: 724; Beasley-Murray 1999: 356; Borchert 2002: 276–77; Burge 2000: 532).

69 Burge (1987: 93–95), referring to 7:37–39, views 19:34 as “a proleptic symbol of the release of the Spirit,” which is realized in 20:22. He views this as an instance of Johannine paradox: what was meant to ensure the victim’s death resulted in the unleashing of the life-giving water/Spirit within. However, Burge’s understanding of 19:34 is predicated upon a christological reading of 7:37–39 (see commentary and critique there).

4 Carson (1991: 635–36 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 371]) suggests that Mary was alone during her first trip to the tomb (contra Morris 1995: 734; Moloney 1998: 522; Witherington 1995: 323; Burge 2000: 553). Mary’s witness was not used as significantly in the preaching of the early church as that of Peter, doubtless because evidence provided by a woman was held in lesser esteem (e.g., m. Roš Haš. 1.8). This is underscored by the fact that Jesus’ encounter with Mary is not included in the resurrection appearances to the disciples cited in 21:14.

24 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 638; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Borchert 2002: 295; R. Brown 1970: 987; Bultmann 1971: 684; Burge 2000: 554; Laney 1992: 360. Witherington (1995: 325) suggests, less plausibly, that the beloved disciple believed that Jesus had been taken by God similar to Elijah. Morris (1995: 736) notes that the two verbs do not have explicit objects, supplying the graveclothes as the object of the beloved disciple’s “seeing” and Jesus’ resurrection as that of the disciple's "believing" (albeit without understanding its full theological significance). Hardly plausible is the suggestion by Minear (1983: 91 n. 14, with reference to 1976 [followed by Conway 1999: 189–90]) that what the disciples believed was the statement of Mary Magdalene in 20:2.

14 Commentators are not agreed as to whether Mary had already touched Jesus or was about to do so. Some say that Mary had already touched him (e.g., Morris 1995: 742; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.318; Witherington 1995: 331; R. Brown 1970: 992; Burge 2000: 555), while others seem to allow for the possibility that she was about to but had not yet done so (e.g., Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. g, 376; Bultmann 1971: 687). Regarding Mary's devotion, see Ruth 1:16. Stibbe (1993: 205) says that the present passage is "most stylized" and detects intertextual echoes with Song 3:1–3.

18 R. Brown (1970: 1012, 1015–16) relates Jesus' words to Mary with his promised giving of the Spirit. In 14:18–19, Jesus promised that he would return to his disciples. On the basis of these words, Mary may have thought that Jesus had returned and would continue their former relationship on a permanent basis. Jesus corrects her misunderstanding in the present passage by showing that this permanent relationship would be established by the giving of the Spirit (see Burge 2000: 556–57, with further reference to the "not yet" in 7:39).

16 The critique by Hatina (1993), who says that the reference is to the indwelling Paraclete, fails to convince. Contrary to the view of many commentators, the present pericope does not constitute the Johannine equivalent to Pentecost (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1038; Barrett [1978: 570], who says that the present passage cannot be harmonized with Acts 2; Bultmann 1971: 691), nor is Calvin's (1961: 205) proposal satisfactory that at 20:22 the disciples "were only sprinkled with His grace and not [as at Pentecost] saturated with full power." Beasley-Murray (1999: 382 [followed by Borchert 2002: 307–8]) believes that John telescoped the giving of the Spirit without concern for chronology (citing the reference to the ascension in 20:17 as a parallel). M. Turner (1977) thinks that the reference is not to the Spirit at all but to Jesus' message as Spirit and life. The treatment by Moloney (1998: 532, 535) is rather idiosyncratic. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.325), too, surprisingly contends that the Johannine instance involves all believers, while the events in Acts 2 pertain to the apostles. If anything, one might have expected the opposite kind of reasoning, with John's account anticipating the general outpouring narrated in Acts 2. Against the view of Burge (2000: 558 [cf. Burge 1987: 148–49]), who notes the connection between the present passage and Jesus' promise to send the Spirit in John 14 and 16, the present event does not mark the actual fulfillment of these promises other than by way of anticipatory sign. Keener's (2003: 1196–1200, see also 1204–6) discussion, including an attempted refutation of M. Turner (1998), remains inconclusive and, on the whole, fails to convince.

14 So, rightly, the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 197: 648; Morris 1995: 754; Carson 1991: 659; Beasley-Murray 1999: 386; Burge 2000: 563; Barrett 1978: 573; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.334; contra Borchert 2002: 316; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

21 The verb "wrap [clothes] around [oneself]" (διαζώννυμι, diazōnnymi) occurs in the NT only in John (Luke employs the LXX form περιζώννυμι, perizōnnymi). Burge (2000: 583–84) adduces some interesting evidence regarding fishing practices on the Sea of Galilee (see also Burge 1998), though there appears to be some incongruity in his suggesting at one point that Peter dove into the water "checking the cast nets (21:7)" and his comments elsewhere that Peter jumped in in order to swim to Jesus.

Burkett, D. 321n1
Burns, J. A. 19n3
Burrows, E. W. 63
Busada, C. J. 400n1
Busse, U. 377n5
Byrne, B. 564n25

32 So, for example, R. Brown (1970: 1076), who sees the origin of the number in authentic eyewitness, citing 21:24. Note also the presence of the sons of Zebedee, according to 21:2. Large numbers elsewhere in John are meant literally as well (e.g., 2:6; 12:3); Schlatter (1948: 368) notes that the large number of fish caught points to Jesus' generous, abundant provision, citing 2:6; 6:13. More questionable are Burge's (2000: 586) reference to 153 being "numerically important" for "Greek mathematicians" and Bultmann's (1971: 709) assertion that the number is allegorical "since it is not a round number." For proper cautions against allegorical interpretations, see Ridderbos 1997: 663.

1 Stibbe (1994: 39) calls the function of the present pericope "crucial" and "pivotal." Various attempts have been made to isolate sources underlying the existing narrative, but as Dodd (1963: 230 [cited in M. Harris 1986: 311]) points out, "Nowhere perhaps, in this gospel, have attempts to analyse out a written source, or sources, proved less convincing, and if the evangelist is following a traditional story of fixed pattern, he has covered his tracks." This observation also holds true for the attempts by Burkett (1994: 209–32) to isolate two previous accounts of Lazarus's resurrection that allegedly have been combined into one in John 11.

3 For a comprehensive chart delineating narrative time in John's Gospel, see Culpepper 1983: 70. See also Burns 1971 and the chapter entitled "Structuring Time in the Fourth Gospel" in M. Davies 1992: 44–66.

1 Cf. "six days before the Passover" in 12:1; "the next day" in 12:12. Carson (1991: 455–58) rightly concludes that Jesus and his disciples ate a true paschal meal on Thursday, 15 Nisan (contra Barrett 1978: 50–51; R. Brown 1970: 556; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.36). On the chronology of the passion narrative in John and the Synoptics (siding with Carson, despite Morris 1995: 688–90), see the sidebar in Köstenberger 1999a: 146, with further bibliographical references (see also Köstenberger 2002c: 130, 164, 173; Blomberg 1987: 175–80; Carson 1984: 530–32). Some seek to adjudicate apparent differences between the presentations in John and the Synoptics by the theory that differences in chronology are due to the use of different calendars. John, it is suggested, like the Judeans and the Sadducees, uses a lunar sunset-to-sunset calendar, while the Synoptics, like the Galileans, the Pharisees, and Jesus and his followers, employ a solar sunrise-to-sunrise reckoning (Hoehner 1977: 85–90; see chart on p. 89; Morris 1995: 684–95); or, John's calendric usage shifts: his light-darkness theme (rooted in the Genesis account) is conveyed by way of a solar calendar, while elsewhere a lunar system is found (building on exodus redemptive motifs) (Busada 2003). However, these theories seem to lack a clear textual base in the Gospels themselves and are unnecessarily complicated if the solution argued here is adopted.

5 Beutler (1990: 335–45) contends that John 12:20 echoes Isa. 52:15 LXX and suggests that John 12:20–50 may constitute a "great inclusion" with 1:19–34. Contra E. Schwartz's famous dictum (quoted in Busse 1992: 2085) that the Greeks here seem "ghostlike," Busse (1992) argues that 12:20–36 is part of the evangelist's literary strategy and consciously anticipates the epilogue in John 21 (compare esp. 21:18 with 10:11, 15, and 21:19 with 12:33).

25 Carson (1991: 638–39 [contra Bultmann 1971: 684]) suggests, on the basis of Luke 24:12, that Peter did not believe at this time (cf. D. M. Smith 1999: 374). Byrne (1985: 92) calls him “the odd-man-out” within the context of John 20. Morris (1995: 737, following Michaels 1989: 336) says that Peter could have believed, and the evangelist may have chosen to present the beloved disciple’s reaction as his own while describing Peter from an external point of view.

17 Calvin (1959: 7) remarks, “I think he calls the Son of God ‘the Word’ ... simply because, first, He is the eternal wisdom and will of God, and secondly, because He is the express image of His purpose. For just as in men speech is called the expression of the thoughts, so it is not inappropriate to apply this to God and say that He expresses Himself to us by His Speech or Word.”

36 Hence, the present reference is to light that only believers possess; contra Calvin (1959: 11), who speaks of the “light” of common grace given to humans, that is, ethical rationality, which animals lack: “I think that this is a reference to that part of life in which men surpass the other animate creatures. It is as if he were saying that the life given to men was not life in general but life united with the light of reason.”

37 “Overcome” or an equivalent is favored also by Morris 1995: 76; Moloney 1998: 36; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.245–46; Laney 1992: 39; Lindars 1972: 87; Schlatter 1948: 9 (“καταλαμβάνω never means ‘understand’ in John”); and Westcott 1908: 1.9–10. Carson (1991: 138) thinks that John might have both meanings (“overcome” and “comprehend”) in mind (so also Whitacre 1999: 53) and likes the ambiguity in BAGD’s translation, “master” (see BDAG 520). Keener (2003: 387) believes that John’s use of κατέλαβεν in 1:5 is an instance of traductio, a play on the multiple meanings of a word (here “comprehend” and “overcome”). Keener notes that the word occurs in Wis. 7:30 but admits that there the term clearly means “overcome” and no wordplay is present. Burge (2000: 56) agrees that both are at work, but he sees “overcome” as being dominant. Calvin (1959: 12) translates “comprehend.” The major translations divide more or less evenly between the two options, usually mentioning the one not chosen in a footnote: (1) NIV: “understood”; NASB, NKJV: “comprehend”; (2) NLT: “extinguish”; NET: “mastered”; ISV: “put out”; HCSB, ESV, NRSV: “overcome.” Notably, the TNIV changed the NIV’s “understood” to “overcome.”

59 Calvin (1959: 17) understands ἐξουσία in 1:12 as “honor”; Schlatter (1948: 19) glosses the word as “authorization” (Ermächtigung).

48 Calvin (1959: 34) here argues for an “unliteral and figurative” interpretation, with “dove” referring to the Spirit by metonymy.

92 Calvin (1959: 40) trenchantly comments on Philip’s witness to Jesus, “He foolishly calls Jesus the son of Joseph and ignorantly makes Him a Nazarene, but all the same, he leads Nathanael to none other than the Son of God who was born in Bethlehem.”

36 Cf. Carson 1991: 177; 1984: 441; Morris 1995: 167; Laney 1992: 70; Westcott 1908: 1.96–97; Calvin 1959: 51; Köstenberger 1999a: 76–78. Carson (1991: 177, referring to Morris) notes that virtually all of John 1–5 (except for the sections on John the Baptist) is non-Synoptic material. Morris (1995: 167 n. 55) states that “there are practically no resemblances between the two narratives, apart from the central act”; only five words are shared. Other commentators holding this view are Luther, W. Hendriksen, and R. V. G. Tasker (Kreitzer 1998: 94).

29 Some interpreters, including Calvin (1959: 90), think that the words of 4:9b (missing from some MSS) are spoken by the Samaritan woman.

9 See Carson 1991: 240. Bultmann (1971: 240) claims that the festival is Passover, based on his switching the order of John 5 and 6, but this is unlikely, since the evangelist clearly identifies Passover everywhere else in his Gospel. Also unlikely is Michaels's (1989: 85) theory that the present pericope was transposed from Jesus' first Passover in Jerusalem (cf. 2:23; 3:2). Many commentators choose to remain agnostic on which feast is in view (Keener 2003: 635), regarding its identity as either unknown (Ridderbos 1997: 184; Morris 1995: 265 n. 6) or of secondary interest (R. Brown 1966: 206), or both (Carson 1991: 241). Calvin (1959: 116) thinks that the feast probably is Pentecost.

72 So Ridderbos 1997: 235–37; cf. Carson 1991: 295; Morris 1995: 331–32; contra Moloney 1998: 223; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.55; Lindars 1972: 267; Talbert 1992: 140. As Keener (2003: 690) observes, "John's words [in 6:27–63] invite his audience to look to Christ's death itself, not merely those symbols which point to his death." At best, any such overtones are derivative (Borchert 1996: 270–71; cf. Brodie 1993: 286; Calvin 1959: 170).

87 Calvin (1959: 177) comments, "It is dreadful and monstrous that so kind and friendly an invitation of Christ should have alienated the minds of many, especially those who had earlier been on His side and were even His close disciples. But this example is put before us as a mirror to see how great is the world's depravity and ingratitude, which heaps up material to stumble over even on the smooth way of life, that it may not come to Christ."

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee's observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus "from within him" refers to "whoever believes in me." Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of "rivers of living water" (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987: 88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

11 A survey of major commentaries shows that about half provide a regular commentary (Carson, Laney, Lindars, Whitacre, Calvin, Westcott), while the other half refrain from comment (Michaels, Talbert, Stibbe, Brodie, D. M. Smith), in some cases choosing not to address the issue at all (e.g., Schlatter [1948: 205], who in his scholarly commentary moves directly from 7:52 to 8:12 without comment, though his popular commentary [1962: 139–41] does treat the pericope adulterae in deference to "ecclesiastical tradition"; see also Zahn [1921: 404], who, like Schlatter, moves immediately from 7:52 to 8:12 and deals with the pericope in a lengthy excursus on pp. 723–30).

15 Noted by Calvin 1959: 239. See John 6:28; Ps. 64:9; 66:5; 78:7; Jer. 51:10; Tob. 12:6, 7, 11; 2 Macc. 3:36; 1QS 4:4.

69 Ridderbos (1997: 396) persuasively argues that 11:25b refers to "death in the natural sense and to living in the sense of eternal life," while "lives" in 11:26a "refers to natural human existence, while 'never die' refers to the eternal life that natural death can neither prevent nor affect" (so also Bultmann 1971: 403, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.331; Stibbe 1994: 51). Contra Carson (1991: 413), R. Brown (1966: 425), and Borchert (1996: 356) (also Calvin and Schlatter), who maintain that "lives" in 11:26a refers to eternal life. Wuellner (1991: 182) calls the present statement an oxymoron.

102 Calvin (1961: 13) comments that Jesus comes “like a wrestler preparing for the contest”: “no wonder that He groans again, for the violent tyranny of death which He had to overcome stands before His eyes.” Wallace (1996: 631) takes ἐμβριμώμενος (embrimōmenos, bristling) to be a causal participle; my preference is attendant circumstance.

26 Beasley-Murray (1999: 209) notes that there is no way of knowing whether or not Mary was aware of the significance of her act, while Laney (1992: 221) thinks that “Mary must have sensed the darkness of the hour.” Calvin (1961: 27) observes that “a thing is said to be kept when it is held in store to be brought out appropriately and opportunely.”

6 See commentary at 7:35, the only other occurrence of the term in John’s Gospel. A look at the remaining NT references indicates that in virtually all instances the term is used in contrast with “Jews” (Ἰουδαῖοι, Ioudaioi; see Acts 14:1; 16:1; 18:4; 19:10, 17; 20:21; Rom. 1:16; 2:9, 10; 3:9; 10:12; 1 Cor. 1:22, 24; 10:32; 12:13; Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11). That the “Greeks” mentioned here were not Diaspora Jews (as Calvin [1961: 35] thought) is accepted by virtually all major commentators (e.g., Westcott [1908: 2.120], who likens these to the Gentile magi at the beginning of Matthew’s Gospel; Ridderbos 1997: 427; Carson 1991: 436; Barrett 1978: 421; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.381; Witherington 1995: 223; Moloney 1998: 351; Burge 2000: 342).

18 What is more, as Calvin (1961: 39) notes, “From this we learn better the enormity of sin, for which the heavenly Father exacted so dreadful a punishment from His only begotten Son. So we must learn that death was no pastime or game to Christ, but that He was cast into severest torments for our sake.”

4 So Morris (1995: 544), citing Calvin (1961: 60), who denounces annual footwashing rites as “theatrical,” “empty and bare,” “ceremonial comedy,” and “shameful mockery of Christ.” See also Carson 1991: 458.

10 Schlatter (1948: 289) notes that Jesus was first one who gave (Gebende) and only then one who commanded (Gebietende). Schlatter relates the “new commandment” to the “new grace of the new covenant” (p. 288, contra Calvin).

45 Calvin (1961: 78) writes “I do not refer these words to Christ’s divine essence, but to the mode of the revelation.”

70 The translation of the term has proved particularly difficult since there does not seem to be an exact equivalent in the English language (see discussion in Carson 1991: 499). None of the expressions chosen in English translations seems fully adequate: “Counselor” (NIV) smacks of contemporary notions of counseling (marriage counselor, camp counselor), focusing primarily on emotional or psychological aspects (though the legal term “Counselor” or “Counsel” is more appropriate); “Helper” (NASB, ESV, ISV) is more neutral but conveys inferior status overtones not present in the text and lacks the legal connotation possibly present (cf. the discussion in Lindars 1972: 479); the fact that some translations give several alternative renderings in footnotes also suggests that any one English rendering may be inadequate (e.g., NLT: “the Counselor; or Comforter, or Encourager, or Advocate”). “Companion” (suggested by Brodie [1993: 466]) also falls short, as does Calvin’s (1961: 82) “Patron.” Some make reference to the root meaning of the word, “one called alongside to help,” but it is unclear whether first-century usage consciously drew on this background. There is evidence that the expression was used in a legal setting, but it is less clear that the meaning should be restricted to “Advocate” (so, consistently, the TNIV) or the like (standard Greek reference works cite the following meanings: LSJ—one called to one’s aid, legal assistant, advocate, summoned, intercessor; Behm, TDNT 5:800–814—legal advisor, helper, advocate in court [for a helpful survey, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.144–50]). Perhaps “helping presence” captures the import of the term better than any other (Köstenberger 1999a: 157) for the following reasons: (1) this is what Jesus was while with the disciples; (2) this encompasses the various functions laid out for the Spirit in John 14–16; (3) this transcends (but may include) the legal context of the term (see esp. 16:7–11). See the discussion by Ridderbos (1997: 503), who issues a plea to let the Johannine context (rather than alleged extrabiblical parallels) determine the meaning of παράκλητος and concludes that “the dominant idea is of someone who offers assistance in a situation in which help is needed.”

57 See Borchert 2002: 150; Carson 1991: 523; and Calvin (1961: 101), who notes that this “is as good as saying that they did not obtain by their own skill or industry whatever they have.” The pronoun ἐγώ (egō, I) is emphatic (Barrett 1978: 478); the conjunction ἀλλὰ (alla, but) is strongly adversative and stresses the contrast between Jesus choosing his disciples and the contemporary practice of disciples choosing to attach themselves to a particular rabbi.

64 While acknowledging that “the equation of the mother in labour with the disciples in bereavement seems to be the first order of reference and application,” Stibbe (1993: 175) argues that the symbol is multivalent. According to Stibbe, the second order of reference is the impending agony of Jesus on the cross (citing 19:34; cf. 7:38). If so, then Jesus’ death is described here as a childbirth experience. Calvin (1961: 125) takes the symbolism in a different direction, saying that believers are like women in labor both in that they have already entered God’s kingdom and in that they are still “held captive in the penitentiary of the flesh” and long for their eternal destiny.

70 Calvin (1961: 129) comments, “He now says that His Word has hitherto been allegorical in comparison with that clear light of understanding which He would soon give them by the grace of His Spirit.”

34 On “your name,” see also 17:26 (see commentary at 14:13). On “those whom you gave me,” see 17:2. Regarding “out of the world,” see 1:9–10; 15:19. Regarding the phrase “they were yours, and you gave them to me,” Calvin (1961: 139) comments that this speaks of “the eternity of election,” “not by faith, nor by any merit, but by pure grace.” It might be added that God’s election is presented here as the grounds for the perseverance of those so chosen (“they have kept your word”).

73 Contra Calvin (1961: 149), who interprets this reference in terms of the restoration of God’s image in sinful humankind through Christ. On “glory,” see 17:1, 4, 5.

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235). Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

20 Calvin (1961: 159) puts it memorably: “He had boasted that he would prove an invincible fighter and triumphant unto death. Now, at the voice of one maid, and that without any threatening, he is confounded and throws down his weapons.” Conway (1999: 174) cites O’Day

574n16, 593n31
Campbell, R. J. 111n37
Cantwell, L. 142, 152, 153
Caragounis, C. C. 244n80
Carroll, S. T. 32
Carson, D. A. xi, xii, 1n2, 2, 2n5, 7n17, 8, 8n18, 8n19, 8n20, 8n21, 9, 16, 17n28, 17n29, 19, (1995: 808): “The words of Peter’s denial ... are the antithesis of Jesus’ words of self-identification and revelation from 18:1–12, ‘I am.’ ”

4 Lindars (1972: 610) says, “This does not mean that his body is ethereal, able to pass through locked doors,” but “rather that he can make himself present at any time and place ‘where two or three are gathered in my name.’ ” Similarly, Calvin 1961: 202.

16 The critique by Hatina (1993), who says that the reference is to the indwelling Paraclete, fails to convince. Contrary to the view of many commentators, the present pericope does not constitute the Johannine equivalent to Pentecost (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1038; Barrett [1978: 570], who says that the present passage cannot be harmonized with Acts 2; Bultmann 1971: 691), nor is Calvin’s (1961: 205) proposal satisfactory that at 20:22 the disciples “were only sprinkled with His grace and not [as at Pentecost] saturated with full power.” Beasley-Murray (1999: 382 [followed by Borchert 2002: 307–8]) believes that John telescoped the giving of the Spirit without concern for chronology (citing the reference to the ascension in 20:17 as a parallel). M. Turner (1977) thinks that the reference is not to the Spirit at all but to Jesus’ message as Spirit and life. The treatment by Moloney (1998: 532, 535) is rather idiosyncratic. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.325), too, surprisingly contends that the Johannine instance involves all believers, while the events in Acts 2 pertain to the apostles. If anything, one might have expected the opposite kind of reasoning, with John’s account anticipating the general outpouring narrated in Acts 2. Against the view of Burge (2000: 558 [cf. Burge 1987: 148–49]), who notes the connection between the present passage and Jesus’ promise to send the Spirit in John 14 and 16, the present event does not mark the actual fulfillment of these promises other than by way of anticipatory sign. Keener’s (2003: 1196–1200, see also 1204–6) discussion, including an attempted refutation of M. Turner (1998), remains inconclusive and, on the whole, fails to convince.

31 Contra efforts to unlock the alleged numerical symbolism, as does Brodie (1993: 586–88), who notes that 153 is the triangular number of 17, which is the sum of both 10+7 and 12+5, all four of which are significant numbers in the Gospel. Calvin (1961: 217) called these kinds of efforts “childish trifling.” On a different note, Ridderbos (1997: 663) categorically states that “carefully counting the fish after a catch was probably never done,” but it is unclear on what basis he can make such a sweeping pronouncement.

37 A third possibility (held by only a few) is that there was only one clearing, at the beginning of Jesus’ ministry, and John got it right (J. A. T. Robinson 1985: 127–31; Campbell 1982: 117). Finally, fourth, Buchanan (1991: 284) says, “Jesus never cleansed the temple at all but instead this event had been attributed to him from the necessity of the doctrines and messianic expectations” (cited in Ådna 2000: 21 n. 67).

80 For an argument supporting “not yet” as the original reading, see Caragounis 1998.

2 See the recent paper by O’Day (2002), who says that the abandonment of the apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel has “created space” for new readings of the Gospel. Others, however, view the results of the rejection of the apostolic authorship of John’s Gospel in less positive terms. In any case, the summary way in which Johannine authorship is regularly dismissed in contemporary scholarship is without justification, for this theory of authorship has never been definitively refuted (Köstenberger 2001b: 17–47). Though only a theory, it continues to be a possible and, I would argue, eminently plausible hypothesis based on both external and internal evidence (see, e.g., Carson 1991: 68–81; Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 138–57; and the discussion below).

5 The essays on history and theology in the Fourth Gospel and on the question of the Fourth Gospel's authorship by Morris (1969: 65–292) still repay careful study. For an interesting application of Clement's statement, see Thielman 1991: 183 in the context of his entire article. The reference to Clement's Hypotyposeis is found in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14. See also Thompson (2002: 2), who rightly notes, "Whatever Clement meant in calling John 'a spiritual Gospel,' it is doubtful that he meant to contrast 'facts' in the modern sense and 'interpretation.' ... [A] 'spiritual' Gospel gives the inner meaning of an event or reality and, hence, its truth must be spiritually discerned." Thompson rightly maintains that "the modern view" that calls into question the historicity of any item in John that "stands in the service of his theological or interpretive agenda" constitutes "a very strange way to imagine that theology works, and perhaps could only have been thought of by people actually not doing theology." Thompson (2002: 3) proceeds to call for greater sophistication in biblical scholars' philosophy of history. Carson (1991: 29) similarly disavows attributing to Clement a dichotomy between "spiritual" and "historical"; he suggests that "spiritual" may mean "allegorical" or "symbol-laden."

17 One tricky piece of evidence concerns the second-century writer Papias (cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.4–5), a contemporary of Polycarp, who, in turn, was a disciple of the apostle John (on the date of Papias, see Yarbrough 1983; Munck 1959). Papias (at least to Eusebius) seems to refer to two separate Johns, the apostle and a "John the elder." On this basis some have conjectured that the latter, rather than the former, wrote the Fourth Gospel. However, there is no need to drive a wedge between the two references to John in the passage in question. To the contrary, John may be designated "the elder" in the latter part of the quotation precisely because he is grouped with the elders mentioned earlier in the same passage. For a sound critique of the "John the elder" hypothesis, see Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 141–43. Keener (2003: 95–98) likewise challenges the reliability of Eusebius's interpretation of Papias, owing to the former's agenda of seeking to denigrate the Apocalypse. Keener (2003: 102–3) also includes an insightful discussion of the plausibility of John writing the Gospel at an advanced age. See also the works cited in Bauckham 1993: 27 n. 17 and the important essay by Hill (1998), who adduces from Eusebius's (Hist. eccl. 3.24.5–13, esp. 11) reference to Papias (without naming him) that Papias held John the apostle to be the author of the Fourth Gospel (contra Bauckham 1993; Hengel 1989a; note my review of Hengel's more extensive 1993 German monograph on the subject, Köstenberger 1996). For studies of the external evidence regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, see Bauckham 1993: 24 n. 1.

18 Irenaeus, Haer. 2.22.5; 3.3.4 (quoted by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.23.3–4), places John's death during the reign of Trajan (A.D. 98–117); Jerome (Vir. ill. 9) says that John died in the sixty-eighth year after Jesus' passion (i.e., A.D. 98 or 101). Regarding John being the last to write his Gospel, see Irenaeus, Haer. 3.1.1; Clement, cited by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7; and Eusebius himself, Hist. eccl. 3.24.7. See Carson 1991: 83.

19 See especially Alexander 1992 and Goodman 1992. For a fuller development and further bibliography, see Köstenberger forthcoming. For a critique of the Martyn/Brown-style "Johannine community" hypothesis, see Köstenberger 1998b: 200–210; Carson 1991: 35–36, 87–88, 369–72; and commentary at 9:22 below.

20 Very few would argue for a date prior to A.D. 70, as do J. A. T. Robinson 1976: 254–85 (but see the refutation in Kerr 2002: 19–25; see also Carson 1991: 82–86); Morris 1995: 25–30 (with reference to Cribbs 1970; Torrey 1936: x–xi); and Wallace 1990 (but see the present commentary at 5:2). However, the cumulative weight of the following internal evidence must be judged to favor a post–A.D. 70 date (cf. Croteau 2003): the references to the Sea of Tiberias in 6:1 and 21:1; Thomas’s confession of Jesus as “my Lord and my God” in 20:28 (contra emperor worship in time of Domitian?); the reference to Peter’s martyrdom (21:19); and the lack of reference to the Sadducees (Schlatter 1948: 44; though see the caution in Carson 1991: 84)—not to mention the comparative ease with which the Fourth Evangelist equates Jesus with God (e.g., 1:1, 14; 10:30; 20:28; see Carson 1991: 85, though note his caveats on p. 84) or external evidence such as Clement of Alexandria’s statement, cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7, “Last of all, John, perceiving that the external facts had been made plain [in the Synoptics] ... composed a spiritual gospel.” This is true especially since the major pieces of evidence cited in support of a pre–A.D. 70 date—the lack of reference to the destruction of the temple and the use of a present-tense verb in 5:2 to refer to the Sheep Gate pool—are not determinative and are capable of alternative explanations (see, e.g., Schlatter 1948: 23–24).

21 See Carson (1991: 85), who tentatively suggests a date of A.D. 80–85, in part because he finds it “hard to believe that, if the Fourth Gospel were written after AD 70, the date was immediately after AD 70... . The reverberations around the Empire, for both Jews and Christians, were doubtless still too powerful. A little time needed to elapse ... before a document like the Fourth Gospel could be free not to make an explicit allusion to the destruction of the temple.”

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon’s work is given extensive coverage in Origen’s commentary on John’s Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John’s Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάραξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that “the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel’s] use”; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges “the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

29 But note the “interlocking traditions” enumerated in Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 161–62. See also the internal evidence for John’s awareness of Synoptic tradition, if not one or more of the written Gospels, listed in Köstenberger 1999a: 36–37 (1:40: Andrew, “Simon Peter’s brother”; 3:24: “This was before John [the Baptist] was put in prison”; 4:44: a prophet is without honor in his own country [cf. Mark 6:4 pars.]; 11:1–2: Bethany, “village of Mary and her sister Martha” [cf. Luke 10:38–42]; 6:67, 71: the Twelve; Judas, “one of the Twelve”).

31 So the majority of commentators, including Morris 1995: 66; Carson 1991: 137; Haenchen

1984: 1.113–14; Schnackenburg 1970: 1.239–40; Barrett 1978: 156–57; and Schlatter 1948: 5–6. Among the translations that construe ὁ γέγονεν with what precedes are the NASB, NIV, NKJV, ISV, NLT, HCSB, ESV, and TNIV.

37 “Overcome” or an equivalent is favored also by Morris 1995: 76; Moloney 1998: 36; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.245–46; Laney 1992: 39; Lindars 1972: 87; Schlatter 1948: 9 (“καταλαμβάνω never means ‘understand’ in John”); and Westcott 1908: 1.9–10. Carson (1991: 138) thinks that John might have both meanings (“overcome” and “comprehend”) in mind (so also Whitacre 1999: 53) and likes the ambiguity in BAGD’s translation, “master” (see BDAG 520). Keener (2003: 387) believes that John’s use of κατέλαβεν in 1:5 is an instance of traductio, a play on the multiple meanings of a word (here “comprehend” and “overcome”). Keener notes that the word occurs in Wis. 7:30 but admits that there the term clearly means “overcome” and no wordplay is present. Burge (2000: 56) agrees that both are at work, but he sees “overcome” as being dominant. Calvin (1959: 12) translates “comprehend.” The major translations divide more or less evenly between the two options, usually mentioning the one not chosen in a footnote: (1) NIV: “understood”; NASB, NKJV: “comprehend”; (2) NLT: “extinguish”; NET: “mastered”; ISV: “put out”; HCSB, ESV, NRSV: “overcome.” Notably, the TNIV changed the NIV’s “understood” to “overcome.”

45 Among those who take 1:9 as a preliminary reference to the incarnation are Ridderbos 1997: 43; Carson 1991: 122; Borchert 1996: 112–13; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.255; Laney 1992: 41. Moloney (1998: 37) sees a hint to the incarnation already in 1:3c–4. There also may be an implied contrast with Hellenistic religions that offered false “light.”

50 Schnackenburg (1990: 1.256) claims that the reference is not to Jesus’ earthly ministry but to Israel’s history prior to the incarnation. Similarly, R. Brown (1966: 30) cites the parallel of Wisdom in 1 Enoch 42:2: “Wisdom came to make her dwelling place among the children of men and found no dwelling place.” More likely, the reference is anticipatory of the Word’s incarnation in 1:14 (Culpepper 1980–81: 13–14; Carson 1991: 122; Ridderbos 1997: 43; Moloney 1998: 37). On a literal level, see the reference in Luke 2:7 that there was “no guest room available” (TNIV) for Jesus and his parents at his birth, which may have spiritual overtones as well.

51 Barrett (1978: 162) sees only one sense of κόσμος in this verse. Morris (1995: 85) contends that the first two instances refer to everyone, while the third reference is to those who came in contact with Jesus. Beasley-Murray (1999: 12) sees a progression from “the world inhabited by humankind” in 1:10a to “the world including human beings” in 1:10b to “humanity, fallen and in darkness” in 1:10c. Carson (1991: 123) demonstrates that the word κόσμος never has a positive usage (contra Burge 2000: 57) and only a few neutral ones.

54 This is the view of, among others, Carson 1991: 125; Dodd 1953: 402; R. Brown 1966: 10; Morris 1995: 85; Borchert 1996: 114; Burge 2000: 59. For a demonstration that 1:11, properly interpreted and understood (particularly the world as God’s property), refutes the notion, advanced by Bultmann, that John reflects gnostic thought, see Jervell 1956: 17–18. But see also the interaction with Jervell in Pryor 1990: 210–14.

60 Some identify “children of God,” not “those who believe,” as the antecedent of the relative clause beginning 1:13 in order not to make faith follow regeneration (Bultmann 1971: 59 nn. 4–5). However, this is both syntactically awkward and implausible, as well as theologically unnecessary. In the Greek syntax, “those who believe” immediately precedes the relative clause and is thus most naturally taken as the antecedent, and the relationship between faith and rebirth is not easily reduced to a set sequential formula. The statement in 1 John 5:1, “Everyone who believes that Jesus is the Christ is born of God,” allows one to deduce from a person’s belief that person’s regenerate state; regeneration (being “born of God”) and saving faith thus go together and cannot be separated. Spiritual rebirth takes place at God’s initiative; people are called to faith based on God’s revelation in Christ. John nowhere elaborates on the precise temporal relationship of these two aspects. Here and elsewhere in his Gospel (6:44–45; 10:26; 12:37–40), he affirms both divine sovereignty and human responsibility, and interpreters should do no less (see Carson 1981).

61 Cf. Borchert (1996: 118), who says that spiritual birth is not the result of bloodline relations. Witherington (1995: 56) paraphrases this as “ethnic origins,” Carson (1991: 126) as “natural descent.”

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

77 The antecedent of πλήρης (plērēs, full) is subject to debate. If declinable, it refers to ὁ λόγος (R. Brown 1966: 14; Morris 1995: 94). If indeclinable, it should be taken with δόξαν (Carson 1991: 129) or αὐτοῦ, as is perhaps most likely (so BDAG 827; Ridderbos 1997: 54 n. 117). In any case, fullness of grace and truth is predicated of Jesus.

86 See also Wallace 1996: 365–68, referring to Waltke 1958: 1.166–76; R. Brown 1966: 16; and especially the excellent, definitive discussion in Carson 1991: 131–34, referring also to R. Edwards 1988; La Potterie 1977: 1.145–50.

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e;

Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

15 See also Mark’s conflation of Mal. 3:1 (“I will send my messenger”) and Isa. 40:3 (also found in John 1:23 and Synoptic parallels) in Mark 1:2–3. Carson (1991: 143) notes that false prophets sometimes dressed in a manner similar to Elijah (see Zech. 13:4).

24 So Ridderbos 1997: 66 n. 10; Morris 1995: 122; Carson 1991: 144; Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292; contra R. Brown 1966: 44; Moloney 1998: 52. While thus the delegation included some Pharisees, this does not mean that the Pharisees were responsible for sending out the delegation, since the Sadducees had a majority on the Sanhedrin (Carson 1991: 144). This is true especially if an article is to be added (or implied) before ἀπεσταλμένοι (Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Barrett 1978: 174; R. Brown 1966: 43–44; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292). Ἀπεσταλμένοι ἦσαν (apestalmenoi ēsan, they had been sent) is a periphrastic pluperfect (Wallace [1996: 586] calls it “consummative”).

26 Cf. Mark 1:2–5; Matt. 3:1–10; Luke 3:3–14. So Morris 1995: 123; Beasley-Murray 1999: 24; Carson 1991: 145–46; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.293.

46 “I have seen” (τεθέαμαι, tetheamai) is in the perfect, indicating the settledness of John’s conviction (Carson 1991: 151). Less likely, the perfect points to the permanent effects of John’s encounter with the Christ (Morris 1995: 132–33; R. Brown 1966: 56). Morris (1995: 133 n. 72) thinks that John’s use of a different verb for seeing may be a mere instance of stylistic variation. More likely, θεάομαι in John conveys a more pronounced note of perception than other “seeing” verbs. This is borne out by all instances of θεάομαι in this Gospel: 1:14, 32, 38; 4:35; 6:5; 11:45. 57 Moreover, it is far from certain whether those uttering these initial lofty confessions understood the full import of their words (cf. the Johannine “misunderstanding” theme). See further Köstenberger 1999a: 66–69; Carson 1991: 147–48, 153–54.

61 See the discussions in Morris 1995: 137; R. Brown 1966: 78; Carson 1991: 154; Barrett 1978: 180. See also comments on the term μένω (menō, stay) at 1:39.

65 Carson (1991: 156–57) points out that the primary support for the Roman time-reckoning theory comes from Pliny the Elder, who notes that Roman authorities (like Egyptian ones) counted the official civil day from midnight to midnight—for example, in cases of leases and other documents that expired at day’s end. But Pliny himself says that “common people everywhere” conceive of the day as running “from dawn to dark” (Natural History 2.188). See also the discussion in Morris 1995: 138 n. 91.

69 Ridderbos (1997: 84) thinks that this identification is all the more likely since Peter learns about Jesus from his brother Andrew and this unnamed disciple (1:41) and since Peter and John are closely associated in this and the other Gospels (so also Schlatter 1948: 55; more cautious assessments are found in Borchert 1996: 143; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.310; Carson 1991: 154). Note also the connection between Andrew and John in the Muratorian Canon (Bettenson 1967: 28). Michaels (1989: 37) thinks that the second disciple is Philip. Keener (2003: 468) likewise sees “no reason” to identify the other disciple with the beloved disciple, since he is not mentioned until 13:23. On a literary level, this is self-evident, but the absence of “beloved disciple” language prior to 13:23 does not seem to rule out the possibility that the apostle John appears in the Johannine narrative as a historical character that is left unnamed.

79 Cf. Matt. 16:16–19; see Schnackenburg 1990: 1.312–13; R. Brown 1966: 80; Beasley-Murray 1987: 27; Carson 1984: 368. It must be noted, however, that the evangelist himself does not comment explicitly, apparently leaving it up to the reader to draw the proper inference (see Barrett 1978: 183).

85 In Jesus’ day, the term “Galilee” was used with reference to the territory east of the Jordan River (Carson 1991: 158; cf. Barrett 1978: 183; R. Brown 1966: 82; Morris 1995: 143 n. 100). After the beginning of the Jewish war in A.D. 66, apparently the entire region around the lake was called Galilee. If this is correct, John here follows contemporary usage (Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. k).

88 Carson (1991: 159) calls this the primary method of Christian growth.

89 The identification of Nathanael with Bartholomew is favored by Ridderbos 1997: 87–88; Morris 1995: 143; Carson 1991: 159; Burge 2000: 77; contra Barrett 1978: 184; R. Brown 1966: 82; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.314. Barrett (1978: 179, 184) conjectures that the meaning of the name “Nathanael,” “God has given,” indicates that he represents an “ideal disciple” and that the passage should be interpreted allegorically. Somewhat along similar lines, Witherington (1995: 71) suggests that Nathanael’s name implies that the disciples are the Father’s gift to Jesus. It seems, however, that these kinds of conjectures leave the realm of well-founded exegesis and veer into the sphere of ultimately unverifiable speculation (see the critiques by Morris [1995: 143] and Carson [1991: 159], both of whom defend Nathanael’s and the event’s historicity). Hanhart (1970: 24–25) identifies Nathanael as Matthew; Hill (1997) somewhat cautiously advances the theory that Nathanael is identical with James of Alphaeus (cf. Epistle to the Apostles 2 [second century A.D.]).

102 Carson (1991: 161) notes, “Since Jesus is about to tell him of greater visions that will be his (1:50–51), there may also be an allusion to the popular etymology that related ‘Israel’ to ʾiš rōʾeh ʾēl, ‘the man who sees God’ ” (cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.66 §186; similarly, Morris 1995: 148 n. 117). On Jacob traditions in nonbiblical Jewish sources, see Neyrey 1982; Rowland 1984.

112 See 4QFlor 1:6–7; 1QSa 2:11–12; 1 Enoch 105:2; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 13:52; 14:9; see Carson 1991: 162. Note also that “Messiah” and “king of Israel” are juxtaposed in Mark 15:32.

115 See the discussion in Carson 1991: 163. On Jesus being “greater than Jacob,” see 4:12. This is one of only three references to angels in this Gospel (cf. 12:29; 20:12).

122 The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. 65, was published in 1998 by the Egypt Exploration Society (see pp. 12–13). Among commentators, “Chosen One of God” is favored by Morris 1995: 134; Carson 1991: 152; Burge 1987: 59–61; 2000: 74; Barrett 1978: 178; R. Brown 1966: 57; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.305. “Son of God” is the reading advocated by Bultmann 1971: 92–93 n. 6; Borchert 1996: 139; Ridderbos 1997: 77; Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. g; Laney 1992: 53 (though all prior to the discovery of P¹⁰⁶). Rodgers (1999: 304) prefers both (“This is the only, the chosen Son of God”), while Michaels (1989: 36) proposes that the Baptist spoke “Chosen One of God” (hence the MS tradition), which the evangelist interpreted as “Son of God.”

7 It is doubtful that the reference to “the third day” represents an allusion to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 102; Carson 1991: 167; Burge 2000: 90; contra Borchert 1996: 153; Stibbe 1993: 46; Keener 2003: 497–98). The reference serves as a chronological connective with preceding events, perhaps indicating that the promise of 1:51 was quickly fulfilled (Beasley-

96n29, 97, 97n31, 99, 100, 100n39, 101, 104, 104n9, 104n11, 105, 107, 107n24, 108, 110, 111n36, 114, 116, 116n5, 118, 120n17, 121, 122, 123, 123n25, 123n27, 123n28,

Murray 1999: 34, citing Schnackenburg 1990: 1.325; cf. Talbert [1992: 86], who says that 2:1–11 serves as fulfillment of the prophecy in 1:51; and D. M. Smith [1999: 86], who speaks of the “first installment ... of the revelation promised in 1:51”). The beginning of Jesus’ final week is signaled in 12:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 189–90).

29 Though this is denied by most commentators (e.g., Morris 1995: 160–61; Barrett 1978: 191; Carson 1991: 174; R. Brown 1966: 100; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.332).

31 So, for example, Ridderbos 1997: 107; Morris 1995: 162; Carson 1991: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 35; R. Brown 1966: 105; Kruse 2003: 94–95. Ridderbos (1997: 108) cites OT allusions to the abundance of wine in the new age (Gen. 49:11; Isa. 25:6; Amos 9:13–14; Jer. 31:12–14; see also Joel 3:18). Keener (2003: 512) suggests a (proleptic) connection between the abundant “measure” of water turned into wine in 2:6 and the unlimited provision of the Spirit in 3:34.

39 Carson (1991: 169) rightly notes that there is little contextual support for the notion that Mary is here presented as a mediatrix between humanity and Jesus (contra those who see Mary here as representative of the people [e.g., Brodie 1993: 174]). Witherington (1995: 79, 378, referring to Ashton) may read too much into John’s presentation when he sees Mary here depicted as a fledgling disciple who later becomes an “archetypal female disciple.” Ridderbos (1997: 108) likewise seems to overreach when he suggests that Mary is symbolic of believing Israel, which has eagerly awaited the coming of the Savior. Another dubious suggestion is made by Stibbe (1993: 44), who proposes that Jesus’ use of γύναι may constitute an allusion to Gen. 3:15, “in which case she is to be seen as the New Eve in the New Creation of Jesus’ ministry.”

9 The phrase “Jewish Passover” has caused some controversy. Barrett (1978: 197) conjectures that the phrase may presuppose the existence of a Christian Passover at the time of writing (so, earlier, Westcott 1908: 1.89; cf. Borchert 1996: 162). Schnackenburg (1991: 1.345) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 39) suggest that the evangelist or the church had stopped participating in the Jewish Passover. Witherington (1995: 86–87) notes that the phrase indicates a certain distance between the author and Judaism and at least a partial Gentile audience (similarly, Morris 1995: 169). Carson (1991: 176) thinks that “Jewish” refers to the Jews of Judea in contrast to Galileans and Diaspora Jews.

11 Contra Carson (1991: 176), who cites a probable date of around A.D. 28.

24 The LXX reads “has consumed me” (Moloney 1998: 77). Unlike in 2:22 and 12:16, the present reference does not refer to the postresurrection period, but to the actual situation (so Ridderbos 1997: 116; Carson 1991: 180; R. Brown 1966: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.347; Barrett 1978: 198; contra Witherington 1995: 88; Bultmann 1971: 122).

36 Cf. Carson 1991: 177; 1984: 441; Morris 1995: 167; Laney 1992: 70; Westcott 1908: 1.96–97; Calvin 1959: 51; Köstenberger 1999a: 76–78. Carson (1991: 177, referring to Morris) notes that virtually all of John 1–5 (except for the sections on John the Baptist) is non-Synoptic material. Morris (1995: 167 n. 55) states that “there are practically no resemblances between the two narratives, apart from the central act”; only five words are shared. Other commentators holding this view are Luther, W. Hendriksen, and R. V. G. Tasker (Kreitzer 1998: 94).

5 Carson (1991: 184) notes that the converse is also true: Jesus promises to entrust himself to those who truly trust in him. Wallace (1996: 349) comments that the emphasizing pronoun in “its very repetition contrasts Jesus with the rest of humanity, setting him apart in his sinlessness.”

Similar reflexive uses of πιστεύω in the NT include Luke 16:11; Rom. 3:2; 1 Cor. 9:17; Gal. 2:7;

124, 124n29, 125, 126, 126n34, 126n37, 127, 128, 129, 130, 132, 133, 133n2, 135, 135n5, 136, 137, 137n9, 138, 138n12, 139, 140, 142n4, 142n5, 146n15, 147n21, 148n25,

1 Thess. 2:4; 1 Tim. 1:11; Titus 1:3 (Barrett 1978: 202).

17 Contra several commentators (Barrett 1978: 205; Moloney 1998: 91; R. Brown 1966: 130; Witherington 1995: 94; Burge 2000: 114; Carson 1995: 187 n. 8; Blomberg 1995: 6), “by night” is likely not symbolic in the sense that Nicodemus came from darkness to light, while Judas went from light to darkness (cf. 6:70–71; 12:4–8; 13:2, 26–30; 18:2–5)—a view held by R. Brown (1966: 130) and Auwers (1990). Wallace (1996: 123–24) overreaches when he finds in the genitive of time an indication of “the kind of time in which Nicodemus came to see the Lord.” Morris (1995: 187) suggests that John may have had more than one meaning in mind.

25 Carson (1991: 195) rightly contends that the NIV’s “water and the Spirit” is misleading (retained in the TNIV); “water and spirit” is preferable (see commentary at 3:6–8). Also incorrect, I believe, is the proposal by Talbert (1992: 99), who renders the phrase “of water which is Spirit.”

27 Contra those who say that “born of water” refers to physical birth, and “born of the Spirit” to spiritual birth (e.g., Witherington 1995: 97, referring to 1 John 5:6–8; Laney 1992: 78; but see Carson 1991: 191).

28 For a listing of options and discussion, see Carson 1991: 191–95.

29 See, earlier, Schlatter 1948: 89. For helpful discussions, see Carson 1991: 191–96, esp. 194–95; McCabe 1999. See also Cotterell 1985: 241; Kynes, DJG 574–76, esp. 575.

34 It may be too early in Jesus’ ministry for his disciples to be included (Carson 1991: 198–99; contra Ridderbos 1997: 134; Morris 1995: 196). Schnackenburg’s (1990: 1.376) solution, that Jesus’ statement is proleptic, looking “forward to the time when his disciples make his ‘testimony’ their own, as part of their preaching” (with reference to 3:22 and 9:4), likewise fails to convince. There is also no need to postulate that the “we” aligns Jesus with the OT prophets, reflects the Johannine community (Witherington 1995: 98; cf. Moloney 1998: 94), or denotes the church versus the synagogue (Barrett 1978: 211; Brodie 1993: 198).

37 Cf. Morris 1995: 196; Carson 1991: 199; R. Brown 1966: 132; Beasley-Murray 1999: 50; Witherington 1995: 98; Moloney 1998: 94; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.377; contra Barrett 1978: 212.

2 There is no need to believe that the present verses were dislodged from their context (Morris 1995: 208–9; contra R. Brown 1966: 154–55) or to suppose that the placement of this section after 3:1–21 indicates that the prior section pertains to the rite of baptism (so, rightly, Carson 1991: 209).

5 There is little evidence to support the various rearrangement theories that have been associated with these verses (Carson 1991: 209; Barrett 1978: 219).

9 It is not necessary to postulate that here the evangelist is addressing those who had remained followers of John the Baptist in his day (Carson 1991: 210; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 146; Morris 1995: 211; contra R. Brown 1966: 156; Barrett 1978: 219; Witherington 1995: 107; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.410).

12 Jesus calls himself “the bridegroom” in Matt. 9:15 pars. For the role of the bridegroom’s friend, see Gower 1987: 64–66; Zimmermann and Zimmermann 1999. Joy was the overriding theme at Jewish weddings; the verb πληρόω (plēroō, fulfill, complete) is associated with joy throughout this Gospel (Carson 1991: 211–12; Barrett 1978: 223). The Baptist’s words χαρᾷ χαίρει (chara chairei, lit., rejoices with joy), a Hebraism (χαρᾷ is a cognate dative [Wallace 1996: 168–69]), serve to intensify the verb (Ridderbos 1997: 147 n. 132; Morris 1995: 213 n. 112).

4 See the various structural proposals in Beasley-Murray 1999: 59; R. Brown 1966: 176–78; Moloney 1998: 115. See also Carson 1991: 214.

5 Blomberg (1995: 8), with reference to Dockery (1988), lists five approaches to the present narrative: (1) allegorical (cf. 2 Kings 17:30–31); (2) existential (Bultmann 1971: 175–202); (3) pastoral (Milne 1993: 85–86); (4) salvation-historical (W. Davies 1974; Carson 1993); and (5) intertextual (focusing on OT parallels such as Gen. 24:10–61; 29:1–20; Exod. 2:15b–21) (Neyrey 1979). Acknowledging that all of these approaches capture elements of truth, Blomberg nevertheless finds them wanting and proposes a seven-pronged approach of his own. Stibbe (1993: 68–69) advocates a symbolic reading: “If the woman has had five husbands and is living de facto with a sixth, then Jesus is the seventh man in her life. Since seven is the perfect number in Judaism, the implicit commentary must be that Jesus is the man which she has been waiting for, the man in whose presence she will find wholeness.” In the same vein, Brodie (1993: 217–18) sees this as a betrothal-type scene. See also Dockery (1988: 127–40), who distinguishes between author-, text-, and reader-oriented approaches, and Marshall 1974. R. Lightfoot (1956: 122) detects certain parallels between John 4 and 19.

15 This represents the wide consensus of interpreters: see Ridderbos 1997: 153; Carson 1991: 215–16; Borchert 1996: 198–99; Beasley-Murray 1999: 59; Witherington 1995: 115; R. Brown 1966: 169; Morris 1995: 226; Barrett 1978: 230; Moloney 1998: 116, 120; Conway 1999: 105.

21 See Ridderbos 1997: 153; cf. Carson 1991: 217; Borchert 1996: 201; Morris 1995: 228; Burge 2000: 142.

25 See Carson 1991: 217; Witherington 1995: 120; Morris 1995: 228; Burge 2000: 142; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.424. As part of a series of putative “wisdom” parallels, Witherington (1995: 119) proposes that the Samaritan woman is depicted as the maidservant of Wisdom. I find this background reconstruction unconvincing.

30 See Maccini 1996: 131–44. Daube (1956: 375–82) argues that “do not associate with” specifically refers to Jews not sharing vessels with Samaritans (cf. NIV text and note at 4:9). However, no common utensils (such as the woman’s water jar) are specifically mentioned in 4:9. The explanatory aside, “For Jews have no dealings with [συγγρῶνται] Samaritans,” probably is broader than the mere refusal to share drinking vessels (Ridderbos 1997: 154; Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. f; contra Carson 1991: 218; Borchert 1996: 203; Witherington 1995: 120; R. Brown 1966: 170; Morris 1995: 229; Barrett 1978: 232; Moloney 1998: 117, 121; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.425 n. 19).

34 Borchert (1996: 203) sees the “gift of God” as the realization of God’s promises; Morris (1995: 230) and Carson (1991: 218) identify it as eternal life, the latter with reference to the Torah (cf. R. Brown 1966: 176, 178–79); Schnackenburg (1990: 1.431) suggests that the gift is either the Holy Spirit or eternal life, or both; Burge (2000: 144) thinks that the reference is to the Spirit.

37 See also Tg. Neof. of Gen. 28:10 (referring to the well at Haran; see Díaz 1963: 76–77), and the Samaritan liturgy for the Day of Atonement cited in Carson 1991: 220 (cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.430–32).

55 The OT occasionally establishes a relationship between “word” and “spirit” (Neh. 9:20, 30; Ps. 33:6; 147:18; Isa. 59:21). In John’s Gospel, Jesus is the Word (1:14), has received the fullness of the Spirit (3:34), and is himself the truth (14:6); in his final prayer, he affirms that God's Word is truth that sanctifies (17:17). Hence "spirit" and "truth" are part of a conceptual cluster that also includes "word" and "worship." On this connection, see Nelson 2001. See also Carson 1991: 226; Barrett 1978: 238–39; R. Brown 1966: 180.

69 The present statement may echo Deut. 8:3; cf. Matt. 4:4; Luke 4:4; see Carson 1991: 228; Borchert 1996: 213; see also Jer. 15:16. Here the term used for "food" is βρῶσις (brōsis); in 4:34 it is βρῶμα (brōma). Apart from stylistic variation, the use of the latter term in 4:34 may be due to a desire to create assonance with θέλημα (thelēma, will) (R. Brown 1966: 173).

78 J. A. T. Robinson (1959) limits the "others" to John the Baptist and his followers (contra Cullmann [1956], who thinks that the "others" are the Hellenists of Acts 8:4ff.; see also the critique of this view by Carson 1991: 231). On entering into someone else's labor, see 1 Cor. 3:5–15 (contrast Rom. 15:20) and the parable of the workers in the vineyard in Matt. 20:1–16.

1 The inclusion with John 2 is created in more ways than one: note the mention of Cana ("where Jesus had turned the water into wine"), the reference to Capernaum, and the numbering of signs in Cana (Carson 1991: 237). Keener (2003: 630) also notes the geographical inclusio (i.e., references to Galilee in 4:43 and 4:54 serving to bracket the entire unit).

4 One school of interpretation identifies πατρίς (patris, homeland, hometown) in 4:44 with Jerusalem (so Barrett 1978: 246; Dodd 1953: 352; 1963: 238–41; Meeks 1966; 1967: 39–40; see, much earlier, Origen, Commentarii in evangelium Joannis 13.54–56, cited in van Belle 1998: 30). However, see the critiques by W. Davies (1974: 321–31) and Stimpfle (1992: 89) as summarized by van Belle (1998: 30–32). The Galilee/Nazareth explanation is found already in Augustine (cited by van Belle 1998: 33) and is defended by Stimpfle (1992: 86–96 [followed by van Belle 1998: 27–44]) and others (see van Belle 1998: 32–33; see also Ridderbos 1997: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 73; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.463). Still others think that both Galilee and Judea are in view (Carson 1991: 235–36; Burge 2000: 151–52; Witherington 1995: 126; W. Davies 1974: 321–31).

7 So Carson 1991: 234; Ridderbos 1997: 174–75; Morris 1995: 255; Borchert 1996: 219–20; Burge 2000: 152–53; Witherington 1995: 127; contra R. Brown 1966: 193; Barrett 1978: 245; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.471–75; Bultmann 1971: 205.

9 So Mead 1985: 71; Barrett 1978: 245; Witherington 1995: 128; Moloney 1998: 153; Bultmann 1971: 206; but see the cautious assessment by Carson 1991: 234. Morris (1995: 255), somewhat idiosyncratically, suggests that the man was a Jew.

11 So Carson 1991: 238; Morris 1995: 256; Borchert 1996: 219; R. Brown 1966: 190; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.465.

22 The numbering of the two Cana signs has suggested to some the existence of a "signs source" (Bultmann 1971: 206; Fortna 1970; 1989; Whitacre 1999: 116). However, this inference is not a necessary one (Ridderbos 1997: 178; Carson 1991: 178; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; contra Barrett 1978: 246; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.469–71).

1 In light of the apparently abrupt reference to Jesus "crossing to the far shore of the Sea of Galilee" in 6:1 (ch. 5 has him in Jerusalem), it has been speculated that chapters 5 and 6 should be reversed (see Bultmann 1971: 209, 237; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.92); but see Carson 1991: 240; Morris 1995: 264; cf. Barrett 1978: 23–24; Borchert 1996: 250; and especially Ridderbos 1997: 183.

177n8, 178, 178n13, 179n17, 179n18, 179n22, 180n28, 181, 181n34, 182, 182n36, 182n37, 184n46, 185n48, 186, 186n54, 186n55, 187, 187n56, 188n62, 188n64, 188n66,

8 See Payne, ZPEB 3:460. “Jewish” festival, rather than pointing to a Gentile audience (Morris 1995: 265), indicates the “temporal and material distance that had developed at the time of the Gospel between the Christian church and the situation to which the story takes us” (Ridderbos 1997: 184). It was customary for Jews at any place and any elevation in Palestine to use the expression going “up” to Jerusalem.

13 A few commentators (Morris 1995: 265–66; Barrett 1978: 251; Moloney 1998: 171; R. Brown 1966: 206) think that προβατικῇ modifies κολυμβήθρα (kolymbēthra, pool); others think that the implied noun is “gate” (Carson 1991: 241; so also the TNIV).

18 The imperfect tense indicates that this was customary (Carson 1991: 242).

22 Carson 1991: 242; the term used (ἀσθενεία, astheneia) represents the general expression for “disabled.”

28 Carson 1991: 244; Barrett 1978: 254. Though Ridderbos (1997: 186) perhaps gets carried away slightly when he sees the act as a sign of victory, exulting, “No longer does the bed carry a powerless man but, with vitality to spare, he (triumphantly) carries the bed.”

34 Ridderbos 1997: 188; Carson 1991: 245; Morris 1995: 271; Culpepper 1983: 138; 1993: 204–5; contra Staley 1991: 63–64. The term ὑγιής (hygiēs, well, healthy) occurs five times in this chapter, six times total in John, and only five other times in the rest of the NT (Morris 1995: 271–72 n. 30).

36 Some (such as Bultmann [1971: 243]) view 5:14 as being in contradiction with 9:2–3 (see discussion in Ridderbos 1997: 188). Though the ailment in the present passage may be the result of specific personal sin, and that in John 9 may not, however, this merely illustrates that caution must be exercised in individual cases and that sweeping theories must be avoided (cf. Carson 1991: 246; Morris 1995: 272).

37 See Ridderbos 1997: 189 n. 14; Morris 1995: 272. Carson (1991: 246 n. 1) rightly cautions against a simplistic generalization of negated present imperative = command to stop doing something (though he acknowledges that this may be the force here). More accurately, the present imperative regularly stresses urgency (with reference to S. Porter 1989: 335ff.).

46 “Jesus said to them” (5:17; see additional note): the Greek has “answered,” not merely “said” (TNIV). The grammatical form of “answered” may suggest legal overtones (cf. 5:19; see Carson 1991: 247; Borchert 1996: 237).

48 Cf. Matt. 12:1–14 pars. (R. Brown 1966: 217; Barrett 1978: 256; Carson 1991: 247–48).

54 Though calling this a “parable” (Dodd 1968a; Burge 2000: 177; cf. R. Brown 1966: 218) may be an overstatement (Carson 1991: 250; Ridderbos 1997: 192; Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Barrett 1978: 259–60).

55 Cf. 7:18; 11:51; 15:4; 16:13; 18:34; see Barrett 1978: 259; Bultmann 1971: 249; Carson 1991: 251; Borchert 1996: 237. Just as the Son depends on the Father, so believers can do nothing of eternal significance without Christ (15:5), but they can do all things through him who strengthens them (Phil. 4:13; see commentary at 5:23).

56 See Carson 1991: 251; Borchert 1996: 238; Barrett 1978: 259; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.104; Westcott 1908: 1.190.

62 The present verse stands in apparent tension with 3:17, which is resolved by the semantic range of κρίνω (krinō, judge), which in 3:17 refers to “outright condemnation,” while in this passage it talks about the judicial “principle of discrimination” (Carson 1991: 254; cf. Borchert

189, 189n71, 190, 190n76, 191, 191n82, 192, 192n88, 193, 194n100, 195, 195n107, 195n108, 195n109, 195n110, 199, 200, 201n11, 202, 203, 204, 204n29, 205, 206, 206n40, 207, 207n41, 207n44, 207n45, 208, 208n47, 208n50, 209, 209n54, 210, 210n56, 1996: 239). Also, 3:17 has as its subject the purpose for the Son's coming into the world, whereas 5:22 addresses the issue of the distinctiveness of the Father's and Son's respective roles (Carson 1991: 254).

64 In effect, this establishes Jesus' right to be worshiped (Carson 1991: 255) and amounts to a claim to deity (Morris 1995: 279).

66 So Carson 1991: 256; Moloney 1998: 183; Ridderbos 1997: 197; Morris 1995: 280; Beasley-Murray 1999: 76.

71 The verse relates to the "eternal generation of the Son" (Carson 1991: 257).

76 The rendering "not valid" (rather than "not true," indicating a courtroom setting) is suggested by Carson (1991: 259) and Morris (1995: 287) (contra Ridderbos 1997: 202).

82 "Have sent" and "have testified" are in the Greek perfect tense, indicating the settled condition resulting from the Baptist's witness to Jesus (cf. Barrett 1978: 264; Carson 1991: 260; Beasley-Murray 1999: 78; Morris 1995: 288; R. Brown 1966: 224; Wallace [1996: 577] calls this an "extensive perfect").

88 See 5:45–47; Luke 24:27, 44; Acts 13:27; 1 John 5:9. Carson (1991: 262) sees here a "general reference to all of the Father's revealing work" (citing R. Lightfoot 1956: 146–47).

100 See Exod. 32:11–14, 30–32; Num. 12:13; 14:19–20; 21:7; Deut. 9:18–20, 25–29. See also As. Mos. 11:17 (cf. 12:6; Jub. 1:19–21; cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 62; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 79; Ridderbos 1997: 207; Carson 1991: 266).

107 Jesus: Luke 16:31; John 3:12; 6:27; 7:23; 10:34–36; Paul: Rom. 5:15, 17; 2 Cor. 3:9, 11; other NT writers: Heb. 9:14; 12:9, 25. See Carson 1991: 266.

108 So the majority of commentators, including Barrett 1978: 250–51; Carson 1991: 240; Morris 1995: 265 n. 6; R. Brown (1966: 206), who says that the evidence is "overwhelming"; Beasley-Murray 1999: 69 n. e; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.93.

109 Hengel (1999: 309) comments, "One should by all means read 'Bethesda'"; so also Carson 1991: 241; Morris 1995: 267; Witherington 1995: 137; Borchert 1996: 231; Moloney 1998: 171; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94; Schlatter 1948: 142; undecided are Ridderbos 1997: 185; R. Brown 1966: 206–7.

110 So Fee 1982 and the vast majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 185; Carson 1991: 242; Morris 1995: 267; Barrett 1978: 253; R. Brown 1966: 207; Beasley-Murray 1999: 70 n. h; Bultmann 1971: 241 n. 4; Borchert 1996: 232; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94–95.

11 See Carson 1991: 269; also R. Brown 1966: 233; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.15. Note the personal pronoun setting Jesus apart from Philip and the verbs ᾔδει (ēdei, he knew; indicating prior knowledge) and ἐμελλεν (emellen, he was about; conveying certainty not associated with simple future) (Morris 1995: 304 n. 16). Compare also the reference to Jesus' supernatural insight in 2:24.

29 Cf. 3:2 and especially 21:3 (though note 13:30). So Moloney 1998: 203; contra Borchert 1996: 258; Carson 1991: 274. Ἐγγόνει (egegonei, had come) is an intensive pluperfect (Wallace 1996: 585).

40 Thus, in effect, "How long have you been here?" (Morris 1995: 316 n. 68; Barrett 1978: 286; R. Brown 1966: 261; Carson 1991: 283).

41 Contra Beasley-Murray (1999: 91), who takes εἶδετε (eidete, you saw) literally, concluding that Jesus' present audience was not physically present when Jesus performed the sign. In the Synoptics, even the disciples are shown to misunderstand the implications of the miracle (Mark 6:52; cf. 8:14–21; see Carson 1991: 283). Barrett (1978: 286) views the use of ἐχορτάσθητε (echortasthēte, you had your fill) as evidence that John was familiar with Mark (cf. Mark 6:42; 8:8).

44 Carson (1991: 283) places the transition at 6:27. Morris (1995: 315) says the shift may have occurred as early as 6:25, but more likely “the discourse took place in stages, with only the concluding section in the synagogue.”

45 See Carson 1991: 284–85. “To work works” is a common Semitic expression: see Matt. 26:10 par.; John 9:4; Acts 13:41, quoting Hab. 1:5; 1 Cor. 16:10. The verb ἐργάζομαι (ergazomai, work) occurs earlier in John in 3:21 and 5:17, and again in 9:4.

47 See Carson 1991: 285. See Rom. 3:20, 27–28; Gal. 2:16; 3:2, 5, 10; cf. Phil. 3:6, 9.

50 Carson 1991: 285; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 91; Barrett 1978: 288; R. Brown 1966: 265; Moloney 1998: 212. The personal pronoun σύ (sy, you) is emphatic, possibly suggesting that people doubt Jesus' ability to furnish such a sign (Morris 1995: 321).

54 Since contemporary Judaism conceived of the Torah as “bread” from God (cf. Prov. 9:5), some suggest that Jesus may here claim to be superior to the Torah (Carson 1991: 286–87; cf. Barrett 1978: 290; R. Brown 1966: 262). However, in the Johannine context such a claim seems unduly dichotomous and probably unlikely.

56 Subsequent sayings include 8:12 = 9:5; 10:7 = 10:9; 10:11 = 10:14; 11:25; 14:6; 15:1 (see the excursus in Witherington 1995: 156–58). The personal pronoun ἐγώ (egō, I) is emphatic (Ridderbos 1997: 229 n. 118); what is more, the “I am” saying of 6:35 forms the “narrative and theological centre of the scene,” as it is based on what precedes it and is explained by what follows (Lee 1994: 135–36). “Of life” constitutes a verbal genitive (Carson 1991: 288 n. 1).

58 There is no need to resort to a sapiential interpretation here, understanding Christ as the true Wisdom (Carson 1991: 289; contra R. Brown 1966: 274–75; Witherington 1995: 149–50).

60 See discussion at 6:30. The second καί (kai, and) in 6:36 probably is adversative (so Barrett 1978: 293). The majority of commentators consider the word με (me, me) in 6:36 to be original (so Ridderbos 1997: 230 n. 120; Carson 1991: 289–90; Morris 1995: 325 n. 104; R. Brown 1966: 270; contra Barrett 1978: 293; Moloney 1998: 216; see also the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 85; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.46).

62 As Carson (1991: 290) notes, the present figure of speech is a litotes, a stylistic device declaring a certain truth by nullifying its corollary.

67 Carson 1991: 292 says, “John's record of their question is steeped in irony” (citing Duke 1985: 64–65). See also earlier, 4:44, where the evangelist refers to Jesus' saying that a prophet is not without honor except in his own country.

72 So Ridderbos 1997: 235–37; cf. Carson 1991: 295; Morris 1995: 331–32; contra Moloney 1998: 223; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.55; Lindars 1972: 267; Talbert 1992: 140. As Keener (2003: 690) observes, “John's words [in 6:27–63] invite his audience to look to Christ's death itself, not merely those symbols which point to his death.” At best, any such overtones are derivative (Borchert 1996: 270–71; cf. Brodie 1993: 286; Calvin 1959: 170).

73 Carson (1991: 295) notes that the preposition ὑπέρ (hyper, for, in behalf of) is often found in the context of sacrificial language (10:11, 15; 11:51–52; 13:37–38; 15:13; 17:19; 18:14).

77 John's use of τρώγω (trōgō, chew, eat) in 6:54 may be intended to heighten the vividness of

216n79, 217, 217n80, 218, 218n88, 219, 220, 220n95, 221, 221n101, 222, 222n105, 222n106, 224n1, 226, 228n2, 228n3, 230, 230n9, 230n11, 231, 231n15, 233, 233n26,

Jesus' words (Ridderbos 1997: 242 n. 163; cf. Moloney 1998: 221; Bultmann 1971: 236), though it may merely be the evangelist's preferred verb for "eating" in the present tense (Carson 1991: 296; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 95; Barrett 1978: 299).

79 There is no reason to conclude, on the basis of the present tense participles in this verse, that this partaking is an act to be repeated (contra Ridderbos 1997: 243; Morris 1995: 336). The logic of this section rather seems to demand that partaking of Jesus' flesh and blood is to be understood as an action that takes place once for all. Mutual indwelling ought not to be understood in egalitarian terms, as if Jesus and the believer were fulfilling equal roles. Jesus' sacrifice is foundational, and the believer's responsibility is the appropriation of this gift (Carson 1991: 298). Moreover, contrary to what might be expected, such mutual indwelling does not imply surrender of personality (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.63–64).

80 The construction καὶ ὁ ζῶ ... καὶ κεῖνος ζήσει harks back to previous statements in 5:21, 24–30. Once again, however, the analogy breaks down in that believers do not have life in themselves (as does Jesus), even though they partake of Jesus' flesh and blood (Carson 1991: 299; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 95).

88 The use of the term μαθητής (mathētēs, disciple) is striking in conjunction with these followers' desertion of Jesus. Just as there are different kinds of faith (e.g., 2:23–25), there are different kinds of disciples (Carson 1991: 300).

95 Ridderbos 1997: 248; Carson 1991: 302; Morris 1995: 342; Barrett 1978: 305. Elsewhere in this Gospel, Jesus is shown to reiterate his earlier teaching: 8:24 (cf. 8:21); 15:20 (cf. 13:16); 16:15 (cf. 16:14).

101 The words "believe" and "come to know" are roughly equivalent in John's Gospel (cf. 17:8; see Carson 1991: 303; R. Brown 1966: 298).

105 Though the phrase could be rendered "one of you is the devil" (see Carson 1991: 304; Wallace 1996: 249, 265), this is not necessary, and contextually is less likely than the rendering "a devil." See also Matt. 16:23 (= Mark 8:33), where Peter is rebuked as "Satan" by Jesus. In John 8:44, Jesus calls the Pharisees children of the devil.

106 So Carson 1991: 267; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 208–9; Barrett 1978: 272; Witherington 1995: 385; contra R. Brown 1966: 235–36; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.5–9.

1 For a thorough discussion of the historical background for the Feast of Tabernacles, see Moloney 1998: 232–36; 2002. See also Carson 1991: 304–5.

2 Carson 1991: 305; Borchert 1996: 279; Barrett 1978: 309; see commentary at 2:12 and at 7:2.

3 The verb tense (a progressive imperfect [Wallace 1996: 543–44]) conveys the notion of Jesus continually moving about through the region of Galilee. Carson (1991: 305) proposes the rendering "continued around Galilee."

9 Note the inclusio of 7:4 and 8:59 (Keener 2003: 703). Cf. Matt. 10:26 and the "messianic secret" motif in the Synoptics (Barrett 1978: 311; Carson 1991: 310, referring to Lindars 1972: 283).

11 Paraphrased, this may mean "You can go anywhere you please, any time you want; I cannot" (cf. Ridderbos 1997: 258–59). Only in the present context is the term καιρός (kairos, time) used to denote Jesus' (God-appointed) "time"; elsewhere the expression is ὥρα, hōra (e.g., 2:4; see R. Brown 1966: 306; Carson 1991: 307–8; Morris 1995: 351–53).

15 To "go up" (ἀναβαίνω, anabainō) to Jerusalem is a common expression no matter what one's geographical origination (cf. 5:1). Because the term is used later with reference to Jesus' ascension to the Father, some see an allusion to Jesus' glorification (Carson 1991: 309: "just possible"). This is unlikely (Michaels 1989: 127; Lindars 1972: 285) and in any case is not the primary referent (contra R. Brown 1966: 308).

234, 235, 235n31, 235n32, 236, 236n35, 237, 238, 239n47, 240n53, 240n59, 241, 242, 243, 243n71, 243n73, 247, 249n11, 254n14, 255n16, 255n21, 256n24, 257n29, 258n31,

26 So Carson 1991: 312–13; R. Brown 1966: 316; Morris 1995: 360; Barrett 1978: 318; Kruse 2003: 185.

31 E.g., Deut. 16:18–19; Isa. 11:3–4; Zech. 7:9. See also John 5:22–30 (esp. 5:30).

Grammatically, Μὴ κρίνετε (mē krinete, stop judging) enjoins people to cease an action rather than merely prohibiting it (Carson 1991: 316). Κρίσιν κρίνετε (krisin krinete, lit., "judge judgment") represents a cognate accusative construction (Ridderbos 1997: 266 n. 40; Wallace 1996: 190).

32 Παρησία (parrēsia, openly) is a dative of manner or adverbial dative (Wallace 1996: 162). "They are not saying a word to him" is a rabbinic expression reflecting tacit approval (R. Brown 1966: 313). "Said R. Judah, 'Helene's sukkah [tabernacle] was twenty cubits tall, and sages went in and out, when visiting her, and not one of them said a thing' " (t. Sukkah 1.1). The interrogative particle μήποτε (mēpote) signals a tentative question (Carson 1991: 317; Barrett 1978: 321), the gist being "Do the rulers perhaps actually [μήποτε ἀληθῶς] know that he is the Christ?"

35 Ἐκραξεν (ekraxen, he cried out) denotes a loud shout (Morris 1995: 366), indicating a public, solemn pronouncement (Carson 1991: 318; Barrett 1978: 322) (cf. 1:15; 7:37; 12:44).

47 See R. Brown 1966: 314; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.150; Schlatter 1948: 198. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 271), who opts for Greek-speaking Diaspora Jews. Carson (1991: 320 [cf. Barrett 1978: 325; Witherington 1995: 173]) thinks that Gentile proselytes probably are in view.

53 Most commentators favor a time immediately following cessation of ceremonies on the eighth day (Carson 1991: 321; Morris 1995: 373, esp. n. 79; Barrett 1978: 326; Moloney 1998: 256; Schlatter 1948: 199). Some believe that Jesus' words fit better with the ceremonies of the seventh day (R. Brown 1966: 320; Bultmann 1971: 302 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.152; Ridderbos 1997: 272; Burge 2000: 227). On the water-drawing ceremony, see Keener 2003: 722–24.

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee's observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus "from within him" refers to "whoever believes in me." Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of "rivers of living water" (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987: 88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

71 Regarding "You have not been deceived as well, have you?" see commentary at 7:12. Note the perfect tense of πεπλάνησθε (peplanēsthe, you have been deceived) (Morris 1995: 382) as well as the passive voice, avoiding explicit reference to agency so as not to detract from the subject (i.e., the officers who are led astray) (Wallace 1996: 436). Carson (1991: 331) also sees irony in 7:48, for whatever one makes of Nicodemus, he is about to speak out on Jesus' behalf.

73 See Ridderbos 1997: 279–80; Carson 1991: 331–32. Morris (1995: 383) adds that it is not that the people are (entirely) unfamiliar with the law, but that they do not “know” (observe) it the way the Pharisees do: keeping the 613 commandments and so forth.

11 A survey of major commentaries shows that about half provide a regular commentary (Carson, Laney, Lindars, Whitacre, Calvin, Westcott), while the other half refrain from comment (Michaels, Talbert, Stibbe, Brodie, D. M. Smith), in some cases choosing not to address the issue at all (e.g., Schlatter [1948: 205], who in his scholarly commentary moves directly from 7:52 to 8:12 without comment, though his popular commentary [1962: 139–41] does treat the pericope adulterae in deference to “ecclesiastical tradition”; see also Zahn [1921: 404], who, like Schlatter, moves immediately from 7:52 to 8:12 and deals with the pericope in a lengthy excursus on pp. 723–30).

14 Commentators vary as to whether to regard as synonyms the two words used in the present context for “true” or “valid,” ἀληθής (alēthēs; 8:13, 14, 17) and ἀληθινός (alēthinos; 8:16). Beasley-Murray (1999: 125 n. a [contra R. Brown 1966: 341; Lindars 1972: 317; Barrett 1978: 339]) opts to distinguish between the former meaning “true” or “valid” and the latter meaning “just” or “authentic” (similarly, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.194). Ridderbos (1997: 294) suggests the meaning “just” for ἀληθινός; Barrett (1978: 339) opts for “authentic”; and Carson (1991: 340) prefers “right.”

16 See Ridderbos 1997: 294; Carson 1991: 339; Beasley-Murray 1999: 129; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.192.

21 Schnackenburg 1990: 2.194; cf. Moloney 1998: 267; R. Brown 1966: 345. Carson (1991: 339 [cf. Burge 2000: 257]) denies the suggestion that κρίνω (krinō, judge) has the meaning “to pass judicial sentence” and the conclusion on that basis that Jesus came not to convict but to save.

24 Cf. 10:34; see also 6:49: “your ancestors”; 8:56: “your father Abraham”; 15:25: “their law” (see Augenstein 1997). Barrett (1978: 339) seems to deny the historicity of the words “in your law,” suggesting that they are a creation of the evangelist intended to show the separation that occurred between Christianity and official Judaism. However, in light of the consistent pattern throughout John’s Gospel, and the undeniable acrimony between Jesus and his Jewish opponents historically, this expedient is unnecessary. In favor of historicity are Morris (1995: 392 n. 19) and Carson (1991: 340).

29 So Morris 1995: 394; Carson 1991: 341; Beasley-Murray 1999: 125 n. b; Burge 2000: 257. Barrett (1978: 340) alone seems to express some reservation.

31 Carson (1991: 341) takes the reference to the Jews’ “looking for” Jesus to refer to their continued search for the Messiah after Jesus’ death. Morris (1995: 396) thinks that the reference is to the Jews coming to realize who Jesus truly is when it is too late, or to their continued opposition after Jesus leaves their presence.

32 “Sin” in 8:21 is in the singular, which may refer to the “cardinal sin of rejecting Jesus” (Barrett 1978: 340; Carson 1991: 341; R. Brown 1966: 350; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.197). Alternatively, “sin” may be used generically to refer to a person’s sinful state apart from Christ. The preposition ἐν (en, in) probably is locative (“in a state of sin”), though it also could be instrumental (“by reason of sin”) (Barrett 1978: 341; cf. Morris 1995: 395).

36 The plural “sins” in 8:24 (cf. 8:21) may refer to the multitude of sins that result from the primary sin of unbelief (Carson 1991: 342).

37 So Carson 1991: 344; Beasley-Murray 1999: 130–31; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.200. See especially Isa. 41:4; 43:10, 13, 25; 46:4; 48:12; cf. Deut. 32:39.

40 So Carson 1991: 344; R. Brown 1966: 347; cf. Motyer 1997: 159, referring to 8:12 and 5:19–30.

47 So the majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 305–6; Carson 1991: 346–47; Morris 1995: 404; Beasley-Murray 1999: 132; D. M. Smith 1999: 185; Borchert 1996: 301 n. 182; Burge 2000: 259; Bultmann 1971: 252 n. 2; contra R. Brown 1966: 354–55, 358; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.204–5; Moloney 1998: 277; Westcott 1908: 2.13–14.

48 A semantic distinction between πιστεύω + εἰς (pisteuō + eis, believe + in) and the verb alone followed by an object in the dative case cannot be maintained (Carson [1991: 346–47] and the vast majority of commentators; see also Croteau 2002). Concerning the perfect participle πεπιστευκότας (pepisteukotas, having believed), Swetnam (1980 citing E. Abbott 1906: 365–66) notes that the perfect participle in Greek can also serve as a pluperfect. If so, the meaning here would be “those who had [previously] believed in him [but did so no longer].”

50 Ridderbos (1997: 306–7) notes the anachronistic and incongruous nature of the tendency of modern scholars to associate statements such as those made in this verse with events in the early church while disassociating them from the life and ministry of Jesus. See also Carson 1991: 347.

53 Morris 1995: 405; cf. R. Brown 1966: 355; Borchert 1996: 303. Carson (1991: 348–49) suggests that truth in 8:32 is similar to the notion of “gospel,” that is, “the truth that has been revealed in and by Jesus” (cf. Barrett 1978: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.205).

59 Carson (1991: 350) helpfully notes that while the act of sinning proves that one is enslaved by sin, it is also true that “sin actively enslaves.” Carson also points out that since the primary issue for Jesus was enslavement to sin, “the pursuit of social justice alone will always prove vain and ephemeral unless the deeper enslavement is recognized and handled” (ibid.).

64 Carson (1991: 351 n. 1) suggests the translations “my word has no place in you” or “my word does not operate in you” (cf. Barrett 1978: 346).

68 So Carson 1991: 352; R. Brown 1966: 357; Barrett 1978: 348; contra Ridderbos 1997: 313; Borchert 1996: 305; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.212.

72 On predestination in John’s Gospel, see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.214–15. Carson (1991: 353) suggests that ἀκούω (akouō, hear) has the connotation of “obey.” R. Brown (1966: 357) thinks that the verb means literally that the Jews “have become so obdurate that they cannot even hear him; they are deaf.” Ridderbos (1997: 314) notes that Jesus’ opponents’ spiritual incomprehension results from their failure to combine hearing with faith.

74 So Morris 1995: 411; Ridderbos 1997: 315; Carson 1991: 353; Barrett 1978: 349; Beasley-Murray 1999: 135; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.213; Moloney 1998: 280; Borchert 1996: 305–6. It was commonly recognized in Second Temple literature that death was the result of Satan’s initiative (Wis. 2:23–24; Sir. 25:24; cf. Rom. 5:12).

90 Cf. 5:24; see also 6:40, 47; 11:25–26. Carson (1991: 355 [cf. Lindars 1972: 332]) suggests that this statement is in further development of 8:50. The word ἐμόν (emon, my) stresses that it is Jesus’ word that must be kept; θάνατον (thanaton, death) is emphatic as well (Morris 1995: 416 n. 104), as is the negative οὐ μὴ ... εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (ou mē ... eis ton aiōna, never . . . ever) (Wallace 1996: 468–69). Note that when Jesus’ opponents quote his statement in 8:52 (per the evangelist’s rendering), they use the less marked pronoun μου (mou, my) instead of the possessive adjective ἐμόν and do not place θάνατον in an emphatic position.

95 Morris 1995: 416; Carson 1991: 356; Barrett 1978: 351. The pronoun ἡμῶν (hēmōn, our) in the phrase “our father Abraham” is likely exclusive, with Jesus not included as ancestor of Abraham (Wallace 1996: 398). Note also the relative pronoun ὅστις (hostis, who), which is both indefinite (R. Brown 1966: 359) and qualitative (Morris 1995: 416 n. 105) in import. Abraham serves as a type of others like him, and all of those were “of such a quality as to die” (Morris 1995: 416 n. 105).

274, 274n111, 277, 277n1, 281, 282, 282n20, 282n21, 283, 283n25, 284, 284n28, 285, 286, 287, 287n47, 287n48, 288, 289, 289n54, 290, 290n57, 291, 291n59, 291n61,

102 Ridderbos 1997: 321–22; cf. Carson 1991: 357; Barrett 1978: 352; R. Brown 1966: 367; Burge 2000: 263.

111 Cf. 1:14; Ezek. 10–11; see Carson 1991: 358, citing W. Davies 1974: 290–96; Barrett 1978: 353. Keener (2003: 774) concurs that Jesus’ withdrawing from the temple may “evoke a state of Ichabod, God’s glory withdrawing from a polluted and rebellious sanctuary” (citing Ezek. 5:11; 8:4; 9:3; 10:4, 18). Ridderbos (1997: 324 n. 225) suggests that the meanings of the verbs ἐκρύβη and ἐξῆλθεν (exēlthen, he left) “mutually determine each other.”

1 For a survey of source-critical scholarship on John 9, see Borchert (1996: 310–12). Carson (1991: 360–61) provides a brief summary and critique of Martyn’s “two-level” reading of the chapter in light of the history of the putative “Johannine community.” See also Bauckham (2001: esp. 103–6), who contends that Martyn’s hermeneutic violates the genre of the Fourth Gospel.

20 Bultmann (1971: 332 n. 1) finds this problematic and attributes the alleged difficulty to disparate sources; but see the responses by Ridderbos (1997: 334) and Carson (1991: 363).

21 Carson (1991: 363) sees the focus of the “darkness” in the period between Jesus’ departure (i.e., the arrest prior to the crucifixion) and Pentecost.

25 The double imperative constitutes a Semitism (Barrett 1978: 358). Ridderbos (1997: 336) lists three reasons why the blind man was sent to Siloam: (1) to wash the mud out of his eyes; (2) to evoke the blind man’s faith; and (3) to carry out ritual purification (cf. Luke 7:14). Carson (1991: 365) adds (4) to correlate the Pharisees’ unbelief with a prophecy of judgment in Isa. 8:6 (though he rejects any prefiguration of baptism, contra Lindars [1972: 344], who sees the man’s bath as a “quasi-baptismal washing”; see also Ridderbos 1997: 337). Grigsby (1985) argues that the washing in the pool of Siloam constitutes a thematic anticipation of the Johannine cross.

28 There is some debate as to whether it is to be identified with the “lower” or “old” pool (Isa. 22:9, 11; see Carson 1991: 365), the “upper” pool (cf. 2 Kings 18:17; Isa. 7:3; 36:2), or some other pool (Mackowski 1980: 56–58, 72, 74).

47 Bultmann (1971: 335) states that the authorities “now hit on the idea of questioning the fact of the miracle, as being the easiest way of putting an end to the whole business.” Keener (2003: 786) notes how, incredibly, the Pharisees repeatedly ignore the testimony of the miracle itself, focusing instead on Jesus’ alleged Sabbath violation. On “the Jews,” see commentary at 5:10. Carson (1991: 368) attributes the shift from “Pharisees” to “the Jews” to John’s penchant for stylistic variation. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.249) thinks that the change serves to indicate the “official character” of the inquiry. Duke (1985: 120, following Schnackenburg 1990: 2.248) suggests that the uneasiness of the Pharisees in 9:17–18 “is evident in the abrupt close of scene and their immediate change of tactic in what follows.”

48 “He is old enough” probably means that the man is qualified to give legal testimony about himself—that is, he is at least thirteen (m. Nid. 5.6; Carson 1991: 369; Barrett 1978: 361; Kruse 2003: 225; Keener 2003: 788). Beyond this, his age is not known. The phrase may indicate that the man is sufficiently mature to reason and answer the Pharisees’ questions for himself (Morris

1995: 433 n. 34).

54 Conway (1999: 131) suggests the idiomatic translation “Tell us the truth.” See Josh. 7:19; 2 Chron. 30:8; Jer. 13:16; 1 Esdr. 9:8; m. Sanh. 6.2; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 344; Carson 1991: 372; Morris 1995: 436. Alternatively, the Jews exhort the man to give glory to God, who performed the miracle (but see Barrett 1978: 362).

57 This is the only instance of λοιδορέω (loidoreō, insult) in the Gospel (elsewhere in the NT only in Acts 23:4; 1 Cor. 4:12; 1 Pet. 2:23). Note the emphatic juxtaposition of the personal pronouns σύ (sy, you) and ἡμεῖς (hēmeis, we), an “antithesis [that] is intended to expose the utter inferiority of the discipleship to which the man born blind refers” (Ridderbos 1997: 345), and the contemptuous force of ἐκείνου (ekeinou, that one’s) (Carson 1991: 373; Morris 1995: 437 n. 42; Barrett 1978: 362).

59 The perceptive reader will note that the Pharaisees’ claim to being disciples of Moses is refuted by the earlier statement in 5:45–47 (Keener 2003: 791). There is some debate as to how common this self-designation was among the Jews of Jesus’ day (cf., e.g., Matt. 23:2). In b. Yoma 4a, it is applied to Pharisees as opposed to Sadducees. In m. Abot 5.19, Jews are referred to as “the disciples of Abraham,” while Christians are dismissed as “the disciples of Balaam the wicked” (that is, Jesus!). Schnackenburg (1990: 2.251) and Ridderbos (1997: 345 n. 287, referring to TDNT 4:443) consider this to be a characteristic rabbinic self-designation, while Carson (1991: 373–74, apparently following Barrett 1978: 362–63) says that this self-designation was not common.

61 Carson (1991: 373) points out that on a formal level, the present statement stands in contradiction with the Pharisees’ earlier comment in 7:27 (cf. 6:42; 8:14b). He rightly notes that “both 7:27 and 9:29 are simultaneously false and ironically true” (almost identically, Barrett 1978: 363; similarly, Morris 1995: 437; Keener 2003: 792).

62 Carson (1991: 374) rightly notes that this raises a crucial hermeneutical question: how should previous revelation be understood in light of Jesus’ teachings (cf. Matt. 5:17–18; John 1:17–18)?

69 Carson (1991: 375) notes the dangers of a strict understanding of the man’s logic, particularly the risks of associating powers with divine power (e.g., the Egyptian magicians). However, these are theological subtleties that do not concern the man. His conclusion thus is correct, even if his theological framework is somewhat precarious. Morris (1995: 438) says that the logic is admirable for a man who has been a beggar all his life.

79 Though Carson (1991: 376 [cf. Morris 1995: 439]) also notes the judging role of the Son of Man (5:27), which coheres well with 9:39–41. Ridderbos (1997: 348) points out how Jesus repeatedly shifts to this title to reveal “greater things” about himself (1:51; 3:13; 6:27, 62; 8:28).

80 Carson 1991: 376; Morris 1995: 440; R. Brown 1966: 375. D. M. Smith (1999: 199) suggests that the ambiguity may be intentional, while Barrett (1978: 364) doubts that John intentionally meant to distinguish between these two meanings in 9:36 and 9:38. Regarding the question “Who is he ... ?” see 12:34 (cf. Acts 9:5).

82 Borchert (1996: 325) relates the present reference to 20:28 and believes that this confession is a high point in the festival cycle. The man’s response to Jesus’ self-revelation is in keeping with the standard OT reaction to theophany (e.g., Gen. 17:3). However, it is possible that the man’s actions, while being “beyond that due to other men,” fall “short of that due to God Almighty” (Beasley-Murray 1999: 160; similarly, Carson 1991: 377). Nevertheless, the majority of commentators favor a fuller sense of worship (Barrett 1978: 365; R. Brown 1966: 376; Bultmann 1971: 339 n. 3; Morris 1995: 440; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.254).

83 The īva (hina, that) here may convey purpose or combine purpose and result (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.255). Carson (1991: 377–78) observes, “That tragic conclusion is the foreseen result of Jesus’ coming, and in that sense part of its purpose.”

10 Later, Judas is called a thief (12:6), and Barabbas a robber (18:40; cf. Mark 15:7). At his arrest, Jesus asks why he is treated like a robber (Matt. 26:55 pars.), and in the end he is crucified with robbers on either side (Matt. 27:38, 44 pars.). The majority of commentators take both terms as referring to the same people (Ridderbos 1997: 354; Carson 1991: 381; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.281; contra Barrett 1978: 369). See further Hengel 1989a: 24–46; Simonis 1967: 101–3.

13 The wording is reminiscent of OT passages such as Num. 27:15–17 and Ezek. 34:13. Carson (1991: 383 [cf. Barrett 1978: 369]) understands Num. 27:15–18 as a typological allusion to Christ (contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.293; Moloney 1998: 308). Ridderbos (1997: 354) also mentions Ps. 80:1.

17 The word is absent from the Synoptics, where the roughly equivalent expression παραβολή (parabolē, parable) is found (not used in John; see Carson 1984: 301–4). Both terms apparently render the broad Hebrew expression māšāl (Borchert 1996: 329). They occur side by side in a few instances (e.g., Sir. 39:3; 47:17) and do not differ significantly in meaning (Dewey 1980).

20 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.288) suggests that πάλιν (palin, again) starts a new discussion. Carson (1991: 384) perceives that 10:7–9 does not necessarily expand on 10:1–5 but that it represents a treatment of the three dominant motifs (gate, shepherd, sheep) in those verses (cf. Barrett 1978: 370–71).

21 Some (e.g., Morris 1995: 450 n. 27; Barrett 1978: 371) seek to make a distinction between the meaning of ἡ θύρα τῶν προβάτων (hē thyra tōn probatōn, the door for the sheep) in 10:7 and ἡ θύρα (hē thyra, the gate) in 10:9, contending that in 10:7 Jesus is presented as the gate to the sheep, while in 10:9 he is the gate for the sheep. However, such a distinction is unnecessary (Carson 1991: 384; cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.289; Moloney 1998: 309).

32 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.294) proposes a translation “right” or “true.” Similarly, Borchert (1996: 333) suggests that the meaning of καλός is similar to that of ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) (cf. Moloney 1998: 310; Bultmann 1971: 364). Carson (1991: 386) contends that the “good shepherd” should be thought of as “noble or worthy” but not “sentimental or effeminate.”

Lindars (1972: 361) favors the rendering “an ideal shepherd.”

37 The preposition ὑπέρ (hyper, for) here, as elsewhere in this Gospel, has the connotation of a sacrificial, substitutionary death (Carson 1991: 386; Barrett 1978: 375; Borchert 1996: 334; Burge 2000: 291).

42 Cf. 1:18; 5:19–20; 7:29; 8:19, 55; 14:7, 31; 17:23, 25; see Carson 1991: 387; Ridderbos 1997: 361–62. Καθώς (kathōs, just as) entails not only a comparative but also a causal dimension (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.297).

45 So the vast majority of commentators, including Barrett, Beasley-Murray, Burge, Carson, Moloney, Morris, Ridderbos, Schnackenburg, and Witherington. For Jewish material indicating that the Messiah would gather the Gentiles, see Hofius 1967.

47 Cf. Matt. 28:18–20; see Carson 1991: 388; cf. Barrett 1978: 376; Beasley-Murray 1999: 171. John 10:16 presupposes Jesus’ resurrection, which is referred to explicitly and repeatedly in the following verses (10:17, 18; cf. Michaels 1989: 181).

307n50, 308, 308n55, 310, 310n60, 310n61, 311, 311n65, 311n67, 312, 312n72, 312n73, 313n77, 314, 314n82, 314n84, 315n85, 316, 316n89, 317n93, 317n94, 318, 319, 322n6,

50 Cf. Paul's teaching regarding the μυστήριον (mystērion, mystery) in Eph. 3:1–10; Col. 1:26–27 (Ridderbos 1997: 363). Ridderbos (1997: 364–65) also provides a helpful discussion and critique of Martyn's (1977: 170–74) reading of 10:16 as “one great cryptogram” in terms of the “Johannine community hypothesis.” See also the comments in Carson 1991: 390.

55 So Morris 1995: 457; cf. Carson 1991: 390; Beasley-Murray 1999: 172; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.303; Burge 2000: 293.

60 See Josephus, J.W. 5.5.1 §§184–85; Ant. 15.11.3 §§396–401; 20.9.7 §§220–21. So the vast majority of commentators, including Carson, Barrett, Morris, Beasley-Murray, R. Brown, Moloney, and Burge; contra Ridderbos 1997: 368.

61 Cf. 18:18: “it was cold.” If so, he is referring to the Jews’ “chilling response” to Jesus (Hengel 1999: 319). See also Borchert 1996: 337. Contra Ridderbos 1997: 368; Carson 1991: 391–92. Stibbe (1993: 116) comments that the “sense of impending doom in 10.1–21 is heightened by the atmospheric statement of the narrator in v. 22.” Bultmann (1971: 361) suggests that the reference to the season serves to indicate that “the end is near,” as the “seasons of the year reflect the progress of the revelation.”

65 So Carson 1991: 392; Burge 2000: 295. Compare the “messianic secret” motif in Mark (e.g., Mark 1:34; 5:43; 7:36; 8:30; 9:9; see Ridderbos 1997: 368; Barrett 1978: 378–80).

67 So, in effect, Ridderbos 1997: 368; Carson 1991: 392–93; Morris 1995: 462; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174. Borchert (1996: 338) suggests that the “interplay between paroimia and parrēsia allows Jesus to tell the Pharisees that he has already answered their question.”

72 The term “one” (ἓν, hen) in 10:30 is neuter rather than masculine; the latter would have suggested that Jesus and the Father are one person (Carson 1991: 394). Morris (1995: 464) suggests the rendering “one thing.”

73 So, rightly, Carson (1991: 394–95), whose entire discussion repays careful reading (see also Morris 1995: 465; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174; Moloney 1998: 320; Burge 2000: 296; Laney 1992: 195; Stibbe 1993: 118; Westcott 1908: 2.68). Michaels (1989: 187) seems to conceive of Jesus’ unity with the Father in functional terms (whether primarily or exclusively so), as both of them doing “the same work.” Barrett (1978: 382) notes that the unity between the Father and the Son is also a unity of love and obedience.

77 R. Brown (1966: 403) suggests that καλός (kalos, good) here may also be intended to hark back to the description of Jesus as the “good” shepherd (10:11, 14) in the preceding narrative. The renderings by Carson (1991: 396) as “noble” or “beautiful,” and by Barrett (1978: 383) as “deeds of power and moral excellence, resulting in health and well-being,” may overreach as expositions of the meaning conveyed by the term.

82 Ridderbos (1997: 372) suggests, not implausibly, that the expression “in your law” may indicate the value placed on the law by the Jews resulting in their attempt to stone Jesus (“in the law that to uphold ... is so important to you”). As noted by Carson (1991: 397), νόμος (nomos, law) here probably refers to the entire OT.

84 See b. Abod. Zar. 5a. For a variation of the first view, see Jungkuntz 1964; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311; Morris 1995: 467; Beasley-Murray 1999: 176–77. The second position is held by Emerton 1960; 1966. For a variation of the third view, see Hanson 1964–65; 1967. See further Oepke, TDNT 4:1022–32, 1054–55. Most major commentators seem to favor the third view as well (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 373; Carson 1991: 398; Barrett 1978: 384; Schnackenburg 1990:

2.311).

85 The presence of an argument from the lesser to the greater is denied by Ridderbos (1997: 374) against the overwhelming majority of commentators (e.g., R. Brown 1966: 410; Morris 1995: 469; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.310; Moloney 1998: 316). Carson (1991: 399, perhaps following Barrett 1978: 385), calls this an ad hominem argument, which he defines (somewhat idiosyncratically, it seems) as an argument that “does not require Jesus to subscribe to the same literal exegesis as his opponents.”

89 In the LXX, variants of the term τὰ ἐγκαίνια (ta enkainia, Feast of Dedication [John 10:22]) refer to the dedication of the tabernacle altar (Num. 7:10–11), Solomon’s temple (1 Kings 8:63), and the second temple (Ezra 6:16–17). A connection between the present statement and the Feast of Tabernacles is made in, among others, Carson 1991: 399; R. Brown 1966: 411; Witherington 1995: 191; Moloney 1998: 317. Commentators differ as to the sacerdotal connotation of the term ἁγιάζω (hagiazō, set apart). R. Brown (1966: 411) is favorably disposed, while Barrett (1978: 385) denies such an association.

93 C. Brown (1984) contends that one cannot have Christ or Christianity without the miracle-working Jesus of the Gospels. Carson (1991: 400) perceptively notes that the Jews’ inability to discern God’s presence in Jesus and his acts ultimately demonstrates their ignorance of God and how he acts. R. Brown (1966: 411–12) relevantly relates the present passage to modern attempts to use evidences as an apologetic tool (though I do not endorse all of Brown’s comments here). Indeed, this verse does seem to suggest that evidence is helpful (if not necessary) in a person’s coming to faith, though at the same time it is shown to be but a (limited) aid to faith rather than compelling faith in and of itself.

94 The distinction between γνῶτε (gnōte) and γινώσκητε (ginōskēte) is that of “coming to know” and “understanding” (Carson 1991: 400; Barrett 1978: 386; Morris 1995: 470; Laney 1992: 198). See also additional note to 10:38.

6 The conjecture that the designation “the one you love” in 11:3 points to Lazarus as the “disciple Jesus loved,” the author of John’s Gospel, is entirely speculative. Also, there is almost certainly no connection between this figure and the character in the parable about the rich man and Lazarus recorded in Luke 16:19–31 (rightly noted by Ridderbos 1997: 386 n. 14; Carson 1991: 404; contra Dunkerley 1959).

8 There is no reason to drive a wedge between history and theology and to diminish the historicity of the raising of Lazarus along the lines suggested by R. Brown (1966: 428–30 [but see Ridderbos 1997: 382]). R. Brown proposes that chapters 10–11 comprises a “later addition to the plan of the Gospel” (p. 427), attributing the present pericope more to “Johannine pedagogical and theological purpose than ... historical reminiscence” (p. 430). Also precarious is the type of source-critical reconstruction attempted by Schnackenburg (1990: 2.316–21). Ridderbos (1997: 382) helpfully points to the “agains” in 11:7–8 (presupposing a long prior stay in Judea and Jerusalem) and the disciples’ remarks about earlier attempts on Jesus’ life by the Jews in 11:8 as evidence that chapter 11 constitutes an integral structural component of the overall Gospel. Ridderbos (1997: 386) rightly notes that the reality of the miracle and its theological significance cannot be separated (referring to 1:14). For a rebuttal of existentialist interpretations of chapter 11, see Carson 1991: 404.

13 Noted by Carson 1991: 405. On the relationship between the two Bethanys referred to in John’s Gospel, see Brownlee 1972: 167–74. Morris (1995: 477 n. 10) rightly rejects the distinction made between “Bethany” as their present home and “the village” as their place of origin on the basis of the prepositions ἀπό (apo) and ἐκ (ek) in 11:1.

19 R. Brown (1966: 423 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.322]) claims that this verse is “clearly a parenthesis added by an editor,” though it is unclear why the author himself (rather than a later editor) could not have added this kind of parenthetical statement. Carson (1991: 405 [approvingly cited by Borchert 1996: 349]) contends, against Barrett (1978: 390), that it does not follow that the intended audience was Christian, though clearly Carson’s case is difficult here. More likely is the reconstruction by Witherington (1995: 201), who says that this verse may serve as “a simple reminder of Mary’s identity to the Christians who would be using this Gospel as a missionary tool to bring outsiders to Christ.” Yet Carson (1991: 405) rightly points out that regardless of this issue, and even if the anointing was unknown to the reader, the proleptic reference to Mary still serves as a fine literary device, urging the first-time reader onward in the narrative.

24 Contrast 11:1, where Mary is mentioned before Martha (presumably because of her prominence on account of the anointing [11:2]). Ridderbos (1997: 388 n. 22 [cf. Carson 1991: 411]) suggests (citing John 11:19ff. and Luke 10:38b, 40–41) that usually Martha is mentioned first because she more often appears as the initiator of events. Carson (1991: 406 [cf. Morris 1995: 478]) proposes that Martha may be the oldest of the three.

28 This is why Carson (1991: 407 [cf. Morris 1995: 479 n. 16]) is right in rejecting the NIV’s rendering of 11:6 as “Yet when he heard” (retained in the TNIV), proposing instead the translation “When therefore he heard.” Ridderbos (1997: 388 n. 24) avers that the particle μέν (men) in 11:6b is “more or less concessive” (“he [it is true] stayed where he was”). Similarly, Barrett (1978: 390) suggests that τότε μέν (tote men, then) in 11:6b anticipates the ἔπειτα μετὰ τοῦτο (epeita meta touto, then after this) in 11:7, stressing Jesus’ deliberate delay.

37 See Morris (1995: 482), who refers to the universal fear regarding death in the ancient world. There is no reason to follow Barrett (1978: 392 [cf. R. Brown 1966: 431]), who, on the basis that φίλος (philos, friend) is a technical term for a Christian in the NT, proposes that this is the “true meaning” of this “pregnant saying.” Carson (1991: 409) notes the “not accidental” switch from the plural “our friend” to the singular “I am going,” saying that this indicates that Jesus alone is the resurrection and the life. “I am going” is identified as a futuristic present by Wallace (1996: 536).

40 For a defense of the historicity of this incident, see Carson (1991: 409), who points out that the disciples did not have the advantage of knowing the end of the story; that the messenger had announced sickness but not death; and that the disciples’ anxiety about returning to Judea might have led to a certain amount of denseness. Carson also, rightly in my opinion, sees no double meaning in σωθήσεται (sōthēsetai, he will get well) (1991: 410; contra Barrett 1978: 393; R. Brown 1966: 424; Moloney 1998: 337; Westcott 1908: 2.84).

43 Alternatively, the sentence should read, “Lazarus has died—and I am glad for your sake, in order that you may believe—because I was not there” (cf. Carson 1991: 411, citing Delebecque 1986; cf. Barrett 1978: 393).

47 So Carson (1991: 410), who speaks of “raw devotion and courage”; similarly, Morris 1995: 484; Michaels 1989: 196. Keener (2003: 842), too, says Thomas’s is an act of courage (contrasting him with Jesus’ brothers in 7:5), though he notes that Thomas later failed to believe the disciples’ testimony regarding Jesus’ resurrection (20:25). Perhaps the strongest endorsement of Thomas's sincerity comes from Whitacre (1999: 283), who says that Thomas displays "an incredible picture of faith," is "following out of loyalty," and constitutes "a model disciple."

53 See Lev. Rab. 18.1 on Lev. 15:1; cf. Eccles. Rab. 12.6 (universally cited by commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 393; Carson 1991: 411; Morris 1995: 485). Cf. m. Yebam. 16.3; Semahot 8, rule 1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 109). See also Hanson 1973. Keener (2003: 841 n. 63, citing Michaels 1984: 190) cautions, however, that the belief that the soul left the body three days after death is not widely attested in the early period.

57 So Ridderbos 1997: 393; Carson 1991: 411 (but see Wis. 19:3; m. Ketub. 4.4).

58 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 411; Barrett 1978: 394; Conway 1999: 139; Stibbe 1994: 48 (though he notes the return to a negative portrayal in 11:36, 45). Contra Morris (1995: 486), who finds the use of "the Jews" here "unusual" and suggests that it may imply that "though the mourners could bring themselves to sympathize with Martha and Mary, they were hostile to Jesus."

60 So Ridderbos 1997: 395. Wallace (1996: 703) goes further: "Although formally a second class condition, it is intended here as a rebuke. It is as if she had said, 'Lord, you should have been here!'" (contra Carson 1991: 412).

61 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 412; Ridderbos 1997: 395, with reference to 2:5; similarly, Keener 2003: 106–7, citing Barrett 1978: 390. The term κύριος (kyrios) probably means "Lord," as in 11:3 (Carson 1991: 411). Regarding the statement "God will give you whatever you ask," see commentary at 9:31.

68 Morris (1995: 489) and Carson (1991: 413) note the one article tying closely together "everyone who lives and believes." Οὐ μὴ ... εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (ou mē ... eis ton aiōna) is an emphatic negative: "never, ever" (plus subjunctive; see Wallace 1996: 468). In the question "Do you believe this?" the verb πιστεύω (pisteuō, believe) is followed by the accusative, which is unique in this Gospel (Bultmann 1971: 404 n. 1; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.332).

69 Ridderbos (1997: 396) persuasively argues that 11:25b refers to "death in the natural sense and to living in the sense of eternal life," while "lives" in 11:26a "refers to natural human existence, while 'never die' refers to the eternal life that natural death can neither prevent nor affect" (so also Bultmann 1971: 403, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.331; Stibbe 1994: 51). Contra Carson (1991: 413), R. Brown (1966: 425), and Borchert (1996: 356) (also Calvin and Schlatter), who maintain that "lives" in 11:26a refers to eternal life. Wuellner (1991: 182) calls the present statement an oxymoron.

72 For this reason Witherington (1995: 203), who calls Martha's confession "the least inadequate confession yet in this Gospel," and R. Brown (1966: 433), who labels her belief "inadequate," are overly negative. More positive are Morris (1995: 489), who says, "She may not understand fully the implications of what he has just said, but as far as she can she accepts it," and Carson (1991: 414), who labels her faith as "a rich mixture of personal trust (fiducia) and of confidence that certain things about Jesus are true (assensus)."

Keener (2003: 844–45) suggests that John, by including Martha's confession, likely sought to balance gender the way Luke does (cf. Peter's confession in 6:68–69). See also Stibbe (1994: 47), who perceives movement from two "I know's" (11:22, 24) to a climactic "I believe" (11:27); from propositional to personal understanding; and from confessor to witness. Ridderbos (1997: 399–400) calls the confession "spontaneous and uninhibited" and sees it as reminiscent of the man blind from birth, who confessed despite his lack of understanding concerning the Son of Man (9:38). On "the Christ," see commentary at 1:41; on "Son of God," see commentary at 1:34 and 1:49.

91 Barrett (1978: 399) asserts that Jesus was angry “beyond question.” Schnackenburg (1990: 2.335) calls attempts to render ἐμβριμάομαι as an emotional experience such as grief, pain, or sympathy “illegitimate.” Beasley-Murray (1987 = 1999: 192–93, followed by Lindars 1992b: 89–90, noting that he changed his view from Lindars 1972: 398) marshals considerable evidence to support the reading “became angry in spirit.” See also Carson (1991: 415), who contends that ἐμβριμάομαι means more than “deeply moved in spirit” and says that the term refers to “anger, outrage, or emotional indignation.” Brodie (1993: 395), starting with Schnackenburg’s view that Jesus was angry at the unbelief of Mary and the Jews, maintains that his anger is directed also at sin and death, and thus ultimately against the realm of Satan.

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, “The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death.” See also Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999: 289. The mourners’ unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999: 192–93), several of whom adduce Paul’s statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus’ anger is directed toward both “the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow” and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus’ anger as occasioned by Mary’s turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either “misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition,” to mean “moved in spirit.” Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus’ struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, “He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself” (11:38 is translated “bearing the rebuke within himself”). According to Story, at the sight of people’s grief, Jesus was overcome by “momentary self-regret,” thinking, “Why did I not come sooner ... ? I have only myself to blame. ... Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?” However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

97 So, essentially, Carson (1991: 416) and Morris (1995: 495), though both (in my view, illegitimately) speak of “unbelief” or “the misconceptions of those around him” as the primary target (similarly, Kruse [2003: 254] believes Jesus wept out of “deep disappointment” with the “faithless weeping and wailing” of Mary and “the Jews”). Schnackenburg (1990: 2.337) insightfully adduces the reference to Jesus’ “tears” during his “life on earth” in Heb. 5:7, which there, as well as in the present reference, are related to the presence of and the need for salvation from death. The comment by Borchert (1996: 360) that Jesus’ weeping is “directly related to the failure of his followers to recognize his mission as the agent of God” is sheer conjecture, as is Moloney’s contention (1998: 331) that “he weeps because of the danger that his unconditional gift of himself in love ... will never be understood or accepted.”

100 As Barrett (1978: 401) writes, “They think of Jesus not as the Son of God who is light and life ... but as a thaumaturge whose capacities, authenticated by the cure of the blind man, might conceivably have been expected to rise to this extremity.” Carson (1991: 417 [cf. Morris 1995: 496]) says that we need not suppose that their attitude was “sneering,” but Schnackenburg (1990: 2.337) points to the introductory δέ (de, but) and the negative connotation of οὐκ ἐδύνάτο (ouk edynato, could he not have?).

345n120, 346, 346n122, 347, 348n131, 349, 349n135, 350, 352, 352n143, 353, 354, 354n151, 359, 359n8, 360n9, 361n12, 361n15, 363, 363n23, 364n25, 365, 365n30,

103 Again, Ridderbos (1997: 401), rightly in my opinion, dismisses attempts to link Jesus’ anger to the unbelief of the Jews. Carson (1991: 417) perhaps construes the relationship between 11:38 and 11:37 too tightly when he states, “This unbelief is the reason the next verse [v. 38] reports that Jesus’ quiet outrage flares up again.” Similarly, Barrett (1978: 401) speaks of “inchoate faith” that draws Jesus’ wrath.

120 “The corpse was customarily laid on a sheet of linen, wide enough to envelop the body completely and more than twice the length of the corpse. The body was so placed on the sheet that the feet were at one end, and then the sheet was drawn over the head and back down to the feet. The feet were bound at the ankles, and the arms were tied to the body with linen strips. ... Jesus’ body was apparently prepared for burial in the same way (cf. 19:40; 20:5, 7)” (Carson 1991: 418–19; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 195). For mishnaic references to burial clothes and wrappings for corpses, see Kruse 2003: 256.

122 As is suggested by some modern commentators (e.g., Schnackenburg 1990: 2.340), with reference to Basil (ca. A.D. 330–379). But see the critique by Carson 1991: 418.

131 On the Pharisees, see commentary at 1:19, 24. On the chief priests and Pharisees, see commentary at 7:32. Ridderbos (1997: 407 n. 84) plausibly argues that the evangelist’s reference to the Pharisees as the key leaders of the people is a function not only of their influence in Jesus’ day but also of their significance in the post-temple period in which the evangelist wrote. Thus, “Their name was particularly useful to him as a general term for the Jewish authorities.” Carson (1991: 420), too, sees no hint of anachronism, pointing out also the Pharisees’ more direct access to the people. This stands in marked contrast to the provocative statement by Barrett (1978: 405) that if the evangelist conceived of the Pharisees as an official body, “he was ignorant of Judaism as it was before A.D. 70.” R. Brown (1966: 439) notes, “The reference to the Pharisees is more a question of simplification than of error.”

135 The temple is favored by, among others, Ridderbos (1997: 408) and Carson (1991: 420).

143 Note the sacrificial language (ὑπέρ, hyper, for) in 11:51–52 (Carson 1991: 422; Wallace 1996: 387). On the irony in Caiaphas’s statement, see especially Duke 1985: 87 (cited in Morris 1995: 503 n. 107).

151 See Riesner, DJG 49; Carson 1991: 423–24. But see Albright (1922–23), who argues that the Ephraim mentioned in John is not Et-Taïyibeh, but Ain Samieh, slightly to the northeast and lower in a valley. Cf. Schwank 1977.

8 The fronted ἐποίησαν (epoiēsan, they prepared) (which may be equivalent to a passive [so R. Brown 1966: 448]) is taken by some as indication of a very public occasion. If so, then the dinner may not have been prepared by Martha and her family and may not even have taken place at their house (Carson 1991: 428; Morris 1995: 511; contra Barrett 1978: 411; Moloney 1998: 356).

9 The vast majority of commentators holds that the dinner probably was eaten on Saturday at some point during the day, presumably in the evening. See Carson 1991: 427; Barrett 1978: 410;

Morris 1995: 510 n. 10; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 208; R. Brown 1966: 447; Burge 2000: 337. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.366) says that the meal could have been on Sunday or possibly Saturday evening.

12 The meaning “genuine” or “pure” is supported by most commentators (e.g., Carson 1991: 428; Barrett 1978: 412; Beasley-Murray 1999: 204 n. b; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.367; Ridderbos 1997: 414). Michaels (1989: 217), on the other hand, thinks that “it may have been the trade name under which the product was marketed” (i.e., “pistic nard”).

15 So Beasley-Murray 1999: 208–9; contra R. Brown 1966: 454. Witherington (1995: 207) notes the irony of Jesus being anointed at the same place where he raised someone from the dead. Carson (1991: 428) points out that in the following chapter, Jesus’ disciples are told to “wash one another’s feet,” a command that may be anticipated by Mary anointing Jesus’ feet in the present pericope.

23 This is the only NT passage in which Judas is called a thief, indeed, where he is charged with anything other than his ultimate betrayal of Jesus (though see Schnackenburg [1990: 2.368], who notes that the Synoptists, too, hint at Judas’s greed: Matt. 26:14–15; 27:3–10; Mark 14:10–11; Luke 22:3–5). Carson (1991: 428–29 [cf. Burge 2000: 339]) suggests that the consistent description of Judas as the one who betrayed Jesus resulted from the “shocking force of their hindsight.” It is as if the disciples’ minds had been permanently seared by their memory of him as the one who betrayed their master.

25 Most commentators view the statement in an elliptical fashion, though there is less consensus on precisely what ought to be supplied. Carson (1991: 429) suggests that the statement is to be construed as follows: “Leave her alone. [She has done this—i.e., held on to the jar] in order to keep it for the day of my burial.” Ridderbos (1997: 417–19), too, holds that the ἵνα (hina, that) of 12:7 is independent (a “brachylogy” [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.369]) and proposes that the phrase is best understood as a rhetorical question. Less likely is the construal of Witherington (1995: 208, appealing to Synoptic parallels), who thinks that Jesus is urging that Mary be left to keep the “burial ritual.” Also doubtful is Maccini’s (1996: 173–74) rendering: “Let her alone, so that she might keep what oil she has left for the day of my burial” (so, earlier, Schlatter 1948: 264).

30 Ἐγνώ (egnō, learned) is best understood as an ingressive aorist (Morris 1995: 517). Most commentators (rightly, in my opinion) hold that the term “Jews” is not used in a negative sense here (so, e.g., Carson 1991: 431; Barrett 1978: 415; R. Brown 1966: 456; contra Morris 1995: 517). See also the additional note on 12:9.

11 Ridderbos (1997: 423 n. 137) says that “hosanna” literally means, “Please help!”; Carson (1991: 432) prefers the meaning “Give salvation now!” But probably Barrett (1978: 417–18) is correct that at the time of Christ, the phrase might have been no more than a “jubilant shout of praise” as part of a “spontaneous ovation” (cf. Morris 1995: 516; R. Brown 1966: 457). Beasley-Murray (1999: 210) adds that it may have been a greeting as well.

18 For a fuller description of how Jesus “found” the donkey, see Matt. 21:1–3 pars. (note the harmonization proposed in Carson 1991: 433; Morris 1995: 520–21). Coakley (1995: 477) calls the reference here “intentionally uninformative,” either because the evangelist had no information about how the donkey was found or because he chose not to disclose it (Coakley prefers the latter). However, his suggestion seems implausible that “Jesus did not intend to ride the donkey at all but was made to do so by enthusiastic followers” (p. 479, citing Luke 19:37; John 6:15). This is the only occurrence of the diminutive form ὀνάριον (onarion, young donkey) in the NT.

20 The possible reference to Isa. 40:9 is noted by Carson (1991: 433); cf. Barrett 1978: 418; contra Morris 1995: 521 n. 48. R. Brown (1966: 458) points to Zeph. 3:16. This kind of conflation of quotations from the OT is not uncommon in the NT (e.g., Matt. 27:9–10; Mark 1:2–3).

30 The ironic nature of the final part of the Pharisees' statement is noted by, among others, Ridderbos (1997: 426), Carson (1991: 435), and Beasley-Murray (1999: 211). Carson (1991: 435) further suggests that there is actually "irony within irony," given the reference to unbelief in 12:37–40.

6 See commentary at 7:35, the only other occurrence of the term in John's Gospel. A look at the remaining NT references indicates that in virtually all instances the term is used in contrast with "Jews" (Ἰουδαῖοι, Ioudaioi; see Acts 14:1; 16:1; 18:4; 19:10, 17; 20:21; Rom. 1:16; 2:9, 10; 3:9; 10:12; 1 Cor. 1:22, 24; 10:32; 12:13; Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11). That the "Greeks" mentioned here were not Diaspora Jews (as Calvin [1961: 35] thought) is accepted by virtually all major commentators (e.g., Westcott [1908: 2.120], who likens these to the Gentile magi at the beginning of Matthew's Gospel; Ridderbos 1997: 427; Carson 1991: 436; Barrett 1978: 421; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.381; Witherington 1995: 223; Moloney 1998: 351; Burge 2000: 342).

9 The address κύριε (kyrie) is best rendered "sir" (Carson 1991: 437; Barrett 1978: 422). The verb ἰδεῖν (idein) here means "to visit with, to meet" (R. Brown 1966: 466) or "to have an interview with" (Carson 1991: 437; Barrett 1978: 422). Stibbe (1993: 136) contends that "the use of the verb 'see' points to the depth of their [the 'Greeks'] seeking." Moloney (1998: 352, 359) lists numerous instances in this Gospel where that verb is used with reference to "the acceptance or the refusal of Jesus' role as the revealer."

11 Philip's provenance from a bilingual region is cited by many commentators, including Ridderbos (1997: 427), Carson (1991: 436), Schnackenburg (1990: 2.382), R. Brown (1966: 470), Witherington (1995: 223), and Moloney (1998: 352).

15 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 439; cf. Barrett 1978: 424; Beasley-Murray 1999: 211; R. Brown 1966: 467; Burge 2000: 344 n. 19. See Gen. 29:31, 33; Deut. 21:15; Matt. 6:24 par.; compare Luke 14:26 with Matt. 10:37.

16 As Carson (1991: 439) perceptively remarks, true discipleship involves not only denial of self but also the recognition of the importance of Christ.

19 On the possible influence of Ps. 42 here and elsewhere in John's Gospel (11:33, 35, 37; 14:1–9, 27; 19:28), see the interchange between Beutler (1979, modifying Freed 1965b: 117–30) and Freed (1983a). See also Carson (1991: 440), who says that τετάρακται signifies "revulsion, horror, anxiety, agitation." This emphasis on the precrucifixion turmoil suffered by Jesus stands over against those who, in an effort to focus on the "glory" aspect of Jesus' death, overlook the real agony and anxiety he endured. So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 434), who argues, contra Witkamp, that 12:27a can "hardly refer to anything other than the natural human reaction in confrontation with death"; and Carson (1991: 439–40), who contends, contra E. Käsemann and G. C. Nicholson, that "even in John [with its realized eschatology], Jesus cannot contemplate the cross as a docetic actor, steeped in dispassionate unconcern." R. Brown (1966: 475) notes that here "we see the true humanity of the Johannine Jesus."

22 Commentators almost universally consider the present pericope to be the Johannine equivalent to the Synoptic account of Gethsemane (e.g., Morris 1995: 529; Barrett 1978: 424; R. Brown 1966: 475–76; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.386), though Ridderbos (1997: 435–36, pointing to Ps. 6) and Carson (1991: 440) rightly reject the notion that the Fourth Evangelist has simply refashioned the Synoptic Gethsemane scene to suit his purposes.

23 Ridderbos (1997: 435 n. 185) cites BDF §448.4 as evidence that ἀλλά after a question posed to oneself could be rendered more strongly as “No!” (cf. NRSV; Bultmann 1971: 427), though Ridderbos himself does not adopt this rendering. Cf. Whitacre 1999: 312, following Carson.

24 Contra Carson (1991: 440 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 212; Burge 2000: 345]), who understands this to be a genuine question (“What shall I say?”) and takes the following statement as a positive prayer (“Father, save me from this hour!”). As Morris (1995: 528) rightly notes, this interpretation, in an effort to do justice to the genuineness of Jesus’ struggle, is unlikely in that it has Jesus utter a prayer and then immediately repudiate it. Moreover, even if the question is seen as rhetorical, this does not deny the reality of Jesus’ struggle but simply shows how he overcomes succumbing to merely human reasoning.

27 Carson (1991: 441) finds it tempting to subsume this passage, and indeed all of Christ’s redemptive work along with the new covenant, under Ezek. 36, particularly 36:22, 32. On Jesus’ desire to glorify the Father, see further 13:31–32; 14:13; 17:1, 4–5 (cf. 15:8; 21:19). R. Brown (1966: 476 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.387]) sees 12:28 as analogous to the Lord’s Prayer (“Hallowed be your name”); Beasley-Murray (1999: 207) regards it as the equivalent of Mark 14:36a.

31 Ridderbos (1997: 437) understands “I have glorified it” to refer to “the whole of Jesus’ earthly activity.” Carson (1991: 441) includes Jesus’ earthly ministry, the incarnation, and the signs. Morris (1995: 530) seems to think that “I will glorify it” refers solely to the cross. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.388, citing Ps. 138:2; Ezek. 36:23; 38:23) takes the same phrase to point to the Son’s exaltation and vindication: “He will justify the Son, raise him above the power of evil, and give him glory and saving power.”

35 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.390) here sees Jesus commenting on people’s incomprehension and urging them to believe. Ridderbos (1997: 437), on the other hand, argues that Jesus refers to the sound of the voice, not the words, maintaining that Jesus “is not holding the crowd answerable for what it could not understand.” Neither Barrett (1978: 426) nor R. Brown (1966: 477) seems able to reconcile the apparent tension in the voice being for the crowd yet unintelligible to the crowd. Carson (1991: 442) offers four points, most importantly that even if the crowd had not understood the voice, the voice itself should be a signal of divine activity.

39 The term “draw” brings out the truth that people do not come to Christ on their own initiative; only as God works in people and draws them can they come to him (Morris 1995: 531). The phrase “all people” does not imply universalism (the ultimate salvation of all [see commentary at 1:9]). Rather, the approach of Gentiles prompts Jesus’ statement that after his glorification he will draw “all kinds of people,” even Gentiles, to himself. For this interpretation and a brief discussion of the textual issues, see Köstenberger 1999a: 194. See also Ridderbos (1997: 439–40), who provides the glosses “the entire human world” and “‘all’ without distinction of people or race”; and Morris (1995: 531–32), who struggles but then interprets πάντας (pantas) to refer to “all kinds of men.” In addition, Carson (1991: 443) sees a parallel with Rev. 12:11a and takes issue with the adversative NIV rendering, “But I, when I am lifted up” (changed in the TNIV to “And I, when I am lifted up”).

40 Ridderbos (1997: 439) rightly notes that this is more than a mere proleptic reference to a future event, which effectively reduces 12:31b to a “prophetic vision” (contra Bultmann [1971: 431], who argues that the “nows” of 12:31 necessitate the purgation of traditional Christian eschatology). As Carson (1991: 444–45) aptly notes, “The end times have begun already. It is not that there is nothing reserved for the consummation; rather, it is that the decisive step is about to be taken in the death/exaltation of Jesus.” See also R. Brown 1966: 477.

41 The evangelist editorializes that “this was to show the kind of death Jesus was going to die” (with σημαίνων [sēmainōn, indicating] serving as a participle indicating purpose [Wallace 1996: 635]). “Kind of death” in the first instance refers to crucifixion (as opposed to, e.g., stoning) but also hints at the fact that Jesus’ death is also “the pathway to his glorification, indeed an integral part of it” (Carson 1991: 444). The same phrase is used regarding Peter’s eventual martyr’s death in 21:19 (Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61, 168). It occurs frequently in connection with Greek oracles (e.g., Plutarch, De Pythiae oraculis 404.D.10), but also in regard to the meaning of names or prophecy (Josephus, Ant. 1.19.8 §308; 7.9.5 §214).

45 Carson (1991: 445) cites most of these passages and adds Ps. 72:17; 1 Enoch 49:1; and he contrasts 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29.

47 Regarding the people’s question “Who is this ‘Son of Man’?” see commentary at 1:51 and at 9:35–36. Ridderbos (1997: 441) takes the question to pertain to the nature of the Son of Man (“What kind of Son of man are you speaking of?”) rather than his identity. Morris (1995: 532) thinks that the crowd asks what the function of the Son of Man is and whether or not he is one and the same as the Messiah. Carson (1991: 445) notes that though four months earlier the Jewish authorities were unclear about whether or not Jesus used the “Son of Man” title messianically, the less knowledgeable crowd, already ripe with messianic expectations, made the “Son of Man = Messiah” connection. To the contrary, if taken at face value, the crowd’s question reveals not understanding, but misunderstanding, even ignorance, or at least confusion (so, rightly, Morris 1995: 533: “To the end they remain confused and perplexed, totally unable to appreciate the magnitude of the gift offered to them and the significance of the Person who offers it”).

6 The balancing emphasis is provided by Ridderbos (1997: 444–45), who notes, “Unbelief is not thereby blamed on God in a predestinarian sense, but is rather described as a punishment from God.” Carson (1991: 448–49), too, engages in theodicy when he writes, “God’s judicial hardening is not presented as the capricious manipulation of an arbitrary potentate ... but as a holy condemnation of a guilty people who are condemned to do and be what they themselves have chosen.”

7 For a helpful comparison and brief discussion of the MT, LXX, and Johannine forms of Isa. 6:10, see R. Brown 1966: 486. The Hebrew original moves from heart to ears to eyes and then back from sight to hearing to understanding. John does not refer to hearing but instead focuses on sight, probably owing to his mention of Jesus’ signs in 12:37 (Carson 1991: 449; cf. Barrett 1978: 431). Keener (2003: 833) detects verbal ties between the quote of Isa. 6:9–10 (John 12:40) and John 9:39–41 (blindness) and 4:47; 5:13 (healing). The Jews considered the heart to be the seat of mental as well as physical life (cf. Mark 8:17–21).

8 This is confirmed by the Targumim: Tg. Ps.-J. on Isa. 6:1 changes “I saw the Lord” to “I saw the glory of the Lord,” and the same Targum changes “the King, the Lord of hosts” in Isa. 6:5 to “the glory of the shekinah of the eternal King, the Lord of hosts” (first century B.C.–third century A.D.; see Carson 1991: 449).

9 This is the view of the majority of major commentators: e.g., Carson 1991: 449; Morris 1995: 538; Ridderbos 1997: 445; R. Brown 1966: 484.

1 This narrow delineation of the farewell discourse is affirmed by, among others, G. Johnston (1970), Segovia (1991, followed tentatively by Keener [2003: 891]), and Dettwiler (1995 [though note that Dettwiler starts the discourse at 13:1 to accommodate his relecture theory]). See also Kellum 2005. Many who do include chapter 17 do so by way of separate reference to Jesus' final prayer (e.g., Carson 1980).

2 For a defense of the literary and theological integrity of 13:1–30, see Carson 1991: 460. For a comprehensive discussion of various attempts at reconstructing putative sources, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.7–15. Note that structurally, the cleansing motif in chapter 13 may correspond to the cleansing motif in chapter 2, both at the Cana wedding and at the clearing of the temple. While in chapter 2 Jesus' attempt to cleanse corrupt Jewish custom and worship must be pronounced a failure in human terms (though both events serve as Johannine "signs" with messianic significance), chapter 13 witnesses his successful cleansing of the new messianic community.

1 Cf. "six days before the Passover" in 12:1; "the next day" in 12:12. Carson (1991: 455–58) rightly concludes that Jesus and his disciples ate a true paschal meal on Thursday, 15 Nisan (contra Barrett 1978: 50–51; R. Brown 1970: 556; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.36). On the chronology of the passion narrative in John and the Synoptics (siding with Carson, despite Morris 1995: 688–90), see the sidebar in Köstenberger 1999a: 146, with further bibliographical references (see also Köstenberger 2002c: 130, 164, 173; Blomberg 1987: 175–80; Carson 1984: 530–32). Some seek to adjudicate apparent differences between the presentations in John and the Synoptics by the theory that differences in chronology are due to the use of different calendars. John, it is suggested, like the Judeans and the Sadducees, uses a lunar sunset-to-sunset calendar, while the Synoptics, like the Galileans, the Pharisees, and Jesus and his followers, employ a solar sunrise-to-sunrise reckoning (Hoehner 1977: 85–90; see chart on p. 89; Morris 1995: 684–95); or, John's calendric usage shifts: his light-darkness theme (rooted in the Genesis account) is conveyed by way of a solar calendar, while elsewhere a lunar system is found (building on exodus redemptive motifs) (Busada 2003). However, these theories seem to lack a clear textual base in the Gospels themselves and are unnecessarily complicated if the solution argued here is adopted.

4 So Morris (1995: 544), citing Calvin (1961: 60), who denounces annual footwashing rites as "theatrical," "empty and bare," "ceremonial comedy," and "shameful mockery of Christ." See also Carson 1991: 458.

7 This is favored by Morris (1995: 545 n. 9) and Ridderbos (1997: 452); cf. Barrett 1978: 438; R. Brown 1970: 550. Carson (1991: 461), at least explicitly, remains undecided, though his translation reflects an intensive force.

33 So Schlatter 1948: 282. Morris (1995: 548 n. 22) notes the plural form ταῦτα (tauta, these things) and suggests that the expression "probably points to all the events associated with the Passion," though he does say that in part, the "later" may refer to the explanation that Jesus soon will give. The latter is ruled out categorically by Schnackenburg (1990: 3.19) and, less categorically but still firmly, by Carson (1991: 463). However, a radical disjunction between Jesus' explanation here and the events of the passion seems to be unnecessary.

34 Contra Carson (1991: 464), who discards a metonymic reading as "heavy-handed" and is content to interpret the statement as reflecting “unrestrained exuberance.”

407n38, 407n39, 409, 409n48, 409n52, 411, 411n1, 412, 412n5, 413, 414, 416, 416n18, 417, 417n21, 418, 419n2, 422, 423, 423n5, 424, 424n13, 425n22, 426n23, 426n24, 428,

38 A reference to Christian baptism is unlikely. Contra Moloney 1998: 375; Brodie 1993: 452; and R. Brown (1970: 562), who says that 13:6–10 represents a secondary allusion to baptism. Moreover, as Carson (1991: 466) notes, the washing of Judas’s feet proves that “no rite, even if performed by Jesus himself, ensures spiritual cleansing.” On “he knew,” see 6:70–71; 13:3, 26–27.

39 Cf. the general application drawn by Carson (1991: 468): “[T]he heart of Jesus’ command is a humility and helpfulness toward brothers and sisters in Christ.” Talbert (1992: 194) rejects this general application and argues for a more specific one: “[F]or the disciples to wash one another’s feet ... means for them to forgive one another those daily trespasses that characterize one human being’s infringement upon another.”

48 Cf. Matt. 10:24; Luke 6:40 (cf. 22:27). Jesus refers back to this saying in John 15:20.

“Aphoristic parenthesis” is the term used by Carson (1991: 469); cf. Barrett 1978: 444; Beasley-Murray 1999: 236.

52 So Morris 1995: 549 n. 27; apparently, Carson 1991: 464–66; and the UBS committee (Metzger 1994: 204), adducing the “preponderant weight of external attestation”; contra Barrett 1978: 442; Beasley-Murray 1999: 229 n. f; Lindars 1972: 451; D. M. Smith 1999: 254; Dunn 1970: 250–51.

1 John’s quotation is closer to the MT than to the LXX. Menken (1990) contends that the rendering of Ps. 41:9 in the present passage represents the evangelist’s own translation from the Hebrew. Moloney (1998: 384), on the strength of the evangelist’s choice of the verb τρῶγῶ (trōgō [used also in 6:54–58]) in the place of the LXX’s ἐσθίῶ (esthiō) for “eat,” postulates “eucharistic overtones” to the meal. On fulfillment quotations, see commentary at 12:38. Similar texts in the Psalms include 31:9–13; 38:10–12; 55:13–14 (see commentary at 13:21). Ridderbos (1997: 467 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 554]) rightly argues for a general sense of “this is to fulfill the scripture” rather than taking the statement to imply that Jesus chose Judas in order to fulfill Scripture. This latter view seems to be held by Carson (1991: 470), who writes, “The reason Jesus chose one who would betray him was to fulfill the Scripture.”

5 Commenting on 13:19, Carson (1991: 471) notes that ἐγὼ εἰμι (egō eimi, I am) is “an everyday expression that can be devoid of theological overtones” but also “can call to mind the ineffable name of God,” without adjudicating the issue. At 13:20, however, he refers to “I am he” as a “stunning Christological claim.”

18 Carson (1991: 474) suggests that “the momentous nature of Jesus’ confidence left him temporarily paralysed.” Barrett (1978: 447) says that the disciple’s “inactivity is incomprehensible.” Morris (1995: 558) thinks that the disciple “did not grasp the significance of the sop,” an option sharply rejected by Barrett (1978: 447), who objects that “to say that he failed to grasp the meaning of the sign is to make him an imbecile.”

21 The present verb ποιεῖς (poieis, you are doing) is conative (Wallace 1996: 535), denoting an action not yet begun but about to be attempted. Carson (1991: 475) and Morris (1995: 557 n. 63; cf. Barrett 1978: 448) suggest that τάχιον (tachion, quickly) should be construed as a genuine comparative and rendered “more quickly” (than Judas had planned). This would be in keeping with the way the comparative form of this word is used in its only other Johannine reference (20:4), though in its other two NT instances the form is simply elative, to be rendered “soon” or “quickly” (Heb. 13:19, 23). Hence, caution seems to be called for in drawing conclusions from the comparative form of the term in the present passage.

2 The outline of the structure of the first unit (13:31–14:31) below follows Carson (1991: 498) and Blomberg (2002: 199), who take 14:15–31 as a single unit. Others divide this section between 14:24 and 14:25 (e.g., Moloney 1998: 391–92; R. Brown 1970: 623). Schnackenburg (1990: 3.58), following Becker, sees a break between 14:17 and 14:18.

5 “New command” is in the emphatic position (Morris 1995: 562). The command probably harks back to the footwashing earlier in the chapter (Carson 1991: 484; Burge 2000: 376).

13 Cf. 10:11. Carson (1991: 486) aptly notes that Peter’s response “displays not only gross ignorance of human weakness, but a certain haughty independence that is the seed of the denial itself.” Peter has no response to Jesus’ prediction of his denials (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.57) and is not heard from again until 18:10 (Morris 1995: 564).

22 Most commentators take both occurrences of πιστεύετε (pisteute, believe, trust) in 14:1 as imperatives (e.g., Carson 1991: 488; Morris 1995: 566; Beasley-Murray 1999: 249; Burge 2000: 391; Westcott 1908: 2.167; Köstenberger 1999a: 163). Alternatively, the first form may be an indicative: “You trust in God; trust also in me” (NIV footnote) or interrogative (Bultmann 1971: 600). Schnackenburg (1990: 3.59) notes that 14:1b forms a chiasm (“[You] Trust in God, also in me trust”).

23 This is inadequately recognized by Gundry 1967: 68–72 (see the critique in Carson 1991: 488–89).

24 The rendering “mansions” (rather than “rooms”), which crept into English translations through William Tyndale (1526) via the Vulgate, mistakenly suggests luxurious accommodations in modern parlance (the Latin word mansio referred to a stopover place, which was still the meaning of “mansion” in Tyndale’s day). See R. Brown 1970: 619; Carson 1991: 489.

35 For a comprehensive treatment and critique of religious pluralism within the larger framework of postmodernism, see especially Carson 1996. See also Carson’s comments in his commentary (1991: 491–92) and his important rebuttal of Bruce (1983: 298–99 [picked up Beasley-Murray 1999: 253]), who alleges that “Jesus’ claim, understood in the light of the prologue to the Gospel, is inclusive, not exclusive.” On the exclusivism of 14:6, see also Keener 2003: 941–43.

40 See the additional note on 14:7. The rendering “certainly” takes ἀπάρτι (aparti) as one word (so, tentatively, Carson 1991: 493, with reference to A. Debrunner and Beasley-Murray; contra Moloney 1998: 399). This is also a possibility in 13:19 (note further the variant in 1:51; cf. Matt. 26:29, 64; Rev. 14:13; see BDAG 97).

54 Carson (1991: 495–96) rightly contends that in the Johannine context “greater works” cannot mean (1) more works, (2) more spectacular works, or (3) more supernatural works. He correctly locates the clues to a proper understanding of 14:12 in the parallel in 5:20 and in the final clause “because I am going to the Father,” and points to the disciples’ greater understanding after the resurrection in the “new eschatological age that will then have dawned.”

65 As Carson (1991: 498, citing Barrett 1978: 461) notes, the conditional clause of 14:15 controls the grammar of the next two verses and the thought of the next six. The condition is third class, with no assumption made as to its veracity.

70 The translation of the term has proved particularly difficult since there does not seem to be an exact equivalent in the English language (see discussion in Carson 1991: 499). None of the expressions chosen in English translations seems fully adequate: “Counselor” (NIV) smacks of contemporary notions of counseling (marriage counselor, camp counselor), focusing primarily on emotional or psychological aspects (though the legal term “Counselor” or “Counsel” is more appropriate); “Helper” (NASB, ESV, ISV) is more neutral but conveys inferior status overtones not present in the text and lacks the legal connotation possibly present (cf. the discussion in Lindars 1972: 479); the fact that some translations give several alternative renderings in footnotes also suggests that any one English rendering may be inadequate (e.g., NLT: “the Counselor; or Comforter, or Encourager, or Advocate”). “Companion” (suggested by Brodie [1993: 466]) also falls short, as does Calvin’s (1961: 82) “Patron.” Some make reference to the root meaning of the word, “one called alongside to help,” but it is unclear whether first-century usage consciously drew on this background. There is evidence that the expression was used in a legal setting, but it is less clear that the meaning should be restricted to “Advocate” (so, consistently, the TNIV) or the like (standard Greek reference works cite the following meanings: LSJ—one called to one’s aid, legal assistant, advocate, summoned, intercessor; Behm, TDNT 5:800–814—legal advisor, helper, advocate in court [for a helpful survey, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.144–50]). Perhaps “helping presence” captures the import of the term better than any other (Köstenberger 1999a: 157) for the following reasons: (1) this is what Jesus was while with the disciples; (2) this encompasses the various functions laid out for the Spirit in John 14–16; (3) this transcends (but may include) the legal context of the term (see esp. 16:7–11). See the discussion by Ridderbos (1997: 503), who issues a plea to let the Johannine context (rather than alleged extrabiblical parallels) determine the meaning of παράκλητος and concludes that “the dominant idea is of someone who offers assistance in a situation in which help is needed.”

73 Though, as Moloney (1998: 407) points out, there are differences between Jesus and the Spirit as well: the latter neither becomes flesh nor dies for our sins. Alternatively, the statement refers to Jesus’ postresurrection appearances to his followers (so Ridderbos 1997: 505; Carson 1991: 501; Morris 1995: 578–59; Beasley-Murray 1999: 258; Borchert 2002: 126). Barrett (1978: 464) says that the passage refers neither to Jesus coming in the person of the Holy Spirit nor to the parousia but rather is using language appropriate to both the resurrection and the parousia to refer to both.

84 As Carson (1991: 503) rightly notes, the reference is not limited to the resurrection appearances but also extends to Jesus’ self-disclosure in later times (citing Matt. 28:20).

91 The vast majority of commentators (including R. Brown, Barrett, Borchert, Morris, Carson, and Ridderbos) believe that teaching and reminding are in synonymous parallelism. On the Spirit’s teaching ministry, see the parallel in 16:13. Both verses together (14:26 and 16:13) echo Ps. 25:5 (cf. 25:9). See also Neh. 9:20 (cf. 1 John 2:20, 27). Regarding Jesus’ teaching, see John 6:59; 7:14, 28, 35; 8:20; 18:20. It is often argued that the use of the Greek masculine pronoun ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, he) for the Spirit in passages such as John 14:26; 15:26; and 16:13–14 affirms the personality of the Holy Spirit (Barrett 1978: 482; Borchert 2002: 159; Morris 1995: 583 n. 73 [citing Westcott]; 606 n. 64; 621 n. 27; and others cited in Wallace 1996: 331 n. 42). However, the most likely reason for John’s use of the masculine pronoun in these passages is that the antecedent is the masculine noun ὁ παράκλητος (ho paraklētos, the helping presence). If so, John’s use of a masculine pronoun to refer to the Spirit is best explained as a function of grammar rather than theology, and arguments for the personality of the Holy Spirit must be made on other grounds (so rightly Wallace 1996: 331–32, who points out that it is difficult to find any text where the neuter noun πνεῦμα [pneuma, spirit/Spirit] is grammatically referred to by the masculine).

98 So Carson 1991: 506; Morris 1995: 584; contra Ridderbos (1997: 511), who construes this clause not as conditional but causal (p. 494 n. 37).

1 Carson (1991: 513) terms it “extended metaphor” or “illustrative comparison.” He is not convinced that the parallels adduced by Bauckham (1987: 84–101) establish that the present passage constitutes a commentary on one of Jesus’ parables (Carson 1991: 512). R. Brown (1970: 668) labels this a māšāl (so also Borchert 2002: 138; cf. 1996: 329); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.96) calls it “figurative discourse.”

2 Although vine imagery is widespread in ancient literature, an OT background for the present passage is favored by the vast majority of commentators, primarily owing to the frequent OT references or allusions and the replacement motif in this Gospel (e.g., Carson 1991: 513; R. Brown 1970: 669–71; Morris 1995: 593; Ridderbos 1997: 515; contra Bultmann 1971: 530; Witherington 1995: 255–57).

11 Some interpreters (e.g., Barrett 1978: 473; Carson 1991: 514; Witherington 1995: 258) view the depiction of the Son as the vine and the Father as the vinedresser in terms of the Son’s subordination to the Father. Indeed, this seems to be the implication in the present allegory, though it is not at the front of the message. Borchert (2002: 140) affirms the functional, though not essential, subordination of the Son to the Father.

13 Westcott (1908: 2.198) notes, “Everything is removed from the branch which tends to divert the vital power from the production of fruit.” The term καθαίρω (kathairō, prune) is rare in the LXX and occurs only here in the NT. It is found frequently with reference to agricultural processes (though not necessarily pruning) in secular Greek (e.g., Xenophon, Oeconomicus 18.6; 20.11). On cutting, see Matt. 3:10 par.; 7:19; Rom. 11:22, 24 (ἐκκόπτω, ekkoptō, cut off). On pruning, see Isa. 18:5; Jer. 5:10 (cf. Heb. 12:4–11). Commentators are virtually unanimous in detecting a play on words in the parallel use of αἶρω (airō, remove) and καθαίρω in 15:2 (e.g., Carson 1991: 515).

16 See especially Carson (1991: 518), who notes that of the twenty-four occurrences of αἶρω in this Gospel, the term means “lift up” eight times and “remove” sixteen times, and states that no good evidence exists that the branches of vines were regularly lifted off the ground.

18 Contra Barrett (1978: 473 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 675]), who believes that the reference is to apostate Christians, perhaps with unfruitful Jews in the background as well. But see Carson (1991: 515), who rightly notes that in John, true disciples by definition persevere (6:37–40; 10:28), while on the other hand, the NT as a whole acknowledges the existence of those who sustain some type of connection with Jesus but who nonetheless end up failing to exemplify the perseverance that would mark them as truly transformed, spiritually reborn individuals (e.g., 8:31–59; 1 John 2:19; 2 John 9; Matt. 13:18–23; 24:12).

26 Carson (1991: 517) lists as among the “fruit” obedience to Jesus’ commands (15:10); experience of Jesus’ joy (15:11; and peace [14:27]); love for one another (15:12); and witness to the world (15:16, 27).

28 As mentioned, Judas seems to be the prime example (cf. 13:10–11; 15:2; see Stibbe 1996: 161–62). Both verbs ἐβλήθη (eblēthē) and ἐξηράνθη (exēranthē) are in the Greek aorist (lit., “has been thrown” and “has been withered”), indicating the completeness of the divine judgment (see the discussion in Carson 1991: 519). Of the four verbs in 15:6, the first two are passive and the second two active in the Greek, which is a bit awkward in English. Hence, several translations (such as the NIV, NLT, RSV, NRSV, and TNIV) render συναγούσιν (synagousin, they gather), for example, as a passive (but see KJV, ASV, NASB, NKJV; Ridderbos 1997: 518). In either case, the agents are left unspecified.

29 Lang, TDNT 6:934–47, especially 936–37, 942; Carson 1991: 517; R. Brown 1970: 679; Ridderbos 1997: 518. See, for example, Isa. 30:27; Matt. 3:12 par.; 5:22; 18:8; 25:41; Luke 12:49; Heb. 12:29; 2 Pet. 3:10; Jude 7, 23; Rev. 20:14.

31 Conversely, fruitlessness fails to give God the glory that he so amply deserves (Carson 1991: 518). The use of ἐδοξάσθη (edoxasthē, lit., he was glorified) resembles the similar instances of passive aorist forms (with the agents remaining unspecified) in 15:6 (Borchert 2002: 145). The conjunction ἵνα (hina) functions appositionally, meaning “namely” or “that” (Wallace 1996: 475–76).

47 That is, for those he loves (Carson 1991: 521; R. Brown 1970: 664; Barrett 1978: 477; Witherington 1995: 259; Borchert 2002: 149). See 10:11, 15, 17–18; 1 John 3:16; cf. Rom. 5:6–8. The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) in the present verse is epexegetical (R. Brown 1970: 664).

48 Some may object that love for one’s enemies would be greater; but the present passage is concerned only with the greatest possible way to show love for one’s friends (Bultmann 1971: 542 n. 4; Morris 1995: 599; Carson 1991: 522).

52 Morris (1995: 599 n. 33) notes the emphatic personal pronouns ὑμεῖς (hymeis, you) and ἐγώ (egō, I), which set off Jesus’ relationship with his disciples from the world. The converse does not follow: Jesus does not have to obey his followers in order to be called their friend (Carson 1991: 522; Kruse 2003: 321, who notes that Matt. 11:19 = Luke 7:34 is no real exception). Borchert (2002: 149) registers his concern that the hymn “What a Friend We Have in Jesus” may be unduly fraternizing.

57 See Borchert 2002: 150; Carson 1991: 523; and Calvin (1961: 101), who notes that this “is as good as saying that they did not obtain by their own skill or industry whatever they have.” The pronoun ἐγώ (egō, I) is emphatic (Barrett 1978: 478); the conjunction ἀλλά (alla, but) is strongly adversative and stresses the contrast between Jesus choosing his disciples and the contemporary practice of disciples choosing to attach themselves to a particular rabbi.

5 See Ridderbos 1997: 523; Carson 1991: 525. Compare Matt. 10:24 par. (Beasley-Murray 1999: 275). See also the additional note on 15:20.

6 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 525–26, with reference to 17:20, the NIV, and many major commentators (e.g., Barrett 1978: 480; Bultmann 1971: 549; Lindars 1970: 494; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.115; Bruce 1980: 313; contra Borchert 2002: 156; Dodd 1963: 409; R. Brown 1970: 687; and the NLT). See the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 275; Carson 1991: 525–26.

8 See 7:28; 8:19, 27, 55; 16:3. Ταῦτα πάντα (tauta panta, all these things) presumably includes both hatred (15:18–19) and the resulting persecution (15:20; cf. 16:1–3; see Bultmann 1971: 550 n. 1; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276; Ridderbos 1997: 524). The expression “because of my name” reflects OT terminology pertaining to God and his great name (cf. 1 Sam. 12:22; 2 Chron. 6:32; Jer. 14:21; cf. Acts 5:41; 1 Pet. 4:14; 1 John 2:12; Rev. 2:3; see R. Brown 1970: 687), though in the present context it is essentially synonymous with “me” (Carson 1991: 526; Moloney 1998: 433).

12 A possible parallel is Matt. 11:20–24, where those who have heard Jesus but rejected him will be judged more severely than Tyre and Sidon (see also Luke 11:31–32) (Carson 1991: 526).

467, 467n16, 467n18, 467n19, 468, 468n22, 468n24, 469, 469n30, 470, 470n35, 472, 472n46, 474, 474n57, 474n59, 475, 475n60, 476, 476n65, 477, 477n68, 477n69, 478,

16 So Ridderbos 1997: 525; R. Brown 1970: 688; Morris 1995: 605; Barrett 1978: 482; Carson 1991: 527 n. 2.

18 So Ridderbos 1997: 525–26; Barrett 1978: 482; Carson 1991: 527; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276; contra Moloney (1998: 434), who contends that “most” favor Ps. 35. Cf. the citation of Ps. 69:9 in John 2:17. See also Ps. 119:161. Extrabiblical parallels include Ps. Sol. 7:1; b. Yoma 9b (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 147; cf. Barrett 1978: 482; R. Brown 1970: 689).

19 Regarding the phrase “whom I will send to you,” see 14:16, 26 (where the Son is said to be the sender of the Paraclete) and 16:7. “Whom I will send from the Father” and “who proceeds from the Father” are parallel (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.118; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276). Carson (1991: 528–29) rightly notes that what is in view is not ontological procession, but the mission of the Spirit is parallel to the mission of the Son (cf. Barrett 1978: 482). On “the Spirit of truth,” see commentary at 14:17 (see also 16:13; 1 John 4:6).

22 Μαρτυρεῖτε (martyreite) is best taken as an imperative, “you must bear witness” (Carson 1991: 529; NIV; NLT; NRSV; TNIV), rather than as an indicative (ASV; RSV) or a future (NASB; NKJV), though there is little distinction in meaning (so, rightly, R. Brown 1970: 689). The imperative here is addressed to the Eleven, who in turn serve as representatives of later generations of believers (Köstenberger 1998b: 151 n. 33, as a mild corrective to Carson 1991: 505). On the implications (or lack thereof) of the use of the masculine form ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, he) for the personality of the Spirit, see commentary at 14:26 (see also 16:13–14).

24 So Carson 1991: 529; Ridderbos 1997: 527; R. Brown 1970: 690; Moloney 1998: 434. See 16:4; 6:64; 8:25. See also Luke 1:2; Acts 1:21–22; 10:37. The present tense ἐστέ (este, you are) is perfective in meaning, “you have been” (R. Brown 1970: 690; contra Bultmann 1971: 554).

30 See Carson 1991: 530; Barrett 1978: 484. Though note the lack of the article in the present instance (Morris 1995: 615 n. 4). The same phrase, ὥρα ἔρχεται (hōra erchetai, a time, hour is coming), occurs in John also in 4:21, 23; 5:25, 28; 16:25, 32.

35 On the surface, 13:36 and 14:5 seem to contradict Jesus’ statement here, but in both previous passages the illocutionary force of the questions is a protest of Jesus’ announced departure rather than a sincere inquiry as to his destination or the implications of his leaving (Carson 1991: 532–33; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.126; R. Brown 1970: 710, followed by Beasley-Murray 1999: 279; note also the curious attempt at resolving the difficulty by Borchert 2002: 164). Burge (2000: 436) notes the present tense ἐρωτᾷ (erōta, asks).

46 Keener (2003: 1034) contends that Carson’s interpretation of 16:8–11 is predicated “on his improbable view that v. 10 refers to the world’s (pseudo-)righteousness.” Keener prefers the traditional view that the righteousness is Christ’s, or his people’s (?).

57 Burge (2000: 450) ventures into precarious territory when he suggests that the Spirit may “also lead into new territory, new doctrines, and new activities unknown in Jesus’ historical ministry” (see, more fully, Burge 1987: 211–17). Clearly, the Spirit’s ministry may lead believers to see the significance and relevance of Jesus’ teaching in a way that would be impossible without his illuminating work, but it is less clear that the present passage should be construed along the lines of the mediation of substantively new revelation or even “new doctrines.” For a critique of this view, see especially Carson (1991: 542), who rightly cautions against diminishing the salvation-historical uniqueness of the vantage point assumed in the present passage.

59 So, rightly, Carson (1991: 543), who speaks of “Jesus’ departure in death and his return after his resurrection” (cf. Morris 1995: 623; Burge 2000: 440), and makes the point that these verses cannot apply to the parousia, because according to Jesus’ accompanying illustration in 16:20–24, there would have to be grief in the interim, while 15:11 promises joy. Contra Borchert (2002: 173 n. 295), who refers to Carson’s view as “narrow.”

60 See, for example, 1:47–48; 2:24–25; 4:17–18; 6:61, 64. See Barrett 1978: 492.

65 See Isa. 13:8; 21:3; 26:17–18; 42:14; 66:7–13; Jer. 4:31; 6:24; 13:21; 22:23; 30:6; 49:22–24; 50:43; Mic. 4:9–10; cf. 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 16:38–39. The anarthrous expression “a woman” is generic (Carson 1991: 544 n. 1). For a brief discussion and refutation of a Mariological interpretation of the woman (mostly by Roman Catholic interpreters), see Ridderbos 1997: 539 n. 188 (referring also to Schnackenburg 1990: 3.158–59).

68 Morris (1995: 628) notes the present tense of the imperative αἰτεῖτε (aiteite, ask) in 16:24, conveying the continual nature of the asking. Note also the presence of two different words for “ask,” ἐρωτάω (erōtaō) in 16:23 and αἰτέω (aiteō) three times in 16:23–24, whereby the former refers to the barrage of questions that the disciples had for Jesus prior to the crucifixion (cf. 16:5, 30), and the latter to prayer requests subsequent to his exaltation (see Carson 1991: 545, apparently dependent on Barrett 1978: 494; contra Borchert 2002: 176).

69 So Carson 1991: 546; Barrett 1978: 495; R. Brown 1970: 735; Beasley-Murray 1999: 286; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.161.

71 The statement involves no necessary contradiction with Mark 4:33–34 (Carson 1991: 546–47).

72 Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25; 1 John 2:1; cf. John 14:16; 17:9, 15, 20. See Carson 1991: 547; Ridderbos 1997: 543; Morris 1995: 629; Barrett 1978: 496.

76 Carson (1991: 548) notes how 16:28 sums up Jesus’ entire mission, from his sending from the Father (3:16–17) through the incarnation (1:10–11, 14) to his departure from the world (14:19) and his return to the Father (the dominant theme of chs. 14–17). Similarly, Borchert 2002: 179. Barrett (1978: 496) even calls the verse “a complete summary ... of the Christian faith,” Beasley-Murray (1999: 287) “at once a summary of Johannine Christology and the heart of this Gospel” (combined by Burge 2000: 443), and Stibbe (1996: 174) “the parade example of this theme of the eternal origin and destiny of Jesus the Messiah.”

81 Some find the present reference to the Father’s presence with Jesus to contradict Jesus’ cry of dereliction on the cross (Mark 15:34 = Matt. 27:46). However, the present passage simply contrasts the disciples’ fickleness with the Father’s faithfulness (Beasley-Murray 1999: 288), which does not rule out “Jesus’ sense of total abandonment, for some brief period of time” (Carson 1991: 549). See also Borchert’s (2002: 181–83) effort to adjudicate this issue in an excursus titled “Nonabandonment in John and the Cry of Dereliction.”

1 The prayer is often called Jesus’ “high-priestly prayer” (a designation reaching back at least as far as the sixteenth century), though this label hardly fits with Johannine thought, which does not picture Jesus as a high priest (Ridderbos 1997: 546; Carson 1991: 552–53; though see commentary at 17:19 below). Westcott’s and E. C. Hoskyns’s title “prayer of consecration,” though not without merit (see below), fails to encompass the contents of the entire prayer (Carson 1991: 553; Barrett 1978: 500). Hence, commentators now frequently opt for more generic titles of the present prayer, such as “The Farewell Prayer” (Ridderbos) or “The Prayer of Jesus” (Carson). Witherington (1995: 266) calls it “The Sage’s Prayer,” based on his view that the Fourth Evangelist portrays Jesus as a sage.

4 Beasley-Murray (1999: 294) and others believe that the prayer of John 17 constitutes an expansion of the much shorter prayer in 12:27–28, but this is rightly rejected by Carson (1991: 552).

12 Ridderbos (1997: 548) says that the glory sought by Jesus here is none other than the one he already possessed on earth (e.g., 1:14; 2:11; cf. 9:3; 11:4, 40; 12:28). Carson (1991: 554) suggests that the petition is for the Father to reverse the self-emptying entailed in Jesus’ incarnation and to restore Jesus to his preexistent glory (cf. 17:24).

14 See also Matt. 11:27; 28:18; cf. Wis. 10:2. Carson (1991: 555) maintains that this authority was granted to Jesus by the Father in eternity past on the basis of the Son’s prospective obedience to the divine redemptive plan. Barrett (1978: 502) claims that the reference is to “a special empowering for the earthly ministry of the incarnate Son.”

19 The explanatory phrase “now this is” is in keeping with Johannine style (cf., e.g., 3:19: “this is the verdict”). The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) here, in typical Johannine idiom, is appositional (Wallace 1996: 475). Morris (1995: 638) notes that ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) here precedes the noun (elsewhere in John also in 4:23), and he proposes that this indicates emphasis. The verse is regularly seen by critical scholars as a Johannine insertion (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 741; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.172; Barrett 1978: 503; but see Carson 1991: 556; Ridderbos 1997: 549).

21 Carson (1991: 556) writes, “Knowledge of God and of Jesus Christ entails fellowship, trust, personal relationship, faith.” Similarly, Barrett (1978: 504) comments, “Saving knowledge is rooted in knowledge of a historical person; it is therefore objective and at the same time a personal relation.” This is in keeping with the Hebrew use of the term “to know,” which encompasses even the most intimate human relationship, sexual intercourse. Thus, Gen. 4:1 LXX says that Adam “knew” (ἐγνων, egnō) his wife, Eve, and she became pregnant and gave birth to her son.

32 Ἐφανερώσα (ephanērōsa, I have revealed) globally refers to Jesus’ entire ministry, including his imminent cross-death (Carson 1991: 558). See also the close parallel in 17:26, ἐγνώρισα (egnōrisa, I have made known) which, together with the present verse, brackets Jesus’ intercession for others. The term φανερώω (phaneroō, reveal) occurs elsewhere in John in 1:31; 2:11; 3:21; 7:4; 9:3; 21:1, 14, and elsewhere in the Gospels only in Mark 4:22. The closest parallel in John is 2:11 (cf. 1:14; see also ἐξηγήσατο [exēgēsato, he has given full account] in 1:18).

36 Cf. Exod. 3:13–15. See R. Brown 1970: 755; Carson 1991: 558; Morris 1995: 640; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.175.

40 As Carson (1991: 559) rightly points out, the point of comparison here is not between the disciples’ faith before and after the resurrection but between the disciples’ faith and the world’s unbelief prior to the resurrection. Barrett (1978: 505) thinks that hindsight has shaded the presentation of the disciples’ faith in the present passage.

42 Believing and knowing are similarly linked in Peter’s seminal confession in 6:69. “Knew with certainty” (TNIV) reads more literally, “knew truly” (ἀληθῶς, alēthōs; cf. 1:47; 4:42; 6:14; 7:26, 40; 8:31). The same phrase occurs in 7:26 (there rendered “really concluded” in the TNIV) in an ironic reference to the Jewish authorities. Carson (1991: 560) points out that the references to the disciples’ knowing and believing balance the strong predestinarian teaching of 17:2, 6.

495n58, 496, 497, 497n69, 498, 498n70, 499n79, 500n88, 501n89, 502n1, 504n3, 504n5, 505n11, 505n14, 506n15, 508n27, 512, 513, 513n13, 514, 514n16, 515, 516, 516n24,

46 Carson (1991: 561) rightly notes that not only does the present address combine the notions of transcendence (holy) and familial intimacy (Father), but also it provides the foundation on the basis of which the Son and believers are consecrated for service (see 17:17–19; see Barrett 1978: 507).

47 R. Brown (1970: 759 [approvingly cited by Borchert 2002: 197]) says that ἐν (en, in, by) is both instrumental and local. Contra Carson (1991: 562) and Morris (1995: 644), who prefer a locative force (“in your name”).

58 Carson (1991: 565) says that believers have “neither the luxury of compromise ... nor the safety of disengagement.” Regarding the statement “they are not of the world, even as I am not of it,” see 17:14.

69 As Carson (1991: 568) notes, believers are dependent on Jesus “for life and fruitfulness.”

70 Carson (1991: 568) maintains that such unity is achieved not by finding “the lowest common theological denominator, but by common adherence to the apostolic gospel, by love that is joyfully self-sacrificing, by undaunted commitment to the shared goals of the mission.”

Similarly, Morris (1995: 644) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 306–7). Schlatter (1948: 325) points out that unity is all the more important as the circle of believers in Jesus grows. He also notes the contrast between such unity and the existence of various sects in contemporary Judaism.

79 See Carson 1991: 569; Ridderbos 1997: 564. On “you ... have loved them,” see 14:23; 16:27.

88 So Carson 1991: 570; cf. R. Brown 1970: 781; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.197; Borchert 2002: 211. Contra Morris (1995: 653), who thinks that it is through the cross. Ridderbos (1997: 566) suggests that this is not so much an anticipation of the passion as it is a reference “to Jesus’ continuing work in heaven.”

1 Stibbe (1992: 111–12) contends that John’s characterization of Jesus in his passion narrative consists of three aspects: Jesus as judge, king, and elusive God. Stibbe also suggests that 18:1–27 serves as an “implicit commentary on the truth enunciated in 1:5” (i.e., the victory of the light over the darkness [p. 100]). On the relationship between the Johannine and the Synoptic passion narratives, see Ridderbos 1996: 569–72; Carson 1991: 571–76; Westcott 1908: 2.262–64. Burge (2000: 485–86) addresses the historical trustworthiness of the Johannine passion narrative.

Moloney (1998: 482) divides 18:1–19:42 into five scenes on the basis of the introduction of new people and places. He also notes that this section begins and ends with κῆπος (kēpos, garden).

R. Brown (1970: 813–17), too, has an extensive discussion of the structure and historicity of John’s passion narrative. See also the examination of theological and literary features of this section in Schnackenburg 1990: 3.218–19.

3 So Carson 1991: 576; Barrett 1978: 517; Beasley-Murray 1999: 321.

5 Morris (1995: 655) suggests that ἐξῆλθεν (exēlthen, they left) means they “went out of the house” (cf. Barrett 1978: 517). Carson (1991: 576) proposes that it means they left the city (cf. Bultmann 1971: 638).

11 The participle λαβών (labōn) here has the sense of “leading” rather than “taking” (Carson 1991: 577; Barrett 1978: 518).

14 As presumably is the case here (so Morris 1995: 656 n. 5; cf. Carson 1991: 577; Witherington 1995: 285; Borchert 2002: 218).

15 Ridderbos (1997: 574) suggests that the two groups are mentioned jointly here to underscore Jesus’ authority. Carson (1991: 577) concludes that the two groups are described to imply that the whole world is against Jesus (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 322). See the further references in 18:12, 18, 22; 19:6 (cf. 18:36).

27 See Ezek. 1:28; 44:4; Dan. 2:46; 8:18; 10:9; Acts 9:4; 22:7; 26:14; Rev. 1:17; 19:10; 22:8. Contra Carson (1991: 578–79), who argues that the evangelist is not attempting to describe a theophanic manifestation, concluding that the soldiers simply responded “better than they knew” (cf. Witherington [1995: 286], who calls this an example of “Johannine double-entendre”; but see Bultmann 1971: 639; Burge 2000: 492; Conway 1999: 173). See also the legend cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 158.

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235). Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

16 So Morris 1995: 665–66 n. 35, citing Dodd; Carson 1991: 581; Barrett 1978: 526; but see Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 3. The term is used for a “close friend” in the LXX (e.g., 2 Kings 10:11; Ps. 54:14 [55:13 Eng.]; cf. Luke 2:44; see also NewDocs 4.44; Homer, Iliad 15.350).

24 Among those viewing the present hearing in more unofficial terms are Carson (1991: 584), Ridderbos (1997: 582), and R. Brown (1970: 826). Most other major commentators consider this to be an official trial (e.g., Morris, Barrett). On the Sadducees’ reputation for judging in general, Josephus writes that “the school of the Sadducees ... are indeed more heartless than any of the other Jews ... when they sit in judgment” (Ant. 20.9.1 §199).

25 Carson (1991: 583) thinks that the authorities’ main concerns were “the size of his following and the potential for any possible conspiracy.”

33 Apparently, Jesus did not consider his response to be in violation of his “turning the other cheek” principle (see the discussions in Ridderbos 1997: 583; Morris 1995: 670 n. 55; Carson 1991: 585). Schlatter (1948: 335) resolves the apparent difficulty by noting that Jesus merely pointed out the abuse without fighting for his rights. In fact, “Turning the other cheek without bearing witness to the truth is not the fruit of moral resolution but the terrorized cowardice of the wimp” (Carson 1991: 585). Contrast also Jesus’ response with Paul’s in Acts 23:2–5, where the apostle lost his temper and called the high priest “you whitewashed wall” (see Carson 1991: 584–85).

39 In the present instance, the two plot lines of Jesus’ trials and the denials of Peter (Evans 1982b [cited in Carson 1991: 586]).

42 The contrast with Jesus is stark: “Jesus confronts his critics denying nothing, Peter wilts before his inquisitors denying everything” (Witherington 1995: 289). As Stibbe (1993: 181) notes, the poignancy of the contrast between Jesus and Peter is “carefully explored in the use of echo effects,” with Jesus’ twice-repeated self-identification “I am” (18:5, 8) corresponding to Peter’s twice-repeated denial “I am not” (18:17, 25). The repeated term “deny” brings to mind Matt. 10:33 and Luke 12:9 (Carson 1991: 586).

1 R. Brown (1970: 861) comments, “With all its drama and its theology, John’s account of the trial is the most consistent and intelligible we have.” Further positive evaluations of John’s historicity are offered by Ridderbos (1997: 587–88) and by Carson (1991: 587), who suggests as possible Johannine sources Jesus after the resurrection, court attendants who later became believers, or possibly some public court records. Barrett (1978: 530) believes that most of the material is based on the Markan passion narrative.

3 For a narrative exegesis of 18:15–19:22, see Larsen 2001: 122–39. Larsen views Pilate as an archetypal tragic figure, in application of the work of Northrop Frye with further reference to Culpepper (1983) and Stibbe (1992; 1994). Keener (2003: 1097) proposes another chiasm for 18:29–19:16, with 19:1–3 (scourging and crown of thorns) at the center. On John’s Passover chronology, see Keener 2003: 1100–1103. Keener (2003: 1103) does not favor Blomberg’s and Carson’s harmonization and concludes that the Synoptics and John “at least imply (perhaps for theological reasons) the Passover on different days.” I have similar problems here with Keener’s reconstruction as with his view on the temple cleansing.

9 See Carson 1991: 588; Beasley-Murray 1999: 317 n. h; Morris 1995: 674–75. R. Brown (1970: 844) sees the hearing before Annas as concluding at 3:00 A.M., Jesus before Caiaphas from 3:00 to 6:00 A.M., and before Pilate from 6:00 A.M. until noon.

10 Ridderbos 1997: 589; Carson 1991: 589; Duke 1985: 127–28. Duke (1985: 128 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 866]) notes the further irony that the Jews are concerned about not being able to eat the Passover, yet they ultimately kill the true Passover.

12 That is, “the many meals and celebrations that week in the Passover season” (Burge 2000: 499; cf. Carson 1991: 590; see also Torrey 1931: 239–40). Contra Keener (1993: 307–308), who says that different calendars or John’s “making a symbolic point” account for the apparent discrepancy between John and the Synoptics (different calendars are also the “solution” presented by Laney [1992: 330, following Hoehner]).

17 Carson (1991: 590) comments insightfully, “The fact that Pilate had sufficiently agreed with their legal briefs to sanction sending a detachment of troops had doubtless encouraged them to think that he would ratify the proceedings of the Sanhedrin and get on to other business. To find him opening up what was in fact a new trial made them sullen.”

40 Witherington (1995: 292) writes, “Apparently Pilate concludes that Jesus is a deluded quack whom he can banter with but not take seriously.” Carson (1991: 595) describes Pilate’s response as “curt and cynical” and thinks that his reply is terse “either because he is convinced there is no answer, or, more likely, because he does not want to hear it.” Ridderbos (1997: 596) sees Pilate “shrugging his shoulders, in effect.”

52 Sherwin-White 1963: 27–28; Carson 1991: 596–97. Contra Schnackenburg (1990: 3.254), who believes that John misplaced the scourging and who, seeing only one scourging, believes that this scourging was the verberatio. R. Brown (1970: 858–59) thinks that John has moved the scourging from its original position (cf. Mark and Matthew) in order to fashion a chiastic arrangement.

60 As Carson (1991: 598) notes, “All the witnesses were too blind to see it at the time, but this Man was displaying his glory, the glory of the one and only Son, in the very disgrace, pain, weakness and brutalization that Pilate advanced as suitable evidence that he was a judicial irrelevance.” So also D. M. Smith (1999: 346): “In typical Johannine fashion, and with a touch of irony, Pilate is saying more than he could possibly know theologically.”

62 Carson (1991: 599) reads this as a sarcastic taunt: “You bring him to me for trial but you will not accept my judgment.”

63 “We have a law” may refer to Lev. 24:16: “Anyone who blasphemes the name of the Lord must be put to death” (Carson 1991: 599; Barrett 1978: 541; Ridderbos 1997: 602).

65 Similarly most translations (including the TNIV, NASB, NLT, NKJV); alternatively, the meaning is “very afraid,” since there is no previous reference to Pilate being afraid (see Carson 1991: 600; Morris 1995: 704; Barrett 1978: 542; Conway 1999: 159).

67 See the later incident recounted in Philo, Gaius 38 §§299–305, and the parallel in Josephus, J.W. 2.9.2–3 §§169–74. So Carson 1991: 600; cf. Morris 1995: 704. Yet see P. Maier 1969.

72 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 601; cf. Morris 1995: 705; Beasley-Murray 1999: 340; Burge 2000: 505; Borchert 2002: 254. Contra Barrett (1978: 543), who thinks that the singular participle constructed from the verb παραδίδωμι (paradidōmi, I hand over) suggests Judas. See also the discussions by Schnackenburg (1990: 3.261–63) and Ridderbos (1997: 603), both of whom ultimately point to the Jews as the most likely referent. Stibbe (1992: 170) concludes that “the one” in 19:11 probably refers to Caiaphas as a representative of the Jewish nation, as the evangelist has a propensity to implicate the Jews in Jesus’ death.

73 Carson (1991: 603) helpfully puts Jesus’ kingship in historical perspective: “Jesus claims to be a king, but a king of such a nature (18:36–37) that he is far less of an immediate threat to Caesar than are the people who are levelling the charge—as is made clear by the Jewish revolt, which lay ahead of the crucifixion but was almost certainly behind John the Evangelist when he wrote. And when the Jews eventually revolted, they were ruthlessly crushed and their temple was razed, while even as John writes the kingship of the crucified Master is running from strength to strength.”

78 The verb ἐκάθισεν (ekathisen, he sat) is intransitive, with Pilate, not Jesus, being the one sitting down (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 605; Carson 1991: 608; Morris 1995: 707 n. 31). Barrett (1978: 544) thinks that this is an instance of Johannine double meaning, though, as R. Brown (1970: 881) rightly objects, “the phenomenon [of double meaning] has not been based on syntactical ambiguity, nor is it usual for the second meaning to be opposite of the first.”

84 So, correctly, the NIV; see also Carson 1991: 604; contra Barrett 1978: 545; R. Brown 1970: 882–83, 895. Also contra those who, like Morris (1995: 684–95, esp. 604–95), contend that Jesus and the temple authorities followed different calendars, with the Synoptics using Jesus’ calendar (according to which the meal was the Passover) and John using that of the temple authorities (according to whom the sacrificial animals were slain the following day; hence, Jesus was sacrificed as our Passover).

86 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 605. Unlikely proposals are those of Barrett (1978: 545), who suggests that confusion of the Greek numerals for 3 and 6 may have led to the apparent discrepancies; and Witherington (1995: 294), who believes “that a Roman form of reckoning is being used, in which case the sixth hour is near dawn, at six in the morning.”

90 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 606. See also Schnackenburg (1990: 3.267), who suggests that the evangelist “intentionally allowed the uncertainty to remain.” The present statement is echoed by Tertullian, who says that the Jews extorted from Pilate a sentence giving Jesus up “to them to be crucified” (Apol. 21.18, italics added).

2 So, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 608; Carson 1991: 608; Morris 1995: 711; Beasley-Murray 1999: 344; Borchert 2002: 260; Burge 2000: 524. Contra Moloney (1998: 506, following R. Brown), who contends that “the Jews” are the subject of the verb.

6 So, with a variety of nuances, Witherington 1995: 308; R. Brown 1970: 917; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270; and Moloney 1998: 502, 506. Carson (1991: 609), who says that the omission is due to John's desire to further highlight Jesus' willing obedience to the Father, dismisses as unduly speculative the view that the omission is part of a polemic against the theory that Simon of Cyrene was himself crucified (contra Beasley-Murray 1999: 345). Barrett (1978: 548) proposes that the omission is due to the evangelist's effort to highlight the "all-sufficiency of Jesus ... in effecting the redemption of the world." Beasley-Murray (1999: 345 [cf. Borchert 2002: 261; R. Brown 1970: 917–18; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270]) suggests that the omission serves to create an allusion to Isaac carrying the wood for his sacrifice.

16 The passage may also echo Isa. 53:12: "numbered with the transgressors" (Beasley-Murray 1999: 346; Bultmann 1971: 669 n. 1; R. Brown 1970: 900; more cautious is Carson [1991: 611–12]).

20 Cf. the causative use of "flogged" in 19:1. So the majority of commentators, including R. Brown 1970: 901; Carson 1991: 610; Morris 1995: 713; Barrett 1978: 549 (but see Borchert 2002: 265). See also commentary at 19:40.

30 Carson (1991: 611) notes that Caiaphas and Pilate unwittingly serve a prophetic function in the Johannine narrative (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 346; Bultmann 1971: 669).

35 The general conclusion of commentators is that the reference to the "seamless robe" may not necessarily have theological significance (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 610 n. 136; cf. Morris 1995: 715, esp. n. 56; Bultmann 1971: 671). Both Witherington (1995: 309) and R. Brown (1970: 920–22) note several possibilities yet caution against dogmatic conclusions (see also Carson 1991: 614). Barrett (1978: 550) sees an allusion to Jesus' death resulting in "the scattered children of God."

36 See Repond 1922; Dalman 1928–39: 5.126–29. Josephus notes that the high priestly robe (χιτών, chiton) was "not composed of two pieces, ... [but] one long woven cloth" (Ant. 3.7.4 §161; cf. Exod. 28:31; Rev. 1:13), while Philo uses a robe as symbolic of the Logos, which binds all things together in unity (Flight 20 §§110–12). However, it is far from certain whether the present passage alludes to the high-priestly garment (or the unity of the church, for that matter) (so, rightly, Carson 1991: 614; contra Moloney 1998: 503, 507). Carson (1991: 614–15) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 347–48), following Schnackenburg (1990: 3.274), see in the preservation of the seamless tunic an allusion to the Father's preservation of the Son; Carson also sees a connection with the footwashing.

37 See the extensive discussion by Carson (1991: 614), who contends that "the Evangelist sees in the entire distribution of Jesus' clothes a fulfillment of both lines of Psalm 22:18, but mentions the peculiarity of the decision about the tunic because he was an eyewitness, and possibly because he saw something symbolic in the seamless garment." Regarding the use of Ps. 22 in ancient Jewish writings, see Str-B 2:574–80. Regarding the "fulfillment quotations" in the latter half of John's Gospel, which reach their crescendo in the passion narrative, see commentary at 12:38. "So this is what the soldiers did" seeks to bring closure to the section narrating the soldiers' actions (19:16b–24).

38 There is no agreement, however, on the exact way in which soldiers and bystanders are related by the evangelist. Ridderbos (1997: 610 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 903]) thinks that there is no implied contrast between these two groups. Other commentators believe that the construction does imply such a contrast (e.g., Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Beasley-Murray 1999:

348; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.273, 276). If a contrast is intended, it is hardly a sharp one; more likely, the two groups are distinguished as the narrative moves from one to the other.

41 The historicity of 19:25 is buttressed by several factors (Carson 1991: 615; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 349; Witherington 1995: 309; contra Barrett 1978: 551–52): (1) the Roman soldiers most likely would not have cared to remove women from the vicinity of the cross; (2) Jesus’ disciples would not have been seen as a threat by the Roman administration; (3) the fact that the sign affixed to the cross was intended to be read, and in fact was read (19:20), by many implies that people could get close enough to the cross to read it; (4) the Gospels record as many as seven statements by Jesus on the cross, suggesting that people were close enough to hear him speak.

42 See the extensive discussions in Carson 1991: 616; R. Brown 1970: 905–6. Symbolic interpretations (such as Brodie 1993: 549; Stibbe 1993: 194) fail to convince.

43 So also the vast majority of commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Morris 1995: 716–17; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Bultmann 1971: 672; Borchert 2002: 268; R. Brown 1970: 904; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.276. Ridderbos (1997: 611 n. 142) notes that in light of Mark 15:40 and Matt. 27:56, there could have been other women there as well. See also Luke 23:49.

44 See Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 616; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Burge 2000: 528; contra Barrett 1978: 551–52; Bultmann 1971: 672 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.277. Carson (1991: 616 [cf. Morris 1995: 717]) notes that, like Jesus’ mother’s sister, Jesus’ mother is also unnamed here and elsewhere in the Gospel (as is the “disciple Jesus loved” in 19:26–27).

46 Many view the “disciple Jesus loved” as an ideal disciple, often in conjunction with the “ideal faith” of Jesus’ mother (e.g., Moloney 1998: 503–4; but see the dissenting voice of Carson 1991: 618; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 614–15). Witherington (1995: 310) suggests that these two unnamed individuals are models for potential disciples to follow. Ridderbos (1997: 613) has an extensive discussion of Mary and the “disciple Jesus loved” as representatives of the new community that is established with the death of Jesus.

47 Commentators have detected various types of symbolism in this scene. Bultmann (1971: 673), true to F. C. Baur, sees Mary as representative of Jewish Christianity, and the beloved disciple of Gentile Christianity, the latter being charged to honor the former as its “mother,” from whom it originated (cf. Brodie 1993: 549). Witherington (1995: 309) views these two characters as symbolic of a new Adam and Eve, who are obedient whereas the former were not. Carson (1991: 618, following M. Gourgues) suggests that Mary, on account of her faith in Christ, is now able metaphorically to become a mother to a new son supplied for her by Jesus (cf. Matt. 19:29; see also Witherington 1995: 310). Beasley-Murray (1999: 350, following Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278) sees Mary as representing that part of Israel that is willing to believe in Jesus as the Messiah. Refreshingly, and refusing to resort to symbolism or allegory, Morris (1995: 718) says the beloved disciple simply “provided her [Mary] with a roof” and took her under his care. Others focus on lessons (to be) learned by Mary, such as needing to “step back in submission to the law of life that the Father has set for her son” (Ridderbos 1997: 612) or to receive the gift of salvation that she desired to receive at the wedding in Cana (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278; Beasley-Murray 1999: 350; Borchert 2002: 269).

50 Though not necessarily in allusion to 1:11, where the identical phrase is found (see Carson 1991: 617 n. 2; Moloney 1998: 503–4).

51 As Carson (1991: 619) points out, this is not obviated by the presence of fulfillment quotations subsequent to the present reference. The adverb ἤδη (ēdē, already) further stresses the notion of fulfillment.

52 The verb used here for “fulfill” is τελειώω (teleioō) rather than πληρόω (plēroō), perhaps to connect it with the cognate form τελέω in the previous clause and in 19:30 (Carson 1991: 620; Barrett 1978: 553).

53 The vast majority of commentators connect the reference to Scripture being fulfilled with Jesus’ statement (e.g., Carson 1991: 619; Barrett 1978: 553; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; though Morris [1995: 719] seems to suggest that it might be deliberately ambiguous). Contra R. Brown (1970: 908), who seems to prefer linking Jesus’ statement with his words to Mary and the beloved disciple.

54 So Ridderbos 1997: 616; Carson 1991: 619; Barrett 1978: 553; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; Schlatter 1948: 351. Psalm 69:21 is also cited in the Qumran hymn 1QH 12:11. Another relevant passage is Ps. 22:15 (Schlatter 1948: 351; Kruse 2003: 369). The suggestion that Jesus here refers back to his statement in 18:11 is improbable (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 617; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; R. Brown 1970: 930).

61 So the vast majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 618; Carson 1991: 622; Barrett 1978: 555; Morris 1995: 730; Bultmann 1971: 676). Contra Borchert (2002: 273 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 933]), who seems to suggest that Jesus died on Nisan 14 and thus was being portrayed as the Passover lamb.

66 See the summary in Carson 1991: 623–24, and the fuller treatment in Beasley-Murray 1999: 355–58. For further discussion, see Barbet 1953; W. Edwards, Gabel, and Hosmer 1986; Sava 1960.

67 See Lev. Rab. 15.2 on Lev. 13:2. Commentators disagree as to whether or not the present reference is intended to counter incipient Docetism, which denied Jesus’ full humanity at his death. Some consider this unlikely (Ridderbos [1997: 620], who thinks that the present passage is simply designed to further support the reliability and eyewitness nature of the account; R. Brown 1970: 949–52), while a majority favors such a polemic purpose (e.g., Carson [1991: 623], who sees this verse as the “counterpoint” to 1:14; Barrett 1978: 556; Morris 1995: 724; Beasley-Murray 1999: 356; Borchert 2002: 276–77; Burge 2000: 532).

73 Contra Bultmann (1971: 678), who seems to suggest that the pronoun refers to Jesus. See the extensive discussion of this verse in Carson 1991: 625–26.

80 Nicodemus’s description by the evangelist as “the man who had earlier visited Jesus at night” harks back to 3:2 (see there the discussion, and ultimately the negative evaluation, of Nicodemus’s putative “progression” in faith throughout the narrative). Contra Carson (1991: 629 [cf. Witherington 1995: 312]), who believes that Nicodemus is, in the present context, presented as “stepping out of the darkness and emerging into the light.”

86 So Carson 1991: 631; Barrett 1978: 560. Cf. 18:1: “olive grove.” Note also the later mention of a gardener in 20:15.

87 Carson (1991: 631 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 959]) suggests that by mentioning that no one had previously been placed in the tomb, the evangelist intends to help the reader realize that only one person was in the tomb and that only that same person could have been resurrected three days later. This may find support in the emphatic way in which this is stated in the original Greek: οὐδέπω οὐδέις (oudepō oudeis, no one ever before) (Morris 1995: 730 n. 115). Matthew 27:60 indicates that this was Joseph of Arimathea's "own new tomb, which he had cut in the rock."

2 Cf. Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; cf. 1 Cor. 15:4; see Carson 1991: 635. The expression "on the first day of the week" reads more literally, "on one of the Sabbath [week]" and may allude to the week of creation (cf. Gen. Rab. 11.9 on Gen. 2:3). Morris (1991: 733 n. 7 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. a]) notes that σαββάτων (sabbatōn) can mean either "Sabbath" or "week" (contra R. Brown [1970: 980], who claims that the meaning "week" emerged only later). The use of the cardinal numeral ("one") for the ordinal ("first") may represent a Semitism (Barrett 1978: 562; cf. Morris 1995: 733 n. 6; Beasley-Murray 1999: 366; Moloney 1998: 521; Lindars 1972: 599).

3 Often, though not always, in John, darkness connotes evil or unbelief (see 1:5; 8:12; 9:4; 11:10; 12:35, 46; 13:30). It is not clear that it does so here (contra Maccini 1996: 208; Carson 1991: 635–36; Borchert 2002: 291; R. Brown 1970: 981; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.308; Moloney 1998: 518).

4 Carson (1991: 635–36 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 371]) suggests that Mary was alone during her first trip to the tomb (contra Morris 1995: 734; Moloney 1998: 522; Witherington 1995: 323; Burge 2000: 553). Mary's witness was not used as significantly in the preaching of the early church as that of Peter, doubtless because evidence provided by a woman was held in lesser esteem (e.g., m. Roš Haš. 1.8). This is underscored by the fact that Jesus' encounter with Mary is not included in the resurrection appearances to the disciples cited in 21:14.

10 The verbs ἐφίλει (ephilei) and ἠγάπα (ēgapa) are used synonymously for "loved" in this expression (cf. 13:23; 19:26; 21:20; see Ridderbos 1997: 632 n. 7; Carson 1991: 636; Barrett 1978: 562).

12 Carson (1991: 636) rightly notes that Mary's use of κύριος (kyrios, lord, master) here does not constitute a christological confession and that she simply spoke "better than she knew" (cf. Moloney 1998: 521; contra R. Brown 1970: 984).

15 Morris 1995: 734; cf. Bernard 1928: 2:262. Contra Carson (1991: 635, following Bultmann), who maintains that the plural "we" is "merely a mode of speech, without plural referent."

16 The approach of several disciples here coheres with the plural ἀπῆλθον (apēlthon, they went) in Luke 24:24 (Carson 1991: 636). Wallace (1996: 401) notes the singular ἐξῆλθεν (exēlthen, he went out) in 20:3 and seems to conclude that here the evangelist is emphasizing Peter. If so, this would counter the notion (advanced by some) that Johannine supremacy is affirmed in the present pericope (see the following note).

17 This is disputed by Brodie (1993: 561), who says that the beloved disciple is "in better running order," which he takes to be symbolic of superior discipleship (though on p. 564 he sees both disciples as symbolic of the unity achieved through faith in the ascending Christ). Beasley-Murray (1999: 371–72) contends that the beloved disciple's speed was due to the extent of his love for Jesus; Moloney (1998: 522) suggests that he had stronger faith that a miracle had occurred. Yet others have seen in this statement an affirmation of John's superiority over Peter (e.g., Schnackenburg 1990: 3.310, 312; Moloney 1998: 520; R. Brown 1970: 1004–7). More likely, however, both the beloved disciple and Peter are presented here as a duo of eyewitnesses to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 632; Carson 1991: 636–37; Bultmann 1971: 684).

21 Carson (1991: 637) denies that the burial cloths still retained the shape of Jesus' body (cf. Morris 1995: 735; Beasley-Murray 1999: 372; R. Brown 1970: 1007–8). But Whitacre (1999:

564n24, 564n25, 566, 567, 568, 570, 572, 572n2, 572n7, 573n9, 574, 574n13, 575n21, 578, 578n4, 579, 579n5, 579n6, 579n7, 579n8, 579n9, 580, 580n14, 581n2, 582, 582n4,

473) says, “With the body gone, the clothes were presumably collapsed, though perhaps retaining much of their shape due to the spices.”

22 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 637; Barrett 1978: 563; Morris 1995: 735; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.311; Moloney 1998: 523. Carson also suggests that the fact that the graveclothes were still in the tomb is intended to create a contrast with Lazarus, who left the tomb with his graveclothes on (11:44) (cf. Barrett 1978: 563; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.311; Beasley-Murray 1999: 372; Moloney 1998: 519–20).

24 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 638; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Borchert 2002: 295; R. Brown 1970: 987; Bultmann 1971: 684; Burge 2000: 554; Laney 1992: 360. Witherington (1995: 325) suggests, less plausibly, that the beloved disciple believed that Jesus had been taken by God similar to Elijah. Morris (1995: 736) notes that the two verbs do not have explicit objects, supplying the graveclothes as the object of the beloved disciple’s “seeing” and Jesus’ resurrection as that of the disciple’s “believing” (albeit without understanding its full theological significance). Hardly plausible is the suggestion by Minear (1983: 91 n. 14, with reference to 1976 [followed by Conway 1999: 189–90]) that what the disciples believed was the statement of Mary Magdalene in 20:2.

25 Carson (1991: 638–39 [contra Bultmann 1971: 684]) suggests, on the basis of Luke 24:12, that Peter did not believe at this time (cf. D. M. Smith 1999: 374). Byrne (1985: 92) calls him “the odd-man-out” within the context of John 20. Morris (1995: 737, following Michaels 1989: 336) says that Peter could have believed, and the evangelist may have chosen to present the beloved disciple’s reaction as his own while describing Peter from an external point of view.

2 Cf. Luke 24:33. Barrett (1978: 568) contends that it is impossible to know the extent of the gathering but that even if only “the ten” were present, they are still representative of the entire church. Morris (1995: 745) and R. Brown (1970: 1022, 1034) favor a larger group beyond the apostles including also other disciples (contra Carson 1991: 646, 656).

7 See commentary at 14:27; 16:33. So Beasley-Murray 1999: 379; Carson 1991: 647; Witherington 1995: 339–40; Moloney 1998: 530.

9 See Carson 1991: 656; R. Brown 1970: 1022; Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. i.

13 The vast majority of the instances of “sending” in John’s Gospel relate to Jesus’ having been sent by the Father. “Sending” terminology also occurs with regard to God’s sending of the Baptist, the Father’s and the Son’s sending of the Spirit, and Jesus’ sending of his disciples. The present passage features two “sending” verbs, πέμπω (pempō) and ἀποστέλλω (apostellō), with no apparent difference in meaning (as is the virtual consensus among major commentators, including Ridderbos, Morris, Carson, Barrett, Schnackenburg, and R. Brown; see also Köstenberger 1999c: 125–43). Morris (1995: 746 n. 56) notes that this is already suggested by the use of καθώς (kathōs, just as) linking the two verbs.

21 The two perfect verbs ἀφέωνται (apheōntai, they are forgiven) and κεκράτηνται (kekratēntai, they are retained) denote the settled state of the pronounced forgiveness or retention of sins (see esp. Carson 1991: 655; Wallace [1996: 581] calls these “proleptic perfects”). See additional note.

4 Schlatter (1948: 361, citing Rev. 1:10) thinks that the celebration of Sunday as the Lord’s Day is in view. Carson (1991: 657) suggests that the continued reference to the Lord’s Day in the resurrection narrative may represent a polemical attempt to demonstrate the basis of Christian worship to John’s Jewish readers.

5 So, essentially, Schnackenburg (1990: 3.332): “Do not be faithless, but believing.” Carson (1991: 657) translates both terms substantively: “Do not be an unbeliever, but a believer.” Neither word occurs elsewhere in John. In the NT epistles, “unbelieving” refers to people who are not Christians, but these categories are not as firmly in place at this earlier stage of salvation history.

6 So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 647) and most major commentators (e.g., Morris 1995: 753; Witherington 1995: 344; Carson 1991: 657; Moloney 1998: 537; Barrett 1978: 572; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.332; contra Borchert 2002: 314; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

7 Stibbe (1996: 203) comments, “Like Mary Magdalene, Thomas has made the journey to ‘owned’ faith ... his own faith in Jesus as Yahweh, ‘Lord and God.’ ” Note the double personal pronoun μου (mou, my), which accentuates the personal nature of Thomas’s confession (Carson 1991: 659; Beasley-Murray 1999: 386; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.332; Wallace 1995: 82).

8 As Carson (1991: 659) astutely observes, however, the present narrative shows that “Jesus’ deity does not exhaust deity” (cf. 5:16–30; 20:17).

9 See M. Harris 1992: 284–86; Ridderbos 1997: 648. On 20:28, see M. Harris 1992: 105–29. For a defense of the historicity of the present pericope, see Carson 1991: 657–58; M. Harris 1992: 111–19.

14 So, rightly, the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 197: 648; Morris 1995: 754; Carson 1991: 659; Beasley-Murray 1999: 386; Burge 2000: 563; Barrett 1978: 573; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.334; contra Borchert 2002: 316; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

2 Carson (1991: 660–61) construes the connection between 20:29 and 20:30 as follows. Individuals who have not seen the risen Christ, yet believe, are blessed; therefore, the present Gospel has been written in order that its readers may believe on the basis of its testimony to Jesus’ signs. The construction μὲν ... δέ contrasts the totality of Jesus’ signs with those recorded in John’s narrative.

4 Contra Carson (1991: 661), who contends that the preeminent sign is Jesus’ death, resurrection, and exaltation; and Beasley-Murray (1999: 387), who maintains that the resurrection appearances should also be viewed as signs.

6 So, rightly, Bultmann 1971: 698–99. The question does not hinge on adjudicating which of the textual variants, πιστεύητε or πιστεύσῃτε, is original (see additional note), for verb tenses are less distinctive in nonindicative moods (cf. 19:35, where most MSS have the aorist reading). It is sometimes alleged that the present subjunctive would imply a purpose of strengthening the faith of believing readers, while the aorist would imply an evangelistic purpose (Metzger 1994: 219–20). However, as Carson (1991: 662) points out, the present tense of πιστεύω (pisteuō, believe) is used in this Gospel with reference to both coming to faith and continuing in faith. Carson also notes that the aorist subjunctive is more common after ἵνα (hina, that) than the present subjunctive.

6 So Culpepper 1983: 96. See also Schlatter (1948: 366), who contends that the sustained characterization of Peter and John in 1:35–42; 13:23–29; 18:15–17; 20:2–10; and chapter 21 cannot be assigned to different hands; Ridderbos (1997: 656), who says that the final chapter is designed to bring into sharper profile the roles of Peter and the beloved disciple; and Carson (1991: 667), who notes that their relationship is removed from the realm of competition and their complementarity strongly and explicitly affirmed. Minear (1983: 91) writes, “Only in chapter 21 do we discover an adequate end to the story of the two disciples who, from chapter 13 on, have played the most conspicuous supporting roles in the gospel: Simon Peter and the beloved disciple.”

10 Carson’s (1991: 666) comments are particularly insightful: “But as in a ‘whodunit’ where all the pieces have finally come together ... , there remains certain authorial discretion: the book may end abruptly ... or it may wind down through a postscript that tells what happens to the characters, especially if what happens to them sheds a certain light backward onto the principal plot of the work.” Contra Barrett (1978: 577), who expresses doubt that an author would spoil the effect of the commissioning in 20:21–23 by representing the disciples thereafter as returning to their former employment and as at first being unable to recognize their Lord; and R. Brown (1970: 1078) who attributes chapter 21 to a later redactor.

11 Carson (1991: 667) mentions one additional possible purpose of chapter 21: “The death of Peter and its relation in God’s providence to the Evangelist’s long life provide an opportunity to articulate at a practical level some implications of the sustained tension throughout the Gospel between the dominant inaugurated eschatology (congruent with the Evangelist’s long life and therefore with the ‘delayed’ parousia) and the futurist eschatology of apocalyptic expectation.” See also Gaventa (1996), who conceives of 20:30–31 and chapter 21 as “dual” or “parallel” endings featuring an “archive of excess” (McCracken’s term). Whereas McCracken (1994: 151) applies this solely to the concluding hyperbole in 21:25, Gaventa extends the notion of “excess” to the entire chapter, encompassing also the 153 fish, the breakfast prepared even before the fish are hauled ashore, the strength of the nets, Jesus’ threefold question to Peter, and, of course, the boundless number of Jesus’ deeds. Though chapters 20 and 21 may indeed constitute an instance of “double closure,” however, it may still be meaningful to speak of chapter 21 as an epilogue mirroring the prologue within the context of John’s overall literary structure.

2 As always, undertaken at Jesus’ initiative (Carson 1991: 668; cf. Morris 1995: 760). The term also occurs in 21:14, marking off 21:1–14 as the first of two scenes in this chapter (Gaventa 1996: 242).

6 Ridderbos (1997: 658–59) detects in this a reference to “the unity they [the disciples] recovered after Jesus’ resurrection.” Similarly, Talbert (1992: 259) sees in this “unity” an answer to Jesus’ prayer in 17:11 and a result of the Spirit’s enabling. This seems to rest too much interpretive weight on the rather inconspicuous expression “were together,” however. Little else in the context suggests that these disciples are Spirit-filled (note that they caught no fish). The presence of symbolism in the number seven is doubtful as well (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 650; Carson 1991: 669; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.352; Beasley-Murray 1999: 399; Borchert 2002: 324); it is hard to see what would connote “completeness” in the present instance (contra Brodie 1993: 582).

7 This, incidentally, is yet another argument against reading 20:22 as indicating an actual impartation of the Spirit at that point. Had they already received the Spirit, it would be almost inexplicable why Peter went back to fishing so soon after that event. So, rightly, Carson (1991: 669–70 [cf. Morris 1995: 760]): “It is impossible to imagine any of this taking place in Acts, after Pentecost ... this is not the portrait of believers who have received the promised Paraclete.” Barrett (1978: 579) considers it “unthinkable” that Peter and his fellow disciples “should contemplate a return to their former occupation after the events of chapter 20.” Contra Keener (2003: 1227), who argues against negative interpretations of the disciples’ return to fishing in 21:3, saying that the disciples simply made use of free time (citing Bruce 1983: 399). Keener also cites Beasley-Murray’s (1999: 399) contention that, even though Jesus had risen from the dead, the disciples must still eat.

10 Carson (1991: 670) here (as elsewhere) detects symbolism in the “night” reference, citing 3:2, 19–21; 13:30; 20:1. However, though 3:19–21 and 13:30 qualify, it is less clear that 3:2, 20:1, and the present instance do. Stibbe (1993: 210) draws attention to the fact that “the time between night and the early hours of the morning was precisely the time when Peter denied Jesus in 18.15–27.” Brodie’s (1993: 583) casting of the symbolism as setting “their boat in an atmosphere of alien darkness” seems overdone, as does Whitacre’s (1999: 490) contention that the early morning hour symbolizes “the dawning of spiritual light.”

25 Wallace (1996: 155) classifies τῷ πλοιαρίῳ (tō ploiariō, in the boat) as a dative of sphere and τῶν ἰχθύων (tōn ichthyōn, of the fish) as a genitive of content (1996: 93). The word for “towing” or “dragging” (σύρω, syrō; used elsewhere in the NT only figuratively) occurs in connection with a trawl net in Plutarch, De sollertia animalium 977.F. Carson (1991: 671) sees in the narrator’s staying with the disciples in the boat rather than following Peter in his encounter with Jesus “a small indication of eyewitness integrity.” If the narrator is none other than John, the son of Zebedee, of course, he himself would have been in that boat, which may further explain why the story is told the way it is.

33 The unbroken net frequently is interpreted symbolically as conveying the preservation of all that is caught (Ridderbos 197: 663, adducing 6:12; Witherington 1995: 355; Michaels 1989: 354–55), or the limitless number of Christian converts (Carson 1991: 673, following Bruce 1983: 401–2), or the unity of the church (Talbert 1992: 260). For surveys, see Carson 1991: 672–73; R. Brown 1970: 1074–76.

11 Bultmann (1971: 713) sees the origin of this saying in a proverb; but see the critique by Carson (1991: 679).

14 Note further the verbal link between the reference to Jesus’ “lifting up” (i.e., crucifixion) in 12:32–33 and the reference to Peter’s future destiny in 21:19. See Carson 1991: 679–80; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Barrett 1978: 585. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 667); Morris (1995: 773); and Schnackenburg (1990: 3.366–67), who believe that the reference is more generally to martyrdom.

8 So Carson (1991: 682), who contends, “It seems simpler to think that the circulating rumour is making the rounds while the beloved disciple is still alive, but advancing in years, and he is determined to stifle it as well as he can for fear of the damage that would be done if he died before the Lord’s return” (cf. Morris 1995: 775). Jackson (1999: 21–22) maintains that 21:23 “makes perfectly good sense as a corrective from a living Beloved Disciple anxious to dispel what he feels are overly enthusiastic eschatological inferences being drawn by some from Jesus’ words.”

11 Carson (1991: 682 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 410]) suggests that the Fourth Evangelist may be encountering a situation similar to the one Paul faced in Corinth (see 1 Cor. 1–4, esp. 1:10–11). Thus, the evangelist is stressing that the mode of Christian service will vary from person to person and that the important thing is to follow Christ as his disciple. Hence, there will be one flock (John 10:16) in unity (ch. 17).

13 As Carson (1991: 686) perceptively notes, “It is as if John had identified himself (v. 24), but is not content to focus on himself, not even on his veracity. He must close by saying his own work is only a minute part of all the honours due the Son.”

Casey, M. 2n4
Casey, P. M. 106n23
Cassian, B. 585n9
Casarella, A. 435n67

15 The most natural way to take the participle ὁ γράψας (ho grapsas, the one who wrote) is to see it as affirming that the evangelist himself wrote the Gospel. See the important critique of amanuensis theories formed on the basis of a suggested parallel with 19:19 (where Pilate caused things to be written down rather than writing them down himself) in Carson 1991: 685 (with reference to Bruce 1983: 3). As Carson points out, it is especially dubious to construe an amanuensis theory on the basis of later disciples writing down material on behalf of their deceased master.

22 Carson (1991: 684) adduces 1:14; 3:2, 11; 20:2; 1 John 1:2, 4, 5, 6, 7; 3 John 12; 2 Cor. 12:2–4; Schlatter (1948: 376), with reference to John 3:2 and 20:2, where the speaker is included in the plural, speaks of the possible presence of collaborators. Minear (1983: 95) believes that 1:14–18 and 21:24 are intended by the evangelist “to enclose his entire message to his audience.” Wallace (1996: 399) lists the present passage as a (debatable) example of the exclusive “we,” “in which the first-person plural restricts the group to the author and his associates” (p. 397).

4 The Fourth Gospel’s integrity is not compromised by the inimitable Johannine style, enveloping narrative as well as discourse portions. For positive assessments of the historical reliability of John’s Gospel, see Köstenberger 2002c; Blomberg 1993; 2001; 2002; contra M. Casey 1996. Nevertheless, there continues to be skepticism on the part of many; see the recent survey by Kysar (2002a), the largely positive assessment by Thompson (2002), and the very negative evaluation by Attridge (2002b).

23 Moreover, the use of Tyrian shekels likely involved religious compromise, if indeed these coins bore the image of the Tyrian god Melkart (P. Casey 1997: esp. 313–15).

9 See Schlatter 1948: 363–77. Note, for example, the references to a charcoal fire in 21:9 and 18:18 and to “drawing” in 21:8 and 12:32, as well as the links between 21:20; 13:23; 1:18 (see Ellis 1992: 18–19). See also the common elements between the good shepherd discourse in chapter 10 and Peter’s commissioning in 21:15–19 (Cassian 1956–57: 132–36 [cited in Minear 1983: 95 n. 24]). Minear (1983: 96–97) further notes the appellation of Thomas as “the twin” in 20:24 and 11:16; the references to Nathanael in 21:2 and 1:45–51 and to Cana in chapters 2, 4, and 21; and several other terminological and thematic connections. Gaventa (1996: 245) notes the similarity between μετὰ ταῦτα (meta tauta, after these things) in 21:1 and 19:38. To this may be added the term “Sea of Tiberias” (21:1; cf. 6:1); Simon Peter “son of John” (21:15; cf. 1:42); Jesus’ taking (λαμβάνω, lambanō) and distributing (δίδωμι, didōmi) bread (21:13; cf. 6:11 [close verbal parallels with 6:11, where Jesus’ giving thanks is explicitly mentioned, may imply thanksgiving in 21:13]); the double ἀμήν (amēn, truly) (21:18; cf., e.g., 1:51); the connection between Peter’s and Jesus’ death established by the evangelist’s parenthetical comment (21:19; cf. 12:33); Jesus’ call for his disciples to “follow” him (21:19, 22; cf. 1:43); and other verbal links, grammatical features, and thematic connections (Osborne 1981: 294). Spencer (1999) finds the following “narrative echoes” of earlier portions in John’s narrative: (1) the feeding of the five thousand (ch. 6); (2) Peter’s threefold denial (18:15–18, 25–27); (3) the footwashing and the final meal (13:3–5, 36–38); and (4) the good shepherd discourse (10:1–18). Note, however, that Spencer considers chapter 21 to be a “later redactional addition” (p. 68).

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2:

Chapman, D. W. 543n12

Chapman, J. 604n19

Charles, J. D. 250n1

Charlesworth, J. H. 327n23, 331n44, 543n15

παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).
12 See Hengel 1977; Green, DJG 147–48; Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 263–64; D. Chapman 2000.

19 Contra Ridderbos (1997: 672), who takes the change in grammatical person as indication of “another hand.” For a vigorous refutation of the view that 21:25 was added by a later editor, see J. Chapman (1930: 386–87), who contends that it is “quite inconceivable” that an interpolator composed this “very Johannine” verse. The main burden of Chapman’s essay is to argue that “we know” in 21:24 constitutes a “plural of authorship.”

1 See Charles 1989; Lincoln 2000. Stibbe (1993: 99) contends that the present pericope constitutes a “trial scene,” whereby “the implicit commentary ... supports the narrator’s defence of the divinity of Jesus and the concomitant satire of the diabolism of the Jews.” According to Stibbe, much of the irony in this chapter comes from Jesus taking on the role of Yahweh, and the Jews that of the false, pagan gods.

23 In any case, the mere reference to Lazarus as “the one you love” in the present passage hardly warrants the conclusion by Eller (1987), Brownlee (1990: 191–94), and Stibbe (1992: 79–81) that the beloved disciple is Lazarus. See the discussion in Charlesworth 1995: xiii (who advances the hardly more plausible theory that the beloved disciple is the apostle Thomas).

Chavel, C. B. 530n43

Chilton, B. 270

Clermont-Ganneau, C. S. 326n16

Coakley, J. F. 357n1, 361n14, 362n18, 369, 369n7, 369n9, 370, 370n18, 371n19

44 Though there is little to justify the conclusion by Charlesworth (1995) that Thomas is the “beloved disciple” (see the critique by Beck 1997: 127–31).

15 The remains of a crucified man, aged 24–28 years, dating roughly to Jesus’ day were found in north Jerusalem in 1968. The man’s name is inscribed on his bone ossuary as Yehohanan ben Hagkol. See Charlesworth 1972–73.

43 See Chavel 1941 (the quotation is from p. 277). One mishnaic passage (m. Pesah. 8.6 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 167]) suggests that such releases were common enough to warrant legislation.

16 See Clermont-Ganneau 1874; Kraeling 1946 [cited in Bruce 1983: 253 n. 1]; Avi-Yonah 1964: 146.

1 Sabbe (1992: 2051–82) believes that John is literarily dependent on the Synoptics (esp. Mark, but also Luke) in the present instance. However, I am not convinced that the available evidence is sufficient to demonstrate redactional activity on John’s part. Coakley (1988: 254) concludes that “the story of John 12:1–8 can without difficulty be understood on the hypothesis of the priority [i.e., independence] of John,” and that the “details do not require to be explained as secondary developments of traditions preserved in more primitive form elsewhere [i.e., the Synoptics]” (though I do not share his skepticism regarding “the correctness of every detail in the account”).

14 Though see the texts cited by Coakley (1988: 247–48), which illustrate that although Mary’s act may have been unusual, it was “not unthinkable” (p. 248). Homer (Odyssey 19.503–7) speaks of Odysseus’s feet being washed and subsequently anointed. The Greek poet Aristophanes cites an instance in which a daughter is washing, anointing (ἀλείφει), and kissing her father’s feet (Vespae 608). Athenaeus (Deipnosophists 12.553) reports an Athenian custom among the wealthy of anointing “even the feet with perfumes.” See also Pliny, Natural History 13.22 (putting scent on the soles of people’s feet in Nero’s day); Petronius, Satyricon 70; Curtius, History of Alexander 8.9.27 (bathing feet in perfumes as a custom of the kings of India); and, in a Jewish context, t. Šabb. 3.16; Sipre on Deut. 33:24. As Coakley (1988: 248) duly notes, of course, none of these passages suggests “that anointing of the feet was an everyday occurrence in Jesus’ day in Palestine.”

18 See further Coakley (1988: 250 n. 51), who cites additional primary and secondary literature. Apparently, for a married woman to let down her hair in public constituted grounds for divorce (t. Šotah 5.9; y. Giṭ. 9.50d; cf. b. Yoma 47a; m. Ketub. 7.6; Num. Rab. 9.16; more general, b. Ned. 30b; but see m. Ketub. 2.1). Yet note the conclusion by Coakley: “But none of these passages touches the question of what an unmarried woman might decently do in a neighbor’s house among friends” (ibid.).

7 Mark 11:8 adds that many spread their cloaks on the road (cf. Coakley 1995: 472–73).

9 For further primary source quotes, see Coakley 1995: 471–72 (Thucydides, History 4.121; Polybius, Histories 5.26.7–12; 20.7.5; 1 Macc. 10:86; Josephus, Ant. 13.4.4 §101; Plutarch, Cicero 43).

18 For a fuller description of how Jesus “found” the donkey, see Matt. 21:1–3 pars. (note the harmonization proposed in Carson 1991: 433; Morris 1995: 520–21). Coakley (1995: 477) calls

Coenen, L. 126
Cohee, P. 20n6, 20n7, 29n30, 30n33
Cohon, S. S. 185n51
Coleman, R. E. 499n81
Collins, C. J. 156, 156n50, 156n51
Coloe, M. 14n24, 20n8

the reference here “intentionally uninformative,” either because the evangelist had no information about how the donkey was found or because he chose not to disclose it (Coakley prefers the latter). However, his suggestion seems implausible that “Jesus did not intend to ride the donkey at all but was made to do so by enthusiastic followers” (p. 479, citing Luke 19:37; John 6:15). This is the only occurrence of the diminutive form ὄναριον (onarion, young donkey) in the NT.

19 See commentary at 1:49–51 and at 6:14–15 (where both terms, “the one who comes” and “king,” are used). Both Ridderbos (1997: 423) and Barrett (1978: 418) contend that by mounting the donkey, Jesus sought to correct the mistaken nationalism of the crowd (see also R. Brown 1966: 462; Witherington 1995: 221); though note Coakley (1995: 461–82), who contends that there is no evidence that the crowd understood at the time, so that, “if Jesus tried to make the crowd understand his actions in this way, he failed” (p. 463). Ridderbos (1997: 423) also points to the salvific context of Zech. 9 and notes that Jesus’ action was intended to convey the fact that the time of salvation described in Zechariah (and other relevant OT texts) had arrived.

6 See the brilliant analysis of 1:1–2 by Cohee (1995: 471–72), who demonstrates that the passage features both “staircase parallelism” and chiasm (both between lines 1 and 2 and between lines 2 and 3) whereby the verb ἦν is placed in the center of each clause. He also notes how this enables θεός in line 3 to be in the emphatic position. See also Keener 2003: 364–65.

7 Cohee (1995: 474–75) rightly notes, “Although verses 6 through 9 seem to exhibit some patterns of verbal repetition or rhythmical system, or may in fact be a prose commentary inserted between verses of hymnic poetry, they do not yield to analysis ... as easily as verses 1 through 5. The same seems to be true of verses 12 through 18. Verses 10 and 11, however, ... do exhibit such a structure.”

30 Cohee (1995: 476–77) adds a third alternative: he believes that ὁ γέγονεν was introduced into the text as a gloss on the οὐδὲ ἓν of verse 3b.

33 Cohee (1995: 473) also draws attention to parallels in Greek literature, such as the passage quoted by the apostle Paul in Acts 17:28 from Aratus, Phaenomena 5, and perhaps Cleanthes, Hymn to Zeus 4: Ἐν αὐτῷ γὰρ ζῶμεν ... (“For in him we live ...”).

51 Thus, the Roman historian Tacitus writes, “the Jews conceive of one God only” (Historiae 5 §5). See Cohon (1955), who also cites affirmations of God’s uniqueness in Sib. Or. (3:11–12, 545–61); Let. Arist. (132–38); Wis. (13–15); Philo (Mos. 1.14 §75; Decal. 12–16 §§52–81); Josephus (Ant. 2.12.4 §§275–76).

81 See Coleman 1963; 1977.

50 The two terms are separate (but exegetically related) in the closest Johannine parallel, 1 John 3:18: “in deed and truth” (ἐν ἔργῳ καὶ ἀληθείᾳ), that is, “in deed, that is, in reality” (Collins 1995: 119, with reference to Schlatter).

51 Collins (1995: 120 n. 12) lists the following passages, featuring a similar construction with the second element serving an exegetical function: 2 Pet. 3:7, 11; Jdt. 7:25; 1 Macc. 3:51; Sir. 45:4.

Colpe, C. 157n56, 165n80, 179n20, 185n47, 283n22, 300n8, 306n43, 307n51, 382n34
Colwell, E. C. 28, 28n27, 83n108, 189

24 On Jesus as the replacement and fulfillment of the temple in John's Gospel, see especially Coloe 2001; Johnson 2001; Hoskins 2002; and Kerr 2002. For a treatment that links this Johannine motif with the composition of the Fourth Gospel, see Motyer 1997 and Köstenberger forthcoming. On Jesus and Israel's traditions of judgment and restoration, see Bryan 2002.

8 John's prologue has stimulated several highly creative structural proposals. Often the only limit seems to be the imagination of the interpreter. A case in point is the understanding of the prologue as a series of three successive "waves," each with three movements (La Potterie 1984; Moloney 1977: 35–39; 1993: 25–27; Viviano 1998). Coloe (1997: 44–46) sees 1:1–2 as introduction and 1:18 as conclusion, with 1:3–17 dividing into two sections of three strophes each (1:3–5, 6–8, 9–13 and 14, 15, 16–17), paralleling the six-day structure of Gen. 1:1–2:4. According to Coloe, the rest of the Gospel represents day seven.

56 See Bammel 1957: 381–85; Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 264–65; Kippenberg 1971: 276–327.

80 C. Koester 1990b: 665–80, esp. 667; cf. Deissmann 1927: 364–65; Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 268.

20 Mackowski (1980: 81–83) even believes that behind 5:2–9 is the story of a pagan sanctuary that he believes to have been an Asclepieum; but this is categorically ruled out by Hengel (1999: 313), who nonetheless points to the significance of the Asclepius cult for John's Asia Minor audience (p. 315, referring also to a work by K. H. Rengstorff in n. 84). See also the ancient and bibliographic references cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 266–67.

47 See Gen. Rab. 11.10; Exod. Rab. 30.9, citing Isa. 6:3; Jer. 23:24. The Letter of Aristeas (second century B.C.) says that God "is continually at work in everything" (210). See also Eusebius, Praeparatio evangelica 13.12.11, frg. 5 (cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 267).

22 Most frequently cited is the healing of the blind soldier Valerius Aper, apparently by Asclepius, in which an eye-salve was used (Deissmann 1927: 135; Rengstorff, TDNT 6:119). According to Boring, Berger, and Colpe (1995: 284), the inscription probably comes from the Asclepius temple on the island in the Tiber in Rome and dates to A.D. 138.

8 Though the OT is doubtless John's primary point of reference, the kind of imagery employed by the evangelist would not have been unknown to his Hellenistic audience. Cf. Themistius, Peri Philanthr. 9d–10c (fourth century A.D.), cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 286.

43 See Exod. 3:7; 33:12, 17; Jer. 31:34; Hos. 6:6; 13:5; Nah. 1:7. For additional references and discussion, see Ridderbos 1997: 361. The saying "I know those who are mine, and those who are mine know me" has a proverbial ring to it; Boring, Berger, and Colpe (1995: 288) cite a Greek parallel: "I know Simon and Simon knows me."

51 Leaders who promoted unity were also prized in the Hellenistic world (e.g., Plutarch, De Alexandri magni fortuna aut virtute 6 [cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 288]).

34 The Sibylline Oracles speak of a "heavenly crash of thunder, the voice of God" (5:344–45). The notion of heaven answering human speech in thunder is also found in the ancient Greek world (Homer, Odyssey 20.97–104 [cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 292]).

27 See Hartley 1999 for an interaction with the arguments by Jehovah's Witnesses against Jesus' deity from 1:1c. Hartley first surveys the history of the debate, starting with Colwell (1933: 12–21), followed by contributions by Harner (1973: 75–87), P. Dixon (1975), and Hartley himself (1996). Hartley concludes that “the Word was theos (1:1c) in every sense the Father was ton theon (1:1b), rather than a god in a particular sense the Father was not” (1999: 1, summarizing 1996). See also MacLeod 2003: 59–60; and Keener 2003: 372–74, who points to the anarthrous instances of θεός designating God the Father later in the prologue (1:6, 12, 13, 18) and the articular use of θεός with reference to Jesus in 20:28 (p. 373).

108 Wallace (1996: 257, 263–64) notes the presence of the definite article in the original before “Son of God” but not “king of Israel” and points out that this was the actual passage that triggered Colwell’s formulation of his famous rule. What Colwell concluded from the present passage is that the lack of the definite article need not indicate indefiniteness, given a certain syntax or word order. In other words, “king of Israel” (despite the lack of the article) is just as “definite” as “Son of God”; the reason why it has no article is that both expressions are governed by the article preceding “Son of God.” See also Morris 1995: 147 n. 114.

10 See Köstenberger 1999a: 30–31. There has been a virtual avalanche of literary explorations of Johannine themes or specific Johannine portions of text pouring from the presses in the last two decades. Among those are Culpepper 1983; Duke 1985; Staley 1988; M. Davies 1992; Stibbe 1992; 1994; Lee 1994; Tovey 1997; Beck 1997; Conway 1999; and Harstine 2002, to list but a few.

2 Conway (1999: 85) describes Nicodemus as an “opaque rather than transparent character” whose inner motives are not disclosed by the narrator. Cotterell (1985: 241) draws attention to the portrayal of Nicodemus in his humanity as a Pharisee who was “inclined to patronize” and was “human enough to sulk” when “pierced in the presence of his own students.” Meeks (1972: 53) calls Nicodemus a “rather stupid disciple.”

10 In a puzzling statement, Conway (1999: 91) seems to drive a wedge between Pharisees and “rulers” in the Fourth Gospel (“given 12:42, the Pharisees seem to have greater authority and control than do the rulers”), and questions whether ἄρχων here refers to the Sanhedrin. But clearly, Nicodemus is presented here as both a Pharisee and an ἄρχων, so that he may accurately be described as a Pharisaic “ruler,” which very likely means “Sanhedrin member.”

14 Cf. Paulien (ABD 4:1106), who also refers to de Jonge 1971: 342; Sylva 1988: 148–49; Michel (1981: 231), who calls Nicodemus a “borderline character” (“personnage-frontière”); and Pamment (1985: 71, 73), who writes, “Nicodemus is the only individual character who fails to make a decision, remaining the good but uncommitted observer who tries to prevent injustice” (p. 73). Similarly, Conway (1999: 85–103) says that Nicodemus is a “pathetic character” who from beginning to end “is genuinely interested in Jesus, but is never able to gather the courage and conviction to confess his belief openly” (p. 103). Note also Pazdan (1987), who sees Nicodemus’s portrayal as part of John’s reversal of the traditional geographical polemic regarding Judeans, Samaritans, and Galileans; and Burge (2000: 124), who contends that Nicodemus never became a model disciple, because “disciples confess Jesus’ identity, remain with him, and tell others.” If my assessment of Nicodemus is correct, it runs counter to the notion, popular in current scholarship, that John’s Gospel is “anti-Semitic,” for here we have a Jewish person who, though not a believer in Jesus the Messiah, represents a fair-minded, moral, kind Jewish leader, providing a counterpoint to the more hostile element on the Sanhedrin. It is also possible that John includes the Nicodemus account at least in part because he had access to individuals among the Jewish leadership (cf. 18:15b: “that disciple [the ‘other disciple’ of 18:15a, presumably the evangelist; cf. 20:2; 21:24] was known to the high priest”).

153n42, 155, 158, 160n64, 289n54, 291, 291n63, 292, 334n58, 341n93, 508n27, 513n13, 515n20, 534n65, 564n24

15 This represents the wide consensus of interpreters: see Ridderbos 1997: 153; Carson 1991: 215–16; Borchert 1996: 198–99; Beasley-Murray 1999: 59; Witherington 1995: 115; R. Brown 1966: 169; Morris 1995: 226; Barrett 1978: 230; Moloney 1998: 116, 120; Conway 1999: 105. 38 Conway (1999: 115–16) maintains that the woman’s response in 4:15 does not indicate a development in her understanding of Jesus’ identity.

41 But see Conway (1999: 119), who suggests that the woman in fact desires to return to the subject of Jewish/Samaritan relations, which she first introduced in 4:9.

42 Conway (1999: 118, citing Boers 1988: 171, 182) points out that whereas Jesus does not launch his revelatory monologue in John 3 until Nicodemus has faded from view, he does so here in the Samaritan woman’s presence.

64 See the discussion at the introduction to John 4 above. See also Schlatter (1948: 129), who says that, as in Matt. 12:23, the magnitude of the Christ concept allows only the question, not yet faith. Conway (1999: 123) may somewhat understate the significance of the particle when she says that it “may simply be an expression of the woman’s excitement and the overall drama of the scene.”

54 Conway (1999: 131) suggests the idiomatic translation “Tell us the truth.” See Josh. 7:19; 2 Chron. 30:8; Jer. 13:16; 1 Esdr. 9:8; m. Sanh. 6.2; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 344; Carson 1991: 372; Morris 1995: 436. Alternatively, the Jews exhort the man to give glory to God, who performed the miracle (but see Barrett 1978: 362).

63 As Rensberger (1988: 42 [cited in Conway 1999: 132]) notes, the man’s attitude resembles that of Jesus before the high priest in 18:19–23, which is “why Jesus can be absent from the central episodes of the story; his role is taken over by the blind man himself.”

58 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 411; Barrett 1978: 394; Conway 1999: 139; Stibbe 1994: 48 (though he notes the return to a negative portrayal in 11:36, 45). Contra Morris (1995: 486), who finds the use of “the Jews” here “unusual” and suggests that it may imply that “though the mourners could bring themselves to sympathize with Martha and Mary, they were hostile to Jesus.”

27 See Ezek. 1:28; 44:4; Dan. 2:46; 8:18; 10:9; Acts 9:4; 22:7; 26:14; Rev. 1:17; 19:10; 22:8. Contra Carson (1991: 578–79), who argues that the evangelist is not attempting to describe a theophanic manifestation, concluding that the soldiers simply responded “better than they knew” (cf. Witherington [1995: 286], who calls this an example of “Johannine double-entendre”; but see Bultmann 1971: 639; Burge 2000: 492; Conway 1999: 173). See also the legend cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 158.

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235). Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

20 Calvin (1961: 159) puts it memorably: “He had boasted that he would prove an invincible

Conzelmann, H. 457n40, 457n41

Corley, B. 510n1

Cortés, J. B. 241n59

Cory, C. 256

Cotterell, P. 113, 113n2, 118, 119n13, 120n16, 121, 123n23, 124n29 fighter and triumphant unto death. Now, at the voice of one maid, and that without any threatening, he is confounded and throws down his weapons.” Conway (1999: 174) cites O’Day (1995: 808): “The words of Peter’s denial ... are the antithesis of Jesus’ words of self-identification and revelation from 18:1–12, ‘I am.’ ”

65 Similarly most translations (including the TNIV, NASB, NLT, NKJV); alternatively, the meaning is “very afraid,” since there is no previous reference to Pilate being afraid (see Carson 1991: 600; Morris 1995: 704; Barrett 1978: 542; Conway 1999: 159).

24 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 638; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Borchert 2002: 295; R. Brown 1970: 987; Bultmann 1971: 684; Burge 2000: 554; Laney 1992: 360. Witherington (1995: 325) suggests, less plausibly, that the beloved disciple believed that Jesus had been taken by God similar to Elijah. Morris (1995: 736) notes that the two verbs do not have explicit objects, supplying the graveclothes as the object of the beloved disciple’s “seeing” and Jesus’ resurrection as that of the disciple’s “believing” (albeit without understanding its full theological significance). Hardly plausible is the suggestion by Minear (1983: 91 n. 14, with reference to 1976 [followed by Conway 1999: 189–90]) that what the disciples believed was the statement of Mary Magdalene in 20:2.

40 For example, Isa. 25:9; 35:10; 51:3; 61:10; 66:10; Zeph. 3:14–17; Zech. 9:9. Cf. Conzelmann, TDNT 9:362–63.

41 See Delling, TDNT 6:297–98; Conzelmann, TDNT 9:365.

1 See Bammel 1970; Corley, DJG 841–54.

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee’s observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus “from within him” refers to “whoever believes in me.” Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of “rivers of living water” (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987: 88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

2 Conway (1999: 85) describes Nicodemus as an “opaque rather than transparent character” whose inner motives are not disclosed by the narrator. Cotterell (1985: 241) draws attention to the portrayal of Nicodemus in his humanity as a Pharisee who was “inclined to patronize” and was “human enough to sulk” when “pierced in the presence of his own students.” Meeks (1972: 53) calls Nicodemus a “rather stupid disciple.”

13 See Blomberg (1995: 5–7), who lists seven factors in favor of seeing John’s portrait of Nicodemus as “substantially more negative” than the dominant view alleges: (1) the introduction of 2:23–25; (2) the labels “Pharisee” and “ruler of the Jews”; (3) Nicodemus’s coming by night; (4) the identification of Jesus as a mere “teacher”; (5) Nicodemus’s dependence on signs; (6) his astonishing ignorance; and (7) the evidence adduced by Cotterell regarding the increasingly negative portrayal of Nicodemus. According to Blomberg (cf. Bassler 1989), Nicodemus remains an ambivalent character, in contrast with the more positive progression found in the Samaritan woman in John 4. This overall conclusion is against Cotterell (1985: 241), who in his otherwise excellent discourse analysis exceeds the evidence when he credits Nicodemus with a “gradual dawning of true faith [culminating] in the presence of Nicodemus at the cross and in his ultimate identification with Jesus in his death.” Rather than “take his place at Calvary,” Nicodemus simply ensured giving Jesus a decent burial. (As Meeks [1972: 55] contends, Nicodemus’s “ludicrous ‘one hundred pounds’ of embalming spices indicate clearly enough that he has not understood the ‘lifting up’ of the Son of Man.”) Cotterell is on surer footing when he concludes that in the present narrative, “Nicodemus chose not to understand Jesus,” characterizing the outcome of the present conversation as “inconclusive.” Likewise mistaken, I believe, is Saayman (1995: 45), who detects in Nicodemus “a growing loyalty to Jesus.”

16 Cotterell (1985: 238–39) notes that νοκτός is not marked, not brought into emphatic position by fronting (he notes the general mobility of this element by reference to Acts 9:24–25; Matt. 28:13; Luke 21:37). He concludes that John’s failure to front the expression tends to support the view that νοκτός is no more than a chronological discourse marker.

23 Cotterell’s (1985: 240) comment that there was no double meaning in Aramaic is unduly dismissive because it disregards the fact that John’s Gospel has come to us in Greek, where misunderstanding is not only possible, but almost certainly intended by the evangelist. Thielman (1991: 179 n. 1) points to the frequency of double meanings in the present pericope (see 3:3, 7, 8), “which give the reader pause and serve to ‘emphasize’ the point at hand.”

29 See, earlier, Schlatter 1948: 89. For helpful discussions, see Carson 1991: 191–96, esp. 194–95; McCabe 1999. See also Cotterell 1985: 241; Kynes, DJG 574–76, esp. 575.

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’ ” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

20 Very few would argue for a date prior to A.D. 70, as do J. A. T. Robinson 1976: 254–85 (but see the refutation in Kerr 2002: 19–25; see also Carson 1991: 82–86); Morris 1995: 25–30 (with reference to Cribbs 1970; Torrey 1936: x–xi); and Wallace 1990 (but see the present commentary at 5:2). However, the cumulative weight of the following internal evidence must be judged to favor a post-A.D. 70 date (cf. Croteau 2003): the references to the Sea of Tiberias in 6:1 and 21:1; Thomas's confession of Jesus as "my Lord and my God" in 20:28 (contra emperor worship in time of Domitian?); the reference to Peter's martyrdom (21:19); and the lack of reference to the Sadducees (Schlatter 1948: 44; though see the caution in Carson 1991: 84)—not to mention the comparative ease with which the Fourth Evangelist equates Jesus with God (e.g., 1:1, 14; 10:30; 20:28; see Carson 1991: 85, though note his caveats on p. 84) or external evidence such as Clement of Alexandria's statement, cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7, "Last of all, John, perceiving that the external facts had been made plain [in the Synoptics] ... composed a spiritual gospel." This is true especially since the major pieces of evidence cited in support of a pre-A.D. 70 date—the lack of reference to the destruction of the temple and the use of a present-tense verb in 5:2 to refer to the Sheep Gate pool—are not determinative and are capable of alternative explanations (see, e.g., Schlatter 1948: 23–24).

20 Very few would argue for a date prior to A.D. 70, as do J. A. T. Robinson 1976: 254–85 (but see the refutation in Kerr 2002: 19–25; see also Carson 1991: 82–86); Morris 1995: 25–30 (with reference to Cribbs 1970; Torrey 1936: x–xi); and Wallace 1990 (but see the present commentary at 5:2). However, the cumulative weight of the following internal evidence must be judged to favor a post-A.D. 70 date (cf. Croteau 2003): the references to the Sea of Tiberias in 6:1 and 21:1; Thomas's confession of Jesus as "my Lord and my God" in 20:28 (contra emperor worship in time of Domitian?); the reference to Peter's martyrdom (21:19); and the lack of reference to the Sadducees (Schlatter 1948: 44; though see the caution in Carson 1991: 84)—not to mention the comparative ease with which the Fourth Evangelist equates Jesus with God (e.g., 1:1, 14; 10:30; 20:28; see Carson 1991: 85, though note his caveats on p. 84) or external evidence such as Clement of Alexandria's statement, cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7, "Last of all, John, perceiving that the external facts had been made plain [in the Synoptics] ... composed a spiritual gospel." This is true especially since the major pieces of evidence cited in support of a pre-A.D. 70 date—the lack of reference to the destruction of the temple and the use of a present-tense verb in 5:2 to refer to the Sheep Gate pool—are not determinative and are capable of alternative explanations (see, e.g., Schlatter 1948: 23–24).

58 For a helpful chart summarizing people's belief or lack thereof in the remainder of the Gospel, see Croteau 2002: 120 (on believing in John's Gospel, see also Gaffney 1965; Melick 1976; and H. Koester 1989). In the first half of the narrative, negative responses predominate; the few instances of believing in the second half are all positive. This seems to support the notion, defended in the present commentary, that Jesus' mission in John 1–12 is predominantly (though not exclusively) one of failure owing to people's lack of believing response, while John 13–21 is taken up with Jesus' focus on the nucleus of the new messianic community. Hence 1:12, as the pivot of the prologue, serves to encapsulate the entire scope of John's presentation of people's responses to the Messiah in terms of reception or rejection with the result of eternal life or judgment.

48 A semantic distinction between πιστεύω + εἰς (pisteuō + eis, believe + in) and the verb alone followed by an object in the dative case cannot be maintained (Carson [1991: 346–47] and the vast majority of commentators; see also Croteau 2002). Concerning the perfect participle πεπιστευκότας (pepisteukotas, having believed), Swetnam (1980 citing E. Abbott 1906: 365–66) notes that the perfect participle in Greek can also serve as a pluperfect. If so, the meaning here

Crown, A. D. 154n44

Cullmann, O. 3, 77n78, 163n78, 482n5

Culpepper, R. A. xi, xii, 1n1, 5n10, 19n3, 19n4, 20, 21, 21n10, 21n11, 23, 30n35, 36n50, would be “those who had [previously] believed in him [but did so no longer].”

2 Οὐκ ἐπίστευον (ouk episteuon, they were not believing), using the imperfect tense, highlights the progressive nature of the Jews’ unbelief (Ridderbos 1997: 443). Croteau (2002: 65–66) plausibly contends that the antecedents of the reference to people’s unbelief in 12:37 include all previous instances of unbelief in the narrative, including 2:23; 4:45–48; 6:14; 7:31; 8:30–31; 11:47; 12:11 (viewed negatively by Croteau).

20 This is what, in application of Robert E. Longacre’s methodology, may mark 15:1–17 as the peak of the entire farewell discourse (Kellum 2005: 193–96). In the present chapter, “remain” seems to serve as a metaphorical substitute for “believe.” On the “strange absence” of the word πιστεύω (pisteuō, believe) in John 15, see Morris 1995: 297 (cited in Croteau 2002: 111).

44 See Ant. 11.8.4 §§321–24; cf. 13.9.1 §256. Josephus further attests to the temple’s existence in 323 B.C., the year of Alexander the Great’s death (Ant. 11.8.7 §346; cf. 11.8.2 §310). See Jeremias 1969: 352 n. 2. On archaeological excavations related to Mount Gerizim, see Crown 1989: 165–74.

78 See Cullmann, TDNT 6:100–101; Borchert 1996: 143–44; Burge 2000: 76; Morris 1995: 140.

78 J. A. T. Robinson (1959) limits the “others” to John the Baptist and his followers (contra Cullmann [1956], who thinks that the “others” are the Hellenists of Acts 8:4ff.; see also the critique of this view by Carson 1991: 231). On entering into someone else’s labor, see 1 Cor. 3:5–15 (contrast Rom. 15:20) and the parable of the workers in the vineyard in Matt. 20:1–16.

5 Hence, it was common especially in older commentators to refer to the present prayer as Jesus’ “prayer of consecration” (e.g., Cullmann, E. C. Hoskyns, Bernard, W. F. Howard [cited in Agourides 1968: 138]; see also Westcott [1908: 2.238], who titles John 17 “The Prayer of Consecration” but later says that the chapter contains “what may be most properly called ‘the Lord’s Prayer’”). This designation has merit (esp. in light of 17:19 [so, rightly, Michaels 1989: 297]), as long as it is not used to imply a strong link between the prayer and the liturgical practices of the church toward the end of the first century A.D. More modestly and soberly, Calvin (1961: 134) calls the prayer “the seal of the preceding teaching” of Jesus.

1 Taking their point of departure from the four beasts in Ezek. 1:10 and Rev. 4:6–8, the Fathers described John as an eagle. See, for example, Augustine, De consensu evangelistarum 6 (cited in Volfing 2001: 45 n. 67): “John flies like an eagle above the clouds of human weakness and gazes most keenly and steadily with the eye of his heart at the light of unchangeable truth.” On John as fisherman, son of thunder, beloved disciple, elder and seer, apostle in second-century interpretation, saint depicted as an eagle, and hero and icon, see Culpepper 1994.

10 See Köstenberger 1999a: 30–31. There has been a virtual avalanche of literary explorations of Johannine themes or specific Johannine portions of text pouring from the presses in the last two decades. Among those are Culpepper 1983; Duke 1985; Staley 1988; M. Davies 1992; Stibbe 1992; 1994; Lee 1994; Tovey 1997; Beck 1997; Conway 1999; and Harstine 2002, to list but a few.

3 For a comprehensive chart delineating narrative time in John’s Gospel, see Culpepper 1983: 70. See also Burns 1971 and the chapter entitled “Structuring Time in the Fourth Gospel” in M. Davies 1992: 44–66.

4 Culpepper (1980–81: 1) quotes Barrett (1971: 27): “The Prologue is ... one piece of solid theological writing. The evangelist wrote it all” (cf. Barrett 1975a: 20–35). Keener (2003: 333–34) maintains that the prologue is an original part of the Gospel, probably added by the author (the apostle John) after completing the first draft of the Gospel. According to Keener (2003: 333–34), ancient writers commonly introduced the main themes at the beginning of their work (see Keener 2003: 334 n. 10 for examples). Bultmann believed that the prologue originated as a pre-Christian gnostic hymn that stemmed from Baptist circles and was taken over and adapted by the Fourth Evangelist (Bultmann 1923: 4; summarized by Ashton 1986: 161). Valentine (1996), in contrast to many other Johannine scholars, argues that the prologue is an organic part of the book, a genuine preface intended to preview important theological themes, rather than a mere afterthought or postscript written after the body of the Gospel had been completed. E. Harris (1994: 26) contends that the prologue “was from the first the construction of the evangelist himself.” See the survey in MacLeod 2003: 49–52.

10 So Culpepper 1980–81: 15–17. This is supported by the observation of Pryor (1990: 202) that 1:14 is not to be considered as the prologue’s “great incarnational turning point,” but that “the ministry of the historical Jesus, which is unquestionably in focus in vv 12–13, ought to be projected back at least to v 9.” Staley (1988: 53–55) suggests that the center is found in 1:12–13.

11 See Culpepper (1980–81: 26–31), who notes that in relation to John’s first epistle, John 1:12 mirrors 1 John 3:1–2, while 1 John 3:10 (cf. 5:2) corresponds to John 8:31–47.

35 For an extensive discussion of the place of symbolism in the Fourth Gospel, see Culpepper 1983: 180–98. See also C. Koester 2003.

50 Schnackenburg (1990: 1.256) claims that the reference is not to Jesus’ earthly ministry but to Israel’s history prior to the incarnation. Similarly, R. Brown (1966: 30) cites the parallel of Wisdom in 1 Enoch 42:2: “Wisdom came to make her dwelling place among the children of men and found no dwelling place.” More likely, the reference is anticipatory of the Word’s incarnation in 1:14 (Culpepper 1980–81: 13–14; Carson 1991: 122; Ridderbos 1997: 43; Moloney 1998: 37). On a literal level, see the reference in Luke 2:7 that there was “no guest room available” (TNIV) for Jesus and his parents at his birth, which may have spiritual overtones as well.

56 According to Culpepper (1983: 169), the “foundational irony of the gospel is that the Jews rejected the Messiah they eagerly expected.” A similar conclusion is reached by Duke (1985: 117), who suggests that 1:9–12 represents a summary of the dominant irony in the Fourth Gospel and notes how this primary irony (Jesus’ rejection by the Jews) is played out in the narrative in John 9.

57 Culpepper (1983: 125–32) has a helpful discussion of the evangelist’s characterization of “the Jews.” For a critique of Culpepper’s methodology of characterization and an alternate proposal, see Stibbe 1992: 24–25.

7 In his thorough discussion of 1:19–51, Culpepper (1983: 54–57) shows how the narrator uses analepses, prolepses, mixed analepses, and mixed prolepses, creating a distinction between the sequence of the narrative and the sequence of the story. Culpepper (1983: 89–98) also provides an extended discussion of the plot of the Fourth Gospel.

54 For a detailed discussion of the characterization of Jesus’ disciples in this Gospel, see Culpepper 1983: 119–25. See also chapter 4 in Köstenberger 1998b.

94 Culpepper (1983: 176–77) suggests that the most common way of conveying irony in John’s Gospel is through the use of unanswered questions (see 1:46; 4:12; 6:42, 52; 7:20, 26, 35, 42, 48;

8:22, 53; 9:40; 18:38). For a partial list of ironies, particularly unanswered questions, see also Duke 1985: 90–91.

113 See the surveys in Hawthorne, DJG 7–8; Moloney 1978: 1–22; Culpepper 1993: 57–101 (on 1:51, see pp. 61–63). See also Köstenberger 2002c: 22.

120 See Culpepper (1983: 61–68) for a detailed discussion of prolepses in the Fourth Gospel (1:50 is listed in the same category as 2:4; 3:14, 17; 6:27, 64; 7:34, 38).

13 See the helpful discussion of 2:1–11 in Derrett 1970: 229–44. For an examination of the evangelist’s characterization of Mary, see Culpepper 1983: 133–34.

31 For a list of misunderstandings in John’s Gospel, see Culpepper 1983: 161–62 (his list includes 2:19–21; 3:3–5; 4:10–15, 31–34; 6:32–35, 51–53; 7:33–36; 8:21–22, 31–35, 51–53, 56–58; 11:11–15, 23–25; 12:32–34; 13:36–38; 14:4–6, 7–9; 16:16–19). Culpepper (1983: 35) also identifies explanatory comments on the statements of Jesus by the evangelist (2:21; 6:6, 71; 7:39; 8:27; 12:33; 13:11; 18:32; 21:19, 23).

10 Dodd 1953: 315; Dockery 1988: 129–30, 133; Culpepper 1983: 136–37; Duke 1985: 100–103.

11 See Culpepper 1983: 22 for a list of editorial comments presenting the internal thoughts of Jesus (4:1; 5:6; 6:6, 15, 61, 64; 11:5, 33, 38; 13:1, 11, 21; 16:19; 18:4; 19:28).

1 For a survey of patristic literature on John 5:1–18, see Mees 1986. A close narrative reading of 5:1–18 is found in Culpepper 1993. A reading of 5:1–47 is provided by Lee 1994: 98–125.

4 For an unfavorable comparison between this character and the man born blind in John 9, see the discussion there. Keener (2003: 639, following Culpepper 1983: 139) contends that 5:1–15 serves as a (negative) foil for the (positive) characterization in chapter 9 of the man born blind, calling the contrasting of characters a common rhetorical device. See also Asiedu-Pepurah 2001; Staley 1991. For a discussion of the similarities and differences between John 5 and 9, see Lee 1994: 105–7.

34 Ridderbos 1997: 188; Carson 1991: 245; Morris 1995: 271; Culpepper 1983: 138; 1993: 204–5; contra Staley 1991: 63–64. The term ὑγιής (hygiēs, well, healthy) occurs five times in this chapter, six times total in John, and only five other times in the rest of the NT (Morris 1995: 271–72 n. 30).

10 So, among others, Schlatter 1948: 286. On the “disciple Jesus loved,” see Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61 (including further bibliographic references). For the identification of the “disciple Jesus loved” with John the son of Zebedee, see chapter 1 in Köstenberger 1999a; for the identification of the “disciple Jesus loved” with the Fourth Evangelist, see Jackson 1999. See also the discussion of authorial modesty in Vanhoozer 1993: 374, citing Augustine and Westcott. Contra Culpepper (1983: 121–23), who views the “beloved disciple” not only as an “ideal disciple” but also as the physical personification of the Paraclete. Beck (1997: 108–36) essentially aligns himself with Culpepper in characterizing this disciple as “the paradigm” or “embodiment of discipleship” (pp. 135–36).

15 Yet Borchert (2002: 230 n. 40, citing Culpepper 1994: 61–63) remains skeptical.

3 For a narrative exegesis of 18:15–19:22, see Larsen 2001: 122–39. Larsen views Pilate as an archetypal tragic figure, in application of the work of Northrop Frye with further reference to Culpepper (1983) and Stibbe (1992; 1994). Keener (2003: 1097) proposes another chiasm for 18:29–19:16, with 19:1–3 (scourging and crown of thorns) at the center. On John’s Passover chronology, see Keener 2003: 1100–1103. Keener (2003: 1103) does not favor Blomberg’s and

Curtis, K. P. G. 558n3

Dahl, N. A. 129, 266

Dahms, J. V. 43n72

Dalman, G. 92n8, 92n9, 147, 147n19, 170, 300, 301, 306n40, 382n32, 451n14, 547n36, Carson's harmonization and concludes that the Synoptics and John "at least imply (perhaps for theological reasons) the Passover on different days." I have similar problems here with Keener's reconstruction as with his view on the temple cleansing.

4 Cf. Acts 19:35–41; 23:23–26:32. In his discussion of the characterization of Pilate in the Fourth Gospel, Culpepper (1983: 143) summarizes the role of Pontius Pilate by suggesting that he "represents the futility of attempted compromise." Stibbe (1992: 109) disagrees, concluding that the reader should not necessarily view Pilate in a negative light.

6 So Culpepper 1983: 96. See also Schlatter (1948: 366), who contends that the sustained characterization of Peter and John in 1:35–42; 13:23–29; 18:15–17; 20:2–10; and chapter 21 cannot be assigned to different hands; Ridderbos (1997: 656), who says that the final chapter is designed to bring into sharper profile the roles of Peter and the beloved disciple; and Carson (1991: 667), who notes that their relationship is removed from the realm of competition and their complementarity strongly and explicitly affirmed. Minear (1983: 91) writes, "Only in chapter 21 do we discover an adequate end to the story of the two disciples who, from chapter 13 on, have played the most conspicuous supporting roles in the gospel: Simon Peter and the beloved disciple."

3 Note the lack of consensus on the relationship between the Johannine empty tomb narrative and those found in the Synoptics: see, for example, the studies by Neirynck (1984), who detects a "determinative" Synoptic influence on the Fourth Evangelist; Lindars (1956), who says that John's sources are traditions that lie behind the Synoptics rather than the Synoptics themselves; and Curtis (1971), who makes the implausible suggestion that Luke used John rather than vice versa.

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, "It is not einzig, but einzigartig" (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): "not 'einzig geboren,' but 'einzig der Art nach.'" Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers "unique," pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son's procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the "root fallacy"; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors "only" or "unique," disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means "unique" and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, "beloved" (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward "only begotten" rather than simply "only," especially in light of the ensuing preposition "from." This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers "unique" or "one-of-a-kind," while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that "the phrase of the Father ... is decisive." Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that "only begotten" as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as "one of a kind," noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God's children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

8 See Mackowski 1979; Dalman 1935: 101–6; Riesner, DJG 36–37; Deines 1993: 25 n. 38 (with

576n23, 590
Danby, H. 149n31
D'Angelo, M. R. 569n13
Daniel-Rops, H. 546n33
Danker, F. W. 494n50

further bibliography).

9 See Riesner 1987: 47, referring to Mackowski 1979: 278–79; cf. Dalman 1935: 101.

19 Hengel 1999: 302, referring to Dalman.

40 Later mishnaic law stipulated that if one wolf attacked the flock, the hireling must protect it. However, if two wolves threatened the sheep, no blame attached to the hired man for any damage caused to the sheep (m. B. Meṣi'a 7.8–9; see Dalman 1928–39: 6.233–35; Morris 1995: 454).

32 “Since the death of the last prophets, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, the Holy Spirit [of prophetic inspiration] departed from Israel; yet they were still able to avail themselves of the bath qol” (b. Sanh. 11a; cf. t. Soṭah 13.3; see Barrett 1970: 39–40; Dalman 1902: 204–5).

14 Philo refers to “superfluous shoots ... which are a great injury to the genuine shoots, and which the husbandmen cleanse and prune” (Dreams 2.9 §64; cf. Husb. 2 §10). For Palestinian horticultural practice, see Dalman 1928–39: 4.312–13.

36 See Repond 1922; Dalman 1928–39: 5.126–29. Josephus notes that the high priestly robe (χιτών, chitōn) was “not composed of two pieces, ... [but] one long woven cloth” (Ant. 3.7.4 §161; cf. Exod. 28:31; Rev. 1:13), while Philo uses a robe as symbolic of the Logos, which binds all things together in unity (Flight 20 §§110–12). However, it is far from certain whether the present passage alludes to the high-priestly garment (or the unity of the church, for that matter) (so, rightly, Carson 1991: 614; contra Moloney 1998: 503, 507). Carson (1991: 614–15) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 347–48), following Schnackenburg (1990: 3.274), see in the preservation of the seamless tunic an allusion to the Father’s preservation of the Son; Carson also sees a connection with the footwashing.

23 See Schlatter 1959: 511; Beasley-Murray 1999: 383; Borchert 2002: 310. The rabbis used the terms “binding” and “loosing” to declare what was forbidden or permitted by the law. See Str-B 1:738–41; Büchsel, TDNT 2:60–61; J. Lightfoot 1859: 2.237–41; Dalman 1902: 213–17.

31 See Danby 1933: 803; Daube 1950; 1956: 373–82; Derrett 1988.

13 Lee (1995: 42) notes the interesting narrative tension introduced by the fact that Jesus asks Mary not to cling to him (20:17) but invites Thomas to touch him later on in the narrative (20:27). She also points out that in the end, it is inconsequential whether or not Thomas actually does touch Jesus (p. 43; see discussion below). For an alternate way of construing the syntax of 20:17 by taking γάρ (gar, for) to be anticipatory, see McGehee (1986), who translates, “Don’t cling to me. Since I have not yet ascended to the Father, go to my brothers and tell them I am ascending to my Father and your Father and my God and your God.” D’Angelo (1990) adduces Apoc. Mos. 31 as a parallel, taking the present passage to relate to a concern for purity “because the appearance takes place in some sort of intermediary stage.”

33 People of that day wore a loin cloth, undergarments, an outer garment, a belt, a head covering, and sandals (Daniel-Rops 1962: 211–18).

50 The phrase “son of” is a Semitism. See Matt. 23:15; Eph. 5:6 = Col. 3:6 (textual variant). Similar expressions (in the plural) are found in the DSS (1QS 9:16 = 10:19; CD 6:15 = 13:14). The phrase is attested also in classical Greek. Danker (1960–61) cites a passage in Menander’s

Danna, E. 143

Daube, D. 65, 111n33, 149n30, 149n31, 202n19, 203n20, 273, 351, 352n142, 553n74

Davids, P. H. 284

Davies, M. 5n10, 19n3, 32n39, 435n68

Dyscolos (published as part of Papyrus Bodmer IV) that contains the word “madman” (lit., “son of madness,” ὀδυνῆς υἱός, odynēs huios).

33 P. Trudinger (1997: 329, citing Daube 1966b: 1–6) suggests that Jesus’ clearing of the temple at the beginning of his ministry resembles Hezekiah’s similar action (see 2 Chron. 29:3–5, 17; 30:1).

30 See Maccini 1996: 131–44. Daube (1956: 375–82) argues that “do not associate with” specifically refers to Jews not sharing vessels with Samaritans (cf. NIV text and note at 4:9). However, no common utensils (such as the woman’s water jar) are specifically mentioned in 4:9. The explanatory aside, “For Jews have no dealings with [συγχρῶνται] Samaritans,” probably is broader than the mere refusal to share drinking vessels (Ridderbos 1997: 154; Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. f; contra Carson 1991: 218; Borchert 1996: 203; Witherington 1995: 120; R. Brown 1966: 170; Morris 1995: 229; Barrett 1978: 232; Moloney 1998: 117, 121; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.425 n. 19).

31 See Danby 1933: 803; Daube 1950; 1956: 373–82; Derrett 1988.

19 Similarly, it is said of Ruth, “She ate all she wanted and had some left over” (Ruth 2:14; see Daube 1956: 46–51). The concern that nothing “perish” (ἀπόληται, apolētai) may establish a link with the fate of Judas, who is described as “son of destruction” (ἀπωλείας, apōleias) in John 17:12. There may also be a link with the apostasy of most of Jesus’ “disciples” in 6:66 (Anderson 1996: 174).

20 This reflects the views of Rabbis Hillel and Yohanan (cf. b. Hul. 105b, attributed to Abaye [ca. A.D. 280–339]). The expression “so that nothing may perish” is also documented in rabbinic literature with reference to food (y. Sanh. 6.6; y. Hag. 2.2; see Köstenberger 2002c: 65).

Regarding Jewish care with respect to food, see E. Johnston 1962: 153–54; Daube 1956: 42.

142 The same case is taken up in the Jerusalem Talmud (y. Ter. 8.10). Another incident involved Ulla the son of Qosher, who was wanted by the government (Gen. Rab. 94.9; see also Gen. Rab. 91.10 on Gen. 48:10 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 117]). Cf. Daube 1966a: 18–47. M. Barker (1970) links Caiaphas’s words with current messianic expectations.

74 Apparently, “in Jewish thought disfiguration was an obstacle to resurrection,” which may further explain why John takes pains to stress that no bone was broken (Daube 1956: 325–29).

10 See Köstenberger 1999a: 30–31. There has been a virtual avalanche of literary explorations of Johannine themes or specific Johannine portions of text pouring from the presses in the last two decades. Among those are Culpepper 1983; Duke 1985; Staley 1988; M. Davies 1992; Stibbe 1992; 1994; Lee 1994; Tovey 1997; Beck 1997; Conway 1999; and Harstine 2002, to list but a few.

3 For a comprehensive chart delineating narrative time in John’s Gospel, see Culpepper 1983: 70. See also Burns 1971 and the chapter entitled “Structuring Time in the Fourth Gospel” in M. Davies 1992: 44–66.

39 Except, of course, for Simon’s father (1:42; 21:15–17). For a list of named individual characters in the Fourth Gospel, see Beck 1997: 30. For a discussion of all the significant named characters in John (plus the mother of Jesus and the “beloved disciple”), see M. Davies 1992: 316–49.

Davies, W. D. 142n5, 168n4, 274n111
Debrunner, A. 430n40. See also BDF
Deeley, M. K. 300n7
Deines, R. 92n8, 96, 96n30, 97

68 For a treatment of the Spirit-Paraclete in the context of the references to the Spirit in the entire Gospel narrative, see M. Davies 1992: 139–53. For a comparison of the treatments of the Spirit in John and the Synoptics, see Köstenberger 1999a: 156. On the Johannine Paraclete and Spirit of truth, see also the extended treatment in Keener 2003: 951–82.

5 Blomberg (1995: 8), with reference to Dockery (1988), lists five approaches to the present narrative: (1) allegorical (cf. 2 Kings 17:30–31); (2) existential (Bultmann 1971: 175–202); (3) pastoral (Milne 1993: 85–86); (4) salvation-historical (W. Davies 1974; Carson 1993); and (5) intertextual (focusing on OT parallels such as Gen. 24:10–61; 29:1–20; Exod. 2:15b–21) (Neyrey 1979). Acknowledging that all of these approaches capture elements of truth, Blomberg nevertheless finds them wanting and proposes a seven-pronged approach of his own. Stibbe (1993: 68–69) advocates a symbolic reading: “If the woman has had five husbands and is living de facto with a sixth, then Jesus is the seventh man in her life. Since seven is the perfect number in Judaism, the implicit commentary must be that Jesus is the man which she has been waiting for, the man in whose presence she will find wholeness.” In the same vein, Brodie (1993: 217–18) sees this as a betrothal-type scene. See also Dockery (1988: 127–40), who distinguishes between author-, text-, and reader-oriented approaches, and Marshall 1974. R. Lightfoot (1956: 122) detects certain parallels between John 4 and 19.

4 One school of interpretation identifies πατρίς (patris, homeland, hometown) in 4:44 with Jerusalem (so Barrett 1978: 246; Dodd 1953: 352; 1963: 238–41; Meeks 1966; 1967: 39–40; see, much earlier, Origen, Commentarii in evangelium Joannis 13.54–56, cited in van Belle 1998: 30). However, see the critiques by W. Davies (1974: 321–31) and Stimpfle (1992: 89) as summarized by van Belle (1998: 30–32). The Galilee/Nazareth explanation is found already in Augustine (cited by van Belle 1998: 33) and is defended by Stimpfle (1992: 86–96 [followed by van Belle 1998: 27–44]) and others (see van Belle 1998: 32–33; see also Ridderbos 1997: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 73; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.463). Still others think that both Galilee and Judea are in view (Carson 1991: 235–36; Burge 2000: 151–52; Witherington 1995: 126; W. Davies 1974: 321–31).

111 Cf. 1:14; Ezek. 10–11; see Carson 1991: 358, citing W. Davies 1974: 290–96; Barrett 1978: 353. Keener (2003: 774) concurs that Jesus’ withdrawing from the temple may “evoke a state of Ichabod, God’s glory withdrawing from a polluted and rebellious sanctuary” (citing Ezek. 5:11; 8:4; 9:3; 10:4, 18). Ridderbos (1997: 324 n. 225) suggests that the meanings of the verbs ἐκρύβη and ἐξῆλθεν (exēlthen, he left) “mutually determine each other.”

40 See the additional note on 14:7. The rendering “certainly” takes ἀπάρτι (aparti) as one word (so, tentatively, Carson 1991: 493, with reference to A. Debrunner and Beasley-Murray; contra Moloney 1998: 399). This is also a possibility in 13:19 (note further the variant in 1:51; cf. Matt. 26:29, 64; Rev. 14:13; see BDAG 97).

7 E.g., Ps. 74:1; 78:52; 79:13; 95:7; 100:3; Ezek. 34:31. A roughly contemporaneous passage, 2 Bar. 77:11–16, portrays the law as true shepherd (as well as light and water). Thus, Jesus here claims to fulfill the function that Jews generally attributed to the Torah (Moloney 1998: 307 [cited in Blomberg 2002: 158]). For a detailed treatment of John’s appropriation of Ezekiel’s shepherd motif in Ezek. 33–37, see Deeley 1997.

Deissmann, A. 165n80, 283n22, 534n64, 580n12
Delebecque, E. 331n43
Delling, G. 457n41, 509n41
p 655 Derrett, J. D. M. 92n10, 92n13, 94n18, 95, 149n31, 208
Dettwiler, A. 398n9, 399n1

8 See Mackowski 1979; Dalman 1935: 101–6; Riesner, DJG 36–37; Deines 1993: 25 n. 38 (with further bibliography).

30 Cf. 1 Esdr. 8:20; Bel 3 (Theodotion); BDAG 643 further lists several inscriptions and papyri. See also Deines (1993: 28–29), who concludes that a μετρητής amounted to approximately thirty-nine liters. Schnelle (1996: 369, referring to Deines) adds up the total to about six hundred liters.

80 C. Koester 1990b: 665–80, esp. 667; cf. Deissmann 1927: 364–65; Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 268.

22 Most frequently cited is the healing of the blind soldier Valerius Aper, apparently by Asclepius, in which an eye-salve was used (Deissmann 1927: 135; Rengstorf, TDNT 6:119). According to Boring, Berger, and Colpe (1995: 284), the inscription probably comes from the Asclepius temple on the island in the Tiber in Rome and dates to A.D. 138.

64 Even Israel could be called God’s son (Exod. 4:22; Hos. 11:1; cf. John 10:33–38). In Greco-Roman circles, “son of god” (υἱὸς θεοῦ; divi filius) frequently occurs in inscriptions as a title for the emperor, especially Augustus (Deissmann 1901: 167), which is why the present charge has possible political implications. However, Pilate seems to find it hard to see Jesus as a threat to Roman imperial power (Whitacre 1999: 449).

12 An inscription dated 24 B.C. dedicates a building “to the god and lord Socnopaeus” (Deissmann 1927: 361–62).

43 Alternatively, the sentence should read, “Lazarus has died—and I am glad for your sake, in order that you may believe—because I was not there” (cf. Carson 1991: 411, citing Delebecque 1986; cf. Barrett 1978: 393).

41 See Delling, TDNT 6:297–98; Conzelmann, TDNT 9:365.

41 See Delling 1957: esp. 110–15; Goppelt, TDNT 6:149–53.

10 On Jewish weddings, see the sidebar in Köstenberger 2002c: 24. See also Safrai 1976; Derrett 1970: 227–38; Ferguson 1993: 68–69; Williams, DJG 86–88.

13 See the helpful discussion of 2:1–11 in Derrett 1970: 229–44. For an examination of the evangelist’s characterization of Mary, see Culpepper 1983: 133–34.

18 So Keener (1993: 268), perhaps following Derrett (1970: 235).

31 See Danby 1933: 803; Daube 1950; 1956: 373–82; Derrett 1988.

9 For the purposes of this present commentary, the farewell discourse will be treated as a literary unity. Writing in 1982, Segovia (1982: 82) could claim, “Nowadays hardly any exegete would vigorously maintain that John 13:31–18:1 is a literary unity as it stands.” The past two decades have seen the emergence of many, often mutually contradictory, redaction-critical proposals, most notably the theory of the “relecture” of John 13–14 in John 15–16 (see esp. Dettwiler 1995). The primary grounds for such theories is the magnus reus (“great offender”) of 14:31, which to many suggests a “literary seam” (aporia). However, Kellum (2005: esp. 205–33) recently has demonstrated the weaknesses of a disunity theory applied to the Johannine farewell discourse on stylistic, structural, and thematic grounds. Moreover, 14:31 is shown more likely to constitute an instance of the Johannine device of implied movement, which may in a given

Dewey, K. E. 297n5, 302n17
Díaz, J. R. 152n37, 266
Dibelius, M. 358n5, 568n11
Dixon, L. 130n47
Dixon, P. S. 28n27

instance convey a shift in topic (cf. 11:16, 44; 20:11). This observation is significant not only on a micro level but also on a macro level. Within the context of the entire discourse, this device is employed to foster both discourse continuity and progression, moving in an increasingly exclusionary direction. In 13:30, Judas's departure leaves Jesus and the Eleven, triggering Jesus' initial cycle of instruction. In 14:31, it is Jesus and his followers whose departure is implied, followed by a metaphorical deepening of Jesus' words from 13:31–14:30. Finally, in 17:1 Jesus lifts his eyes to heaven, praying by himself. On the other end of the discourse, Jesus and the disciples are shown to cross the Kidron Valley in 18:1, with the subsequent arrest of Jesus and the ensuing events of his passion. Hence, there is no need to resort to redaction-critical relecture or chiasmic or other theories, and 14:31 is not a "literary seam" but part of a carefully designed pattern of escalating narrative movement.

1 This narrow delineation of the farewell discourse is affirmed by, among others, G. Johnston (1970), Segovia (1991, followed tentatively by Keener [2003: 891]), and Dettwiler (1995 [though note that Dettwiler starts the discourse at 13:1 to accommodate his relecture theory]). See also Kellum 2005. Many who do include chapter 17 do so by way of separate reference to Jesus' final prayer (e.g., Carson 1980).

5 Dewey (1980), while acknowledging that the term παροιμία (paroimia, illustration) occurs only in 10:6 (with reference to 10:1–5) and 16:25, 29 (referring to 16:21–24), extends the term to encompass as many as thirty-four proverbial sayings in the Gospel. This seems overzealous. For a more restrained treatment, comparing the Synoptic parables to their Johannine counterparts, see Schweizer 1996.

17 The word is absent from the Synoptics, where the roughly equivalent expression παραβολή (parabolē, parable) is found (not used in John; see Carson 1984: 301–4). Both terms apparently render the broad Hebrew expression māšāl (Borchert 1996: 329). They occur side by side in a few instances (e.g., Sir. 39:3; 47:17) and do not differ significantly in meaning (Dewey 1980).

37 See also Tg. Neof. of Gen. 28:10 (referring to the well at Haran; see Díaz 1963: 76–77), and the Samaritan liturgy for the Day of Atonement cited in Carson 1991: 220 (cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.430–32).

5 See Köstenberger 2001b: 49–63. Ridderbos (1997: 413 [cf. Burge 2000: 336]) rightly contends that Mary is not the woman described in Luke 7 (though he perceives some degree of dependence on Mark 14:3–9 = Matt. 26:6–13). This view is rather common, though not universally so. Contra Holst (1976: 435–46), who on form-critical grounds believes that there is only one underlying historical event and that "variations arose in the course of oral transmission" (citing Dodd 1963: 172; other proponents include D. F. Strauss, Dibelius, and Bultmann).

11 Similar recognition scenes are found in stories of Greco-Roman gods walking among people (Dibelius 1918 [cited in R. Brown 1970: 1008–9]).

47 For further study on hell, see L. Dixon 1992; Fernando 1994; and Peterson 1995.

27 See Hartley 1999 for an interaction with the arguments by Jehovah's Witnesses against Jesus' deity from 1:1c. Hartley first surveys the history of the debate, starting with Colwell (1933: 12–21), followed by contributions by Harner (1973: 75–87), P. Dixon (1975), and Hartley himself

Dockery, D. S. 112n1, 142n5, 143n10, 148

Dodd, C. H. 37n54, 53, 108, 111n34, 128, 133, 143n10, 168n4, 186n54, 208n48, 224n3, (1996). Hartley concludes that “the Word was theos (1:1c) in every sense the Father was ton theon (1:1b), rather than a god in a particular sense the Father was not” (1999: 1, summarizing 1996). See also MacLeod 2003: 59–60; and Keener 2003: 372–74, who points to the anarthrous instances of θεός designating God the Father later in the prologue (1:6, 12, 13, 18) and the articular use of θεός with reference to Jesus in 20:28 (p. 373).

1 This chart comparing and contrasting Jesus’ encounters with Nicodemus and the Samaritan woman in John 3–4 is adapted from Dockery 1988: 128–29.

5 Blomberg (1995: 8), with reference to Dockery (1988), lists five approaches to the present narrative: (1) allegorical (cf. 2 Kings 17:30–31); (2) existential (Bultmann 1971: 175–202); (3) pastoral (Milne 1993: 85–86); (4) salvation-historical (W. Davies 1974; Carson 1993); and (5) intertextual (focusing on OT parallels such as Gen. 24:10–61; 29:1–20; Exod. 2:15b–21) (Neyrey 1979). Acknowledging that all of these approaches capture elements of truth, Blomberg nevertheless finds them wanting and proposes a seven-pronged approach of his own. Stibbe (1993: 68–69) advocates a symbolic reading: “If the woman has had five husbands and is living de facto with a sixth, then Jesus is the seventh man in her life. Since seven is the perfect number in Judaism, the implicit commentary must be that Jesus is the man which she has been waiting for, the man in whose presence she will find wholeness.” In the same vein, Brodie (1993: 217–18) sees this as a betrothal-type scene. See also Dockery (1988: 127–40), who distinguishes between author-, text-, and reader-oriented approaches, and Marshall 1974. R. Lightfoot (1956: 122) detects certain parallels between John 4 and 19.

10 Dodd 1953: 315; Dockery 1988: 129–30, 133; Culpepper 1983: 136–37; Duke 1985: 100–103.

54 This is the view of, among others, Carson 1991: 125; Dodd 1953: 402; R. Brown 1966: 10; Morris 1995: 85; Borchert 1996: 114; Burge 2000: 59. For a demonstration that 1:11, properly interpreted and understood (particularly the world as God’s property), refutes the notion, advanced by Bultmann, that John reflects gnostic thought, see Jervell 1956: 17–18. But see also the interaction with Jervell in Pryor 1990: 210–14.

34 Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.344; Barrett 1978: 195; R. Brown 1966: 117; Witherington 1995: 85–86; Borchert 1996: 160; Bultmann 1971: 122; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38–39; Dodd 1963: 162; Lindars 1972: 135–37; Keener 2003: 518–19. Keener contends that it is historically implausible that Jesus would challenge the temple system by overturning tables and yet continue in public ministry for two or three years afterward, sometimes even visiting Jerusalem (though he notes that Jesus faces considerable hostility there when he does). On the contrary, an early temple cleansing accounts well for Jewish hostility toward Jesus early on (5:18), and Jesus’ continuing in ministry for two or three more years is eminently plausible historically in light of Jesus’ pattern of withdrawal (3:22; 6:15; 7:9–10; 8:59; 10:40) and his caution from the very inception of his ministry because his “time” has not yet come (2:4; 7:6). Borchert (1996: 160) contends that two temple clearings are “a historiographic monstrosity that has no basis in the texts of the Gospels.” Kreitzer (1998: 100–101) claims that the evangelist followed the motto “When the details of history no longer serve the functions of the story—discard them.” R. Brown (1966: 118) concludes that Jesus uttered some prophetic saying concerning the destruction of the temple on his first visit but actually cleansed the temple at the end of his ministry. Wallace (1996: 561 n. 20) notes that this would require a crucifixion date of

A.D. 33.

10 Dodd 1953: 315; Dockery 1988: 129–30, 133; Culpepper 1983: 136–37; Duke 1985: 100–103.

4 One school of interpretation identifies πατρίς (patris, homeland, hometown) in 4:44 with Jerusalem (so Barrett 1978: 246; Dodd 1953: 352; 1963: 238–41; Meeks 1966; 1967: 39–40; see, much earlier, Origen, Commentarii in evangelium Joannis 13.54–56, cited in van Belle 1998: 30). However, see the critiques by W. Davies (1974: 321–31) and Stimpfle (1992: 89) as summarized by van Belle (1998: 30–32). The Galilee/Nazareth explanation is found already in Augustine (cited by van Belle 1998: 33) and is defended by Stimpfle (1992: 86–96 [followed by van Belle 1998: 27–44]) and others (see van Belle 1998: 32–33; see also Ridderbos 1997: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 73; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.463). Still others think that both Galilee and Judea are in view (Carson 1991: 235–36; Burge 2000: 151–52; Witherington 1995: 126; W. Davies 1974: 321–31).

54 Though calling this a “parable” (Dodd 1968a; Burge 2000: 177; cf. R. Brown 1966: 218) may be an overstatement (Carson 1991: 250; Ridderbos 1997: 192; Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Barrett 1978: 259–60).

48 The parallelism between 6:30 and 2:18 is noted by Keener (2003: 678). Dodd (1953: 301, cf. 90) perceptively notes that Jesus, in response to the Jews’ demand for a sign, “does not promise any significant event yet to happen,” but rather “offers an interpretation of what has already happened,” inviting them “to see in the actual occurrence of the Feeding of the Multitude the σημεῖον which they desire.” People had seen the feeding, but they had not seen the sign; that is, they had not understood its symbolic, messianic significance as pointing to Jesus as the life-giving bread (pp. 334–35). Contra Whitacre (1999: 156), who claims that the crowd “is not asking for another sign to be given, but rather they want an interpretation of the feeding that has just occurred.”

3 Ridderbos (1997: 253) considers chapters 7–10 to constitute a unit, marked by Jesus’ “encounters, conversations, and confrontations” with the Jews. More in depth is the analysis by Schenke (1989: esp. 186), who likewise defends the unity of chapters 7–10 dramatically developing the escalating conflict regarding Jesus. Schenke discerns three major scenes (7:10–8:59; 9:1–10:21; 10:22–39) plus a prologue (7:1–9) and an epilogue (10:40–42). In chapters 7–8 (scene I, taking place in the Jerusalem temple), Schenke finds seven smaller scenes (7:10–13, 14–31, 32–36, 37–44, 45–52; 8:12–20, 21–59) moving from diversity of opinion regarding Jesus to a united front against him. Scene II is staged in Jerusalem and can also be divided into seven smaller scenes (9:1–7, 8–12, 13–17, 18–23, 24–34, 35–39; 9:40–10:21). The location of scene III is once again the temple. A very similar division of chapter 7 is found in Neyrey 1996 (followed in the discussion below). On the thematic unity of the present unit, see also Dodd 1953: 345–54. On the thematic unity and development of 7:1–36, see Attridge 1980.

6 See Isa. 60:19–22; Zech. 14:5b–8; cf. Rev. 21:23–24. Contemporary Judaism applied the phrase “light of the world” not only to God but also to Israel, Jerusalem, the patriarchs, the Messiah, famous rabbis (e.g., Yohanan ben Zakkai), the Torah, the temple, and even Adam (Keener 1993: 285; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 128; R. Brown 1966: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.190; Moloney 1998: 266). The universality of “light” symbolism in religious language issues in numerous non-Jewish parallels (see Barrett 1978: 335–37; Bultmann 1971: 40–44, 342–43; Dodd 1953: 201–8; Odeberg 1968: 286–92).

23 Apparently, this is also how Gentiles referred to the law when in dialogue with Jews (Dodd 1953: 82).

1 Stibbe (1994: 39) calls the function of the present pericope “crucial” and “pivotal.” Various attempts have been made to isolate sources underlying the existing narrative, but as Dodd (1963: 230 [cited in M. Harris 1986: 311]) points out, “Nowhere perhaps, in this gospel, have attempts to analyse out a written source, or sources, proved less convincing, and if the evangelist is following a traditional story of fixed pattern, he has covered his tracks.” This observation also holds true for the attempts by Burkett (1994: 209–32) to isolate two previous accounts of Lazarus’s resurrection that allegedly have been combined into one in John 11.

116 Cf. 1 Esdr. 4:58; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162. Hunter (1985: 58, citing Dodd 1963: 183; Fortna 1970: 83) notes that “first-century Jewish custom dictated that ‘prayers were generally said with downcast eyes’ ” (cf. Ps. 131:1a; b. Yebam. 105b).

5 See Köstenberger 2001b: 49–63. Ridderbos (1997: 413 [cf. Burge 2000: 336]) rightly contends that Mary is not the woman described in Luke 7 (though he perceives some degree of dependence on Mark 14:3–9 = Matt. 26:6–13). This view is rather common, though not universally so. Contra Holst (1976: 435–46), who on form-critical grounds believes that there is only one underlying historical event and that “variations arose in the course of oral transmission” (citing Dodd 1963: 172; other proponents include D. F. Strauss, Dibelius, and Bultmann).

6 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 525–26, with reference to 17:20, the NIV, and many major commentators (e.g., Barrett 1978: 480; Bultmann 1971: 549; Lindars 1970: 494; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.115; Bruce 1980: 313; contra Borchert 2002: 156; Dodd 1963: 409; R. Brown 1970: 687; and the NLT). See the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 275; Carson 1991: 525–26.

16 So Morris 1995: 665–66 n. 35, citing Dodd; Carson 1991: 581; Barrett 1978: 526; but see Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 3. The term is used for a “close friend” in the LXX (e.g., 2 Kings 10:11; Ps. 54:14 [55:13 Eng.]; cf. Luke 2:44; see also NewDocs 4.44; Homer, Iliad 15.350).

5 So Ridderbos (1997: 656), who states, “There is much that argues for ascribing the majority of ch. 21 to the Evangelist, as the completion of his narrative, albeit as a striking ... addition to a provisionally concluded whole.” Among the tie-ins between chapters 21 and 1–20, Ridderbos cites 21:1, 14 (referring back to the preceding resurrection account, in which Peter and the beloved disciple are linked) and the connection between Peter’s reinstatement in 21:15–23 and 13:38/18:16ff. According to Ridderbos (1997: 658), the chapter “was added to describe the passage from Jesus’ work on earth to its continuation through his disciples.” Keener (2003: 1219–22), too, makes a strong case for the literary unity of John 21 as a chapter and as an integral part of the entire Gospel. He notes that, apart from special vocabulary needed for the matters at hand (such as fishing terminology), chapter 21 does not differ significantly from the rest of the Gospel. Keener (2003: 1219, citing Bruce 1983: 398) lists the following commonalities: the variation of synonymous terms in 21:15–17; the double ἀμήν (21:18); the construction “This he said, indicating” (21:19; cf. 12:33); and the reference to the Sea of Tiberias (21:1; cf. 6:1). Contra, for example, Dodd (1953: 290), who claims that chapter 21 “falls outside the design of the book as a whole” (cited in Minear 1983: 87 n. 11).

21 Similarly, Morris (1995: 775), who vaguely refers to “people respected in the church who knew the facts of the case.” Osborne (1981: 327, following Dodd) favors “the community as a whole as separate from the author of the epilogue.” Moloney (1998: 562) focuses more on the way in which the “we” of 21:24 “involves [later] generations of Christian readers who know that this witness is true and who can give witness to their own belief.”

Douglas, M. 283n24
Draper, J. A. 8
Droge, A. J. 258n34
Drusius, J. 248n9
Dschulnigg, P. 246
Duke, P. D. 5n10, 37n56, 81n94, 143n10, 278, 278n5, 281, 287n47, 288n49, 290n56, 24 Cf. D. Smith 1985, building on the work of Douglas 1984.

34 According to the rabbis, the person who committed suicide could not pay with his life for the shedding of his blood (cf. Gen. 9:5), so that he must spend the afterlife in a state of damnation (see also Josephus, J.W. 3.8.5 §375; cf. 7.8.6–7.9.1 §§320–401). In contrast, pagan philosophers often considered suicide to be an “honorable death” (Droge and Tabor 1991).

9 This was first suggested by J. Drusius (1595), followed by Hugo Grotius (1641) and J. A. Fabricius (1703–19) (see Petersen 1997: 217). M. Robinson (1998: 5) wrongly attributes to Petersen the view that the pericope of the adulterous woman “was circulating as part of John’s gospel in the mid-second century” (italics added). Apart from the fact that Petersen speaks of “the second half of the second century,” his actual conclusion is that “three constitutive elements of the pericope adulterae, as it is now known [sic] to us from the Gospel of John, were known in the second half of the second century” (1997: 207 [italics added]). Nowhere does he suggest that John’s Gospel was the source of the Protevangelium of James or that John’s Gospel already contained the pericope in the mid-second century (and even if it did, this still would not prove that the pericope is original).

10 See Köstenberger 1999a: 30–31. There has been a virtual avalanche of literary explorations of Johannine themes or specific Johannine portions of text pouring from the presses in the last two decades. Among those are Culpepper 1983; Duke 1985; Staley 1988; M. Davies 1992; Stibbe 1992; 1994; Lee 1994; Tovey 1997; Beck 1997; Conway 1999; and Harstine 2002, to list but a few.

56 According to Culpepper (1983: 169), the “foundational irony of the gospel is that the Jews rejected the Messiah they eagerly expected.” A similar conclusion is reached by Duke (1985: 117), who suggests that 1:9–12 represents a summary of the dominant irony in the Fourth Gospel and notes how this primary irony (Jesus’ rejection by the Jews) is played out in the narrative in John 9.

94 Culpepper (1983: 176–77) suggests that the most common way of conveying irony in John’s Gospel is through the use of unanswered questions (see 1:46; 4:12; 6:42, 52; 7:20, 26, 35, 42, 48; 8:22, 53; 9:40; 18:38). For a partial list of ironies, particularly unanswered questions, see also Duke 1985: 90–91.

10 Dodd 1953: 315; Dockery 1988: 129–30, 133; Culpepper 1983: 136–37; Duke 1985: 100–103.

5 For structural proposals, see especially Ridderbos (1997: 332), who divides the chapter into four major scenes (9:1–5, 6–12, 13–34, 35–41); Duke (1985: 125–26 [followed by Lincoln 2000: 97]), who contends that irony is intensified by the evangelist’s juxtaposition of parallel scenes (9:1–7, 8–12, 13–17, 18–23, 24–34, 35–38, 39–41), which are arranged chiastically with 9:22 at the center; Lee (1994: 164–65), who sees a threefold structure (9:1–7, 8–34, 35–41); and Keener (2003: 775), who divides chapters 9 and 10 as follows: 9:1–34 (blindness and sin); 9:35–10:18 (true shepherd, sheep, and thieves); 10:19–21 (divided response); and 10:22–42 (conflict at Hanukkah). Lincoln (2000: 99) also follows Duke (1985: 126) in contending that in John 9 “the theme is clearly trial and judgment,” with the elements of a trial emerging from 9:13 onward. 47 Bultmann (1971: 335) states that the authorities “now hit on the idea of questioning the fact of the miracle, as being the easiest way of putting an end to the whole business.” Keener (2003: 786) notes how, incredibly, the Pharisees repeatedly ignore the testimony of the miracle itself, focusing instead on Jesus’ alleged Sabbath violation. On “the Jews,” see commentary at 5:10. Carson (1991: 368) attributes the shift from “Pharisees” to “the Jews” to John’s penchant for stylistic variation. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.249) thinks that the change serves to indicate the “official character” of the inquiry. Duke (1985: 120, following Schnackenburg 1990: 2.248) suggests that the uneasiness of the Pharisees in 9:17–18 “is evident in the abrupt close of scene and their immediate change of tactic in what follows.”

49 Duke (1985: 120–21) detects irony in the fact that the parents’ fear of the Jewish authorities sends the interrogators back to the man born blind, whom they had already questioned, yet it was precisely the Jews’ dissatisfaction with that man’s version that had caused them to change their tactic in the first place. This well illustrates not only the authorities’ dilemma but also the cycle of futility in their investigation (cf. Bultmann 1971: 335). Confession of Jesus as Christ was the mark of the early Christians (e.g., Acts 9:22; 18:28; see Hurtado 1988b: 112–13). The phrase “fear of the Jews” occurs in this Gospel also at 7:13; 19:38; 20:19. The expression ἀποσυνάγωγος (aposynagōgos, expelled from the synagogue) occurs in the NT elsewhere only in John 12:42 and 16:2 (there with a future reference). Expulsion from the assembly of the exiles is reported already in Ezra 10:8 (Morris [1995: 434 n. 36], who also refers to Exod. 31:14).

56 Duke (1985: 81–82) describes the irony of the man’s question as sarcastic and notes that it is one of four questions in this Gospel (cf. 7:26, 47–48, 52) that implicitly claim that the Jewish leaders have some form of belief in Christ (cf. 12:42; 19:38–39).

73 Duke (1985: 122–23) notes the irony inherent in 9:34 because the man born blind did in fact teach the Pharisees.

143 Note the sacrificial language (ὑπέρ, hyper, for) in 11:51–52 (Carson 1991: 422; Wallace 1996: 387). On the irony in Caiaphas’s statement, see especially Duke 1985: 87 (cited in Morris 1995: 503 n. 107).

5 For the various ways in which Peter’s characterization is contrasted with that of Jesus, see the discussion in Stibbe 1992: 97–98. Stibbe notes that Jesus is presented twice answering under interrogation with the construction ἐγώ εἰμι (egō eimi, I am) while Peter twice answers with οὐκ εἰμί (ouk eimi, I am not). Also, Peter attacks a servant of the high priest, while Jesus is assaulted by a servant of the high priest. Finally, Peter is on trial outside, while Jesus is on trial inside.

Duke’s (1985: 96–99) discussion of the characterization of Peter focuses on its ironic aspects.

10 Ridderbos 1997: 589; Carson 1991: 589; Duke 1985: 127–28. Duke (1985: 128 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 866]) notes the further irony that the Jews are concerned about not being able to eat the Passover, yet they ultimately kill the true Passover.

27 Duke (1985: 129) also notes irony: the Jewish leaders have Jesus “shamefully crucified to prevent the world from going after him, when in fact he long ago had chosen just such a way to gather the world unto himself.”

34 Jesus’ response also seizes the initiative rather than merely passively responding to Pilate’s question. Duke (1985: 129) suggests that Jesus is not simply seeking information but instead is asking an ironic question in import similar to the blind man’s question in 9:27. In this manner, Jesus is now placing Pilate on trial and calls him to make his own decision. Likewise, Michaels

Dunkerley, R. 322n6

Dunn, J. D. G. 409n52

Edwards, M. J. 25n19, 273n103

Edwards, R. B. 20, 47, 47n86, 47n90, 47n91, 48n93

(1989: 315) notes that Jesus' reply in 18:34 "addresses Pilate at a very personal level, as if to ask him, 'Do you really want to know the answer for your own sake, or are you simply carrying out your duty as magistrate?'" Pilate quickly removes all doubt: it is strictly the latter.

6 The conjecture that the designation "the one you love" in 11:3 points to Lazarus as the "disciple Jesus loved," the author of John's Gospel, is entirely speculative. Also, there is almost certainly no connection between this figure and the character in the parable about the rich man and Lazarus recorded in Luke 16:19–31 (rightly noted by Ridderbos 1997: 386 n. 14; Carson 1991: 404; contra Dunkerley 1959).

52 So Morris 1995: 549 n. 27; apparently, Carson 1991: 464–66; and the UBS committee (Metzger 1994: 204), adducing the "preponderant weight of external attestation"; contra Barrett 1978: 442; Beasley-Murray 1999: 229 n. f; Lindars 1972: 451; D. M. Smith 1999: 254; Dunn 1970: 250–51.

19 See the allusion to the tabernacle in 1:14 and the reference to God's giving the law through Moses in 1:17 (see also 5:46). As Behr (2000: 94 [cf. M. Edwards 1995]) notes, for the second-century church fathers, including Justin Martyr, "The revelation of God in the incarnate Logos is the last, even if the most important, in a series of discrete revelations." According to Irenaeus, "[t]he pre-existence of Christ, the Word of God, is inextricably connected with his seminal presence in Scripture, the word of God" (inseminatus est ubique in Scripturis ejus Filius Dei; Behr 2000: 98).

103 Kruse (2003:217) cites a stipulation in the Qumran writings (CD 14:7–10) that certain officeholders must be between thirty and fifty years of age. Schlatter (1948: 220) says that the present passage coheres with Matt. 17:24, for the obligation to pay the temple tax ended at age fifty: "hence Jesus was not yet a πρεσβύτερος." Also, the Book of Jubilees uses "fifty years" to measure the eras since the creation (M. Edwards 1994; followed by Moloney 1998: 286).
86 See also Wallace 1996: 365–68, referring to Waltke 1958: 1.166–76; R. Brown 1966: 16; and especially the excellent, definitive discussion in Carson 1991: 131–34, referring also to R. Edwards 1988; La Potterie 1977: 1.145–50.

90 R. Edwards (1988: 7 nn. 17–21) cites the following leading fathers of the Greek church as holding that the phrase "grace for grace" referred to a replacement of the Mosaic law by the gospel: Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, Origen, and Theophylact (also Jerome, the most learned of the Latin fathers). Somewhat curiously, Michaels (1989: 24) contends that "grace and truth" is "a circumlocution for the Holy Spirit" (with reference to passages in John and elsewhere that connect the Spirit with grace or truth; cf. John 4:23–24; 14:17; 15:26; 16:13; 1 John 5:6).

91 For the translation "true grace" I am indebted to R. Edwards (1988: 11, following R. Brown 1966: 16, with further reference to Montgomery 1939; Kuyper 1964), who notes that the Hebrew Vorlage hesed wa-emet constitutes a hendiadys meaning "faithful (or enduring) love." Edwards (ibid.) rightly cautions that John's appropriation of these OT expressions must be allowed to have a "fresh nuance": "The Old Testament symbols of God's gracious acts have been appropriated and Christianized."

93 Other positive references to the law in John include 1:45; 7:19, 22–23, 51; 8:17; 10:34; 12:34 (cf. R. Edwards 1988: 8–9).

Edwards, W. D. 552n66
Egger, P. 510n4
Ehrman, B. D. 247
Eller, V. 327n23
Ellis, P. F. 585, 585n9, 588n4
Emerton, J. A. 315n84, 575
Engel, F. G. 451
Ensor, P. W. 161n73, 162

66 See the summary in Carson 1991: 623–24, and the fuller treatment in Beasley-Murray 1999: 355–58. For further discussion, see Barbet 1953; W. Edwards, Gabel, and Hosmer 1986; Sava 1960.

4 On Roman and Jewish administrative policies in first-century A.D. Palestine, see Egger 1997.

23 In any case, the mere reference to Lazarus as “the one you love” in the present passage hardly warrants the conclusion by Eller (1987), Brownlee (1990: 191–94), and Stibbe (1992: 79–81) that the beloved disciple is Lazarus. See the discussion in Charlesworth 1995: xiii (who advances the hardly more plausible theory that the beloved disciple is the apostle Thomas).

9 See Schlatter 1948: 363–77. Note, for example, the references to a charcoal fire in 21:9 and 18:18 and to “drawing” in 21:8 and 12:32, as well as the links between 21:20; 13:23; 1:18 (see Ellis 1992: 18–19). See also the common elements between the good shepherd discourse in chapter 10 and Peter’s commissioning in 21:15–19 (Cassian 1956–57: 132–36 [cited in Minear 1983: 95 n. 24]). Minear (1983: 96–97) further notes the appellation of Thomas as “the twin” in 20:24 and 11:16; the references to Nathanael in 21:2 and 1:45–51 and to Cana in chapters 2, 4, and 21; and several other terminological and thematic connections. Gaventa (1996: 245) notes the similarity between μετὰ ταῦτα (meta tauta, after these things) in 21:1 and 19:38. To this may be added the term “Sea of Tiberias” (21:1; cf. 6:1); Simon Peter “son of John” (21:15; cf. 1:42); Jesus’ taking (λαμβάνω, lambanō) and distributing (δίδωμι, didōmi) bread (21:13; cf. 6:11 [close verbal parallels with 6:11, where Jesus’ giving thanks is explicitly mentioned, may imply thanksgiving in 21:13]); the double ἀμὴν (amēn, truly) (21:18; cf., e.g., 1:51); the connection between Peter’s and Jesus’ death established by the evangelist’s parenthetical comment (21:19; cf. 12:33); Jesus’ call for his disciples to “follow” him (21:19, 22; cf. 1:43); and other verbal links, grammatical features, and thematic connections (Osborne 1981: 294). Spencer (1999) finds the following “narrative echoes” of earlier portions in John’s narrative: (1) the feeding of the five thousand (ch. 6); (2) Peter’s threefold denial (18:15–18, 25–27); (3) the footwashing and the final meal (13:3–5, 36–38); and (4) the good shepherd discourse (10:1–18). Note, however, that Spencer considers chapter 21 to be a “later redactional addition” (p. 68).

4 Breck (1992: 27–49, following Ellis 1984; 1992) lays out 1:19–51 and 20:19–21:25 in inverted parallelism involving Nathanael.

84 See b. Abod. Zar. 5a. For a variation of the first view, see Jungkuntz 1964; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311; Morris 1995: 467; Beasley-Murray 1999: 176–77. The second position is held by Emerton 1960; 1966. For a variation of the third view, see Hanson 1964–65; 1967. See further Oepke, TDNT 4:1022–32, 1054–55. Most major commentators seem to favor the third view as well (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 373; Carson 1991: 398; Barrett 1978: 384; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311).

73 Somewhat similar, though in a context of judgment, is Jer. 51:33 (Schnackenburg 1990: 1.149 n. 86). Ensor (2000: 16) notes that the word θερισμός (therismos, harvest) occurs on Jesus’

Epp, E. J. 26n20

Eppstein, V. 103n8

Erasmus, D. 248n10

Evans, C. A. 71, 77n73, 89n2, 102n3, 103n8, 106n22, 390n4, 392, 519n39 lips—but not those of the evangelists—in both John and the Synoptics, which supports the authenticity of John 4:35 as a saying uttered by Jesus (note also the instances that Ensor cites on p. 16 n. 17).

20 For a more thorough discussion, see E. Miller (1993: 448–49), who lists as many as nine different theories: (1) the OT δβρ; (2) Wisdom (R. Harris 1917); (3) Greek philosophy (Stoicism); (4) Philo (Evans 1993: 100–145; Tobin 1990); (5) the Aramaic mmr (Hayward 1978); (6) rabbinic speculation on the Torah; (7) gnostic sources, such as the Hermetic literature, especially Poimandres (Pagels 1999); (8) the Hellenistic-gnostic redeemer myth, Mandeans, and the Odes of Solomon (Bultmann 1923; 1973; 1971); and (9) the breaking of divine silence (Jeremias). Some, such as Epp (1975), combine two or more of the above (in Epp’s case, Wisdom and Torah). Miller himself (1993: 452), building on his earlier work (1989), advances the thesis that the uses of λόγος in the Gospel proper, while not a christological title, are invested “with a certain christological transparency” (B. Reicke’s term). Thus, startlingly, Miller, who believes that the prologue was written not only after the Gospel proper, but even after John’s first epistle, finds the origin of the prologue’s λόγος in the Fourth Gospel itself: “The one of whom it was said in John 7:46, ‘Never has a man spoken like this!’ eventually came to be called, appropriately, ‘the Word.’ ” I find this thesis entirely unconvincing (Miller [1999] attempts to make the same case for ἀρχή). It is quite a tour de force to brush aside the massive OT substructure pervading the entire prologue. Not surprisingly, Miller’s thesis has found few followers.

8 Evans (1989: 265–67, citing Eppstein 1964) concludes that Caiaphas may have been the first high priest to authorize the sale of sacrificial animals in the temple precincts (perhaps because of a quarrel with the Sanhedrin), which may have provoked Jesus’ response. Eppstein places this quarrel at A.D. 30, which would be precisely the time at which, according to my reconstruction, Jesus cleared the temple (the spring of A.D. 30; but see the cautionary comments in Evans 1989: 266–67).

10 The unfortunate precedent of including the pericope may have been set by Erasmus, who, though doubting the originality of the passage, nonetheless included it in his 1516 edition of the Greek NT in deference to its popularity by readers of the Latin Vulgate. From there, the pericope found its way into the seventeenth-century Textus Receptus (Burge 1984: 148 n. 29). See also Beck (1997: 101–7, esp. 103–4), who concludes that the pericope is inauthentic but nonetheless incorporates it in his study by analyzing its effect on the reader. This judgment, however, is of doubtful merit in that it fails to consider the original and the earliest readers of the Gospel (who would not have read the Gospel with this pericope), and in that it unduly neglects issues such as canonicity, inspiration, and biblical authority.

73 See Ps. Sol. 17:32; 1 Enoch 48:10; 52:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 12:32; 2 Bar. 29:3; 30:1; 40:1; 70:9; 72:2. See O’Neill 1995: 25–26; Abegg and Evans 1998: 191–94; Horbury 1998: chapter 2.

2 For a defense of the temple clearing as a Johannine sign, see Köstenberger 1995b (cf. P. Trudinger 1997: 330), contra R. Brown (1966: 528), who claims that every use of σημεῖον (sēmeion, sign) refers to a “miraculous deed.” By referring to the “temple cleansing” as “temple

Evanson, E. 2

Fabricius, J. A. 248n9

Farmer, W. R. 368n4, 369

Fee, G. D. 195n110, 240n59, 582

clearing,” I take up a suggestion made by Mathews (1988–89: 101); cf. E. Sanders 1985: 61–76; Evans 1989: 237–70.

3 Interpreters differ as to whether Jesus’ clearing of the temple was designed to “cleanse” temple worship (cf. E. Sanders 1985: 61–71; Neusner 1989; Evans 1989). In any case, the major point of the temple clearing in John is that Jesus serves as the temple’s replacement in the life of the messianic community.

8 Evans (1989: 265–67, citing Eppstein 1964) concludes that Caiaphas may have been the first high priest to authorize the sale of sacrificial animals in the temple precincts (perhaps because of a quarrel with the Sanhedrin), which may have provoked Jesus’ response. Eppstein places this quarrel at A.D. 30, which would be precisely the time at which, according to my reconstruction, Jesus cleared the temple (the spring of A.D. 30; but see the cautionary comments in Evans 1989: 266–67).

22 See commentary at 2:14. See also Barrett 1975b; Evans 1997. On Gentile worship at the Jerusalem temple, see the appendix on Gentile participation in worship at Jerusalem in Schürer 1973–79: 2.309–13. Neusner (1989) adds another possible reason: the understanding that the daily whole offering, which was financed by the temple tax, provided atonement and expiation of sin.

4 See 13:18; 15:25; 17:12; 19:24, 36. Cf. Evans 1982a; 1987: esp. 225–26. The formula is also found frequently in the Gospel of Matthew (1:22; 2:15, 17, 23; 4:14; 8:17; 12:17; 13:35; 21:4; 27:9).

39 In the present instance, the two plot lines of Jesus’ trials and the denials of Peter (Evans 1982b [cited in Carson 1991: 586]).

9 This was first suggested by J. Drusius (1595), followed by Hugo Grotius (1641) and J. A. Fabricius (1703–19) (see Petersen 1997: 217). M. Robinson (1998: 5) wrongly attributes to Petersen the view that the pericope of the adulterous woman “was circulating as part of John’s gospel in the mid-second century” (italics added). Apart from the fact that Petersen speaks of “the second half of the second century,” his actual conclusion is that “three constitutive elements of the pericope adulterae, as it is now known [sic] to us from the Gospel of John, were known in the second half of the second century” (1997: 207 [italics added]). Nowhere does he suggest that John’s Gospel was the source of the Protevangelium of James or that John’s Gospel already contained the pericope in the mid-second century (and even if it did, this still would not prove that the pericope is original).

110 So Fee 1982 and the vast majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 185; Carson 1991: 242; Morris 1995: 267; Barrett 1978: 253; R. Brown 1966: 207; Beasley-Murray 1999: 70 n. h; Bultmann 1971: 241 n. 4; Borchert 1996: 232; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94–95.

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee’s observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus “from within him” refers to “whoever believes in me.” Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less

Ferguson, E. 92n10, 104n10, 131n51, 168, 371
Fernando, A. 130n47
Feuillet, A. 21
Finegan, J. 136n8
Fisher, M. C. 28n25
Fitzmyer, J. A. 43, 331
Foerster, W. 417, 444n97
Ford, J. M. 458n50, 553
Forestell, J. T. 68
Fortna, R. T. 172n22, 344n116
France, R. T. 297n4

likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of “rivers of living water” (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987: 88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

10 On Jewish weddings, see the sidebar in Köstenberger 2002c: 24. See also Safrai 1976; Derrett 1970: 227–38; Ferguson 1993: 68–69; Williams, DJG 86–88.

10 Although this was not always possible for those living at a distance from Jerusalem, Galileans were not so remote as to be prevented from attending regularly (Ferguson 1993: 521).

51 See the discussion of Plato’s “Allegory of the Cave” (Republic 7.1–11 [ca. 390 B.C.]) in relation to John 3:19–21 by Köstenberger (2002c: 38–39), who notes that in Plato’s allegory, the person who has seen the light is the philosopher who is cognizant of the world of ideas and thus is able better to explain reality, while in Jesus’ teaching, the light is himself (cf. 1:4–5; 8:12; 9:5), and people’s main problem is not ignorance but sin (cf. Ferguson 1993: 313–14).

47 For further study on hell, see L. Dixon 1992; Fernando 1994; and Peterson 1995.

8 The first is mentioned as early as Eusebius’s Onomasticon (fourth century A.D.). The second is defended by the eminent archaeologist Albright (1924), followed by Bacon (1929); see also Finegan (1992: 70). Yet another site is suggested in Riesner, DJG 35: Ain Farah, eight miles northwest of Shechem.

25 On “God” and “Father” in the Gospel of John, see especially the valuable and insightful monographs by Thompson (2000; 2001). On the characterization of God in the Fourth Gospel, see also Tolmie 1998; on God the Father, see Meyer 1996: 255–73 and Fisher 2003.

97 Philo, the Hellenistic Jew, calls peace “the highest of blessings ... a gift no human being can bestow” (Mos. 1.55 §304; cf. Dreams 2.38 §250; see Foerster, TDNT 2:400–417).

50 Friendship was also the subject of extended reflection in Second Temple wisdom literature (esp. Sir. 6:5–17). For a study of the concept of friendship in Greco-Roman, Jewish, and early Christian literature with special focus on John’s Gospel, see Ford 1997.

22 The numbering of the two Cana signs has suggested to some the existence of a “signs source” (Bultmann 1971: 206; Fortna 1970; 1989; Whitacre 1999: 116). However, this inference is not a necessary one (Ridderbos 1997: 178; Carson 1991: 178; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; contra Barrett 1978: 246; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.469–71).

116 Cf. 1 Esdr. 4:58; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162. Hunter (1985: 58, citing Dodd 1963: 183; Fortna 1970: 83) notes that “first-century Jewish custom dictated that ‘prayers were generally said with downcast eyes’ ” (cf. Ps. 131:1a; b. Yebam. 105b).

4 Cf. Zech. 9:9; 11:17; 12:10 (quoted in John 19:37; cf. Matt. 24:30; Rev. 1:7); 13:7 (alluded to in John 16:32; cf. Matt. 26:56; Mark 14:50). France (1971: 104 [cf. Köstenberger 1998b: 133–

Franzmann, M. 71, 584n4

Freed, E. D. 171, 172, 259n38, 273, 370n13, 380n19, 467

Frend, W. H. C. 464n3

Freyne, S. 171n17

38]) argues that Zechariah's four images jointly portray the successive phases of the messianic shepherd-king's coming and people's reaction to him.

4 Gaventa (1996: 246–47), drawing on Torgovnick's (1981) insights on closure, suggests that chapters 20 and 21 pursue different "strategies of closure." According to Gaventa, chapter 20 structurally corresponds primarily to the prologue (cf., e.g., 20:17 with 1:10; 20:24–31 with 1:7, 13; and 20:28, 31 with 1:18), while chapter 21 recalls a number of scenes throughout the Gospel (cf., e.g., 21:24 with 1:6–8; 21:18–19 with 10:11; 21:15–23 with 13:36) (on the connections between the call narratives of chapters 1 and 21, see Franzmann and Klinger 1992). What is more, chapters 20 and 21 also differ in focus, with chapter 20 centering primarily on Jesus, and chapter 21 foregrounding (two select representatives of) the disciples. There is some truth in this, but oversimplifications should be avoided. John's narrative strategy is doubtless more complex than is often thought.

38 For a study of Jesus' words in 8:24 in light of Jewish messianic expectations, see Freed 1982.

13 Morris (1995: 520) prefers the translation "Blessed is he that comes" over "Blessed be the one." If this is correct, then the phrase constitutes a statement rather than a prayer. Freed (1961) maintains that the OT quotations in John 12:13–15 demonstrate Johannine literary dependence on the Synoptics; but see the rebuttal by D. M. Smith 1963.

19 On the possible influence of Ps. 42 here and elsewhere in John's Gospel (11:33, 35, 37; 14:1–9, 27; 19:28), see the interchange between Beutler (1979, modifying Freed 1965b: 117–30) and Freed (1983a). See also Carson (1991: 440), who says that τετάρακται signifies "revulsion, horror, anxiety, agitation." This emphasis on the precrucifixion turmoil suffered by Jesus stands over against those who, in an effort to focus on the "glory" aspect of Jesus' death, overlook the real agony and anxiety he endured. So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 434), who argues, contra Witkamp, that 12:27a can "hardly refer to anything other than the natural human reaction in confrontation with death"; and Carson (1991: 439–40), who contends, contra E. Käsemann and G. C. Nicholson, that "even in John [with its realized eschatology], Jesus cannot contemplate the cross as a docetic actor, steeped in dispassionate unconcern." R. Brown (1966: 475) notes that here "we see the true humanity of the Johannine Jesus."

3 The world's hatred was experienced by Christians long before John wrote. The Roman historians Tacitus (Annales 15.44) and Suetonius (Nero 16) both called Christianity "a mischievous superstition." See also the charges leveled against the early Christians listed in Köstenberger 2002c: 147, citing Barclay 1975: 2.183–85. Still useful are Frend 1967 and Workman 1923. Keener (2003: 1017) claims that the worldview presupposed in 15:18–25 is "one common to sectarian groups, in which apocalyptic ideologies (in the modern sense of that expression) often prevail" (though he later acknowledges degrees of "sectarian" outlook [quotation marks his]). In his following paragraph, Keener does concede, however, that John's emphasis here "probably [but perhaps not?] stems from authentic Jesus tradition." Did Jesus, then, propagate a sectarian worldview? And, if so, in what sense?

17 On the unusual nature of Jesus' signs selected by John, see commentary at 2:10. A similar remarkable incident (that of the healing of the centurion's servant in Capernaum) is narrated in Matt. 8:5–13 par. Vermes (1972–73) seeks to adduce parallels with the first-century Jewish

Friedrichsen, A. 403n13

Frye, N. 521n3

Funk, R. W. See BDF

Gabel, W. J. 552n66

Gächter, P. 597

Gaffney, J. 38n58

Gaventa, B. R. 583n1, 584n4, 585n9, 586n11, 588, 588n2

miracle worker and faith healer Ḥanina ben Dosa (cf. b. Ber. 34b; much more cautious is Bokser 1985). However, as Meier (1994: 581–88, citing Freyne 1980) points out, not only is Ḥanina ben Dosa not mentioned in Josephus, but also none of the three mishnaic references attribute miracle-working power to him; this takes place only in the talmudic tradition. Hence, all that can be said confidently about the “historical” Ḥanina is that he probably was a first-century Palestinian Jew who was noted for his efficacious prayers over the sick; there is not even early historical evidence linking him to Galilee.

13 Ridderbos (1997: 459 n. 33, with reference to Friedrichsen 1939: 94) suggests the translation “after the meal,” but this seems to be an unlikely rendering of the preposition ἐκ (ek).

3 For a narrative exegesis of 18:15–19:22, see Larsen 2001: 122–39. Larsen views Pilate as an archetypal tragic figure, in application of the work of Northrop Frye with further reference to Culpepper (1983) and Stibbe (1992; 1994). Keener (2003: 1097) proposes another chiasm for 18:29–19:16, with 19:1–3 (scourging and crown of thorns) at the center. On John’s Passover chronology, see Keener 2003: 1100–1103. Keener (2003: 1103) does not favor Blomberg’s and Carson’s harmonization and concludes that the Synoptics and John “at least imply (perhaps for theological reasons) the Passover on different days.” I have similar problems here with Keener’s reconstruction as with his view on the temple cleansing.

66 See the summary in Carson 1991: 623–24, and the fuller treatment in Beasley-Murray 1999: 355–58. For further discussion, see Barbet 1953; W. Edwards, Gabel, and Hosmer 1986; Sava 1960.

58 For a helpful chart summarizing people’s belief or lack thereof in the remainder of the Gospel, see Croteau 2002: 120 (on believing in John’s Gospel, see also Gaffney 1965; Melick 1976; and H. Koester 1989). In the first half of the narrative, negative responses predominate; the few instances of believing in the second half are all positive. This seems to support the notion, defended in the present commentary, that Jesus’ mission in John 1–12 is predominantly (though not exclusively) one of failure owing to people’s lack of believing response, while John 13–21 is taken up with Jesus’ focus on the nucleus of the new messianic community. Hence 1:12, as the pivot of the prologue, serves to encapsulate the entire scope of John’s presentation of people’s responses to the Messiah in terms of reception or rejection with the result of eternal life or judgment.

4 Gaventa (1996: 246–47), drawing on Torgovnick’s (1981) insights on closure, suggests that chapters 20 and 21 pursue different “strategies of closure.” According to Gaventa, chapter 20 structurally corresponds primarily to the prologue (cf., e.g., 20:17 with 1:10; 20:24–31 with 1:7, 13; and 20:28, 31 with 1:18), while chapter 21 recalls a number of scenes throughout the Gospel (cf., e.g., 21:24 with 1:6–8; 21:18–19 with 10:11; 21:15–23 with 13:36) (on the connections between the call narratives of chapters 1 and 21, see Franzmann and Klinger 1992). What is more, chapters 20 and 21 also differ in focus, with chapter 20 centering primarily on Jesus, and chapter 21 foregrounding (two select representatives of) the disciples. There is some truth in this, but oversimplifications should be avoided. John's narrative strategy is doubtless more complex than is often thought.

Gese, H. 49

Geva, H. 105n15

Giblin, C. H. 93, 93n17, 153, 328

9 See Schlatter 1948: 363–77. Note, for example, the references to a charcoal fire in 21:9 and 18:18 and to “drawing” in 21:8 and 12:32, as well as the links between 21:20; 13:23; 1:18 (see Ellis 1992: 18–19). See also the common elements between the good shepherd discourse in chapter 10 and Peter's commissioning in 21:15–19 (Cassian 1956–57: 132–36 [cited in Minear 1983: 95 n. 24]). Minear (1983: 96–97) further notes the appellation of Thomas as “the twin” in 20:24 and 11:16; the references to Nathanael in 21:2 and 1:45–51 and to Cana in chapters 2, 4, and 21; and several other terminological and thematic connections. Gaventa (1996: 245) notes the similarity between μετὰ ταῦτα (meta tauta, after these things) in 21:1 and 19:38. To this may be added the term “Sea of Tiberias” (21:1; cf. 6:1); Simon Peter “son of John” (21:15; cf. 1:42); Jesus' taking (λαμβάνω, lambanō) and distributing (δίδωμι, didōmi) bread (21:13; cf. 6:11 [close verbal parallels with 6:11, where Jesus' giving thanks is explicitly mentioned, may imply thanksgiving in 21:13]); the double ἀμὲν (amēn, truly) (21:18; cf., e.g., 1:51); the connection between Peter's and Jesus' death established by the evangelist's parenthetical comment (21:19; cf. 12:33); Jesus' call for his disciples to “follow” him (21:19, 22; cf. 1:43); and other verbal links, grammatical features, and thematic connections (Osborne 1981: 294). Spencer (1999) finds the following “narrative echoes” of earlier portions in John's narrative: (1) the feeding of the five thousand (ch. 6); (2) Peter's threefold denial (18:15–18, 25–27); (3) the footwashing and the final meal (13:3–5, 36–38); and (4) the good shepherd discourse (10:1–18). Note, however, that Spencer considers chapter 21 to be a “later redactional addition” (p. 68).

11 Carson (1991: 667) mentions one additional possible purpose of chapter 21: “The death of Peter and its relation in God's providence to the Evangelist's long life provide an opportunity to articulate at a practical level some implications of the sustained tension throughout the Gospel between the dominant inaugurated eschatology (congruent with the Evangelist's long life and therefore with the ‘delayed’ parousia) and the futurist eschatology of apocalyptic expectation.” See also Gaventa (1996), who conceives of 20:30–31 and chapter 21 as “dual” or “parallel” endings featuring an “archive of excess” (McCracken's term). Whereas McCracken (1994: 151) applies this solely to the concluding hyperbole in 21:25, Gaventa extends the notion of “excess” to the entire chapter, encompassing also the 153 fish, the breakfast prepared even before the fish are hauled ashore, the strength of the nets, Jesus' threefold question to Peter, and, of course, the boundless number of Jesus' deeds. Though chapters 20 and 21 may indeed constitute an instance of “double closure,” however, it may still be meaningful to speak of chapter 21 as an epilogue mirroring the prologue within the context of John's overall literary structure.

2 As always, undertaken at Jesus' initiative (Carson 1991: 668; cf. Morris 1995: 760). The term also occurs in 21:14, marking off 21:1–14 as the first of two scenes in this chapter (Gaventa 1996: 242).

15 See the Greek inscription (discovered in 1870) cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 29; cf. Geva, NEAEHL 2:744; Millard 1997: 243. See also m. Kelim 1.8; Josephus, Ant. 15.11.4 §417; J.W. 5.5.1 §193; 6.2.4 §125.

17 Giblin's treatment is perceptive, but rather than including 4:46–54 with 2:1–11; 7:2–14; and 11:1–44, it is preferable to treat 4:46–54 in conjunction with the Synoptic “request–rebuke–

Glasson, T. F. 194n104, 318n101
Godet, F. 475
Goldin, J. 159
Goodenough, E. R. 532n55
Goodman, M. 8n19
Goppelt, L. 509n41
Goulder, M. D. 120n15
Gourgues, M. 549n47

assistance” pattern, since the pericope does not involve a misunderstanding regarding Jesus’ “hour.” Notably, each of the three instances of the “suggestion–negative response–positive action” pattern begin or conclude a subsection of John’s Gospel, with 2:11 and 11:1–44 bracketing John’s account of Jesus’ seven signs as the first and last of these signs, and 7:2–14 beginning the second part of Jesus’ public ministry after the watershed mass defection at the end of chapter 6.

104 For a treatment of Moses as a character in the Fourth Gospel, see Harstine (2002: 40–75), who treats 1:17, 45; 3:14; 5:45–46; 6:32; 7:19, 22, 23; 9:28–29. According to Harstine, Moses’ dominant function throughout the narrative is as a witness to Jesus (p. 72), whereby Moses serves as a historical/legendary figure similar to Jacob (4:5, 12), David (7:42), and Abraham (8:33–58). On Moses in the Fourth Gospel, see also Glasson 1963; Meeks 1967; and Boismard 1993. Keener (2003: 662) observes how, on a literary level, the closing appeal to Moses in 5:45–47 prepares the way for chapter 6, where Jesus is presented as the new Moses providing God’s people with the new “bread from heaven.”

101 R. Brown (1966: 415, referring to Glasson) notes that after 3:30 (“He must increase, but I must decrease”), the references to the Baptist grow progressively shorter. However, this interesting observation should not be pressed too far.

55 The former is favored by Ha-Reubéni 1933; the latter by Hart 1952. Goodenough and Welles (1953) and Avi-Yonah (1964: 151) suggest acanthus.

19 See especially Alexander 1992 and Goodman 1992. For a fuller development and further bibliography, see Köstenberger forthcoming. For a critique of the Martyn/Brown-style “Johannine community” hypothesis, see Köstenberger 1998b: 200–210; Carson 1991: 35–36, 87–88, 369–72; and commentary at 9:22 below.

41 See Delling 1957: esp. 110–15; Goppelt, TDNT 6:149–53.

15 Though note Goulder (1991: 154), who contends that “the tone [in the present passage] sounds greasy,” and who adduces the parallel in Matt. 22:16, “a similarly insincere compliment, and one which led to a trap” (the second-century A.D. P.Eger. 2 links the present encounter with the question regarding paying tribute to Caesar in the Synoptics; see Bassler 1989: 636).

Goulder, too, thinks that Nicodemus’s portrayal in John’s Gospel is “solidly negative” (p. 153), noting that “all Nicodemus can manage is two crass questions (3.4, 9) which show that he is totally without spiritual insight; and Jesus says so (3.10)”; that “at 7.50f Nicodemus speaks up weakly to his fellow Pharisees ... but he is firmly snubbed, and does not stick to his point. ... He is no real Christian: he is ‘one of them’ (7.50)”; and finally, that at the burial Nicodemus brings a large amount of spices, but Jesus has already been anointed for burial (12:7), and the ointments will be laid aside at the resurrection (pp. 155–56).

47 Commentators have detected various types of symbolism in this scene. Bultmann (1971: 673), true to F. C. Baur, sees Mary as representative of Jewish Christianity, and the beloved disciple of

Gower, R. 138n12, 159
Grappe, C. 40n63, 41
Grayston, K. 435n67

Gentile Christianity, the latter being charged to honor the former as its “mother,” from whom it originated (cf. Brodie 1993: 549). Witherington (1995: 309) views these two characters as symbolic of a new Adam and Eve, who are obedient whereas the former were not. Carson (1991: 618, following M. Gourgues) suggests that Mary, on account of her faith in Christ, is now able metaphorically to become a mother to a new son supplied for her by Jesus (cf. Matt. 19:29; see also Witherington 1995: 310). Beasley-Murray (1999: 350, following Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278) sees Mary as representing that part of Israel that is willing to believe in Jesus as the Messiah. Refreshingly, and refusing to resort to symbolism or allegory, Morris (1995: 718) says the beloved disciple simply “provided her [Mary] with a roof” and took her under his care. Others focus on lessons (to be) learned by Mary, such as needing to “step back in submission to the law of life that the Father has set for her son” (Ridderbos 1997: 612) or to receive the gift of salvation that she desired to receive at the wedding in Cana (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278; Beasley-Murray 1999: 350; Borchert 2002: 269).

12 Jesus calls himself “the bridegroom” in Matt. 9:15 pars. For the role of the bridegroom’s friend, see Gower 1987: 64–66; Zimmermann and Zimmermann 1999. Joy was the overriding theme at Jewish weddings; the verb πληρόω (plēroō, fulfill, complete) is associated with joy throughout this Gospel (Carson 1991: 211–12; Barrett 1978: 223). The Baptist’s words χαρᾷ χαίρει (chara chairei, lit., rejoices with joy), a Hebraism (χαρᾷ is a cognate dative [Wallace 1996: 168–69]), serve to intensify the verb (Ridderbos 1997: 147 n. 132; Morris 1995: 213 n. 112).

63 Grappe (2000: 153–69) discusses 1:14–18 in light of Second Temple literature. He identifies the shekinah motif as the focal point of the passage, taking its point of departure from the revelation granted to Moses at Mount Sinai. For John, Jesus is the place where God’s presence, glory, grace, and truth are revealed. “By virtue of his unique nature, he is the one who transcends the most prestigious figures and institutions of the past” (p. 153).

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist

Green, J. B. 504n8, 543n12, 554n77
Grese, W. C. 127n39
Grigsby, B. H. 240n55, 241n60, 283n25
Grillmeier, A. 1, 2n3
Grotius, H. 248n9

(see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

8 See Matt. 26:36; Mark 14:32. See Green, DJG 265–68, esp. 267–68.

12 See Hengel 1977; Green, DJG 147–48; Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 263–64; D. Chapman 2000.

77 For a survey of funerary customs in antiquity and a discussion of the likely location of Jesus’ burial site, see Green, DJG 88–92.

39 He does so despite his doubt that Nicodemus can follow his explanation (3:12), but by this time the primary audience in John’s Gospel has shifted from Nicodemus to the readers (see the survey in Saayman 1995: 30–31). Grese (1988) maintains that 3:13–18 serves to explicate the references to “being born from above” in 3:3, 5, but this is doubtful, for by 3:13–18 the monologue has moved on to a christological plane, while 3:3, 5 stipulate the human requirement for entering God’s kingdom.

55 See, perhaps, 1 Sam. 7:6. Some rabbinic sources, which may or may not reach back to the first century, are Pesiq. Rab. 52.3–6; t. Sukkah 3.3–12. See Grigsby 1986.

60 See the material cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 78–79. See also Grigsby 1986.

25 The double imperative constitutes a Semitism (Barrett 1978: 358). Ridderbos (1997: 336) lists three reasons why the blind man was sent to Siloam: (1) to wash the mud out of his eyes; (2) to evoke the blind man’s faith; and (3) to carry out ritual purification (cf. Luke 7:14). Carson (1991: 365) adds (4) to correlate the Pharisees’ unbelief with a prophecy of judgment in Isa. 8:6 (though he rejects any prefiguration of baptism, contra Lindars [1972: 344], who sees the man’s bath as a “quasi-baptismal washing”; see also Ridderbos 1997: 337). Grigsby (1985) argues that the washing in the pool of Siloam constitutes a thematic anticipation of the Johannine cross.

3 On the Latin background, see Volting 2001: 11–59. See also the works referenced in J. N. Sanders 1943; Pollard 1970; Braun 1959; and Grillmeier 1975.

9 This was first suggested by J. Drusius (1595), followed by Hugo Grotius (1641) and J. A. Fabricius (1703–19) (see Petersen 1997: 217). M. Robinson (1998: 5) wrongly attributes to Petersen the view that the pericope of the adulterous woman “was circulating as part of John’s gospel in the mid-second century” (italics added). Apart from the fact that Petersen speaks of “the second half of the second century,” his actual conclusion is that “three constitutive elements of the pericope adulterae, as it is now known [sic] to us from the Gospel of John, were known in the second half of the second century” (1997: 207 [italics added]). Nowhere does he suggest that John’s Gospel was the source of the Protevangelium of James or that John’s Gospel already

Guhrt, J. 129

Gundry, R. H. 128n43, 426n23

Guthrie, D. 86n119

Guthrie, G. H. 444

Haas, N. 552

Haenchen, E. 22n14, 29n31, 34, 36, 42n68, 43n72, 598n12

contained the pericope in the mid-second century (and even if it did, this still would not prove that the pericope is original).

43 Gundry and Howell (1999: 24–39) argue that the Greek construction οὕτως ... ὥστε should not be taken to mean “this is how much ... so that,” denoting high degree and result, but rather “in this way ... and so,” construing οὕτως with what precedes and taking ὥστε independently. This reading is novel, but it is hard to see how ὥστε could introduce a main clause and be rendered “and so.” Also, these authors maintain that 3:16 is parallel to 3:14 (καθώς ... οὕτως, “just as ... so”), but the traditional rendering provides a much better parallelism (“so much ... so”) than the newly proposed one (“in this way ... and so”).

23 This is inadequately recognized by Gundry 1967: 68–72 (see the critique in Carson 1991: 488–89).

119 This corresponds to the threefold division suggested by D. Guthrie (1981: 285–87): origin, authority, and exaltation (cited in Ham 1998: 78). For a bibliographic note, see Köstenberger 1998b: 50–51 n. 26. For a basic survey and relevant literature, see Ham 1998.

14 Haenchen (1984: 1.117) holds that 1:6–8 represents a rather clumsy insertion into the original hymn. Bultmann (1971: 49) believes that the material is inserted to counter veneration of John the Baptist (cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.249–50). Ridderbos (1997: 42) ardently defends the prologue’s unity. Moloney (1998: 37) notes that 1:6–8 is essential to the prologue in its current form.

31 So the majority of commentators, including Morris 1995: 66; Carson 1991: 137; Haenchen 1984: 1.113–14; Schnackenburg 1970: 1.239–40; Barrett 1978: 156–57; and Schlatter 1948: 5–6. Among the translations that construe ὁ γέγονεν with what precedes are the NASB, NIV, NKJV, ISV, NLT, HCSB, ESV, and TNIV.

68 R. Brown (1966: 13) contends that “us” refers to humanity, and “we” to the apostolic witness (contra Barrett 1978: 166); Haenchen (1984: 1.119) takes “we” as a reference to the Christian community. Bultmann (1971: 69) unduly dichotomizes and dehistoricizes when he takes “seeing” as the unhistorical sight of faith.

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’ ” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick

Hahn, H. C. 129n46
Ham, C. 86, 86n119
Hambly, W. F. 53
Hamilton, J. 438n77
Hanhart, K. 80n89
Hanson, A. T. 315n84, 331n39, 333n53, 344n114

[1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

12 This is illustrated by the following passages: Epictetus, Diatribai 3.26.22; Seneca, Ad Marciam de consolatione 20.3; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 7.69; Tertullian, De pudicitia 22 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 194). See Bauer (1925: 232) and Haenchen (1984: 2.226–27), who also note passages in Artemidorus and Plautus; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Hengel 1977: esp. chapter 4.

46 Later significant uses of this term in John (some of which reveal Jesus’ commitment to keep his own from perishing) include 6:39; 10:28; 12:25; 17:12; 18:9 (cf. 3:36; 8:21, 24). See Hahn, NIDNTT 1:462–65; Morris 1965b: 146–49.

119 This corresponds to the threefold division suggested by D. Guthrie (1981: 285–87): origin, authority, and exaltation (cited in Ham 1998: 78). For a bibliographic note, see Köstenberger 1998b: 50–51 n. 26. For a basic survey and relevant literature, see Ham 1998.

77 D. M. Smith (1999: 274–75) notes that “you” here is plural, which leads him to infer that the statement does not necessarily refer to personal indwelling. In principle, this is true, but the statement could just as well be plural because Jesus is speaking to a group of followers (rather than a single person), not because reference is made to communal as opposed to individual indwelling. Despite the plural “you,” the latter scenario seems more likely (note, e.g., the singular pronoun construction καὶ ἐῖς [akeinos, and that one] in 14:12, and compare the Pauline teaching on the Spirit’s indwelling of individual believers). On some of the systematic-theological issues raised by the present verse, see Hamilton (2003), who takes the passage as a point of departure for arguing that OT believers were regenerated but not indwelt by the Spirit.

89 The identification of Nathanael with Bartholomew is favored by Ridderbos 1997: 87–88; Morris 1995: 143; Carson 1991: 159; Burge 2000: 77; contra Barrett 1978: 184; R. Brown 1966: 82; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.314. Barrett (1978: 179, 184) conjectures that the meaning of the name “Nathanael,” “God has given,” indicates that he represents an “ideal disciple” and that the passage should be interpreted allegorically. Somewhat along similar lines, Witherington (1995: 71) suggests that Nathanael’s name implies that the disciples are the Father’s gift to Jesus. It seems, however, that these kinds of conjectures leave the realm of well-founded exegesis and veer into the sphere of ultimately unverifiable speculation (see the critiques by Morris [1995: 143] and Carson [1991: 159], both of whom defend Nathanael’s and the event’s historicity). Hanhart (1970: 24–25) identifies Nathanael as Matthew; Hill (1997) somewhat cautiously advances the theory that Nathanael is identical with James of Alphaeus (cf. Epistle to the Apostles 2 [second century A.D.]).

84 See b. Abod. Zar. 5a. For a variation of the first view, see Jungkuntz 1964; Schnackenburg

Ha-Reubéni, E. 532n55
Harnack, A. von 19n2
Harner, P. 28n27
Harris, E. 19n4, 50n97, 50n98

1990: 2.311; Morris 1995: 467; Beasley-Murray 1999: 176–77. The second position is held by Emerton 1960; 1966. For a variation of the third view, see Hanson 1964–65; 1967. See further Oepke, TDNT 4:1022–32, 1054–55. Most major commentators seem to favor the third view as well (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 373; Carson 1991: 398; Barrett 1978: 384; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311).

39 Hanson (1973) suggests that Job 14 lies behind John’s narrative. Other LXX references featuring the term are Judg. 16:14, 20; 1 Kings 3:15.

53 See Lev. Rab. 18.1 on Lev. 15:1; cf. Eccles. Rab. 12.6 (universally cited by commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 393; Carson 1991: 411; Morris 1995: 485). Cf. m. Yebam. 16.3; Semahot 8, rule 1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 109). See also Hanson 1973. Keener (2003: 841 n. 63, citing Michaels 1984: 190) cautions, however, that the belief that the soul left the body three days after death is not widely attested in the early period.

114 Hunter (1985: 59–60) suggests that the past tense ἤκουσας (ēkousas, you heard) be taken as a reference to “a previous (private) personal prayer offered by Jesus on behalf of his friend.” An OT antecedent to Jesus’ prayer here is that of Elijah: “Answer me, O Lord, answer me, so these people will know that you, O Lord, are God” (1 Kings 18:37; cf. Ps. 118:21; 121:1; 123:1). Cf. John 6:5; 17:1; Mark 7:34; Luke 18:13; Acts 7:55. See also Matt. 11:25; John 6:11. Hunter (1985: 62–70, citing J. M. Robinson 1964: 194–225) notes the similarity in form with Jewish prayers of thanksgiving (hodayot). Hanson (1973: 254) and Wilcox (1977: 130) contend that 11:41 is actually a quotation of Ps. 118:21a (see the discussion in Hunter 1985: 68); Wilcox (1977: 131) further argues that Ps. 118:22 also resonates in the present passage via the “stone” motif.

55 The former is favored by Ha-Reubéni 1933; the latter by Hart 1952. Goodenough and Welles (1953) and Avi-Yonah (1964: 151) suggest acanthus.

2 This is why the prologue has also been called the “proleptic quintessence” (Harnack 1892: 191), a “microcosm” (Valentine 1996), and an “adumbration” (Booser 1998: 13) of the entire Gospel (cited in MacLeod 2003: 48 n. 1).

27 See Hartley 1999 for an interaction with the arguments by Jehovah’s Witnesses against Jesus’ deity from 1:1c. Hartley first surveys the history of the debate, starting with Colwell (1933: 12–21), followed by contributions by Harner (1973: 75–87), P. Dixon (1975), and Hartley himself (1996). Hartley concludes that “the Word was theos (1:1c) in every sense the Father was ton theon (1:1b), rather than a god in a particular sense the Father was not” (1999: 1, summarizing 1996). See also MacLeod 2003: 59–60; and Keener 2003: 372–74, who points to the anarthrous instances of θεός designating God the Father later in the prologue (1:6, 12, 13, 18) and the articular use of θεός with reference to Jesus in 20:28 (p. 373).

4 Culpepper (1980–81: 1) quotes Barrett (1971: 27): “The Prologue is ... one piece of solid theological writing. The evangelist wrote it all” (cf. Barrett 1975a: 20–35). Keener (2003: 333–34) maintains that the prologue is an original part of the Gospel, probably added by the author (the apostle John) after completing the first draft of the Gospel. According to Keener (2003: 333–34), ancient writers commonly introduced the main themes at the beginning of their work (see Keener 2003: 334 n. 10 for examples). Bultmann believed that the prologue originated as a pre-Christian gnostic hymn that stemmed from Baptist circles and was taken over and adapted by the Fourth Evangelist (Bultmann 1923: 4; summarized by Ashton 1986: 161). Valentine (1996), in contrast to many other Johannine scholars, argues that the prologue is an organic part of the book, a genuine preface intended to preview important theological themes, rather than a mere afterthought or postscript written after the body of the Gospel had been completed. E. Harris (1994: 26) contends that the prologue “was from the first the construction of the evangelist himself.” See the survey in MacLeod 2003: 49–52.

97 See also E. Harris (1994: 109, 115), who suggests the rendering “has communicated divine things,” viewing the verb as a technical term describing the actions of religious figures in disclosing divine truth.

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

1 Stibbe (1994: 39) calls the function of the present pericope “crucial” and “pivotal.” Various attempts have been made to isolate sources underlying the existing narrative, but as Dodd (1963:

230 [cited in M. Harris 1986: 311]) points out, “Nowhere perhaps, in this gospel, have attempts to analyse out a written source, or sources, proved less convincing, and if the evangelist is following a traditional story of fixed pattern, he has covered his tracks.” This observation also holds true for the attempts by Burkett (1994: 209–32) to isolate two previous accounts of Lazarus’s resurrection that allegedly have been combined into one in John 11.

2 Though see the reference to “all the miracles” that the people of Jerusalem had seen in Luke 19:37 (noted by Ridderbos 1997: 383; R. Brown 1966: 429). For a defense of the historicity of the raising of Lazarus, see M. Harris 1986: 310–15. See also Morris (1995: 474–76), who, arguing for the historicity of the raising of Lazarus, presents several lines of reasoning: (1) the impressive amount of detail given, including names and geographical references; (2) Peter’s absence from the Johannine narrative in 7:1–13:6 (cf. Matt. 19:27–26:33; Mark 10:28–11:21; Luke 18:28–22:8), which may account, at least in part, for the omission of the raising of Lazarus in Mark and Matthew; and (3) all the Jerusalem miracles are excluded from the Synoptic tradition, and Jerusalem itself is excluded, with the exception of the final week. Keener (2003: 836) conjectures that Mark may have “suppressed” (an infelicitous word choice) the Lazarus story to protect Lazarus and his sisters, who still lived near Jerusalem at the time of publication. Keener (2003: 837) also observes that the account of Jesus’ raising of Lazarus is critical for John’s plot development (the Lazarus account is at the heart of John’s message: Jesus dies most immediately because he has given life to a disciple [11:14–16; cf. 3:16–17]); it constitutes the longest single sign account in the Fourth Gospel; and, apart from the passion narrative, it represents the longest narrative without a substantial discourse section.

5 In all four Gospels combined there are only three such events: the raising of Jairus’s daughter (Mark 5:22–24, 38–42 pars.); the raising of the widow’s son at Nain (Luke 7:11–15); and the raising of Lazarus (John 11:1–44) (M. Harris 1986).

9 M. Harris (1986: 311) divides the text as follows: setting (11:1–6); complication (11:7–37); and resolution (11:38–44). However, this does not adequately recognize the geographical movement from the location outside Judea where Jesus hears of Lazarus’s condition (11:1–16), to his arrival in Bethany (11:17–37), to his arrival at Lazarus’s tomb (11:38–44) (see Stibbe 1994: 41). According to Stibbe (1994: 43–44), the evangelist has arranged his material “in five sections using the technique of inverted parallelism or chiasmus” (11:1–16, 17–22, 23–27, 28–32, 33–44), with the “I am” saying in the center (11:25–26). Stibbe (1994: 41–42) notes that of all the Johannine signs, only the Lazarus narrative has the miracle at the end, “as the grand finale of the story” (p. 42). The initial stance of Jesus in every instance is “outside”: outside Judea; outside Bethany; outside the tomb (p. 43). The two main protagonists, Jesus and Lazarus, are far apart at the beginning and reunited at the end. Jesus is portrayed in his elusiveness and his humanity, and as the one who performs in his here-and-now ministry a function (raising the dead) reserved in traditional Jewish thought for God himself, even using the divine name (11:25) (Stibbe 1994: 44–45). Other ingredients of the present narrative are delay and misunderstanding.

9 See M. Harris 1992: 284–86; Ridderbos 1997: 648. On 20:28, see M. Harris 1992: 105–29. For a defense of the historicity of the present pericope, see Carson 1991: 657–58; M. Harris 1992: 111–19.

20 For a more thorough discussion, see E. Miller (1993: 448–49), who lists as many as nine different theories: (1) the OT dbr; (2) Wisdom (R. Harris 1917); (3) Greek philosophy (Stoicism); (4) Philo (Evans 1993: 100–145; Tobin 1990); (5) the Aramaic mmr (Hayward

Harrison, R. H. 45n80, 360
Harstine, S. 5n10, 194n104
Hart, H. J. 532n54, 532n55
Hartley, D. E. 28n27

1978); (6) rabbinic speculation on the Torah; (7) gnostic sources, such as the Hermetic literature, especially Poimandres (Pagels 1999); (8) the Hellenistic-gnostic redeemer myth, Mandeans, and the Odes of Solomon (Bultmann 1923; 1973; 1971); and (9) the breaking of divine silence (Jeremias). Some, such as Epp (1975), combine two or more of the above (in Epp's case, Wisdom and Torah). Miller himself (1993: 452), building on his earlier work (1989), advances the thesis that the uses of λόγος in the Gospel proper, while not a christological title, are invested "with a certain christological transparency" (B. Reicke's term). Thus, startlingly, Miller, who believes that the prologue was written not only after the Gospel proper, but even after John's first epistle, finds the origin of the prologue's λόγος in the Fourth Gospel itself: "The one of whom it was said in John 7:46, 'Never has a man spoken like this!' eventually came to be called, appropriately, 'the Word.'" I find this thesis entirely unconvincing (Miller [1999] attempts to make the same case for ἀρχή). It is quite a tour de force to brush aside the massive OT substructure pervading the entire prologue. Not surprisingly, Miller's thesis has found few followers.

80 See Harrison, BEB 1:791. For a different kind of argument from chronological priority, see 1 Tim. 2:13.

10 See Köstenberger 1999a: 30–31. There has been a virtual avalanche of literary explorations of Johannine themes or specific Johannine portions of text pouring from the presses in the last two decades. Among those are Culpepper 1983; Duke 1985; Staley 1988; M. Davies 1992; Stibbe 1992; 1994; Lee 1994; Tovey 1997; Beck 1997; Conway 1999; and Harstine 2002, to list but a few.

104 For a treatment of Moses as a character in the Fourth Gospel, see Harstine (2002: 40–75), who treats 1:17, 45; 3:14; 5:45–46; 6:32; 7:19, 22, 23; 9:28–29. According to Harstine, Moses' dominant function throughout the narrative is as a witness to Jesus (p. 72), whereby Moses serves as a historical/legendary figure similar to Jacob (4:5, 12), David (7:42), and Abraham (8:33–58). On Moses in the Fourth Gospel, see also Glasson 1963; Meeks 1967; and Boismard 1993. Keener (2003: 662) observes how, on a literary level, the closing appeal to Moses in 5:45–47 prepares the way for chapter 6, where Jesus is presented as the new Moses providing God's people with the new "bread from heaven."

54 The crown is also reminiscent of depictions of oriental kings who were worshiped as gods (Hart 1952: esp. 71–74).

55 The former is favored by Ha-Reubéni 1933; the latter by Hart 1952. Goodenough and Welles (1953) and Avi-Yonah (1964: 151) suggest acanthus.

27 See Hartley 1999 for an interaction with the arguments by Jehovah's Witnesses against Jesus' deity from 1:1c. Hartley first surveys the history of the debate, starting with Colwell (1933: 12–21), followed by contributions by Harner (1973: 75–87), P. Dixon (1975), and Hartley himself (1996). Hartley concludes that "the Word was theos (1:1c) in every sense the Father was ton theon (1:1b), rather than a god in a particular sense the Father was not" (1999: 1, summarizing 1996). See also MacLeod 2003: 59–60; and Keener 2003: 372–74, who points to the anarthrous instances of θεός designating God the Father later in the prologue (1:6, 12, 13, 18) and the articular use of θεός with reference to Jesus in 20:28 (p. 373).

Hatina, T. R. 574n16, 574n17, 575n18
Hauck, F. 407n36, 500n84
Hawthorne, G. F. 38, 85n113

16 The critique by Hatina (1993), who says that the reference is to the indwelling Paraclete, fails to convince. Contrary to the view of many commentators, the present pericope does not constitute the Johannine equivalent to Pentecost (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1038; Barrett [1978: 570], who says that the present passage cannot be harmonized with Acts 2; Bultmann 1971: 691), nor is Calvin's (1961: 205) proposal satisfactory that at 20:22 the disciples "were only sprinkled with His grace and not [as at Pentecost] saturated with full power." Beasley-Murray (1999: 382 [followed by Borchert 2002: 307–8]) believes that John telescoped the giving of the Spirit without concern for chronology (citing the reference to the ascension in 20:17 as a parallel). M. Turner (1977) thinks that the reference is not to the Spirit at all but to Jesus' message as Spirit and life. The treatment by Moloney (1998: 532, 535) is rather idiosyncratic. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.325), too, surprisingly contends that the Johannine instance involves all believers, while the events in Acts 2 pertain to the apostles. If anything, one might have expected the opposite kind of reasoning, with John's account anticipating the general outpouring narrated in Acts 2. Against the view of Burge (2000: 558 [cf. Burge 1987: 148–49]), who notes the connection between the present passage and Jesus' promise to send the Spirit in John 14 and 16, the present event does not mark the actual fulfillment of these promises other than by way of anticipatory sign. Keener's (2003: 1196–1200, see also 1204–6) discussion, including an attempted refutation of M. Turner (1998), remains inconclusive and, on the whole, fails to convince.

17 See 7:39; 14:12, 16–18, 25–26; 16:12–15; cf. 20:17. Luke's account of Pentecost hardly reads as though Acts 2 represents merely "one of several additional empowerings of the Spirit," as Hatina (1993: 201) alleges. Talbert (1992: 252) concludes from 20:22 that Jesus must have ascended by then because otherwise, according to 7:39, he could not yet have given the Spirit. But this presupposes that the Spirit was in fact imparted at 20:22. If not, there is no need to suppose that Jesus had already ascended by then.

18 In 20:26, the doors are still locked (as prior to 20:22 in 20:19), presumably still "for fear of the Jewish leaders"; in 21:3, Peter decides to go fishing and is joined by six others, but they catch nothing. Hatina's (1993: 200) argument that the latter may have been "an atypical circumstance" fails to convince, as does his claim that Peter's threefold confession of love suggests reception of the Spirit (cf. Peter's earlier offer in 13:37 to lay down his life for Jesus).

36 Relevant instances of λούω in Scripture (LXX and NT) include Lev. 14:9; 15:11; 16:4; 17:16; Num. 19:7; Deut. 23:12; Acts 9:37; Heb. 10:22. Note especially Lev. 15:11, where νίπτω and λούω are found side by side. The word νίπτω occurs elsewhere in the NT for washing one's face (Matt. 6:17), hands (Matt. 15:2; Mark 7:3), eyes (John 9:7, 11, 15), and feet (John 13:5, 6, 8, 10, 12, 14; 1 Tim. 5:10). On the distinction in meaning between λούω and νίπτω, see Thomas 1991a: 51 n. 25; Oepke, TDNT 4:305; Hauck, TDNT 4:947.

84 For example, Gen. Rab. 1.10; 2.5; Lev. Rab. 25.3; Num. Rab. 12.6; Deut. Rab. 10.2; As. Mos. 1:13–14. For further Jewish references, see Hauck, TDNT 3:620–21. A suggestive parallel is found in Odes Sol. 41:15, where the Messiah is said to have been "known before the foundations of the world, that he might give life to persons forever by the truth of his name." Compare 17:6 with 17:26. Note also the strong affinity between 17:24–26 and 1 John 3:2.

113 See the surveys in Hawthorne, DJG 7–8; Moloney 1978: 1–22; Culpepper 1993: 57–101 (on 1:51, see pp. 61–63). See also Köstenberger 2002c: 22.

Hayward, C. T. R. 26n20
Heard, W. J. 107, 232n20
Heil, J. P. 246n4
Heine, R. E. 249
Henderson, A. 329n31
Hendriksen, W. 111n36
Hengel, M. xii, 3, 7n17, 18n30, 56n2, 91n6, 107, 146n17, 146n18, 147n19, 153n40, 177,

20 For a more thorough discussion, see E. Miller (1993: 448–49), who lists as many as nine different theories: (1) the OT δβρ; (2) Wisdom (R. Harris 1917); (3) Greek philosophy (Stoicism); (4) Philo (Evans 1993: 100–145; Tobin 1990); (5) the Aramaic mmr (Hayward 1978); (6) rabbinic speculation on the Torah; (7) gnostic sources, such as the Hermetic literature, especially Poimandres (Pagels 1999); (8) the Hellenistic-gnostic redeemer myth, Mandeans, and the Odes of Solomon (Bultmann 1923; 1973; 1971); and (9) the breaking of divine silence (Jeremias). Some, such as Epp (1975), combine two or more of the above (in Epp’s case, Wisdom and Torah). Miller himself (1993: 452), building on his earlier work (1989), advances the thesis that the uses of λόγος in the Gospel proper, while not a christological title, are invested “with a certain christological transparency” (B. Reicke’s term). Thus, startlingly, Miller, who believes that the prologue was written not only after the Gospel proper, but even after John’s first epistle, finds the origin of the prologue’s λόγος in the Fourth Gospel itself: “The one of whom it was said in John 7:46, ‘Never has a man spoken like this!’ eventually came to be called, appropriately, ‘the Word.’ ” I find this thesis entirely unconvincing (Miller [1999] attempts to make the same case for ἀρχή). It is quite a tour de force to brush aside the massive OT substructure pervading the entire prologue. Not surprisingly, Miller’s thesis has found few followers.

20 See the list in Köstenberger 2002c: 74. For a general survey, see Heard, DJG 688–98.

4 In my judgment, not even Wallace’s (1993: 291–93) attempted refutation of Heil (1991) succeeds in completely enlisting the internal lexical and syntactical evidence in favor of non-Johannine authorship, though many of his individual points are well taken (Metzger [1994: 188 n. 3] calls Wallace’s refutation of Heil a “convincing rebuttal”).

31 Stibbe (1994: 51) paraphrases as follows: “I can return to Judea because the hour for my death (the hour of darkness) is not quite upon us. I will therefore not be killed (‘stumble’) at Bethany because I am still ministering in a season of pre-ordained security (daylight).” The saying is not without Jewish parallels (e.g., b. Sanh. 38b). Pollard (1973: 438, following Henderson 1920–21) somewhat implausibly suggests that the present statement indicates that Jesus “waited for light,” that is, divine guidance, and hence the delay. But see the critique in Moule 1975: 118–20.

36 Cf. Carson 1991: 177; 1984: 441; Morris 1995: 167; Laney 1992: 70; Westcott 1908: 1.96–97; Calvin 1959: 51; Köstenberger 1999a: 76–78. Carson (1991: 177, referring to Morris) notes that virtually all of John 1–5 (except for the sections on John the Baptist) is non-Synoptic material. Morris (1995: 167 n. 55) states that “there are practically no resemblances between the two narratives, apart from the central act”; only five words are shared. Other commentators holding this view are Luther, W. Hendriksen, and R. V. G. Tasker (Kreitzer 1998: 94).

17 One tricky piece of evidence concerns the second-century writer Papias (cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.4–5), a contemporary of Polycarp, who, in turn, was a disciple of the apostle John (on the date of Papias, see Yarbrough 1983; Munck 1959). Papias (at least to Eusebius) seems to refer to two separate Johns, the apostle and a “John the elder.” On this basis some have conjectured that the latter, rather than the former, wrote the Fourth Gospel. However, there is no need to drive a wedge between the two references to John in the passage in question. To the contrary, John may be designated “the elder” in the latter part of the quotation precisely because he is grouped with the elders mentioned earlier in the same passage. For a sound critique of the “John the elder” hypothesis, see Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 141–43. Keener (2003: 95–98) likewise challenges the reliability of Eusebius’s interpretation of Papias, owing to the former’s agenda of seeking to denigrate the Apocalypse. Keener (2003: 102–3) also includes an insightful discussion of the plausibility of John writing the Gospel at an advanced age. See also the works cited in Bauckham 1993: 27 n. 17 and the important essay by Hill (1998), who adduces from Eusebius’s (Hist. eccl. 3.24.5–13, esp. 11) reference to Papias (without naming him) that Papias held John the apostle to be the author of the Fourth Gospel (contra Bauckham 1993; Hengel 1989a; note my review of Hengel’s more extensive 1993 German monograph on the subject, Köstenberger 1996). For studies of the external evidence regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, see Bauckham 1993: 24 n. 1.

30 See the brief treatments in Köstenberger 1999a: 36–37, 198–200. Stuhlmacher (2002: 185–87) contends that John and the Synoptics do not merely represent different perspectives (what M. Hengel calls “aspective”), but that the Fourth Gospel “cultivates a[n] ... idealized type of memory concerning Jesus.” He urges, “The Johannine witness therefore needs to be consistently realigned with the Synoptics, the Pauline corpus and the OT, so that faith in Jesus Christ does not lose its historical roots” (p. 187). This, however, seems to be merely an oblique way of saying that John’s Gospel is historically unreliable and that there are real contradictions between John and the Synoptics (cf. Stuhlmacher’s more blunt statement in 1997: 287 [cited in Köstenberger 2002a: 144 n. 3]). I, of course, deny both accusations.

2 See Hoehner (1977: 31–37) and Messner (1998), with reference to the Roman historians Tacitus (Annales 4 §4) and Suetonius (Tiberius 73), both of whom date the beginning of Tiberius’s reign at A.D. 14 (the precise date is August 19, the day of Emperor Augustus’s death); see also commentary at 2:20–21. It is unclear why Hengel (1999: 322) dates Tiberius’s fifteenth year to ca. A.D. 27/28.

6 Some in John’s Ephesian audience may also have read the present account in light of the myth of Dionysus, the Greek god of wine and most popular deity in the Hellenistic world (Hengel 1995).

17 See Hengel 1999: 299–300; contra Albright 1956: 160.

18 “A city in Samaria” in Acts 8:5 may refer to Sychar as well (see Hengel 1999: 301).

19 Hengel 1999: 302, referring to Dalman.

40 Some interpreters (such as Lindars [1972: 186]) argue that “five men/husbands” alludes to a tradition cited in Josephus, according to which the Samaritans had five gods (Ant. 9.14.3 §288; cf. 2 Kings 17:24, 30–31), just as “five colonnades” in 5:2 is taken to refer to the Jewish Pentateuch (Hengel 1999: 307, 315). As Blomberg (1995: 8 [cf. Schlatter 1948: 122]) points out, however, in reality the text lists seven gods of five nations (but see Prest 1992: 368; see also the discussion in C. Koester 1990b: 675–77).

14 The existence of these pools, if not the name “Bethesda,” may be attested by the Copper Scroll from Qumran (3Q15), which dates from between A.D. 35 and 65. See Hengel 1999: 309–10; Küchler 1999: 382, with further references.

15 The northern, smaller pool may go back to monarchical times; the southern pool may be that established in the second century B.C. by Simon the high priest (Sir. 50:3). For ancient sources, see Hengel 1999: 310. The site favored by most scholars is located under the monastery of St. Anne in the northeast quarter of the Old City. See Jeremias 1966b; Vardaman 1963: 28.

Regarding the archaeological identification of Bethesda, see Wieand 1965–66: 396–400. The existence of the five porticoes is disputed by Broer (2001).

16 Some argue that “five” colonnades is also symbolic of the five books of Moses, the Pentateuch (see commentary at 4:18; cf. Hengel 1999: 315). Küchler (1999: 381–82) denies the historical existence of the five colonnades altogether and interprets the reference as exclusively allegorical.

17 See Barrett 1978: 252–53; Hengel 1999: 313, with further references in n. 74. On John’s translation of Aramaic or Hebrew terms, see commentary at 1:38. “Aramaic” for the Greek Ἑβραϊστί is favored by Carson 1991: 242; Ridderbos 1997: 185; Barrett 1978: 253; Witherington 1995: 137; Burge 2000: 173. R. Brown (1966: 206) says that the term “is used loosely, often for names that are Aramaic.” See also additional note.

20 Mackowski (1980: 81–83) even believes that behind 5:2–9 is the story of a pagan sanctuary that he believes to have been an Asclepieum; but this is categorically ruled out by Hengel (1999: 313), who nonetheless points to the significance of the Asclepius cult for John’s Asia Minor audience (p. 315, referring also to a work by K. H. Rengstorff in n. 84). See also the ancient and bibliographic references cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 266–67.

109 Hengel (1999: 309) comments, “One should by all means read ‘Bethesda’”; so also Carson 1991: 241; Morris 1995: 267; Witherington 1995: 137; Borchert 1996: 231; Moloney 1998: 171; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94; Schlatter 1948: 142; undecided are Ridderbos 1997: 185; R. Brown 1966: 206–7.

10 Later, Judas is called a thief (12:6), and Barabbas a robber (18:40; cf. Mark 15:7). At his arrest, Jesus asks why he is treated like a robber (Matt. 26:55 pars.), and in the end he is crucified with robbers on either side (Matt. 27:38, 44 pars.). The majority of commentators take both terms as referring to the same people (Ridderbos 1997: 354; Carson 1991: 381; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.281; contra Barrett 1978: 369). See further Hengel 1989a: 24–46; Simonis 1967: 101–3.

61 Cf. 18:18: “it was cold.” If so, he is referring to the Jews’ “chilling response” to Jesus (Hengel 1999: 319). See also Borchert 1996: 337. Contra Ridderbos 1997: 368; Carson 1991: 391–92. Stibbe (1993: 116) comments that the “sense of impending doom in 10.1–21 is heightened by the atmospheric statement of the narrator in v. 22.” Bultmann (1971: 361) suggests that the reference to the season serves to indicate that “the end is near,” as the “seasons of the year reflect the progress of the revelation.”

132 For further information on the Sanhedrin, see Schürer 1973–79: 2.199–226; Lohse, TDNT 7:861–71. Hengel (1999: 330) questions whether the Sanhedrin had seventy members in Jesus’ day, as is frequently alleged; he favors instead the view that the composition of the council depended on the particular ruling high priest, especially in the period between A.D. 6 and 41.

9 On John’s portrayal of Annas and Caiaphas his son-in-law, see Hengel 1999: 322–34.

21 Barrett 1978: 533–35; Morris 1995: 695–97; Hengel 1999: 330; Winter 1974. See especially the references in Josephus (J.W. 2.8.1 §117; Ant. 20.9.1 §§197–203 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 164]). Cf. the acknowledgment in talmudic literature that the Jews had lost this power “forty years” before the destruction of Jerusalem (y. Sanh. 1.1; 7.2; on “forty years,” see

Hepper, F. N. 555
Hiers, R. H. 107
Higgins, A. J. B. 537n83
Hill, C. E. 7n17, 80, 80n89

commentary at 18:24 above; loss of this power may have occurred as early as A.D. 6; see also Legasse 1997: 54–56).

12 See Hengel 1977; Green, DJG 147–48; Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 263–64; D. Chapman 2000.

12 This is illustrated by the following passages: Epictetus, Diatribai 3.26.22; Seneca, Ad Marciam de consolatione 20.3; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 7.69; Tertullian, De pudicitia 22 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 194). See Bauer (1925: 232) and Haenchen (1984: 2.226–27), who also note passages in Artemidorus and Plautus; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Hengel 1977: esp. chapter 4.

83 Cf. Did. 8:1; Mart. Pol. 7:1. See Torrey 1931 (including his critique of Str-B 2:834–85 on pp. 235–36); Higgins 1954–55: 206–9; Story 1989: 318; Blomberg 1987: 177–78; Morris 1995: 708; Ridderbos 1997: 606.

17 One tricky piece of evidence concerns the second-century writer Papias (cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.4–5), a contemporary of Polycarp, who, in turn, was a disciple of the apostle John (on the date of Papias, see Yarbrough 1983; Munck 1959). Papias (at least to Eusebius) seems to refer to two separate Johns, the apostle and a “John the elder.” On this basis some have conjectured that the latter, rather than the former, wrote the Fourth Gospel. However, there is no need to drive a wedge between the two references to John in the passage in question. To the contrary, John may be designated “the elder” in the latter part of the quotation precisely because he is grouped with the elders mentioned earlier in the same passage. For a sound critique of the “John the elder” hypothesis, see Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 141–43. Keener (2003: 95–98) likewise challenges the reliability of Eusebius’s interpretation of Papias, owing to the former’s agenda of seeking to denigrate the Apocalypse. Keener (2003: 102–3) also includes an insightful discussion of the plausibility of John writing the Gospel at an advanced age. See also the works cited in Bauckham 1993: 27 n. 17 and the important essay by Hill (1998), who adduces from Eusebius’s (Hist. eccl. 3.24.5–13, esp. 11) reference to Papias (without naming him) that Papias held John the apostle to be the author of the Fourth Gospel (contra Bauckham 1993; Hengel 1989a; note my review of Hengel’s more extensive 1993 German monograph on the subject, Köstenberger 1996). For studies of the external evidence regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, see Bauckham 1993: 24 n. 1.

89 The identification of Nathanael with Bartholomew is favored by Ridderbos 1997: 87–88; Morris 1995: 143; Carson 1991: 159; Burge 2000: 77; contra Barrett 1978: 184; R. Brown 1966: 82; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.314. Barrett (1978: 179, 184) conjectures that the meaning of the name “Nathanael,” “God has given,” indicates that he represents an “ideal disciple” and that the passage should be interpreted allegorically. Somewhat along similar lines, Witherington (1995: 71) suggests that Nathanael’s name implies that the disciples are the Father’s gift to Jesus. It seems, however, that these kinds of conjectures leave the realm of well-founded exegesis and veer into the sphere of ultimately unverifiable speculation (see the critiques by Morris [1995: 143] and Carson [1991: 159], both of whom defend Nathanael’s and the event’s historicity). Hanhart (1970: 24–25) identifies Nathanael as Matthew; Hill (1997) somewhat cautiously advances the theory that Nathanael is identical with James of Alphaeus (cf. Epistle to the

Hirsch, E. D., Jr. 4n8

Hodges, Z. 190, 240n57, 241n59

Hoehner, H. W. 11n22, 55n2, 72n56, 104, 109n29, 169, 354, 368n5, 400n1, 524n12, Apostles 2 [second century A.D.]).

8 The classic work is Hirsch 1967. Considerably more sophisticated is the recent work by Vanhoozer (1998), whose defense of authorially intended textual meaning is all the more to be taken seriously as Vanhoozer is keenly aware of, and sensitive to, the role of the reader in biblical interpretation, without, however, absolutizing it (cf. Vanhoozer 1995; see also the penetrating collection of essays in Vanhoozer 2002 and the following note).

57 Isa. 12:3; 44:3; 49:10; Ezek. 36:25–27; 47:1; Joel 3:18; Amos 9:11–15; Zech. 13:1. Ezekiel 47:1–11 is favored by Hodges (1979b) and Knapp (1997: 116–17).

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee’s observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus “from within him” refers to “whoever believes in me.” Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of “rivers of living water” (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987: 88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

22 There are two main possibilities for the dating of Jesus’ ministry, A.D. 26–30 or 29–33, with the latter set of dates to be preferred (see Hoehner 1977; Hoehner, DJG 118–22).

2 See Hoehner (1977: 31–37) and Messner (1998), with reference to the Roman historians Tacitus (Annales 4 §4) and Suetonius (Tiberius 73), both of whom date the beginning of Tiberius’s reign at A.D. 14 (the precise date is August 19, the day of Emperor Augustus’s death); see also commentary at 2:20–21. It is unclear why Hengel (1999: 322) dates Tiberius’s fifteenth year to ca. A.D. 27/28.

56 See Hoehner 1977: 37–38; Hoehner, DJG 119; Humphreys and Waddington 1992: 351.

29 Assuming a three-year ministry, we see that this puts the crucifixion at A.D. 33. This reading of John 2:20, and a date of A.D. 30 for Jesus’ first Passover and the temple clearing, were advocated by Badcock (1935: 40–41). See also P. Maier (1968: 4–5); Hoehner (1977: 38–43; followed by Laney 1992: 72; cf. Hoehner, DJG 119); Humphreys and Waddington (1992: 351). MacAdam (1999: 31–33) concurs, but believes that this was Jesus’ final Passover and that the Fourth Evangelist has transposed the temple clearing to the beginning of Jesus’ ministry. Zahn (1921: 126–27 n. 23) comes close, arriving at the year A.D. 28 or 29.

5 Contra Laney (1992: 224, citing Hoehner 1977: 91), who thinks that the “next day” refers to the day after the great crowds of Jews came to Bethany (12:9), “probably Monday, rather than Sunday.” Ridderbos (1997: 422), among others, proposes that the triumphal entry occurred the day after the anointing at Bethany. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.373) contends that a definitive conclusion is not possible.

1 Cf. “six days before the Passover” in 12:1; “the next day” in 12:12. Carson (1991: 455–58) rightly concludes that Jesus and his disciples ate a true paschal meal on Thursday, 15 Nisan (contra Barrett 1978: 50–51; R. Brown 1970: 556; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.36). On the chronology of the passion narrative in John and the Synoptics (siding with Carson, despite Morris 1995: 688–90), see the sidebar in Köstenberger 1999a: 146, with further bibliographical

524n13, 534n68
Hofius, O. 47, 48, 49, 139n16, 306n45
Hollis, H. 127n40
Holst, R. 358n5
Hooker, M. 21
Horbury, W. 35n46, 60n13, 76n71, 77n73

references (see also Köstenberger 2002c: 130, 164, 173; Blomberg 1987: 175–80; Carson 1984: 530–32). Some seek to adjudicate apparent differences between the presentations in John and the Synoptics by the theory that differences in chronology are due to the use of different calendars. John, it is suggested, like the Judeans and the Sadducees, uses a lunar sunset-to-sunset calendar, while the Synoptics, like the Galileans, the Pharisees, and Jesus and his followers, employ a solar sunrise-to-sunrise reckoning (Hoehner 1977: 85–90; see chart on p. 89; Morris 1995: 684–95); or, John’s calendric usage shifts: his light-darkness theme (rooted in the Genesis account) is conveyed by way of a solar calendar, while elsewhere a lunar system is found (building on exodus redemptive motifs) (Busada 2003). However, these theories seem to lack a clear textual base in the Gospels themselves and are unnecessarily complicated if the solution argued here is adopted.

12 That is, “the many meals and celebrations that week in the Passover season” (Burge 2000: 499; cf. Carson 1991: 590; see also Torrey 1931: 239–40). Contra Keener (1993: 307–308), who says that different calendars or John’s “making a symbolic point” account for the apparent discrepancy between John and the Synoptics (different calendars are also the “solution” presented by Laney [1992: 330, following Hoehner]).

13 See Hoehner, DJG 615–17. “Pontius” appears only in Luke 3:1; Acts 4:27; 1 Tim. 6:13.

68 See Hoehner, DJG 121. Contra Keener (1993: 311) and R. Brown (1970: 891), who conjectures, “Perhaps the tremors that presaged the fall of Sejanus were already felt by sensitive political observers, and Pilate feared that soon he would have no protector at court” (thus placing Jesus’ trial and crucifixion prior to Sejanus’s demise in October, A.D. 31). Another pertinent issue is the designation “friend of Caesar,” on which, see commentary at 19:12. Regarding “the palace,” see commentary at 18:28.

16 So, e.g., Lee 1994: 41–42. It is possible that “he” refers to Jesus rather than God (Burge 1987: 83–84; cf. Hofius 1999: 131–34).

45 So the vast majority of commentators, including Barrett, Beasley-Murray, Burge, Carson, Moloney, Morris, Ridderbos, Schnackenburg, and Witherington. For Jewish material indicating that the Messiah would gather the Gentiles, see Hofius 1967.

40 Additionally, Hollis (1989: 475–78) draws attention to the use of “lift up” (רָם) in Gen. 40:13, 19, with reference to “lifting up” the butler’s head and restoring him to office and to “lifting up” the baker’s head and hanging him on a tree (cf. Gen. 40:20–22). Thus, this short narrative uses “lift up” both to refer to elevation in status and to indicate death by hanging on a tree.

5 See Köstenberger 2001b: 49–63. Ridderbos (1997: 413 [cf. Burge 2000: 336]) rightly contends that Mary is not the woman described in Luke 7 (though he perceives some degree of dependence on Mark 14:3–9 = Matt. 26:6–13). This view is rather common, though not universally so. Contra Holst (1976: 435–46), who on form-critical grounds believes that there is only one underlying historical event and that “variations arose in the course of oral transmission” (citing Dodd 1963: 172; other proponents include D. F. Strauss, Dibelius, and Bultmann).

Horsley, R. A. 60, 203n25
Hoskins, P. M. 8, 14n24, 41
Hoskyns, E. C. 482n1, 482n5
Hosmer, F. E. 552n66

46 On the general motif of “light,” see commentary at 1:4–5. On the coming of the Messiah in terms of light, see especially Horbury (1998: 92–93, 99–100), who also discusses rabbinic interpretations. Important OT references include Num. 24:17 (cf. 4QTest 9–13); Isa. 9:2 (cf. 42:6–7; see commentary at John 1:5); and Mal. 4:2 (cf. Luke 1:78–79; see Köstenberger 2002c: 8).

13 The Greek word Χριστός, like its Hebrew counterpart, mešiah, means “anointed one.” Though the term was applied in the OT to a variety of men who were set apart and anointed to serve God and his people in a special capacity (such as priest or king), OT predictive prophecy gave rise to the expectation that there would be a future figure, the Anointed One, sent by God to deliver and rule his people. See especially Horbury 1998. For a convincing refutation of the claim that the present passage was written to counter a Baptist sect in the evangelist’s day, see Ridderbos 1997: 64 (cf. R. Brown 1966: 48).

71 On messianism in the OT, see chapter 1 of Horbury 1998.

73 See Ps. Sol. 17:32; 1 Enoch 48:10; 52:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 12:32; 2 Bar. 29:3; 30:1; 40:1; 70:9; 72:2. See O’Neill 1995: 25–26; Abegg and Evans 1998: 191–94; Horbury 1998: chapter 2.

25 Beasley-Murray (1999: 88) comments, “The step from a prophet like Moses (v 14), the first Redeemer and worker of miracles, to a messianic deliverer was a short one for enthusiasts in contemporary Israel to make” (cf. Horsley 1984).

24 On Jesus as the replacement and fulfillment of the temple in John’s Gospel, see especially Coloe 2001; Johnson 2001; Hoskins 2002; and Kerr 2002. For a treatment that links this Johannine motif with the composition of the Fourth Gospel, see Motyer 1997 and Köstenberger forthcoming. On Jesus and Israel’s traditions of judgment and restoration, see Bryan 2002.

1 The prayer is often called Jesus’ “high-priestly prayer” (a designation reaching back at least as far as the sixteenth century), though this label hardly fits with Johannine thought, which does not picture Jesus as a high priest (Ridderbos 1997: 546; Carson 1991: 552–53; though see commentary at 17:19 below). Westcott’s and E. C. Hoskyns’s title “prayer of consecration,” though not without merit (see below), fails to encompass the contents of the entire prayer (Carson 1991: 553; Barrett 1978: 500). Hence, commentators now frequently opt for more generic titles of the present prayer, such as “The Farewell Prayer” (Ridderbos) or “The Prayer of Jesus” (Carson). Witherington (1995: 266) calls it “The Sage’s Prayer,” based on his view that the Fourth Evangelist portrays Jesus as a sage.

5 Hence, it was common especially in older commentators to refer to the present prayer as Jesus’ “prayer of consecration” (e.g., Cullmann, E. C. Hoskyns, Bernard, W. F. Howard [cited in Agourides 1968: 138]; see also Westcott [1908: 2.238], who titles John 17 “The Prayer of Consecration” but later says that the chapter contains “what may be most properly called ‘the Lord’s Prayer’”). This designation has merit (esp. in light of 17:19 [so, rightly, Michaels 1989: 297]), as long as it is not used to imply a strong link between the prayer and the liturgical practices of the church toward the end of the first century A.D. More modestly and soberly, Calvin (1961: 134) calls the prayer “the seal of the preceding teaching” of Jesus.

66 See the summary in Carson 1991: 623–24, and the fuller treatment in Beasley-Murray 1999:

Howard, W. F. 482n5
Howell, R. W. 128n43
Hubbard, R. L., Jr. 3
Huffmon, H. B. 430n41
Hultgren, A. J. 400n3
Humphreys, C. J. 13n23, 72n56, 109n29, 531n49
Hunter, W. B. 344, 344n114, 344n116, 483n7, 485n10

355–58. For further discussion, see Barbet 1953; W. Edwards, Gabel, and Hosmer 1986; Sava 1960.

5 Hence, it was common especially in older commentators to refer to the present prayer as Jesus' "prayer of consecration" (e.g., Cullmann, E. C. Hoskyns, Bernard, W. F. Howard [cited in Agourides 1968: 138]; see also Westcott [1908: 2.238], who titles John 17 "The Prayer of Consecration" but later says that the chapter contains "what may be most properly called 'the Lord's Prayer'"). This designation has merit (esp. in light of 17:19 [so, rightly, Michaels 1989: 297]), as long as it is not used to imply a strong link between the prayer and the liturgical practices of the church toward the end of the first century A.D. More modestly and soberly, Calvin (1961: 134) calls the prayer "the seal of the preceding teaching" of Jesus.

43 Gundry and Howell (1999: 24–39) argue that the Greek construction οὕτως ... ὥστε should not be taken to mean "this is how much ... so that," denoting high degree and result, but rather "in this way ... and so," construing οὕτως with what precedes and taking ὥστε independently. This reading is novel, but it is hard to see how ὥστε could introduce a main clause and be rendered "and so." Also, these authors maintain that 3:16 is parallel to 3:14 (καθώς ... οὕτως, "just as ... so"), but the traditional rendering provides a much better parallelism ("so much ... so") than the newly proposed one ("in this way ... and so").

41 See Hos. 13:4; Jer. 24:7; 31:34. Cf. Huffmon 1966 (cited by R. Brown 1970: 631).

3 See the concise summary of "footwashing in antiquity" in Hultgren 1982: 541–42. Hultgren understands the Johannine footwashing as a "symbol of eschatological hospitality." On the practice of footwashing, see also Keener 2003: 903–4 (who apparently, and implausibly, takes literally the reference to footwashing in 1 Tim. 5:10 [p. 904]).

23 For the dating of the four Passovers between A.D. 29 and 33 mentioned above, see Humphreys and Waddington 1992: 335.

29 Assuming a three-year ministry, we see that this puts the crucifixion at A.D. 33. This reading of John 2:20, and a date of A.D. 30 for Jesus' first Passover and the temple clearing, were advocated by Badcock (1935: 40–41). See also P. Maier (1968: 4–5); Hoehner (1977: 38–43; followed by Laney 1992: 72; cf. Hoehner, DJG 119); Humphreys and Waddington (1992: 351). MacAdam (1999: 31–33) concurs, but believes that this was Jesus' final Passover and that the Fourth Evangelist has transposed the temple clearing to the beginning of Jesus' ministry. Zahn (1921: 126–27 n. 23) comes close, arriving at the year A.D. 28 or 29.

49 See Humphreys and Waddington 1992, with particular reference to the lunar eclipse occurring on that day (cf. Mark 15:33).

114 Hunter (1985: 59–60) suggests that the past tense ἤκουσας (ēkousas, you heard) be taken as a reference to "a previous (private) personal prayer offered by Jesus on behalf of his friend." An OT antecedent to Jesus' prayer here is that of Elijah: "Answer me, O Lord, answer me, so these people will know that you, O Lord, are God" (1 Kings 18:37; cf. Ps. 118:21; 121:1; 123:1). Cf. John 6:5; 17:1; Mark 7:34; Luke 18:13; Acts 7:55. See also Matt. 11:25; John 6:11. Hunter

(1985: 62–70, citing J. M. Robinson 1964: 194–225) notes the similarity in form with Jewish prayers of thanksgiving (hodayot). Hanson (1973: 254) and Wilcox (1977: 130) contend that 11:41 is actually a quotation of Ps. 118:21a (see the discussion in Hunter 1985: 68); Wilcox (1977: 131) further argues that Ps. 118:22 also resonates in the present passage via the “stone” motif.

116 Cf. 1 Esdr. 4:58; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162. Hunter (1985: 58, citing Dodd 1963: 183; Fortna 1970: 83) notes that “first-century Jewish custom dictated that ‘prayers were generally said with downcast eyes’ ” (cf. Ps. 131:1a; b. Yebam. 105b).

7 See Morris 1995: 634; with further delineation of subunits, Hunter 1979: 326–28. Lindars (1972: 515) further divides 17:20–26 into 17:20–23 and 17:24–26. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.168–69, with reference to a 1973 German article) provides a more complicated proposal, dividing at 17:1–2, 4–5, 6–11a, 11b–16, 17–19, 22–23, 24–26 (he considers 17:3 and 17:20–21 to be secondary glosses). Others favor division at 17:1–8, 9–19, 20–26 (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 748–51). Malatesta (1971: 191–92) divides at 17:1–5, 6–8, 9–19, 20–24, 25–26 and proposes a strophic arrangement. More eccentric is the suggestion by Appold (1976: 204) that there is an oscillating pattern of petition and review, featuring six petition and six review units. A survey of structural proposals for John 17 up to the late 1970s is found in Hunter 1979: 312–28. More recently, Borchert (2002: 185–89) has favored seven petitions, based on the address “Father.” Yet, as Ridderbos (1997: 547) remarks, “The structure is not severe enough and the transitions are too fluid for us to speak of a detailed and sharply delineated thought scheme.”

10 Contra those who, like Barrett, consider the entire prayer to be a creation of the Fourth Evangelist, “the greatest theologian in all the history of the church” (cited in Hunter 1979: 285). Lindars (1971: 77), too, thinks that the concern for unity pervading the prayer is “nothing else than the deepest expression of John’s own personal experience” (cited in Hunter 1979: 302 n. 320). But see Hunter (1979), who argues that the prayer, including the “concept of the preexistent Son,” is firmly rooted in “Jesus’ own consciousness” (p. 301); and Agourides (1968: 138–39), who likewise contends that “no one can deny that what we really have is the formulation of the words, deeds, self-consciousness and evaluation of the work of Jesus by Himself” (p. 139; note also: “the Evangelist’s recollections of an essential historic truth about Jesus’ concern for the circle of His disciples before the Passion” [p. 141]).

70 For a general survey of this title, see Hurtado, DJG 106–17.

50 See Num. 15:37–41; Deut. 6:4; 11:13–21. On the Jewish confession of God as “one God,” called the Shema (from Hebrew, “to hear”), see Schürer 1973–79: 2.454–55. See also Hurtado 1998a.

49 Duke (1985: 120–21) detects irony in the fact that the parents’ fear of the Jewish authorities sends the interrogators back to the man born blind, whom they had already questioned, yet it was precisely the Jews’ dissatisfaction with that man’s version that had caused them to change their tactic in the first place. This well illustrates not only the authorities’ dilemma but also the cycle of futility in their investigation (cf. Bultmann 1971: 335). Confession of Jesus as Christ was the mark of the early Christians (e.g., Acts 9:22; 18:28; see Hurtado 1988b: 112–13). The phrase “fear of the Jews” occurs in this Gospel also at 7:13; 19:38; 20:19. The expression ἀποσυνάγωγος (aposynagōgos, expelled from the synagogue) occurs in the NT elsewhere only in John 12:42 and 16:2 (there with a future reference). Expulsion from the assembly of the exiles is reported already in Ezra 10:8 (Morris [1995: 434 n. 36], who also refers to Exod. 31:14).

Jackson, H. M. 414, 414n10, 489n26, 601n8, 603, 604, 604n17, 604n18

Jensen, E. E. 527

p 656 Jeremias, J. 26n20, 47, 76, 108, 108n26, 154n44, 177n11, 178n15, 185, 237, 262n55, 86 For the charge of blasphemy against Jesus, see Hurtado 1999, especially 36–37. Jesus’ practice of posing a question that proves too difficult for his opponents to answer is also attested repeatedly in the Synoptics (e.g., Matt. 22:41–46; Mark 12:35–37; Luke 20:41–44; see Borchert 1996: 343).

10 So, among others, Schlatter 1948: 286. On the “disciple Jesus loved,” see Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61 (including further bibliographic references). For the identification of the “disciple Jesus loved” with John the son of Zebedee, see chapter 1 in Köstenberger 1999a; for the identification of the “disciple Jesus loved” with the Fourth Evangelist, see Jackson 1999. See also the discussion of authorial modesty in Vanhoozer 1993: 374, citing Augustine and Westcott. Contra Culpepper (1983: 121–23), who views the “beloved disciple” not only as an “ideal disciple” but also as the physical personification of the Paraclete. Beck (1997: 108–36) essentially aligns himself with Culpepper in characterizing this disciple as “the paradigm” or “embodiment of discipleship” (pp. 135–36).

26 The expression “Jesus Christ” is used in this Gospel only here and in 1:17 (see also 1 John 4:2), and it perhaps reveals hindsight: “Christ” has now become Jesus’ last name (but see Ridderbos 1997: 549). It may strike the modern reader as curious that Jesus would call himself “Jesus Christ”; however, self-reference in the third person was common in antiquity (cf. 21:24; see Jackson 1999: esp. 24–31).

8 So Carson (1991: 682), who contends, “It seems simpler to think that the circulating rumour is making the rounds while the beloved disciple is still alive, but advancing in years, and he is determined to stifle it as well as he can for fear of the damage that would be done if he died before the Lord’s return” (cf. Morris 1995: 775). Jackson (1999: 21–22) maintains that 21:23 “makes perfectly good sense as a corrective from a living Beloved Disciple anxious to dispel what he feels are overly enthusiastic eschatological inferences being drawn by some from Jesus’ words.”

17 “This is the disciple,” “his testimony.” See especially 19:35. Compare also Jesus’ final prayer, where Jesus refers to himself as “Jesus Christ” (17:3), and Thucydides’ practice of introducing himself in the third person (History of the Peloponnesian War 1.1.1; 5.26.1) and of referring to himself as “Thucydides” (ibid., 4.104.4: “Thucydides, the son of Oloros, who composed this history”; this is also true of Julius Caesar in Gallic Wars). See Jackson 1999: 27; see also there pp. 28–20 on Josephus.

18 An “associative collective,” where the “you” subsumed under the “we” are the book’s Christian readers, but where the “I” included in the “we” is the author (Jackson 1999: 23–24).

20 For a more thorough discussion, see E. Miller (1993: 448–49), who lists as many as nine different theories: (1) the OT dbr; (2) Wisdom (R. Harris 1917); (3) Greek philosophy (Stoicism); (4) Philo (Evans 1993: 100–145; Tobin 1990); (5) the Aramaic mmr (Hayward 1978); (6) rabbinic speculation on the Torah; (7) gnostic sources, such as the Hermetic literature, especially Poimandres (Pagels 1999); (8) the Hellenistic-gnostic redeemer myth, Mandeans, and the Odes of Solomon (Bultmann 1923; 1973; 1971); and (9) the breaking of divine silence (Jeremias). Some, such as Epp (1975), combine two or more of the above (in Epp’s case, Wisdom and Torah). Miller himself (1993: 452), building on his earlier work (1989), advances the thesis that the uses of λόγος in the Gospel proper, while not a christological title, are invested

“with a certain christological transparency” (B. Reicke’s term). Thus, startlingly, Miller, who believes that the prologue was written not only after the Gospel proper, but even after John’s first epistle, finds the origin of the prologue’s λόγος in the Fourth Gospel itself: “The one of whom it was said in John 7:46, ‘Never has a man spoken like this!’ eventually came to be called, appropriately, ‘the Word.’” I find this thesis entirely unconvincing (Miller [1999] attempts to make the same case for ἀρχή). It is quite a tour de force to brush aside the massive OT substructure pervading the entire prologue. Not surprisingly, Miller’s thesis has found few followers.

26 The terminology in 2:19 is similar to, but not identical with, Mark 14:58: John 2:19 uses λύω, ἐν + dative, and ἐγείρω; Mark 14:58 has καταλύω, δία + genitive, and οἰκοδομέω; τὸν ναὸν τοῦτον is shared. But note the use of ἐν + dative in Mark 15:29 (and Matt. 27:40), which leads Schlosser (1990: 400–402) to conclude that John depends on Mark in his account of the clearing of the temple. However, see the thorough analysis by Ådna (2000: 179–89), who comes to the opposite conclusion, that neither Mark nor Matthew/Luke served as literary sources for John’s account of the clearing of the temple. Jeremias (1971: 221) notes that both ἐν + dative and δία + genitive are based on the Semitic ܕܝܢ.

44 See Ant. 11.8.4 §§321–24; cf. 13.9.1 §256. Josephus further attests to the temple’s existence in 323 B.C., the year of Alexander the Great’s death (Ant. 11.8.7 §346; cf. 11.8.2 §310). See Jeremias 1969: 352 n. 2. On archaeological excavations related to Mount Gerizim, see Crown 1989: 165–74.

11 Helpful treatments include Avi-Yonah 1974: 142; Jeremias 1966b; Mackowski 1980: 79–83; Vardaman 1963; and Wieand 1965–66. Riesner (DJG 41) prefers the translation “There is in Jerusalem by the Sheep Pool the [site] with five porticoes called in Hebrew [i.e., Aramaic] Bethesda.”

15 The northern, smaller pool may go back to monarchical times; the southern pool may be that established in the second century B.C. by Simon the high priest (Sir. 50:3). For ancient sources, see Hengel 1999: 310. The site favored by most scholars is located under the monastery of St. Anne in the northeast quarter of the Old City. See Jeremias 1966b; Vardaman 1963: 28.

Regarding the archaeological identification of Bethesda, see Wieand 1965–66: 396–400. The existence of the five porticoes is disputed by Broer (2001).

55 See especially Matt. 3:9 par., including John the Baptist’s exhortation. On the importance assigned to ancestry in Judaism, see Jeremias 1969: 271–302.

25 On acts of charity, see Jeremias 1969: 126–34; on begging, 116–19.

29 Exod. 12:8; cf. m. Zebah. 5.8. See Jeremias (1969: 44–46), who also cites Jub. 49:1, 12; t. Pesah. 1.34; and other references.

17 See the discussions in R. Smith 1966; Jeremias 1968: 83–87.

43 The Greek wording is identical to Matt. 26:74. The translation “began to crow” reflects the understanding that the aorist verb ἐφώνησεν (ephōnēsen) is ingressive (cf., e.g., the TNIV). If so, D. M. Smith’s (1999: 337) point is moot that “it is only in Mark that the cock crows twice (14:72; cf. 14:30),” but that “like Matthew and Luke, John reports only one cock-crowing” (cf. Laney 1992: 326). Mishnaic legislation prohibited the raising of fowl in Jerusalem (m. B. Qam. 7.7), but it is unlikely that this prohibition was strictly obeyed in Jesus’ day (Jeremias 1969: 47–48).

Johnson, B. 14n24
Johnson, D. H. 30
Johnston, E. D. 202n15, 203n20
Johnston, G. 399n1, 435n67

54 This is the view of, among others, Carson 1991: 125; Dodd 1953: 402; R. Brown 1966: 10; Morris 1995: 85; Borchert 1996: 114; Burge 2000: 59. For a demonstration that 1:11, properly interpreted and understood (particularly the world as God's property), refutes the notion, advanced by Bultmann, that John reflects gnostic thought, see Jervell 1956: 17–18. But see also the interaction with Jervell in Pryor 1990: 210–14.

24 On Jesus as the replacement and fulfillment of the temple in John's Gospel, see especially Coloe 2001; Johnson 2001; Hoskins 2002; and Kerr 2002. For a treatment that links this Johannine motif with the composition of the Fourth Gospel, see Motyer 1997 and Köstenberger forthcoming. On Jesus and Israel's traditions of judgment and restoration, see Bryan 2002.

15 In light of the fact that the term ἰχθὺς came to have eucharistic significance, it may be significant that John uses a different word (E. Johnston 1962: 153).

20 This reflects the views of Rabbis Hillel and Yohanan (cf. b. Hul. 105b, attributed to Abaye [ca. A.D. 280–339]). The expression “so that nothing may perish” is also documented in rabbinic literature with reference to food (y. Sanh. 6.6; y. Hag. 2.2; see Köstenberger 2002c: 65).

Regarding Jewish care with respect to food, see E. Johnston 1962: 153–54; Daube 1956: 42.

1 This narrow delineation of the farewell discourse is affirmed by, among others, G. Johnston (1970), Segovia (1991, followed tentatively by Keener [2003: 891]), and Dettwiler (1995 [though note that Dettwiler starts the discourse at 13:1 to accommodate his relecture theory]). See also Kellum 2005. Many who do include chapter 17 do so by way of separate reference to Jesus' final prayer (e.g., Carson 1980).

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man's Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source's figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that

Jonge, M. de 119n14, 386

Julian, P. 113

Jungkuntz, R. 315n84

Käsemann, E. 17n27, 380n19, 485n8

the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

14 Cf. Paulien (ABD 4:1106), who also refers to de Jonge 1971: 342; Sylva 1988: 148–49; Michel (1981: 231), who calls Nicodemus a “borderline character” (“personnage-frontière”); and Pamment (1985: 71, 73), who writes, “Nicodemus is the only individual character who fails to make a decision, remaining the good but uncommitted observer who tries to prevent injustice” (p. 73). Similarly, Conway (1999: 85–103) says that Nicodemus is a “pathetic character” who from beginning to end “is genuinely interested in Jesus, but is never able to gather the courage and conviction to confess his belief openly” (p. 103). Note also Pazdan (1987), who sees Nicodemus’s portrayal as part of John’s reversal of the traditional geographical polemic regarding Judeans, Samaritans, and Galileans; and Burge (2000: 124), who contends that Nicodemus never became a model disciple, because “disciples confess Jesus’ identity, remain with him, and tell others.” If my assessment of Nicodemus is correct, it runs counter to the notion, popular in current scholarship, that John’s Gospel is “anti-Semitic,” for here we have a Jewish person who, though not a believer in Jesus the Messiah, represents a fair-minded, moral, kind Jewish leader, providing a counterpoint to the more hostile element on the Sanhedrin. It is also possible that John includes the Nicodemus account at least in part because he had access to individuals among the Jewish leadership (cf. 18:15b: “that disciple [the ‘other disciple’ of 18:15a, presumably the evangelist; cf. 20:2; 21:24] was known to the high priest”).

84 See b. Abod. Zar. 5a. For a variation of the first view, see Jungkuntz 1964; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311; Morris 1995: 467; Beasley-Murray 1999: 176–77. The second position is held by Emerton 1960; 1966. For a variation of the third view, see Hanson 1964–65; 1967. See further Oepke, TDNT 4:1022–32, 1054–55. Most major commentators seem to favor the third view as well (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 373; Carson 1991: 398; Barrett 1978: 384; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311).

27 See the introduction above. There is no good reason to believe that John’s Gospel itself is based on a gnostic Vorlage, as Bultmann (1971: 25–31, and passim) held, or that it reflects Docetism and was erroneously included in the canon (the view of Käsemann 1968: 76–77 [cited in Sloan 1996: 127, 129–30]).

19 On the possible influence of Ps. 42 here and elsewhere in John’s Gospel (11:33, 35, 37; 14:1–9, 27; 19:28), see the interchange between Beutler (1979, modifying Freed 1965b: 117–30) and Freed (1983a). See also Carson (1991: 440), who says that τετάρακται signifies “revulsion, horror, anxiety, agitation.” This emphasis on the precrucifixion turmoil suffered by Jesus stands over against those who, in an effort to focus on the “glory” aspect of Jesus’ death, overlook the real agony and anxiety he endured. So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 434), who argues, contra Witkamp, that 12:27a can “hardly refer to anything other than the natural human reaction in confrontation with death”; and Carson (1991: 439–40), who contends, contra E. Käsemann and G. C. Nicholson, that “even in John [with its realized eschatology], Jesus cannot contemplate the

Katz, P. 354, 354n152

Keener, C. S. xii, 7n16, 7n17, 8, 15n25, 18, 18n31, 19n4, 20n5, 20n6, 26, 28n27, 29n29, cross as a docetic actor, steeped in dispassionate unconcern.” R. Brown (1966: 475) notes that here “we see the true humanity of the Johannine Jesus.”

8 Stibbe (1993: 178) memorably contends that “the Jesus of John’s story [and of the present prayer] obeys very different laws of gravity [than mere mortals]. In our Newtonian perspective, ‘what goes up must come down.’ In the Johannine law of gravity, the opposite seems to be true: ‘what comes down [Jesus] must go up!’ ” He adds (echoes of Käsemann?), “John’s Jesus utters his prayer not as a human being on earth but as a divine being somewhere beyond both time and space.” This is hardly an accurate reading of the prayer, however. In failing to understand the prayer’s relation to John’s depiction of Jesus as the sent Son whose mission is about to be completed (see commentary below), Stibbe erects a false dichotomy (“not as a human being ... but as a divine being”) and then disavows the former and unilaterally accentuates the latter, which hardly does justice to the sense of dependence expressed by Jesus on his sender, the Father.

152 Schwank (1977) helpfully points out that in the final analysis, the reason for the mention of Ephraim in 11:54 is most likely the Fourth Evangelist’s conviction that Jesus did in fact withdraw to this location at this juncture of his ministry, whether or not this served the purpose of geographical symbolism or other theological purposes (cf. Olsson 1974: 28 [cited in Schwank 1977: 380]). He rejects the view of Bultmann (1971: 412 n. 3) that the reference is merely “schematic” (i.e., literary but not historical in nature) and also the contention by Kundsinn (1925: 49–50) that the evangelist chose the name because the location was significant for Christians at the end of the first century (unsupported by evidence, as is admitted by Kundsinn [p. 49]; see the discussions in Katz 1997: 131 n. 7; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.351).

16 See Blomberg 2001: 72, referring to Westcott. Nevertheless, it should be acknowledged that apostolic authorship remains a hypothesis. In an essay surveying scholarship from the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries on the issue, I have shown that the apostolic paradigm was challenged on largely philosophical rather than evidential grounds and that there is therefore compelling reason to doubt that the Fourth Gospel’s Johannine authorship has ever been refuted by actual argument (Köstenberger 2001b: 17–47). To assert the superiority of alternative hypotheses as virtually self-evident without adducing supporting evidence, as is commonly done today, hardly constitutes evenhanded scholarship. Cf. Keener 2003: 81–139, who at the outset of his thorough investigation of the authorship of John’s Gospel (which concludes, tentatively, in favor of apostolic authorship) states that the Fourth Gospel’s apostolic authorship has often been opposed out of dogmatism (p. 81) but that “traditional conservative scholars have made a better case for Johannine authorship of the Gospel ... than other scholars have made against it” (p. 82).

17 One tricky piece of evidence concerns the second-century writer Papias (cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.4–5), a contemporary of Polycarp, who, in turn, was a disciple of the apostle John (on the date of Papias, see Yarbrough 1983; Munck 1959). Papias (at least to Eusebius) seems to refer to two separate Johns, the apostle and a “John the elder.” On this basis some have conjectured that the latter, rather than the former, wrote the Fourth Gospel. However, there is no need to drive a wedge between the two references to John in the passage in question. To the contrary, John may be designated “the elder” in the latter part of the quotation precisely because he is grouped with the elders mentioned earlier in the same passage. For a sound critique of the “John the elder” hypothesis, see Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 141–43. Keener (2003: 95–98)

likewise challenges the reliability of Eusebius's interpretation of Papias, owing to the former's agenda of seeking to denigrate the Apocalypse. Keener (2003: 102–3) also includes an insightful discussion of the plausibility of John writing the Gospel at an advanced age. See also the works cited in Bauckham 1993: 27 n. 17 and the important essay by Hill (1998), who adduces from Eusebius's (Hist. eccl. 3.24.5–13, esp. 11) reference to Papias (without naming him) that Papias held John the apostle to be the author of the Fourth Gospel (contra Bauckham 1993; Hengel 1989a; note my review of Hengel's more extensive 1993 German monograph on the subject, Köstenberger 1996). For studies of the external evidence regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, see Bauckham 1993: 24 n. 1.

25 Keener (2003: 227–28) suggests that John's use of "the Jews" is ironic in that the evangelist grants the authorities the title they covet while ironically undermining their claim (citing Rev. 2:9; 3:9). Keener recommends putting "the Jews" in quotation marks in modern translations to indicate the irony.

31 See Köstenberger 1999a: 205; 2000: 284; see also Keener 2003: 126–39, esp. 129. On the relationship between John's Gospel and the Pauline writings and the remainder of the NT, see Köstenberger 1999a: 205–7; 2000: 284–85.

4 Culpepper (1980–81: 1) quotes Barrett (1971: 27): "The Prologue is ... one piece of solid theological writing. The evangelist wrote it all" (cf. Barrett 1975a: 20–35). Keener (2003: 333–34) maintains that the prologue is an original part of the Gospel, probably added by the author (the apostle John) after completing the first draft of the Gospel. According to Keener (2003: 333–34), ancient writers commonly introduced the main themes at the beginning of their work (see Keener 2003: 334 n. 10 for examples). Bultmann believed that the prologue originated as a pre-Christian gnostic hymn that stemmed from Baptist circles and was taken over and adapted by the Fourth Evangelist (Bultmann 1923: 4; summarized by Ashton 1986: 161). Valentine (1996), in contrast to many other Johannine scholars, argues that the prologue is an organic part of the book, a genuine preface intended to preview important theological themes, rather than a mere afterthought or postscript written after the body of the Gospel had been completed. E. Harris (1994: 26) contends that the prologue "was from the first the construction of the evangelist himself." See the survey in MacLeod 2003: 49–52.

5 Morris (1995: 64) calls it "elevated prose." For a recent treatment of the Johannine prologue dealing with these and other questions, see MacLeod 2003: 48–64. For a discussion of the structure of the prologue, see Keener 2003: 334–37 (but Keener's [2003: 337] own tentative proposal—a three-stanza structure omitting the Baptist verses [1:6–8, 15]—is hardly convincing).

6 See the brilliant analysis of 1:1–2 by Cohee (1995: 471–72), who demonstrates that the passage features both "staircase parallelism" and chiasm (both between lines 1 and 2 and between lines 2 and 3) whereby the verb ἦν is placed in the center of each clause. He also notes how this enables θεός in line 3 to be in the emphatic position. See also Keener 2003: 364–65.

27 See Hartley 1999 for an interaction with the arguments by Jehovah's Witnesses against Jesus' deity from 1:1c. Hartley first surveys the history of the debate, starting with Colwell (1933: 12–21), followed by contributions by Harner (1973: 75–87), P. Dixon (1975), and Hartley himself (1996). Hartley concludes that "the Word was theos (1:1c) in every sense the Father was ton theon (1:1b), rather than a god in a particular sense the Father was not" (1999: 1, summarizing 1996). See also MacLeod 2003: 59–60; and Keener 2003: 372–74, who points to the anarthrous instances of θεός designating God the Father later in the prologue (1:6, 12, 13, 18) and the articular use of θεός with reference to Jesus in 20:28 (p. 373).

29 Though note that Jesus is not explicitly mentioned until 1:17. “All things” (τὰ πάντα, ta panta) may echo Gen. 1:31 (cf. Gen. 9:3; Ashton 1986: 184 n. 37). Though startling, the substance of the present assertion is in no way unique to John; it pervades much of the NT (cf. 1 Cor. 8:6; Col. 1:16; Heb. 1:2). For extrabiblical parallels, see Köstenberger 2002c: 6. For a survey of possible backgrounds for 1:3, see Keener 2003: 375–81.

34 Schlatter (1948: 6) notes the characteristic Johannine asyndeton in 1:4 and that it does not detract from the flow of thought. Keener (2003: 382) identifies the chain life-life-light-light-darkness-darkness in 1:4–5 as a literary device called sorites (also adducing Wis. 6:17–20).

37 “Overcome” or an equivalent is favored also by Morris 1995: 76; Moloney 1998: 36; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.245–46; Laney 1992: 39; Lindars 1972: 87; Schlatter 1948: 9 (“καταλαμβάνω never means ‘understand’ in John”); and Westcott 1908: 1.9–10. Carson (1991: 138) thinks that John might have both meanings (“overcome” and “comprehend”) in mind (so also Whitacre 1999: 53) and likes the ambiguity in BAGD’s translation, “master” (see BDAG 520). Keener (2003: 387) believes that John’s use of κατέλαβεν in 1:5 is an instance of traductio, a play on the multiple meanings of a word (here “comprehend” and “overcome”). Keener notes that the word occurs in Wis. 7:30 but admits that there the term clearly means “overcome” and no wordplay is present. Burge (2000: 56) agrees that both are at work, but he sees “overcome” as being dominant. Calvin (1959: 12) translates “comprehend.” The major translations divide more or less evenly between the two options, usually mentioning the one not chosen in a footnote: (1) NIV: “understood”; NASB, NKJV: “comprehend”; (2) NLT: “extinguish”; NET: “mastered”; ISV: “put out”; HCSB, ESV, NRSV: “overcome.” Notably, the TNIV changed the NIV’s “understood” to “overcome.”

41 Keener (2003: 393) notes the literary purpose of opening and closing the Gospel with a witness (the Baptist and the evangelist respectively).

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’ ” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

88 Cf. Sir. 26:15: χάρις ἐπὶ χάριτι γυνὴ αἰσχυντηρά (“a modest wife adds charm to charm”).

Keener (2003: 421) contends that the phrase in John 1:16 conveys the sense of a “compensatory exchange,” accumulation (“grace added to grace”) rather than substitution, “an inexhaustible supply of blessing.” Contra Keener, the use of ἐπί rather than ἀντί in Sir. 26:15 does put in question the relevance of Sir. 26:15 as a parallel for John 1:16.

92 Keener (2003: 422) states that the contrast in 1:17 is between something good and something better (citing m. Abot 2.7: “the more study of the Law the more life”). See also Luther’s (1957: 139–48) discussion of 1:17, summed up as follows: “It is as if he were to say: The Law, given through Moses, is indeed a Law of life, righteousness, and everything good. But far more was accomplished through Christ” (p. 144).

95 On the level of the original readers of John’s Gospel, Keener (2003: 426) observes that “[t]o Jewish Christians needing to lay even their lives on the line because of their Christology, John reminds them that Christology is at the heart of their faith in Israel’s God.”

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

1 The note of escalating conflict from 1:19–6:70 to 6:71–10:42 is recognized by Keener (2003: 427).

1 This assessment contrasts with Keener (2003: 429), who characterizes the transition in 1:19 as abrupt (citing Homer’s Odyssey as a parallel).

25 For an extended treatment of the function of baptism in this Gospel, including discussions of proposed parallels with other ancient baptisms and John the Baptist and proselyte baptism, see Keener (2003: 440–48).

35 A genitive of source. Alternatively, it may be a genitive of possession (“belonging to God”; see discussions in Morris 1995: 127; R. Brown 1966: 55). For a general survey of John’s teaching on Jesus as the lamb of God, see Marshall, DJG 432–34. See also the survey of various interpretive options by Keener (2003: 452–54), who cites the apocalyptic lamb (judged unlikely), the language of the suffering servant (probable allusion to Isa. 53), and the sacrificial Passover lamb (considered primary).

69 Ridderbos (1997: 84) thinks that this identification is all the more likely since Peter learns about Jesus from his brother Andrew and this unnamed disciple (1:41) and since Peter and John are closely associated in this and the other Gospels (so also Schlatter 1948: 55; more cautious assessments are found in Borchert 1996: 143; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.310; Carson 1991: 154). Note also the connection between Andrew and John in the Muratorian Canon (Bettenson 1967:

28). Michaels (1989: 37) thinks that the second disciple is Philip. Keener (2003: 468) likewise sees “no reason” to identify the other disciple with the beloved disciple, since he is not mentioned until 13:23. On a literary level, this is self-evident, but the absence of “beloved disciple” language prior to 13:23 does not seem to rule out the possibility that the apostle John appears in the Johannine narrative as a historical character that is left unnamed.

105 C. Koester 1990a: 23–34; cf. Barrett 1978: 185; Nicklas (2000b: 201–2) is less than convinced. Other commentators consider the reference to be incidental, intended to show merely that Jesus “knew” Nathanael prior to their actual encounter (Ridderbos 1997: 90; cf. Burge 2000: 78; R. Brown 1966: 83; Moloney 1998: 56; contra Morris 1995: 146; Witherington 1995: 71; Borchert 1996: 148; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.317). Keener (2003: 486), too, rejects any deeper significance in the identification, suggesting that the fig tree may be mentioned simply because a specific landmark was necessary for some reason. Witherington’s suggestion that Nathanael is being portrayed as an expert in the law who thus would know that the Messiah could not come from Nazareth seems far-fetched.

3 Cf. Keener (2003: 493), who prefers to read 2:1–11 in terms of Judaism’s renewal rather than its obsolescence.

7 It is doubtful that the reference to “the third day” represents an allusion to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 102; Carson 1991: 167; Burge 2000: 90; contra Borchert 1996: 153; Stibbe 1993: 46; Keener 2003: 497–98). The reference serves as a chronological connective with preceding events, perhaps indicating that the promise of 1:51 was quickly fulfilled (Beasley-Murray 1999: 34, citing Schnackenburg 1990: 1.325; cf. Talbert [1992: 86], who says that 2:1–11 serves as fulfillment of the prophecy in 1:51; and D. M. Smith [1999: 86], who speaks of the “first installment ... of the revelation promised in 1:51”). The beginning of Jesus’ final week is signaled in 12:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 189–90).

15 On wine in biblical times, see Watson, DJG 870–73; Keener 2003: 500–501.

18 So Keener (1993: 268), perhaps following Derrett (1970: 235).

24 See Judg. 11:12; 2 Sam. 16:10; 1 Kings 17:18; 2 Kings 3:13; 2 Chron. 35:21. See Maccini (1996: 100–102), who concludes that Jesus is attempting to separate himself from his mother. Keener (2003: 505–6) likewise views 2:4 in terms of distancing.

27 For a list of the instances of “hour” in John’s Gospel, see Keener 2003: 507.

31 So, for example, Ridderbos 1997: 107; Morris 1995: 162; Carson 1991: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 35; R. Brown 1966: 105; Kruse 2003: 94–95. Ridderbos (1997: 108) cites OT allusions to the abundance of wine in the new age (Gen. 49:11; Isa. 25:6; Amos 9:13–14; Jer. 31:12–14; see also Joel 3:18). Keener (2003: 512) suggests a (proleptic) connection between the abundant “measure” of water turned into wine in 2:6 and the unlimited provision of the Spirit in 3:34.

37 Keener (2003: 515) gives the sense of ἀρχή as “paradigmatic.”

34 Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.344; Barrett 1978: 195; R. Brown 1966: 117; Witherington 1995: 85–86; Borchert 1996: 160; Bultmann 1971: 122; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38–39; Dodd 1963: 162; Lindars 1972: 135–37; Keener 2003: 518–19. Keener contends that it is historically implausible that Jesus would challenge the temple system by overturning tables and yet continue in public ministry for two or three years afterward, sometimes even visiting Jerusalem (though he notes that Jesus faces considerable hostility there when he does). On the contrary, an early temple cleansing accounts well for Jewish hostility toward Jesus early on (5:18), and Jesus’ continuing in ministry for two or three more years is eminently plausible historically in light of Jesus' pattern of withdrawal (3:22; 6:15; 7:9–10; 8:59; 10:40) and his caution from the very inception of his ministry because his "time" has not yet come (2:4; 7:6). Borchert (1996: 160) contends that two temple clearings are "a historiographic monstrosity that has no basis in the texts of the Gospels." Kreitzer (1998: 100–101) claims that the evangelist followed the motto "When the details of history no longer serve the functions of the story—discard them." R. Brown (1966: 118) concludes that Jesus uttered some prophetic saying concerning the destruction of the temple on his first visit but actually cleansed the temple at the end of his ministry. Wallace (1996: 561 n. 20) notes that this would require a crucifixion date of A.D. 33.

9 Keener (2003: 536) states that Nicodemus (unlike the Samaritan woman) is probably named for literary reasons, since "it would be difficult for any but the most diligent reader to recognize his recurrence in 7:50 and 19:39 if he remained anonymous." This argument is unpersuasive, however, for it fails to account for the fact that the Fourth Evangelist manages to refrain from naming the "disciple Jesus loved" and yet avoids confusion.

11 Keener (2003: 536) proceeds to call Nicodemus a "secret believer" in 3:2 on account of his coming to Jesus by night. Yet this characterization is doubtful, since Jesus does not seem to treat Nicodemus as a "believer" here, secret or otherwise.

32 Keener (2003: 556 n. 221) notes the verbal parallel between the wind blowing "where it wills" (3:7–8) and Jesus raising "whom he wills" (5:21). Keener (2003: 557–58) also recognizes another wordplay, involving the word for "voice" or "sound" (φωνή), applied to the wind in 2:8 and occurring later in the Gospel in 3:29; 5:25, 28, 37; 10:3–5, 16, 27; 11:43; 12:28, 30; 18:37.

2 On the moral, gender, and ethnic barriers separating Jesus from the Samaritan woman, see Keener 2003: 593–601.

24 But note that it may have been winter when Jesus met the Samaritan woman (see commentary at 4:35); if so, the midday sun would not have been as hot. Contra Keener (2003: 592–93), who repeatedly stresses that the noon hour would be hot and speaks of the "intensity of heat," without entertaining the possibility that noon would not be so hot in December (the likely time of year for this event, in my view).

32 As Keener (2003: 605, citing ancient references) observes, water drawn from wells was not always living water (unless it was fed by an underground stream) and was therefore often thought to be less healthy than "living water," that is, water drawn from a spring or from rainwater.

35 Keener (2003: 601, 605) goes one step further, suggesting that the woman's statements in 4:12, 15 may have a mocking connotation.

49 Contra Keener (1993: 273), who reads the present passage in terms of "racial reconciliation." But this does not square with the emphasis of the present passage on the Jews being the source of salvation.

54 Contra Keener (2003: 617), who suggests that the reference in 4:23–24 is to "worship empowered by the Spirit," the more probable reference in this context is to the distinction between the realm of spirit ("God is spirit") and that of physical location. Keener (2003: 618–19, esp. p. 619) also says "since God is spiritual but not physical, those who relate to him must do so through the gift of his Spirit," but a more logical way to complete his sentence would be "those who relate to him must do so on a spiritual rather than physical plane." Spirit, as in God's Spirit or the Holy Spirit, is only the derivative sense (see the discussion below).

58 Keener (2003: 621) suggests that the narrative technique at work in 4:27 is that of interruption (citing Acts 2:37; 10:44) immediately after the climax of a narrative (in the present instance, Jesus' self-revelation in 4:26).

62 See the discussion and references in Köstenberger 1998a: 120–22. Contra Keener (1993: 274), who refers to “the general principle that one ought not to challenge one's teacher.”

1 The inclusion with John 2 is created in more ways than one: note the mention of Cana (“where Jesus had turned the water into wine”), the reference to Capernaum, and the numbering of signs in Cana (Carson 1991: 237). Keener (2003: 630) also notes the geographical inclusio (i.e., references to Galilee in 4:43 and 4:54 serving to bracket the entire unit).

10 Keener (1993: 275) conjectures that perhaps he was “a wealthy aristocrat, probably much influenced by Greco-Roman culture and not very religious by general Palestinian Jewish standards.” In his later commentary, Keener (2003: 630) similarly calls the man a “Galilean aristocrat.” Some scholars speculate that the royal official is to be identified with Chuza, the manager of Herod's household mentioned in Luke 8:3.

4 For an unfavorable comparison between this character and the man born blind in John 9, see the discussion there. Keener (2003: 639, following Culpepper 1983: 139) contends that 5:1–15 serves as a (negative) foil for the (positive) characterization in chapter 9 of the man born blind, calling the contrasting of characters a common rhetorical device. See also Asiedu-Pepurah 2001; Staley 1991. For a discussion of the similarities and differences between John 5 and 9, see Lee 1994: 105–7.

7 On a literary level, Keener (2003: 634) observes that the shift from the end of chapter 4 to the beginning of chapter 5 is part of the Johannine pattern of leaving major chronological and geographical gaps (e.g., 7:2; 10:22; 11:55).

9 See Carson 1991: 240. Bultmann (1971: 240) claims that the festival is Passover, based on his switching the order of John 5 and 6, but this is unlikely, since the evangelist clearly identifies Passover everywhere else in his Gospel. Also unlikely is Michaels's (1989: 85) theory that the present pericope was transposed from Jesus' first Passover in Jerusalem (cf. 2:23; 3:2). Many commentators choose to remain agnostic on which feast is in view (Keener 2003: 635), regarding its identity as either unknown (Ridderbos 1997: 184; Morris 1995: 265 n. 6) or of secondary interest (R. Brown 1966: 206), or both (Carson 1991: 241). Calvin (1959: 116) thinks that the feast probably is Pentecost.

41 Moloney 1998: 173; cf. Metzner 1999; Lee 1994: 110; Witkamp 1985: 24; Leidig 1979: 211; contra Thomas 1995: 18. Moloney (1998: 173) rightly notes, contra Beck (1993 [cf. 1997: 86–90]), who argues that anonymous characters in the Fourth Gospel draw the reader into an identification with the character, “The reader of the Fourth Gospel, however, hardly identifies with a man who is in league with ‘the Jews’ (vs. 15).” Keener (2003: 87), similarly, contends that a list of Johannine models of faith is not entirely coextensive with anonymous characters (citing esp. 5:14–15) and registers this as his only serious disagreement with Beck (p. 87 n. 49). Beck, in a review (2001), indirectly responds to my earlier criticism (Köstenberger 1999b, reviewing Beck 1997) that the man in John 5 disproves his theory by alleging, in effect, that I have no place for literary analysis in my hermeneutical method. Nothing could be further from the truth. My concern, rather, lies with an unqualified wholesale adoption of reader-response criticism by evangelicals who fail to realize that this methodology is part and parcel of a postmodern hermeneutic that is left with nothing but subjective readings devoid of any claim to authority or universal applicability. Moreover, I was concerned to point out that Beck's central thesis (i.e., that anonymity necessarily equals ideal function and positive characterization) is invalid. Note further this puzzling conclusion by Brodie (1993: 238): "The final picture ... is ... open to a positive interpretation: the man has finally come to mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus, and he is announcing the good news to the Jews." Precisely where Brodie finds the man "announcing the good news to the Jews" is unclear to me, nor can I see textual evidence for the man coming to "mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus."

53 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Borchert 1996: 236; Moloney 1998: 174; Bultmann 1971: 245; Morris 1995: 274–75 n. 48 (referring to Odeberg 1968: 203), 277; Barrett 1978: 259; Keener 1999: 42–43. The use of ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, that one) for God "lays stress upon the separate divine Person" in contrast with υἱός (huios, son). Also stressed is the Son's inability to do anything apart from the Father (again in 5:30; see Moloney 1998: 178; Barrett 1978: 264).

91 Keener (2003: 658) lays out 5:38–44 as a "probable chiasmic structure," with 5:42–43a as the center of the chiasm.

104 For a treatment of Moses as a character in the Fourth Gospel, see Harstine (2002: 40–75), who treats 1:17, 45; 3:14; 5:45–46; 6:32; 7:19, 22, 23; 9:28–29. According to Harstine, Moses' dominant function throughout the narrative is as a witness to Jesus (p. 72), whereby Moses serves as a historical/legendary figure similar to Jacob (4:5, 12), David (7:42), and Abraham (8:33–58). On Moses in the Fourth Gospel, see also Glasson 1963; Meeks 1967; and Boismard 1993. Keener (2003: 662) observes how, on a literary level, the closing appeal to Moses in 5:45–47 prepares the way for chapter 6, where Jesus is presented as the new Moses providing God's people with the new "bread from heaven."

5 Keener (2003: 664) observes that the references to mountains in 6:3 and 6:15 constitute a literary inclusio.

8 The phrase ἐπάρας οὖν τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς is reminiscent of 4:35 (Ridderbos 1997: 210; Keener 2003: 665).

28 The imperfect ἤρχοντο (ērchonto) indicates that the disciples "were on their way" or that they were "trying to go" (Barrett 1978: 280; cf. Morris 1995: 308 n. 36; Moloney 1998: 203). Morris (1995: 309 n. 41), followed by Keener (2003: 673), suggests that the disciples were probably crossing not at the widest part of the lake but from the northeast to the northwest shores, the distance stated in 6:19 indicating that they were most of the way across the lake.

33 Keener (2003: 673) suggests that there may be an allusion to Job 9:8 LXX, where God is said to walk on the waters (noting also the parallel wording in Mark 6:48 ["passing by"] and Job 9:11).

34 So Beasley-Murray 1999: 89–90; Witherington 1995: 153; Burge 2000: 193, 195. See further the discussion of ἐγὼ εἶμι sayings in ancient culture and the OT in Beasley-Murray 1999: 89–90.

48 The parallelism between 6:30 and 2:18 is noted by Keener (2003: 678). Dodd (1953: 301, cf. 90) perceptively notes that Jesus, in response to the Jews' demand for a sign, "does not promise any significant event yet to happen," but rather "offers an interpretation of what has already happened," inviting them "to see in the actual occurrence of the Feeding of the Multitude the σημεῖον which they desire." People had seen the feeding, but they had not seen the sign; that is, they had not understood its symbolic, messianic significance as pointing to Jesus as the life-giving bread (pp. 334–35). Contra Whitacre (1999: 156), who claims that the crowd "is not asking for another sign to be given, but rather they want an interpretation of the feeding that has just occurred.”

72 So Ridderbos 1997: 235–37; cf. Carson 1991: 295; Morris 1995: 331–32; contra Moloney 1998: 223; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.55; Lindars 1972: 267; Talbert 1992: 140. As Keener (2003: 690) observes, “John’s words [in 6:27–63] invite his audience to look to Christ’s death itself, not merely those symbols which point to his death.” At best, any such overtones are derivative (Borchert 1996: 270–71; cf. Brodie 1993: 286; Calvin 1959: 170).

2 Keener (2003: 703) notes that chapters 7 and 8 are framed by ἐν κρυπτῷ and ἐκρύβη in 7:4 and 8:59 respectively to form a messianic secret motif.

9 Note the inclusio of 7:4 and 8:59 (Keener 2003: 703). Cf. Matt. 10:26 and the “messianic secret” motif in the Synoptics (Barrett 1978: 311; Carson 1991: 310, referring to Lindars 1972: 283).

10 Keener (2003: 705) observes that the statement in 7:5 (“not even his brothers were believing in him”) follows on the heels of the apostasy of many of Jesus’ disciples (6:66), adding to a wave of unbelief mounting against Jesus. Keener (2003: 706, citing D. M. Smith 1999: 168) also adduces the incident recounted in Mark 3:21, 31–35.

21 Motyer (1997: 152–53) plausibly suggests that 7:14–24 is designed to enable the reader to make an appropriate judgment concerning the death of Jesus. If the Jews are correct, Jesus is a sinner, demon-possessed, and the like. If Jesus’ claims are valid, it is the Jews who are misleading the people, not Jesus. Keener (2003: 721) discerns a common structure in 7:14–36 and 7:37–52: (1) Jesus teaches in the temple (7:14–24; 7:37–39), (2) people speculate about his identity (7:25–29, 31; 7:40–43), and (3) an attempt to arrest him fails (7:30, 32–36; 7:44–52, citing Talbert 1992: 145, following Lindars).

28 See also Josephus, J.W. 6.5.3 §§300–309 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 75). Keener (2003: 715) observes that Jesus will reverse this charge and in 8:41, 44 identify the devil as the “father” of “the Jews.”

30 See the material cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 76 and Keener 2003: 717.

53 Most commentators favor a time immediately following cessation of ceremonies on the eighth day (Carson 1991: 321; Morris 1995: 373, esp. n. 79; Barrett 1978: 326; Moloney 1998: 256; Schlatter 1948: 199). Some believe that Jesus’ words fit better with the ceremonies of the seventh day (R. Brown 1966: 320; Bultmann 1971: 302 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.152; Ridderbos 1997: 272; Burge 2000: 227). On the water-drawing ceremony, see Keener 2003: 722–24.

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee’s observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus “from within him” refers to “whoever believes in me.” Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of “rivers of living water” (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987: 88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

7 See also Metzger (1994: 187–89), who calls the evidence for the non-Johannine origin of the pericope “overwhelming” and “conclusive.” Keener (2003: 735–36), too, strongly contends that 7:53–8:11 is an interpolation, based on its suspect textual history and its large non-Johannine vocabulary. One of the few scholars favoring originality (on the grounds of Byzantine priority) is M. Robinson (1998: 1–17).

6 See Isa. 60:19–22; Zech. 14:5b–8; cf. Rev. 21:23–24. Contemporary Judaism applied the phrase “light of the world” not only to God but also to Israel, Jerusalem, the patriarchs, the Messiah, famous rabbis (e.g., Yohanan ben Zakkai), the Torah, the temple, and even Adam (Keener 1993: 285; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 128; R. Brown 1966: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.190; Moloney 1998: 266). The universality of “light” symbolism in religious language issues in numerous non-Jewish parallels (see Barrett 1978: 335–37; Bultmann 1971: 40–44, 342–43; Dodd 1953: 201–8; Odeberg 1968: 286–92).

84 Keener (2003: 764) seems to think that the present charge represents an extrapolation from reports of the welcome Jesus received in Samaria (4:40). He notes that the informed reader, who knows that Jesus denied the legitimacy of worship on Mount Gerizim and affirmed that salvation was from the Jews (4:21–22), recognizes the charge as slanderous (and perhaps motivated by envy).

104 Keener (2003: 769) suggests that the Jews were probably “annoyed by his [Jesus’] claims to authority despite his relative youth.”

111 Cf. 1:14; Ezek. 10–11; see Carson 1991: 358, citing W. Davies 1974: 290–96; Barrett 1978: 353. Keener (2003: 774) concurs that Jesus’ withdrawing from the temple may “evoke a state of Ichabod, God’s glory withdrawing from a polluted and rebellious sanctuary” (citing Ezek. 5:11; 8:4; 9:3; 10:4, 18). Ridderbos (1997: 324 n. 225) suggests that the meanings of the verbs ἐκρύβη and ἐξῆλθεν (exēlthen, he left) “mutually determine each other.”

5 For structural proposals, see especially Ridderbos (1997: 332), who divides the chapter into four major scenes (9:1–5, 6–12, 13–34, 35–41); Duke (1985: 125–26 [followed by Lincoln 2000: 97]), who contends that irony is intensified by the evangelist’s juxtaposition of parallel scenes (9:1–7, 8–12, 13–17, 18–23, 24–34, 35–38, 39–41), which are arranged chiastically with 9:22 at the center; Lee (1994: 164–65), who sees a threefold structure (9:1–7, 8–34, 35–41); and Keener (2003: 775), who divides chapters 9 and 10 as follows: 9:1–34 (blindness and sin); 9:35–10:18 (true shepherd, sheep, and thieves); 10:19–21 (divided response); and 10:22–42 (conflict at Hanukkah). Lincoln (2000: 99) also follows Duke (1985: 126) in contending that in John 9 “the theme is clearly trial and judgment,” with the elements of a trial emerging from 9:13 onward.

7 Due to the lack of a clear break between chapters 8 and 9 and the fact that the pool of Siloam was near the temple, Keener (2003: 776–77) contends that “[i]n the story world it therefore remains the final day of the Feast of Tabernacles.” It is less clear when he thinks the events of chapter 9 took place historically.

47 Bultmann (1971: 335) states that the authorities “now hit on the idea of questioning the fact of the miracle, as being the easiest way of putting an end to the whole business.” Keener (2003: 786) notes how, incredibly, the Pharisees repeatedly ignore the testimony of the miracle itself, focusing instead on Jesus’ alleged Sabbath violation. On “the Jews,” see commentary at 5:10. Carson (1991: 368) attributes the shift from “Pharisees” to “the Jews” to John’s penchant for stylistic variation. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.249) thinks that the change serves to indicate the “official character” of the inquiry. Duke (1985: 120, following Schnackenburg 1990: 2.248) suggests that the uneasiness of the Pharisees in 9:17–18 “is evident in the abrupt close of scene and their immediate change of tactic in what follows.”

59 The perceptive reader will note that the Pharisees’ claim to being disciples of Moses is refuted by the earlier statement in 5:45–47 (Keener 2003: 791). There is some debate as to how common this self-designation was among the Jews of Jesus’ day (cf., e.g., Matt. 23:2). In b. Yoma 4a, it is applied to Pharisees as opposed to Sadducees. In m. Abot 5.19, Jews are referred to as “the disciples of Abraham,” while Christians are dismissed as “the disciples of Balaam the wicked” (that is, Jesus!). Schnackenburg (1990: 2.251) and Ridderbos (1997: 345 n. 287, referring to TDNT 4:443) consider this to be a characteristic rabbinic self-designation, while Carson (1991: 373–74, apparently following Barrett 1978: 362–63) says that this self-designation was not common.

61 Carson (1991: 373) points out that on a formal level, the present statement stands in contradiction with the Pharisees’ earlier comment in 7:27 (cf. 6:42; 8:14b). He rightly notes that “both 7:27 and 9:29 are simultaneously false and ironically true” (almost identically, Barrett 1978: 363; similarly, Morris 1995: 437; Keener 2003: 792).

70 Keener (2003: 792–93) acknowledges that Palestinian Jewish tradition provides no such reports, but he still holds out the possibility that the formerly blind man’s statement is hyperbolic.

76 Keener (2003: 793–94) notes that the Pharisees’ conclusion that the man must be a sinner (9:34) contradicts Jesus’ affirmation that the man’s blindness was not a result of personal sin (9:2–3). The fine irony will not escape the alert reader that the Pharisees themselves have not been born from God (3:3) but rather were born in sin as the devil’s heirs (8:44) and destined to die in sin (8:21).

1 For a thorough investigation of the OT background of John 10, especially 10:16, see Köstenberger 2002b. On sheep and shepherd imagery, see also Keener 2003: 799–802.

14 Lindars 1972: 357: “probably simply holding the gate open while the sheep run out past him.” On the fold and the door, see also Keener 2003: 809–11.

71 Keener (2003: 225) detects here an allusion to Ps. 95:7 (94:7 LXX), where people are called the “sheep of his [God’s] hand.”

2 Though see the reference to “all the miracles” that the people of Jerusalem had seen in Luke 19:37 (noted by Ridderbos 1997: 383; R. Brown 1966: 429). For a defense of the historicity of the raising of Lazarus, see M. Harris 1986: 310–15. See also Morris (1995: 474–76), who, arguing for the historicity of the raising of Lazarus, presents several lines of reasoning: (1) the impressive amount of detail given, including names and geographical references; (2) Peter’s absence from the Johannine narrative in 7:1–13:6 (cf. Matt. 19:27–26:33; Mark 10:28–11:21; Luke 18:28–22:8), which may account, at least in part, for the omission of the raising of Lazarus in Mark and Matthew; and (3) all the Jerusalem miracles are excluded from the Synoptic tradition, and Jerusalem itself is excluded, with the exception of the final week. Keener (2003: 836) conjectures that Mark may have “suppressed” (an infelicitous word choice) the Lazarus story to protect Lazarus and his sisters, who still lived near Jerusalem at the time of publication. Keener (2003: 837) also observes that the account of Jesus’ raising of Lazarus is critical for John’s plot development (the Lazarus account is at the heart of John’s message: Jesus dies most immediately because he has given life to a disciple [11:14–16; cf. 3:16–17]); it constitutes the longest single sign account in the Fourth Gospel; and, apart from the passion narrative, it represents the longest narrative without a substantial discourse section.

27 For a similar delay, see 7:4–10 (noted by Moule 1975: 118). Keener (2003: 839) observes that in 4:40 Jesus also remains two additional days. Westcott (1908: 2.82) comments, “Because the Lord loved the family He went at the exact moment when His visit would be most fruitful, and not just when He was invited.”

29 Contra Keener (2003: 839–40), who says Bethany was only a single day’s journey away. According to Keener’s reconstruction, if Jesus delayed two days after receiving the message and arrived to find that Lazarus had been dead four days, Lazarus may have been dead by the time the messengers reached Jesus, dying shortly after they left Bethany. If so, even if Jesus had left immediately upon receiving the message, Lazarus would still have been dead, albeit only two (rather than four) days.

35 Keener (2003: 835, 840) says that since Lazarus was the friend of Jesus and the disciples (11:11), it was appropriate to die for him (15:13–15). If there is a connection, 15:13–15 serves as a commentary on the raising of Lazarus.

36 Keener (2003: 838) notes the contrasting dynamic between 7:1–10 (where others told Jesus to go to Jerusalem but he refused because his time had not yet come) and 11:1–16 (where Jesus goes to Jerusalem because his time is now close at hand).

46 Note that John does not record any comment on Jesus’ part. Moloney (1998: 322) notes that this is the first time in the Gospel that ἀποθνήσκω (apothnēskō, die) is associated with Jesus, but from now on it will appear in that regard with frequency (cf. 11:50, 51; 12:24, 33). Keener (2003: 835 n. 1) says that Thomas ironically interprets Jesus as saying that he will go to the realm of death.

47 So Carson (1991: 410), who speaks of “raw devotion and courage”; similarly, Morris 1995: 484; Michaels 1989: 196. Keener (2003: 842), too, says Thomas’s is an act of courage (contrasting him with Jesus’ brothers in 7:5), though he notes that Thomas later failed to believe the disciples’ testimony regarding Jesus’ resurrection (20:25). Perhaps the strongest endorsement of Thomas’s sincerity comes from Whitacre (1999: 283), who says that Thomas displays “an incredible picture of faith,” is “following out of loyalty,” and constitutes “a model disciple.”

53 See Lev. Rab. 18.1 on Lev. 15:1; cf. Eccles. Rab. 12.6 (universally cited by commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 393; Carson 1991: 411; Morris 1995: 485). Cf. m. Yebam. 16.3; Semaḥot 8, rule 1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 109). See also Hanson 1973. Keener (2003: 841 n. 63, citing Michaels 1984: 190) cautions, however, that the belief that the soul left the body three days after death is not widely attested in the early period.

61 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 412; Ridderbos 1997: 395, with reference to 2:5; similarly, Keener 2003: 106–7, citing Barrett 1978: 390. The term κύριος (kyrios) probably means “Lord,” as in 11:3 (Carson 1991: 411). Regarding the statement “God will give you whatever you ask,” see commentary at 9:31.

72 For this reason Witherington (1995: 203), who calls Martha’s confession “the least inadequate confession yet in this Gospel,” and R. Brown (1966: 433), who labels her belief “inadequate,” are overly negative. More positive are Morris (1995: 489), who says, “She may not understand fully the implications of what he has just said, but as far as she can she accepts it,” and Carson (1991: 414), who labels her faith as “a rich mixture of personal trust (fiducia) and of confidence that certain things about Jesus are true (assensus).” Keener (2003: 844–45) suggests that John, by including Martha’s confession, likely sought to balance gender the way Luke does (cf. Peter’s confession in 6:68–69). See also Stibbe (1994: 47), who perceives movement from two “I know’s” (11:22, 24) to a climactic “I believe” (11:27); from propositional to personal understanding; and from confessor to witness. Ridderbos (1997: 399–400) calls the confession

“spontaneous and uninhibited” and sees it as reminiscent of the man blind from birth, who confessed despite his lack of understanding concerning the Son of Man (9:38). On “the Christ,” see commentary at 1:41; on “Son of God,” see commentary at 1:34 and 1:49.

119 Brodie (1993: 397) draws a connection with 5:24–29 and speaks of Jesus’ exercise of “Creator-like power.” See especially 5:28–29, where Jesus speaks of a coming time “when all who are in their graves will hear his [the Son of Man’s] voice and come out.” Keener (2003: 839) distinguishes between Jesus’ “secret” sign in 2:1–11 and his public sign in chapter 11, the difference being that now his time is close at hand.

124 Keener (2003: 850), however, observes that Lazarus’ coming out of the tomb with his graveclothes contrasts with Jesus’ leaving them behind at his resurrection (cf. 20:5, 7).

128 Along different lines, Keener (2003: 838) observes that Lazarus is wholly passive and silent in the entire narrative (which is hardly surprising, since he is dead for the vast majority of it) so that his sisters and their faith are the focal point of the story (apart from Jesus, one might add).

4 For a detailed analysis of the present pericope (focused on verbal aspect), see Köstenberger 2001b: 49–63. The transitional nature of most of chapter 12 is noted by Keener 2003: 859.

11 Keener (1993: 294) mentions that normally a flask would contain no more than an ounce.

1 For a discussion of 12:37–50 in the context of the Johannine lawsuit motif (cf. Isa. 40–55), see Lincoln 2000: 105–10. Keener (2003: 882) notes that many find in 12:37–43 a theological summary of people’s responses to Jesus’ public ministry and in 12:44–50 an anthology of representative sayings. Whitacre (1999: 326) suggests that 12:37–43 emphasizes Jesus’ deeds, and 12:44–50 his words (also adducing Moses’ final words in Deut. 32:45–47 as a parallel). Both Ridderbos (1997: 443) and Schnackenburg (1990: 2.411) stress the relevance of this section for the evangelist’s own day and the historical distance from which this section was presumably written. This surely is true but should not be exaggerated. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.421) also provides a defense of Johannine authorship against Boismard, who claims that 12:44–50 is non-Johannine. Bultmann (1971: ix), in a hardly defensible move, relocates both 12:34–36 and 12:44–50 to John 8, with only 12:37–43 remaining in the traditional position.

7 For a helpful comparison and brief discussion of the MT, LXX, and Johannine forms of Isa. 6:10, see R. Brown 1966: 486. The Hebrew original moves from heart to ears to eyes and then back from sight to hearing to understanding. John does not refer to hearing but instead focuses on sight, probably owing to his mention of Jesus’ signs in 12:37 (Carson 1991: 449; cf. Barrett 1978: 431). Keener (2003: 833) detects verbal ties between the quote of Isa. 6:9–10 (John 12:40) and John 9:39–41 (blindness) and 4:47; 5:13 (healing). The Jews considered the heart to be the seat of mental as well as physical life (cf. Mark 8:17–21).

1 This narrow delineation of the farewell discourse is affirmed by, among others, G. Johnston (1970), Segovia (1991, followed tentatively by Keener [2003: 891]), and Dettwiler (1995 [though note that Dettwiler starts the discourse at 13:1 to accommodate his relecture theory]). See also Kellum 2005. Many who do include chapter 17 do so by way of separate reference to Jesus’ final prayer (e.g., Carson 1980).

3 See the concise summary of “footwashing in antiquity” in Hultgren 1982: 541–42. Hultgren understands the Johannine footwashing as a “symbol of eschatological hospitality.” On the practice of footwashing, see also Keener 2003: 903–4 (who apparently, and implausibly, takes literally the reference to footwashing in 1 Tim. 5:10 [p. 904]).

37 Thus, according to Plutarch (first century A.D.), both Cato the Younger and Pompey had a bath before supper (λούω, δεῖπνον) (cf. Cato Minor 67.1; Pompeius 55.6; see also Lucian, Gallus 7.9; Timon 54; De morte Peregrini 6). Keener (2003: 909) suggests that the reference “may allude physically to the ritual purification preceding the eating of Passover.”

9 Cf. 13:1; 15:13; see also 1 John 3:23; 4:7–8, 11–12, 19–21. That the early Christians indeed did love one another is attested in the famous statement, quoting observers of Christians, recorded by the church father Tertullian: “See how they love one another” (Apol. 39). Regarding the Jews, on the other hand, the Roman historian Tacitus wrote, “The Jews are extremely loyal toward one another, and always ready to show compassion, but toward every other people they feel only hate and enmity” (Historiae 5.5; cf. Josephus, J.W. 2.8.14 §166). Keener (2003: 926) contends that “[l]ike the Qumran community, John’s outlook is sectarian and dualistic,” but he then proceeds to affirm that this does not negate love for those outside the community. It is unclear to me how, in light of the obvious missionary concern for the world evidenced in this Gospel, Keener can still maintain (even in a qualified sense) that “John’s outlook is sectarian.”

30 See John 21:22–23; 1 Thess. 4:16–17. So, rightly, Morris 1995: 568. Contra Schnackenburg (1990: 3.62), who says that a reference to the parousia would be in contradiction to the Fourth Evangelist’s present eschatology, and Keener (1993: 299), who claims that Jesus’ coming after the resurrection to give the Spirit is in view. This certainly is the case in 16:16 (cf. 14:17–24), but it is more than doubtful whether Jesus’ comments in 14:2–3 indicate that he will prepare a place for the disciples in the interim between his crucifixion and his resurrection and then come back and take them with him at that time. After all, Jesus taught that the gospel must first be preached to all nations, and this will be done through Jesus’ followers.

35 For a comprehensive treatment and critique of religious pluralism within the larger framework of postmodernism, see especially Carson 1996. See also Carson’s comments in his commentary (1991: 491–92) and his important rebuttal of Bruce (1983: 298–99 [picked up Beasley-Murray 1999: 253]), who alleges that “Jesus’ claim, understood in the light of the prologue to the Gospel, is inclusive, not exclusive.” On the exclusivism of 14:6, see also Keener 2003: 941–43.

37 Keener (2003: 943) contends that “truth” and “life” in the present passage “merely clarify the ‘way’ ” (following R. Brown 1970: 621).

61 Keener (2003: 951) proposes a minor chiasmic structure in 14:16–26, with 14:21–24 at the center (though he acknowledges the asymmetry in unit length).

68 For a treatment of the Spirit-Paraclete in the context of the references to the Spirit in the entire Gospel narrative, see M. Davies 1992: 139–53. For a comparison of the treatments of the Spirit in John and the Synoptics, see Köstenberger 1999a: 156. On the Johannine Paraclete and Spirit of truth, see also the extended treatment in Keener 2003: 951–82.

50 Friendship was also the subject of extended reflection in Second Temple wisdom literature (esp. Sir. 6:5–17). For a study of the concept of friendship in Greco-Roman, Jewish, and early Christian literature with special focus on John’s Gospel, see Ford 1997.

2 Keener (2003: 1019) finds another micro-chiasm in 15:18–25, with 15:20ab (a servant is not greater than his master) at the center. The six conditional clauses in 15:18–24 represent warnings pertaining to the future (or present) of the Christian community in relation to the world. Such parting exhortations are a common feature of farewell discourses (Moloney 1998: 433). The present condition is second class: “If the world hates you—and it does” (Wallace 1996: 696; Borchert 2002: 154). On the “world,” see commentary at 1:9; the same phrase occurs in 1 John

3:13 (see also John 17:14). On the contrast between “above” and “below,” see 3:31; 8:23 (cf. 18:36–37). The form γινώσκετε (ginōskete, you know) can be read as an imperative (NIV; NRSV; NLT; ISV; ESV; HCSB; TNIV; Barrett 1978: 480) or an indicative (NASB; KJV), though admittedly the difference is marginal (R. Brown 1970: 686). The pronoun με is emphatic (Morris 1995: 602 n. 42). The perfect verb form μεμίσηκεν (memisēken, it hated) stresses the settled, completed state of the world’s hatred toward Jesus (Barrett 1978: 480; R. Brown 1970: 686; Morris 1995: 602 n. 44).

3 The world’s hatred was experienced by Christians long before John wrote. The Roman historians Tacitus (Annales 15.44) and Suetonius (Nero 16) both called Christianity “a mischievous superstition.” See also the charges leveled against the early Christians listed in Köstenberger 2002c: 147, citing Barclay 1975: 2.183–85. Still useful are Frend 1967 and Workman 1923. Keener (2003: 1017) claims that the worldview presupposed in 15:18–25 is “one common to sectarian groups, in which apocalyptic ideologies (in the modern sense of that expression) often prevail” (though he later acknowledges degrees of “sectarian” outlook [quotation marks his]). In his following paragraph, Keener does concede, however, that John’s emphasis here “probably [but perhaps not?] stems from authentic Jesus tradition.” Did Jesus, then, propagate a sectarian worldview? And, if so, in what sense?

46 Keener (2003: 1034) contends that Carson’s interpretation of 16:8–11 is predicated “on his improbable view that v. 10 refers to the world’s (pseudo-)righteousness.” Keener prefers the traditional view that the righteousness is Christ’s, or his people’s (?).

12 So Blomberg 2002: 228–30; Burge 2000: 491; Morris 1995: 656 (though both the LXX and Josephus use the term also with reference to non-Roman military [2 Macc. 8:23; 12:20, 22; Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §215; J.W. 2.1.3 §11]). Cf. the cautious assessment by Ridderbos (1997: 575). Contra Keener (1993: 306), who maintains that both the “detachment of soldiers” and the “officials from the chief priests and Pharisees” refer to the temple police.

3 For a narrative exegesis of 18:15–19:22, see Larsen 2001: 122–39. Larsen views Pilate as an archetypal tragic figure, in application of the work of Northrop Frye with further reference to Culpepper (1983) and Stibbe (1992; 1994). Keener (2003: 1097) proposes another chiasm for 18:29–19:16, with 19:1–3 (scourging and crown of thorns) at the center. On John’s Passover chronology, see Keener 2003: 1100–1103. Keener (2003: 1103) does not favor Blomberg’s and Carson’s harmonization and concludes that the Synoptics and John “at least imply (perhaps for theological reasons) the Passover on different days.” I have similar problems here with Keener’s reconstruction as with his view on the temple cleansing.

12 That is, “the many meals and celebrations that week in the Passover season” (Burge 2000: 499; cf. Carson 1991: 590; see also Torrey 1931: 239–40). Contra Keener (1993: 307–308), who says that different calendars or John’s “making a symbolic point” account for the apparent discrepancy between John and the Synoptics (different calendars are also the “solution” presented by Laney [1992: 330, following Hoehner]).

68 See Hoehner, DJG 121. Contra Keener (1993: 311) and R. Brown (1970: 891), who conjectures, “Perhaps the tremors that presaged the fall of Sejanus were already felt by sensitive political observers, and Pilate feared that soon he would have no protector at court” (thus placing Jesus’ trial and crucifixion prior to Sejanus’s demise in October, A.D. 31). Another pertinent issue is the designation “friend of Caesar,” on which, see commentary at 19:12. Regarding “the palace,” see commentary at 18:28.

88 Several commentators (e.g., Kruse 2003: 365; Keener 2003: 1132, referring to Meeks 1967:

77 citing b. Pesah. 118a) add that the Jews concluded the Greater Hallel in the Passover haggadah with the prayer “From everlasting to everlasting, you are God; beside you we have no king, redeemer, or savior; no liberator, deliverer, provider. ... We have no King but you.”

29 The double perfect of γέγραφα (gegrapha, I have written) conveys a sense of finality, portraying Pilate’s action as a fait accompli (Ridderbos 1997: 609 n. 134; Morris 1995: 714 n. 54). Bultmann (1971: 670 n. 2 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 902]) suggests that the first perfect is aoristic; Wallace (1996: 577) lists 19:22 as an example of an extensive perfect focusing on the completion of an action in the past. Similar word combinations are found also in the LXX (Gen. 43:14; Esth. 4:16; 1 Macc. 13:38) and in rabbinic literature (b. Menah. 3a; b. Ketub. 96a; b. Yebam. 106b) (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; further instances are cited in Schlatter 1948: 349). Perhaps significantly, similar phrases are found also in a Roman context (note Cicero, Epistulae ad Quintum fratrem 1.2.2; 1.2.13: scripsi, scripsi). Keener’s (2003: 1138) observation that every other instance of “written” in this Gospel refers to Scripture (2:17; 6:31, 45; 8:17; 10:34; 12:14, 16; 15:25), which cannot be broken (10:35), seems of doubtful relevance here.

49 Some Roman Catholic interpreters contend, implausibly, that this statement proves that Mary did not, in fact, have other children after Jesus, for if he had had siblings, he would not have entrusted his mother to “the disciple he loved.” For a discussion on 19:26–27 in the ancient cultural context, see Keener 2003: 1144–45.

1 For a discussion of this pericope’s relationship to the Synoptics, see Ridderbos 1997: 629–30 (see also Morris 1995: 732; R. Brown 1970: 996). Ridderbos (1997: 630–31) also defends the historicity of the event over against Bultmann (1971: 685), who denies historicity and takes an allegorical approach. On historical questions surrounding the Johannine account of Jesus’ resurrection and appearances, see also Keener 2003: 1167–78.

16 The critique by Hatina (1993), who says that the reference is to the indwelling Paraclete, fails to convince. Contrary to the view of many commentators, the present pericope does not constitute the Johannine equivalent to Pentecost (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1038; Barrett [1978: 570], who says that the present passage cannot be harmonized with Acts 2; Bultmann 1971: 691), nor is Calvin’s (1961: 205) proposal satisfactory that at 20:22 the disciples “were only sprinkled with His grace and not [as at Pentecost] saturated with full power.” Beasley-Murray (1999: 382 [followed by Borchert 2002: 307–8]) believes that John telescoped the giving of the Spirit without concern for chronology (citing the reference to the ascension in 20:17 as a parallel). M. Turner (1977) thinks that the reference is not to the Spirit at all but to Jesus’ message as Spirit and life. The treatment by Moloney (1998: 532, 535) is rather idiosyncratic. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.325), too, surprisingly contends that the Johannine instance involves all believers, while the events in Acts 2 pertain to the apostles. If anything, one might have expected the opposite kind of reasoning, with John’s account anticipating the general outpouring narrated in Acts 2. Against the view of Burge (2000: 558 [cf. Burge 1987: 148–49]), who notes the connection between the present passage and Jesus’ promise to send the Spirit in John 14 and 16, the present event does not mark the actual fulfillment of these promises other than by way of anticipatory sign. Keener’s (2003: 1196–1200, see also 1204–6) discussion, including an attempted refutation of M. Turner (1998), remains inconclusive and, on the whole, fails to convince.

20 This “new creation” theme is noted by several commentators, including Morris 1995: 747 n. 58 (who also cites Ezek. 37:9); Barrett 1978: 570; R. Brown 1970: 1035, 1037; Witherington 1995: 342; Keener 2003: 1204. Whitacre (1999: 482) speaks of the event in John 20:22 as the church's "conception," and of Pentecost as its "birth."

10 Thomas's function in John thus is similar to that of the Roman centurion in Mark 15:39.

Keener (2003: 1211) perceptively comments, "Thomas's very skepticism makes him the ideal proponent of a high Christology" in John's Gospel.

13 Keener 2003: 1211–12. A Greek parallel is "O Lord God" in Epictetus, Arriani epistula ad Lucium Gellium 2.16.13. Only decades later, Pliny attests that Christians worshiped Christ as God (Epistulae 10.96 [before A.D. 115]). Other confessions in John include 1:49; 4:42; 6:69; 9:38; 11:27; 16:30; 20:16.

1 Keener (2003: 1213) says that 20:30–31 is the conclusion of the book, followed by the epilogue of chapter 21. Keener (2003: 1221, with reference to Whitacre 1999: 489) also cites other places in the Johannine writings where summary conclusions are followed by additional material (e.g., John 12:36–37; 1 John 5:13; Rev. 22:5).

5 So Ridderbos (1997: 656), who states, "There is much that argues for ascribing the majority of ch. 21 to the Evangelist, as the completion of his narrative, albeit as a striking ... addition to a provisionally concluded whole." Among the tie-ins between chapters 21 and 1–20, Ridderbos cites 21:1, 14 (referring back to the preceding resurrection account, in which Peter and the beloved disciple are linked) and the connection between Peter's reinstatement in 21:15–23 and 13:38/18:16ff. According to Ridderbos (1997: 658), the chapter "was added to describe the passage from Jesus' work on earth to its continuation through his disciples." Keener (2003: 1219–22), too, makes a strong case for the literary unity of John 21 as a chapter and as an integral part of the entire Gospel. He notes that, apart from special vocabulary needed for the matters at hand (such as fishing terminology), chapter 21 does not differ significantly from the rest of the Gospel. Keener (2003: 1219, citing Bruce 1983: 398) lists the following commonalities: the variation of synonymous terms in 21:15–17; the double ἀμήν (21:18); the construction "This he said, indicating" (21:19; cf. 12:33); and the reference to the Sea of Tiberias (21:1; cf. 6:1). Contra, for example, Dodd (1953: 290), who claims that chapter 21 "falls outside the design of the book as a whole" (cited in Minear 1983: 87 n. 11).

7 This, incidentally, is yet another argument against reading 20:22 as indicating an actual impartation of the Spirit at that point. Had they already received the Spirit, it would be almost inexplicable why Peter went back to fishing so soon after that event. So, rightly, Carson (1991: 669–70 [cf. Morris 1995: 760]): "It is impossible to imagine any of this taking place in Acts, after Pentecost ... this is not the portrait of believers who have received the promised Paraclete." Barrett (1978: 579) considers it "unthinkable" that Peter and his fellow disciples "should contemplate a return to their former occupation after the events of chapter 20." Contra Keener (2003: 1227), who argues against negative interpretations of the disciples' return to fishing in 21:3, saying that the disciples simply made use of free time (citing Bruce 1983: 399). Keener also cites Beasley-Murray's (1999: 399) contention that, even though Jesus had risen from the dead, the disciples must still eat.

27 The heading "The Banquet" for 21:9–14 in Keener (2003: 1230) seems overdone; one would hardly call a few fried fish at a lakeshore a banquet. Barrett (1978: 581), seeking to resolve the apparent difficulty of Jesus already cooking fish before the disciples had brought the fish ashore, suggests a literary solution in which two stories, one featuring the disciples catching and bringing the fish and another describing Jesus providing the meal, were being combined. More likely, the presence of fish prior to the disciples bringing theirs is yet another hint at Jesus' supernatural powers of provision.

29 Whatever symbolism there may be in the present reference (see below), the event does not, in my opinion, constitute a Johannine sign, since the signs are confined to the period of Jesus' public ministry to the Jews (John 1–12). See Köstenberger 1995b. Contra, among others, Keener (2003: 1234), who seems to imply that the catch of 153 fish is a Johannine sign.

30 For example, R. Brown (1970: 1097), who interprets the full net allegorically as the absence of schism in the Christian community; Bultmann (1971: 709), who speaks of the “indestructible unity of the Church”; Michaels (1989: 354–55), who contends that the full net indicates the successful completion of Jesus' mission; and Talbert (1992: 260), who says that the 153 fish symbolize the universal outreach of the church. For a virtually exhaustive list of interpretations of the number 153, no matter how implausible, see Keener (2003: 1231–33). He properly concludes that “the number could simply stem from an accurate memory of a careful count on the occasion, because fish had to be counted to be divided among fishermen.” Keener (2003: 1233) also notes that 153 fish may be no more symbolic than Peter swimming 100 yards in 21:8. 12 Keener (2003: 1240–42) seems open (if not favorable) toward the possibility that the author of the entire Gospel wrote the Gospel's final two verses, though he maintains that at least the plural in 21:24 would seem to represent others, discarding the possibility of an “editorial we” (see further below). Keener does not address the first-person singular verb in 21:25.

32 The performance of the miracle is not actually narrated. For the Johannine pattern of implying movement without actually narrating it, see also 5:10, where the Jewish leaders challenging the healed lame man appear out of nowhere; 5:17 and 5:19, where Jesus is shown to respond to charges never made explicit; 6:10, where compliance with Jesus' command to have the people sit down is assumed but not stated; 6:59, where reference is made to Jesus' teaching in the synagogue in Capernaum though his arrival there has not previously been narrated; 9:7, where the movements of the man born blind are traced while Jesus fades from view; 11:16, where Thomas exhorts his fellow disciples to join him in going to Judea to die with Jesus, with the ensuing verse recording the group's arrival, but no reference being made to the actual departure or journey; 11:44, where the reader has to assume that some of the bystanders comply with Jesus' directive to take Lazarus's graveclothes off and let him go (note the shift signaled in both 11:16 and 11:44); 12:20, where the Greeks are shown to arrive, but their subsequent departure is not mentioned; Jesus' hearing before Pilate, where there are certain gaps in the narration of these two characters' movements (e.g., 19:5, 9); and 20:11, where Mary stands outside the tomb crying, without previous record of her approach. See Kellum 2005: 223–30, esp. 229, where he cites R. Brown 1966: 315.

6 On this and other purported examples of an aporia, or literary “seam,” see the excursus in Köstenberger 1999a: 259–60. See also chapter 4 in Kellum 2005 (with special emphasis on 14:31).

107 See also Thielman (1991: 180), who suggests that the seemingly abrupt transition from 5:47 to 6:1 may be an instance of “a purposeful attempt at obscurity” (on which, see ibid., pp. 175–77). According to Thielman, the Fourth Evangelist may have “obscured the organizational pattern of his Gospel by design—to keep out those whose eyes were blind and whose hearts hard (12.40)” (p. 181). See also the work of Kellum (2005), especially pp. 225–26.

1 It is possible that John 13 represents a chiasm centering on Jesus' pronouncement in 13:18–20. See Moloney 1986: 372 (following Simoons 1981: 101). However, this proposal gives insufficient consideration to 13:31 as start of the farewell discourse proper. For a critique of chiasmic proposals related to the Johannine farewell discourse, see Kellum 2005: 63–72. Kellum concludes that “on a structural level the farewell discourse resists a chiasmic solution,” both owing to “the lack of stated awareness of macro-chiasm in antiquity” and because “the text of the farewell discourse itself resists a chiasmic arrangement” (ibid., 72). See also the recent paper by C. Smith (2002) pointing out foundational weaknesses of contemporary chiasmic studies. John 13–17 in its entirety explicates 1:7.

9 For the purposes of this present commentary, the farewell discourse will be treated as a literary unity. Writing in 1982, Segovia (1982: 82) could claim, “Nowadays hardly any exegete would vigorously maintain that John 13:31–18:1 is a literary unity as it stands.” The past two decades have seen the emergence of many, often mutually contradictory, redaction-critical proposals, most notably the theory of the “relecture” of John 13–14 in John 15–16 (see esp. Dettwiler 1995). The primary grounds for such theories is the magnus reus (“great offender”) of 14:31, which to many suggests a “literary seam” (aporia). However, Kellum (2005: esp. 205–33) recently has demonstrated the weaknesses of a disunity theory applied to the Johannine farewell discourse on stylistic, structural, and thematic grounds. Moreover, 14:31 is shown more likely to constitute an instance of the Johannine device of implied movement, which may in a given instance convey a shift in topic (cf. 11:16, 44; 20:11). This observation is significant not only on a micro level but also on a macro level. Within the context of the entire discourse, this device is employed to foster both discourse continuity and progression, moving in an increasingly exclusionary direction. In 13:30, Judas’s departure leaves Jesus and the Eleven, triggering Jesus’ initial cycle of instruction. In 14:31, it is Jesus and his followers whose departure is implied, followed by a metaphorical deepening of Jesus’ words from 13:31–14:30. Finally, in 17:1 Jesus lifts his eyes to heaven, praying by himself. On the other end of the discourse, Jesus and the disciples are shown to cross the Kidron Valley in 18:1, with the subsequent arrest of Jesus and the ensuing events of his passion. Hence, there is no need to resort to redaction-critical relecture or chiasmic or other theories, and 14:31 is not a “literary seam” but part of a carefully designed pattern of escalating narrative movement.

1 This narrow delineation of the farewell discourse is affirmed by, among others, G. Johnston (1970), Segovia (1991, followed tentatively by Keener [2003: 891]), and Dettwiler (1995 [though note that Dettwiler starts the discourse at 13:1 to accommodate his relecture theory]). See also Kellum 2005. Many who do include chapter 17 do so by way of separate reference to Jesus’ final prayer (e.g., Carson 1980).

95 Hence, 14:27 continues 14:25–26. See Kellum (2005: 164), who cites Witherington 1995: 253 and Brodie 1993: 469. In the Greek world, peace (εἰρήνη, eirēnē) was essentially a concept stated negatively, denoting the absence of war. Though this is also part of the term’s range of meaning in Hebrew thought (e.g., Josh. 9:15; 1 Sam. 7:14; 1 Kings 2:5), the expression shālôm usually had much richer connotations, conveying the notion of positive blessing, especially that of a right relationship with God (Morris 1965a: 237–44; Lindars 1972: 484). This is evident in the well-known blessing given by Moses and Aaron (Num. 6:24–26; cf. Ps. 29:11; Hag. 2:9). The OT prophetic writings in particular look forward to a period of peace inaugurated by the coming of the Messiah. The “prince of peace” (Isa. 9:6) would “command peace to the nations” (Zech. 9:10; cf. 9:9), and there would be good tidings of peace and salvation (Isa. 52:7; cf. 54:13; 57:19; Acts 10:36). Through the royal Messiah, God would make an everlasting “covenant of peace” with his people (Ezek. 37:26).

Kenyon, F. 193n92
Kerr, A. R. 8, 8n20, 14n24, 41
Kessler, W. T. 562n9

104 The transition from 14:31 to 15:1 is frequently labeled an aporia, which is commonly taken to indicate a literary seam indicating the presence of different underlying sources (one of the first to see such a difficulty was C. H. Weisse 1856: 116; cf. Wellhausen 1907 and the influential series of essays by E. Schwartz 1907; 1908; see the historical survey in Kellum 2005: 10–78). However, this conclusion seems premature and unwarranted in light of preferable alternate explanations. Thielman (1991: 180), for instance, suggests that the present passage may be an instance of a “purposeful attempt at obscurity” common in ancient writers (he cites the transition from 5:47 to 6:1 as another possible example). Recently, Kellum (2005: 230) has suggested that statements indicating movement in the Fourth Gospel regularly serve as ways to move along the narrative. Stibbe (1993: 159), too, is able to make “very good sense” of the narrative as it stands without resorting to source-critical theories. For him, 14:31 is part of the Johannine theme of “the elusive Christ.” After saying in 14:30 that the devil “has no hold” on him, Jesus, knowing that the “prince of this world” is now coming, is evading his captors for one final time. Schlatter (1948: 304), finally, makes the improbable suggestion that the unevenness may be due to a break in dictation.

20 This is what, in application of Robert E. Longacre’s methodology, may mark 15:1–17 as the peak of the entire farewell discourse (Kellum 2005: 193–96). In the present chapter, “remain” seems to serve as a metaphorical substitute for “believe.” On the “strange absence” of the word πιστεύω (pisteuō, believe) in John 15, see Morris 1995: 297 (cited in Croteau 2002: 111).

92 See Kenyon 1939: 38 (cited in Morris 1995: 292 n. 118). See also b. Meg. 18b (cf. Köstenberger 2002c: 61–62).

20 Very few would argue for a date prior to A.D. 70, as do J. A. T. Robinson 1976: 254–85 (but see the refutation in Kerr 2002: 19–25; see also Carson 1991: 82–86); Morris 1995: 25–30 (with reference to Cribbs 1970; Torrey 1936: x–xi); and Wallace 1990 (but see the present commentary at 5:2). However, the cumulative weight of the following internal evidence must be judged to favor a post–A.D. 70 date (cf. Croteau 2003): the references to the Sea of Tiberias in 6:1 and 21:1; Thomas’s confession of Jesus as “my Lord and my God” in 20:28 (contra emperor worship in time of Domitian?); the reference to Peter’s martyrdom (21:19); and the lack of reference to the Sadducees (Schlatter 1948: 44; though see the caution in Carson 1991: 84)—not to mention the comparative ease with which the Fourth Evangelist equates Jesus with God (e.g., 1:1, 14; 10:30; 20:28; see Carson 1991: 85, though note his caveats on p. 84) or external evidence such as Clement of Alexandria’s statement, cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7, “Last of all, John, perceiving that the external facts had been made plain [in the Synoptics] ... composed a spiritual gospel.” This is true especially since the major pieces of evidence cited in support of a pre–A.D. 70 date—the lack of reference to the destruction of the temple and the use of a present-tense verb in 5:2 to refer to the Sheep Gate pool—are not determinative and are capable of alternative explanations (see, e.g., Schlatter 1948: 23–24).

24 On Jesus as the replacement and fulfillment of the temple in John’s Gospel, see especially Coloe 2001; Johnson 2001; Hoskins 2002; and Kerr 2002. For a treatment that links this Johannine motif with the composition of the Fourth Gospel, see Motyer 1997 and Köstenberger forthcoming. On Jesus and Israel’s traditions of judgment and restoration, see Bryan 2002.

9 Cf. 21:2–3, 7–8, 11, 15–23. On Peter as prime resurrection witness, see Kessler 1998.

Kilpatrick, G. D. 172
Kippenberg, H. G. 146n16, 153, 157, 157n56
Klaiber, W. 133n1
Klausner, J. 506n16
Klein, W. W. 3
Klinger, M. 71, 584n4
Knapp, H. M. 240n57
Koester, C. R. 30n35, 83, 83n105, 83n106, 153n40, 154n45, 165, 165n80, 165n83, 217n83

16 See Potter 1959: 331; Kippenberg 1971: 94; Riesner, DJG 40. A few late sources (such as Jerome) substitute “Shechem” for “Sychar,” but this is clearly secondary (contra R. Brown 1966: 169; Burge 2000: 141).

56 See Bammel 1957: 381–85; Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 264–65; Kippenberg 1971: 276–327.

1 On the connections between 3:22–36 and 3:11–21, see Klaiber 1990. Stegemann (1990: 514), in a very sound structural proposal, views 1:19–34 and 3:22–36 as inclusios encompassing 1:19–3:36, which in turn is a composite of 1:19–2:11 (John the Baptist; first week of Jesus’ ministry; first sign) and 2:13–3:36 (Jesus’ ministry in Jerusalem, including sign; John the Baptist [2:12 is transitional]).

16 Their arms and methods are recalled in a “street-ballad” (see Köstenberger 2002c: 157, following Klausner 1925: 337); various versions circulated, depending on the high priests targeted (cf. b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.21).

4 Gaventa (1996: 246–47), drawing on Torgovnick’s (1981) insights on closure, suggests that chapters 20 and 21 pursue different “strategies of closure.” According to Gaventa, chapter 20 structurally corresponds primarily to the prologue (cf., e.g., 20:17 with 1:10; 20:24–31 with 1:7, 13; and 20:28, 31 with 1:18), while chapter 21 recalls a number of scenes throughout the Gospel (cf., e.g., 21:24 with 1:6–8; 21:18–19 with 10:11; 21:15–23 with 13:36) (on the connections between the call narratives of chapters 1 and 21, see Franzmann and Klinger 1992). What is more, chapters 20 and 21 also differ in focus, with chapter 20 centering primarily on Jesus, and chapter 21 foregrounding (two select representatives of) the disciples. There is some truth in this, but oversimplifications should be avoided. John’s narrative strategy is doubtless more complex than is often thought.

57 Isa. 12:3; 44:3; 49:10; Ezek. 36:25–27; 47:1; Joel 3:18; Amos 9:11–15; Zech. 13:1. Ezekiel 47:1–11 is favored by Hodges (1979b) and Knapp (1997: 116–17).

35 For an extensive discussion of the place of symbolism in the Fourth Gospel, see Culpepper 1983: 180–98. See also C. Koester 2003.

105 C. Koester 1990a: 23–34; cf. Barrett 1978: 185; Nicklas (2000b: 201–2) is less than convinced. Other commentators consider the reference to be incidental, intended to show merely that Jesus “knew” Nathanael prior to their actual encounter (Ridderbos 1997: 90; cf. Burge 2000: 78; R. Brown 1966: 83; Moloney 1998: 56; contra Morris 1995: 146; Witherington 1995: 71; Borchert 1996: 148; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.317). Keener (2003: 486), too, rejects any deeper significance in the identification, suggesting that the fig tree may be mentioned simply because a specific landmark was necessary for some reason. Witherington’s suggestion that Nathanael is being portrayed as an expert in the law who thus would know that the Messiah could not come from Nazareth seems far-fetched.

106 The DSS and other Jewish and early Christian texts indicate that the term “Branch” was a familiar designation for the Davidic messiah (4QFlor 10–12a; 4QP Bless; 4QpIsa^a 8–10; T. Jud. 24; Rev. 5:5). The DSS also show that the “Branch” was identified as God’s “son” and king over Israel (C. Koester 1990a: 27–30).

40 Some interpreters (such as Lindars [1972: 186]) argue that “five men/husbands” alludes to a tradition cited in Josephus, according to which the Samaritans had five gods (Ant. 9.14.3 §288; cf. 2 Kings 17:24, 30–31), just as “five colonnades” in 5:2 is taken to refer to the Jewish Pentateuch (Hengel 1999: 307, 315). As Blomberg (1995: 8 [cf. Schlatter 1948: 122]) points out, however, in reality the text lists seven gods of five nations (but see Prest 1992: 368; see also the discussion in C. Koester 1990b: 675–77).

45 C. Koester (1990b: 673–74) notes that while Samaritans claimed that Moses had hidden the vessels of the tabernacle on Mount Gerizim (see Josephus, Ant. 18.4.1 §85), the Jews traced the roots of Samaritan idolatry to when Jacob’s wife Rachel stole and hid her father’s household gods in that place (Gen. 31:19, 34; cf. 35:4; see Gen. Rab. 81.3 [ca. A.D. 180]; Pseudo-Philo, Bib. Ant. 25.10).

80 C. Koester 1990b: 665–80, esp. 667; cf. Deissmann 1927: 364–65; Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 268.

83 An implied contrast with the Roman emperor is favored in Morris 1995: 251 n. 98; Beasley-Murray 1999: 65; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 1.458. C. Koester (1990b: 678) contends that the Samaritans’ designation of Jesus as “Savior of the world” is part of the Johannine kingship theme, in contrast to the Jews’ disavowal of Jesus as their king in 19:15 (“We have no king but Caesar”). Koester also points to the Roman presence in Samaria as evidence for the countercultural nature of the Samaritans’ confession of Jesus (rather than the Roman emperor) as “Savior of the world” (pp. 678–79).

83 See Gen. 9:4; Lev. 17:10–14; Deut. 12:16. See C. Koester 2003: 102–4.

58 For a helpful chart summarizing people’s belief or lack thereof in the remainder of the Gospel, see Croteau 2002: 120 (on believing in John’s Gospel, see also Gaffney 1965; Melick 1976; and H. Koester 1989). In the first half of the narrative, negative responses predominate; the few instances of believing in the second half are all positive. This seems to support the notion, defended in the present commentary, that Jesus’ mission in John 1–12 is predominantly (though not exclusively) one of failure owing to people’s lack of believing response, while John 13–21 is taken up with Jesus’ focus on the nucleus of the new messianic community. Hence 1:12, as the pivot of the prologue, serves to encapsulate the entire scope of John’s presentation of people’s responses to the Messiah in terms of reception or rejection with the result of eternal life or judgment.

7 See also Kopp 1963: 368–39. R. Brown (1970: 845) also notes that the term αὐλή (aulē, palace), used in Mark 15:16 to describe the Praetorium, occurs frequently in Josephus with reference to the Herodian palace but never with regard to the Fortress of Antonia.

80 A paved court measuring about 2,300 square yards has been excavated on the lower level of the fortress of Antonia, one of the two possible sites of the governor’s residence (the other is Herod’s Palace in the northwest part of the upper city; see commentary at 18:28; Avi-Yonah 1964: 152). The blocks making up this pavement are more than a yard square and a foot thick. This kind of structure may well have been famous as “the stone pavement.” However, it is unclear whether the excavated pavement was part of the fortress of Antonia in Jesus’ time or not

Kosmala, H. 520n45

Kossen, H. B. 377

Köstenberger, A. J. xi, 1, 1n2, 2, 2n4, 5, 5n10, 6, 6n14, 7n15, 7n16, 7n17, 8, 8n19, 9, 14, (Kopp [1963: 372–73] suggests a date ca. A.D. 135).

45 The former is suggested by Kosmala 1963; 1967–68; the latter by Lattey 1953–54; R. Brown 1970: 828 (both citing Lagrange). See also commentary at 13:36–38.

2 See the recent paper by O’Day (2002), who says that the abandonment of the apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel has “created space” for new readings of the Gospel. Others, however, view the results of the rejection of the apostolic authorship of John’s Gospel in less positive terms. In any case, the summary way in which Johannine authorship is regularly dismissed in contemporary scholarship is without justification, for this theory of authorship has never been definitively refuted (Köstenberger 2001b: 17–47). Though only a theory, it continues to be a possible and, I would argue, eminently plausible hypothesis based on both external and internal evidence (see, e.g., Carson 1991: 68–81; Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 138–57; and the discussion below).

4 The Fourth Gospel’s integrity is not compromised by the inimitable Johannine style, enveloping narrative as well as discourse portions. For positive assessments of the historical reliability of John’s Gospel, see Köstenberger 2002c; Blomberg 1993; 2001; 2002; contra M. Casey 1996. Nevertheless, there continues to be skepticism on the part of many; see the recent survey by Kysar (2002a), the largely positive assessment by Thompson (2002), and the very negative evaluation by Attridge (2002b).

10 See Köstenberger 1999a: 30–31. There has been a virtual avalanche of literary explorations of Johannine themes or specific Johannine portions of text pouring from the presses in the last two decades. Among those are Culpepper 1983; Duke 1985; Staley 1988; M. Davies 1992; Stibbe 1992; 1994; Lee 1994; Tovey 1997; Beck 1997; Conway 1999; and Harstine 2002, to list but a few.

14 Note that the label “the disciple Jesus loved” occurs only in the second major portion of John’s Gospel (first at 13:23). This is in keeping with the marked shift in perspective starting in 13:1, where the disciples’ mission is viewed from the perspective of Jesus’ exaltation (Köstenberger 1998b: 153). Hence, the casting of John in more elevated terms in chapters 13–21 is not unique in John’s Gospel and may be seen as indicating that the apostle, as “the disciple Jesus loved,” has an important part to play in the postexaltation mission of Jesus carried out through his commissioned followers.

15 The epithet “the disciple Jesus loved” is plausibly understood as an instance of authorial modesty (see Vanhoozer 1993: 374, who cites Augustine and Westcott, contra Barrett 1978: 117). On authorial modesty, see also Köstenberger 2004.

16 See Blomberg 2001: 72, referring to Westcott. Nevertheless, it should be acknowledged that apostolic authorship remains a hypothesis. In an essay surveying scholarship from the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries on the issue, I have shown that the apostolic paradigm was challenged on largely philosophical rather than evidential grounds and that there is therefore compelling reason to doubt that the Fourth Gospel’s Johannine authorship has ever been refuted by actual argument (Köstenberger 2001b: 17–47). To assert the superiority of alternative hypotheses as virtually self-evident without adducing supporting evidence, as is commonly done today, hardly constitutes evenhanded scholarship. Cf. Keener 2003: 81–139, who at the outset of his thorough investigation of the authorship of John’s Gospel (which concludes, tentatively, in favor of apostolic authorship) states that the Fourth Gospel's apostolic authorship has often been opposed out of dogmatism (p. 81) but that "traditional conservative scholars have made a better case for Johannine authorship of the Gospel ... than other scholars have made against it" (p. 82).

 17 One tricky piece of evidence concerns the second-century writer Papias (cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.4–5), a contemporary of Polycarp, who, in turn, was a disciple of the apostle John (on the date of Papias, see Yarbrough 1983; Munck 1959). Papias (at least to Eusebius) seems to refer to two separate Johns, the apostle and a "John the elder." On this basis some have conjectured that the latter, rather than the former, wrote the Fourth Gospel. However, there is no need to drive a wedge between the two references to John in the passage in question. To the contrary, John may be designated "the elder" in the latter part of the quotation precisely because he is grouped with the elders mentioned earlier in the same passage. For a sound critique of the "John the elder" hypothesis, see Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 141–43. Keener (2003: 95–98) likewise challenges the reliability of Eusebius's interpretation of Papias, owing to the former's agenda of seeking to denigrate the Apocalypse. Keener (2003: 102–3) also includes an insightful discussion of the plausibility of John writing the Gospel at an advanced age. See also the works cited in Bauckham 1993: 27 n. 17 and the important essay by Hill (1998), who adduces from Eusebius's (Hist. eccl. 3.24.5–13, esp. 11) reference to Papias (without naming him) that Papias held John the apostle to be the author of the Fourth Gospel (contra Bauckham 1993; Hengel 1989a; note my review of Hengel's more extensive 1993 German monograph on the subject, Köstenberger 1996). For studies of the external evidence regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, see Bauckham 1993: 24 n. 1.

19 See especially Alexander 1992 and Goodman 1992. For a fuller development and further bibliography, see Köstenberger forthcoming. For a critique of the Martyn/Brown-style "Johannine community" hypothesis, see Köstenberger 1998b: 200–210; Carson 1991: 35–36, 87–88, 369–72; and commentary at 9:22 below.

24 On Jesus as the replacement and fulfillment of the temple in John's Gospel, see especially Coloe 2001; Johnson 2001; Hoskins 2002; and Kerr 2002. For a treatment that links this Johannine motif with the composition of the Fourth Gospel, see Motyer 1997 and Köstenberger forthcoming. On Jesus and Israel's traditions of judgment and restoration, see Bryan 2002.

30 See the brief treatments in Köstenberger 1999a: 36–37, 198–200. Stuhlmacher (2002: 185–87) contends that John and the Synoptics do not merely represent different perspectives (what M. Hengel calls "aspective"), but that the Fourth Gospel "cultivates a[n] ... idealized type of memory concerning Jesus." He urges, "The Johannine witness therefore needs to be consistently realigned with the Synoptics, the Pauline corpus and the OT, so that faith in Jesus Christ does not lose its historical roots" (p. 187). This, however, seems to be merely an oblique way of saying that John's Gospel is historically unreliable and that there are real contradictions between John and the Synoptics (cf. Stuhlmacher's more blunt statement in 1997: 287 [cited in Köstenberger 2002a: 144 n. 3]). I, of course, deny both accusations.

31 See Köstenberger 1999a: 205; 2000: 284; see also Keener 2003: 126–39, esp. 129. On the relationship between John's Gospel and the Pauline writings and the remainder of the NT, see Köstenberger 1999a: 205–7; 2000: 284–85.

26 For a brief survey of the divinity and uniqueness of Jesus, particularly claims of Jesus' preexistence, see Köstenberger 1998b: 46–47 (see relevant bibliography in nn. 7–8).

29 Though note that Jesus is not explicitly mentioned until 1:17. "All things" (τὰ πάντα, ta panta) may echo Gen. 1:31 (cf. Gen. 9:3; Ashton 1986: 184 n. 37). Though startling, the substance of the present assertion is in no way unique to John; it pervades much of the NT (cf. 1 Cor. 8:6; Col. 1:16; Heb. 1:2). For extrabiblical parallels, see Köstenberger 2002c: 6. For a survey of possible backgrounds for 1:3, see Keener 2003: 375–81.

40 As Lincoln (2000: 21) notes, not only does the lawsuit motif (see Isa. 40–55, esp. 42:18–25; 43:22–28; 50:1–3) occur in each of the five main sections of John’s narrative (prologue; 1:19–12:50; 13–17; 18–20; epilogue), but it does so in highly significant ways, forming the narrative framework of the Gospel (p. 141). According to Lincoln, just as there are seven signs and seven discourses in John’s Gospel, there are seven witnesses: John the Baptist, Jesus himself, Jesus’ works, God the Father, the Scriptures, the Samaritan woman, and the crowd. For a summary and appraisal of Lincoln’s important monograph, see Köstenberger 2001a.

46 On the general motif of “light,” see commentary at 1:4–5. On the coming of the Messiah in terms of light, see especially Horbury (1998: 92–93, 99–100), who also discusses rabbinic interpretations. Important OT references include Num. 24:17 (cf. 4QTest 9–13); Isa. 9:2 (cf. 42:6–7; see commentary at John 1:5); and Mal. 4:2 (cf. Luke 1:78–79; see Köstenberger 2002c: 8).

47 Later in John’s Gospel, Jesus calls himself “the light of the world” (8:12; 9:5). See also the depiction of Jesus in the Book of Revelation (1:14, 16; 2:18; 19:12; 21:23; 22:5, 16; cf. Matt. 17:2 pars.; Heb. 1:3; 2 Pet. 1:19). Köstenberger (2002c: 8) points out that the contrast conveyed by the expression “true light” is primarily between previous OT manifestations of God and God’s final, definitive revelation through Jesus Christ.

70 For further discussion and relevant passages, see Köstenberger 1997: 230.

76 On God the Father in the Gospel of John, see especially the work of Thompson (2000; 2001). See my largely appreciative review of her contribution (Köstenberger 2002d), yet note the concerns I raise regarding the overall thesis of her work.

6 Greek, Ἰουδαῖοι. Here and elsewhere in the Fourth Gospel, this Greek term ought to be rendered in keeping with the connotative meaning supplied by the respective context (see the TNIV). In a recent paper, S. Porter (2002), taking as his point of departure the recent compendium edited by Bieringer et al. (2001a; 2001b), contends that no single proposal explains all instances of the term in John’s Gospel. He notes that only twenty-six out of seventy instances of Ἰουδαῖοι in John are negative (including 11:8, 54, but not 1:19; 5:10, 15; 8:22; 10:24; 18:12; 19:31). According to Porter, the singular referent of the term in John’s Gospel is the Jewish people as a religious, ethnic group. However, a given context may limit the reference to a subgroup. A case in point is an articular, demonstrative use: “those Jews there.” Anaphoric usage provides discourse continuity and cohesion. Partitive uses are found as well. Both literalistic views and “politically correct” views, according to Porter, are to be eschewed in favor of an understanding that is linguistically informed and contextually sensitive. When applied as part of a salvation-historical reading of the Johannine narrative and supplemented by other related terms, such as οἱ Ἰῆδοι in 1:11, the approach advocated by Porter is superior to woodenly literal or ideologically driven alternatives (see also Köstenberger 2003).

19 Note John’s “sending” theme, especially 1:6, where the Baptist is said to have been “sent” from God; the Jewish delegation had been sent merely from Jerusalem. Note also the instance of stylistic variation of “sending” words: πέμπω in 1:22, ἀποστέλλω in 1:24 (Köstenberger 1999c). Wallace (1996: 621) cites the participle πέμψασιν in 1:22 as an example of an independent substantial participle.

74n63, 78, 84n111, 85n113, 86n119, 87, 89n2, 92n10, 92n11, 102n1, 102n6, 105n15, 105n16, 108, 111n36, 117, 121, 126n38, 130n49, 131n51, 135n6, 141n1, 148n26, 151,

54 For a detailed discussion of the characterization of Jesus' disciples in this Gospel, see Culpepper 1983: 119–25. See also chapter 4 in Köstenberger 1998b.

57 Moreover, it is far from certain whether those uttering these initial lofty confessions understood the full import of their words (cf. the Johannine “misunderstanding” theme). See further Köstenberger 1999a: 66–69; Carson 1991: 147–48, 153–54.

59 Further references in the present Gospel are found in 1:38, 40, 43; 8:12; 10:4, 5, 27; 12:26; 13:36, 37; 21:19, 22. See Köstenberger 1998b: 145–47, 177–80.

60 For further rabbinic parallels, see Köstenberger 1998a: 119.

63 See esp. Köstenberger 1998a: 97–128 (condensed in Köstenberger 1999a: 257–58).

111 For relevant literature, see Köstenberger 1998b: 48–49 n. 17.

113 See the surveys in Hawthorne, DJG 7–8; Moloney 1978: 1–22; Culpepper 1993: 57–101 (on 1:51, see pp. 61–63). See also Köstenberger 2002c: 22.

119 This corresponds to the threefold division suggested by D. Guthrie (1981: 285–87): origin, authority, and exaltation (cited in Ham 1998: 78). For a bibliographic note, see Köstenberger 1998b: 50–51 n. 26. For a basic survey and relevant literature, see Ham 1998.

2 For a defense of the temple clearing as a Johannine sign, see Köstenberger 1995b (cf. P. Trudinger 1997: 330), contra R. Brown (1966: 528), who claims that every use of σημεῖον (sēmeion, sign) refers to a “miraculous deed.” By referring to the “temple cleansing” as “temple clearing,” I take up a suggestion made by Mathews (1988–89: 101); cf. E. Sanders 1985: 61–76; Evans 1989: 237–70.

10 On Jewish weddings, see the sidebar in Köstenberger 2002c: 24. See also Safrai 1976; Derrett 1970: 227–38; Ferguson 1993: 68–69; Williams, DJG 86–88.

11 On Jesus' natural family, see the sidebar in Köstenberger 2002c: 25.

1 See the sidebar in Köstenberger 2002c: 30.

6 For a detailed discussion of the prophetic symbolism entailed by Jesus' clearing of the temple and the argument that this event should be considered the second sign recorded in John's Gospel, see Köstenberger 1995b.

15 See the Greek inscription (discovered in 1870) cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 29; cf. Geva, NEAEHL 2:744; Millard 1997: 243. See also m. Kelim 1.8; Josephus, Ant. 15.11.4 §417; J.W. 5.5.1 §193; 6.2.4 §125.

16 See the sidebar in Köstenberger 2002c: 30.

36 Cf. Carson 1991: 177; 1984: 441; Morris 1995: 167; Laney 1992: 70; Westcott 1908: 1.96–97; Calvin 1959: 51; Köstenberger 1999a: 76–78. Carson (1991: 177, referring to Morris) notes that virtually all of John 1–5 (except for the sections on John the Baptist) is non-Synoptic material. Morris (1995: 167 n. 55) states that “there are practically no resemblances between the two narratives, apart from the central act”; only five words are shared. Other commentators holding this view are Luther, W. Hendriksen, and R. V. G. Tasker (Kreitzer 1998: 94).

38 A similar sentiment is expressed in Wis. 9:16 (first century B.C.): “We can hardly guess at what is on the earth ... but who has traced out what is in the heavens?” (cf. Jdt. 8:14). See also the anecdote involving Rabban Gamaliel (ca. A.D. 90) recounted in Köstenberger 2002c: 36.

49 See the references cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 38.

51 See the discussion of Plato's “Allegory of the Cave” (Republic 7.1–11 [ca. 390 B.C.]) in relation to John 3:19–21 by Köstenberger (2002c: 38–39), who notes that in Plato’s allegory, the person who has seen the light is the philosopher who is cognizant of the world of ideas and thus is able better to explain reality, while in Jesus’ teaching, the light is himself (cf. 1:4–5; 8:12; 9:5), and people’s main problem is not ignorance but sin (cf. Ferguson 1993: 313–14).

6 On this and other purported examples of an aporia, or literary “seam,” see the excursus in Köstenberger 1999a: 259–60. See also chapter 4 in Kellum 2005 (with special emphasis on 14:31).

1 See the sidebar on Samaritans in Köstenberger 2002c: 45, including the listing of additional bibliography in footnote A-15 on p. 215.

26 See y. Šeb. 9.9; Lam. Rab. 3.17; y. Ber. 8.5; t. Ber. 6.4–5. See also Köstenberger 1998a: 122.

62 See the discussion and references in Köstenberger 1998a: 120–22. Contra Keener (1993: 274), who refers to “the general principle that one ought not to challenge one’s teacher.”

79 Though translations usually render ἀπέστειλα in the past tense (“sent”), it can be argued that “send” is a better rendering; if so, Jesus is talking here not about a sending in the past, but about the disciples’ mission in general (on 4:34–38, see Köstenberger 1998b: 180–84).

33 On Sabbath and Sunday observance, see the sidebar in Köstenberger 2002c: 59. On the Johannine characterization of “the Jews,” see commentary at 1:19.

41 Moloney 1998: 173; cf. Metzner 1999; Lee 1994: 110; Witkamp 1985: 24; Leidig 1979: 211; contra Thomas 1995: 18. Moloney (1998: 173) rightly notes, contra Beck (1993 [cf. 1997: 86–90]), who argues that anonymous characters in the Fourth Gospel draw the reader into an identification with the character, “The reader of the Fourth Gospel, however, hardly identifies with a man who is in league with ‘the Jews’ (vs. 15).” Keener (2003: 87), similarly, contends that a list of Johannine models of faith is not entirely coextensive with anonymous characters (citing esp. 5:14–15) and registers this as his only serious disagreement with Beck (p. 87 n. 49). Beck, in a review (2001), indirectly responds to my earlier criticism (Köstenberger 1999b, reviewing Beck 1997) that the man in John 5 disproves his theory by alleging, in effect, that I have no place for literary analysis in my hermeneutical method. Nothing could be further from the truth. My concern, rather, lies with an unqualified wholesale adoption of reader-response criticism by evangelicals who fail to realize that this methodology is part and parcel of a postmodern hermeneutic that is left with nothing but subjective readings devoid of any claim to authority or universal applicability. Moreover, I was concerned to point out that Beck’s central thesis (i.e., that anonymity necessarily equals ideal function and positive characterization) is invalid. Note further this puzzling conclusion by Brodie (1993: 238): “The final picture ... is ... open to a positive interpretation: the man has finally come to mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus, and he is announcing the good news to the Jews.” Precisely where Brodie finds the man “announcing the good news to the Jews” is unclear to me, nor can I see textual evidence for the man coming to “mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus.”

42 The giving of life is central to Jesus’ mission in this Gospel (see 3:16–17; 6:33, 40, 44, 47, 50–58; 10:7–10; 17:2–3; cf. Köstenberger 1998b: 75–76).

61 Cf. b. Ta’an. 2a (attributed to Rabbi Yohanan, ca. A.D. 70 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 58]) and the Shemoneh Esreh (ca. A.D. 70–100 [cited in Schürer 1973–79: 2.455–63]).

75 On the double-negative construction underlying the phrase “by myself I can do nothing,” see commentary at 14:30 and the close parallel 15:5. Cf. m. Abot 2.4 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 60).

192n89, 193n92, 194n100, 200, 203n20, 205, 209n51, 210n55, 214n69, 217n85, 226, 230n12, 232n20, 233, 233n24, 234n28, 234n30, 238, 241n60, 241n62, 241n64, 244n77, 244n79, 248, 253n7, 254n11, 261, 262n54, 263n61, 266, 270n93, 282, 288n51, 297, 87 See Köstenberger 1998b: 72–73. The term is repeated in 5:36 for emphasis (Morris 1995: 290).

89 Cf. m. Abot 4.22; Exod. Rab. 1.20; Wis. 1:6 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 61, 201 n. 164).

92 See Kenyon 1939: 38 (cited in Morris 1995: 292 n. 118). See also b. Meg. 18b (cf. Köstenberger 2002c: 61–62).

100 See Exod. 32:11–14, 30–32; Num. 12:13; 14:19–20; 21:7; Deut. 9:18–20, 25–29. See also As. Mos. 11:17 (cf. 12:6; Jub. 1:19–21; cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 62; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 79; Ridderbos 1997: 207; Carson 1991: 266).

20 This reflects the views of Rabbis Hillel and Yohanan (cf. b. Hul. 105b, attributed to Abaye [ca. A.D. 280–339]). The expression “so that nothing may perish” is also documented in rabbinic literature with reference to food (y. Sanh. 6.6; y. Hag. 2.2; see Köstenberger 2002c: 65).

Regarding Jewish care with respect to food, see E. Johnston 1962: 153–54; Daube 1956: 42.

51 The expectation is also found in later rabbinic tradition (see quotations in Köstenberger 2002c: 68–69).

55 On John’s portrayal of Jesus as the one who comes into the world and returns to the Father (descent/ascent), see Köstenberger 1998b: 121–30.

69 Though shortly it will become apparent that his teaching is “too hard” for many of his followers (6:60). On Jesus as a rabbi in John’s Gospel, see Köstenberger 1998a.

85 It is possible that the second-century synagogue excavated at Capernaum was located on the site of the synagogue mentioned here. See the sidebar in Köstenberger 2002c: 70.

12 See Eccles. 3:1 (cf. Eccles. Rab. 3.1) and the rabbinic and Qumran material cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 73.

20 See the list in Köstenberger 2002c: 74. For a general survey, see Heard, DJG 688–98.

24 In the post-Jamnia period (after ca. A.D. 90), the term “rabbi” came to refer exclusively to those who had undergone formal rabbinic training. See b. Soṭah 22a (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 74–75; cf. Str-B 2:486; Beasley-Murray 1999: 108). See also commentary at 7:49.

28 See also Josephus, J.W. 6.5.3 §§300–309 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 75). Keener (2003: 715) observes that Jesus will reverse this charge and in 8:41, 44 identify the devil as the “father” of “the Jews.”

30 See the material cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 76 and Keener 2003: 717.

60 See the material cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 78–79. See also Grigsby 1986.

62 See the material cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 79. See also Marcus 1998; and Schnackenburg (1990: 2.156), who connects κοιλία with the water flowing from Jesus’ side at 19:34.

64 For rabbinic and Qumran parallels, see Köstenberger 2002c: 79.

77 Cf. Acts 25:16; Josephus, Ant. 14.9.3 §167; J.W. 1.10.6 §209; see Pancaro 1972. Later rabbinic rulings concur (Exod. Rab. 21.3 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 81]).

79 See the rabbinic literature cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 81. For another doubtful assertion by Jesus’ antagonists, see 8:33.

7 For a detailed description of Tabernacles festivities and their relevance for the portrayal of Jesus in John 7–8, see Köstenberger 2002c: 82.

11 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 128–29. Moloney (1998: 268, citing Talbert) notes that there was an expectation that the pillar of fire would return “at the end of time.” For Qumran and Second

297n1, 297n2, 297n3, 297n4, 302n18, 302n22, 306n44, 307n46, 308, 309, 309n58, 333n53, 341n95, 342n104, 349n134, 350, 351n140, 352n142, 358n4, 358n5, 370n14,

Temple parallels, see Köstenberger 2002c: 82.

54 For a brief sketch of the conceptions of freedom in Judaism and Greek philosophy, see Köstenberger 2002c: 85–86.

61 See the references cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 87; Kruse 2003: 210.

93 Such as Abraham: see the midrash Tanḥuma 6.11. For Greco-Roman parallels, see Köstenberger 2002c: 90.

51 Cited by Köstenberger (2002c: 95), who also provides a basic critique of this reconstruction.

1 For a thorough investigation of the OT background of John 10, especially 10:16, see Köstenberger 2002b. On sheep and shepherd imagery, see also Keener 2003: 799–802.

2 The reference is plainly to Jesus' substitutionary atonement (ὑπέρ [hyper, for] in 10:11, 15; cf. 15:13). On the nature of Jesus' work according to the Fourth Gospel, see Köstenberger 1998b: 74–81.

3 For a list of ways in which John appropriates old-covenant language to designate Jesus' new messianic community, see Köstenberger 1998b: 162, in adaptation of Pryor 1992a.

4 Cf. Zech. 9:9; 11:17; 12:10 (quoted in John 19:37; cf. Matt. 24:30; Rev. 1:7); 13:7 (alluded to in John 16:32; cf. Matt. 26:56; Mark 14:50). France (1971: 104 [cf. Köstenberger 1998b: 133–38]) argues that Zechariah's four images jointly portray the successive phases of the messianic shepherd-king's coming and people's reaction to him.

18 Stibbe (1993: 113) characterizes παροιμία as “a symbolic word-picture with a cryptic meaning ... essentially elusive discourse.” Morris (1995: 445) suggests that this is a rather unique form of allegory. Ridderbos (1997: 355 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 168]) opts for a parable with allegorical elements (cf. 10:7–9). Bultmann (1971: 375) describes the genre as a mixture between parable and riddle. See Köstenberger 2002b: 72–75. See also the long discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.284–88.

22 For an interesting reconstruction of the background, see Barclay 1975: 2.58 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 99); cf. Bishop 1959–60. For links between “the door” and “the shepherd” in wisdom traditions, see Scott 1992: 121–23.

44 For a full treatment of this passage in light of its OT background, see Köstenberger 2002b. See also additional note.

46 Note the present tense ἔχω (echō, I have), which points to Christ's current possession of these sheep despite their absence from the fold (Morris 1995: 455). There is no basis for the supposition by some (e.g., Bultmann 1971: 383) that 10:16 represents a later addition (see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.299; ambivalent is Ridderbos 1997: 362). As a study of the Johannine mission theme makes clear (not to mention the mission theme in the other Gospels), this passage, far from representing an isolated reference to Jesus' anticipation of a future (Gentile) mission, coheres with a repeated and consistent emphasis on the extension of the scope of God's salvation beyond the boundaries of national Israel to the other nations (e.g., Matt. 28:19; Acts 1:8). See Köstenberger 1998b; Köstenberger and O'Brien 2001: 73–127, 203–26.

58 For a more detailed historical sketch, see Köstenberger 2002c: 103.

53 See Lev. Rab. 18.1 on Lev. 15:1; cf. Eccles. Rab. 12.6 (universally cited by commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 393; Carson 1991: 411; Morris 1995: 485). Cf. m. Yebam. 16.3; Semaḥot 8, rule 1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 109). See also Hanson 1973. Keener (2003: 841 n. 63, citing Michaels 1984: 190) cautions, however, that the belief that the soul left the body three days after death is not widely attested in the early period.

95 Contra the unilateral docetic emphasis on Jesus' deity (see Ridderbos 1997: 402–3). See the brief discussion and references to Jesus' thirst, tiredness, and so on in Köstenberger 1998b: 50. See also Stibbe (1993: 124–25), who notes that Jesus “is not some mystical, neo-Platonic God who stands far beyond the harsh realities endured by those trapped within a frail mortality,” but rather is “the deity who sheds tears, who feels anger, and who dares to look through the dark threshold of a place which he himself will have to enter.”

104 See Avi-Yonah 1964: 147 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 112). For more information and examples of tombs from this period, see Mackowski 1980: 20–21, 157–59.

134 Note also the absence of the definite article before συνέδριον in the Greek (which may imply “a gathering” rather than “the Sanhedrin”), though not too much should be made of this (Morris 1995: 501 n. 99). For a complete list of high priests from 200 B.C. to A.D. 70, see Jeremias 1969: 377–78. For a list of high priests from 37 B.C. to A.D. 68, see Smallwood 1962: 31–32. For a list of the most important high priests from 200 B.C. to the time of Jesus, see Köstenberger 2002c: 114. R. Brown (1966: 439) suggests that there may be an intentional contrast between the gathering of the Sanhedrin here and the gathering of the children of God in 11:52.

140 Lindars 1972: 406: “in that memorable year.” On Joseph Caiaphas, see the sidebar in Köstenberger 2002c: 116.

142 The same case is taken up in the Jerusalem Talmud (y. Ter. 8.10). Another incident involved Ulla the son of Kasher, who was wanted by the government (Gen. Rab. 94.9; see also Gen. Rab. 91.10 on Gen. 48:10 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 117]). Cf. Daube 1966a: 18–47. M. Barker (1970) links Caiaphas's words with current messianic expectations.

4 For a detailed analysis of the present pericope (focused on verbal aspect), see Köstenberger 2001b: 49–63. The transitional nature of most of chapter 12 is noted by Keener 2003: 859.

5 See Köstenberger 2001b: 49–63. Ridderbos (1997: 413 [cf. Burge 2000: 336]) rightly contends that Mary is not the woman described in Luke 7 (though he perceives some degree of dependence on Mark 14:3–9 = Matt. 26:6–13). This view is rather common, though not universally so. Contra Holst (1976: 435–46), who on form-critical grounds believes that there is only one underlying historical event and that “variations arose in the course of oral transmission” (citing Dodd 1963: 172; other proponents include D. F. Strauss, Dibelius, and Bultmann).

14 Note also the interesting connection between a donkey and the “ruler from Judah” in Gen. 49:11 (see commentary at 12:15).

39 The term “draw” brings out the truth that people do not come to Christ on their own initiative; only as God works in people and draws them can they come to him (Morris 1995: 531). The phrase “all people” does not imply universalism (the ultimate salvation of all [see commentary at 1:9]). Rather, the approach of Gentiles prompts Jesus' statement that after his glorification he will draw “all kinds of people,” even Gentiles, to himself. For this interpretation and a brief discussion of the textual issues, see Köstenberger 1999a: 194. See also Ridderbos (1997: 439–40), who provides the glosses “the entire human world” and “‘all’ without distinction of people or race”; and Morris (1995: 531–32), who struggles but then interprets πάντα (pantas) to refer to “all kinds of men.” In addition, Carson (1991: 443) sees a parallel with Rev. 12:11a and takes issue with the adversative NIV rendering, “But I, when I am lifted up” (changed in the TNIV to “And I, when I am lifted up”).

41 The evangelist editorializes that “this was to show the kind of death Jesus was going to die”

(with σημαίνων [sēmainōn, indicating] serving as a participle indicating purpose [Wallace 1996: 635]). “Kind of death” in the first instance refers to crucifixion (as opposed to, e.g., stoning) but also hints at the fact that Jesus’ death is also “the pathway to his glorification, indeed an integral part of it” (Carson 1991: 444). The same phrase is used regarding Peter’s eventual martyr’s death in 21:19 (Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61, 168). It occurs frequently in connection with Greek oracles (e.g., Plutarch, De Pythiae oraculis 404.D.10), but also in regard to the meaning of names or prophecy (Josephus, Ant. 1.19.8 §308; 7.9.5 §214).

46 So, rightly, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.395. For a summary and bibliographic references, see Köstenberger 1998b: 95 n. 180.

6 Consider the more endearing terms used for Jesus’ followers in the second half of John’s Gospel (Köstenberger 1998b: 149–53): “his own” (οἱ ἴδιοι [13:1; cf. 1:11]); “little children” (τεκνία [13:33]); “friends” (φίλοι [15:15]); “those you gave me” (οἱ ἄνθρωποι οὓς ἔδωκάς μοι [17:6]); “those who are mine” (τὰ ἐμά [17:10]); “my brothers” (οἱ ἀδελφοί μου [20:17]); and “little children” (παιδιά [21:5]).

1 Cf. “six days before the Passover” in 12:1; “the next day” in 12:12. Carson (1991: 455–58) rightly concludes that Jesus and his disciples ate a true paschal meal on Thursday, 15 Nisan (contra Barrett 1978: 50–51; R. Brown 1970: 556; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.36). On the chronology of the passion narrative in John and the Synoptics (siding with Carson, despite Morris 1995: 688–90), see the sidebar in Köstenberger 1999a: 146, with further bibliographical references (see also Köstenberger 2002c: 130, 164, 173; Blomberg 1987: 175–80; Carson 1984: 530–32). Some seek to adjudicate apparent differences between the presentations in John and the Synoptics by the theory that differences in chronology are due to the use of different calendars. John, it is suggested, like the Judeans and the Sadducees, uses a lunar sunset-to-sunset calendar, while the Synoptics, like the Galileans, the Pharisees, and Jesus and his followers, employ a solar sunrise-to-sunrise reckoning (Hoehner 1977: 85–90; see chart on p. 89; Morris 1995: 684–95); or, John’s calendric usage shifts: his light-darkness theme (rooted in the Genesis account) is conveyed by way of a solar calendar, while elsewhere a lunar system is found (building on exodus redemptive motifs) (Busada 2003). However, these theories seem to lack a clear textual base in the Gospels themselves and are unnecessarily complicated if the solution argued here is adopted.

24 For further references and discussion, see Köstenberger 1998a: 122–23.

47 For example, Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 30.8; Plutarch, Marcellus 20.1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 132).

49 Similar occurrences of ἀπόστολος in the NT include 2 Cor. 8:23; Phil. 2:25. For references to the disciples being sent elsewhere in this Gospel, see 4:38; 17:18; 20:21 (Köstenberger 1998b: 180–97).

51 Hesiod, Opera et dies 826–27; Seneca, Epistulae morales 75.7 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 132).

10 So, among others, Schlatter 1948: 286. On the “disciple Jesus loved,” see Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61 (including further bibliographic references). For the identification of the “disciple Jesus loved” with John the son of Zebedee, see chapter 1 in Köstenberger 1999a; for the identification of the “disciple Jesus loved” with the Fourth Evangelist, see Jackson 1999. See also the discussion of authorial modesty in Vanhoozer 1993: 374, citing Augustine and Westcott. Contra Culpepper (1983: 121–23), who views the “beloved disciple” not only as an “ideal disciple” but also as the physical personification of the Paraclete. Beck (1997: 108–36) essentially aligns himself with Culpepper in characterizing this disciple as “the paradigm” or “embodiment of discipleship” (pp. 135–36).

24 But see Exod. 12:22, which indicates that at the original Passover, people were required to stay inside. A similar piece of legislation is found in m. Šabb. 23.1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 135).

6 Words for “love” occur twelve times in John 1–12 and forty-five times in John 13–17 (Köstenberger 1999a: 149). The theme of commandment recurs frequently in Jesus’ final discourse and in the Johannine Epistles.

19 The Greek present imperative implies that the disciples were anxious already; the phrase therefore may be rendered as “stop being troubled” (Morris 1995: 565; Beasley-Murray 1999: 249; Köstenberger 1999a: 152).

22 Most commentators take both occurrences of πιστεύετε (pisteute, believe, trust) in 14:1 as imperatives (e.g., Carson 1991: 488; Morris 1995: 566; Beasley-Murray 1999: 249; Burge 2000: 391; Westcott 1908: 2.167; Köstenberger 1999a: 163). Alternatively, the first form may be an indicative: “You trust in God; trust also in me” (NIV footnote) or interrogative (Bultmann 1971: 600). Schnackenburg (1990: 3.59) notes that 14:1b forms a chiasm (“[You] Trust in God, also in me trust”).

32 The asking of clarifying questions was an important aspect of the teacher-disciple relationship in first-century Judaism. For specific rabbinic references and discussion, see Köstenberger 1998a: 120–22.

39 The expression “truth,” while virtually absent from the Synoptics (the only significant reference is Matt. 22:16 pars.), is found frequently in John’s Gospel with reference to Jesus (1:14, 17; 5:33; 18:37; cf. 8:40, 45, 46; see also 1:9; 6:32; 15:1), the liberating effect of his word (8:31–32; cf. 17:17, 19), and the ministry of the Holy Spirit (16:13; cf. 14:17; 15:26). “Life” frequently is said to be the result of a person’s coming to, and believing in, Jesus (e.g., 3:15, 16; 20:31) (Köstenberger 1998b: 75–76). The giving of life is said to be Jesus’ purpose for coming (10:10) and is linked with two “I am” statements, “I am the bread of life” (6:35, 48) and “I am the resurrection and the life” (11:25).

43 On “in” terminology in John’s Gospel, see the excursus in Köstenberger 1999a: 154–55.

56 For a fuller exposition of this passage, see Köstenberger 1998b: 171–75; 1995a.

68 For a treatment of the Spirit-Paraclete in the context of the references to the Spirit in the entire Gospel narrative, see M. Davies 1992: 139–53. For a comparison of the treatments of the Spirit in John and the Synoptics, see Köstenberger 1999a: 156. On the Johannine Paraclete and Spirit of truth, see also the extended treatment in Keener 2003: 951–82.

70 The translation of the term has proved particularly difficult since there does not seem to be an exact equivalent in the English language (see discussion in Carson 1991: 499). None of the expressions chosen in English translations seems fully adequate: “Counselor” (NIV) smacks of contemporary notions of counseling (marriage counselor, camp counselor), focusing primarily on emotional or psychological aspects (though the legal term “Counselor” or “Counsel” is more appropriate); “Helper” (NASB, ESV, ISV) is more neutral but conveys inferior status overtones not present in the text and lacks the legal connotation possibly present (cf. the discussion in Lindars 1972: 479); the fact that some translations give several alternative renderings in footnotes also suggests that any one English rendering may be inadequate (e.g., NLT: “the Counselor; or Comforter, or Encourager, or Advocate”). “Companion” (suggested by Brodie [1993: 466]) also falls short, as does Calvin’s (1961: 82) “Patron.” Some make reference to the root meaning of the word, “one called alongside to help,” but it is unclear whether first-century usage consciously drew on this background. There is evidence that the expression was used in a legal setting, but it is less clear that the meaning should be restricted to “Advocate” (so, consistently, the TNIV) or the like (standard Greek reference works cite the following meanings: LSJ—one called to one’s aid, legal assistant, advocate, summoned, intercessor; Behm, TDNT 5:800–814—legal advisor, helper, advocate in court [for a helpful survey, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.144–50]). Perhaps “helping presence” captures the import of the term better than any other (Köstenberger 1999a: 157) for the following reasons: (1) this is what Jesus was while with the disciples; (2) this encompasses the various functions laid out for the Spirit in John 14–16; (3) this transcends (but may include) the legal context of the term (see esp. 16:7–11). See the discussion by Ridderbos (1997: 503), who issues a plea to let the Johannine context (rather than alleged extrabiblical parallels) determine the meaning of παράκλητος and concludes that “the dominant idea is of someone who offers assistance in a situation in which help is needed.”

5 For a discussion of the theological implications of the present passage, see Köstenberger 1999a: 159–60.

23 See Exod. 25:8; 29:45; Lev. 26:11–12; Ezek. 37:27–28; 43:9. See Malatesta 1978: esp. ch. 8; Pryor 1988: 49–50; and the excursus on “in” terminology in John’s Gospel in Köstenberger 1999a: 154–55.

49 See the material cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 146.

55 The designation of the disciples as Jesus’ “friends” is in keeping with the more intimate characterization of his followers in the second part of the Gospel (Köstenberger 1998b: 153).

3 The world’s hatred was experienced by Christians long before John wrote. The Roman historians Tacitus (Annales 15.44) and Suetonius (Nero 16) both called Christianity “a mischievous superstition.” See also the charges leveled against the early Christians listed in Köstenberger 2002c: 147, citing Barclay 1975: 2.183–85. Still useful are Frend 1967 and Workman 1923. Keener (2003: 1017) claims that the worldview presupposed in 15:18–25 is “one common to sectarian groups, in which apocalyptic ideologies (in the modern sense of that expression) often prevail” (though he later acknowledges degrees of “sectarian” outlook [quotation marks his]). In his following paragraph, Keener does concede, however, that John’s emphasis here “probably [but perhaps not?] stems from authentic Jesus tradition.” Did Jesus, then, propagate a sectarian worldview? And, if so, in what sense?

18 So Ridderbos 1997: 525–26; Barrett 1978: 482; Carson 1991: 527; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276; contra Moloney (1998: 434), who contends that “most” favor Ps. 35. Cf. the citation of Ps. 69:9 in John 2:17. See also Ps. 119:161. Extrabiblical parallels include Ps. Sol. 7:1; b. Yoma 9b (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 147; cf. Barrett 1978: 482; R. Brown 1970: 689).

22 μαρτυρεῖτε (martyreite) is best taken as an imperative, “you must bear witness” (Carson 1991: 529; NIV; NLT; NRSV; TNIV), rather than as an indicative (ASV; RSV) or a future (NASB; NKJV), though there is little distinction in meaning (so, rightly, R. Brown 1970: 689). The imperative here is addressed to the Eleven, who in turn serve as representatives of later generations of believers (Köstenberger 1998b: 151 n. 33, as a mild corrective to Carson 1991: 505). On the implications (or lack thereof) of the use of the masculine form ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, he) for the personality of the Spirit, see commentary at 14:26 (see also 16:13–14).

25 Cf. Pliny the Younger, Epistulae 10.96 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 148; cf. Stählin, TDNT 7:339–58).

43 Regarding the world, see commentary at 1:10. Jewish and Greek background material is cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 149.

75 On Jesus’ “having come from the Father,” see 8:42; 17:8. On “going back to the Father,” see 7:33; 13:1; 14:12, 28. On modes of movement in Jesus’ mission, see Köstenberger 1998b: 82–92, esp. 89.

33 For a refutation of the false dichotomy between revelation and redemption in John’s Christology, see especially Köstenberger 1998b: 74–81.

55 Parallel wordings are attested in rabbinic literature for both “take out of this world” (y. Ber. 2.7) and “protect from the evil one” (y. Pe. ah 1.1; Deut. Rab. 4.4 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 210 nn. 519–20]; cf. Ps. 140:1; Matt. 6:13).

16 Their arms and methods are recalled in a “street-ballad” (see Köstenberger 2002c: 157, following Klausner 1925: 337); various versions circulated, depending on the high priests targeted (cf. b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.21).

27 See Ezek. 1:28; 44:4; Dan. 2:46; 8:18; 10:9; Acts 9:4; 22:7; 26:14; Rev. 1:17; 19:10; 22:8. Contra Carson (1991: 578–79), who argues that the evangelist is not attempting to describe a theophanic manifestation, concluding that the soldiers simply responded “better than they knew” (cf. Witherington [1995: 286], who calls this an example of “Johannine double-entendre”; but see Bultmann 1971: 639; Burge 2000: 492; Conway 1999: 173). See also the legend cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 158.

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235). Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

21 Barrett 1978: 533–35; Morris 1995: 695–97; Hengel 1999: 330; Winter 1974. See especially the references in Josephus (J.W. 2.8.1 §117; Ant. 20.9.1 §§197–203 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 164]). Cf. the acknowledgment in talmudic literature that the Jews had lost this power “forty years” before the destruction of Jerusalem (y. Sanh. 1.1; 7.2; on “forty years,” see commentary at 18:24 above; loss of this power may have occurred as early as A.D. 6; see also Legasse 1997: 54–56).

32 See, for example, Josephus, Ant. 14.3.1 §36 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 166).

37 The answer given by the grandchildren of Jude, Jesus’ half-brother, at a trial before Domitian echoes Jesus’ words (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.20.6 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 166]). Jesus’ description of the nature of his kingdom is reminiscent of certain passages in Daniel (e.g., 2:44; 7:14, 27).

41 The expression refers to the entire festival in Deut. 16:1–2; Ezek. 45:21; Luke 2:41; 22:1; John 2:13, 23; 6:4; 11:55; Acts 12:4; Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §213; cf. y. Pesah. 9.5 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 212 n. 577).

43 See Chavel 1941 (the quotation is from p. 277). One mishnaic passage (m. Pesah. 8.6 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 167]) suggests that such releases were common enough to warrant legislation.

57 Philo tells of people mocking a certain madman named Carabas in the gymnasium of Alexandria in A.D. 38. Dressed in a rug for a royal robe, with a sheet of byblus as a diadem on his head and a papyrus scepter in his hand, Carabas received homage and was saluted as king and hailed as lord, apparently in imitation of familiar pantomimes (Flacc. 6 §§36–42 [ca. A.D. 50]). See also the reference to a similar Persian custom in Dio Chrysostom, De regno 4.67–68 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 169).

66 Two instances of such fear on the part of a judge of one accused whom he came to recognize as a higher being are relayed by Philostratus (Vita Apollonii 1.21; 4.44 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 212 n. 596]). See Bultmann 1971: 661 n. 4.

75 See Bammel (1952), who consequently insists on a post–A.D. 31 crucifixion date for Jesus. On “Caesar” as a title for the Roman emperor in Jesus’ day, see Köstenberger 2002c: 172.

4 This most likely is to describe the custom that called for those who were to be crucified to carry their own cross (see the primary references cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 174–75; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 608 n. 128; Beasley-Murray 1999: 345). “By himself” is probably more accurate than the TNIV’s “carrying his own cross.” Note also the emphatic position of ἑαυτῷ (Barrett 1978: 548).

21 See Suetonius, Domitian 10.1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 176). Though instances are known in which a condemned man carried the notice around his neck or had it carried in front of him—such as “Attalus the Christian” during Marcus Aurelius’s reign in the amphitheater in Lyons (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.44)—there is little or no evidence for the custom of affixing it to a cross.

23 For a reconstruction of the sign, see Köstenberger 2002c: 177; Avi-Yonah 1964: 153.

29 The double perfect of ἔγραφα (gegrapha, I have written) conveys a sense of finality, portraying Pilate’s action as a fait accompli (Ridderbos 1997: 609 n. 134; Morris 1995: 714 n. 54). Bultmann (1971: 670 n. 2 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 902]) suggests that the first perfect is aoristic; Wallace (1996: 577) lists 19:22 as an example of an extensive perfect focusing on the completion of an action in the past. Similar word combinations are found also in the LXX (Gen. 43:14; Esth. 4:16; 1 Macc. 13:38) and in rabbinic literature (b. Menah. 3a; b. Ketub. 96a; b. Yebam. 106b) (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; further instances are cited in Schlatter 1948: 349). Perhaps significantly, similar phrases are found also in a Roman context (note Cicero, Epistulae ad Quintum fratrem 1.2.2; 1.2.13: scripsi, scripsi). Keener’s (2003: 1138) observation that every other instance of “written” in this Gospel refers to Scripture (2:17; 6:31, 45; 8:17; 10:34; 12:14, 16; 15:25), which cannot be broken (10:35), seems of doubtful relevance here.

31 If a later collection of Roman law also reflects earlier practice, then the soldiers were to take Jesus’ clothes into custody but not necessarily keep them for themselves. See Justinian, Digesta 48.20 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; contra Barrett 1978: 550).

62 Though Roman law does seem to have allowed burial of crucified people, as is suggested by a passage attributed to the first-century A.D. rhetorician Quintilian (Declamationes 6.9 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 179]).

5 See the introduction to John 21 below. On the parallel development of Peter and the beloved disciple in the Fourth Gospel, see Quast 1989 (though see the critical interaction in Köstenberger

570n20, 571, 573, 574n13, 582, 588n5, 590n15, 591n20, 593n29, 596, 598n12, 599n17, 601n4, 602, 604n20, 605n24, 605n25, 606n26

1998b: 154–61).

6 See the rabbinic material cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 186.

7 On the presumed layout of the tomb, see Köstenberger 2002c: 186.

19 See the reference to Köstenberger 2002c: 186 at 20:1.

20 Cf. 13:1, 33; 15:15; 17:6, 10; 21:4–5. See Köstenberger 1998b: 153.

13 The vast majority of the instances of “sending” in John’s Gospel relate to Jesus’ having been sent by the Father. “Sending” terminology also occurs with regard to God’s sending of the Baptist, the Father’s and the Son’s sending of the Spirit, and Jesus’ sending of his disciples. The present passage features two “sending” verbs, πέμπω (pempō) and ἀποστέλλω (apostellō), with no apparent difference in meaning (as is the virtual consensus among major commentators, including Ridderbos, Morris, Carson, Barrett, Schnackenburg, and R. Brown; see also Köstenberger 1999c: 125–43). Morris (1995: 746 n. 56) notes that this is already suggested by the use of καθώς (kathōs, just as) linking the two verbs.

5 The important implication for the authorship of John’s Gospel is that since the “disciple Jesus loved” is identified as the author in 21:24 (cf. 21:20), and since he is one of the seven (21:7), the author must be one of the seven mentioned in 21:2. This makes it eminently plausible that the author (the “beloved disciple”) is John, one of the two sons of Zebedee (Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24).

15 Cf. 1 John 2:14, 18; in John 13:33, the word for “children” is τέκνία (teknia). However, understanding this as a familiar reference must be tempered with placing it in the larger context of first-century teacher-disciple relationships (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 660; Moloney 1998: 552, with further reference to 1 John). On this topic, see Köstenberger 1998a: 119–26.

20 Cf. 13:23–25; 18:15–18; 20:2–10; 21:20–24; see Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61. On “the disciple Jesus loved,” see commentary at 13:23; 19:26; 21:2 (see also 18:15; 20:3, 8; and commentary at 21:20). For Peter’s characterization in John 21, see Wiarda 2000: 111–14, 139–40, 175–78.

29 Whatever symbolism there may be in the present reference (see below), the event does not, in my opinion, constitute a Johannine sign, since the signs are confined to the period of Jesus’ public ministry to the Jews (John 1–12). See Köstenberger 1995b. Contra, among others, Keener (2003: 1234), who seems to imply that the catch of 153 fish is a Johannine sign.

12 This is illustrated by the following passages: Epictetus, Diatribai 3.26.22; Seneca, Ad Marciam de consolatione 20.3; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 7.69; Tertullian, De pudicitia 22 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 194). See Bauer (1925: 232) and Haenchen (1984: 2.226–27), who also note passages in Artemidorus and Plautus; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Hengel 1977: esp. chapter 4.

17 Scorpiace 15 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 214 n. 666). Blomberg (2002: 278) also cites Acts Pet. 37–39 and Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.1.

4 Cf. 4:46; 6:23; 7:50; 9:13, 18, 24; 10:40; 12:1–2, 9; 18:14, 26; 19:39. See the excursus “Asides” in Köstenberger 1999a: 250–52.

20 On the implications of the use of the first-person singular verb οἶμαι for the Gospel’s authorship, including a survey of interpretations of 21:24–25 and a discussion of pertinent first-century references featuring the term, see Köstenberger 2004.

24 The rather bewildering array of interpretations attempting to come to terms with the shift

Kovacs, J. L. 376, 385
Kraeling, C. H. 326n16
Kreitzer, L. J. 111n34, 111n36
Kruijf, T. C. de 42n72, 43n73

from the first-person plural in 21:24 to the first-person singular in 21:25 is documented by a survey of the state of research in Köstenberger 2004.

25 For extensive documentation, see Köstenberger 2004.

26 Examples in Philo (Post. Cain 43 §144; Drunk. 9 §32; Mos. 1.38 §213) are cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 195 (see also Boring 1995: 308).

16 See Clermont-Ganneau 1874; Kraeling 1946 [cited in Bruce 1983: 253 n. 1]; Avi-Yonah 1964: 146.

34 Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.344; Barrett 1978: 195; R. Brown 1966: 117; Witherington 1995: 85–86; Borchert 1996: 160; Bultmann 1971: 122; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38–39; Dodd 1963: 162; Lindars 1972: 135–37; Keener 2003: 518–19. Keener contends that it is historically implausible that Jesus would challenge the temple system by overturning tables and yet continue in public ministry for two or three years afterward, sometimes even visiting Jerusalem (though he notes that Jesus faces considerable hostility there when he does). On the contrary, an early temple cleansing accounts well for Jewish hostility toward Jesus early on (5:18), and Jesus’ continuing in ministry for two or three more years is eminently plausible historically in light of Jesus’ pattern of withdrawal (3:22; 6:15; 7:9–10; 8:59; 10:40) and his caution from the very inception of his ministry because his “time” has not yet come (2:4; 7:6). Borchert (1996: 160) contends that two temple clearings are “a historiographic monstrosity that has no basis in the texts of the Gospels.” Kreitzer (1998: 100–101) claims that the evangelist followed the motto “When the details of history no longer serve the functions of the story—discard them.” R. Brown (1966: 118) concludes that Jesus uttered some prophetic saying concerning the destruction of the temple on his first visit but actually cleansed the temple at the end of his ministry. Wallace (1996: 561 n. 20) notes that this would require a crucifixion date of A.D. 33.

36 Cf. Carson 1991: 177; 1984: 441; Morris 1995: 167; Laney 1992: 70; Westcott 1908: 1.96–97; Calvin 1959: 51; Köstenberger 1999a: 76–78. Carson (1991: 177, referring to Morris) notes that virtually all of John 1–5 (except for the sections on John the Baptist) is non-Synoptic material. Morris (1995: 167 n. 55) states that “there are practically no resemblances between the two narratives, apart from the central act”; only five words are shared. Other commentators holding this view are Luther, W. Hendriksen, and R. V. G. Tasker (Kreitzer 1998: 94).

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’ ” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

73 De Kruijf (1970: 114) notes that even though Luke 8:42 and 9:38 have parallels in the other Synoptics, only Luke uses the term μονογενής or even gives the information that the girl and the boy have no siblings. The presumable reason for this is Luke’s desire to highlight the special value that the salvation of these children has for their parents.

91 W. O. Walker (1994: 36) argues that “son of Joseph” is intended “to say something significant (and problematic) about Jesus’ origin and thus about his identity: he is the son of a human father.” He concludes, “If such is the case at 6.42, it may well also be the case at 1.45, particularly in light of the fact that ‘from Nazareth’ apparently has a similar import at 1.45.” There is only one problem with this view: “son of Joseph, the one from Nazareth” is found on the lips of Philip, not Nathanael, in the wake of his claim “We have found the one of whom Moses wrote in the law and [of whom] the prophets [also wrote].” It is hard to conceive of Philip being derogatory about Jesus having a human father and coming from Nazareth (the latter is the case with Nathanael later!) while at the same time seeking to convince Nathanael that he and his fellow-seekers have found the one predicted in the Hebrew Scriptures. Moreover, as Kruse (2003: 86) notes, in the prologue the evangelist has already provided a clear presentation of Jesus’ true origins, so he can refrain from commenting on Philip’s rather incomplete description of Jesus here.

31 So, for example, Ridderbos 1997: 107; Morris 1995: 162; Carson 1991: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 35; R. Brown 1966: 105; Kruse 2003: 94–95. Ridderbos (1997: 108) cites OT allusions to the abundance of wine in the new age (Gen. 49:11; Isa. 25:6; Amos 9:13–14; Jer. 31:12–14; see also Joel 3:18). Keener (2003: 512) suggests a (proleptic) connection between the abundant “measure” of water turned into wine in 2:6 and the unlimited provision of the Spirit in 3:34.

20 Kruse (2003: 127) writes, “If Jesus had been baptizing in the same area as John (3:22, 26) and had left from there heading north-west to Sychar, he had covered a significant distance. As the crow flies, Sychar is about 30 miles from Aenon; but following the Roman roads it was about 40 miles. The journey would take a day and a half, so Jesus and his disciples would arrive in Sychar on the second day at about the sixth hour, i.e. about noon.”

74 See the table “Chronology of Jesus’ Ministry in John’s Gospel” in the introduction. Contra Kruse (2003: 139 n. 1), who thinks the event took place shortly after the Passover in March/April.

6 Kruse (2003: 161) notes that Passover was a time when the Jews expected the Prophet to provide manna from heaven the way Moses had done (citing 2 Bar. 29:3–30:1 [c. A.D. 100], see esp. 29:8, though there is in this text no specific mention of Passover).

8 See Laney 1992: 138–39. The background for this may be the brothers’ memory of Jesus’ feat at the wedding of Cana (2:1–12) and his subsequent apparent popularity in Jerusalem (2:23–25; Ridderbos 1997: 257–58; Barrett 1978: 311). Kruse (2003: 182) proposes that the recent defection of many disciples may have been to the detriment of the family honor, which Jesus’ brothers wanted restored. Ποιεῖ καὶ ζητεῖ in 7:4 represents Hebraic parataxis (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.139).

233n26, 235n33, 236, 257, 263n61, 264, 265, 273n103, 281n14, 284n29, 286n43, 288n48, 296, 341n96, 341n97, 345n120, 368n6, 379n17, 417n22, 458n52, 526n26,

26 So Carson 1991: 312–13; R. Brown 1966: 316; Morris 1995: 360; Barrett 1978: 318; Kruse 2003: 185.

33 For OT information regarding the origins of the Messiah, see Mic. 5:2; Dan. 7:13. For apocalyptic references, see 1 Enoch 48:6; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 13:51–52 (these may be post-Christian). See also Justin, Dial. 8.4 (cited in Kruse 2003: 188).

61 See the references cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 87; Kruse 2003: 210.

103 Kruse (2003:217) cites a stipulation in the Qumran writings (CD 14:7–10) that certain officeholders must be between thirty and fifty years of age. Schlatter (1948: 220) says that the present passage coheres with Matt. 17:24, for the obligation to pay the temple tax ended at age fifty: “hence Jesus was not yet a πρεσβύτερος.” Also, the Book of Jubilees uses “fifty years” to measure the eras since the creation (M. Edwards 1994; followed by Moloney 1998: 286).

14 Poirier (1996), Burge (2000: 273), and Kruse (2003: 220–21) take the purpose clause in 9:3b with 9:4, which is less likely.

29 Kruse (2003: 222) suggests that the evangelist may have added the gloss “sent” to indicate that the miracle occurred because Jesus sent the man, not because the water had healing properties.

43 Incidentally, the second group apparently disregards the fact that Pharaoh’s magicians were able to perform miracles as well (Exod. 7:11, 22; 8:7; but cf. 8:18–19). As Kruse (2003: 224) points out, their reasoning was defective—false prophets sometimes do perform miracles—but their conclusion was correct.

96 Nevertheless, Kruse’s (2003: 254) suggestion is doubtful that the use of a different word for Jesus’ weeping may show that his crying was “of a different order” than Mary’s.

97 So, essentially, Carson (1991: 416) and Morris (1995: 495), though both (in my view, illegitimately) speak of “unbelief” or “the misconceptions of those around him” as the primary target (similarly, Kruse [2003: 254] believes Jesus wept out of “deep disappointment” with the “faithless weeping and wailing” of Mary and “the Jews”). Schnackenburg (1990: 2.337) insightfully adduces the reference to Jesus’ “tears” during his “life on earth” in Heb. 5:7, which there, as well as in the present reference, are related to the presence of and the need for salvation from death. The comment by Borchert (1996: 360) that Jesus’ weeping is “directly related to the failure of his followers to recognize his mission as the agent of God” is sheer conjecture, as is Moloney’s contention (1998: 331) that “he weeps because of the danger that his unconditional gift of himself in love ... will never be understood or accepted.”

120 “The corpse was customarily laid on a sheet of linen, wide enough to envelop the body completely and more than twice the length of the corpse. The body was so placed on the sheet that the feet were at one end, and then the sheet was drawn over the head and back down to the feet. The feet were bound at the ankles, and the arms were tied to the body with linen strips. ... Jesus’ body was apparently prepared for burial in the same way (cf. 19:40; 20:5, 7)” (Carson 1991: 418–19; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 195). For mishnaic references to burial clothes and wrappings for corpses, see Kruse 2003: 256.

6 Kruse (2003: 265) cites Josephus (J.W. 6.9.3 §§422–25), who puts the figure at 2.7 million, which Kruse rightly finds “hard to believe.” Cf. commentary at 11:54–57.

534n69, 535, 539n88, 550n54
Küchler, M. 178n14, 178n16
Kuhn, H.-W. 79n86
Kuhn, K. G. 415
Kundsinn, K. 354n152

17 Kruse (2003: 270) sees a resemblance between Jesus' pronouncement and 1 Sam. 2:30.

22 Conversely, it appears that Satan was unaware of the ultimate outcome of Jesus' crucifixion, that is, his own demise (cf. 1 John 3:8; Heb. 2:14–15), or else he presumably would not have prompted Judas to betray Jesus (Kruse 2003: 289).

52 Morris (1995: 599 n. 33) notes the emphatic personal pronouns ὑμεῖς (hymeis, you) and ἐγώ (egō, I), which set off Jesus' relationship with his disciples from the world. The converse does not follow: Jesus does not have to obey his followers in order to be called their friend (Carson 1991: 522; Kruse 2003: 321, who notes that Matt. 11:19 = Luke 7:34 is no real exception). Borchert (2002: 149) registers his concern that the hymn "What a Friend We Have in Jesus" may be unduly fraternizing.

26 Kruse (2003: 359) suggests that the Jewish leaders may have wanted crucifixion to show that Jesus was under God's curse.

69 Kruse (2003: 362) notes that in the ancient world, one's identity and honor were closely tied to one's place of origin (Acts 21:39).

88 Several commentators (e.g., Kruse 2003: 365; Keener 2003: 1132, referring to Meeks 1967: 77 citing b. Pesah. 118a) add that the Jews concluded the Greater Hallel in the Passover haggadah with the prayer "From everlasting to everlasting, you are God; beside you we have no king, redeemer, or savior; no liberator, deliverer, provider. ... We have no King but you."

54 So Ridderbos 1997: 616; Carson 1991: 619; Barrett 1978: 553; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; Schlatter 1948: 351. Psalm 69:21 is also cited in the Qumran hymn 1QH 12:11. Another relevant passage is Ps. 22:15 (Schlatter 1948: 351; Kruse 2003: 369). The suggestion that Jesus here refers back to his statement in 18:11 is improbable (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 617; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; R. Brown 1970: 930).

14 The existence of these pools, if not the name "Bethesda," may be attested by the Copper Scroll from Qumran (3Q15), which dates from between A.D. 35 and 65. See Hengel 1999: 309–10; Küchler 1999: 382, with further references.

16 Some argue that "five" colonnades is also symbolic of the five books of Moses, the Pentateuch (see commentary at 4:18; cf. Hengel 1999: 315). Küchler (1999: 381–82) denies the historical existence of the five colonnades altogether and interprets the reference as exclusively allegorical.

86 For general (including archaeological) information on Bethsaida, see Strickert 1998; Kuhn and Arav 1991; and Pixner 1985.

152 Schwank (1977) helpfully points out that in the final analysis, the reason for the mention of Ephraim in 11:54 is most likely the Fourth Evangelist's conviction that Jesus did in fact withdraw to this location at this juncture of his ministry, whether or not this served the purpose of geographical symbolism or other theological purposes (cf. Olsson 1974: 28 [cited in Schwank 1977: 380]). He rejects the view of Bultmann (1971: 412 n. 3) that the reference is merely "schematic" (i.e., literary but not historical in nature) and also the contention by Kundsinn (1925: 49–50) that the evangelist chose the name because the location was significant for Christians at the end of the first century (unsupported by evidence, as is admitted by Kundsinn [p. 49]; see the

Kurz, W. S. 19n1, 396n2
Kuyper, L. J. 45, 47n91
Kynes, W. L. 124n29
Kysar, R. 2n4, 3

Lacomara, A. 396n2, 398n7
Ladd, G. E. 487
Lagrange, M.-J. 520n45, 549n48

discussions in Katz 1997: 131 n. 7; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.351).

1 J. A. T. Robinson (1962–63) observes that “the themes of the gospel are played over beforehand, as in the overture to an opera” (cited in Viviano 1998: 183). Beasley-Murray (1992: 1867) calls it “an anticipatory description of the Mission of the Logos-Son to the World.” The bibliography on the Johannine prologue is vast: see van der Watt 1995: 311 n. 1; Kurz 1997: 179 n. 1. For a chart showing themes anticipated in the prologue, see p. 586 below.

2 The following material is adapted from Moloney 1998: 377–78 (for further bibliography, see pp. 389–91). See also Bammel 1993; Kurz 1985; 1990; Lacomara 1974; Paschal, DJG 229–33, esp. 232.

91 For the translation “true grace” I am indebted to R. Edwards (1988: 11, following R. Brown 1966: 16, with further reference to Montgomery 1939; Kuyper 1964), who notes that the Hebrew Vorlage hesed wa-emet constitutes a hendiadys meaning “faithful (or enduring) love.” Edwards (ibid.) rightly cautions that John’s appropriation of these OT expressions must be allowed to have a “fresh nuance”: “The Old Testament symbols of God’s gracious acts have been appropriated and Christianized.”

29 See, earlier, Schlatter 1948: 89. For helpful discussions, see Carson 1991: 191–96, esp. 194–95; McCabe 1999. See also Cotterell 1985: 241; Kynes, DJG 574–76, esp. 575.

4 The Fourth Gospel’s integrity is not compromised by the inimitable Johannine style, enveloping narrative as well as discourse portions. For positive assessments of the historical reliability of John’s Gospel, see Köstenberger 2002c; Blomberg 1993; 2001; 2002; contra M. Casey 1996. Nevertheless, there continues to be skepticism on the part of many; see the recent survey by Kysar (2002a), the largely positive assessment by Thompson (2002), and the very negative evaluation by Attridge (2002b).

2 The following material is adapted from Moloney 1998: 377–78 (for further bibliography, see pp. 389–91). See also Bammel 1993; Kurz 1985; 1990; Lacomara 1974; Paschal, DJG 229–33, esp. 232.

7 Note, for example, the preponderance of the five major verb themes of Exod. 33–34 and Deuteronomy—“love,” “obey,” “live,” “know,” and “see”—in John 14:15–24. See Lacomara 1974; Pryor 1992a: esp. 160, 166, 216 n. 8, referring also to Malatesta 1978: 42–77.

45 The former is suggested by Kosmala 1963; 1967–68; the latter by Lattey 1953–54; R. Brown 1970: 828 (both citing Lagrange). See also commentary at 13:36–38.

48 In antiquity, a dying person ordinarily would entrust his mother to another with a direct charge such as this: “I leave to you my mother to be taken care of” (Lagrange 1925: 494 [cited in R. Brown 1970: 907]; cf. Lucian, Toxaris 22). In the LXX, the adoption formula is generally “you are” rather than “here is” as in the present passage (“ ‘Mother, here is your son’ ... ‘Here is your mother’ ”; cf. Ps. 2:7; Tob. 7:12). The form of expression used in John has a Semitic ring. Speaking of “the official formula of the old Jewish family law,” one commentator refers to a crucified man’s “right to make testamentary dispositions, even from the cross” (Stauffer 1960:

13; cf. Borchert 2002: 269; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278).

37 “Overcome” or an equivalent is favored also by Morris 1995: 76; Moloney 1998: 36; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.245–46; Laney 1992: 39; Lindars 1972: 87; Schlatter 1948: 9 (“καταλαμβάνω never means ‘understand’ in John”); and Westcott 1908: 1.9–10. Carson (1991: 138) thinks that John might have both meanings (“overcome” and “comprehend”) in mind (so also Whitacre 1999: 53) and likes the ambiguity in BAGD’s translation, “master” (see BDAG 520). Keener (2003: 387) believes that John’s use of κατέλαβεν in 1:5 is an instance of traductio, a play on the multiple meanings of a word (here “comprehend” and “overcome”). Keener notes that the word occurs in Wis. 7:30 but admits that there the term clearly means “overcome” and no wordplay is present. Burge (2000: 56) agrees that both are at work, but he sees “overcome” as being dominant. Calvin (1959: 12) translates “comprehend.” The major translations divide more or less evenly between the two options, usually mentioning the one not chosen in a footnote: (1) NIV: “understood”; NASB, NKJV: “comprehend”; (2) NLT: “extinguish”; NET: “mastered”; ISV: “put out”; HCSB, ESV, NRSV: “overcome.” Notably, the TNIV changed the NIV’s “understood” to “overcome.”

45 Among those who take 1:9 as a preliminary reference to the incarnation are Ridderbos 1997: 43; Carson 1991: 122; Borchert 1996: 112–13; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.255; Laney 1992: 41.

Moloney (1998: 37) sees a hint to the incarnation already in 1:3c–4. There also may be an implied contrast with Hellenistic religions that offered false “light.”

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’ ” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

21 Laney (1992: 48) remarks that John’s voice crying out in the wilderness “is the first indication that things were not quite right in Jerusalem. The religious establishment of first-century Judaism was corrupt. The voice has abandoned Jerusalem and was calling out in the desert.”

122 The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. 65, was published in 1998 by the Egypt Exploration Society (see pp. 12–13). Among commentators, “Chosen One of God” is favored by Morris 1995: 134; Carson 1991: 152; Burge 1987: 59–61; 2000: 74; Barrett 1978: 178; R. Brown 1966: 57;

Schnackenburg 1990: 1.305. “Son of God” is the reading advocated by Bultmann 1971: 92–93 n. 6; Borchert 1996: 139; Ridderbos 1997: 77; Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. g; Laney 1992: 53 (though all prior to the discovery of P¹⁰⁶). Rodgers (1999: 304) prefers both (“This is the only, the chosen Son of God”), while Michaels (1989: 36) proposes that the Baptist spoke “Chosen One of God” (hence the MS tradition), which the evangelist interpreted as “Son of God.”

29 Assuming a three-year ministry, we see that this puts the crucifixion at A.D. 33. This reading of John 2:20, and a date of A.D. 30 for Jesus’ first Passover and the temple clearing, were advocated by Badcock (1935: 40–41). See also P. Maier (1968: 4–5); Hoehner (1977: 38–43; followed by Laney 1992: 72; cf. Hoehner, DJG 119); Humphreys and Waddington (1992: 351). MacAdam (1999: 31–33) concurs, but believes that this was Jesus’ final Passover and that the Fourth Evangelist has transposed the temple clearing to the beginning of Jesus’ ministry. Zahn (1921: 126–27 n. 23) comes close, arriving at the year A.D. 28 or 29.

36 Cf. Carson 1991: 177; 1984: 441; Morris 1995: 167; Laney 1992: 70; Westcott 1908: 1.96–97; Calvin 1959: 51; Köstenberger 1999a: 76–78. Carson (1991: 177, referring to Morris) notes that virtually all of John 1–5 (except for the sections on John the Baptist) is non-Synoptic material. Morris (1995: 167 n. 55) states that “there are practically no resemblances between the two narratives, apart from the central act”; only five words are shared. Other commentators holding this view are Luther, W. Hendriksen, and R. V. G. Tasker (Kreitzer 1998: 94).

27 Contra those who say that “born of water” refers to physical birth, and “born of the Spirit” to spiritual birth (e.g., Witherington 1995: 97, referring to 1 John 5:6–8; Laney 1992: 78; but see Carson 1991: 191).

31 The noun is qualitative, indicating the kind of day, not which day it was (so, rightly, Wallace 1996: 264). Thatcher (1999) calls this “the Sabbath trick,” “a form of ‘unstable irony’ in which the narrator of the Fourth Gospel withholds critical information about an episode until the end of the story, forcing the reader to re-evaluate radically the nature of Jesus’ activity.” However, alternate explanations of the flow of the narrative are possible (if not more probable), and Thatcher’s attempt at a poststructural reading of John 5 and 9 ultimately fails to convince. Highly improbable is the proposal by Laney (1992: 108–9) that the absence of the definite article suggests that this was not a Sabbath at all but a feast day when Sabbath regulations applied (citing Lev. 23:34–36).

8 See Laney 1992: 138–39. The background for this may be the brothers’ memory of Jesus’ feat at the wedding of Cana (2:1–12) and his subsequent apparent popularity in Jerusalem (2:23–25; Ridderbos 1997: 257–58; Barrett 1978: 311). Kruse (2003: 182) proposes that the recent defection of many disciples may have been to the detriment of the family honor, which Jesus’ brothers wanted restored. Ποιᾶν καὶ ζητεῖν in 7:4 represents Hebraic parataxis (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.139).

11 A survey of major commentaries shows that about half provide a regular commentary (Carson, Laney, Lindars, Whitacre, Calvin, Westcott), while the other half refrain from comment (Michaels, Talbert, Stibbe, Brodie, D. M. Smith), in some cases choosing not to address the issue at all (e.g., Schlatter [1948: 205], who in his scholarly commentary moves directly from 7:52 to 8:12 without comment, though his popular commentary [1962: 139–41] does treat the pericope adulterae in deference to “ecclesiastical tradition”; see also Zahn [1921: 404], who, like Schlatter, moves immediately from 7:52 to 8:12 and deals with the pericope in a lengthy excursus on pp. 723–30).

13 Morris (1995: 389 n. 10 [similarly, Laney 1992: 159]) suggests the following possibilities: “gives life,” “is life,” “springs from life,” or “illuminates life.” Schnackenburg (1990: 2.191) adds that this may be an instance of an exegetical genitive in the sense of “the life which frees a person from the sphere of death.”

108 Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §216; J.W. 2.1.3 §§11–12; see Morris 1995: 420–21; R. Brown 1966: 360; cf. Laney 1992: 169.

77 See Michaels 1989: 170. Contra R. Brown (1966: 375), who believes that the man was only cast from their presence rather than being formally expelled. Burge (2000: 275) and Laney (1992: 180) also seem to hold this view.

73 So, rightly, Carson (1991: 394–95), whose entire discussion repays careful reading (see also Morris 1995: 465; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174; Moloney 1998: 320; Burge 2000: 296; Laney 1992: 195; Stibbe 1993: 118; Westcott 1908: 2.68). Michaels (1989: 187) seems to conceive of Jesus’ unity with the Father in functional terms (whether primarily or exclusively so), as both of them doing “the same work.” Barrett (1978: 382) notes that the unity between the Father and the Son is also a unity of love and obedience.

94 The distinction between γνῶτε (gnōte) and γινώσκητε (ginōskēte) is that of “coming to know” and “understanding” (Carson 1991: 400; Barrett 1978: 386; Morris 1995: 470; Laney 1992: 198). See also additional note to 10:38.

102 Laney (1992: 199) thinks that the final word ἐκεῖ (ekei, there) represents an emphatic contrast between people’s response “in that place” and the unbelief Jesus encountered in Jerusalem (10:36–39).

26 Beasley-Murray (1999: 209) notes that there is no way of knowing whether or not Mary was aware of the significance of her act, while Laney (1992: 221) thinks that “Mary must have sensed the darkness of the hour.” Calvin (1961: 27) observes that “a thing is said to be kept when it is held in store to be brought out appropriately and opportunely.”

3 John and Matthew also refer to Zech. 9:9 (see introduction to John 10). Riding on a donkey, a lowly animal, conveyed the notion of humility, so characteristic of Jesus throughout his ministry (cf. Matt. 11:29; 2 Cor. 8:9; Phil. 2:5–11). (But note the dissenting voice of Laney [1992: 225], who says that “a donkey was not considered a lowly creature in the ancient Near East,” but that it was “the mount of princes [Judg. 5:10; 10:4; 12:14] and kings [2 Sam. 16:1–2]”; according to Laney, “Jesus came riding into Jerusalem on a mount appropriate to His royal position.”) The donkey was also considered to be an animal of peace, in contrast to the war horse (cf. Zech. 9:10). The Synoptics provide additional information not given in John: Jesus’ command to two of his disciples to go and get the colt in anticipation of his arrival in Jerusalem (Mark 11:2–3 pars.); John only mentions that “Jesus found a young donkey and sat upon it,” without going into details here (12:14).

5 Contra Laney (1992: 224, citing Hoehner 1977: 91), who thinks that the “next day” refers to the day after the great crowds of Jews came to Bethany (12:9), “probably Monday, rather than Sunday.” Ridderbos (1997: 422), among others, proposes that the triumphal entry occurred the day after the anointing at Bethany. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.373) contends that a definitive conclusion is not possible.

43 The Greek wording is identical to Matt. 26:74. The translation “began to crow” reflects the understanding that the aorist verb ἐφώνησεν (ephōnēsen) is ingressive (cf., e.g., the TNIV). If so, D. M. Smith’s (1999: 337) point is moot that “it is only in Mark that the cock crows twice

549, 564n24, 590n17, 598n10
Lang, F. 455n29
La Potterie, I. de 20n8, 47n86
Larsen, B. 332n45, 521n3

(14:72; cf. 14:30),” but that “like Matthew and Luke, John reports only one cock-crowing” (cf. Laney 1992: 326). Mishnaic legislation prohibited the raising of fowl in Jerusalem (m. B. Qam. 7.7), but it is unlikely that this prohibition was strictly obeyed in Jesus’ day (Jeremias 1969: 47–48).

12 That is, “the many meals and celebrations that week in the Passover season” (Burge 2000: 499; cf. Carson 1991: 590; see also Torrey 1931: 239–40). Contra Keener (1993: 307–308), who says that different calendars or John’s “making a symbolic point” account for the apparent discrepancy between John and the Synoptics (different calendars are also the “solution” presented by Laney [1992: 330, following Hoehner]).

24 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 638; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Borchert 2002: 295; R. Brown 1970: 987; Bultmann 1971: 684; Burge 2000: 554; Laney 1992: 360. Witherington (1995: 325) suggests, less plausibly, that the beloved disciple believed that Jesus had been taken by God similar to Elijah. Morris (1995: 736) notes that the two verbs do not have explicit objects, supplying the graveclothes as the object of the beloved disciple’s “seeing” and Jesus’ resurrection as that of the disciple’s “believing” (albeit without understanding its full theological significance). Hardly plausible is the suggestion by Minear (1983: 91 n. 14, with reference to 1976 [followed by Conway 1999: 189–90]) that what the disciples believed was the statement of Mary Magdalene in 20:2.

17 Morris (1995: 762 n. 17, citing H. V. Morton) conjectures that an individual on the shore may be able to see better than the one fishing and thus may plausibly direct the latter on where to cast the net. Similarly, Laney (1992: 375) suggests that “perhaps the disciples thought the stranger on the shore could see a school of fish near the surface of the water.”

10 Contra Laney (1992: 381), who says that Peter was hurt “when Jesus used his own word to ask about his love.”

29 Lang, TDNT 6:934–47, especially 936–37, 942; Carson 1991: 517; R. Brown 1970: 679; Ridderbos 1997: 518. See, for example, Isa. 30:27; Matt. 3:12 par.; 5:22; 18:8; 25:41; Luke 12:49; Heb. 12:29; 2 Pet. 3:10; Jude 7, 23; Rev. 20:14.

8 John’s prologue has stimulated several highly creative structural proposals. Often the only limit seems to be the imagination of the interpreter. A case in point is the understanding of the prologue as a series of three successive “waves,” each with three movements (La Potterie 1984; Moloney 1977: 35–39; 1993: 25–27; Viviano 1998). Coloe (1997: 44–46) sees 1:1–2 as introduction and 1:18 as conclusion, with 1:3–17 dividing into two sections of three strophes each (1:3–5, 6–8, 9–13 and 14, 15, 16–17), paralleling the six-day structure of Gen. 1:1–2:4. According to Coloe, the rest of the Gospel represents day seven.

86 See also Wallace 1996: 365–68, referring to Waltke 1958: 1.166–76; R. Brown 1966: 16; and especially the excellent, definitive discussion in Carson 1991: 131–34, referring also to R. Edwards 1988; La Potterie 1977: 1.145–50.

45 See Larsen 2001: 215–20; Zahn 1921: 482 (called “a bizarre idea” by Bultmann [1971: 400 n. 6]); acknowledged as grammatically possible but rejected by Michaels (1989: 199).

3 For a narrative exegesis of 18:15–19:22, see Larsen 2001: 122–39. Larsen views Pilate as an archetypal tragic figure, in application of the work of Northrop Frye with further reference to

Lattey, C. 520n45

p 657 Laughlin, J. C. H. 100n41

Leaney, A. R. C. 435n67

Lee, D. A. 5n10, 113n1, 115n4, 139, 139n16, 174n1, 174n4, 181n30, 190n78, 210n56, 278, Culpepper (1983) and Stibbe (1992; 1994). Keener (2003: 1097) proposes another chiasm for 18:29–19:16, with 19:1–3 (scourging and crown of thorns) at the center. On John's Passover chronology, see Keener 2003: 1100–1103. Keener (2003: 1103) does not favor Blomberg's and Carson's harmonization and concludes that the Synoptics and John "at least imply (perhaps for theological reasons) the Passover on different days." I have similar problems here with Keener's reconstruction as with his view on the temple cleansing.

45 The former is suggested by Kosmala 1963; 1967–68; the latter by Lattey 1953–54; R. Brown 1970: 828 (both citing Lagrange). See also commentary at 13:36–38.

41 For general information, see Laughlin (1993) and Schlatter (1997: 111–12).

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus "our advocate" with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning "supporter" or "sponsor." The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning "advocate" (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man's Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is "a kind of angel ... in human form," be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the "alter ego of Jesus" [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source's figure of "helper"; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the "spirit of prophecy." For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel's lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete's role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete's ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

10 See Köstenberger 1999a: 30–31. There has been a virtual avalanche of literary explorations of Johannine themes or specific Johannine portions of text pouring from the presses in the last two decades. Among those are Culpepper 1983; Duke 1985; Staley 1988; M. Davies 1992; Stibbe 1992; 1994; Lee 1994; Tovey 1997; Beck 1997; Conway 1999; and Harstine 2002, to list but a few.

1 For a helpful defense of the literary unity of John 3, see Lee 1994: 37–38.

4 See also the connection between Nicodemus's statement regarding τὰ σημεῖα ... ἃ σὺ ποιεῖς (3:2) and the evangelist's comment regarding τὰ σημεῖα ἃ ἐποίησεν (2:23) (noted by Lee 1994: 39), which suggests that Nicodemus is one of those, described in 2:23–24, to whom Jesus did not entrust himself.

16 So, e.g., Lee 1994: 41–42. It is possible that “he” refers to Jesus rather than God (Burge 1987: 83–84; cf. Hofius 1999: 131–34).

1 For a survey of patristic literature on John 5:1–18, see Mees 1986. A close narrative reading of 5:1–18 is found in Culpepper 1993. A reading of 5:1–47 is provided by Lee 1994: 98–125.

4 For an unfavorable comparison between this character and the man born blind in John 9, see the discussion there. Keener (2003: 639, following Culpepper 1983: 139) contends that 5:1–15 serves as a (negative) foil for the (positive) characterization in chapter 9 of the man born blind, calling the contrasting of characters a common rhetorical device. See also Asiedu-Pepurah 2001; Staley 1991. For a discussion of the similarities and differences between John 5 and 9, see Lee 1994: 105–7.

30 Lee (1994: 102, citing Robert Alter in n. 4) notes that the delayed reference to the Sabbath in 5:9b is in keeping with typical Hebrew narrative style.

78 As Lee (1994: 104) notes, following Schnackenburg, instead of summoning three witnesses in 5:32–47, Jesus ultimately is only calling upon the witness of God, “whose testimony is effected through” John the Baptist, Jesus’ own works, and the Scriptures.

56 Subsequent sayings include 8:12 = 9:5; 10:7 = 10:9; 10:11 = 10:14; 11:25; 14:6; 15:1 (see the excursus in Witherington 1995: 156–58). The personal pronoun ἐγώ (egō, I) is emphatic (Ridderbos 1997: 229 n. 118); what is more, the “I am” saying of 6:35 forms the “narrative and theological centre of the scene,” as it is based on what precedes it and is explained by what follows (Lee 1994: 135–36). “Of life” constitutes a verbal genitive (Carson 1991: 288 n. 1).

5 For structural proposals, see especially Ridderbos (1997: 332), who divides the chapter into four major scenes (9:1–5, 6–12, 13–34, 35–41); Duke (1985: 125–26 [followed by Lincoln 2000: 97]), who contends that irony is intensified by the evangelist’s juxtaposition of parallel scenes (9:1–7, 8–12, 13–17, 18–23, 24–34, 35–38, 39–41), which are arranged chiastically with 9:22 at the center; Lee (1994: 164–65), who sees a threefold structure (9:1–7, 8–34, 35–41); and Keener (2003: 775), who divides chapters 9 and 10 as follows: 9:1–34 (blindness and sin); 9:35–10:18 (true shepherd, sheep, and thieves); 10:19–21 (divided response); and 10:22–42 (conflict at Hanukkah). Lincoln (2000: 99) also follows Duke (1985: 126) in contending that in John 9 “the theme is clearly trial and judgment,” with the elements of a trial emerging from 9:13 onward.

30 Barrett 1978: 358–59; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.243 (cited in Lee [1994: 167 n. 1], who also refers to Isa. 8:6 LXX). See Gen. Rab. 98.8; 99.8.

4 Lee (1995: 38) speaks of a “narrative partnership” between those characters within the literary plan of the chapter.

7 On the literary connections between John 20 and 21, see Talbert 1992: 248; Schneiders 1989 (cited in Lee 1995: 40 n. 7).

11 Three times in this chapter Mary expresses her conviction that Jesus’ body had been taken by grave robbers (cf. 20:13, 15; see Lee 1995: 40).

26 Note the plural “they” (Beasley-Murray 1999: 373). As Lee (1995: 40) points out, the present pericope thus acts as a prolepsis to John 21. Specifically, the beloved disciple recognizes the risen Jesus in 21:7.

13 Lee (1995: 42) notes the interesting narrative tension introduced by the fact that Jesus asks Mary not to cling to him (20:17) but invites Thomas to touch him later on in the narrative (20:27). She also points out that in the end, it is inconsequential whether or not Thomas actually does touch Jesus (p. 43; see discussion below). For an alternate way of construing the syntax of 20:17 by taking γάρ (gar, for) to be anticipatory, see McGehee (1986), who translates, “Don’t cling to me. Since I have not yet ascended to the Father, go to my brothers and tell them I am ascending to my Father and your Father and my God and your God.” D’Angelo (1990) adduces Apoc. Mos. 31 as a parallel, taking the present passage to relate to a concern for purity “because the appearance takes place in some sort of intermediary stage.”

19 Though see the discussion and bibliographic references in Lee 1995: 45 n. 22.

1 The present unit is introduced by δέ (de, and, but), perhaps creating a contrast between Thomas and the disciples in the previous narrative (Moloney 1998: 538). The existence of the Twelve is in this Gospel presupposed rather than explicitly narrated (see commentary at 6:67; see also the brief excursus in Borchert 2002: 311). The reference to Thomas’s designation “the twin” hardly constitutes an allusion to his double-mindedness (so, rightly, Borchert 2002: 312; cf. R. Brown 1970: 1024; Bultmann 1971: 694 n. 2). Lee (1995: 43, citing Robert Alter) notes that “absence is a favourite literary device of this narrator.”

2 Contra Lee (1995: 43), who says that Thomas is no more doubtful than the other disciples.
21 Barrett 1978: 533–35; Morris 1995: 695–97; Hengel 1999: 330; Winter 1974. See especially the references in Josephus (J.W. 2.8.1 §117; Ant. 20.9.1 §§197–203 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 164]). Cf. the acknowledgment in talmudic literature that the Jews had lost this power “forty years” before the destruction of Jerusalem (y. Sanh. 1.1; 7.2; on “forty years,” see commentary at 18:24 above; loss of this power may have occurred as early as A.D. 6; see also Legasse 1997: 54–56).

41 Moloney 1998: 173; cf. Metzner 1999; Lee 1994: 110; Witkamp 1985: 24; Leidig 1979: 211; contra Thomas 1995: 18. Moloney (1998: 173) rightly notes, contra Beck (1993 [cf. 1997: 86–90]), who argues that anonymous characters in the Fourth Gospel draw the reader into an identification with the character, “The reader of the Fourth Gospel, however, hardly identifies with a man who is in league with ‘the Jews’ (vs. 15).” Keener (2003: 87), similarly, contends that a list of Johannine models of faith is not entirely coextensive with anonymous characters (citing esp. 5:14–15) and registers this as his only serious disagreement with Beck (p. 87 n. 49). Beck, in a review (2001), indirectly responds to my earlier criticism (Köstenberger 1999b, reviewing Beck 1997) that the man in John 5 disproves his theory by alleging, in effect, that I have no place for literary analysis in my hermeneutical method. Nothing could be further from the truth. My concern, rather, lies with an unqualified wholesale adoption of reader-response criticism by evangelicals who fail to realize that this methodology is part and parcel of a postmodern hermeneutic that is left with nothing but subjective readings devoid of any claim to authority or universal applicability. Moreover, I was concerned to point out that Beck’s central thesis (i.e., that anonymity necessarily equals ideal function and positive characterization) is invalid. Note further this puzzling conclusion by Brodie (1993: 238): “The final picture ... is ... open to a positive interpretation: the man has finally come to mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus, and he is announcing the good news to the Jews.” Precisely where Brodie finds the man

Levinskaya, I. 377n8
Lieu, J. M. 102, 295n86
Lightfoot, J. 75n67, 362, 576n23
Lightfoot, R. H. 142n5, 192n88
Lincoln, A. T. 33, 33n40, 131, 190n79, 250n1, 277n4, 278n5, 297, 389n1, 435n67, 472, “announcing the good news to the Jews” is unclear to me, nor can I see textual evidence for the man coming to “mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus.”

8 So, for example, Burge 2000: 343. Levinskaya (1996) demonstrates the presence of God-fearers in Jewish assemblies during the first-century Roman Empire. Cf. Josephus, J.W. 6.9.3 §§420–27; Acts 8:27–28.

86 See Isa. 6:10; 42:19; Jer. 5:21 (cf. Matt. 13:13–15 pars.; and esp. John 12:40). See Lieu 1988: 90.

67 As cited in J. Lightfoot 1859: 3.245.

23 See Schlatter 1959: 511; Beasley-Murray 1999: 383; Borchert 2002: 310. The rabbis used the terms “binding” and “loosing” to declare what was forbidden or permitted by the law. See Str-B 1:738–41; Büchsel, TDNT 2:60–61; J. Lightfoot 1859: 2.237–41; Dalman 1902: 213–17.

5 Blomberg (1995: 8), with reference to Dockery (1988), lists five approaches to the present narrative: (1) allegorical (cf. 2 Kings 17:30–31); (2) existential (Bultmann 1971: 175–202); (3) pastoral (Milne 1993: 85–86); (4) salvation-historical (W. Davies 1974; Carson 1993); and (5) intertextual (focusing on OT parallels such as Gen. 24:10–61; 29:1–20; Exod. 2:15b–21) (Neyrey 1979). Acknowledging that all of these approaches capture elements of truth, Blomberg nevertheless finds them wanting and proposes a seven-pronged approach of his own. Stibbe (1993: 68–69) advocates a symbolic reading: “If the woman has had five husbands and is living de facto with a sixth, then Jesus is the seventh man in her life. Since seven is the perfect number in Judaism, the implicit commentary must be that Jesus is the man which she has been waiting for, the man in whose presence she will find wholeness.” In the same vein, Brodie (1993: 217–18) sees this as a betrothal-type scene. See also Dockery (1988: 127–40), who distinguishes between author-, text-, and reader-oriented approaches, and Marshall 1974. R. Lightfoot (1956: 122) detects certain parallels between John 4 and 19.

88 See 5:45–47; Luke 24:27, 44; Acts 13:27; 1 John 5:9. Carson (1991: 262) sees here a “general reference to all of the Father’s revealing work” (citing R. Lightfoot 1956: 146–47).

40 As Lincoln (2000: 21) notes, not only does the lawsuit motif (see Isa. 40–55, esp. 42:18–25; 43:22–28; 50:1–3) occur in each of the five main sections of John’s narrative (prologue; 1:19–12:50; 13–17; 18–20; epilogue), but it does so in highly significant ways, forming the narrative framework of the Gospel (p. 141). According to Lincoln, just as there are seven signs and seven discourses in John’s Gospel, there are seven witnesses: John the Baptist, Jesus himself, Jesus’ works, God the Father, the Scriptures, the Samaritan woman, and the crowd. For a summary and appraisal of Lincoln’s important monograph, see Köstenberger 2001a.

79 On the trial motif in John’s Gospel, see especially Lincoln 2000.

1 See Charles 1989; Lincoln 2000. Stibbe (1993: 99) contends that the present pericope constitutes a “trial scene,” whereby “the implicit commentary ... supports the narrator’s defence of the divinity of Jesus and the concomitant satire of the diabolism of the Jews.” According to Stibbe, much of the irony in this chapter comes from Jesus taking on the role of Yahweh, and the Jews that of the false, pagan gods.

4 For an analysis of John 9 in light of the Johannine lawsuit motif, see Lincoln 2000: 96–105.

5 For structural proposals, see especially Ridderbos (1997: 332), who divides the chapter into four major scenes (9:1–5, 6–12, 13–34, 35–41); Duke (1985: 125–26 [followed by Lincoln 2000: 97]), who contends that irony is intensified by the evangelist’s juxtaposition of parallel scenes (9:1–7, 8–12, 13–17, 18–23, 24–34, 35–38, 39–41), which are arranged chiastically with 9:22 at the center; Lee (1994: 164–65), who sees a threefold structure (9:1–7, 8–34, 35–41); and Keener (2003: 775), who divides chapters 9 and 10 as follows: 9:1–34 (blindness and sin); 9:35–10:18 (true shepherd, sheep, and thieves); 10:19–21 (divided response); and 10:22–42 (conflict at Hanukkah). Lincoln (2000: 99) also follows Duke (1985: 126) in contending that in John 9 “the theme is clearly trial and judgment,” with the elements of a trial emerging from 9:13 onward.

1 For a discussion of 12:37–50 in the context of the Johannine lawsuit motif (cf. Isa. 40–55), see Lincoln 2000: 105–10. Keener (2003: 882) notes that many find in 12:37–43 a theological summary of people’s responses to Jesus’ public ministry and in 12:44–50 an anthology of representative sayings. Whitacre (1999: 326) suggests that 12:37–43 emphasizes Jesus’ deeds, and 12:44–50 his words (also adducing Moses’ final words in Deut. 32:45–47 as a parallel). Both Ridderbos (1997: 443) and Schnackenburg (1990: 2.411) stress the relevance of this section for the evangelist’s own day and the historical distance from which this section was presumably written. This surely is true but should not be exaggerated. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.421) also provides a defense of Johannine authorship against Boismard, who claims that 12:44–50 is non-Johannine. Bultmann (1971: ix), in a hardly defensible move, relocates both 12:34–36 and 12:44–50 to John 8, with only 12:37–43 remaining in the traditional position.

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete's ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

47 Regarding the Isaianic “lawsuit motif” as background for 16:8–11, see Lincoln 2000: 122–23.

2 For Jesus' trial before Pilate in the context of the “lawsuit motif” in the Fourth Gospel (with echoes of Isa. 40–55), see Lincoln 2000: 123–38 (with further bibliography on p. 123 n. 93).

2 See R. Brown 1970: 858–59, followed by Lincoln 2000: 124; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.220, 242; Moloney 1998: 493.

22 Moloney (1998: 35) says that πρὸς connotes motion, not just “with,” and translates it “turned toward.” Yet any force of motion inherent in πρὸς is overridden by the stative verb (Wallace 1996: 358–59; Schnackenburg [1990: 1.234] also rejects the idea). Lindars (1972: 84) proposes “in company with,” while Westcott (1908: 1.6) writes, “The personal being of the Word was realised in active intercourse with and in perfect communion with God.” Bultmann (1971: 32–33) suggests that ἦν πρὸς is a Semitism equivalent to παρά plus the dative.

24 Lindars (1972: 82) labels ἦν “past continuous” and thus “virtually timeless.”

37 “Overcome” or an equivalent is favored also by Morris 1995: 76; Moloney 1998: 36;

Schnackenburg 1990: 1.245–46; Laney 1992: 39; Lindars 1972: 87; Schlatter 1948: 9

(“καταλαμβάνω never means ‘understand’ in John”); and Westcott 1908: 1.9–10. Carson (1991: 138) thinks that John might have both meanings (“overcome” and “comprehend”) in mind (so also Whitacre 1999: 53) and likes the ambiguity in BAGD's translation, “master” (see BDAG 520). Keener (2003: 387) believes that John's use of κατέλαβεν in 1:5 is an instance of tradio, a play on the multiple meanings of a word (here “comprehend” and “overcome”). Keener notes that the word occurs in Wis. 7:30 but admits that there the term clearly means “overcome” and no wordplay is present. Burge (2000: 56) agrees that both are at work, but he sees “overcome” as being dominant. Calvin (1959: 12) translates “comprehend.” The major translations divide more or less evenly between the two options, usually mentioning the one not chosen in a footnote: (1) NIV: “understood”; NASB, NKJV: “comprehend”; (2) NLT: “extinguish”; NET: “mastered”; ISV: “put out”; HCSB, ESV, NRSV: “overcome.” Notably, the TNIV changed the NIV's “understood” to “overcome.”

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970:

112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son's procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called

God's children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

85 See also Bultmann 1971: 78; Lindars 1972: 97; Bruce 1983: 43; Beasley-Murray 1999: 15; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.275–76.

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

55 Contra Lindars (1972: 112–13), who contends that Jesus still remained a disciple of John according to the present Gospel in contrast to the Synoptics.

34 Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.344; Barrett 1978: 195; R. Brown 1966: 117; Witherington 1995: 85–86; Borchert 1996: 160; Bultmann 1971: 122; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38–39; Dodd 1963: 162; Lindars 1972: 135–37; Keener 2003: 518–19. Keener contends that it is historically implausible that Jesus would challenge the temple system by overturning tables and yet continue in public ministry for two or three years afterward, sometimes even visiting Jerusalem (though he notes that Jesus faces considerable hostility there when he does). On the contrary, an early temple cleansing accounts well for Jewish hostility toward Jesus early on (5:18), and Jesus' continuing in ministry for two or three more years is eminently plausible historically in light of Jesus' pattern of withdrawal (3:22; 6:15; 7:9–10; 8:59; 10:40) and his caution from the very inception of his ministry because his “time” has not yet come (2:4; 7:6). Borchert (1996: 160) contends that two temple clearings are “a historiographic monstrosity that has no basis in the texts of the Gospels.” Kreitzer (1998: 100–101) claims that the evangelist followed the motto “When the details of history no longer serve the functions of the story—discard them.” R. Brown (1966: 118) concludes that Jesus uttered some prophetic saying concerning the destruction of the temple on his first visit but actually cleansed the temple at the end of his ministry. Wallace (1996: 561 n. 20) notes that this would require a crucifixion date of A.D. 33.

21 The phrase “enter the kingdom of God [or ‘heaven’]” is found in the NT also in Matt. 5:20; 7:21; 18:3; 19:23–24 par.; Mark 9:47; Acts 14:22. Pryor (1991b: 71–95 [cf., earlier, Lindars 1981: 287–88]) seeks to make a case for John's dependence on the tradition behind Matt. 18:3, but his argument is both unpersuasive and unnecessary (cf. Osburn 1989: 132: “unconvincing”).

31 Lindars (1972: 153–54) adduces Paul's statement in 1 Cor. 15:50 that “flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God.”

8 Cf. LSJ 1130, s.v. μήτις; NRSV; Lindars 1972: 193. Westcott (1908: 1.163) comments, “The form of the sentence grammatically suggests a negative answer (v. 33), but hope bursts through it.” The two other uses of μήτι in this Gospel (8:22; 18:35) unequivocally expect a negative response.

40 Some interpreters (such as Lindars [1972: 186]) argue that “five men/husbands” alludes to a tradition cited in Josephus, according to which the Samaritans had five gods (Ant. 9.14.3 §288; cf. 2 Kings 17:24, 30–31), just as “five colonnades” in 5:2 is taken to refer to the Jewish Pentateuch (Hengel 1999: 307, 315). As Blomberg (1995: 8 [cf. Schlatter 1948: 122]) points out, however, in reality the text lists seven gods of five nations (but see Prest 1992: 368; see also the discussion in C. Koester 1990b: 675–77).

3 Lindars (1992a) proposes the rather daring hypothesis that John’s source for the present account was Q, which he developed along different lines than did Matthew and Luke. However, the degree of difference between the respective accounts renders source-critical solutions less than convincing.

72 So Ridderbos 1997: 235–37; cf. Carson 1991: 295; Morris 1995: 331–32; contra Moloney 1998: 223; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.55; Lindars 1972: 267; Talbert 1992: 140. As Keener (2003: 690) observes, “John’s words [in 6:27–63] invite his audience to look to Christ’s death itself, not merely those symbols which point to his death.” At best, any such overtones are derivative (Borchert 1996: 270–71; cf. Brodie 1993: 286; Calvin 1959: 170).

78 Lindars (1972: 269) observes, “This is the climax of the discourse. All the metaphors are dropped, and the whole thing is put into terms of personal relationship.” Schlatter (1948: 179) notes aptly that the only “mysticism” that arises from this mutual indwelling is that of being “children of God.”

9 Note the inclusio of 7:4 and 8:59 (Keener 2003: 703). Cf. Matt. 10:26 and the “messianic secret” motif in the Synoptics (Barrett 1978: 311; Carson 1991: 310, referring to Lindars 1972: 283).

15 To “go up” (ἀναβαίνω, anabainō) to Jerusalem is a common expression no matter what one’s geographical origination (cf. 5:1). Because the term is used later with reference to Jesus’ ascension to the Father, some see an allusion to Jesus’ glorification (Carson 1991: 309: “just possible”). This is unlikely (Michaels 1989: 127; Lindars 1972: 285) and in any case is not the primary referent (contra R. Brown 1966: 308).

21 Motyer (1997: 152–53) plausibly suggests that 7:14–24 is designed to enable the reader to make an appropriate judgment concerning the death of Jesus. If the Jews are correct, Jesus is a sinner, demon-possessed, and the like. If Jesus’ claims are valid, it is the Jews who are misleading the people, not Jesus. Keener (2003: 721) discerns a common structure in 7:14–36 and 7:37–52: (1) Jesus teaches in the temple (7:14–24; 7:37–39), (2) people speculate about his identity (7:25–29, 31; 7:40–43), and (3) an attempt to arrest him fails (7:30, 32–36; 7:44–52, citing Talbert 1992: 145, following Lindars).

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee’s observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus “from within him” refers to “whoever believes in me.” Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of “rivers of living water” (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987: 88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

11 A survey of major commentaries shows that about half provide a regular commentary (Carson, Laney, Lindars, Whitacre, Calvin, Westcott), while the other half refrain from comment (Michaels, Talbert, Stibbe, Brodie, D. M. Smith), in some cases choosing not to address the issue at all (e.g., Schlatter [1948: 205], who in his scholarly commentary moves directly from 7:52 to 8:12 without comment, though his popular commentary [1962: 139–41] does treat the pericope adulterae in deference to “ecclesiastical tradition”; see also Zahn [1921: 404], who, like Schlatter, moves immediately from 7:52 to 8:12 and deals with the pericope in a lengthy excursus on pp. 723–30).

14 Commentators vary as to whether to regard as synonyms the two words used in the present context for “true” or “valid,” ἀληθής (alēthēs; 8:13, 14, 17) and ἀληθινός (alēthinos; 8:16). Beasley-Murray (1999: 125 n. a [contra R. Brown 1966: 341; Lindars 1972: 317; Barrett 1978: 339]) opts to distinguish between the former meaning “true” or “valid” and the latter meaning “just” or “authentic” (similarly, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.194). Ridderbos (1997: 294) suggests the meaning “just” for ἀληθινός; Barrett (1978: 339) opts for “authentic”; and Carson (1991: 340) prefers “right.”

90 Cf. 5:24; see also 6:40, 47; 11:25–26. Carson (1991: 355 [cf. Lindars 1972: 332]) suggests that this statement is in further development of 8:50. The word ἐμὸν (emon, my) stresses that it is Jesus’ word that must be kept; θάνατον (thanaton, death) is emphatic as well (Morris 1995: 416 n. 104), as is the negative οὐ μὴ ... εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (ou mē ... eis ton aiōna, never . . . ever) (Wallace 1996: 468–69). Note that when Jesus’ opponents quote his statement in 8:52 (per the evangelist’s rendering), they use the less marked pronoun μου (mou, my) instead of the possessive adjective ἐμὸν and do not place θάνατον in an emphatic position.

106 Wallace (1996: 515, 530–31) contends that the present reference does not constitute an instance of the historical present of εἰμί (eimi, I am). Lindars (1972: 336) notes how the “striking change of tense and the use of the simple verb einai put all the emphasis on the timeless condition of eternal existence,” drawing attention also to the escalating force of the “I am” sayings of the present chapter (8:12, 24, 28, 58).

25 The double imperative constitutes a Semitism (Barrett 1978: 358). Ridderbos (1997: 336) lists three reasons why the blind man was sent to Siloam: (1) to wash the mud out of his eyes; (2) to evoke the blind man’s faith; and (3) to carry out ritual purification (cf. Luke 7:14). Carson (1991: 365) adds (4) to correlate the Pharisees’ unbelief with a prophecy of judgment in Isa. 8:6 (though he rejects any prefiguration of baptism, contra Lindars [1972: 344], who sees the man’s bath as a “quasi-baptismal washing”; see also Ridderbos 1997: 337). Grigsby (1985) argues that the washing in the pool of Siloam constitutes a thematic anticipation of the Johannine cross.

14 Lindars 1972: 357: “probably simply holding the gate open while the sheep run out past him.” On the fold and the door, see also Keener 2003: 809–11.

32 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.294) proposes a translation “right” or “true.” Similarly, Borchert (1996: 333) suggests that the meaning of καλός is similar to that of ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) (cf. Moloney 1998: 310; Bultmann 1971: 364). Carson (1991: 386) contends that the “good shepherd” should be thought of as “noble or worthy” but not “sentimental or effeminate.” Lindars (1972: 361) favors the rendering “an ideal shepherd.”

95 Some have seen a parallel to Jesus’ assertion of oneness with God in Antiochus Epiphanes’ boast that he was “God Manifest” (the meaning of the Greek epithet “Epiphanes”). This claim made by Antiochus may also lie behind the Jews’ charge that Jesus (like the Seleucid ruler [see 2 Macc. 9:28]) was a blasphemer (cf. 10:33, 36; see VanderKam 1990: 211–14; followed by Moloney 1998: 321). See, however, the appropriate caution by Lindars (1972: 376), who distinguishes between Jesus’ words here and the notion of family relationships among pagan gods. Lindars also points out that the present statement “preserves the logical priority of God, because the title Father is retained” and “denotes a personal intimacy which forestalls any suggestion of ditheism.”

32 Lindars (1972: 390) conjectures that “stumble” may constitute an allusion to Isa. 8:14.

38 Further references are provided by Borchert (1996: 352) and Lindars (1972: 394).

86 The term, in verb or noun form, occurs rarely in the LXX (Dan. 11:30; Lam. 2:6; cf. Sir. 13:3), though the evidence is probably late and hardly conclusive (see Lindars 1992b: 94–95). For primary Greek references, see Lindars (1992b: 92–96), who cites Aeschylus, Seven against Thebes 1.461 (sixth to fifth century B.C.) as the only extracanonical reference preceding the present one. The term occurs three times in the Synoptics (Mark 1:43: Jesus “rebukes” a demon; Mark 14:5: some “reproach” a woman for wasting ointment; Matt. 9:30: Jesus “sternly warns” healed men to tell no one). Both τῷ πνεύματι (tō pneumati, in spirit) in John 11:33 and ἐν ἑαυτῷ (en heautō, in himself) in 11:38 represent Semitisms “for expressing the internal impact of the emotions” (R. Brown 1966: 425).

91 Barrett (1978: 399) asserts that Jesus was angry “beyond question.” Schnackenburg (1990: 2.335) calls attempts to render ἐμβριμάομαι as an emotional experience such as grief, pain, or sympathy “illegitimate.” Beasley-Murray (1987 = 1999: 192–93, followed by Lindars 1992b: 89–90, noting that he changed his view from Lindars 1972: 398) marshals considerable evidence to support the reading “became angry in spirit.” See also Carson (1991: 415), who contends that ἐμβριμάομαι means more than “deeply moved in spirit” and says that the term refers to “anger, outrage, or emotional indignation.” Brodie (1993: 395), starting with Schnackenburg’s view that Jesus was angry at the unbelief of Mary and the Jews, maintains that his anger is directed also at sin and death, and thus ultimately against the realm of Satan.

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, “The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death.” See also Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999: 289. The mourners’ unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999: 192–93), several of whom adduce Paul’s statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus’ anger is directed toward both “the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow” and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus’ anger as occasioned by Mary’s turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either “misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition,” to mean “moved in spirit.” Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus’ struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, “He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself” (11:38 is translated “bearing the rebuke within himself”). According to Story, at the sight of people’s grief, Jesus was overcome by “momentary self-regret,” thinking, “Why did I not come sooner ... ? I have only myself to blame. ... Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?” However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

93 This is the meaning of the word in its only undisputed preceding reference in Aeschylus, Seven against Thebes 1.461, where mares are shown “snorting [ἐμβριμώμενας] in the bridles,” “with their breath whistling in their nostrils (1.463–64), as they brace themselves for the rush upon the enemy” (the latter quote is a paraphrase by Lindars 1992b: 92). It is less clear that people’s unbelief is the object of Jesus’ indignation; if so, why would he join them in their grief by bursting into tears himself in 11:35 (Lindars 1992b: 92)? Schlatter (1948: 254) comments perceptively, “All that John is saying is that Jesus took on a threatening posture and that he was agitated as he went to Lazarus’s tomb. John never provided an interpretation of the processes that moved the inner life of Jesus.” Conway (1999: 147–48) cautions similarly that “we should be wary of delving too deeply into the psyche of Jesus.”

115 Lindars (1972: 401) maintains that it is Jesus’ desire “that they may have the perception to see in the miracle the glory of God. ... If it is urgent that Jesus should do this sign before his Passion, it is equally vital that its true meaning should be recognized.” The phrase “that they may believe that you sent me” in 11:42 is later echoed repeatedly at the conclusion of Jesus’ final prayer in 17:21, 23, 25, and in the purpose statement in 20:30–31, which mentions Jesus’ “signs” and “believing” in his name.

140 Lindars 1972: 406: “in that memorable year.” On Joseph Caiaphas, see the sidebar in Köstenberger 2002c: 116.

33 Contra Lindars (1972: 419), who claims that “the idea that Lazarus should also be put to death is an unhappy consequence of his own [i.e., the evangelist’s] work, deriving not from the tradition, but from the logic of the situation which he has produced.” I see no reason to question the historicity of this piece of information.

2 Lindars (1972: 448) notes, “The piling up of participial clauses is unusual in John, and gives a most solemn effect.”

52 So Morris 1995: 549 n. 27; apparently, Carson 1991: 464–66; and the UBS committee (Metzger 1994: 204), adducing the “preponderant weight of external attestation”; contra Barrett 1978: 442; Beasley-Murray 1999: 229 n. f; Lindars 1972: 451; D. M. Smith 1999: 254; Dunn 1970: 250–51.

11 As Lindars (1972: 465) points out, the appearance of Peter at the beginning and at the end of John 13 is another Johannine instance of inclusio.

70 The translation of the term has proved particularly difficult since there does not seem to be an exact equivalent in the English language (see discussion in Carson 1991: 499). None of the expressions chosen in English translations seems fully adequate: “Counselor” (NIV) smacks of contemporary notions of counseling (marriage counselor, camp counselor), focusing primarily on emotional or psychological aspects (though the legal term “Counselor” or “Counsel” is more appropriate); “Helper” (NASB, ESV, ISV) is more neutral but conveys inferior status overtones not present in the text and lacks the legal connotation possibly present (cf. the discussion in Lindars 1972: 479); the fact that some translations give several alternative renderings in footnotes also suggests that any one English rendering may be inadequate (e.g., NLT: “the Counselor; or Comforter, or Encourager, or Advocate”). “Companion” (suggested by Brodie [1993: 466]) also falls short, as does Calvin’s (1961: 82) “Patron.” Some make reference to the root meaning of the word, “one called alongside to help,” but it is unclear whether first-century usage consciously drew on this background. There is evidence that the expression was used in a legal setting, but it is less clear that the meaning should be restricted to “Advocate” (so, consistently, the TNIV) or the like (standard Greek reference works cite the following meanings: LSJ—one called to one’s aid, legal assistant, advocate, summoned, intercessor; Behm, TDNT 5:800–814—legal advisor, helper, advocate in court [for a helpful survey, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.144–50]). Perhaps “helping presence” captures the import of the term better than any other (Köstenberger 1999a: 157) for the following reasons: (1) this is what Jesus was while with the disciples; (2) this encompasses the various functions laid out for the Spirit in John 14–16; (3) this transcends (but may include) the legal context of the term (see esp. 16:7–11). See the discussion by Ridderbos (1997: 503), who issues a plea to let the Johannine context (rather than alleged extrabiblical parallels) determine the meaning of παράκλητος and concludes that “the dominant idea is of someone who offers assistance in a situation in which help is needed.”

95 Hence, 14:27 continues 14:25–26. See Kellum (2005: 164), who cites Witherington 1995: 253 and Brodie 1993: 469. In the Greek world, peace (εἰρήνη, eirēnē) was essentially a concept stated negatively, denoting the absence of war. Though this is also part of the term’s range of meaning in Hebrew thought (e.g., Josh. 9:15; 1 Sam. 7:14; 1 Kings 2:5), the expression shālôm usually had much richer connotations, conveying the notion of positive blessing, especially that of a right relationship with God (Morris 1965a: 237–44; Lindars 1972: 484). This is evident in the well-known blessing given by Moses and Aaron (Num. 6:24–26; cf. Ps. 29:11; Hag. 2:9). The OT prophetic writings in particular look forward to a period of peace inaugurated by the coming of the Messiah. The “prince of peace” (Isa. 9:6) would “command peace to the nations” (Zech. 9:10; cf. 9:9), and there would be good tidings of peace and salvation (Isa. 52:7; cf. 54:13; 57:19; Acts 10:36). Through the royal Messiah, God would make an everlasting “covenant of peace” with his people (Ezek. 37:26).

6 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 525–26, with reference to 17:20, the NIV, and many major commentators (e.g., Barrett 1978: 480; Bultmann 1971: 549; Lindars 1970: 494; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.115; Bruce 1980: 313; contra Borchert 2002: 156; Dodd 1963: 409; R. Brown 1970: 687; and the NLT). See the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 275; Carson 1991: 525–26.

21 Lindars (1972: 496) adduces Matt. 10:20 as evidence that the present passage probably refers to “legal testimony in a court of law.”

48 Lindars (1972: 503) rightly notes that the Spirit’s convicting work in the world is critical, for people will see their need for salvation only “when the divine judgment becomes an inescapable reality to them.”

7 See Morris 1995: 634; with further delineation of subunits, Hunter 1979: 326–28. Lindars (1972: 515) further divides 17:20–26 into 17:20–23 and 17:24–26. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.168–69, with reference to a 1973 German article) provides a more complicated proposal, dividing at 17:1–2, 4–5, 6–11a, 11b–16, 17–19, 22–23, 24–26 (he considers 17:3 and 17:20–21 to be secondary glosses). Others favor division at 17:1–8, 9–19, 20–26 (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 748–51). Malatesta (1971: 191–92) divides at 17:1–5, 6–8, 9–19, 20–24, 25–26 and proposes a strophic arrangement. More eccentric is the suggestion by Appold (1976: 204) that there is an oscillating pattern of petition and review, featuring six petition and six review units. A survey of structural proposals for John 17 up to the late 1970s is found in Hunter 1979: 312–28. More recently, Borchert (2002: 185–89) has favored seven petitions, based on the address “Father.” Yet, as Ridderbos (1997: 547) remarks, “The structure is not severe enough and the transitions are too fluid for us to speak of a detailed and sharply delineated thought scheme.”

10 Contra those who, like Barrett, consider the entire prayer to be a creation of the Fourth Evangelist, “the greatest theologian in all the history of the church” (cited in Hunter 1979: 285). Lindars (1971: 77), too, thinks that the concern for unity pervading the prayer is “nothing else than the deepest expression of John’s own personal experience” (cited in Hunter 1979: 302 n. 320). But see Hunter (1979), who argues that the prayer, including the “concept of the preexistent Son,” is firmly rooted in “Jesus’ own consciousness” (p. 301); and Agourides (1968: 138–39), who likewise contends that “no one can deny that what we really have is the formulation of the words, deeds, self-consciousness and evaluation of the work of Jesus by Himself” (p. 139; note also: “the Evangelist’s recollections of an essential historic truth about Jesus’ concern for the circle of His disciples before the Passion” [p. 141]).

13 “All people” reads literally, “all flesh,” a Semitism (Lindars 1972: 518–19); compare 8:15, where “by human standards” translates “according to the flesh.”

16 On life, see commentary at 1:4; on eternal life, see commentary at 3:15. The later expression last occurred at the conclusion of the first half of this Gospel (12:50). Its occurrences in the present and the following verse constitute the final references in John. Lindars (1972: 519) notes that, since “eternal life” is John’s regular substitute for “the kingdom of God,” the present prayer corresponds quite closely to the opening of the “Lord’s Prayer” recorded in the Synoptics (though he stops short of saying that John actually used it as his model).

78 Lindars (1972: 530) asserts, “A disunited Christian community denies by its behaviour the message which it proclaims.” For an interesting example of the use of John 17 in church history, see Payton 1992: 26–38 on Martin Bucer’s 1531 sermon on John 17 in the context of the Reformation controversy regarding the Eucharist. Bucer reminded his listeners that Jesus himself is the one praying, and God alone is all-knowing.

25 Contra Lindars (1972: 541: “scarcely ... an historically reliable detail ... John’s way of expressing ... theological fact”), apparently echoed by D. M. Smith (1999: 330: “scarcely conceivable historically ... John’s way of conveying theological points”), I see no reason to question the historicity of the account.

39 But since Jesus’ kingdom is otherworldly, the use of force is uncalled for in the present instance. Lindars (1972: 559) remarks, “For the Kingdom understood in this way military action is not appropriate—a fact which the Church has not always remembered.” Yet one must be careful not to construe Jesus’ statement here as a wholesale endorsement of pacifism. Though the institutional church ought to be cautious about endorsing military action, Christians are at times in their capacity as citizens called on to take up arms; in that sense, “the church” may well engage in military action and not be in any conflict with Jesus’ refusal (in a very different if not unique situation). One thinks here of the forceful abolition of slavery in the United States and of Dietrich Bonhoeffer’s participation in a plot to assassinate Adolf Hitler.

80 Nicodemus’s description by the evangelist as “the man who had earlier visited Jesus at night” harks back to 3:2 (see there the discussion, and ultimately the negative evaluation, of

Liver, J. 106n18
Loader, W. 87
Loffreda, S. 100
Lohse, E. 348, 348n132
Longacre, R. E. 453n20
Loos, H. van der 293n72, 345n117
Losie, L. A. 367n1

Nicodemus's putative "progression" in faith throughout the narrative). Contra Carson (1991: 629 [cf. Witherington 1995: 312]), who believes that Nicodemus is, in the present context, presented as "stepping out of the darkness and emerging into the light."

3 Note the lack of consensus on the relationship between the Johannine empty tomb narrative and those found in the Synoptics: see, for example, the studies by Neirynck (1984), who detects a "determinative" Synoptic influence on the Fourth Evangelist; Lindars (1956), who says that John's sources are traditions that lie behind the Synoptics rather than the Synoptics themselves; and Curtis (1971), who makes the implausible suggestion that Luke used John rather than vice versa.

2 Cf. Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; cf. 1 Cor. 15:4; see Carson 1991: 635. The expression "on the first day of the week" reads more literally, "on one of the Sabbath [week]" and may allude to the week of creation (cf. Gen. Rab. 11.9 on Gen. 2:3). Morris (1991: 733 n. 7 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. a]) notes that σαββάτων (sabbatōn) can mean either "Sabbath" or "week" (contra R. Brown [1970: 980], who claims that the meaning "week" emerged only later). The use of the cardinal numeral ("one") for the ordinal ("first") may represent a Semitism (Barrett 1978: 562; cf. Morris 1995: 733 n. 6; Beasley-Murray 1999: 366; Moloney 1998: 521; Lindars 1972: 599).

15 That Mary's reaction is natural may be illustrated by one incident in the life of Alexander the Great (see Arrian, Anabasis 6.13.3 [cited in BDAG 126]). That it reveals misunderstanding is well argued by Lindars (1972: 607), who writes, "The desire to hold Jesus must be restrained, because it is an attempt to recapture the conditions of the incarnate life in place of the universal and abiding relationship which is the object of his mission."

4 Lindars (1972: 610) says, "This does not mean that his body is ethereal, able to pass through locked doors," but "rather that he can make himself present at any time and place 'where two or three are gathered in my name.' " Similarly, Calvin 1961: 202.

18 Cf. m. Šeqal. 1.3: "On the 25th thereof [the month of Adar] they [the tables of the moneychangers] were set up in the Temple." On Tyrian shekels, see Richardson 1992: 514–18. On the half-shekel offering, see Liver 1963.

132 For further information on the Sanhedrin, see Schürer 1973–79: 2.199–226; Lohse, TDNT 7:861–71. Hengel (1999: 330) questions whether the Sanhedrin had seventy members in Jesus' day, as is frequently alleged; he favors instead the view that the composition of the council depended on the particular ruling high priest, especially in the period between A.D. 6 and 41.

20 This is what, in application of Robert E. Longacre's methodology, may mark 15:1–17 as the peak of the entire farewell discourse (Kellum 2005: 193–96). In the present chapter, "remain" seems to serve as a metaphorical substitute for "believe." On the "strange absence" of the word πιστεύω (pisteuō, believe) in John 15, see Morris 1995: 297 (cited in Croteau 2002: 111).

72 On Jewish opinions on Jesus' miracles, see van der Loos 1965: 156–65.

117 See van der Loos 1965: 133–38; on the raising of Lazarus, 576–89.

Louw, J. P. 48, 50, 123
Lowery, D. K. 53n1
Lund, N. W. 21
Luthardt, C. E. 17n28
Luther, M. 28, 48n92, 111n36

MacAdam, H. I. 109n29

1 See the survey in Losie, DJG 854–59. Laney (1992: 222, 224) prefers the term “royal entry” because Jesus entered the city as Messiah and king.

1 On the term Ἰουδαῖοι, see commentary at 1:19. The new BDAG entry on Ἰουδαῖος, which systematically recasts all “Jews” as “Judeans” in order to avoid “anti-Judaism” by modern-day readers, constitutes an unduly extreme reaction and results in demonstrably inaccurate renderings that equate all Jews with inhabitants of Judea. However, Jews lived also in Galilee and adjacent provinces, not to mention the Diaspora. Note the appropriate criticism by Lowery (2003: 120–21).

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon’s work is given extensive coverage in Origen’s commentary on John’s Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John’s Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάπξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that “the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel’s] use”; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges “the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

92 Keener (2003: 422) states that the contrast in 1:17 is between something good and something better (citing m. Abot 2.7: “the more study of the Law the more life”). See also Luther’s (1957: 139–48) discussion of 1:17, summed up as follows: “It is as if he were to say: The Law, given through Moses, is indeed a Law of life, righteousness, and everything good. But far more was accomplished through Christ” (p. 144).

36 Cf. Carson 1991: 177; 1984: 441; Morris 1995: 167; Laney 1992: 70; Westcott 1908: 1.96–97; Calvin 1959: 51; Köstenberger 1999a: 76–78. Carson (1991: 177, referring to Morris) notes that virtually all of John 1–5 (except for the sections on John the Baptist) is non-Synoptic material. Morris (1995: 167 n. 55) states that “there are practically no resemblances between the two narratives, apart from the central act”; only five words are shared. Other commentators holding this view are Luther, W. Hendriksen, and R. V. G. Tasker (Kreitzer 1998: 94).

29 Assuming a three-year ministry, we see that this puts the crucifixion at A.D. 33. This reading of John 2:20, and a date of A.D. 30 for Jesus’ first Passover and the temple clearing, were advocated by Badcock (1935: 40–41). See also P. Maier (1968: 4–5); Hoehner (1977: 38–43; followed by Laney 1992: 72; cf. Hoehner, DJG 119); Humphreys and Waddington (1992: 351). MacAdam (1999: 31–33) concurs, but believes that this was Jesus’ final Passover and that the Maccini, R. G. 95, 95n24, 95n25, 142, 149n30, 159n63, 160n67, 337n76, 364n25, 561n3, 562, 569, 570

Macdonald, J. 61, 154n43

Mackowski, R. M. 92n8, 92n9, 177n11, 179n20, 284n28, 342n104

Fourth Evangelist has transposed the temple clearing to the beginning of Jesus' ministry. Zahn (1921: 126–27 n. 23) comes close, arriving at the year A.D. 28 or 29.

24 See Judg. 11:12; 2 Sam. 16:10; 1 Kings 17:18; 2 Kings 3:13; 2 Chron. 35:21. See Maccini (1996: 100–102), who concludes that Jesus is attempting to separate himself from his mother. Keener (2003: 505–6) likewise views 2:4 in terms of distancing.

25 Adducing the Petrine parallel, Maccini (1996: 102–4) calls Jesus' words to Mary here a “stern reprimand.”

30 See Maccini 1996: 131–44. Daube (1956: 375–82) argues that “do not associate with” specifically refers to Jews not sharing vessels with Samaritans (cf. NIV text and note at 4:9). However, no common utensils (such as the woman's water jar) are specifically mentioned in 4:9. The explanatory aside, “For Jews have no dealings with [συγγρῶνται] Samaritans,” probably is broader than the mere refusal to share drinking vessels (Ridderbos 1997: 154; Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. f; contra Carson 1991: 218; Borchert 1996: 203; Witherington 1995: 120; R. Brown 1966: 170; Morris 1995: 229; Barrett 1978: 232; Moloney 1998: 117, 121; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.425 n. 19).

63 On the Samaritan Taheb as prophet-revealer, see commentary at 4:25. On the woman's witness in a Jewish-Samaritan context, see Maccini 1994.

67 Regarding women witnesses in general, Josephus writes, “From women let no evidence be accepted, because of the levity [lightness, triviality] and temerity [over-boldness, rashness] of their sex” (Ant. 4.8.15 §219). Maccini (1996: 139) too facetiously subsumes the witness of Samaritan women under the witness of Samaritans in general.

76 Note the progressive aspect reflected in the imperfect ἔρχετο (ērchetō, she went, was going) (see the discussion in Morris [1995: 491 n. 65], who does, however, believe that the present-tense form of the verb found in some MSS may be original here; cf. Maccini 1996: 149–50).

25 Most commentators view the statement in an elliptical fashion, though there is less consensus on precisely what ought to be supplied. Carson (1991: 429) suggests that the statement is to be construed as follows: “Leave her alone. [She has done this—i.e., held on to the jar] in order to keep it for the day of my burial.” Ridderbos (1997: 417–19), too, holds that the ἵνα (hina, that) of 12:7 is independent (a “brachylogy” [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.369]) and proposes that the phrase is best understood as a rhetorical question. Less likely is the construal of Witherington (1995: 208, appealing to Synoptic parallels), who thinks that Jesus is urging that Mary be left to keep the “burial ritual.” Also doubtful is Maccini's (1996: 173–74) rendering: “Let her alone, so that she might keep what oil she has left for the day of my burial” (so, earlier, Schlatter 1948: 264).

3 Often, though not always, in John, darkness connotes evil or unbelief (see 1:5; 8:12; 9:4; 11:10; 12:35, 46; 13:30). It is not clear that it does so here (contra Maccini 1996: 208; Carson 1991: 635–36; Borchert 2002: 291; R. Brown 1970: 981; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.308; Moloney 1998: 518).

43 For Samaritan views about Mount Gerizim, see Macdonald 1964: 327–33.

8 See Mackowski 1979; Dalman 1935: 101–6; Riesner, DJG 36–37; Deines 1993: 25 n. 38 (with further bibliography).

9 See Riesner 1987: 47, referring to Mackowski 1979: 278–79; cf. Dalman 1935: 101.

11 Helpful treatments include Avi-Yonah 1974: 142; Jeremias 1966b; Mackowski 1980: 79–83; Vardaman 1963; and Wieand 1965–66. Riesner (DJG 41) prefers the translation “There is in Jerusalem by the Sheep Pool the [site] with five porticoes called in Hebrew [i.e., Aramaic] Bethesda.”

20 Mackowski (1980: 81–83) even believes that behind 5:2–9 is the story of a pagan sanctuary that he believes to have been an Asclepieum; but this is categorically ruled out by Hengel (1999: 313), who nonetheless points to the significance of the Asclepius cult for John’s Asia Minor audience (p. 315, referring also to a work by K. H. Rengstorff in n. 84). See also the ancient and bibliographic references cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 266–67.

28 There is some debate as to whether it is to be identified with the “lower” or “old” pool (Isa. 22:9, 11; see Carson 1991: 365), the “upper” pool (cf. 2 Kings 18:17; Isa. 7:3; 36:2), or some other pool (Mackowski 1980: 56–58, 72, 74).

104 See Avi-Yonah 1964: 147 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 112). For more information and examples of tombs from this period, see Mackowski 1980: 20–21, 157–59.

2 This is why the prologue has also been called the “proleptic quintessence” (Harnack 1892: 191), a “microcosm” (Valentine 1996), and an “adumbration” (Booser 1998: 13) of the entire Gospel (cited in MacLeod 2003: 48 n. 1).

4 Culpepper (1980–81: 1) quotes Barrett (1971: 27): “The Prologue is ... one piece of solid theological writing. The evangelist wrote it all” (cf. Barrett 1975a: 20–35). Keener (2003: 333–34) maintains that the prologue is an original part of the Gospel, probably added by the author (the apostle John) after completing the first draft of the Gospel. According to Keener (2003: 333–34), ancient writers commonly introduced the main themes at the beginning of their work (see Keener 2003: 334 n. 10 for examples). Bultmann believed that the prologue originated as a pre-Christian gnostic hymn that stemmed from Baptist circles and was taken over and adapted by the Fourth Evangelist (Bultmann 1923: 4; summarized by Ashton 1986: 161). Valentine (1996), in contrast to many other Johannine scholars, argues that the prologue is an organic part of the book, a genuine preface intended to preview important theological themes, rather than a mere afterthought or postscript written after the body of the Gospel had been completed. E. Harris (1994: 26) contends that the prologue “was from the first the construction of the evangelist himself.” See the survey in MacLeod 2003: 49–52.

5 Morris (1995: 64) calls it “elevated prose.” For a recent treatment of the Johannine prologue dealing with these and other questions, see MacLeod 2003: 48–64. For a discussion of the structure of the prologue, see Keener 2003: 334–37 (but Keener’s [2003: 337] own tentative proposal—a three-stanza structure omitting the Baptist verses [1:6–8, 15]—is hardly convincing).

23 Seeking to combine the notions of “with” indicating accompaniment and “toward” signifying relationship, R. Brown (1966: 4–6) translates, “The Word was in God’s presence”; A. T. Robertson (1934: 623 [cited in MacLeod 2003: 57]) glosses, “face to face with God.”

27 See Hartley 1999 for an interaction with the arguments by Jehovah’s Witnesses against Jesus’ deity from 1:1c. Hartley first surveys the history of the debate, starting with Colwell (1933: 12–21), followed by contributions by Harner (1973: 75–87), P. Dixon (1975), and Hartley himself (1996). Hartley concludes that “the Word was theos (1:1c) in every sense the Father was ton theon (1:1b), rather than a god in a particular sense the Father was not” (1999: 1, summarizing

Mahoney, R. 585

Maier, G. 4

Maier, P. L. 72, 109n29, 525, 534n67

Malatesta, E. 398n7, 453n22, 454, 483n6, 483n7

1996). See also MacLeod 2003: 59–60; and Keener 2003: 372–74, who points to the anarthrous instances of θεός designating God the Father later in the prologue (1:6, 12, 13, 18) and the articular use of θεός with reference to Jesus in 20:28 (p. 373).

28 See, rightly, MacLeod 2003: 62 (who in n. 66 cites further proponents of the view that 1:2 merely repeats 1:1), though it is far from certain that 1:2 should be read in sapiential terms as MacLeod avers.

29 Assuming a three-year ministry, we see that this puts the crucifixion at A.D. 33. This reading of John 2:20, and a date of A.D. 30 for Jesus' first Passover and the temple clearing, were advocated by Badcock (1935: 40–41). See also P. Maier (1968: 4–5); Hoehner (1977: 38–43; followed by Laney 1992: 72; cf. Hoehner, DJG 119); Humphreys and Waddington (1992: 351). MacAdam (1999: 31–33) concurs, but believes that this was Jesus' final Passover and that the Fourth Evangelist has transposed the temple clearing to the beginning of Jesus' ministry. Zahn (1921: 126–27 n. 23) comes close, arriving at the year A.D. 28 or 29.

67 See the later incident recounted in Philo, Gaius 38 §§299–305, and the parallel in Josephus, J.W. 2.9.2–3 §§169–74. So Carson 1991: 600; cf. Morris 1995: 704. Yet see P. Maier 1969.

7 Note, for example, the preponderance of the five major verb themes of Exod. 33–34 and Deuteronomy—"love," "obey," "live," "know," and "see"—in John 14:15–24. See Lacomara 1974; Pryor 1992a: esp. 160, 166, 216 n. 8, referring also to Malatesta 1978: 42–77.

22 Schnackenburg (1990: 3.99) notes the elliptical nature of 15:4. The term μένω is found previously in the farewell discourse in 14:10, 17, 25. See also additional note on 15:4.

6 Hence, Bultmann (1971: 486, cf. 460–61) places chapter 17 between 13:30 and 13:31, with 13:1 serving as the introduction to the prayer. As R. Brown (1970: 745) rightly notes, however, although chapters 13 and 17 are indeed closely related, they are so by way of inclusion rather than direct sequence. Brown himself, incidentally, believes that chapter 17 was not part of the original Gospel but was added at the same time as chapters 15 and 16. He conjectures that the prayer may have been written by the same circle as the prologue. For a discussion of the literary structure of John 17, see also Malatesta 1971. Black (1988) breaks up the prayer into ninety-five "nuclear structures ... embedded into 52 cola" (p. 145), also noting the frequent occurrence of ellipsis, anacolouthon, and parallelism (see also his chart of rhetorical features on pp. 149–53, listing instances of repetition, omission, and shifts in expectancy).

7 See Morris 1995: 634; with further delineation of subunits, Hunter 1979: 326–28. Lindars (1972: 515) further divides 17:20–26 into 17:20–23 and 17:24–26. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.168–69, with reference to a 1973 German article) provides a more complicated proposal, dividing at 17:1–2, 4–5, 6–11a, 11b–16, 17–19, 22–23, 24–26 (he considers 17:3 and 17:20–21 to be secondary glosses). Others favor division at 17:1–8, 9–19, 20–26 (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 748–51). Malatesta (1971: 191–92) divides at 17:1–5, 6–8, 9–19, 20–24, 25–26 and proposes a strophic arrangement. More eccentric is the suggestion by Appold (1976: 204) that there is an oscillating pattern of petition and review, featuring six petition and six review units. A survey of structural proposals for John 17 up to the late 1970s is found in Hunter 1979: 312–28. More recently, Borchert (2002: 185–89) has favored seven petitions, based on the address "Father." Yet, as Ridderbos (1997: 547) remarks, "The structure is not severe enough and the transitions are too

Malina, B. J. 181n32, 201, 269, 277, 396n4, 531n51, 543n12
Mann, J. 514n19
Marcus, J. 241n62
Marshall, I. H. 66n35, 86, 142n5
Martin, J. P. 333n52

fluid for us to speak of a detailed and sharply delineated thought scheme.”

32 Compare and contrast this healing especially with that of the blind man in John 9, which also takes place on a Sabbath (see the chart in Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 109). The Synoptics include at least five incidents that involve healing on the Sabbath and incur the wrath of the Jewish leaders: (1) Mark 1:21–28 par.; (2) Matt. 8:14–15 pars.; (3) Matt. 12:9–14 pars.; (4) Luke 13:10–17; (5) Luke 14:1–6 (Matthew features two, Mark three, and Luke all five incidents).

4 For example, Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs; Assumption of Moses; cf. Jub. 22:10–30; 1 Macc. 2:49–70; Josephus, Ant. 12.6.3 §§279–84. For Greco-Roman farewell passages, see Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 221–22.

51 For ancient references on flogging and torture, see Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 263.

12 See Hengel 1977; Green, DJG 147–48; Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 263–64; D. Chapman 2000.

19 See Ramsay 1915–16 and the supplement by J. Mann (pp. 424–25) pertaining to talmudic literature.

62 See the material cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 79. See also Marcus 1998; and Schnackenburg (1990: 2.156), who connects κοιλία with the water flowing from Jesus’ side at 19:34.

35 A genitive of source. Alternatively, it may be a genitive of possession (“belonging to God”; see discussions in Morris 1995: 127; R. Brown 1966: 55). For a general survey of John’s teaching on Jesus as the lamb of God, see Marshall, DJG 432–34. See also the survey of various interpretive options by Keener (2003: 452–54), who cites the apocalyptic lamb (judged unlikely), the language of the suffering servant (probable allusion to Isa. 53), and the sacrificial Passover lamb (considered primary).

5 Blomberg (1995: 8), with reference to Dockery (1988), lists five approaches to the present narrative: (1) allegorical (cf. 2 Kings 17:30–31); (2) existential (Bultmann 1971: 175–202); (3) pastoral (Milne 1993: 85–86); (4) salvation-historical (W. Davies 1974; Carson 1993); and (5) intertextual (focusing on OT parallels such as Gen. 24:10–61; 29:1–20; Exod. 2:15b–21) (Neyrey 1979). Acknowledging that all of these approaches capture elements of truth, Blomberg nevertheless finds them wanting and proposes a seven-pronged approach of his own. Stibbe (1993: 68–69) advocates a symbolic reading: “If the woman has had five husbands and is living de facto with a sixth, then Jesus is the seventh man in her life. Since seven is the perfect number in Judaism, the implicit commentary must be that Jesus is the man which she has been waiting for, the man in whose presence she will find wholeness.” In the same vein, Brodie (1993: 217–18) sees this as a betrothal-type scene. See also Dockery (1988: 127–40), who distinguishes between author-, text-, and reader-oriented approaches, and Marshall 1974. R. Lightfoot (1956: 122) detects certain parallels between John 4 and 19.

52 See 11:14, 39; cf. 11:21, 32; see J. Martin 1964: 336–37. But note the dissenting voice of Michaels (1989: 205): “It is doubtful that such discussions shed light on the present passage. If the intent was to underscore that Lazarus was truly dead, the detail seems both unnecessary (he was, after all, buried!) and confusing (was Jesus not really dead because he was raised within three days?). Rather, the intent is simply to prepare the reader for Jesus’ confrontation with death

Martin, T. W. 92n12
Martyn, J. L. 3, 3n7, 8n19, 241n65, 277n1, 288n50, 307n50, 554n76
Marzotto, D. 483
Mathews, K. A. 89n2
McCabe, R. V. 124n29
McCaffrey, J. 426n25

as decay and uncleanness in v. 39.”

12 The use of a compound subject with a singular verb suggests that Jesus was invited to the wedding while his disciples simply accompanied him (Wallace 1996: 344). T. Martin (1998), surveying references to mothers in ancient writings, demonstrates that Mary is not mentioned by name because John assumed knowledge of her name among his readers (contra symbolic or polemical interpretations; see Beck 1993). For a list of unnamed characters in this Gospel, see Beck 1997: 31 (significant instances are the mother of Jesus, the Samaritan woman, the royal official, the lame man at the pool, the man born blind, and the beloved disciple). See also Beck’s (1997: 54–62) treatment of the characterization of the mother of Jesus in John’s Gospel.

7 As late as 1990, D. M. Smith (1990: 293 n. 30) could write, “Martyn’s thesis has become a paradigm. . . . It is a part of what students imbibe from standard works, such as commentaries and textbooks, as knowledge generally received and held to be valid.”

19 See especially Alexander 1992 and Goodman 1992. For a fuller development and further bibliography, see Köstenberger forthcoming. For a critique of the Martyn/Brown-style “Johannine community” hypothesis, see Köstenberger 1998b: 200–210; Carson 1991: 35–36, 87–88, 369–72; and commentary at 9:22 below.

65 Though see Meeks 1967 and Martyn 1979: 113–14 for the view that the roles of the Prophet and the Messiah were intertwined in the minds of many.

1 For a survey of source-critical scholarship on John 9, see Borchert (1996: 310–12). Carson (1991: 360–61) provides a brief summary and critique of Martyn’s “two-level” reading of the chapter in light of the history of the putative “Johannine community.” See also Bauckham (2001: esp. 103–6), who contends that Martyn’s hermeneutic violates the genre of the Fourth Gospel.

50 See especially Martyn 1977; 1979; R. Brown 1979. But see the critique in Stibbe 1992: 59–61.

50 Cf. Paul’s teaching regarding the μυστήριον (mystērion, mystery) in Eph. 3:1–10; Col. 1:26–27 (Ridderbos 1997: 363). Ridderbos (1997: 364–65) also provides a helpful discussion and critique of Martyn’s (1977: 170–74) reading of 10:16 as “one great cryptogram” in terms of the “Johannine community hypothesis.” See also the comments in Carson 1991: 390.

76 R. Brown (1970: 939) conjectures that Pilate’s releasing the body to Joseph suggests that he was not an overt disciple of Jesus, because the Roman governor would not have done this for an ardent follower of Jesus. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 625, reacting against Martyn), who claims that Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus are symbolic of the “true Israel.”

2 For a defense of the temple clearing as a Johannine sign, see Köstenberger 1995b (cf. P. Trudinger 1997: 330), contra R. Brown (1966: 528), who claims that every use of σημεῖον (sēmeion, sign) refers to a “miraculous deed.” By referring to the “temple cleansing” as “temple clearing,” I take up a suggestion made by Mathews (1988–89: 101); cf. E. Sanders 1985: 61–76; Evans 1989: 237–70.

29 See, earlier, Schlatter 1948: 89. For helpful discussions, see Carson 1991: 191–96, esp. 194–95; McCabe 1999. See also Cotterell 1985: 241; Kynes, DJG 574–76, esp. 575.

McCann, J. C., Jr. 189n68
McCracken, D. 586n11
McDonald, J. I. H. 247
McGaughy, L. C. 28
McGehee, M. 569n13
McKay, K. L. 178n12, 596n6

25 The expression “my Father’s house” refers to the temple in 2:16 (cf. Luke 2:49), but there is no indication in the present context that the temple is in view (see McCaffrey 1988: 63). Note that even in 2:21 the temple is reinterpreted in terms of Jesus’ body. On “father’s house” as designating a (patriarchal) family in the LXX and extrabiblical literature, see McCaffrey 1988: 50–51.

68 There are no similar texts in Second Temple literature. Paul refers to “the God who gives life to the dead and calls things that are not as though they were” (Rom. 4:17; cf. Eph. 2:1–5). On φωνή (phōnē, voice), see Betz, TDNT 9:285–86; McCann, ISBE 4:997; see also Rev. 1:10, 15. 11 Carson (1991: 667) mentions one additional possible purpose of chapter 21: “The death of Peter and its relation in God’s providence to the Evangelist’s long life provide an opportunity to articulate at a practical level some implications of the sustained tension throughout the Gospel between the dominant inaugurated eschatology (congruent with the Evangelist’s long life and therefore with the ‘delayed’ parousia) and the futurist eschatology of apocalyptic expectation.” See also Gaventa (1996), who conceives of 20:30–31 and chapter 21 as “dual” or “parallel” endings featuring an “archive of excess” (McCracken’s term). Whereas McCracken (1994: 151) applies this solely to the concluding hyperbole in 21:25, Gaventa extends the notion of “excess” to the entire chapter, encompassing also the 153 fish, the breakfast prepared even before the fish are hauled ashore, the strength of the nets, Jesus’ threefold question to Peter, and, of course, the boundless number of Jesus’ deeds. Though chapters 20 and 21 may indeed constitute an instance of “double closure,” however, it may still be meaningful to speak of chapter 21 as an epilogue mirroring the prologue within the context of John’s overall literary structure.

13 Lee (1995: 42) notes the interesting narrative tension introduced by the fact that Jesus asks Mary not to cling to him (20:17) but invites Thomas to touch him later on in the narrative (20:27). She also points out that in the end, it is inconsequential whether or not Thomas actually does touch Jesus (p. 43; see discussion below). For an alternate way of construing the syntax of 20:17 by taking γάρ (gar, for) to be anticipatory, see McGehee (1986), who translates, “Don’t cling to me. Since I have not yet ascended to the Father, go to my brothers and tell them I am ascending to my Father and your Father and my God and your God.” D’Angelo (1990) adduces Apoc. Mos. 31 as a parallel, taking the present passage to relate to a concern for purity “because the appearance takes place in some sort of intermediary stage.”

12 See especially Wallace (1990: esp. 204; 1996: 531, with reference to McKay 1994: 40), who claims, “Since εἰμί is nowhere else clearly used as a historical present, the present tense should be taken as indicating present time from the viewpoint of the speaker.” For evidence that εἰμί can function as a historical present, see 10:8: πάντες ὅσοι ἦλθον πρὸ ἐμοῦ κλέπται εἰσὶν καὶ λησταί, “all who have come before me were thieves and robbers” (note that “were” is the rendering chosen in the NIV, TNIV, NLT, and NET); cf. 19:40: καθὼς ἔθος ἐστὶν τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις ἐνταφιάζειν, “this was in accordance with Jewish burial customs” (NIV = TNIV; CEV: “which was how the Jewish people buried their dead”). See also Schlatter (1948: 141), who takes the present tense verb in 5:2 at face value but conjectures that the “sheep gate” must have been reconstructed subsequent to its destruction by Titus in A.D. 70.

Mead, A. H. 169n9

Meeks, W. A. 113n2, 119n13, 168n4, 194n102, 194n104, 237, 241n65, 533, 539n88

6 But see the dissenting opinion of McKay (1985: esp. 323), who concludes that “the pattern of variation of forms of ἀγαπάω and φιλέω in this passage are not pointless [in apparent reaction to N. Turner 1976], but constitute a contextual distinction which is not blatant, but gently significant” (p. 333). However, it is unclear what McKay means by “not blatant, but gently significant,” especially since he never elaborates on this assertion with reference to the use of these two verbs in 21:15–17.

9 So Mead 1985: 71; Barrett 1978: 245; Witherington 1995: 128; Moloney 1998: 153; Bultmann 1971: 206; but see the cautious assessment by Carson 1991: 234. Morris (1995: 255), somewhat idiosyncratically, suggests that the man was a Jew.

2 Conway (1999: 85) describes Nicodemus as an “opaque rather than transparent character” whose inner motives are not disclosed by the narrator. Cotterell (1985: 241) draws attention to the portrayal of Nicodemus in his humanity as a Pharisee who was “inclined to patronize” and was “human enough to sulk” when “pierced in the presence of his own students.” Meeks (1972: 53) calls Nicodemus a “rather stupid disciple.”

13 See Blomberg (1995: 5–7), who lists seven factors in favor of seeing John’s portrait of Nicodemus as “substantially more negative” than the dominant view alleges: (1) the introduction of 2:23–25; (2) the labels “Pharisee” and “ruler of the Jews”; (3) Nicodemus’s coming by night; (4) the identification of Jesus as a mere “teacher”; (5) Nicodemus’s dependence on signs; (6) his astonishing ignorance; and (7) the evidence adduced by Cotterell regarding the increasingly negative portrayal of Nicodemus. According to Blomberg (cf. Bassler 1989), Nicodemus remains an ambivalent character, in contrast with the more positive progression found in the Samaritan woman in John 4. This overall conclusion is against Cotterell (1985: 241), who in his otherwise excellent discourse analysis exceeds the evidence when he credits Nicodemus with a “gradual dawning of true faith [culminating] in the presence of Nicodemus at the cross and in his ultimate identification with Jesus in his death.” Rather than “take his place at Calvary,” Nicodemus simply ensured giving Jesus a decent burial. (As Meeks [1972: 55] contends, Nicodemus’s “ludicrous ‘one hundred pounds’ of embalming spices indicate clearly enough that he has not understood the ‘lifting up’ of the Son of Man.”) Cotterell is on surer footing when he concludes that in the present narrative, “Nicodemus chose not to understand Jesus,” characterizing the outcome of the present conversation as “inconclusive.” Likewise mistaken, I believe, is Saayman (1995: 45), who detects in Nicodemus “a growing loyalty to Jesus.”

4 One school of interpretation identifies πατρίς (patris, homeland, hometown) in 4:44 with Jerusalem (so Barrett 1978: 246; Dodd 1953: 352; 1963: 238–41; Meeks 1966; 1967: 39–40; see, much earlier, Origen, Commentarii in evangelium Joannis 13.54–56, cited in van Belle 1998: 30). However, see the critiques by W. Davies (1974: 321–31) and Stimpfle (1992: 89) as summarized by van Belle (1998: 30–32). The Galilee/Nazareth explanation is found already in Augustine (cited by van Belle 1998: 33) and is defended by Stimpfle (1992: 86–96 [followed by van Belle 1998: 27–44]) and others (see van Belle 1998: 32–33; see also Ridderbos 1997: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 73; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.463). Still others think that both Galilee and Judea are in view (Carson 1991: 235–36; Burge 2000: 151–52; Witherington 1995: 126; W. Davies 1974: 321–31).

102 Schnackenburg 1990: 1.470 n. 139, with reference to Meeks 1967: 254–55.

Mees, M. 174n1

Meier, J. P. 171n17, 194n98, 243n74

Melick, R. R. 38n58

104 For a treatment of Moses as a character in the Fourth Gospel, see Harstine (2002: 40–75), who treats 1:17, 45; 3:14; 5:45–46; 6:32; 7:19, 22, 23; 9:28–29. According to Harstine, Moses’ dominant function throughout the narrative is as a witness to Jesus (p. 72), whereby Moses serves as a historical/legendary figure similar to Jacob (4:5, 12), David (7:42), and Abraham (8:33–58). On Moses in the Fourth Gospel, see also Glasson 1963; Meeks 1967; and Boismard 1993. Keener (2003: 662) observes how, on a literary level, the closing appeal to Moses in 5:45–47 prepares the way for chapter 6, where Jesus is presented as the new Moses providing God’s people with the new “bread from heaven.”

65 Though see Meeks 1967 and Martyn 1979: 113–14 for the view that the roles of the Prophet and the Messiah were intertwined in the minds of many.

88 Several commentators (e.g., Kruse 2003: 365; Keener 2003: 1132, referring to Meeks 1967: 77 citing b. Pesah. 118a) add that the Jews concluded the Greater Hallel in the Passover haggadah with the prayer “From everlasting to everlasting, you are God; beside you we have no king, redeemer, or savior; no liberator, deliverer, provider. . . . We have no King but you.”

1 For a survey of patristic literature on John 5:1–18, see Mees 1986. A close narrative reading of 5:1–18 is found in Culpepper 1993. A reading of 5:1–47 is provided by Lee 1994: 98–125.

17 On the unusual nature of Jesus’ signs selected by John, see commentary at 2:10. A similar remarkable incident (that of the healing of the centurion’s servant in Capernaum) is narrated in Matt. 8:5–13 par. Vermes (1972–73) seeks to adduce parallels with the first-century Jewish miracle worker and faith healer Hanina ben Dosa (cf. b. Ber. 34b; much more cautious is Bokser 1985). However, as Meier (1994: 581–88, citing Freyne 1980) points out, not only is Hanina ben Dosa not mentioned in Josephus, but also none of the three mishnaic references attribute miracle-working power to him; this takes place only in the talmudic tradition. Hence, all that can be said confidently about the “historical” Hanina is that he probably was a first-century Palestinian Jew who was noted for his efficacious prayers over the sick; there is not even early historical evidence linking him to Galilee.

98 See Barnett 1980–81; Schlatter 1948: 160; Piper, ISBE 3:332–33; van der Woude, TDNT 9:509–27. However, calling these figures “messianic pretenders” goes beyond the evidence. Thus, Meier (1994: 611–12 n. 75) and R. Brown (1997: 820 n. 6) emphatically deny that any Jew (other than Jesus) claimed or was said to be the Messiah prior to, contemporaneous with, or even in the decades immediately following Jesus’ ministry.

74 Care must be taken not to identify the crowd in the present instance with the “people of the land” (Hebrew: ammê hā-āreṣ) in later rabbinic literature. As Meier (2001: 28–29) notes, first, the reference here is not necessarily to common people in general but specifically to the crowd of pilgrims who are in Jerusalem for the Feast of Tabernacles; second, the dispute here concerns not rules of purity and tithing in the Mosaic law (the context in which later rabbinic literature refers to ordinary Jews as “people of the land” with a pejorative connotation) but the proper identification of Jesus; and third, the crowd acts here (as throughout much of John 7) as the evangelist’s sounding board for the christological revelation of Jesus (see further ibid., pp. 38–39 n. 36).

58 For a helpful chart summarizing people’s belief or lack thereof in the remainder of the Gospel, see Croteau 2002: 120 (on believing in John’s Gospel, see also Gaffney 1965; Melick 1976; and H. Koester 1989). In the first half of the narrative, negative responses predominate; the few instances of believing in the second half are all positive. This seems to support the notion, defended in the present commentary, that Jesus' mission in John 1–12 is predominantly (though not exclusively) one of failure owing to people's lack of believing response, while John 13–21 is taken up with Jesus' focus on the nucleus of the new messianic community. Hence 1:12, as the pivot of the prologue, serves to encapsulate the entire scope of John's presentation of people's responses to the Messiah in terms of reception or rejection with the result of eternal life or judgment.

22 The quotation from Isa. 40:3 follows the LXX (Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. b) except that John uses εὐθύνετε instead of ἐτοιμάσατε (Barrett 1978: 173). This may be because (1) John was translating straight from the Hebrew; (2) he was influenced by the sound of εὐθείαν in the LXX shortly after the quotation; or (3) he took his cue from the use of εὐθύνειν with ὁδός in Sir. 2:6; 37:15; 49:9. Menken (1985: 202–3) suggests that the change was motivated by his desire “to make John the Baptist not so much the precursor of Jesus as a witness contemporaneous with Jesus.”

56 Isa. 58:11; cf. Prov. 4:23; 5:15; Zech. 14:8. Menken (1996) favors Ps. 77:16, 20 LXX, with the epithet “living” coming from Zech. 14:8.

58 See Neh. 9:15, 19–20; other relevant passages include Exod. 17:6; Ps. 105:41; Prov. 18:4; Isa. 43:19–20; 55:1; Jer. 2:13; 17:13; see also 1QH 16:4. See Menken 1996.

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee's observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus “from within him” refers to “whoever believes in me.” Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of “rivers of living water” (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987: 88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

1 John's quotation is closer to the MT than to the LXX. Menken (1990) contends that the rendering of Ps. 41:9 in the present passage represents the evangelist's own translation from the Hebrew. Moloney (1998: 384), on the strength of the evangelist's choice of the verb τρώγω (trōgō [used also in 6:54–58]) in the place of the LXX's ἐσθίω (esthiō) for “eat,” postulates “eucharistic overtones” to the meal. On fulfillment quotations, see commentary at 12:38. Similar texts in the Psalms include 31:9–13; 38:10–12; 55:13–14 (see commentary at 13:21). Ridderbos (1997: 467 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 554]) rightly argues for a general sense of “this is to fulfill the scripture” rather than taking the statement to imply that Jesus chose Judas in order to fulfill Scripture. This latter view seems to be held by Carson (1991: 470), who writes, “The reason Jesus chose one who would betray him was to fulfill the Scripture.”

2 See Hoehner (1977: 31–37) and Messner (1998), with reference to the Roman historians Tacitus (Annales 4 §4) and Suetonius (Tiberius 73), both of whom date the beginning of Tiberius's reign at A.D. 14 (the precise date is August 19, the day of Emperor Augustus's death); see also commentary at 2:20–21. It is unclear why Hengel (1999: 322) dates Tiberius's fifteenth year to ca. A.D. 27/28.

Metzger, B. M. 29n32, 50n98, 172, 180, 223, 246n4, 247, 247n7, 296, 319, 409n52, 446, 447, 481, 582, 582n6

32 Note the comment on this alternative by Metzger (1994: 168): “whatever that may be supposed to mean.” In Metzger’s dissenting opinion (the majority of the UBS translation committee favors taking the phrase with what follows) he states, “Despite valiant attempts of commentators to bring sense out of taking ὁ γέγονεν with what follows, the passage remains intolerably clumsy and opaque” (similarly, Schnackenburg, cited by Ashton 1986: 172). Among the major translations, only the NRSV prefers this alternative. Commentators who advocate this option are R. Brown (1966: 6–7), Bultmann (1971: 39–40, esp. n. 4), Beasley-Murray (1999: 1–2, esp. n. a), and Whitacre (1999: 52). See also E. Miller (1989), who integrates his belief that the phrase is to be taken with what follows into his larger thesis that 1:1a–b and 1:3–5 constitute a christological hymn in four strophes extolling the salvation-historical activity of the Word (he considers 1:1c and 1:2 to be interpolations). Brodie (1993: 138), because of the lack of punctuation, sees the text as inherently ambiguous and as being “part of a careful literary strategy” designed to focus on “the continuity between creation and the incarnation, between creation and redemption.”

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενῆς θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

4 In my judgment, not even Wallace’s (1993: 291–93) attempted refutation of Heil (1991) succeeds in completely enlisting the internal lexical and syntactical evidence in favor of non-Johannine authorship, though many of his individual points are well taken (Metzger [1994: 188 n. 3] calls Wallace’s refutation of Heil a “convincing rebuttal”).

7 See also Metzger (1994: 187–89), who calls the evidence for the non-Johannine origin of the pericope “overwhelming” and “conclusive.” Keener (2003: 735–36), too, strongly contends that 7:53–8:11 is an interpolation, based on its suspect textual history and its large non-Johannine vocabulary. One of the few scholars favoring originality (on the grounds of Byzantine priority) is M. Robinson (1998: 1–17).

52 So Morris 1995: 549 n. 27; apparently, Carson 1991: 464–66; and the UBS committee (Metzger 1994: 204), adducing the “preponderant weight of external attestation”; contra Barrett 1978: 442; Beasley-Murray 1999: 229 n. f; Lindars 1972: 451; D. M. Smith 1999: 254; Dunn 1970: 250–51.

6 So, rightly, Bultmann 1971: 698–99. The question does not hinge on adjudicating which of the textual variants, πιστεύητε or πιστεύσῃτε, is original (see additional note), for verb tenses are

Metzner, R. 183n41

Meyer, P. W. 28n25, 303

Meyer, R. 335n65

Michaels, J. R. 25n18, 47n90, 76n69, 82n103, 83n107, 88n122, 116n6, 123n26, 168n5, less distinctive in nonindicative moods (cf. 19:35, where most MSS have the aorist reading). It is sometimes alleged that the present subjunctive would imply a purpose of strengthening the faith of believing readers, while the aorist would imply an evangelistic purpose (Metzger 1994: 219–20). However, as Carson (1991: 662) points out, the present tense of πιστεύω (pisteuō, believe) is used in this Gospel with reference to both coming to faith and continuing in faith. Carson also notes that the aorist subjunctive is more common after ἵνα (hina, that) than the present subjunctive.

41 Moloney 1998: 173; cf. Metzner 1999; Lee 1994: 110; Witkamp 1985: 24; Leidig 1979: 211; contra Thomas 1995: 18. Moloney (1998: 173) rightly notes, contra Beck (1993 [cf. 1997: 86–90]), who argues that anonymous characters in the Fourth Gospel draw the reader into an identification with the character, “The reader of the Fourth Gospel, however, hardly identifies with a man who is in league with ‘the Jews’ (vs. 15).” Keener (2003: 87), similarly, contends that a list of Johannine models of faith is not entirely coextensive with anonymous characters (citing esp. 5:14–15) and registers this as his only serious disagreement with Beck (p. 87 n. 49). Beck, in a review (2001), indirectly responds to my earlier criticism (Köstenberger 1999b, reviewing Beck 1997) that the man in John 5 disproves his theory by alleging, in effect, that I have no place for literary analysis in my hermeneutical method. Nothing could be further from the truth. My concern, rather, lies with an unqualified wholesale adoption of reader-response criticism by evangelicals who fail to realize that this methodology is part and parcel of a postmodern hermeneutic that is left with nothing but subjective readings devoid of any claim to authority or universal applicability. Moreover, I was concerned to point out that Beck’s central thesis (i.e., that anonymity necessarily equals ideal function and positive characterization) is invalid. Note further this puzzling conclusion by Brodie (1993: 238): “The final picture ... is ... open to a positive interpretation: the man has finally come to mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus, and he is announcing the good news to the Jews.” Precisely where Brodie finds the man “announcing the good news to the Jews” is unclear to me, nor can I see textual evidence for the man coming to “mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus.”

25 On “God” and “Father” in the Gospel of John, see especially the valuable and insightful monographs by Thompson (2000; 2001). On the characterization of God in the Fourth Gospel, see also Tolmie 1998; on God the Father, see Meyer 1996: 255–73 and Fisher 2003.

65 See Matt. 22:23–33 pars.; Acts 23:8; Josephus, J.W. 2.8.14 §165; Ant. 18.1.4 §16. See Oepke, TDNT 1:370; Meyer, TDNT 7:46–47.

18 Michaels (1989: 21) observes, “Elsewhere in John’s Gospel, Jesus speaks the word, but in the prologue he is the Word, the personal embodiment of all that he proclaims.”

90 R. Edwards (1988: 7 nn. 17–21) cites the following leading fathers of the Greek church as holding that the phrase “grace for grace” referred to a replacement of the Mosaic law by the gospel: Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, Origen, and Theophylact (also Jerome, the most learned of the Latin fathers). Somewhat curiously, Michaels (1989: 24) contends that “grace and truth” is “a circumlocution for the Holy Spirit” (with reference to passages in John and elsewhere that connect the Spirit with grace or truth; cf. John 4:23–24; 14:17; 15:26; 16:13; 1 John 5:6).

69 Ridderbos (1997: 84) thinks that this identification is all the more likely since Peter learns about Jesus from his brother Andrew and this unnamed disciple (1:41) and since Peter and John are closely associated in this and the other Gospels (so also Schlatter 1948: 55; more cautious assessments are found in Borchert 1996: 143; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.310; Carson 1991: 154). Note also the connection between Andrew and John in the Muratorian Canon (Bettenson 1967: 28). Michaels (1989: 37) thinks that the second disciple is Philip. Keener (2003: 468) likewise sees “no reason” to identify the other disciple with the beloved disciple, since he is not mentioned until 13:23. On a literary level, this is self-evident, but the absence of “beloved disciple” language prior to 13:23 does not seem to rule out the possibility that the apostle John appears in the Johannine narrative as a historical character that is left unnamed.

103 Michaels (1989: 40) helpfully clarifies, “Jesus is not so much praising Nathanael’s candor ... as ... looking at him and seeing not what he is but what he will become.”

107 Michaels (1966–67, reiterated in 1989: 41) proposes an allusion to Hos. 9:10.

122 The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. 65, was published in 1998 by the Egypt Exploration Society (see pp. 12–13). Among commentators, “Chosen One of God” is favored by Morris 1995: 134; Carson 1991: 152; Burge 1987: 59–61; 2000: 74; Barrett 1978: 178; R. Brown 1966: 57; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.305. “Son of God” is the reading advocated by Bultmann 1971: 92–93 n. 6; Borchert 1996: 139; Ridderbos 1997: 77; Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. g; Laney 1992: 53 (though all prior to the discovery of P¹⁰⁶). Rodgers (1999: 304) prefers both (“This is the only, the chosen Son of God”), while Michaels (1989: 36) proposes that the Baptist spoke “Chosen One of God” (hence the MS tradition), which the evangelist interpreted as “Son of God.”

6 As Michaels (1989: 53) notes, the problem is not signs-based faith, but cowardice and failure to acknowledge one’s faith openly. Whitacre (1999: 86) similarly notes that signs-based faith is not the problem (citing 10:38; 12:37; 14:12; 20:30–31; cf. R. Brown 1966: 525–29), but that by its very nature, all faith prior to Jesus’ glorification and the coming of the Spirit is immature. Borchert (1996: 167–69) wrongly includes even the disciples of 2:11 among the group whose faith is illegitimately signs-based in 2:23.

26 Note in 3:5 the single Greek preposition governing both “water” and “spirit” (Ridderbos 1997: 127). Some have suggested that “born of water” refers to water baptism, be it John the Baptist’s or Christian baptism, or both (Schnackenburg 1990: 1.369; Barrett 1978: 203, 208–9; R. Brown 1966: 141–42; Ridderbos 1997: 127–28; Beasley-Murray 1999: 49; Michaels 1989: 57). But it would hardly have been meaningful for Jesus to inform Nicodemus that he must be baptized in order to go to heaven. Nothing in the context indicates that this is the case, and it is unlikely that Jesus would have expected Nicodemus already to have known this. Moreover, the emphasis here is on the Spirit’s activity, not on human ritual observance (Morris 1995: 193).

5 John may assume here his readers’ familiarity with Synoptic tradition, according to which Jesus was rejected in his native Galilee, including Nazareth (Matt. 13:53–58 par.; Luke 4:16–30; cf. Matt. 11:19 par.). Other instances in which John appears to expect his readers’ familiarity with Synoptic tradition include 1:40; 3:24; 6:67; 11:1–2. The present saying is found also in Gos. Thom. 31 and P.Oxy. 1.6 (van Belle 1998: 27–44). Michaels (1989: 78–79) links the present “welcome” to the Didache guideline that itinerant teachers not stay in a locale more than two days (cf. John 4:40). However, this seems to be both anachronistic and contextually far-fetched.

9 See Carson 1991: 240. Bultmann (1971: 240) claims that the festival is Passover, based on his switching the order of John 5 and 6, but this is unlikely, since the evangelist clearly identifies Passover everywhere else in his Gospel. Also unlikely is Michaels’s (1989: 85) theory that the present pericope was transposed from Jesus' first Passover in Jerusalem (cf. 2:23; 3:2). Many commentators choose to remain agnostic on which feast is in view (Keener 2003: 635), regarding its identity as either unknown (Ridderbos 1997: 184; Morris 1995: 265 n. 6) or of secondary interest (R. Brown 1966: 206), or both (Carson 1991: 241). Calvin (1959: 116) thinks that the feast probably is Pentecost.

36 For example, Michaels (1989: 107) observes, "The disciples wanted to take Jesus into the boat, but before they had a chance, they found themselves suddenly at their destination."

Ridderbos (1997: 218) rejects the idea; many commentators do not arrive at a definitive conclusion (e.g., Morris 1995: 310). The phrase "and at once" is found elsewhere in John in 5:9 and 18:27 (the closely related term εὐθύς [euthys] is found in 13:30, 32; 19:34).

15 To "go up" (ἀναβαίνω, anabainō) to Jerusalem is a common expression no matter what one's geographical origination (cf. 5:1). Because the term is used later with reference to Jesus' ascension to the Father, some see an allusion to Jesus' glorification (Carson 1991: 309: "just possible"). This is unlikely (Michaels 1989: 127; Lindars 1972: 285) and in any case is not the primary referent (contra R. Brown 1966: 308).

11 A survey of major commentaries shows that about half provide a regular commentary (Carson, Laney, Lindars, Whitacre, Calvin, Westcott), while the other half refrain from comment (Michaels, Talbert, Stibbe, Brodie, D. M. Smith), in some cases choosing not to address the issue at all (e.g., Schlatter [1948: 205], who in his scholarly commentary moves directly from 7:52 to 8:12 without comment, though his popular commentary [1962: 139–41] does treat the pericope adulterae in deference to "ecclesiastical tradition"; see also Zahn [1921: 404], who, like Schlatter, moves immediately from 7:52 to 8:12 and deals with the pericope in a lengthy excursus on pp. 723–30).

41 Beasley-Murray (1999: 131, following M. Zerwick) prefers "Just what I am telling you." See also Michaels (1989: 149): "Just what I have been claiming all along."

100 It has been suggested (e.g., Michaels 1989: 153; cf. Brodie 1993: 335) that the reference here may be to Abraham's rejoicing when he announced to Isaac on the way to the sacrifice, "God himself will provide the lamb for the burnt offering, my son" (Gen. 22:8). See also T. Levi 18:2, 6 (cf. 18:14; Matt. 8:11).

19 Michaels (1989: 160) comments, "Like a laborer determined to finish his job before nightfall, Jesus summons his disciples to join him in taking full advantage of the remaining daylight hours." D. M. Smith (1999: 192) notes that the time is short both for Jesus, who must complete his work on earth before his hour of departure arrives, and for his hearers, whose opportunity to respond positively to Jesus is close to gone (12:35–36). In this regard, compare the repeated references to Jesus' appointed "time" in John's Gospel (Beasley-Murray 1999: 155).

77 See Michaels 1989: 170. Contra R. Brown (1966: 375), who believes that the man was only cast from their presence rather than being formally expelled. Burge (2000: 275) and Laney (1992: 180) also seem to hold this view.

48 Jer. 3:15; 23:4–6; Ezek. 34:23–24; 37:15–28; Mic. 2:12; 5:3–5.

73 So, rightly, Carson (1991: 394–95), whose entire discussion repays careful reading (see also Morris 1995: 465; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174; Moloney 1998: 320; Burge 2000: 296; Laney 1992: 195; Stibbe 1993: 118; Westcott 1908: 2.68). Michaels (1989: 187) seems to conceive of Jesus' unity with the Father in functional terms (whether primarily or exclusively so), as both of them doing "the same work." Barrett (1978: 382) notes that the unity between the Father and the Son is also a unity of love and obedience.

45 See Larsen 2001: 215–20; Zahn 1921: 482 (called “a bizarre idea” by Bultmann [1971: 400 n. 6]); acknowledged as grammatically possible but rejected by Michaels (1989: 199).

47 So Carson (1991: 410), who speaks of “raw devotion and courage”; similarly, Morris 1995: 484; Michaels 1989: 196. Keener (2003: 842), too, says Thomas’s is an act of courage (contrasting him with Jesus’ brothers in 7:5), though he notes that Thomas later failed to believe the disciples’ testimony regarding Jesus’ resurrection (20:25). Perhaps the strongest endorsement of Thomas’s sincerity comes from Whitacre (1999: 283), who says that Thomas displays “an incredible picture of faith,” is “following out of loyalty,” and constitutes “a model disciple.”

51 Michaels (1989: 201) writes, “Jesus’ arrival in Bethany is described like the visit of a conquering king, or in the way the early Christians later expected him to come gloriously to earth a second time.”

52 See 11:14, 39; cf. 11:21, 32; see J. Martin 1964: 336–37. But note the dissenting voice of Michaels (1989: 205): “It is doubtful that such discussions shed light on the present passage. If the intent was to underscore that Lazarus was truly dead, the detail seems both unnecessary (he was, after all, buried!) and confusing (was Jesus not really dead because he was raised within three days?). Rather, the intent is simply to prepare the reader for Jesus’ confrontation with death as decay and uncleanness in v. 39.”

53 See Lev. Rab. 18.1 on Lev. 15:1; cf. Eccles. Rab. 12.6 (universally cited by commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 393; Carson 1991: 411; Morris 1995: 485). Cf. m. Yebam. 16.3; Semahot 8, rule 1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 109). See also Hanson 1973. Keener (2003: 841 n. 63, citing Michaels 1984: 190) cautions, however, that the belief that the soul left the body three days after death is not widely attested in the early period.

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, “The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death.” See also Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999: 289. The mourners’ unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999: 192–93), several of whom adduce Paul’s statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus’ anger is directed toward both “the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow” and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus’ anger as occasioned by Mary’s turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either “misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition,” to mean “moved in spirit.” Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus’ struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, “He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself” (11:38 is translated “bearing the rebuke within himself”). According to Story, at the sight of people’s grief, Jesus was overcome by “momentary self-regret,” thinking, “Why did I not come sooner ... ? I have only myself to blame. ... Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?" However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

127 Michaels (1989: 207) notes that all three raisings of the dead in the Gospels end "with a similarly warm human interest touch in which Jesus meets an additional, comparatively minor, need (cf. Mark 5:43; Luke 7:15)." Michaels also suggests that unbinding Lazarus may evoke the biblical imagery of "loosing" to convey the notion of victory over death and the powers of evil (citing Matt. 16:19; Luke 13:16; Acts 2:24; cf. John 8:32–36).

12 The meaning "genuine" or "pure" is supported by most commentators (e.g., Carson 1991: 428; Barrett 1978: 412; Beasley-Murray 1999: 204 n. b; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.367; Ridderbos 1997: 414). Michaels (1989: 217), on the other hand, thinks that "it may have been the trade name under which the product was marketed" (i.e., "pistic nard").

12 Michaels (1989: 234) detects in the present statement "a sense of tragedy, as if [the narrator was] aware that there were people like that in the synagogues of his own city." The term rendered "praise" in the NIV (though note the change to "glory" in the TNIV) is elsewhere in John translated "glory," which may tie in the present reference with John's use of the same word in 12:41. Examples of imperfect faith in this Gospel include 2:23; 4:48; 8:30–31.

28 See additional note on 14:2. Similar language is used in Mark 10:40; 1 Cor. 2:9; Heb. 11:16; 1 Pet. 1:4. Jesus' words in the present passage are designed to further reassure his disciples (cf. Michaels 1989: 267). As Schnackenburg (1990: 3.59) notes, the point of reference probably is John 13:33.

1 Michaels (1989: 275) observes, "If the disciples are known by their love, the world is defined by its hatred."

5 Hence, it was common especially in older commentators to refer to the present prayer as Jesus' "prayer of consecration" (e.g., Cullmann, E. C. Hoskyns, Bernard, W. F. Howard [cited in Agourides 1968: 138]; see also Westcott [1908: 2.238], who titles John 17 "The Prayer of Consecration" but later says that the chapter contains "what may be most properly called 'the Lord's Prayer' "). This designation has merit (esp. in light of 17:19 [so, rightly, Michaels 1989: 297]), as long as it is not used to imply a strong link between the prayer and the liturgical practices of the church toward the end of the first century A.D. More modestly and soberly, Calvin (1961: 134) calls the prayer "the seal of the preceding teaching" of Jesus.

30 Contra Michaels (1989: 294), who claims, "The Son will give glory to the Father after his death on the cross, and this glorification is defined as the giving of eternal life."

63 It is also reminiscent of the OT notion of "setting apart" sacrificial animals (e.g., Deut. 15:19; see Michaels 1989: 297).

18 As will be seen, this statement involves irony on multiple levels, because not only did the Jews lack the right to impose capital punishment under Roman law, but also, more importantly, they were forbidden under God's law to execute anyone not formally convicted of a capital offense (see Michaels 1989: 314). Moreover, in yet further irony, the Jewish authorities' response to Pilate's teasing remark amounts to a public acknowledgment of the illegality and illegitimacy of their dealings with Jesus (so, rightly, Stibbe 1993: 190).

19 Literally, "kill" (ἀποκτείνω, apokteinō), in possible reference to the sixth commandment of the Decalogue (Michaels 1989: 314). Schlatter (1948: 338) notes the emphatic position of ἡμῖν (hēmin, for us), contrasting the Jews and Pilate.

31 Beyond this, Michaels (1989: 317) may have a point when he writes, "All that happens ... is the product of Pilate's sick and anti-Semitic sense of humor. He seems obsessed throughout with the grim joke that Jesus is the Jews' king."

34 Jesus' response also seizes the initiative rather than merely passively responding to Pilate's question. Duke (1985: 129) suggests that Jesus is not simply seeking information but instead is asking an ironic question in import similar to the blind man's question in 9:27. In this manner, Jesus is now placing Pilate on trial and calls him to make his own decision. Likewise, Michaels (1989: 315) notes that Jesus' reply in 18:34 "addresses Pilate at a very personal level, as if to ask him, 'Do you really want to know the answer for your own sake, or are you simply carrying out your duty as magistrate?'" Pilate quickly removes all doubt: it is strictly the latter.

25 Carson (1991: 638–39 [contra Bultmann 1971: 684]) suggests, on the basis of Luke 24:12, that Peter did not believe at this time (cf. D. M. Smith 1999: 374). Byrne (1985: 92) calls him "the odd-man-out" within the context of John 20. Morris (1995: 737, following Michaels 1989: 336) says that Peter could have believed, and the evangelist may have chosen to present the beloved disciple's reaction as his own while describing Peter from an external point of view.

30 For example, R. Brown (1970: 1097), who interprets the full net allegorically as the absence of schism in the Christian community; Bultmann (1971: 709), who speaks of the "indestructible unity of the Church"; Michaels (1989: 354–55), who contends that the full net indicates the successful completion of Jesus' mission; and Talbert (1992: 260), who says that the 153 fish symbolize the universal outreach of the church. For a virtually exhaustive list of interpretations of the number 153, no matter how implausible, see Keener (2003: 1231–33). He properly concludes that "the number could simply stem from an accurate memory of a careful count on the occasion, because fish had to be counted to be divided among fishermen." Keener (2003: 1233) also notes that 153 fish may be no more symbolic than Peter swimming 100 yards in 21:8. 33 The unbroken net frequently is interpreted symbolically as conveying the preservation of all that is caught (Ridderbos 197: 663, adducing 6:12; Witherington 1995: 355; Michaels 1989: 354–55), or the limitless number of Christian converts (Carson 1991: 673, following Bruce 1983: 401–2), or the unity of the church (Talbert 1992: 260). For surveys, see Carson 1991: 672–73; R. Brown 1970: 1074–76.

34 Witherington (1995: 354) considers this to be "a fellowship meal, a family reunion of a sort" (similarly, Michaels 1989: 356, 358), contra those who would detect the presence of "eucharistic symbolism" (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1098–1100; D. M. Smith 1999: 394; Stibbe 1993: 212; Whitacre 1999: 494). In fact, Beasley-Murray (1999: 404) points out that what is celebrated here is not Jesus' death but his resurrection, which enabled his followers to enjoy fellowship with their Lord subsequent to his death. He classifies the present meal as "an epiphany celebration of the risen Lord" (following Rissi 1979: 81–86). Schlatter (1948: 369) says that the disciples' present disposition fulfills 16:23.

14 Cf. Paulien (ABD 4:1106), who also refers to de Jonge 1971: 342; Sylva 1988: 148–49; Michel (1981: 231), who calls Nicodemus a "borderline character" ("personnage-frontière"); and Pamment (1985: 71, 73), who writes, "Nicodemus is the only individual character who fails to make a decision, remaining the good but uncommitted observer who tries to prevent injustice" (p. 73). Similarly, Conway (1999: 85–103) says that Nicodemus is a "pathetic character" who from beginning to end "is genuinely interested in Jesus, but is never able to gather the courage and conviction to confess his belief openly" (p. 103). Note also Pazdan (1987), who sees Nicodemus's portrayal as part of John's reversal of the traditional geographical polemic regarding Judeans, Samaritans, and Galileans; and Burge (2000: 124), who contends that Nicodemus never became a model disciple, because "disciples confess Jesus' identity, remain with him, and tell others." If my assessment of Nicodemus is correct, it runs counter to the notion, popular in current scholarship, that John's Gospel is "anti-Semitic," for here we have a Jewish person who, though not a believer in Jesus the Messiah, represents a fair-minded, moral, kind Jewish leader, providing a counterpoint to the more hostile element on the Sanhedrin. It is also possible that John includes the Nicodemus account at least in part because he had access to individuals among the Jewish leadership (cf. 18:15b: "that disciple [the 'other disciple' of 18:15a, presumably the evangelist; cf. 20:2; 21:24] was known to the high priest").

15 See the Greek inscription (discovered in 1870) cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 29; cf. Geva, NEAEHL 2:744; Millard 1997: 243. See also m. Kelim 1.8; Josephus, Ant. 15.11.4 §417; J.W. 5.5.1 §193; 6.2.4 §125.

13 See the illustration in Millard 1997: 179. For "expensive," see commentary at 12:5.

20 For a more thorough discussion, see E. Miller (1993: 448–49), who lists as many as nine different theories: (1) the OT δבר; (2) Wisdom (R. Harris 1917); (3) Greek philosophy (Stoicism); (4) Philo (Evans 1993: 100–145; Tobin 1990); (5) the Aramaic mmr (Hayward 1978); (6) rabbinic speculation on the Torah; (7) gnostic sources, such as the Hermetic literature, especially Poimandres (Pagels 1999); (8) the Hellenistic-gnostic redeemer myth, Mandeans, and the Odes of Solomon (Bultmann 1923; 1973; 1971); and (9) the breaking of divine silence (Jeremias). Some, such as Epp (1975), combine two or more of the above (in Epp's case, Wisdom and Torah). Miller himself (1993: 452), building on his earlier work (1989), advances the thesis that the uses of λόγος in the Gospel proper, while not a christological title, are invested "with a certain christological transparency" (B. Reicke's term). Thus, startlingly, Miller, who believes that the prologue was written not only after the Gospel proper, but even after John's first epistle, finds the origin of the prologue's λόγος in the Fourth Gospel itself: "The one of whom it was said in John 7:46, 'Never has a man spoken like this!' eventually came to be called, appropriately, 'the Word.' " I find this thesis entirely unconvincing (Miller [1999] attempts to make the same case for ἄρχή). It is quite a tour de force to brush aside the massive OT substructure pervading the entire prologue. Not surprisingly, Miller's thesis has found few followers.

32 Note the comment on this alternative by Metzger (1994: 168): "whatever that may be supposed to mean." In Metzger's dissenting opinion (the majority of the UBS translation committee favors taking the phrase with what follows) he states, "Despite valiant attempts of commentators to bring sense out of taking ὁ γέγονεν with what follows, the passage remains intolerably clumsy and opaque" (similarly, Schnackenburg, cited by Ashton 1986: 172). Among the major translations, only the NRSV prefers this alternative. Commentators who advocate this option are R. Brown (1966: 6–7), Bultmann (1971: 39–40, esp. n. 4), Beasley-Murray (1999: 1–2, esp. n. a), and Whitacre (1999: 52). See also E. Miller (1989), who integrates his belief that the phrase is to be taken with what follows into his larger thesis that 1:1a–b and 1:3–5 constitute a christological hymn in four strophes extolling the salvation-historical activity of the Word (he considers 1:1c and 1:2 to be interpolations). Brodie (1993: 138), because of the lack of punctuation, sees the text as inherently ambiguous and as being "part of a careful literary strategy” designed to focus on “the continuity between creation and the incarnation, between creation and redemption.”

Milne, B. 142n5

Minear, P. S. 564n24, 583n2, 583n3, 584n5, 584n6, 584n7, 585, 585n9, 604n22

5 Blomberg (1995: 8), with reference to Dockery (1988), lists five approaches to the present narrative: (1) allegorical (cf. 2 Kings 17:30–31); (2) existential (Bultmann 1971: 175–202); (3) pastoral (Milne 1993: 85–86); (4) salvation-historical (W. Davies 1974; Carson 1993); and (5) intertextual (focusing on OT parallels such as Gen. 24:10–61; 29:1–20; Exod. 2:15b–21) (Neyrey 1979). Acknowledging that all of these approaches capture elements of truth, Blomberg nevertheless finds them wanting and proposes a seven-pronged approach of his own. Stibbe (1993: 68–69) advocates a symbolic reading: “If the woman has had five husbands and is living de facto with a sixth, then Jesus is the seventh man in her life. Since seven is the perfect number in Judaism, the implicit commentary must be that Jesus is the man which she has been waiting for, the man in whose presence she will find wholeness.” In the same vein, Brodie (1993: 217–18) sees this as a betrothal-type scene. See also Dockery (1988: 127–40), who distinguishes between author-, text-, and reader-oriented approaches, and Marshall 1974. R. Lightfoot (1956: 122) detects certain parallels between John 4 and 19.

24 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 638; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Borchert 2002: 295; R. Brown 1970: 987; Bultmann 1971: 684; Burge 2000: 554; Laney 1992: 360. Witherington (1995: 325) suggests, less plausibly, that the beloved disciple believed that Jesus had been taken by God similar to Elijah. Morris (1995: 736) notes that the two verbs do not have explicit objects, supplying the graveclothes as the object of the beloved disciple’s “seeing” and Jesus’ resurrection as that of the disciple’s “believing” (albeit without understanding its full theological significance). Hardly plausible is the suggestion by Minear (1983: 91 n. 14, with reference to 1976 [followed by Conway 1999: 189–90]) that what the disciples believed was the statement of Mary Magdalene in 20:2.

5 So Ridderbos (1997: 656), who states, “There is much that argues for ascribing the majority of ch. 21 to the Evangelist, as the completion of his narrative, albeit as a striking ... addition to a provisionally concluded whole.” Among the tie-ins between chapters 21 and 1–20, Ridderbos cites 21:1, 14 (referring back to the preceding resurrection account, in which Peter and the beloved disciple are linked) and the connection between Peter’s reinstatement in 21:15–23 and 13:38/18:16ff. According to Ridderbos (1997: 658), the chapter “was added to describe the passage from Jesus’ work on earth to its continuation through his disciples.” Keener (2003: 1219–22), too, makes a strong case for the literary unity of John 21 as a chapter and as an integral part of the entire Gospel. He notes that, apart from special vocabulary needed for the matters at hand (such as fishing terminology), chapter 21 does not differ significantly from the rest of the Gospel. Keener (2003: 1219, citing Bruce 1983: 398) lists the following commonalities: the variation of synonymous terms in 21:15–17; the double ἀμήν (21:18); the construction “This he said, indicating” (21:19; cf. 12:33); and the reference to the Sea of Tiberias (21:1; cf. 6:1). Contra, for example, Dodd (1953: 290), who claims that chapter 21 “falls outside the design of the book as a whole” (cited in Minear 1983: 87 n. 11).

6 So Culpepper 1983: 96. See also Schlatter (1948: 366), who contends that the sustained characterization of Peter and John in 1:35–42; 13:23–29; 18:15–17; 20:2–10; and chapter 21 cannot be assigned to different hands; Ridderbos (1997: 656), who says that the final chapter is designed to bring into sharper profile the roles of Peter and the beloved disciple; and Carson

(1991: 667), who notes that their relationship is removed from the realm of competition and their complementarity strongly and explicitly affirmed. Minear (1983: 91) writes, “Only in chapter 21 do we discover an adequate end to the story of the two disciples who, from chapter 13 on, have played the most conspicuous supporting roles in the gospel: Simon Peter and the beloved disciple.”

7 This is astutely observed by Minear (1983: 95), though I disagree that the “we” of 21:24 and the “I” of 21:25 are two different persons or groups (see further below).

9 See Schlatter 1948: 363–77. Note, for example, the references to a charcoal fire in 21:9 and 18:18 and to “drawing” in 21:8 and 12:32, as well as the links between 21:20; 13:23; 1:18 (see Ellis 1992: 18–19). See also the common elements between the good shepherd discourse in chapter 10 and Peter’s commissioning in 21:15–19 (Cassian 1956–57: 132–36 [cited in Minear 1983: 95 n. 24]). Minear (1983: 96–97) further notes the appellation of Thomas as “the twin” in 20:24 and 11:16; the references to Nathanael in 21:2 and 1:45–51 and to Cana in chapters 2, 4, and 21; and several other terminological and thematic connections. Gaventa (1996: 245) notes the similarity between μετὰ ταῦτα (meta tauta, after these things) in 21:1 and 19:38. To this may be added the term “Sea of Tiberias” (21:1; cf. 6:1); Simon Peter “son of John” (21:15; cf. 1:42); Jesus’ taking (λαμβάνω, lambanō) and distributing (δίδωμι, didōmi) bread (21:13; cf. 6:11 [close verbal parallels with 6:11, where Jesus’ giving thanks is explicitly mentioned, may imply thanksgiving in 21:13]); the double ἀμὴν (amēn, truly) (21:18; cf., e.g., 1:51); the connection between Peter’s and Jesus’ death established by the evangelist’s parenthetical comment (21:19; cf. 12:33); Jesus’ call for his disciples to “follow” him (21:19, 22; cf. 1:43); and other verbal links, grammatical features, and thematic connections (Osborne 1981: 294). Spencer (1999) finds the following “narrative echoes” of earlier portions in John’s narrative: (1) the feeding of the five thousand (ch. 6); (2) Peter’s threefold denial (18:15–18, 25–27); (3) the footwashing and the final meal (13:3–5, 36–38); and (4) the good shepherd discourse (10:1–18). Note, however, that Spencer considers chapter 21 to be a “later redactional addition” (p. 68).

22 Carson (1991: 684) adduces 1:14; 3:2, 11; 20:2; 1 John 1:2, 4, 5, 6, 7; 3 John 12; 2 Cor. 12:2–4; Schlatter (1948: 376), with reference to John 3:2 and 20:2, where the speaker is included in the plural, speaks of the possible presence of collaborators. Minear (1983: 95) believes that 1:14–18 and 21:24 are intended by the evangelist “to enclose his entire message to his audience.”

Wallace (1996: 399) lists the present passage as a (debatable) example of the exclusive “we,” “in which the first-person plural restricts the group to the author and his associates” (p. 397).

8 John’s prologue has stimulated several highly creative structural proposals. Often the only limit seems to be the imagination of the interpreter. A case in point is the understanding of the prologue as a series of three successive “waves,” each with three movements (La Potterie 1984; Moloney 1977: 35–39; 1993: 25–27; Viviano 1998). Coloe (1997: 44–46) sees 1:1–2 as introduction and 1:18 as conclusion, with 1:3–17 dividing into two sections of three strophes each (1:3–5, 6–8, 9–13 and 14, 15, 16–17), paralleling the six-day structure of Gen. 1:1–2:4. According to Coloe, the rest of the Gospel represents day seven.

14 Haenchen (1984: 1.117) holds that 1:6–8 represents a rather clumsy insertion into the original hymn. Bultmann (1971: 49) believes that the material is inserted to counter veneration of John the Baptist (cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.249–50). Ridderbos (1997: 42) ardently defends the prologue’s unity. Moloney (1998: 37) notes that 1:6–8 is essential to the prologue in its current form.

22 Moloney (1998: 35) says that πρὸς connotes motion, not just “with,” and translates it “turned toward.” Yet any force of motion inherent in πρὸς is overridden by the stative verb (Wallace 1996: 358–59; Schnackenburg [1990: 1.234] also rejects the idea). Lindars (1972: 84) proposes “in company with,” while Westcott (1908: 1.6) writes, “The personal being of the Word was realised in active intercourse with and in perfect communion with God.” Bultmann (1971: 32–33) suggests that ἦν πρὸς is a Semitism equivalent to παρά plus the dative.

37 “Overcome” or an equivalent is favored also by Morris 1995: 76; Moloney 1998: 36; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.245–46; Laney 1992: 39; Lindars 1972: 87; Schlatter 1948: 9 (“καταλαμβάνω never means ‘understand’ in John”); and Westcott 1908: 1.9–10. Carson (1991: 138) thinks that John might have both meanings (“overcome” and “comprehend”) in mind (so also Whitacre 1999: 53) and likes the ambiguity in BAGD’s translation, “master” (see BDAG 520). Keener (2003: 387) believes that John’s use of κατέλαβεν in 1:5 is an instance of traductio, a play on the multiple meanings of a word (here “comprehend” and “overcome”). Keener notes that the word occurs in Wis. 7:30 but admits that there the term clearly means “overcome” and no wordplay is present. Burge (2000: 56) agrees that both are at work, but he sees “overcome” as being dominant. Calvin (1959: 12) translates “comprehend.” The major translations divide more or less evenly between the two options, usually mentioning the one not chosen in a footnote: (1) NIV: “understood”; NASB, NKJV: “comprehend”; (2) NLT: “extinguish”; NET: “mastered”; ISV: “put out”; HCSB, ESV, NRSV: “overcome.” Notably, the TNIV changed the NIV’s “understood” to “overcome.”

45 Among those who take 1:9 as a preliminary reference to the incarnation are Ridderbos 1997: 43; Carson 1991: 122; Borchert 1996: 112–13; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.255; Laney 1992: 41. Moloney (1998: 37) sees a hint to the incarnation already in 1:3c–4. There also may be an implied contrast with Hellenistic religions that offered false “light.”

50 Schnackenburg (1990: 1.256) claims that the reference is not to Jesus’ earthly ministry but to Israel’s history prior to the incarnation. Similarly, R. Brown (1966: 30) cites the parallel of Wisdom in 1 Enoch 42:2: “Wisdom came to make her dwelling place among the children of men and found no dwelling place.” More likely, the reference is anticipatory of the Word’s incarnation in 1:14 (Culpepper 1980–81: 13–14; Carson 1991: 122; Ridderbos 1997: 43; Moloney 1998: 37). On a literal level, see the reference in Luke 2:7 that there was “no guest room available” (TNIV) for Jesus and his parents at his birth, which may have spiritual overtones as well.

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενῆς θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996:

360: “the unique One, God.”

3 For an extensive summary of reconstructions, see Beasley-Murray 1999: 22; cf.

Schnackenburg 1990: 1.285. Witherington (1995: 68) proposes that 1:35–2:11 describes three days, the first being narrated in 1:35–42, the second in 1:43–51, and the third in 2:1–12. Note also Moloney (1998: 50–51), who suggests that 1:19–2:11 represents an allusion to the giving of the law in Exod. 19.

5 Moloney (1998: 58) proposes that the question “Who are you?” could be taken as the leitmotif of John’s Gospel. Barrett (1978: 172) considers the phrase an allusion to Jesus’ “I am” statements in 6:35 and 8:24. Witherington (1995: 64) follows Painter in classifying the present pericope as a “quest story” that prepares the evangelist’s audience to properly answer subsequent questions about Jesus’ identity. He also contends—a rather dubious claim—that the evangelist presents Jesus as a Jewish sage à la Wisdom whom disciples were to seek and follow (adducing Sir. 51:23). The opening demonstrative “this” is classified by Wallace (1996: 334) as an instance of “inverse attraction,” where the pronominal subject is linked with the gender of the preceding nominative (cf. Matt. 7:12; 13:38; Luke 2:12; 8:11; Rom. 11:27; Gal. 4:24). More questionable is Wallace’s claim (1996: 532) that the present verb ἐστίν (estin, is) is a “testimonium present” (discussed under the rubric of “perfective present”). More likely, ἐστίν is a historical present (Wallace denies that εἰμί is ever used as a historical present in the NT).

24 So Ridderbos 1997: 66 n. 10; Morris 1995: 122; Carson 1991: 144; Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292; contra R. Brown 1966: 44; Moloney 1998: 52. While thus the delegation included some Pharisees, this does not mean that the Pharisees were responsible for sending out the delegation, since the Sadducees had a majority on the Sanhedrin (Carson 1991: 144). This is true especially if an article is to be added (or implied) before ἀπεσταλμένοι (Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Barrett 1978: 174; R. Brown 1966: 43–44; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292). Ἀπεσταλμένοι ἦσαν (apestalmenoi ēsan, they had been sent) is a periphrastic pluperfect (Wallace [1996: 586] calls it “consummative”).

32 Moloney (1998: 53) notes, “Nowhere else in 1:19–51 is a day brought to such a formal close as this first day.” Note also the periphrastic imperfect ἦν ... βαπτίζων (“was baptizing”), indicating the continual nature of the Baptist’s ministry (Barrett 1978: 175; Wallace 1996: 648).

105 C. Koester 1990a: 23–34; cf. Barrett 1978: 185; Nicklas (2000b: 201–2) is less than convinced. Other commentators consider the reference to be incidental, intended to show merely that Jesus “knew” Nathanael prior to their actual encounter (Ridderbos 1997: 90; cf. Burge 2000: 78; R. Brown 1966: 83; Moloney 1998: 56; contra Morris 1995: 146; Witherington 1995: 71; Borchert 1996: 148; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.317). Keener (2003: 486), too, rejects any deeper significance in the identification, suggesting that the fig tree may be mentioned simply because a specific landmark was necessary for some reason. Witherington’s suggestion that Nathanael is being portrayed as an expert in the law who thus would know that the Messiah could not come from Nazareth seems far-fetched.

113 See the surveys in Hawthorne, DJG 7–8; Moloney 1978: 1–22; Culpepper 1993: 57–101 (on 1:51, see pp. 61–63). See also Köstenberger 2002c: 22.

35 Moloney (1998: 69) notes that the next time a bridegroom is mentioned in this Gospel, it is Jesus who is identified as the bridegroom by John the Baptist.

19 Several commentators also mention that Tyrian coinage would have been preferred because it did not bear effigies (Moloney 1998: 76; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38 n. c; R. Brown 1966: 115;

106n20, 107, 107n24, 108, 109, 113, 113n3, 115, 116, 118, 120n17, 125, 125n33, 126n34, 126n37, 127, 132, 134, 135, 137, 138n13, 140, 142n4, 143n9, 146n15, 147n23, Borchert 1996: 163). However, this is disputed by Murphy-O'Connor (2000: 47, referring to Ben-David 1969), who cites evidence that Tyrian shekels "carried the head of the god Melkart (or Herakles) on the obverse and a Tyrian (Ptolemaic) eagle on the reverse with the inscription 'Tyre the holy and inviolable.' " Murphy-O'Connor also notes the minting of Jewish shekels carrying the legend "shekel of Israel/Jerusalem [is/the] holy" at the onset of the Jewish war in A.D. 66 (pp. 47–48, citing Schürer 1973–79: 1.605), and he points to the Qumran interpretation of a one-time requirement in 4Q159 frag. 1, col. 2, lines 6–7 (p. 49).

20 So Ridderbos 1997: 116; Moloney 1998: 81; Barrett 1978: 197; Witherington 1995: 87; contra TNIV.

24 The LXX reads "has consumed me" (Moloney 1998: 77). Unlike in 2:22 and 12:16, the present reference does not refer to the postresurrection period, but to the actual situation (so Ridderbos 1997: 116; Carson 1991: 180; R. Brown 1966: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.347; Barrett 1978: 198; contra Witherington 1995: 88; Bultmann 1971: 122).

3 Moloney (1998: 90) and R. Brown (1966: 149) believe that Jesus' words continue through 3:21; Witherington (1995: 99) thinks that the evangelist takes over in 3:12, or at least by 3:16. Schnackenburg (1990: 1.360, citing others as well) places the start of the evangelist's reflections at 3:13.

17 Contra several commentators (Barrett 1978: 205; Moloney 1998: 91; R. Brown 1966: 130; Witherington 1995: 94; Burge 2000: 114; Carson 1995: 187 n. 8; Blomberg 1995: 6), "by night" is likely not symbolic in the sense that Nicodemus came from darkness to light, while Judas went from light to darkness (cf. 6:70–71; 12:4–8; 13:2, 26–30; 18:2–5)—a view held by R. Brown (1966: 130) and Auwers (1990). Wallace (1996: 123–24) overreaches when he finds in the genitive of time an indication of "the kind of time in which Nicodemus came to see the Lord." Morris (1995: 187) suggests that John may have had more than one meaning in mind.

33 Cf. Ezek. 11:19–20; 36:26–27; Isa. 44:3; 59:21; Jer. 31:31–34; Ps. 51:10; cf. Wis. 9:16–18; 1QS 3:13–4:26; see Ridderbos 1997: 132; Barrett 1978: 203; Moloney 1998: 94.

34 It may be too early in Jesus' ministry for his disciples to be included (Carson 1991: 198–99; contra Ridderbos 1997: 134; Morris 1995: 196). Schnackenburg's (1990: 1.376) solution, that Jesus' statement is proleptic, looking "forward to the time when his disciples make his 'testimony' their own, as part of their preaching" (with reference to 3:22 and 9:4), likewise fails to convince. There is also no need to postulate that the "we" aligns Jesus with the OT prophets, reflects the Johannine community (Witherington 1995: 98; cf. Moloney 1998: 94), or denotes the church versus the synagogue (Barrett 1978: 211; Brodie 1993: 198).

37 Cf. Morris 1995: 196; Carson 1991: 199; R. Brown 1966: 132; Beasley-Murray 1999: 50; Witherington 1995: 98; Moloney 1998: 94; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.377; contra Barrett 1978: 212.

13 Note the reference to John by Jesus as a "lamp" in 5:35. See Ridderbos 1997: 147–48; cf. R. Brown 1966: 153; Moloney 1998: 110.

4 See the various structural proposals in Beasley-Murray 1999: 59; R. Brown 1966: 176–78; Moloney 1998: 115. See also Carson 1991: 214.

9 Moloney (1998: 196–99) considers the woman to be an example of "partial faith," and her fellow villagers to be one of "complete faith."

15 This represents the wide consensus of interpreters: see Ridderbos 1997: 153; Carson 1991:

149, 149n30, 150, 152, 154, 155, 157, 165, 166, 169, 169n9, 170, 170n16, 171, 171n19, 172, 178n13, 180n29, 183n41, 184, 186n53, 187, 188n66, 189, 191n81, 193, 195,

215–16; Borchert 1996: 198–99; Beasley-Murray 1999: 59; Witherington 1995: 115; R. Brown 1966: 169; Morris 1995: 226; Barrett 1978: 230; Moloney 1998: 116, 120; Conway 1999: 105. 23 So N. Walker 1960 and the vast majority of commentators, including Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. e; Witherington 1995: 120; Barrett 1978: 231; Moloney 1998: 116, 121; Bultmann 1971: 178; contra Borchert 1996: 201.

30 See Maccini 1996: 131–44. Daube (1956: 375–82) argues that “do not associate with” specifically refers to Jews not sharing vessels with Samaritans (cf. NIV text and note at 4:9). However, no common utensils (such as the woman’s water jar) are specifically mentioned in 4:9. The explanatory aside, “For Jews have no dealings with [συγχρῶνται] Samaritans,” probably is broader than the mere refusal to share drinking vessels (Ridderbos 1997: 154; Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. f; contra Carson 1991: 218; Borchert 1996: 203; Witherington 1995: 120; R. Brown 1966: 170; Morris 1995: 229; Barrett 1978: 232; Moloney 1998: 117, 121; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.425 n. 19).

9 So Mead 1985: 71; Barrett 1978: 245; Witherington 1995: 128; Moloney 1998: 153; Bultmann 1971: 206; but see the cautious assessment by Carson 1991: 234. Morris (1995: 255), somewhat idiosyncratically, suggests that the man was a Jew.

16 The expression “child” indicates the close bond between father and son—a more emotional term than “son” in 4:47 (Morris 1995: 257; Moloney 1998: 153; Burge 2000: 158).

19 Note also the progression from official to personal in the evangelist’s description of the man: from “a certain official” (τις βασιλικός, tis basilikos [4:46, cf. 49]), to “the man” (ὁ ἄνθρωπος, ho anthrōpos [4:50]), to “the father” (ὁ πατήρ, ho patēr [4:53]) (Moloney 1998: 161).

13 A few commentators (Morris 1995: 265–66; Barrett 1978: 251; Moloney 1998: 171; R. Brown 1966: 206) think that προβατικὴ modifies κολυμβήθρα (kolymbēthra, pool); others think that the implied noun is “gate” (Carson 1991: 241; so also the TNIV).

29 Morris 1995: 269; Witherington 1995: 137. Puzzlingly, Moloney (1998: 172) concludes that the man’s “obedience to the word of Jesus” “suggests that the man achieves a faith response.”

41 Moloney 1998: 173; cf. Metzner 1999; Lee 1994: 110; Witkamp 1985: 24; Leidig 1979: 211; contra Thomas 1995: 18. Moloney (1998: 173) rightly notes, contra Beck (1993 [cf. 1997: 86–90]), who argues that anonymous characters in the Fourth Gospel draw the reader into an identification with the character, “The reader of the Fourth Gospel, however, hardly identifies with a man who is in league with ‘the Jews’ (vs. 15).” Keener (2003: 87), similarly, contends that a list of Johannine models of faith is not entirely coextensive with anonymous characters (citing esp. 5:14–15) and registers this as his only serious disagreement with Beck (p. 87 n. 49). Beck, in a review (2001), indirectly responds to my earlier criticism (Köstenberger 1999b, reviewing Beck 1997) that the man in John 5 disproves his theory by alleging, in effect, that I have no place for literary analysis in my hermeneutical method. Nothing could be further from the truth. My concern, rather, lies with an unqualified wholesale adoption of reader-response criticism by evangelicals who fail to realize that this methodology is part and parcel of a postmodern hermeneutic that is left with nothing but subjective readings devoid of any claim to authority or universal applicability. Moreover, I was concerned to point out that Beck’s central thesis (i.e., that anonymity necessarily equals ideal function and positive characterization) is invalid. Note further this puzzling conclusion by Brodie (1993: 238): “The final picture ... is ... open to a positive interpretation: the man has finally come to mature (repentant) recognition of

195n109, 201n10, 202, 204n28, 204n29, 206, 207, 207n43, 208n50, 209, 211n60, 211n61, 213, 214, 215n72, 216, 216n77, 220n96, 223, 224, 224n1, 231, 234, 236, 238,

Jesus, and he is announcing the good news to the Jews.” Precisely where Brodie finds the man “announcing the good news to the Jews” is unclear to me, nor can I see textual evidence for the man coming to “mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus.”

53 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Borchert 1996: 236; Moloney 1998: 174; Bultmann 1971: 245; Morris 1995: 274–75 n. 48 (referring to Odeberg 1968: 203), 277; Barrett 1978: 259; Keener 1999: 42–43. The use of ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, that one) for God “lays stress upon the separate divine Person” in contrast with υἱός (huios, son). Also stressed is the Son’s inability to do anything apart from the Father (again in 5:30; see Moloney 1998: 178; Barrett 1978: 264).

66 So Carson 1991: 256; Moloney 1998: 183; Ridderbos 1997: 197; Morris 1995: 280; Beasley-Murray 1999: 76.

81 That “another” refers to God the Father represents a broad consensus among commentators: so Ridderbos 1997: 202; Morris 1995: 288; Moloney 1998: 190; Beasley-Murray 1999: 78; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.121; Barrett 1978: 264; R. Brown 1966: 224.

109 Hengel (1999: 309) comments, “One should by all means read ‘Bethesda’ ”; so also Carson 1991: 241; Morris 1995: 267; Witherington 1995: 137; Borchert 1996: 231; Moloney 1998: 171; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94; Schlatter 1948: 142; undecided are Ridderbos 1997: 185; R. Brown 1966: 206–7.

10 See Num. 11:13 (cf. R. Brown 1966: 233; Moloney 1998: 197; Burge 2000: 193). There are several other parallels between John 6 and Num. 11: the grumbling of the people (Num. 11:1; John 6:41, 43); the description of the manna (Num. 11:7–9; John 6:31); the reference to the eating of meat/[Jesus’] flesh (Num. 11:13; John 6:51); and the striking disproportion between the existing need and the available resources (Num. 11:22; John 6:7–9).

28 The imperfect ἤρχοντο (ērchonto) indicates that the disciples “were on their way” or that they were “trying to go” (Barrett 1978: 280; cf. Morris 1995: 308 n. 36; Moloney 1998: 203). Morris (1995: 309 n. 41), followed by Keener (2003: 673), suggests that the disciples were probably crossing not at the widest part of the lake but from the northeast to the northwest shores, the distance stated in 6:19 indicating that they were most of the way across the lake.

29 Cf. 3:2 and especially 21:3 (though note 13:30). So Moloney 1998: 203; contra Borchert 1996: 258; Carson 1991: 274. Ἐγγύονει (egegonei, had come) is an intensive pluperfect (Wallace 1996: 585).

43 So Barrett 1978: 287; cf. Witherington 1995: 155; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.38; Burge 1987: 84–85. Less likely, the reference may be to his consecration (R. Brown 1966: 261) or to the incarnation (Moloney 1998: 211). On the phrase “seal of approval,” see commentary at 3:33.

50 Carson 1991: 285; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 91; Barrett 1978: 288; R. Brown 1966: 265; Moloney 1998: 212. The personal pronoun σύ (sy, you) is emphatic, possibly suggesting that people doubt Jesus’ ability to furnish such a sign (Morris 1995: 321).

60 See discussion at 6:30. The second καί (kai, and) in 6:36 probably is adversative (so Barrett 1978: 293). The majority of commentators consider the word με (me, me) in 6:36 to be original (so Ridderbos 1997: 230 n. 120; Carson 1991: 289–90; Morris 1995: 325 n. 104; R. Brown 1966: 270; contra Barrett 1978: 293; Moloney 1998: 216; see also the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 85; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.46).

61 “Everything” (πάν, pan) in 6:37 and 6:39 is neuter, used in a qualitative, collective sense (R. Brown 1966: 270; Barrett 1978: 294; Borchert 1966: 265), though ultimately people (not things) are in mind (BDF §138.1, with specific reference to John 6:37; cf. Morris 1995: 325; Moloney 1998: 216).

72 So Ridderbos 1997: 235–37; cf. Carson 1991: 295; Morris 1995: 331–32; contra Moloney 1998: 223; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.55; Lindars 1972: 267; Talbert 1992: 140. As Keener (2003: 690) observes, “John’s words [in 6:27–63] invite his audience to look to Christ’s death itself, not merely those symbols which point to his death.” At best, any such overtones are derivative (Borchert 1996: 270–71; cf. Brodie 1993: 286; Calvin 1959: 170).

77 John’s use of τρώγω (trōgō, chew, eat) in 6:54 may be intended to heighten the vividness of Jesus’ words (Ridderbos 1997: 242 n. 163; cf. Moloney 1998: 221; Bultmann 1971: 236), though it may merely be the evangelist’s preferred verb for “eating” in the present tense (Carson 1991: 296; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 95; Barrett 1978: 299).

96 So Moloney 1998: 231; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.75; Wallace (1996: 658) translates it “as a result of this”; Barrett (1978: 306) opts for both.

1 For a thorough discussion of the historical background for the Feast of Tabernacles, see Moloney 1998: 232–36; 2002. See also Carson 1991: 304–5.

42 This is the first occurrence of the frequent Johannine phrase indicating that Jesus will return to “him who sent me” (Ridderbos 1997: 271). The term ὑπάγω (hypagō, go) is favored by John (32 times, compared to 19 times in Matthew, 15 in Mark, and 5 in Luke; see Morris 1995: 369 n. 67; Moloney 1998: 250; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.476 n. 47). It is used seventeen times to refer to Jesus’ departure to the Father.

53 Most commentators favor a time immediately following cessation of ceremonies on the eighth day (Carson 1991: 321; Morris 1995: 373, esp. n. 79; Barrett 1978: 326; Moloney 1998: 256; Schlatter 1948: 199). Some believe that Jesus’ words fit better with the ceremonies of the seventh day (R. Brown 1966: 320; Bultmann 1971: 302 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.152; Ridderbos 1997: 272; Burge 2000: 227). On the water-drawing ceremony, see Keener 2003: 722–24.

75 Ridderbos 1997: 280 (contra Moloney [1998: 255], who says that Nicodemus “now advocates a new way of understanding God’s design for the people ... in the words and deeds of Jesus”; see also Ridderbos’s excursus on Nicodemus at the end of ch. 7).

5 So Morris 1995: 388; R. Brown 1966: 344; Burge 2000: 255; Moloney 1998: 268; Borchert 1996: 295.

6 See Isa. 60:19–22; Zech. 14:5b–8; cf. Rev. 21:23–24. Contemporary Judaism applied the phrase “light of the world” not only to God but also to Israel, Jerusalem, the patriarchs, the Messiah, famous rabbis (e.g., Yohanan ben Zakkai), the Torah, the temple, and even Adam (Keener 1993: 285; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 128; R. Brown 1966: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.190; Moloney 1998: 266). The universality of “light” symbolism in religious language issues in numerous non-Jewish parallels (see Barrett 1978: 335–37; Bultmann 1971: 40–44, 342–43; Dodd 1953: 201–8; Odeberg 1968: 286–92).

11 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 128–29. Moloney (1998: 268, citing Talbert) notes that there was an expectation that the pillar of fire would return “at the end of time.” For Qumran and Second Temple parallels, see Köstenberger 2002c: 82.

19 Cf. 2 Cor. 5:16; Isa. 53:2–3; 1 Sam. 16:7; see Barrett 1978: 338; Moloney 1998: 266–67.

21 Schnackenburg 1990: 2.194; cf. Moloney 1998: 267; R. Brown 1966: 345. Carson (1991: 339 [cf. Burge 2000: 257]) denies the suggestion that κρίνω (krinō, judge) has the meaning “to pass judicial sentence” and the conclusion on that basis that Jesus came not to convict but to save. 28 The preposition ἐν (en) is to be rendered “at,” “near,” or “by,” since not just anyone would have been allowed inside (Ridderbos 1997: 298 n. 137). There may be irony in the location where the Jews manifest their ignorance of Jesus’ true identity (Moloney 1998: 298). There may also be an element of judgment (Bultmann 1971: 283).

259, 260n47, 264, 266n74, 269n85, 272, 272n98, 272n99, 273n103, 275, 282, 290, 300n7, 301n13, 302, 302n21, 304n32, 306n45, 309n59, 310n60, 312n73, 314n80,

47 So the majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 305–6; Carson 1991: 346–47; Morris 1995: 404; Beasley-Murray 1999: 132; D. M. Smith 1999: 185; Borchert 1996: 301 n. 182; Burge 2000: 259; Bultmann 1971: 252 n. 2; contra R. Brown 1966: 354–55, 358; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.204–5; Moloney 1998: 277; Westcott 1908: 2.13–14.

74 So Morris 1995: 411; Ridderbos 1997: 315; Carson 1991: 353; Barrett 1978: 349; Beasley-Murray 1999: 135; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.213; Moloney 1998: 280; Borchert 1996: 305–6. It was commonly recognized in Second Temple literature that death was the result of Satan’s initiative (Wis. 2:23–24; Sir. 25:24; cf. Rom. 5:12).

85 This implies that Jesus neglects the traditional ways of Judaism and so is perceived as acting more like a Samaritan than like a true Jew (Morris 1995: 414; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 318). Morris (1995: 414) suggests that the Jews might be addressing Jesus’ failure to recognize their relationship with Abraham. Barrett (1978: 350) notes that since Dositheus and Simon Magus (both Samaritans who claimed to be sons of God) were described as demon-possessed, Jesus’ opponents might be making a similar connection with him (cf. Moloney 1998: 286; R. Brown 1966: 358).

98 Cf. 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 3:13–14; 2 Bar. 4:4; Apoc. Abr. 31:1–3; see Moloney 1998: 284.

99 So Moloney 1998: 286; R. Brown 1966: 360.

103 Kruse (2003:217) cites a stipulation in the Qumran writings (CD 14:7–10) that certain officeholders must be between thirty and fifty years of age. Schlatter (1948: 220) says that the present passage coheres with Matt. 17:24, for the obligation to pay the temple tax ended at age fifty: “hence Jesus was not yet a πρεσβύτερος.” Also, the Book of Jubilees uses “fifty years” to measure the eras since the creation (M. Edwards 1994; followed by Moloney 1998: 286).

7 E.g., Ps. 74:1; 78:52; 79:13; 95:7; 100:3; Ezek. 34:31. A roughly contemporaneous passage, 2 Bar. 77:11–16, portrays the law as true shepherd (as well as light and water). Thus, Jesus here claims to fulfill the function that Jews generally attributed to the Torah (Moloney 1998: 307 [cited in Blomberg 2002: 158]). For a detailed treatment of John’s appropriation of Ezekiel’s shepherd motif in Ezek. 33–37, see Deeley 1997.

13 The wording is reminiscent of OT passages such as Num. 27:15–17 and Ezek. 34:13. Carson (1991: 383 [cf. Barrett 1978: 369]) understands Num. 27:15–18 as a typological allusion to Christ (contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.293; Moloney 1998: 308). Ridderbos (1997: 354) also mentions Ps. 80:1.

21 Some (e.g., Morris 1995: 450 n. 27; Barrett 1978: 371) seek to make a distinction between the meaning of ἡ θύρα τῶν προβάτων (hē thyra tōn probatōn, the door for the sheep) in 10:7 and ἡ θύρα (hē thyra, the gate) in 10:9, contending that in 10:7 Jesus is presented as the gate to the sheep, while in 10:9 he is the gate for the sheep. However, such a distinction is unnecessary (Carson 1991: 384; cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.289; Moloney 1998: 309).

32 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.294) proposes a translation “right” or “true.” Similarly, Borchert (1996: 333) suggests that the meaning of καλός is similar to that of ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) (cf.

Moloney 1998: 310; Bultmann 1971: 364). Carson (1991: 386) contends that the “good shepherd” should be thought of as “noble or worthy” but not “sentimental or effeminate.” Lindars (1972: 361) favors the rendering “an ideal shepherd.”

45 So the vast majority of commentators, including Barrett, Beasley-Murray, Burge, Carson, Moloney, Morris, Ridderbos, Schnackenburg, and Witherington. For Jewish material indicating that the Messiah would gather the Gentiles, see Hofius 1967.

59 For discussions of the Feast of Dedication, see Barrett 1978: 378–79; Beasley-Murray 1999: 172–73. Moloney (1998: 317–19) suggests that 10:22–39 is a summary of John 5–10. See also his treatment of the narrative’s structure on p. 314. Keener (2003: 822) notes the irony of Jesus the Messiah being rejected at a festival commemorating national deliverance.

60 See Josephus, J.W. 5.5.1 §§184–85; Ant. 15.11.3 §§396–401; 20.9.7 §§220–21. So the vast majority of commentators, including Carson, Barrett, Morris, Beasley-Murray, R. Brown, Moloney, and Burge; contra Ridderbos 1997: 368.

73 So, rightly, Carson (1991: 394–95), whose entire discussion repays careful reading (see also Morris 1995: 465; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174; Moloney 1998: 320; Burge 2000: 296; Laney 1992: 195; Stibbe 1993: 118; Westcott 1908: 2.68). Michaels (1989: 187) seems to conceive of Jesus’ unity with the Father in functional terms (whether primarily or exclusively so), as both of them doing “the same work.” Barrett (1978: 382) notes that the unity between the Father and the Son is also a unity of love and obedience.

80 Moloney (1998: 316) notes that at the Feast of Dedication the Jews affirmed their desire to remain faithful to God, yet in the present instance they are acting in a manner similar to Antiochus IV, who tried to destroy the presence of God.

85 The presence of an argument from the lesser to the greater is denied by Ridderbos (1997: 374) against the overwhelming majority of commentators (e.g., R. Brown 1966: 410; Morris 1995: 469; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.310; Moloney 1998: 316). Carson (1991: 399, perhaps following Barrett 1978: 385), calls this an ad hominem argument, which he defines (somewhat idiosyncratically, it seems) as an argument that “does not require Jesus to subscribe to the same literal exegesis as his opponents.”

89 In the LXX, variants of the term τὰ ἐγκαίνια (ta enkainia, Feast of Dedication [John 10:22]) refer to the dedication of the tabernacle altar (Num. 7:10–11), Solomon’s temple (1 Kings 8:63), and the second temple (Ezra 6:16–17). A connection between the present statement and the Feast of Tabernacles is made in, among others, Carson 1991: 399; R. Brown 1966: 411; Witherington 1995: 191; Moloney 1998: 317. Commentators differ as to the sacerdotal connotation of the term ἁγιάζω (hagiazō, set apart). R. Brown (1966: 411) is favorably disposed, while Barrett (1978: 385) denies such an association.

95 Some have seen a parallel to Jesus’ assertion of oneness with God in Antiochus Epiphanes’ boast that he was “God Manifest” (the meaning of the Greek epithet “Epiphanes”). This claim made by Antiochus may also lie behind the Jews’ charge that Jesus (like the Seleucid ruler [see 2 Macc. 9:28]) was a blasphemer (cf. 10:33, 36; see VanderKam 1990: 211–14; followed by Moloney 1998: 321). See, however, the appropriate caution by Lindars (1972: 376), who distinguishes between Jesus’ words here and the notion of family relationships among pagan gods. Lindars also points out that the present statement “preserves the logical priority of God, because the title Father is retained” and “denotes a personal intimacy which forestalls any suggestion of ditheism.”

40 For a defense of the historicity of this incident, see Carson (1991: 409), who points out that the disciples did not have the advantage of knowing the end of the story; that the messenger had announced sickness but not death; and that the disciples' anxiety about returning to Judea might have led to a certain amount of denseness. Carson also, rightly in my opinion, sees no double meaning in σωθήσεται (sōthēsetai, he will get well) (1991: 410; contra Barrett 1978: 393; R. Brown 1966: 424; Moloney 1998: 337; Westcott 1908: 2.84).

46 Note that John does not record any comment on Jesus' part. Moloney (1998: 322) notes that this is the first time in the Gospel that ἀποθνήσκω (apothnēskō, die) is associated with Jesus, but from now on it will appear in that regard with frequency (cf. 11:50, 51; 12:24, 33). Keener (2003: 835 n. 1) says that Thomas ironically interprets Jesus as saying that he will go to the realm of death.

62 Moloney (1998: 328) suggests, not implausibly, that Martha here interrupts Jesus: "She tells Jesus what resurrection means... Jesus must wrest the initiative from the energetic Martha."

71 Note the emphatic ἐγώ (egō, I) (Morris 1995: 489) and the perfect (labeled "intensive" by Wallace [1996: 574]) πεπίστευκα (pepisteuka, I have come to believe), which indicates a settled conviction (contra Moloney [1998: 328], who believes that the perfect suggests arrogance on Martha's part).

82 Though, conversely, Martha understands Jesus as a thaumaturge. Thus, according to Moloney (1998: 330), "Mary is the character in the story reflecting true faith (vv. 29, 32) while Martha has fallen short of such faith (vv. 21–22, 24, 27)." Ironically, this conclusion is precisely the opposite of that drawn by Pollard 1973: 440–41 (see n. 80 above). Both instances seem to represent the kind of dichotomizations that Ridderbos (1997: 401) rejects.

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, "The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death." See also Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999: 289. The mourners' unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999: 192–93), several of whom adduce Paul's statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus' anger is directed toward both "the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow" and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus' anger as occasioned by Mary's turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either "misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition," to mean "moved in spirit." Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus' struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, "He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself" (11:38 is translated "bearing the rebuke within himself"). According to Story, at the sight of people's grief, Jesus was overcome by "momentary self-regret," thinking, "Why did I not come sooner ... ? I have only myself to blame. ... Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?” However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

97 So, essentially, Carson (1991: 416) and Morris (1995: 495), though both (in my view, illegitimately) speak of “unbelief” or “the misconceptions of those around him” as the primary target (similarly, Kruse [2003: 254] believes Jesus wept out of “deep disappointment” with the “faithless weeping and wailing” of Mary and “the Jews”). Schnackenburg (1990: 2.337) insightfully adduces the reference to Jesus’ “tears” during his “life on earth” in Heb. 5:7, which there, as well as in the present reference, are related to the presence of and the need for salvation from death. The comment by Borchert (1996: 360) that Jesus’ weeping is “directly related to the failure of his followers to recognize his mission as the agent of God” is sheer conjecture, as is Moloney’s contention (1998: 331) that “he weeps because of the danger that his unconditional gift of himself in love ... will never be understood or accepted.”

8 The fronted ἐποίησαν (epoiēsan, they prepared) (which may be equivalent to a passive [so R. Brown 1966: 448]) is taken by some as indication of a very public occasion. If so, then the dinner may not have been prepared by Martha and her family and may not even have taken place at their house (Carson 1991: 428; Morris 1995: 511; contra Barrett 1978: 411; Moloney 1998: 356).

10 Martha’s serving suggests to some (e.g., Moloney 1998: 356) that the dinner was given at her (and Lazarus’s) house. Others object that if the dinner had been at Lazarus’s house, it likely would not have been stated that he was reclining with Jesus; his presence at the house would have been assumed (Morris 1995: 511; R. Brown 1966: 448; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 414). As on previous occasions, Martha is mentioned before her sister Mary (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.366).

20 Moloney (1998: 349) sees a contrast between Martha’s objection in 11:39 and her acting in “a position of recognition” in 12:2b, on the one hand, and Mary’s performance of “a humble act of love” in the present instance, but there is no explicit textual evidence to suggest that this contrast was intended by the Fourth Evangelist.

6 See commentary at 7:35, the only other occurrence of the term in John’s Gospel. A look at the remaining NT references indicates that in virtually all instances the term is used in contrast with “Jews” (Ἰουδαῖοι, Ioudaioi; see Acts 14:1; 16:1; 18:4; 19:10, 17; 20:21; Rom. 1:16; 2:9, 10; 3:9; 10:12; 1 Cor. 1:22, 24; 10:32; 12:13; Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11). That the “Greeks” mentioned here were not Diaspora Jews (as Calvin [1961: 35] thought) is accepted by virtually all major commentators (e.g., Westcott [1908: 2.120], who likens these to the Gentile magi at the beginning of Matthew’s Gospel; Ridderbos 1997: 427; Carson 1991: 436; Barrett 1978: 421; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.381; Witherington 1995: 223; Moloney 1998: 351; Burge 2000: 342).

9 The address κύριε (kyrie) is best rendered “sir” (Carson 1991: 437; Barrett 1978: 422). The verb ἰδεῖν (idein) here means “to visit with, to meet” (R. Brown 1966: 466) or “to have an interview with” (Carson 1991: 437; Barrett 1978: 422). Stibbe (1993: 136) contends that “the use of the verb ‘see’ points to the depth of their [the ‘Greeks’] seeking.” Moloney (1998: 352, 359) lists numerous instances in this Gospel where that verb is used with reference to “the acceptance or the refusal of Jesus’ role as the revealer.”

11 Philip’s provenance from a bilingual region is cited by many commentators, including Ridderbos (1997: 427), Carson (1991: 436), Schnackenburg (1990: 2.382), R. Brown (1966: 470), Witherington (1995: 223), and Moloney (1998: 352).

1 It is possible that John 13 represents a chiasm centering on Jesus’ pronouncement in 13:18–20.

See Moloney 1986: 372 (following Simoens 1981: 101). However, this proposal gives insufficient consideration to 13:31 as start of the farewell discourse proper. For a critique of chiastic proposals related to the Johannine farewell discourse, see Kellum 2005: 63–72. Kellum concludes that “on a structural level the farewell discourse resists a chiastic solution,” both owing to “the lack of stated awareness of macro-chiasm in antiquity” and because “the text of the farewell discourse itself resists a chiastic arrangement” (ibid., 72). See also the recent paper by C. Smith (2002) pointing out foundational weaknesses of contemporary chiastic studies. John 13–17 in its entirety explicates 1:7.

2 The following material is adapted from Moloney 1998: 377–78 (for further bibliography, see pp. 389–91). See also Bammel 1993; Kurz 1985; 1990; Lacomara 1974; Paschal, DJG 229–33, esp. 232.

38 A reference to Christian baptism is unlikely. Contra Moloney 1998: 375; Brodie 1993: 452; and R. Brown (1970: 562), who says that 13:6–10 represents a secondary allusion to baptism. Moreover, as Carson (1991: 466) notes, the washing of Judas’s feet proves that “no rite, even if performed by Jesus himself, ensures spiritual cleansing.” On “he knew,” see 6:70–71; 13:3, 26–27.

1 John’s quotation is closer to the MT than to the LXX. Menken (1990) contends that the rendering of Ps. 41:9 in the present passage represents the evangelist’s own translation from the Hebrew. Moloney (1998: 384), on the strength of the evangelist’s choice of the verb τρώγω (trōgō [used also in 6:54–58]) in the place of the LXX’s ἐσθίω (esthiō) for “eat,” postulates “eucharistic overtones” to the meal. On fulfillment quotations, see commentary at 12:38. Similar texts in the Psalms include 31:9–13; 38:10–12; 55:13–14 (see commentary at 13:21). Ridderbos (1997: 467 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 554]) rightly argues for a general sense of “this is to fulfill the scripture” rather than taking the statement to imply that Jesus chose Judas in order to fulfill Scripture. This latter view seems to be held by Carson (1991: 470), who writes, “The reason Jesus chose one who would betray him was to fulfill the Scripture.”

2 The outline of the structure of the first unit (13:31–14:31) below follows Carson (1991: 498) and Blomberg (2002: 199), who take 14:15–31 as a single unit. Others divide this section between 14:24 and 14:25 (e.g., Moloney 1998: 391–92; R. Brown 1970: 623). Schnackenburg (1990: 3.58), following Becker, sees a break between 14:17 and 14:18.

40 See the additional note on 14:7. The rendering “certainly” takes ἀπάρτι (aparti) as one word (so, tentatively, Carson 1991: 493, with reference to A. Debrunner and Beasley-Murray; contra Moloney 1998: 399). This is also a possibility in 13:19 (note further the variant in 1:51; cf. Matt. 26:29, 64; Rev. 14:13; see BDAG 97).

46 Again, “this will suffice” probably represents Johannine irony. Philip claims to be modest in his request—a direct vision of God—while in fact asking for something greater than the amazing revelation already provided in Jesus. On Philip, see commentary at 1:44; 12:21–22. The verb ἀρκέω (arkeō, suffice) occurs elsewhere in this Gospel only in 6:7, there, as in the present passage, on the lips of Philip (Moloney 1998: 399).

73 Though, as Moloney (1998: 407) points out, there are differences between Jesus and the Spirit as well: the latter neither becomes flesh nor dies for our sins. Alternatively, the statement refers to Jesus’ postresurrection appearances to his followers (so Ridderbos 1997: 505; Carson 1991: 501; Morris 1995: 578–59; Beasley-Murray 1999: 258; Borchert 2002: 126). Barrett (1978: 464) says that the passage refers neither to Jesus coming in the person of the Holy Spirit nor to the parousia but rather is using language appropriate to both the resurrection and the parousia to refer to both.

80 See Morris (1995: 579), who says that “if this is accepted it must be in the sense of 20:22, where the Spirit was in some sense given on the day of resurrection”; and Bruce (1983: 303), who points out that the resurrection appearances were but brief and temporary. See also Barrett (1978: 464), who maintains that the primary reference is to the resurrection but the expression also extends to the presence of Christ in his disciples (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 258). In the patristic period, the Eastern church fathers understood the phrase “in a little while” to refer to the resurrection, while the Latin church thought that Jesus meant the parousia. Bultmann (1971: 619) contends that John’s source referred to the latter, with the evangelist demythologizing his source by reinterpreting it as the former. Hence, the second coming is swallowed up in Easter. However, this reconstruction is predicated upon Bultmann’s source theory regarding John’s Gospel as well as upon his existential approach to interpretation, including the categories of “myth” and “demythologization.” Yet note how even after his resurrection, Jesus refers to a future time at which he will return (21:22, 23). Moloney (1998: 403) implausibly contends that “that day” is Jesus’ hour and departure.

89 The term occurs infrequently in the OT (Ps. 51:11; Isa. 63:9–10). There are several references to the “Holy Spirit” in Second Temple literature (e.g., Wis. 9:17; Ps. Sol. 17:37; Odes Sol. 14:8). In the Gospels, the expression is used five times in Matthew (1:18, 20; 3:11; 12:32; 28:19), four times in Mark (1:8; 3:29; 12:36; 13:11), thirteen times in Luke (1:15, 35, 41, 67; 2:25, 26; 3:16, 22; 4:1; 10:21; 11:13; 12:10, 12), and three times in John (in the other two instances without the article: 1:33; 20:22). References to the “Holy Spirit” are frequent in the Book of Acts and the writings of Paul. I am puzzled by Moloney’s (1998: 413) statement that “this is the only place in the NT where the expression ‘the Holy Spirit’ is found.” There are about ninety references to the Holy Spirit in the NT.

44 The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) functions appositionally (Wallace 1996: 476). The distinction made by Moloney (1998: 424 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 663]) between the disciples being commanded to love “continuously” (present subjunctive) on the basis of Jesus’ crucifixion, a single act of love (aorist), founders because of reliance on outmoded notions of Greek verbal theory.

46 Moloney (1998: 426) notes that the genre of farewell typically included a renewing of a covenant.

2 Keener (2003: 1019) finds another micro-chiasm in 15:18–25, with 15:20ab (a servant is not greater than his master) at the center. The six conditional clauses in 15:18–24 represent warnings pertaining to the future (or present) of the Christian community in relation to the world. Such parting exhortations are a common feature of farewell discourses (Moloney 1998: 433). The present condition is second class: “If the world hates you—and it does” (Wallace 1996: 696; Borchert 2002: 154). On the “world,” see commentary at 1:9; the same phrase occurs in 1 John 3:13 (see also John 17:14). On the contrast between “above” and “below,” see 3:31; 8:23 (cf. 18:36–37). The form γινώσκετε (ginōskete, you know) can be read as an imperative (NIV; NRSV; NLT; ISV; ESV; HCSB; TNIV; Barrett 1978: 480) or an indicative (NASB; KJV), though admittedly the difference is marginal (R. Brown 1970: 686). The pronoun με is emphatic (Morris 1995: 602 n. 42). The perfect verb form μемίσσηκεν (memisēken, it hated) stresses the settled, completed state of the world’s hatred toward Jesus (Barrett 1978: 480; R. Brown 1970: 686; Morris 1995: 602 n. 44).

8 See 7:28; 8:19, 27, 55; 16:3. Ταῦτα πάντα (tauta panta, all these things) presumably includes both hatred (15:18–19) and the resulting persecution (15:20; cf. 16:1–3; see Bultmann 1971: 550 n. 1; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276; Ridderbos 1997: 524). The expression “because of my name” reflects OT terminology pertaining to God and his great name (cf. 1 Sam. 12:22; 2 Chron. 6:32; Jer. 14:21; cf. Acts 5:41; 1 Pet. 4:14; 1 John 2:12; Rev. 2:3; see R. Brown 1970: 687), though in the present context it is essentially synonymous with “me” (Carson 1991: 526; Moloney 1998: 433).

18 So Ridderbos 1997: 525–26; Barrett 1978: 482; Carson 1991: 527; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276; contra Moloney (1998: 434), who contends that “most” favor Ps. 35. Cf. the citation of Ps. 69:9 in John 2:17. See also Ps. 119:161. Extrabiblical parallels include Ps. Sol. 7:1; b. Yoma 9b (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 147; cf. Barrett 1978: 482; R. Brown 1970: 689).

24 So Carson 1991: 529; Ridderbos 1997: 527; R. Brown 1970: 690; Moloney 1998: 434. See 16:4; 6:64; 8:25. See also Luke 1:2; Acts 1:21–22; 10:37. The present tense ἐστέ (este, you are) is perfective in meaning, “you have been” (R. Brown 1970: 690; contra Bultmann 1971: 554).

28 On being “put out of the synagogue,” see commentary at 9:22, 34 and at 12:42–43. There is no need to tie the present reference to the birkat ha-minim (Moloney 1998: 434). See also the references to “those who say they are Jews and are not, but are a synagogue of Satan” in the Book of Revelation (2:9; 3:9). Some rabbis taught that prayer was not effective unless offered in the synagogue.

9 Moloney (1998: 469, 473) seems to believe that the prayer was spoken while Jesus was still at the Passover meal, with his disciples still present at the table. D. M. Smith (1999: 308), too, insists on this presumption.

53 Barrett (1978: 508) seems to go further, apparently suggesting that the Fourth Evangelist identified Judas and the antichrist. Note also Moloney’s (1998: 467) startling assertion that what happened through “the son of perdition is beyond the control of Jesus.” How does that cohere with the immediately ensuing assertion that Judas’s betrayal occurred in fulfillment of Scripture?

1 Stibbe (1992: 111–12) contends that John’s characterization of Jesus in his passion narrative consists of three aspects: Jesus as judge, king, and elusive God. Stibbe also suggests that 18:1–27 serves as an “implicit commentary on the truth enunciated in 1:5” (i.e., the victory of the light over the darkness [p. 100]). On the relationship between the Johannine and the Synoptic passion narratives, see Ridderbos 1996: 569–72; Carson 1991: 571–76; Westcott 1908: 2.262–64. Burge (2000: 485–86) addresses the historical trustworthiness of the Johannine passion narrative.

Moloney (1998: 482) divides 18:1–19:42 into five scenes on the basis of the introduction of new people and places. He also notes that this section begins and ends with κῆπος (kēpos, garden). R. Brown (1970: 813–17), too, has an extensive discussion of the structure and historicity of John’s passion narrative. See also the examination of theological and literary features of this section in Schnackenburg 1990: 3.218–19.

1 Contra Moloney (1998: 483), who, puzzlingly, urges that 18:1–11 should not be described as “the arrest of Jesus.” He actually suggests that “Jesus is not betrayed, led out, or questioned” (p. 485).

4 “With” here is σύν (syn) rather than μετά (meta), another instance of Johannine stylistic variation (Morris 1995: 655 n. 2). Moloney (1998: 484) notes the emphasis placed on the disciples in this Gospel in contrast with the Synoptics, contending that the “passion of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel may not only be about what happens to Jesus, but may also determine the future of the disciples.”

22 So Ridderbos 1997: 576; with reference to the threefold repetition of this phrase in this section, Morris 1995: 658 and Ball 1996: 201; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 322; Moloney 1998: 485; R. Brown 1970: 818; Borchert 2002: 219; Burge 2000: 492.

30 Moloney (1998: 485), rather idiosyncratically, claims that the “son of perdition” in 17:12 is not Judas but Satan and that Jesus does not exclude anyone, even Judas, from his request to the soldiers (p. 483). R. Brown (1970: 811–12) suggests that Judas was not given to Jesus by the Father. Borchert (2002: 220) rightly notes that the exception is already stated in 17:12.

6 Though Annas is also mentioned by Luke (Luke 3:2; Acts 4:6). On the historical plausibility of such a trial, see Ridderbos 1997: 579–80. See also the excursus on the political and judicial situation in Israel during the time of Jesus in Borchert 2002: 224–26 and the chart showing the relationship of the four Gospels to one another concerning Jesus before the Jewish authorities in R. Brown 1970: 830–31. John 18:12a–b can be construed either with 18:1–11 (Beasley-Murray 1999: 324; Moloney 1998: 486; Barrett 1978: 523) or with 18:12c–14 (so Ridderbos 1997: 578; Morris 1995: 664; R. Brown 1970: 819).

10 See m. Hor. 3.4; cf. m. Meg. 1.9; m. Mak. 2.6; t. Yoma 1.4. See also Luke 3:2, where the appearance of John the Baptist is placed “during the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas.” Josephus indicates that it was customary for former high priests to continue to be called by that term (J.W. 4.3.7 §151; 4.3.9 §160; see Ridderbos 1997: 579; Moloney 1998: 490; Pancaro 1975: 66–67). The family is mentioned several times in later Jewish writings; it was noted not only for its great size, wealth, and power (b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.18), but also for its greed (see the street-ballad referred to in commentary at 18:3). Its wealth is reported later to have been destroyed by the Zealots.

23 Symbolic interpretations of this verse (such as those by Witherington 1995: 288; Moloney 1998: 490; and Whitacre 1999: 432) fail to convince.

27 As R. Brown (1970: 826) points out, the only previous reference to Jesus teaching in a synagogue in this Gospel is found in 6:59 (though there are other instances recorded in the Synoptics). The perfects λελάληκα (lélalēka, I have spoken) in 18:20 and ἀκηκοότας (akēkootas, [those who] heard) in 18:21 present Jesus’ teaching from the perspective of having been completed, so that it is now possible to look at it as a finished product in terms of both delivery and reception (though not everything that commentators deduce from the perfects here seems warranted [see, e.g., Moloney 1998: 488]).

2 See R. Brown 1970: 858–59, followed by Lincoln 2000: 124; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.220, 242; Moloney 1998: 493.

1 For discussions of this passage’s relationship to the Synoptics, see Barrett 1978: 546–48 (on the assumption of John’s use of Mark and the superiority of Markan material); Beasley-Murray 1999: 343–44; Bultmann 1971: 667; R. Brown 1970: 913–16. R. Brown (1970: 910–12) divides 19:16b–42 into five chiastically arranged episodes plus introduction and conclusion; Moloney (1998: 502, following Donald Senior) sees the five scenes but not the chiasm (see also Moloney’s literary analysis of John 18–19 on pp. 511–12).

2 So, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 608; Carson 1991: 608; Morris 1995: 711; Beasley-Murray 1999: 344; Borchert 2002: 260; Burge 2000: 524. Contra Moloney (1998: 506, following R. Brown), who contends that “the Jews” are the subject of the verb.

6 So, with a variety of nuances, Witherington 1995: 308; R. Brown 1970: 917; Schnackenburg

1990: 3.270; and Moloney 1998: 502, 506. Carson (1991: 609), who says that the omission is due to John's desire to further highlight Jesus' willing obedience to the Father, dismisses as unduly speculative the view that the omission is part of a polemic against the theory that Simon of Cyrene was himself crucified (contra Beasley-Murray 1999: 345). Barrett (1978: 548) proposes that the omission is due to the evangelist's effort to highlight the "all-sufficiency of Jesus ... in effecting the redemption of the world." Beasley-Murray (1999: 345 [cf. Borchert 2002: 261; R. Brown 1970: 917–18; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270]) suggests that the omission serves to create an allusion to Isaac carrying the wood for his sacrifice.

17 So, for example, Ridderbos 1997: 608; Beasley-Murray 1999: 346; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270; Moloney 1998: 502; Schlatter 1948: 348; Westcott 1908: 2.308.

36 See Repond 1922; Dalman 1928–39: 5.126–29. Josephus notes that the high priestly robe (χιτών, chitōn) was "not composed of two pieces, ... [but] one long woven cloth" (Ant. 3.7.4 §161; cf. Exod. 28:31; Rev. 1:13), while Philo uses a robe as symbolic of the Logos, which binds all things together in unity (Flight 20 §§110–12). However, it is far from certain whether the present passage alludes to the high-priestly garment (or the unity of the church, for that matter) (so, rightly, Carson 1991: 614; contra Moloney 1998: 503, 507). Carson (1991: 614–15) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 347–48), following Schnackenburg (1990: 3.274), see in the preservation of the seamless tunic an allusion to the Father's preservation of the Son; Carson also sees a connection with the footwashing.

46 Many view the "disciple Jesus loved" as an ideal disciple, often in conjunction with the "ideal faith" of Jesus' mother (e.g., Moloney 1998: 503–4; but see the dissenting voice of Carson 1991: 618; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 614–15). Witherington (1995: 310) suggests that these two unnamed individuals are models for potential disciples to follow. Ridderbos (1997: 613) has an extensive discussion of Mary and the "disciple Jesus loved" as representatives of the new community that is established with the death of Jesus.

50 Though not necessarily in allusion to 1:11, where the identical phrase is found (see Carson 1991: 617 n. 2; Moloney 1998: 503–4).

75 So R. Brown 1970: 952–53; Moloney 1998: 509. Beasley-Murray (1999: 355) suggests that the source of the Fourth Gospel was alluding to Passover typology, while the evangelist is alluding to the righteous sufferer of Ps. 34. Somewhat ironically, Barrett (1978: 558) proposes the exact converse: the source is alluding to the Psalms typology, while the evangelist is alluding to Passover typology. Ridderbos (1997: 622–23) opts for the Psalms typology but denies the Passover allusion.

1 On the structure of John 20, see the discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 3.301–2. See also Beasley-Murray 1999: 367–70; Moloney 1998: 517; Borchert 2002: 289; R. Brown 1970: 995–96. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.321) considers 20:11–18 to be a "prelude" to 20:19–29. Borchert (2002: 289–90, 296) perceives in 20:1–18 an "envelope effect or sandwich pattern" whereby the narratives involving Mary have been framed around 20:3–10, with the statement about the beloved disciple in 20:8 serving as the focal point of this chapter. Moloney (1998: 515–16) finds an inclusio between 1:35–51 and chapter 20.

2 Cf. Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; cf. 1 Cor. 15:4; see Carson 1991: 635. The expression "on the first day of the week" reads more literally, "on one of the Sabbath [week]" and may allude to the week of creation (cf. Gen. Rab. 11.9 on Gen. 2:3). Morris (1991: 733 n. 7 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. a]) notes that σαββάτων (sabbatōn) can mean either "Sabbath" or "week" (contra R. Brown [1970: 980], who claims that the meaning "week" emerged only later).

The use of the cardinal numeral (“one”) for the ordinal (“first”) may represent a Semitism (Barrett 1978: 562; cf. Morris 1995: 733 n. 6; Beasley-Murray 1999: 366; Moloney 1998: 521; Lindars 1972: 599).

3 Often, though not always, in John, darkness connotes evil or unbelief (see 1:5; 8:12; 9:4; 11:10; 12:35, 46; 13:30). It is not clear that it does so here (contra Maccini 1996: 208; Carson 1991: 635–36; Borchert 2002: 291; R. Brown 1970: 981; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.308; Moloney 1998: 518).

4 Carson (1991: 635–36 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 371]) suggests that Mary was alone during her first trip to the tomb (contra Morris 1995: 734; Moloney 1998: 522; Witherington 1995: 323; Burge 2000: 553). Mary’s witness was not used as significantly in the preaching of the early church as that of Peter, doubtless because evidence provided by a woman was held in lesser esteem (e.g., m. Roš Haš. 1.8). This is underscored by the fact that Jesus’ encounter with Mary is not included in the resurrection appearances to the disciples cited in 21:14.

12 Carson (1991: 636) rightly notes that Mary’s use of κύριος (kyrios, lord, master) here does not constitute a christological confession and that she simply spoke “better than she knew” (cf. Moloney 1998: 521; contra R. Brown 1970: 984).

14 Cf. Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:1; Luke 24:10. See R. Brown 1970: 984. Contra Bultmann (1971: 684 n. 1), who suggests that the term is an Oriental idiom. Also contra Moloney (1998: 518–19), who claims that the term suggests that Mary is being associated with the two disciples.

17 This is disputed by Brodie (1993: 561), who says that the beloved disciple is “in better running order,” which he takes to be symbolic of superior discipleship (though on p. 564 he sees both disciples as symbolic of the unity achieved through faith in the ascending Christ). Beasley-Murray (1999: 371–72) contends that the beloved disciple’s speed was due to the extent of his love for Jesus; Moloney (1998: 522) suggests that he had stronger faith that a miracle had occurred. Yet others have seen in this statement an affirmation of John’s superiority over Peter (e.g., Schnackenburg 1990: 3.310, 312; Moloney 1998: 520; R. Brown 1970: 1004–7). More likely, however, both the beloved disciple and Peter are presented here as a duo of eyewitnesses to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 632; Carson 1991: 636–37; Bultmann 1971: 684).

20 Contra Moloney (1998: 520), who suggests that the participle ἐντετυλιγμένον (entetyligmenon, rolled up) is a divine passive.

22 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 637; Barrett 1978: 563; Morris 1995: 735; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.311; Moloney 1998: 523. Carson also suggests that the fact that the graveclothes were still in the tomb is intended to create a contrast with Lazarus, who left the tomb with his graveclothes on (11:44) (cf. Barrett 1978: 563; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.311; Beasley-Murray 1999: 372; Moloney 1998: 519–20).

23 In this he compares favorably with Thomas later in this chapter (Moloney 1998: 538; see commentary at 20:24–29). Ridderbos (1997: 633 n. 15 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Beck 1997: 117–18]) suggests that ἐπίστευσεν (episteusen, he believed) is an ingressive aorist. He also contrasts Mary’s reaction (concern that the body had been stolen) with that of the beloved disciple (faith).

10 Moloney (1998: 525) notes that at previous instances Mary referred to those whom she believed to have taken Jesus’ body in the third person (“they” [20:2, 13]); now she addresses Jesus directly in the second person (“you”).

570, 571, 572, 572n7, 573, 574n16, 577, 577n1, 578, 579n6, 582, 590n15, 604n21
Montgomery, J. A. 47n91

7 See commentary at 14:27; 16:33. So Beasley-Murray 1999: 379; Carson 1991: 647; Witherington 1995: 339–40; Moloney 1998: 530.

16 The critique by Hatina (1993), who says that the reference is to the indwelling Paraclete, fails to convince. Contrary to the view of many commentators, the present pericope does not constitute the Johannine equivalent to Pentecost (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1038; Barrett [1978: 570], who says that the present passage cannot be harmonized with Acts 2; Bultmann 1971: 691), nor is Calvin's (1961: 205) proposal satisfactory that at 20:22 the disciples "were only sprinkled with His grace and not [as at Pentecost] saturated with full power." Beasley-Murray (1999: 382 [followed by Borchert 2002: 307–8]) believes that John telescoped the giving of the Spirit without concern for chronology (citing the reference to the ascension in 20:17 as a parallel). M. Turner (1977) thinks that the reference is not to the Spirit at all but to Jesus' message as Spirit and life. The treatment by Moloney (1998: 532, 535) is rather idiosyncratic. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.325), too, surprisingly contends that the Johannine instance involves all believers, while the events in Acts 2 pertain to the apostles. If anything, one might have expected the opposite kind of reasoning, with John's account anticipating the general outpouring narrated in Acts 2. Against the view of Burge (2000: 558 [cf. Burge 1987: 148–49]), who notes the connection between the present passage and Jesus' promise to send the Spirit in John 14 and 16, the present event does not mark the actual fulfillment of these promises other than by way of anticipatory sign. Keener's (2003: 1196–1200, see also 1204–6) discussion, including an attempted refutation of M. Turner (1998), remains inconclusive and, on the whole, fails to convince.

1 The present unit is introduced by δέ (de, and, but), perhaps creating a contrast between Thomas and the disciples in the previous narrative (Moloney 1998: 538). The existence of the Twelve is in this Gospel presupposed rather than explicitly narrated (see commentary at 6:67; see also the brief excursus in Borchert 2002: 311). The reference to Thomas's designation "the twin" hardly constitutes an allusion to his double-mindedness (so, rightly, Borchert 2002: 312; cf. R. Brown 1970: 1024; Bultmann 1971: 694 n. 2). Lee (1995: 43, citing Robert Alter) notes that "absence is a favourite literary device of this narrator."

6 So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 647) and most major commentators (e.g., Morris 1995: 753; Witherington 1995: 344; Carson 1991: 657; Moloney 1998: 537; Barrett 1978: 572; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.332; contra Borchert 2002: 314; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

15 Cf. 1 John 2:14, 18; in John 13:33, the word for "children" is τεκνία (teknia). However, understanding this as a familiar reference must be tempered with placing it in the larger context of first-century teacher-disciple relationships (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 660; Moloney 1998: 552, with further reference to 1 John). On this topic, see Köstenberger 1998a: 119–26.

21 Similarly, Morris (1995: 775), who vaguely refers to "people respected in the church who knew the facts of the case." Osborne (1981: 327, following Dodd) favors "the community as a whole as separate from the author of the epilogue." Moloney (1998: 562) focuses more on the way in which the "we" of 21:24 "involves [later] generations of Christian readers who know that this witness is true and who can give witness to their own belief."

91 For the translation "true grace" I am indebted to R. Edwards (1988: 11, following R. Brown 1966: 16, with further reference to Montgomery 1939; Kuyper 1964), who notes that the Hebrew Vorlage hesed wa-emet constitutes a hendiadys meaning "faithful (or enduring) love." Edwards (ibid.) rightly cautions that John's appropriation of these OT expressions must be allowed to have a “fresh nuance”: “The Old Testament symbols of God’s gracious acts have been appropriated and Christianized.”

2 See the recent paper by O’Day (2002), who says that the abandonment of the apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel has “created space” for new readings of the Gospel. Others, however, view the results of the rejection of the apostolic authorship of John’s Gospel in less positive terms. In any case, the summary way in which Johannine authorship is regularly dismissed in contemporary scholarship is without justification, for this theory of authorship has never been definitively refuted (Köstenberger 2001b: 17–47). Though only a theory, it continues to be a possible and, I would argue, eminently plausible hypothesis based on both external and internal evidence (see, e.g., Carson 1991: 68–81; Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 138–57; and the discussion below).

17 One tricky piece of evidence concerns the second-century writer Papias (cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.4–5), a contemporary of Polycarp, who, in turn, was a disciple of the apostle John (on the date of Papias, see Yarbrough 1983; Munck 1959). Papias (at least to Eusebius) seems to refer to two separate Johns, the apostle and a “John the elder.” On this basis some have conjectured that the latter, rather than the former, wrote the Fourth Gospel. However, there is no need to drive a wedge between the two references to John in the passage in question. To the contrary, John may be designated “the elder” in the latter part of the quotation precisely because he is grouped with the elders mentioned earlier in the same passage. For a sound critique of the “John the elder” hypothesis, see Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 141–43. Keener (2003: 95–98) likewise challenges the reliability of Eusebius’s interpretation of Papias, owing to the former’s agenda of seeking to denigrate the Apocalypse. Keener (2003: 102–3) also includes an insightful discussion of the plausibility of John writing the Gospel at an advanced age. See also the works cited in Bauckham 1993: 27 n. 17 and the important essay by Hill (1998), who adduces from Eusebius’s (Hist. eccl. 3.24.5–13, esp. 11) reference to Papias (without naming him) that Papias held John the apostle to be the author of the Fourth Gospel (contra Bauckham 1993; Hengel 1989a; note my review of Hengel’s more extensive 1993 German monograph on the subject, Köstenberger 1996). For studies of the external evidence regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, see Bauckham 1993: 24 n. 1.

29 But note the “interlocking traditions” enumerated in Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 161–62. See also the internal evidence for John’s awareness of Synoptic tradition, if not one or more of the written Gospels, listed in Köstenberger 1999a: 36–37 (1:40: Andrew, “Simon Peter’s brother”; 3:24: “This was before John [the Baptist] was put in prison”; 4:44: a prophet is without honor in his own country [cf. Mark 6:4 pars.]; 11:1–2: Bethany, “village of Mary and her sister Martha” [cf. Luke 10:38–42]; 6:67, 71: the Twelve; Judas, “one of the Twelve”).

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’ ” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός,

Morgan-Wynne, J. E. 260

Morgenthaler, R. 245, 246

Morris, L. xii, 1n2, 2n5, 7n17, 8n20, 17n29, 20n5, 25, 27, 29, 29n31, 30, 31n37, 33, 34, 35, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

75 For a very thorough and definitive demonstration that the notion of Jesus as the “only begotten” of the Father is foreign to Johannine thought and was read into the Gospel only later during the patristic period, see Pendrick 1995. Among other pieces of evidence, Pendrick cites ancient references where μονογενής is applied to an only child who was not the only begotten, “for the father might have begotten other children who died young and so the preservation of his name rests on the only surviving son” (p. 590). In light of the high infant mortality rate in the ancient world, Pendrick notes that “there must have been many only children who were not the only ones begotten by their parents” (p. 590 n. 23). See also Moody 1953: 213–19 and W. O. Walker 1994: 41 n. 37 (though when Walker contends that “the Greek of 1.14 does not include υἱός with μονογενής,” he overlooks that “son” surely is implied in the term μονογενής, both semantically and by virtue of the juxtaposition with “from the Father”).

2 See the recent paper by O’Day (2002), who says that the abandonment of the apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel has “created space” for new readings of the Gospel. Others, however, view the results of the rejection of the apostolic authorship of John’s Gospel in less positive terms. In any case, the summary way in which Johannine authorship is regularly dismissed in contemporary scholarship is without justification, for this theory of authorship has never been definitively refuted (Köstenberger 2001b: 17–47). Though only a theory, it continues to be a possible and, I would argue, eminently plausible hypothesis based on both external and internal evidence (see, e.g., Carson 1991: 68–81; Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 138–57; and the discussion below).

5 The essays on history and theology in the Fourth Gospel and on the question of the Fourth Gospel’s authorship by Morris (1969: 65–292) still repay careful study. For an interesting application of Clement’s statement, see Thielman 1991: 183 in the context of his entire article. The reference to Clement’s Hypotyposeis is found in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14. See also Thompson (2002: 2), who rightly notes, “Whatever Clement meant in calling John ‘a spiritual Gospel,’ it is doubtful that he meant to contrast ‘facts’ in the modern sense and ‘interpretation.’ ... [A] ‘spiritual’ Gospel gives the inner meaning of an event or reality and, hence, its truth must be spiritually discerned.” Thompson rightly maintains that “the modern view” that calls into question the historicity of any item in John that “stands in the service of his theological or interpretive agenda” constitutes “a very strange way to imagine that theology works, and perhaps could only have been thought of by people actually not doing theology.” Thompson (2002: 3) proceeds to call for greater sophistication in biblical scholars’ philosophy of history. Carson

(1991: 29) similarly disavows attributing to Clement a dichotomy between “spiritual” and “historical”; he suggests that “spiritual” may mean “allegorical” or “symbol-laden.”

17 One tricky piece of evidence concerns the second-century writer Papias (cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.4–5), a contemporary of Polycarp, who, in turn, was a disciple of the apostle John (on the date of Papias, see Yarbrough 1983; Munck 1959). Papias (at least to Eusebius) seems to refer to two separate Johns, the apostle and a “John the elder.” On this basis some have conjectured that the latter, rather than the former, wrote the Fourth Gospel. However, there is no need to drive a wedge between the two references to John in the passage in question. To the contrary, John may be designated “the elder” in the latter part of the quotation precisely because he is grouped with the elders mentioned earlier in the same passage. For a sound critique of the “John the elder” hypothesis, see Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 141–43. Keener (2003: 95–98) likewise challenges the reliability of Eusebius’s interpretation of Papias, owing to the former’s agenda of seeking to denigrate the Apocalypse. Keener (2003: 102–3) also includes an insightful discussion of the plausibility of John writing the Gospel at an advanced age. See also the works cited in Bauckham 1993: 27 n. 17 and the important essay by Hill (1998), who adduces from Eusebius’s (Hist. eccl. 3.24.5–13, esp. 11) reference to Papias (without naming him) that Papias held John the apostle to be the author of the Fourth Gospel (contra Bauckham 1993; Hengel 1989a; note my review of Hengel’s more extensive 1993 German monograph on the subject, Köstenberger 1996). For studies of the external evidence regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, see Bauckham 1993: 24 n. 1.

20 Very few would argue for a date prior to A.D. 70, as do J. A. T. Robinson 1976: 254–85 (but see the refutation in Kerr 2002: 19–25; see also Carson 1991: 82–86); Morris 1995: 25–30 (with reference to Cribbs 1970; Torrey 1936: x–xi); and Wallace 1990 (but see the present commentary at 5:2). However, the cumulative weight of the following internal evidence must be judged to favor a post–A.D. 70 date (cf. Croteau 2003): the references to the Sea of Tiberias in 6:1 and 21:1; Thomas’s confession of Jesus as “my Lord and my God” in 20:28 (contra emperor worship in time of Domitian?); the reference to Peter’s martyrdom (21:19); and the lack of reference to the Sadducees (Schlatter 1948: 44; though see the caution in Carson 1991: 84)—not to mention the comparative ease with which the Fourth Evangelist equates Jesus with God (e.g., 1:1, 14; 10:30; 20:28; see Carson 1991: 85, though note his caveats on p. 84) or external evidence such as Clement of Alexandria’s statement, cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7, “Last of all, John, perceiving that the external facts had been made plain [in the Synoptics] ... composed a spiritual gospel.” This is true especially since the major pieces of evidence cited in support of a pre–A.D. 70 date—the lack of reference to the destruction of the temple and the use of a present-tense verb in 5:2 to refer to the Sheep Gate pool—are not determinative and are capable of alternative explanations (see, e.g., Schlatter 1948: 23–24).

29 But note the “interlocking traditions” enumerated in Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 161–62. See also the internal evidence for John’s awareness of Synoptic tradition, if not one or more of the written Gospels, listed in Köstenberger 1999a: 36–37 (1:40: Andrew, “Simon Peter’s brother”; 3:24: “This was before John [the Baptist] was put in prison”; 4:44: a prophet is without honor in his own country [cf. Mark 6:4 pars.]; 11:1–2: Bethany, “village of Mary and her sister Martha” [cf. Luke 10:38–42]; 6:67, 71: the Twelve; Judas, “one of the Twelve”).

5 Morris (1995: 64) calls it “elevated prose.” For a recent treatment of the Johannine prologue dealing with these and other questions, see MacLeod 2003: 48–64. For a discussion of the structure of the prologue, see Keener 2003: 334–37 (but Keener’s [2003: 337] own tentative proposal—a three-stanza structure omitting the Baptist verses [1:6–8, 15]—is hardly convincing).

31 So the majority of commentators, including Morris 1995: 66; Carson 1991: 137; Haenchen 1984: 1.113–14; Schnackenburg 1970: 1.239–40; Barrett 1978: 156–57; and Schlatter 1948: 5–6. Among the translations that construe ὁ γέγονεν with what precedes are the NASB, NIV, NKJV, ISV, NLT, HCSB, ESV, and TNIV.

37 “Overcome” or an equivalent is favored also by Morris 1995: 76; Moloney 1998: 36; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.245–46; Laney 1992: 39; Lindars 1972: 87; Schlatter 1948: 9 (“καταλαμβάνω never means ‘understand’ in John”); and Westcott 1908: 1.9–10. Carson (1991: 138) thinks that John might have both meanings (“overcome” and “comprehend”) in mind (so also Whitacre 1999: 53) and likes the ambiguity in BAGD’s translation, “master” (see BDAG 520). Keener (2003: 387) believes that John’s use of κατέλαβεν in 1:5 is an instance of traductio, a play on the multiple meanings of a word (here “comprehend” and “overcome”). Keener notes that the word occurs in Wis. 7:30 but admits that there the term clearly means “overcome” and no wordplay is present. Burge (2000: 56) agrees that both are at work, but he sees “overcome” as being dominant. Calvin (1959: 12) translates “comprehend.” The major translations divide more or less evenly between the two options, usually mentioning the one not chosen in a footnote: (1) NIV: “understood”; NASB, NKJV: “comprehend”; (2) NLT: “extinguish”; NET: “mastered”; ISV: “put out”; HCSB, ESV, NRSV: “overcome.” Notably, the TNIV changed the NIV’s “understood” to “overcome.”

51 Barrett (1978: 162) sees only one sense of κόσμος in this verse. Morris (1995: 85) contends that the first two instances refer to everyone, while the third reference is to those who came in contact with Jesus. Beasley-Murray (1999: 12) sees a progression from “the world inhabited by humankind” in 1:10a to “the world including human beings” in 1:10b to “humanity, fallen and in darkness” in 1:10c. Carson (1991: 123) demonstrates that the word κόσμος never has a positive usage (contra Burge 2000: 57) and only a few neutral ones.

54 This is the view of, among others, Carson 1991: 125; Dodd 1953: 402; R. Brown 1966: 10; Morris 1995: 85; Borchert 1996: 114; Burge 2000: 59. For a demonstration that 1:11, properly interpreted and understood (particularly the world as God’s property), refutes the notion, advanced by Bultmann, that John reflects gnostic thought, see Jervell 1956: 17–18. But see also the interaction with Jervell in Pryor 1990: 210–14.

66 While some see the tabernacle parallel (see Exod. 35–40), others look to the tent of meeting in Exod. 33 (Morris 1995: 92) or the exodus in general (Beasley-Murray 1999: 14).

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’ ” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

77 The antecedent of πλήρης (plērēs, full) is subject to debate. If declinable, it refers to ὁ λόγος (R. Brown 1966: 14; Morris 1995: 94). If indeclinable, it should be taken with δόξαν (Carson 1991: 129) or αὐτοῦ, as is perhaps most likely (so BDAG 827; Ridderbos 1997: 54 n. 117). In any case, fullness of grace and truth is predicated of Jesus.

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

12 The emphatic pronoun ἐγώ adds further firmness to the Baptist’s denial (Barrett 1978: 172; Morris 1995: 117; Bultmann 1971: 88). Morris (1995: 117) renders the sense well: “It is not I who am the Christ.”

24 So Ridderbos 1997: 66 n. 10; Morris 1995: 122; Carson 1991: 144; Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292; contra R. Brown 1966: 44; Moloney 1998: 52. While thus the delegation included some Pharisees, this does not mean that the Pharisees were responsible for sending out the delegation, since the Sadducees had a majority on the Sanhedrin (Carson 1991: 144). This is true especially if an article is to be added (or implied) before ἀπεσταλμένοι (Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Barrett 1978: 174; R. Brown 1966: 43–44; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292). Ἀπεσταλμένοι ἦσαν (apestalmenoi ēsan, they had been sent) is a periphrastic pluperfect (Wallace [1996: 586] calls it “consummative”).

26 Cf. Mark 1:2–5; Matt. 3:1–10; Luke 3:3–14. So Morris 1995: 123; Beasley-Murray 1999: 24; Carson 1991: 145–46; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.293.

34 The sense of ἐρχόμενον (erchomenon, coming) is that of John seeing Jesus coming toward him, though not for the first time. John 1:26 and 1:32–33 suggest that John had already recognized Jesus’ true identity (Morris 1995: 126). Ἴδε (ide, look) indicates recognition; ὁ ἀμνός (ho amnos, the lamb) and its appositive represent a nominative of exclamation (Wallace 1996: 59–60), with the article preceding ἀμνός pointing to a one-of-a-kind substantive (a “monadic” article; Wallace 1996: 223–24).

35 A genitive of source. Alternatively, it may be a genitive of possession (“belonging to God”; see discussions in Morris 1995: 127; R. Brown 1966: 55). For a general survey of John’s teaching on Jesus as the lamb of God, see Marshall, DJG 432–34. See also the survey of various interpretive options by Keener (2003: 452–54), who cites the apocalyptic lamb (judged unlikely), the language of the suffering servant (probable allusion to Isa. 53), and the sacrificial Passover lamb (considered primary).

38 For a thorough discussion of several additional alternatives, see Morris 1995: 127–29; see also Barrett 1978: 176; Ridderbos 1997: 73–74.

43 The reference to a previous statement is a recurring stylistic feature in this Gospel (Schlatter [1948: 50] cites 3:26, 28; 4:54; 5:33; 7:21; 8:24; 11:37; 13:33; 15:20; 18:9, 14, 32; 21:14). The statement is largely unchanged from 1:15 and 1:27, though the context is now Jesus’ actual appearance (Ridderbos 1997: 75; Morris 1995: 132). The form of the verbs has been changed from participles to indicatives, enabling the author to stress the reality of the thought more forcefully (Morris 1995: 132). The inference that John includes this statement as a polemic against elements elevating the Baptist over Jesus in the evangelist’s day (Beasley-Murray 1999: 25) is unnecessary.

46 “I have seen” (τεθέαμαι, tetheamai) is in the perfect, indicating the settledness of John’s conviction (Carson 1991: 151). Less likely, the perfect points to the permanent effects of John’s encounter with the Christ (Morris 1995: 132–33; R. Brown 1966: 56). Morris (1995: 133 n. 72) thinks that John’s use of a different verb for seeing may be a mere instance of stylistic variation. More likely, θεάομαι in John conveys a more pronounced note of perception than other “seeing” verbs. This is borne out by all instances of θεάομαι in this Gospel: 1:14, 32, 38; 4:35; 6:5; 11:45.

47 The question of whether ἐξ οὐρανοῦ (ex ouranou, from heaven) should be related to καταβαῖνον (katabainon, descend) or περιστεράν (peristeran, dove) (discussed by Morris 1995: 133 n. 73) is ultimately an academic issue with little consequence. Wallace (1996: 223) considers the article with πνεῦμα (pneuma, Spirit) as an instance of a par excellence usage.

51 Note also the emphatic pronoun ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, that one) in the original (Morris 1995: 134 n. 77).

58 Note that there is no Johannine equivalent to the Synoptic accounts of Jesus choosing the twelve apostles (Morris 1995: 136).

61 See the discussions in Morris 1995: 137; R. Brown 1966: 78; Carson 1991: 154; Barrett 1978: 180. See also comments on the term μένω (menō, stay) at 1:39.

65 Carson (1991: 156–57) points out that the primary support for the Roman time-reckoning theory comes from Pliny the Elder, who notes that Roman authorities (like Egyptian ones) counted the official civil day from midnight to midnight—for example, in cases of leases and other documents that expired at day’s end. But Pliny himself says that “common people everywhere” conceive of the day as running “from dawn to dark” (Natural History 2.188). See also the discussion in Morris 1995: 138 n. 91.

68 Bultmann’s claim (1971: 100; accepted by Brodie 1993: 160) that “tenth hour” is the “hour of fulfillment” is very questionable. R. Brown (1966: 75) suggests that if the day was Friday, the disciples had to stay until Saturday evening in order to properly observe the Sabbath.

Alternatively, the disciples stayed overnight because of the nature of the desired conversation. If so, this could refer to any day during the week (Morris 1995: 139; cf. Burge 2000: 76).

78 See Cullmann, TDNT 6:100–101; Borchert 1996: 143–44; Burge 2000: 76; Morris 1995: 140.

82 On ἀκολουθέω, see commentary at 1:37. Philip is the only true example of a “call” in this Gospel (Morris 1995: 136); note also the Synoptic parallels. Morris (1995: 142) notes that the use here of the present tense of ἀκολουθέω points to a continuous action.

85 In Jesus’ day, the term “Galilee” was used with reference to the territory east of the Jordan River (Carson 1991: 158; cf. Barrett 1978: 183; R. Brown 1966: 82; Morris 1995: 143 n. 100). After the beginning of the Jewish war in A.D. 66, apparently the entire region around the lake was called Galilee. If this is correct, John here follows contemporary usage (Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. k).

89 The identification of Nathanael with Bartholomew is favored by Ridderbos 1997: 87–88; Morris 1995: 143; Carson 1991: 159; Burge 2000: 77; contra Barrett 1978: 184; R. Brown 1966: 82; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.314. Barrett (1978: 179, 184) conjectures that the meaning of the name “Nathanael,” “God has given,” indicates that he represents an “ideal disciple” and that the passage should be interpreted allegorically. Somewhat along similar lines, Witherington (1995: 71) suggests that Nathanael’s name implies that the disciples are the Father’s gift to Jesus. It seems, however, that these kinds of conjectures leave the realm of well-founded exegesis and veer into the sphere of ultimately unverifiable speculation (see the critiques by Morris [1995: 143] and Carson [1991: 159], both of whom defend Nathanael’s and the event’s historicity). Hanhart (1970: 24–25) identifies Nathanael as Matthew; Hill (1997) somewhat cautiously advances the theory that Nathanael is identical with James of Alphaeus (cf. Epistle to the Apostles 2 [second century A.D.]).

97 Morris (1995: 145) suggests that the reason for this approach was Philip’s ineptitude.

102 Carson (1991: 161) notes, “Since Jesus is about to tell him of greater visions that will be his (1:50–51), there may also be an allusion to the popular etymology that related ‘Israel’ to ʾiš rōʾeh ʾēl, ‘the man who sees God’ ” (cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.66 §186; similarly, Morris 1995: 148 n. 117). On Jacob traditions in nonbiblical Jewish sources, see Neyrey 1982; Rowland 1984.

105 C. Koester 1990a: 23–34; cf. Barrett 1978: 185; Nicklas (2000b: 201–2) is less than convinced. Other commentators consider the reference to be incidental, intended to show merely that Jesus “knew” Nathanael prior to their actual encounter (Ridderbos 1997: 90; cf. Burge 2000: 78; R. Brown 1966: 83; Moloney 1998: 56; contra Morris 1995: 146; Witherington 1995: 71; Borchert 1996: 148; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.317). Keener (2003: 486), too, rejects any deeper significance in the identification, suggesting that the fig tree may be mentioned simply because a specific landmark was necessary for some reason. Witherington’s suggestion that Nathanael is being portrayed as an expert in the law who thus would know that the Messiah could not come from Nazareth seems far-fetched.

108 Wallace (1996: 257, 263–64) notes the presence of the definite article in the original before “Son of God” but not “king of Israel” and points out that this was the actual passage that triggered Colwell’s formulation of his famous rule. What Colwell concluded from the present passage is that the lack of the definite article need not indicate indefiniteness, given a certain syntax or word order. In other words, “king of Israel” (despite the lack of the article) is just as “definite” as “Son of God”; the reason why it has no article is that both expressions are governed by the article preceding “Son of God.” See also Morris 1995: 147 n. 114.

110 Morris 1995: 147; cf. Witherington 1995: 72; R. Brown 1966: 87; Borchert 1996: 148.

114 The perfect of ἀνοίγω (anoigō, open) suggests that heaven is in a state of openness (Morris 1995: 150).

88n122, 93, 95n26, 96n29, 97, 97n31, 98, 99, 99n36, 101, 104n9, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111n36, 114, 116, 117, 118, 120, 120n17, 121, 121n19, 122, 122n20, 123,

121 As Morris (1995: 148 n. 117) points out, this may be another reference to Nathanael as an “Israelite,” in the sense that the name “Israel” (first applied to Jacob) was commonly derived from the Hebrew for “the man seeing God.” Thus, Jacob was thought of as a prototypical man of vision, yet Nathanael would exceed his ancestor in the “greater things” that he would see as Jesus’ follower.

122 The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. 65, was published in 1998 by the Egypt Exploration Society (see pp. 12–13). Among commentators, “Chosen One of God” is favored by Morris 1995: 134; Carson 1991: 152; Burge 1987: 59–61; 2000: 74; Barrett 1978: 178; R. Brown 1966: 57; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.305. “Son of God” is the reading advocated by Bultmann 1971: 92–93 n. 6; Borchert 1996: 139; Ridderbos 1997: 77; Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. g; Laney 1992: 53 (though all prior to the discovery of P¹⁰⁶). Rodgers (1999: 304) prefers both (“This is the only, the chosen Son of God”), while Michaels (1989: 36) proposes that the Baptist spoke “Chosen One of God” (hence the MS tradition), which the evangelist interpreted as “Son of God.”

26 See also the lengthy note in Morris 1995: 159 n. 24.

29 Though this is denied by most commentators (e.g., Morris 1995: 160–61; Barrett 1978: 191; Carson 1991: 174; R. Brown 1966: 100; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.332).

31 So, for example, Ridderbos 1997: 107; Morris 1995: 162; Carson 1991: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 35; R. Brown 1966: 105; Kruse 2003: 94–95. Ridderbos (1997: 108) cites OT allusions to the abundance of wine in the new age (Gen. 49:11; Isa. 25:6; Amos 9:13–14; Jer. 31:12–14; see also Joel 3:18). Keener (2003: 512) suggests a (proleptic) connection between the abundant “measure” of water turned into wine in 2:6 and the unlimited provision of the Spirit in 3:34.

36 Beyond this, Morris (1995: 162) suggests that Jesus provided a magnificent gift to a needy couple, saving them from incurring a significant liability that they would not have been able to afford.

9 The phrase “Jewish Passover” has caused some controversy. Barrett (1978: 197) conjectures that the phrase may presuppose the existence of a Christian Passover at the time of writing (so, earlier, Westcott 1908: 1.89; cf. Borchert 1996: 162). Schnackenburg (1991: 1.345) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 39) suggest that the evangelist or the church had stopped participating in the Jewish Passover. Witherington (1995: 86–87) notes that the phrase indicates a certain distance between the author and Judaism and at least a partial Gentile audience (similarly, Morris 1995: 169). Carson (1991: 176) thinks that “Jewish” refers to the Jews of Judea in contrast to Galileans and Diaspora Jews.

36 Cf. Carson 1991: 177; 1984: 441; Morris 1995: 167; Laney 1992: 70; Westcott 1908: 1.96–97; Calvin 1959: 51; Köstenberger 1999a: 76–78. Carson (1991: 177, referring to Morris) notes that virtually all of John 1–5 (except for the sections on John the Baptist) is non-Synoptic material. Morris (1995: 167 n. 55) states that “there are practically no resemblances between the two narratives, apart from the central act”; only five words are shared. Other commentators holding this view are Luther, W. Hendriksen, and R. V. G. Tasker (Kreitzer 1998: 94).

17 Contra several commentators (Barrett 1978: 205; Moloney 1998: 91; R. Brown 1966: 130; Witherington 1995: 94; Burge 2000: 114; Carson 1995: 187 n. 8; Blomberg 1995: 6), “by night” is likely not symbolic in the sense that Nicodemus came from darkness to light, while Judas went from light to darkness (cf. 6:70–71; 12:4–8; 13:2, 26–30; 18:2–5)—a view held by R. Brown (1966: 130) and Auwers (1990). Wallace (1996: 123–24) overreaches when he finds in the genitive of time an indication of “the kind of time in which Nicodemus came to see the Lord.” Morris (1995: 187) suggests that John may have had more than one meaning in mind.

123n24, 123n26, 124, 125, 126, 126n34, 126n37, 129, 129n44, 129n46, 132, 133, 133n2, 134, 135, 135n7, 136, 137, 137n9, 137n10, 137n11, 138, 138n12, 139n15, 140, 145,

19 The iterative use of the present tense ποιεῖς points to Jesus’ continuing practice of performing “signs” (in Jerusalem; see Morris 1995: 188 n. 14; Wallace 1996: 521).

20 “See” and “enter” are roughly synonymous (Barrett 1978: 207; R. Brown 1966: 130; Morris 1995: 189)—an instance of the Johannine penchant for stylistic variation (Barrett 1978: 208).

24 Morris (1995: 190) proposes that rather than being obtuse, Nicodemus may have been wistful, choosing not to understand because he was unwilling to accept the implications of Jesus’ pronouncement.

26 Note in 3:5 the single Greek preposition governing both “water” and “spirit” (Ridderbos 1997: 127). Some have suggested that “born of water” refers to water baptism, be it John the Baptist’s or Christian baptism, or both (Schnackenburg 1990: 1.369; Barrett 1978: 203, 208–9; R. Brown 1966: 141–42; Ridderbos 1997: 127–28; Beasley-Murray 1999: 49; Michaels 1989: 57). But it would hardly have been meaningful for Jesus to inform Nicodemus that he must be baptized in order to go to heaven. Nothing in the context indicates that this is the case, and it is unlikely that Jesus would have expected Nicodemus already to have known this. Moreover, the emphasis here is on the Spirit’s activity, not on human ritual observance (Morris 1995: 193).

34 It may be too early in Jesus’ ministry for his disciples to be included (Carson 1991: 198–99; contra Ridderbos 1997: 134; Morris 1995: 196). Schnackenburg’s (1990: 1.376) solution, that Jesus’ statement is proleptic, looking “forward to the time when his disciples make his ‘testimony’ their own, as part of their preaching” (with reference to 3:22 and 9:4), likewise fails to convince. There is also no need to postulate that the “we” aligns Jesus with the OT prophets, reflects the Johannine community (Witherington 1995: 98; cf. Moloney 1998: 94), or denotes the church versus the synagogue (Barrett 1978: 211; Brodie 1993: 198).

37 Cf. Morris 1995: 196; Carson 1991: 199; R. Brown 1966: 132; Beasley-Murray 1999: 50; Witherington 1995: 98; Moloney 1998: 94; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.377; contra Barrett 1978: 212.

44 Contra Schnackenburg (1990: 1.399), who places heavy emphasis on the incarnation rather than the crucifixion. Morris (1995: 203) and others believe that both the incarnation and the crucifixion are in view.

46 Later significant uses of this term in John (some of which reveal Jesus’ commitment to keep his own from perishing) include 6:39; 10:28; 12:25; 17:12; 18:9 (cf. 3:36; 8:21, 24). See Hahn, NIDNTT 1:462–65; Morris 1965b: 146–49.

2 There is no need to believe that the present verses were dislodged from their context (Morris 1995: 208–9; contra R. Brown 1966: 154–55) or to suppose that the placement of this section after 3:1–21 indicates that the prior section pertains to the rite of baptism (so, rightly, Carson 1991: 209).

7 Morris (1995: 209) refers to “an unhurried period.”

9 It is not necessary to postulate that here the evangelist is addressing those who had remained followers of John the Baptist in his day (Carson 1991: 210; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 146; Morris 1995: 211; contra R. Brown 1966: 156; Barrett 1978: 219; Witherington 1995: 107; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.410).

10 The perfect participle δεδομένον (dedomenon, given) points to the permanence of the assignment (Morris 1995: 212).

146n15, 147n21, 148n25, 149n30, 150n34, 151, 155, 156, 158, 159n59, 160, 160n66, 162, 163, 164, 165, 165n83, 168, 169n7, 169n9, 169n11, 170n14, 170n16, 171n18, 172,

11 Note the emphatic expression “you yourselves” (Morris 1995: 212). Schlatter (1948: 107) notes how closely οὐκ (ouk, not) is linked to εἰμί (eimi, I am) in 3:28.

12 Jesus calls himself “the bridegroom” in Matt. 9:15 pars. For the role of the bridegroom’s friend, see Gower 1987: 64–66; Zimmermann and Zimmermann 1999. Joy was the overriding theme at Jewish weddings; the verb πληρόω (plēroō, fulfill, complete) is associated with joy throughout this Gospel (Carson 1991: 211–12; Barrett 1978: 223). The Baptist’s words χαρᾷ χαίρει (chara chairei, lit., rejoices with joy), a Hebraism (χαρᾷ is a cognate dative [Wallace 1996: 168–69]), serve to intensify the verb (Ridderbos 1997: 147 n. 132; Morris 1995: 213 n. 112).

15 “No one” in 3:32 is hyperbolic; cf. 3:33 and see the similar progression in 1:11–12 (Morris 1995: 216–17; Borchert 1996: 193; Ridderbos 1997: 150).

15 This represents the wide consensus of interpreters: see Ridderbos 1997: 153; Carson 1991: 215–16; Borchert 1996: 198–99; Beasley-Murray 1999: 59; Witherington 1995: 115; R. Brown 1966: 169; Morris 1995: 226; Barrett 1978: 230; Moloney 1998: 116, 120; Conway 1999: 105.

21 See Ridderbos 1997: 153; cf. Carson 1991: 217; Borchert 1996: 201; Morris 1995: 228; Burge 2000: 142.

25 See Carson 1991: 217; Witherington 1995: 120; Morris 1995: 228; Burge 2000: 142; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.424. As part of a series of putative “wisdom” parallels, Witherington (1995: 119) proposes that the Samaritan woman is depicted as the maidservant of Wisdom. I find this background reconstruction unconvincing.

30 See Maccini 1996: 131–44. Daube (1956: 375–82) argues that “do not associate with” specifically refers to Jews not sharing vessels with Samaritans (cf. NIV text and note at 4:9). However, no common utensils (such as the woman’s water jar) are specifically mentioned in 4:9. The explanatory aside, “For Jews have no dealings with [συγχεῖν] Samaritans,” probably is broader than the mere refusal to share drinking vessels (Ridderbos 1997: 154; Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. f; contra Carson 1991: 218; Borchert 1996: 203; Witherington 1995: 120; R. Brown 1966: 170; Morris 1995: 229; Barrett 1978: 232; Moloney 1998: 117, 121; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.425 n. 19).

34 Borchert (1996: 203) sees the “gift of God” as the realization of God’s promises; Morris (1995: 230) and Carson (1991: 218) identify it as eternal life, the latter with reference to the Torah (cf. R. Brown 1966: 176, 178–79); Schnackenburg (1990: 1.431) suggests that the gift is either the Holy Spirit or eternal life, or both; Burge (2000: 144) thinks that the reference is to the Spirit.

59 See Morris 1995: 242–43 n. 67 for other primary quotes.

66 Morris (1995: 243 n. 70) suggests that by the use of this term, the evangelist may wish to affirm the humanity of Jesus (cf. 5:12; 8:40; 9:11, 24; 10:33; 11:47, 50; 18:14, 17, 29; 19:5).

83 An implied contrast with the Roman emperor is favored in Morris 1995: 251 n. 98; Beasley-Murray 1999: 65; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 1.458. C. Koester (1990b: 678) contends that the Samaritans’ designation of Jesus as “Savior of the world” is part of the Johannine kingship theme, in contrast to the Jews’ disavowal of Jesus as their king in 19:15 (“We have no king but Caesar”). Koester also points to the Roman presence in Samaria as evidence for the countercultural nature of the Samaritans’ confession of Jesus (rather than the Roman emperor) as “Savior of the world” (pp. 678–79).

7 So Carson 1991: 234; Ridderbos 1997: 174–75; Morris 1995: 255; Borchert 1996: 219–20; Burge 2000: 152–53; Witherington 1995: 127; contra R. Brown 1966: 193; Barrett 1978: 245; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.471–75; Bultmann 1971: 205.

9 So Mead 1985: 71; Barrett 1978: 245; Witherington 1995: 128; Moloney 1998: 153; Bultmann 1971: 206; but see the cautious assessment by Carson 1991: 234. Morris (1995: 255), somewhat idiosyncratically, suggests that the man was a Jew.

11 So Carson 1991: 238; Morris 1995: 256; Borchert 1996: 219; R. Brown 1966: 190; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.465.

14 The imperfect ἤρώτα (ērōta, urged) points to the official’s determination (Ridderbos 1997: 175 n. 215; Morris 1995: 256). The urgency of the situation is further highlighted by the word ἤμελλεν (ēmellen, about to [Morris 1995: 256 n. 11]). “To come down” is a literal rendering of the Greek, for Capernaum was lower in elevation than Cana (see above and commentary at 4:51). Regarding the phrase “about to die,” see the references to the royal official’s son being “sick” (ἡσθένει, ēsthenei) in 4:46 and “having a fever” (ὁ πυρετός, ho pyretos) in 4:52.

16 The expression “child” indicates the close bond between father and son—a more emotional term than “son” in 4:47 (Morris 1995: 257; Moloney 1998: 153; Burge 2000: 158).

18 Note the threefold repetition of the fact that the son is “alive” (John 4:50, 51, 43), emphasizing that Jesus is able to give/restore life (Morris 1995: 259; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 73).

1 In light of the apparently abrupt reference to Jesus “crossing to the far shore of the Sea of Galilee” in 6:1 (ch. 5 has him in Jerusalem), it has been speculated that chapters 5 and 6 should be reversed (see Bultmann 1971: 209, 237; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.92); but see Carson 1991: 240; Morris 1995: 264; cf. Barrett 1978: 23–24; Borchert 1996: 250; and especially Ridderbos 1997: 183.

8 See Payne, ZPEB 3:460. “Jewish” festival, rather than pointing to a Gentile audience (Morris 1995: 265), indicates the “temporal and material distance that had developed at the time of the Gospel between the Christian church and the situation to which the story takes us” (Ridderbos 1997: 184). It was customary for Jews at any place and any elevation in Palestine to use the expression going “up” to Jerusalem.

9 See Carson 1991: 240. Bultmann (1971: 240) claims that the festival is Passover, based on his switching the order of John 5 and 6, but this is unlikely, since the evangelist clearly identifies Passover everywhere else in his Gospel. Also unlikely is Michaels’s (1989: 85) theory that the present pericope was transposed from Jesus’ first Passover in Jerusalem (cf. 2:23; 3:2). Many commentators choose to remain agnostic on which feast is in view (Keener 2003: 635), regarding its identity as either unknown (Ridderbos 1997: 184; Morris 1995: 265 n. 6) or of secondary interest (R. Brown 1966: 206), or both (Carson 1991: 241). Calvin (1959: 116) thinks that the feast probably is Pentecost.

13 A few commentators (Morris 1995: 265–66; Barrett 1978: 251; Moloney 1998: 171; R. Brown 1966: 206) think that προβατικῇ modifies κολυμβήθρα (kolymbēthra, pool); others think that the implied noun is “gate” (Carson 1991: 241; so also the TNIV).

23 Cf. 1:47–48; 4:17–18. So Barrett 1978: 254; Witherington 1995: 137; contra Morris 1995: 268 n. 18.

25 Εὐθέως (eutheōs, immediately), rare in John, stresses immediacy (Morris 1995: 269 n. 23; cf.

182n37, 182n39, 184, 184n44, 185, 186, 186n53, 187, 187n57, 187n58, 188n64, 188n66, 189, 190, 190n76, 190n77, 191, 191n81, 191n82, 191n85, 192, 192n87, 193n92, 194,

R. Brown 1966: 208).

29 Morris 1995: 269; Witherington 1995: 137. Puzzlingly, Moloney (1998: 172) concludes that the man's "obedience to the word of Jesus" "suggests that the man achieves a faith response."

34 Ridderbos 1997: 188; Carson 1991: 245; Morris 1995: 271; Culpepper 1983: 138; 1993: 204–5; contra Staley 1991: 63–64. The term ὑγιής (hygiēs, well, healthy) occurs five times in this chapter, six times total in John, and only five other times in the rest of the NT (Morris 1995: 271–72 n. 30).

36 Some (such as Bultmann [1971: 243]) view 5:14 as being in contradiction with 9:2–3 (see discussion in Ridderbos 1997: 188). Though the ailment in the present passage may be the result of specific personal sin, and that in John 9 may not, however, this merely illustrates that caution must be exercised in individual cases and that sweeping theories must be avoided (cf. Carson 1991: 246; Morris 1995: 272).

37 See Ridderbos 1997: 189 n. 14; Morris 1995: 272. Carson (1991: 246 n. 1) rightly cautions against a simplistic generalization of negated present imperative = command to stop doing something (though he acknowledges that this may be the force here). More accurately, the present imperative regularly stresses urgency (with reference to S. Porter 1989: 335ff.).

39 God's judgment: Ridderbos 1997: 189; Barrett 1978: 255; Gehenna or Hades: Beasley-Murray 1999: 74; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.98; eternal consequences: Morris 1995: 272; Witherington 1995: 139.

44 The imperfect Greek verbs in 5:16 and 5:18 (ἐδίωκον, ἐποίει, ἐζήτουν, ἔλυνεν, ἔλεγεν) indicate the permanent pattern of hostility (Morris 1995: 275). Schlatter (1948: 146) views Jesus' opponents' urgency as an indication that they feared he might seek to escape.

53 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Borchert 1996: 236; Moloney 1998: 174; Bultmann 1971: 245; Morris 1995: 274–75 n. 48 (referring to Odeberg 1968: 203), 277; Barrett 1978: 259; Keener 1999: 42–43. The use of ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, that one) for God "lays stress upon the separate divine Person" in contrast with υἱός (huios, son). Also stressed is the Son's inability to do anything apart from the Father (again in 5:30; see Moloney 1998: 178; Barrett 1978: 264).

57 The present tense forms φιλεῖ, δείκνυσιν, and ποιεῖ point to the habitual nature of the Father's love for the Son (Morris 1995: 278).

58 The ὑμεῖς in the final phrase in 5:20 is emphatic (Morris 1995: 278 n. 65; R. Brown 1966: 214) and "perhaps derogatory" (R. Brown 1966: 214).

64 In effect, this establishes Jesus' right to be worshiped (Carson 1991: 255) and amounts to a claim to deity (Morris 1995: 279).

66 So Carson 1991: 256; Moloney 1998: 183; Ridderbos 1997: 197; Morris 1995: 280; Beasley-Murray 1999: 76.

76 The rendering "not valid" (rather than "not true," indicating a courtroom setting) is suggested by Carson (1991: 259) and Morris (1995: 287) (contra Ridderbos 1997: 202).

77 Note the preponderance of emphatic first-person Greek pronouns in this section (5:30, 31, 34, 36, 43, 45; see Morris 1995: 286).

81 That "another" refers to God the Father represents a broad consensus among commentators: so Ridderbos 1997: 202; Morris 1995: 288; Moloney 1998: 190; Beasley-Murray 1999: 78; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.121; Barrett 1978: 264; R. Brown 1966: 224.

82 "Have sent" and "have testified" are in the Greek perfect tense, indicating the settled condition resulting from the Baptist's witness to Jesus (cf. Barrett 1978: 264; Carson 1991: 260; Beasley-Murray 1999: 78; Morris 1995: 288; R. Brown 1966: 224; Wallace [1996: 577] calls this an "extensive perfect").

195n105, 195n108, 195n109, 195n110, 200, 201n11, 203n22, 204n28, 205, 205n32, 205n36, 206, 206n40, 207n44, 208, 208n50, 209, 210, 211, 211n59, 211n60, 211n61,

85 There may also be a hint at "burning up" in the sense that his witness was borne at a high personal cost (Morris 1995: 289), similar to Jesus being "consumed" by zeal for God (2:17).

87 See Köstenberger 1998b: 72–73. The term is repeated in 5:36 for emphasis (Morris 1995: 290).

92 See Kenyon 1939: 38 (cited in Morris 1995: 292 n. 118). See also b. Meg. 18b (cf. Köstenberger 2002c: 61–62).

105 The word πιστεύω (pisteuō, believe) is central, occurring four times in these two verses (see Morris 1995: 296–98).

108 So the majority of commentators, including Barrett 1978: 250–51; Carson 1991: 240; Morris 1995: 265 n. 6; R. Brown (1966: 206), who says that the evidence is "overwhelming"; Beasley-Murray 1999: 69 n. e; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.93.

109 Hengel (1999: 309) comments, "One should by all means read 'Bethesda' "; so also Carson 1991: 241; Morris 1995: 267; Witherington 1995: 137; Borchert 1996: 231; Moloney 1998: 171; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94; Schlatter 1948: 142; undecided are Ridderbos 1997: 185; R. Brown 1966: 206–7.

110 So Fee 1982 and the vast majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 185; Carson 1991: 242; Morris 1995: 267; Barrett 1978: 253; R. Brown 1966: 207; Beasley-Murray 1999: 70 n. h; Bultmann 1971: 241 n. 4; Borchert 1996: 232; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94–95.

11 See Carson 1991: 269; also R. Brown 1966: 233; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.15. Note the personal pronoun setting Jesus apart from Philip and the verbs ᾔδει (ēdei, he knew; indicating prior knowledge) and ἐμελλεν (emellen, he was about; conveying certainty not associated with simple future) (Morris 1995: 304 n. 16). Compare also the reference to Jesus' supernatural insight in 2:24.

22 The perfect participle βεβρωκόσιν (bebrōkosin, those who had eaten) may denote the sense of satisfaction provided by the meal (Morris 1995: 306 n. 27).

28 The imperfect ἦρχοντο (ērchonto) indicates that the disciples "were on their way" or that they were "trying to go" (Barrett 1978: 280; cf. Morris 1995: 308 n. 36; Moloney 1998: 203). Morris (1995: 309 n. 41), followed by Keener (2003: 673), suggests that the disciples were probably crossing not at the widest part of the lake but from the northeast to the northwest shores, the distance stated in 6:19 indicating that they were most of the way across the lake.

32 The use of the present tense adds a sense of vividness to the account (Morris 1995: 309).

36 For example, Michaels (1989: 107) observes, "The disciples wanted to take Jesus into the boat, but before they had a chance, they found themselves suddenly at their destination."

Ridderbos (1997: 218) rejects the idea; many commentators do not arrive at a definitive conclusion (e.g., Morris 1995: 310). The phrase "and at once" is found elsewhere in John in 5:9 and 18:27 (the closely related term εὐθύς [euthys] is found in 13:30, 32; 19:34).

40 Thus, in effect, "How long have you been here?" (Morris 1995: 316 n. 68; Barrett 1978: 286; R. Brown 1966: 261; Carson 1991: 283).

44 Carson (1991: 283) places the transition at 6:27. Morris (1995: 315) says the shift may have occurred as early as 6:25, but more likely "the discourse took place in stages, with only the concluding section in the synagogue.”

50 Carson 1991: 285; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 91; Barrett 1978: 288; R. Brown 1966: 265; Moloney 1998: 212. The personal pronoun σύ (sy, you) is emphatic, possibly suggesting that people doubt Jesus’ ability to furnish such a sign (Morris 1995: 321).

59 The significance of the shift from the aorist subjunctive πεινάσῃ (peinasē, hunger) to the future indicative διψήσῃ (dipsēsei, thirst) is unclear (noted by Morris 1995: 324 n. 100; Barrett [1978: 292–93] thinks that John’s use of the indicative is incorrect).

60 See discussion at 6:30. The second καί (kai, and) in 6:36 probably is adversative (so Barrett 1978: 293). The majority of commentators consider the word με (me, me) in 6:36 to be original (so Ridderbos 1997: 230 n. 120; Carson 1991: 289–90; Morris 1995: 325 n. 104; R. Brown 1966: 270; contra Barrett 1978: 293; Moloney 1998: 216; see also the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 85; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.46).

61 “Everything” (πάν, pan) in 6:37 and 6:39 is neuter, used in a qualitative, collective sense (R. Brown 1966: 270; Barrett 1978: 294; Borchert 1966: 265), though ultimately people (not things) are in mind (BDF §138.1, with specific reference to John 6:37; cf. Morris 1995: 325; Moloney 1998: 216).

66 The personal pronoun ἡμεῖς (hēmeis, we) may be emphatic, underscoring the certainty of people’s conviction (Morris 1995: 328). R. Brown (1966: 270) detects a degree of animosity in the pronoun οὗτος (houtos, this one) and translates it “this fellow.” Similarly, Westcott (1908: 233), who finds “perhaps a tinge of contemptuous surprise in the pronoun.”

72 So Ridderbos 1997: 235–37; cf. Carson 1991: 295; Morris 1995: 331–32; contra Moloney 1998: 223; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.55; Lindars 1972: 267; Talbert 1992: 140. As Keener (2003: 690) observes, “John’s words [in 6:27–63] invite his audience to look to Christ’s death itself, not merely those symbols which point to his death.” At best, any such overtones are derivative (Borchert 1996: 270–71; cf. Brodie 1993: 286; Calvin 1959: 170).

79 There is no reason to conclude, on the basis of the present tense participles in this verse, that this partaking is an act to be repeated (contra Ridderbos 1997: 243; Morris 1995: 336). The logic of this section rather seems to demand that partaking of Jesus’ flesh and blood is to be understood as an action that takes place once for all. Mutual indwelling ought not to be understood in egalitarian terms, as if Jesus and the believer were fulfilling equal roles. Jesus’ sacrifice is foundational, and the believer’s responsibility is the appropriation of this gift (Carson 1991: 298). Moreover, contrary to what might be expected, such mutual indwelling does not imply surrender of personality (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.63–64).

81 The consistent use of singular forms in contrast to the plural “the ancestors” may further accentuate the need for individuals to enter into right relationship with God through Jesus (Morris 1995: 337).

94 The absence of the article before πνεῦμα (pneuma, spirit) and ζωή (zōē, life) indicates the quality or essential nature of Jesus’ words (cf. 4:24). Ἐγώ (egō, I) may be emphatic (Barrett 1978: 305); the perfect λέλάληκα (lēlalēka, I have spoken), together with the plural ῥήματα (rhēmata, words), refers to the body of Jesus’ teaching in its totality. The repetition of the stative verb (ἐστίν, estin) establishes “spirit” and “life” as distinct concepts (Morris 1995: 341 n. 152).

95 Ridderbos 1997: 248; Carson 1991: 302; Morris 1995: 342; Barrett 1978: 305. Elsewhere in this Gospel, Jesus is shown to reiterate his earlier teaching: 8:24 (cf. 8:21); 15:20 (cf. 13:16); 16:15 (cf. 16:14).

221n100, 222, 230, 230n11, 230n13, 231, 232n23, 233, 233n26, 235, 236, 236n35, 236n36, 237, 238, 238n42, 240n53, 242, 242n70, 243, 243n71, 243n73, 244, 244n78,

97 Morris 1995: 342. For further reasons, see commentary at 6:60. On people's expectations of the Messiah, see John 7 and commentary there.

100 The absence of the article before "words" in 6:68 points generically to the nature of Jesus' words (Morris 1995: 344–45 n. 164).

11 Paraphrased, this may mean "You can go anywhere you please, any time you want; I cannot" (cf. Ridderbos 1997: 258–59). Only in the present context is the term καιρός (kairos, time) used to denote Jesus' (God-appointed) "time"; elsewhere the expression is ῥα, hōra (e.g., 2:4; see R. Brown 1966: 306; Carson 1991: 307–8; Morris 1995: 351–53).

13 The personal pronoun ἐμέ (eme, me) is emphatic (Morris 1995: 353 n. 20). The statement harks back to the evangelist's comments in 3:19–20 (Ridderbos 1997: 258–59; see, later, 7:19; 8:31–59; 9:39–41; 16:8–11).

23 Note that many in Jerusalem were pilgrims from places where Jesus had never been, so this was their first acquaintance with his teachings (Morris 1995: 359). A similar question is raised regarding Jesus' followers in Acts 4:13.

26 So Carson 1991: 312–13; R. Brown 1966: 316; Morris 1995: 360; Barrett 1978: 318; Kruse 2003: 185.

35 Ἑκραξεν (ekraxen, he cried out) denotes a loud shout (Morris 1995: 366), indicating a public, solemn pronouncement (Carson 1991: 318; Barrett 1978: 322) (cf. 1:15; 7:37; 12:44).

36 The καί (kai, but) preceding ἀπ' ἐμαυτοῦ (ap' emautou, on my own accord) is adversative (Ridderbos 1997: 268 n. 45; Barrett 1978: 323; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.147). The ἐγώ (egō, I) at the beginning of 7:29 is emphatic, set against the ὑμεῖς (hymeis, you) in 7:28 (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.147). The alternating use of two words meaning "send," πέμπω (pempō) and ἀποστέλλω (apostellō), in 7:28–29 represents stylistic variation (Morris 1995: 367 n. 58; Barrett 1978: 323; R. Brown 1966: 313).

42 This is the first occurrence of the frequent Johannine phrase indicating that Jesus will return to "him who sent me" (Ridderbos 1997: 271). The term ὑπάγω (hypagō, go) is favored by John (32 times, compared to 19 times in Matthew, 15 in Mark, and 5 in Luke; see Morris 1995: 369 n. 67; Moloney 1998: 250; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.476 n. 47). It is used seventeen times to refer to Jesus' departure to the Father.

53 Most commentators favor a time immediately following cessation of ceremonies on the eighth day (Carson 1991: 321; Morris 1995: 373, esp. n. 79; Barrett 1978: 326; Moloney 1998: 256; Schlatter 1948: 199). Some believe that Jesus' words fit better with the ceremonies of the seventh day (R. Brown 1966: 320; Bultmann 1971: 302 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.152; Ridderbos 1997: 272; Burge 2000: 227). On the water-drawing ceremony, see Keener 2003: 722–24.

70 For other times where Jesus' speech elicits similar responses, see Matt. 7:29; Mark 1:22; 12:17, 32–34, 37 pars.; John 4:42; cf. 18:6. The adverb οὕτως (houtōs, like this) focuses on the way Jesus spoke rather than on the substance of his teaching (Morris 1995: 382 n. 103).

71 Regarding "You have not been deceived as well, have you?" see commentary at 7:12. Note the perfect tense of πεπλάνησθε (peplanēsthe, you have been deceived) (Morris 1995: 382) as well as the passive voice, avoiding explicit reference to agency so as not to detract from the subject (i.e., the officers who are led astray) (Wallace 1996: 436). Carson (1991: 331) also sees irony in 7:48, for whatever one makes of Nicodemus, he is about to speak out on Jesus' behalf.

244n81, 253, 253n5, 254, 254n13, 255, 255n20, 256, 256n24, 257n29, 258n31, 258n32, 259, 259n42, 260, 260n47, 261n53, 262n58, 263, 264, 265, 266, 266n71, 266n74, 267,

73 See Ridderbos 1997: 279–80; Carson 1991: 331–32. Morris (1995: 383) adds that it is not that the people are (entirely) unfamiliar with the law, but that they do not “know” (observe) it the way the Pharisees do: keeping the 613 commandments and so forth.

78 Ridderbos (1997: 281 n. 81) again notes the introductory particle μή, which here indicates ridicule. Ἐραύνησον (eraunēson, search) is a conditional imperative, with the verb in the apodosis, ἴδε (ide, see), being another imperative (Wallace 1996: 489). The present tense of ἐγείρεται (egeiretai, he arises) states a (supposedly) timeless truth (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 281) rather than emphasizing presentness (Morris 1995: 385 n. 114). See also additional note. As to the brashness of the comment, cf. 11:49.

81 For further discussion of this issue, including bibliographic references, see Morris 1995: 385 n. 115. Motyer (1997: 154) suggests that the reference is to “the prophet” of Deut. 18:15.

5 So Morris 1995: 388; R. Brown 1966: 344; Burge 2000: 255; Moloney 1998: 268; Borchert 1996: 295.

13 Morris (1995: 389 n. 10 [similarly, Laney 1992: 159]) suggests the following possibilities: “gives life,” “is life,” “springs from life,” or “illuminates life.” Schnackenburg (1990: 2.191) adds that this may be an instance of an exegetical genitive in the sense of “the life which frees a person from the sphere of death.”

20 Cf. 16:32. See also m. Abot 4.8. The conjunction δέ (de, but) serves to “reverse” the negative statement in 8:15b (Barrett 1978: 339). Morris (1995: 392) suggests that δέ (given its relationship with καί [kai, even]) means “even if.”

24 Cf. 10:34; see also 6:49: “your ancestors”; 8:56: “your father Abraham”; 15:25: “their law” (see Augenstein 1997). Barrett (1978: 339) seems to deny the historicity of the words “in your law,” suggesting that they are a creation of the evangelist intended to show the separation that occurred between Christianity and official Judaism. However, in light of the consistent pattern throughout John’s Gospel, and the undeniable acrimony between Jesus and his Jewish opponents historically, this expedient is unnecessary. In favor of historicity are Morris (1995: 392 n. 19) and Carson (1991: 340).

29 So Morris 1995: 394; Carson 1991: 341; Beasley-Murray 1999: 125 n. b; Burge 2000: 257. Barrett (1978: 340) alone seems to express some reservation.

31 Carson (1991: 341) takes the reference to the Jews’ “looking for” Jesus to refer to their continued search for the Messiah after Jesus’ death. Morris (1995: 396) thinks that the reference is to the Jews coming to realize who Jesus truly is when it is too late, or to their continued opposition after Jesus leaves their presence.

32 “Sin” in 8:21 is in the singular, which may refer to the “cardinal sin of rejecting Jesus” (Barrett 1978: 340; Carson 1991: 341; R. Brown 1966: 350; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.197). Alternatively, “sin” may be used generically to refer to a person’s sinful state apart from Christ. The preposition ἐν (en, in) probably is locative (“in a state of sin”), though it also could be instrumental (“by reason of sin”) (Barrett 1978: 341; cf. Morris 1995: 395).

42 Ridderbos 1997: 303. The expression καὶ γὰρ (kagō, and I) creates a close link between Jesus and the Father (Morris 1995: 401 n. 54). The use of εἰς (eis, to) in the phrase “to the world” is interesting. R. Brown (1966: 348) suggests that it has an “aspect of motion.”

47 So the majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 305–6; Carson 1991: 346–47; Morris 1995: 404; Beasley-Murray 1999: 132; D. M. Smith 1999: 185; Borchert 1996: 301

n. 182; Burge 2000: 259; Bultmann 1971: 252 n. 2; contra R. Brown 1966: 354–55, 358; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.204–5; Moloney 1998: 277; Westcott 1908: 2.13–14.

53 Morris 1995: 405; cf. R. Brown 1966: 355; Borchert 1996: 303. Carson (1991: 348–49) suggests that truth in 8:32 is similar to the notion of “gospel,” that is, “the truth that has been revealed in and by Jesus” (cf. Barrett 1978: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.205).

58 Note the emphatic position of οὐδενί (oudenī, to no one) and the perfect tense verb δεδουλεύκαμεν (dedouleukamen, we have been slaves) in 8:33 (Morris 1995: 406 n. 66).

71 Morris (1995: 410) and Barrett (1978: 348) claim to detect a contrast between Jesus’ λαλία (lalia, speech) and his λόγος (logos, word), but it is hard to see why these two terms should not be understood as rough synonyms, in keeping with Johannine style.

74 So Morris 1995: 411; Ridderbos 1997: 315; Carson 1991: 353; Barrett 1978: 349; Beasley-Murray 1999: 135; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.213; Moloney 1998: 280; Borchert 1996: 305–6. It was commonly recognized in Second Temple literature that death was the result of Satan’s initiative (Wis. 2:23–24; Sir. 25:24; cf. Rom. 5:12).

82 Morris (1995: 414) conjectures that the phrase “Do we not rightly say?” might refer to a charge brought against Jesus throughout his ministry, though he acknowledges the lack of direct evidence.

85 This implies that Jesus neglects the traditional ways of Judaism and so is perceived as acting more like a Samaritan than like a true Jew (Morris 1995: 414; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 318). Morris (1995: 414) suggests that the Jews might be addressing Jesus’ failure to recognize their relationship with Abraham. Barrett (1978: 350) notes that since Dositheus and Simon Magus (both Samaritans who claimed to be sons of God) were described as demon-possessed, Jesus’ opponents might be making a similar connection with him (cf. Moloney 1998: 286; R. Brown 1966: 358).

85 This implies that Jesus neglects the traditional ways of Judaism and so is perceived as acting more like a Samaritan than like a true Jew (Morris 1995: 414; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 318). Morris (1995: 414) suggests that the Jews might be addressing Jesus’ failure to recognize their relationship with Abraham. Barrett (1978: 350) notes that since Dositheus and Simon Magus (both Samaritans who claimed to be sons of God) were described as demon-possessed, Jesus’ opponents might be making a similar connection with him (cf. Moloney 1998: 286; R. Brown 1966: 358).

90 Cf. 5:24; see also 6:40, 47; 11:25–26. Carson (1991: 355 [cf. Lindars 1972: 332]) suggests that this statement is in further development of 8:50. The word ἐμὸν (emon, my) stresses that it is Jesus’ word that must be kept; θάνατον (thanaton, death) is emphatic as well (Morris 1995: 416 n. 104), as is the negative οὐ μὴ ... εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (ou mē ... eis ton aiōna, never ... ever) (Wallace 1996: 468–69). Note that when Jesus’ opponents quote his statement in 8:52 (per the evangelist’s rendering), they use the less marked pronoun μου (mou, my) instead of the possessive adjective ἐμὸν and do not place θάνατον in an emphatic position.

94 The majority of commentators believe that there is no significance in the slight alteration of Jesus’ words in 8:52 (Morris 1995: 416 n. 104; Barrett 1978: 350–51; R. Brown 1966: 359; Borchert 1996: 307). Note, however, that “taste death” replaces “see death” (see Laney 1992: 168; cf. 5:24). The expression “taste death” is not found in the OT, but “to see death” is (see commentary at 8:51). The expression “taste death” occurs in the NT also in Mark 9:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 351) and Heb. 2:9. See further Acts 2:27, 31 (citing Ps. 16:10); 1 Cor. 15:54–55 (citing Isa. 25:8; Hos. 13:14); 1 John 3:14. On other minor differences, see footnote for commentary at John 8:51.

95 Morris 1995: 416; Carson 1991: 356; Barrett 1978: 351. The pronoun ἡμῶν (hēmōn, our) in the phrase “our father Abraham” is likely exclusive, with Jesus not included as ancestor of Abraham (Wallace 1996: 398). Note also the relative pronoun ὅστις (hostis, who), which is both indefinite (R. Brown 1966: 359) and qualitative (Morris 1995: 416 n. 105) in import. Abraham serves as a type of others like him, and all of those were “of such a quality as to die” (Morris 1995: 416 n. 105).

95 Morris 1995: 416; Carson 1991: 356; Barrett 1978: 351. The pronoun ἡμῶν (hēmōn, our) in the phrase “our father Abraham” is likely exclusive, with Jesus not included as ancestor of Abraham (Wallace 1996: 398). Note also the relative pronoun ὅστις (hostis, who), which is both indefinite (R. Brown 1966: 359) and qualitative (Morris 1995: 416 n. 105) in import. Abraham serves as a type of others like him, and all of those were “of such a quality as to die” (Morris 1995: 416 n. 105).

97 The term ἀγαλλιάω (agalliaō, be glad) occurs in this Gospel elsewhere only in 5:35. The sense is that of being “overjoyed” (Morris 1995: 417). The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) is variously classified as referring to the content of Abraham’s joy (Morris 1995: 417); as introducing “the ground of the rejoicing” (Barrett 1978: 351); as causal or explanatory (Beasley-Murray 1999: 126 n. 1); or as conveying purpose (R. Brown 1966: 359).

97 The term ἀγαλλιάω (agalliaō, be glad) occurs in this Gospel elsewhere only in 5:35. The sense is that of being “overjoyed” (Morris 1995: 417). The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) is variously classified as referring to the content of Abraham’s joy (Morris 1995: 417); as introducing “the ground of the rejoicing” (Barrett 1978: 351); as causal or explanatory (Beasley-Murray 1999: 126 n. 1); or as conveying purpose (R. Brown 1966: 359).

108 Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §216; J.W. 2.1.3 §§11–12; see Morris 1995: 420–21; R. Brown 1966: 360; cf. Laney 1992: 169.

109 The passive verb ἐκρύβη (ekrybē) in 8:59 and 12:36 is customarily translated in English Bibles as reflexive/middle (“hid himself”; KJV; NKJV; NIV; TNIV; ISV; ESV; NLT; NET; NRSV; NASB) or even actively (“hid”; NAB; CEV). The sole exception is the HCSB, which renders the expression as a genuine passive. See also Morris (1995: 421), who contends that the NT usage is to take the form as a real passive and consequently argues that the passive form may imply the agency of God the Father in concealing Jesus. This is possible; ekrybē does function as a genuine passive in Luke 19:42 and Heb. 11:23, the only other two NT instances (besides here and in John 12:36) of the aorist passive indicative form of kryptō. But cf. BDAG 571, which treats both references as instances of the passive used in an active sense (“to hide”). Similarly, BDF §471 (4).

26 Morris (1995: 428) notes the nonchalant fashion in which the miracle is described. Barrett (1978: 359) comments, “The man’s obedience was complete and so was his cure.” A connection with the previous chapters is established by the fact that the water for the water-pouring rites of the Feast of Tabernacles was drawn from the pool of Siloam (cf. m. Sukkah 4.9–10).

32 The imperfect verb tenses in 9:8–10 indicate ongoing discussion (Morris 1995: 429 n. 24). Morris (1995: 429) regards the NIV rendering of ἔλεγον (elegon, they were saying) as “they demanded” in 9:10 as too strong (note the change to “they asked” in the TNIV). The passive “were opened” in 9:10 is an instance of agency being suppressed for rhetorical effect (Wallace 1996: 437).

285n36, 285n37, 286, 286n40, 286n41, 287, 288, 288n48, 288n49, 289, 289n53, 289n54, 290, 290n57, 291n61, 292, 292n69, 293, 293n71, 294, 294n78, 294n79, 294n80, 295,

34 Τόν ποτε τυφλόν (ton pote typhlon, the formerly blind man) is placed in apposition to αὐτόν (auton, him) earlier in the sentence, which is construed as emphatic by some commentators, including Ridderbos (1997: 339) and Morris (1995: 430 n. 29).

36 Morris (1995: 430) thinks it plain that the examination of the man before the Pharisees occurs “on a day subsequent to that of the cure.” Borchert (1996: 317) perceives that the reference to the Sabbath “gives the effect of sounding a piercing alarm in the story.”

37 See Ridderbos 1997: 335; Morris 1995: 427; Barrett 1978: 359; R. Brown 1966: 373; Borchert 1996: 318.

40 The separation of οὗτος (houtos, this) from ὁ ἄνθρωπος (ho anthrōpos, the man) suggests that the comment is meant contemptuously (Morris 1995: 431). Barrett (1978: 360) construes the intent underlying the statement as follows: “‘He is not from God—this man’; and certainly he is no more than [a] man.” Both Morris (1995: 431) and Schnackenburg (1990: 2.248) believe that the word order is chosen by the evangelist to highlight the Pharisees’ ignorance of the incarnation and ill-conceived notion of distance between Jesus and God.

41 The term ἁμαρτωλός (hamartōlos, sinner) occurs in John’s Gospel only in the present chapter (9:16, 24, 25, 31; noted in Morris 1995: 431 n. 31).

49 Duke (1985: 120–21) detects irony in the fact that the parents’ fear of the Jewish authorities sends the interrogators back to the man born blind, whom they had already questioned, yet it was precisely the Jews’ dissatisfaction with that man’s version that had caused them to change their tactic in the first place. This well illustrates not only the authorities’ dilemma but also the cycle of futility in their investigation (cf. Bultmann 1971: 335). Confession of Jesus as Christ was the mark of the early Christians (e.g., Acts 9:22; 18:28; see Hurtado 1988b: 112–13). The phrase “fear of the Jews” occurs in this Gospel also at 7:13; 19:38; 20:19. The expression ἀποσυνάγωγος (aposynagōgos, expelled from the synagogue) occurs in the NT elsewhere only in John 12:42 and 16:2 (there with a future reference). Expulsion from the assembly of the exiles is reported already in Ezra 10:8 (Morris [1995: 434 n. 36], who also refers to Exod. 31:14).

53 Ridderbos 1997: 343; similarly, Morris 1995: 434 n. 36; contra Barrett 1978: 361; R. Brown 1966: 380; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.250; Bultmann 1971: 335.

54 Conway (1999: 131) suggests the idiomatic translation “Tell us the truth.” See Josh. 7:19; 2 Chron. 30:8; Jer. 13:16; 1 Esdr. 9:8; m. Sanh. 6.2; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 344; Carson 1991: 372; Morris 1995: 436. Alternatively, the Jews exhort the man to give glory to God, who performed the miracle (but see Barrett 1978: 362).

57 This is the only instance of λοιδορέω (loidoreō, insult) in the Gospel (elsewhere in the NT only in Acts 23:4; 1 Cor. 4:12; 1 Pet. 2:23). Note the emphatic juxtaposition of the personal pronouns σύ (sy, you) and ἡμεῖς (hēmeis, we), an “antithesis [that] is intended to expose the utter inferiority of the discipleship to which the man born blind refers” (Ridderbos 1997: 345), and the contemptuous force of ἐκείνου (ekeinou, that one’s) (Carson 1991: 373; Morris 1995: 437 n. 42; Barrett 1978: 362).

61 Carson (1991: 373) points out that on a formal level, the present statement stands in contradiction with the Pharisees’ earlier comment in 7:27 (cf. 6:42; 8:14b). He rightly notes that “both 7:27 and 9:29 are simultaneously false and ironically true” (almost identically, Barrett 1978: 363; similarly, Morris 1995: 437; Keener 2003: 792).

69 Carson (1991: 375) notes the dangers of a strict understanding of the man’s logic, particularly the risks of associating powers with divine power (e.g., the Egyptian magicians). However, these are theological subtleties that do not concern the man. His conclusion thus is correct, even if his theological framework is somewhat precarious. Morris (1995: 438) says that the logic is admirable for a man who has been a beggar all his life.

71 On the grammatical construction underlying the phrase “he could do nothing,” see commentary at 14:30. Morris (1995: 438 n. 46) notes the emphatic double negative; Wallace (1996: 696) cites this as an example of a second-class condition (contrary to fact).

78 The emphatic pronoun σὺ (sy, you) points to the personal nature of faith (Morris 1995: 439) and draws a distinction between the man’s positive response and the Pharisees’ unbelief (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.253).

79 Though Carson (1991: 376 [cf. Morris 1995: 439]) also notes the judging role of the Son of Man (5:27), which coheres well with 9:39–41. Ridderbos (1997: 348) points out how Jesus repeatedly shifts to this title to reveal “greater things” about himself (1:51; 3:13; 6:27, 62; 8:28).

80 Carson 1991: 376; Morris 1995: 440; R. Brown 1966: 375. D. M. Smith (1999: 199) suggests that the ambiguity may be intentional, while Barrett (1978: 364) doubts that John intentionally meant to distinguish between these two meanings in 9:36 and 9:38. Regarding the question “Who is he ... ?” see 12:34 (cf. Acts 9:5).

82 Borchert (1996: 325) relates the present reference to 20:28 and believes that this confession is a high point in the festival cycle. The man’s response to Jesus’ self-revelation is in keeping with the standard OT reaction to theophany (e.g., Gen. 17:3). However, it is possible that the man’s actions, while being “beyond that due to other men,” fall “short of that due to God Almighty” (Beasley-Murray 1999: 160; similarly, Carson 1991: 377). Nevertheless, the majority of commentators favor a fuller sense of worship (Barrett 1978: 365; R. Brown 1966: 376; Bultmann 1971: 339 n. 3; Morris 1995: 440; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.254).

9 Barrett (1978: 368) suggests that ἀναβαίνων ἀλλαχόθεν (anabainōn allachōthen, going up another way) refers to individuals who attempt to reach the heavenly realm through a method other than the cross, but it is doubtful that the symbolism can be extended this far. See the appropriate cautions against pressing an allegorical reading of every detail in the present discourse registered by Ridderbos 1997: 355 (Morris 1995: 447 cites the doorkeeper as an example; see below).

11 The lack of an article before ποιμήν (poimēn, shepherd) in 10:2 does not negate the specificity of the term (Ridderbos 1997: 354; Morris 1995: 446 n. 13, 453–54; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.282). Westcott (1908: 2.50) says that the “absence of the article fixes attention on the character as distinct from the person.”

12 The term θυρωρός is used later for the doorkeeper of the high priest’s courtyard in 18:16, 17. Morris (1995: 447) aptly notes that no special symbolic significance should be assigned to the doorkeeper in the present discourse.

18 Stibbe (1993: 113) characterizes παροιμία as “a symbolic word-picture with a cryptic meaning ... essentially elusive discourse.” Morris (1995: 445) suggests that this is a rather unique form of allegory. Ridderbos (1997: 355 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 168]) opts for a parable with allegorical elements (cf. 10:7–9). Bultmann (1971: 375) describes the genre as a mixture between parable and riddle. See Köstenberger 2002b: 72–75. See also the long discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.284–88.

21 Some (e.g., Morris 1995: 450 n. 27; Barrett 1978: 371) seek to make a distinction between the meaning of ἡ θύρα τῶν προβάτων (hē thyra tōn probatōn, the door for the sheep) in 10:7 and ἡ θύρα (hē thyra, the gate) in 10:9, contending that in 10:7 Jesus is presented as the gate to the sheep, while in 10:9 he is the gate for the sheep. However, such a distinction is unnecessary (Carson 1991: 384; cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.289; Moloney 1998: 309).

24 “Were” is the rendering chosen in the NIV (but note the TNIV), NLT, and NET. If correct, this would constitute an instance in the Fourth Gospel of a historical present of εἰμί (eimi, am), whose existence is denied by Wallace (1990: 204; 1996: 531). But see Morris (1995: 451 n. 31), who says that the emphasis is on Jesus’ own day. Another possible instance of this grammatical feature is found in 19:40 (so NIV = TNIV; CEV; see commentary at 5:2).

26 Note the emphatic placement of δι’ ἐμοῦ (di’ emou, through me), which focuses on Jesus’ role as the one through whom sheep may enter the fold (Morris 1995: 452).

40 Later mishnaic law stipulated that if one wolf attacked the flock, the hireling must protect it. However, if two wolves threatened the sheep, no blame attached to the hired man for any damage caused to the sheep (m. B. Meṣi’a 7.8–9; see Dalman 1928–39: 6.233–35; Morris 1995: 454).

45 So the vast majority of commentators, including Barrett, Beasley-Murray, Burge, Carson, Moloney, Morris, Ridderbos, Schnackenburg, and Witherington. For Jewish material indicating that the Messiah would gather the Gentiles, see Hofius 1967.

46 Note the present tense ἔχω (echō, I have), which points to Christ’s current possession of these sheep despite their absence from the fold (Morris 1995: 455). There is no basis for the supposition by some (e.g., Bultmann 1971: 383) that 10:16 represents a later addition (see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.299; ambivalent is Ridderbos 1997: 362). As a study of the Johannine mission theme makes clear (not to mention the mission theme in the other Gospels), this passage, far from representing an isolated reference to Jesus’ anticipation of a future (Gentile) mission, coheres with a repeated and consistent emphasis on the extension of the scope of God’s salvation beyond the boundaries of national Israel to the other nations (e.g., Matt. 28:19; Acts 1:8). See Köstenberger 1998b; Köstenberger and O’Brien 2001: 73–127, 203–26.

55 So Morris 1995: 457; cf. Carson 1991: 390; Beasley-Murray 1999: 172; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.303; Burge 2000: 293.

56 The interrogative particle μή (mē) indicates expectation of a negative answer (Morris 1995: 458 n. 58).

60 See Josephus, J.W. 5.5.1 §§184–85; Ant. 15.11.3 §§396–401; 20.9.7 §§220–21. So the vast majority of commentators, including Carson, Barrett, Morris, Beasley-Murray, R. Brown, Moloney, and Burge; contra Ridderbos 1997: 368.

63 More literally, the Greek may be rendered “take away our life” (Ridderbos 1997: 368 n. 358). This translation is favored also by Morris (1995: 461, with reference to the same verb, αἶρω [airō, take away], in 10:18), who believes that the Jews are suggesting that Jesus is attempting to destroy Judaism. But in 10:18, αἶρω means “take up,” not “take away.” Bultmann (1971: 361 n. 5) thinks that this is “scarcely credible” and adduces the parallel expression in Josephus, Ant. 3.2.3 §48: οἱ δ’ ἦσαν ἐπὶ τὸν κίνδυνον τὰς ψυχὰς ἡρμμένοι (LCL translation: “hearts elated”). R. Brown (1966: 403) proposes that Jesus is creating a pun on the word ψυχή (psychē, life), using it both with reference to Jesus’ giving his life for his sheep and, ironically, to refer to Jesus’ “taking away the life” of those who refuse to acknowledge him. In light of the fact that John’s Gospel is laden with irony, this is possible but hard to verify.

67 So, in effect, Ridderbos 1997: 368; Carson 1991: 392–93; Morris 1995: 462; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174. Borchert (1996: 338) suggests that the “interplay between paroimia and parrēsia allows Jesus to tell the Pharisees that he has already answered their question.”

69 As Morris (1995: 463) notes, this makes clear “that our continuance in eternal life depends not on our feeble hold on Christ, but on his firm grip on us.” Later, Paul affirms that nothing can “separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord” (Rom. 8:39).

72 The term “one” (ἓν, hen) in 10:30 is neuter rather than masculine; the latter would have suggested that Jesus and the Father are one person (Carson 1991: 394). Morris (1995: 464) suggests the rendering “one thing.”

73 So, rightly, Carson (1991: 394–95), whose entire discussion repays careful reading (see also Morris 1995: 465; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174; Moloney 1998: 320; Burge 2000: 296; Laney 1992: 195; Stibbe 1993: 118; Westcott 1908: 2.68). Michaels (1989: 187) seems to conceive of Jesus’ unity with the Father in functional terms (whether primarily or exclusively so), as both of them doing “the same work.” Barrett (1978: 382) notes that the unity between the Father and the Son is also a unity of love and obedience.

78 Ridderbos (1997: 371 n. 373) identifies λιθάζετε (lithazete, you stone) as a conative present (cf. Morris 1995: 466 n. 90); Wallace (1996: 535) calls it a “tendential present,” describing an act about to be performed.

79 Cf. Mark 14:64 par.; see Bock 1998: es p. 234–37. See the brief discussion of Synoptic parallels in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.310. John 10:33 is the only occurrence of the term βλασφημία (blasphēmia, blasphemy) in this Gospel; the verb βλασφημέω (blasphēmeō, blaspheme) occurs only in 10:36. The expression καὶ ὅτι (kai hoti, even because) (adverbial καί) further clarifies the charge made by the Jews (Morris 1995: 467 n. 92). The participle ὄν (ōn, being) in 10:33 is concessive: “even though you are a mere man” (Wallace 1996: 634–35).

Ποιεῖς (poieis, you make) is identified by Ridderbos (1997: 372 n. 375) as a durative present.

84 See b. Abod. Zar. 5a. For a variation of the first view, see Jungkuntz 1964; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311; Morris 1995: 467; Beasley-Murray 1999: 176–77. The second position is held by Emerton 1960; 1966. For a variation of the third view, see Hanson 1964–65; 1967. See further Oepke, TDNT 4:1022–32, 1054–55. Most major commentators seem to favor the third view as well (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 373; Carson 1991: 398; Barrett 1978: 384; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311).

85 The presence of an argument from the lesser to the greater is denied by Ridderbos (1997: 374) against the overwhelming majority of commentators (e.g., R. Brown 1966: 410; Morris 1995: 469; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.310; Moloney 1998: 316). Carson (1991: 399, perhaps following Barrett 1978: 385), calls this an ad hominem argument, which he defines (somewhat idiosyncratically, it seems) as an argument that “does not require Jesus to subscribe to the same literal exegesis as his opponents.”

90 Morris (1995: 469 n. 102) notes the use of the adverb οὐ (ou) versus the particle μή (mē) in εἰ οὐ ποιω̄ (ei ou poiō), giving the sense “if I were to leave undone” or “if I were to omit to do.”

91 Morris (1995: 470) understands the dative τοῖς ἐργοῖς (tois ergois, the works) as “giving credence to” rather than full faith.

94 The distinction between γινῶτε (ginōte) and γινώσκητε (ginōskēte) is that of “coming to know” and “understanding” (Carson 1991: 400; Barrett 1978: 386; Morris 1995: 470; Laney 1992: 198). See also additional note to 10:38.

317n96, 317n97, 318n99, 318n103, 319, 321n2, 325n13, 327, 327n21, 327n24, 328, 328n28, 329n30, 330, 330n37, 331, 331n41, 331n42, 332, 332n47, 333n53, 333n54,

96 Morris (1995: 470) also suggests that the evangelist might be contrasting the “hand” of Jesus’ opponents (unable to capture Jesus) with the “hand” of the Father (fully capable of protecting [10:29]), but this seems a bit far-fetched, since 10:28 refers to the “hand” of Jesus as the one protecting, while in the present instance it is Jesus who is being protected.

97 Ἦν ... βαπτίζων (ēn ... baptizōn) is a periphrastic, stressing the extended duration of the Baptist’s baptizing ministry (contra Morris [1995: 471 n. 110], who proposes the rendering “where John was at first, baptizing”).

99 The verb μένω (menō, remain) harks back to earlier similar uses with reference to Jesus in 1:38–39 and 2:12. The reading ἔμεινεν (aorist) rather than ἔμενεν (imperfect) is likely original (R. Brown 1966: 413; Morris 1995: 471 n. 111).

103 Ridderbos (1997: 379) proposes that the words of 10:42 are seeking to indicate that despite his rejection by the Jews elsewhere, Jesus’ ministry was not ineffective. Ridderbos sees no reason to question the faith of these individuals. However, in light of the consistent string of instances of fleeting faith in John’s Gospel, there seems to be good reason to do just that. Also doubtful is the contention by Morris (1995: 472) that 10:42 describes a process akin to what occurred in John 4 (the impact of the woman’s testimony).

2 Though see the reference to “all the miracles” that the people of Jerusalem had seen in Luke 19:37 (noted by Ridderbos 1997: 383; R. Brown 1966: 429). For a defense of the historicity of the raising of Lazarus, see M. Harris 1986: 310–15. See also Morris (1995: 474–76), who, arguing for the historicity of the raising of Lazarus, presents several lines of reasoning: (1) the impressive amount of detail given, including names and geographical references; (2) Peter’s absence from the Johannine narrative in 7:1–13:6 (cf. Matt. 19:27–26:33; Mark 10:28–11:21; Luke 18:28–22:8), which may account, at least in part, for the omission of the raising of Lazarus in Mark and Matthew; and (3) all the Jerusalem miracles are excluded from the Synoptic tradition, and Jerusalem itself is excluded, with the exception of the final week. Keener (2003: 836) conjectures that Mark may have “suppressed” (an infelicitous word choice) the Lazarus story to protect Lazarus and his sisters, who still lived near Jerusalem at the time of publication. Keener (2003: 837) also observes that the account of Jesus’ raising of Lazarus is critical for John’s plot development (the Lazarus account is at the heart of John’s message: Jesus dies most immediately because he has given life to a disciple [11:14–16; cf. 3:16–17]); it constitutes the longest single sign account in the Fourth Gospel; and, apart from the passion narrative, it represents the longest narrative without a substantial discourse section.

13 Noted by Carson 1991: 405. On the relationship between the two Bethanys referred to in John’s Gospel, see Brownlee 1972: 167–74. Morris (1995: 477 n. 10) rightly rejects the distinction made between “Bethany” as their present home and “the village” as their place of origin on the basis of the prepositions ἀπό (apo) and ἐκ (ek) in 11:1.

21 The absence of a specific request is noted by Morris (1995: 478).

24 Contrast 11:1, where Mary is mentioned before Martha (presumably because of her prominence on account of the anointing [11:2]). Ridderbos (1997: 388 n. 22 [cf. Carson 1991: 411]) suggests (citing John 11:19ff. and Luke 10:38b, 40–41) that usually Martha is mentioned first because she more often appears as the initiator of events. Carson (1991: 406 [cf. Morris 1995: 478]) proposes that Martha may be the oldest of the three.

28 This is why Carson (1991: 407 [cf. Morris 1995: 479 n. 16]) is right in rejecting the NIV’s rendering of 11:6 as “Yet when he heard” (retained in the TNIV), proposing instead the translation “When therefore he heard.” Ridderbos (1997: 388 n. 24) avers that the particle μέν (men) in 11:6b is “more or less concessive” (“he [it is true] stayed where he was”). Similarly, Barrett (1978: 390) suggests that τότε μέν (tote men, then) in 11:6b anticipates the ἔπειτα μετὰ τοῦτο (epeita meta touto, then after this) in 11:7, stressing Jesus’ deliberate delay.

30 Morris (1995: 480) thinks that the present reference to returning to Judea (instead of the more specific Bethany) indicates that it is this entrance that is significant, for it will lead to Jesus’ crucifixion. On the address “rabbi,” see commentary at 1:38. The term is used here for the last time in John’s Gospel (but see 20:16). The expression also occurs in 9:2 (note the similarities between 9:2–5 and 11:8–10).

37 See Morris (1995: 482), who refers to the universal fear regarding death in the ancient world. There is no reason to follow Barrett (1978: 392 [cf. R. Brown 1966: 431]), who, on the basis that φίλος (philos, friend) is a technical term for a Christian in the NT, proposes that this is the “true meaning” of this “pregnant saying.” Carson (1991: 409) notes the “not accidental” switch from the plural “our friend” to the singular “I am going,” saying that this indicates that Jesus alone is the resurrection and the life. “I am going” is identified as a futuristic present by Wallace (1996: 536).

41 Whereby Jesus’ clarification in 11:14 is preceded by the evangelist’s aside in 11:13. Εἰρήκει (eirēkei, he had spoken) is an extensive pluperfect (Wallace 1996: 585); ἐκεῖνοι δέ (ekeinoi de, but they) emphasizes the difference in subject: “they in distinction from him” (Morris 1995: 482 n. 27). Κοίμησις (koimēsis, sleep) is used as an expression for death in Sir. 46:19; 48:13. On the phrase παρρησία (parrēsia, frankness), see 7:4; 16:29. Regarding the supernatural knowledge conveyed, see, e.g., 4:17–18.

42 See the reference to God’s glory in 11:4; see also 2:11; cf. Barrett 1978: 393; R. Brown 1966: 432. Note the aorist subjunctive πιστεύσητε (pisteusēte, you may believe), which here refers to the strengthening of the disciples’ faith (rather than the creation of new faith). This observation is significant in relation to the question of how the purpose statement in 20:30–31 should be construed. Morris (1995: 483) struggles to accommodate this form within his somewhat outmoded verbal theory.

47 So Carson (1991: 410), who speaks of “raw devotion and courage”; similarly, Morris 1995: 484; Michaels 1989: 196. Keener (2003: 842), too, says Thomas’s is an act of courage (contrasting him with Jesus’ brothers in 7:5), though he notes that Thomas later failed to believe the disciples’ testimony regarding Jesus’ resurrection (20:25). Perhaps the strongest endorsement of Thomas’s sincerity comes from Whitacre (1999: 283), who says that Thomas displays “an incredible picture of faith,” is “following out of loyalty,” and constitutes “a model disciple.”

53 See Lev. Rab. 18.1 on Lev. 15:1; cf. Eccles. Rab. 12.6 (universally cited by commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 393; Carson 1991: 411; Morris 1995: 485). Cf. m. Yebam. 16.3; Semaḥot 8, rule 1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 109). See also Hanson 1973. Keener (2003: 841 n. 63, citing Michaels 1984: 190) cautions, however, that the belief that the soul left the body three days after death is not widely attested in the early period.

54 Note that in Luke 10:38, Bethany is simply referred to as “a certain village,” with no reference made to its proximity to Jerusalem (noted by Morris 1995: 485).

56 Morris (1995: 485 n. 43) notes the “curious” Greek word order and explains it in terms of a measurement beginning “from” Jerusalem.

58 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 411; Barrett 1978: 394; Conway 1999: 139; Stibbe 1994: 48 (though he notes the return to a negative portrayal in 11:36, 45). Contra Morris (1995: 486), who finds the use of “the Jews” here “unusual” and suggests that it may imply that “though the mourners could bring themselves to sympathize with Martha and Mary, they were hostile to Jesus.”

68 Morris (1995: 489) and Carson (1991: 413) note the one article tying closely together “everyone who lives and believes.” Οὐ μὴ ... εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (ou mē ... eis ton aiōna) is an emphatic negative: “never, ever” (plus subjunctive; see Wallace 1996: 468). In the question “Do you believe this?” the verb πιστεύω (pisteuō, believe) is followed by the accusative, which is unique in this Gospel (Bultmann 1971: 404 n. 1; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.332).

70 On the expression “Lord” in 11:27, cf. 11:3, 21.

72 For this reason Witherington (1995: 203), who calls Martha’s confession “the least inadequate confession yet in this Gospel,” and R. Brown (1966: 433), who labels her belief “inadequate,” are overly negative. More positive are Morris (1995: 489), who says, “She may not understand fully the implications of what he has just said, but as far as she can she accepts it,” and Carson (1991: 414), who labels her faith as “a rich mixture of personal trust (fiducia) and of confidence that certain things about Jesus are true (assensus).” Keener (2003: 844–45) suggests that John, by including Martha’s confession, likely sought to balance gender the way Luke does (cf. Peter’s confession in 6:68–69). See also Stibbe (1994: 47), who perceives movement from two “I know’s” (11:22, 24) to a climactic “I believe” (11:27); from propositional to personal understanding; and from confessor to witness. Ridderbos (1997: 399–400) calls the confession “spontaneous and uninhibited” and sees it as reminiscent of the man blind from birth, who confessed despite his lack of understanding concerning the Son of Man (9:38). On “the Christ,” see commentary at 1:41; on “Son of God,” see commentary at 1:34 and 1:49.

73 Morris (1995: 490 n. 62) perceptively notes that λάθρα (lathra, privately) could modify ἐφώνησεν (ephōnēsen, she called) or εἰποῦσα (eipousa, saying), meaning either that Martha called her sister secretly or that she secretly (or privately) talked to her. The former is perhaps more likely. Morris also is critical of the NIV’s gloss “aside.” Borchert (1996: 358) suggests that Martha’s statement to Mary may have been “an indication of Martha’s controlling temperament.”

76 Note the progressive aspect reflected in the imperfect ἦρχετο (ērchetō, she went, was going) (see the discussion in Morris [1995: 491 n. 65], who does, however, believe that the present-tense form of the verb found in some MSS may be original here; cf. Maccini 1996: 149–50).

81 Morris (1995: 492) suggests that by moving quickly, Mary may have achieved some brief moments of privacy away from her comforters, who would have been confused over where she was going. If so, her “prostration and greeting” were private. At any rate, she was quickly rejoined by the party of mourners. We may add that it is quite likely that the evangelist does not record everything said at the present occasion.

90 Though Morris (1995: 494) does refer to Jesus’ “deep concern and indignation at the attitude of the mourners.” Morris cites the Synoptic occurrences of the term ἐμβριμάομαι related to Jesus (Matt. 9:30; Mark 1:43) and notes the lack of an expressed object of Jesus’ anger. He favors the NRSV rendering “greatly disturbed in spirit.”

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, “The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death.” See also

Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999: 289. The mourners' unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999: 192–93), several of whom adduce Paul's statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus' anger is directed toward both "the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow" and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus' anger as occasioned by Mary's turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either "misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition," to mean "moved in spirit." Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus' struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, "He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself" (11:38 is translated "bearing the rebuke within himself"). According to Story, at the sight of people's grief, Jesus was overcome by "momentary self-regret," thinking, "Why did I not come sooner ... ? I have only myself to blame. ... Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?" However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

94 The term δακρύω occurs occasionally in the LXX (Job 3:24; Ezek. 27:35; Mic. 2:6; 2 Macc. 4:37; Sir. 12:16; 31:13). Owing to the force of the verb tense in the Greek original (an "ingressive aorist"), "Jesus burst into tears" is a better translation than the customary "wept" (Morris 1995: 495 n. 77; cf. Barrett 1978: 400; Pollard 1973: 441; Stibbe 1994: 45). This is suggested by comparison with instances of δακρύω in the same grammatical form in Greco-Roman and Hellenistic Jewish literature, where the term is regularly rendered this way (see Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 17.66.4; 27.6.1; Plutarch, Camillus 5.5; Pyrrhus 34.4; Pompeius 80.5; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162; J.W. 5.10.5 §445; 6.5.3 §304).

97 So, essentially, Carson (1991: 416) and Morris (1995: 495), though both (in my view, illegitimately) speak of "unbelief" or "the misconceptions of those around him" as the primary target (similarly, Kruse [2003: 254] believes Jesus wept out of "deep disappointment" with the "faithless weeping and wailing" of Mary and "the Jews"). Schnackenburg (1990: 2.337) insightfully adduces the reference to Jesus' "tears" during his "life on earth" in Heb. 5:7, which there, as well as in the present reference, are related to the presence of and the need for salvation from death. The comment by Borchert (1996: 360) that Jesus' weeping is "directly related to the failure of his followers to recognize his mission as the agent of God" is sheer conjecture, as is Moloney's contention (1998: 331) that "he weeps because of the danger that his unconditional gift of himself in love ... will never be understood or accepted."

99 More negative are Morris (1995: 496), who says, "As always the Jews fail to enter the mind of Christ," and Beasley-Murray (1999: 194), who exclaims, "They did not perceive that the tears were more over them than over Lazarus!" Very possibly, Morris (1995: 496) is correct when he contends that the Jews misunderstood Jesus' tears to represent frustration.

100 As Barrett (1978: 401) writes, "They think of Jesus not as the Son of God who is light and life ... but as a thaumaturge whose capacities, authenticated by the cure of the blind man, might conceivably have been expected to rise to this extremity.” Carson (1991: 417 [cf. Morris 1995: 496]) says that we need not suppose that their attitude was “sneering,” but Schnackenburg (1990: 2.337) points to the introductory δέ (de, but) and the negative connotation of οὐκ ἐδύνατο (ouk edynato, could he not have?).

108 The perfect participle τετελευτηκότος (teteleutēkotos, deceased) highlights the permanence of death (Morris 1995: 496–97).

130 Their signs-based response is reminiscent of 2:23. Morris (1995: 499) construes the relationship between “many of the Jews” and “who had come to Mary” in narrow terms as appositional, so that it would have been the Jews who had come to Mary who believed. However, R. Brown (1966: 438 [contra Bernard 1928: 2.401–2]) cogently contends that there is no need to overemphasize the agreement of the participle so as to conclude that all the Jews who had come to comfort Mary believed in Jesus.

134 Note also the absence of the definite article before συνέδριον in the Greek (which may imply “a gathering” rather than “the Sanhedrin”), though not too much should be made of this (Morris 1995: 501 n. 99). For a complete list of high priests from 200 B.C. to A.D. 70, see Jeremias 1969: 377–78. For a list of high priests from 37 B.C. to A.D. 68, see Smallwood 1962: 31–32. For a list of the most important high priests from 200 B.C. to the time of Jesus, see Köstenberger 2002c:

114. R. Brown (1966: 439) suggests that there may be an intentional contrast between the gathering of the Sanhedrin here and the gathering of the children of God in 11:52.

143 Note the sacrificial language (ὑπέρ, hyper, for) in 11:51–52 (Carson 1991: 422; Wallace 1996: 387). On the irony in Caiaphas’s statement, see especially Duke 1985: 87 (cited in Morris 1995: 503 n. 107).

146 Cf. Matt. 23:37 = Luke 13:34 (noted by Beutler 1994: 403). Morris (1995: 504 n. 117) suggests that the perfect participle διεσκορπισμένα (dieskorpismena, scattered) may “indicate the permanence of the scattering, apart from Christ’s work.” The notion of the gathering of scattered “children of God” in the context of John’s Gospel seems to presuppose the notion of divine election and predestination. R. Brown (1966: 443) sees eucharistic overtones in the term “gathered together,” adducing 6:13 where fragments are gathered subsequent to the miraculous feeding. This reading seems far-fetched.

7 Curiously, Schnackenburg (1990: 2.366) questions the historical veracity of Jesus’ trip to Bethany, arguing that it is unlikely that Jesus would have gone to a more dangerous location. However, there is solid, multiply attested evidence in favor of authenticity, and the Gospels make clear that Jesus was not exclusively, or even primarily, guided by concerns for his own safety, especially toward the end of his public ministry. Morris (1995: 510–11) notes that οὖν (oun, therefore) in 12:1 establishes a logical connection between the anointing and the preceding reference to the hostility of the Jewish leaders: despite their antagonism, Jesus was still willing to go to the place where he would eventually die.

8 The fronted ἐποίησαν (epoiēsan, they prepared) (which may be equivalent to a passive [so R. Brown 1966: 448]) is taken by some as indication of a very public occasion. If so, then the dinner may not have been prepared by Martha and her family and may not even have taken place at their house (Carson 1991: 428; Morris 1995: 511; contra Barrett 1978: 411; Moloney 1998: 356).

9 The vast majority of commentators holds that the dinner probably was eaten on Saturday at some point during the day, presumably in the evening. See Carson 1991: 427; Barrett 1978: 410; Morris 1995: 510 n. 10; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 208; R. Brown 1966: 447; Burge 2000: 337. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.366) says that the meal could have been on Sunday or possibly Saturday evening.

360n10, 361n16, 362, 362n19, 362n21, 363, 363n22, 364, 364n27, 365, 365n30, 365n34, 366, 368, 369, 369n11, 370, 370n12, 370n13, 370n18, 371n20, 372n22, 373n28, 380n21,

10 Martha's serving suggests to some (e.g., Moloney 1998: 356) that the dinner was given at her (and Lazarus's) house. Others object that if the dinner had been at Lazarus's house, it likely would not have been stated that he was reclining with Jesus; his presence at the house would have been assumed (Morris 1995: 511; R. Brown 1966: 448; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 414). As on previous occasions, Martha is mentioned before her sister Mary (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.366).

16 This is further underscored by the repeated reference to Jesus' feet in 12:3 (Ridderbos 1997: 414–15; Morris 1995: 512).

19 See also Midr. Qoh. 7.1 (cf. Morris 1995: 513).

21 See especially Morris 1995: 513 n. 19. Contra Schnackenburg (1990: 2.367–68), who questions the originality of the phrase “the one who was about to betray him.”

22 Morris (1995: 513 n. 21 [cf. R. Brown 1966: 448]) draws attention to the similarity between the wording of the phrase οὐχ ὅτι περὶ τῶν πτωχῶν ἔμελεν αὐτῷ in 12:6 and οὐ μέλει αὐτῷ περὶ τῶν προβάτων, the description of the hireling, in 10:13, noting that both are impersonal in tone.

27 Note that in the Greek text, “me” is placed in the emphatic position (Morris 1995: 515 n. 30). See also the additional note on 12:8.

30 Ἐγνώ (egnō, learned) is best understood as an ingressive aorist (Morris 1995: 517). Most commentators (rightly, in my opinion) hold that the term “Jews” is not used in a negative sense here (so, e.g., Carson 1991: 431; Barrett 1978: 415; R. Brown 1966: 456; contra Morris 1995: 517). See also the additional note on 12:9.

34 Contra Barrett (1978: 415 [cf. Morris 1995: 517]), who contends that the Jews mentioned here abandoned Judaism and aligned themselves with Christ.

11 Ridderbos (1997: 423 n. 137) says that “hosanna” literally means, “Please help!”; Carson (1991: 432) prefers the meaning “Give salvation now!” But probably Barrett (1978: 417–18) is correct that at the time of Christ, the phrase might have been no more than a “jubilant shout of praise” as part of a “spontaneous ovation” (cf. Morris 1995: 516; R. Brown 1966: 457). Beasley-Murray (1999: 210) adds that it may have been a greeting as well.

12 Morris (1995: 518–19 n. 40 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.374]) denies that the branches waved on this occasion were the lulabs used at the Feast of Tabernacles.

13 Morris (1995: 520) prefers the translation “Blessed is he that comes” over “Blessed be the one.” If this is correct, then the phrase constitutes a statement rather than a prayer. Freed (1961) maintains that the OT quotations in John 12:13–15 demonstrate Johannine literary dependence on the Synoptics; but see the rebuttal by D. M. Smith 1963.

18 For a fuller description of how Jesus “found” the donkey, see Matt. 21:1–3 pars. (note the harmonization proposed in Carson 1991: 433; Morris 1995: 520–21). Coakley (1995: 477) calls the reference here “intentionally uninformative,” either because the evangelist had no information about how the donkey was found or because he chose not to disclose it (Coakley prefers the latter). However, his suggestion seems implausible that “Jesus did not intend to ride the donkey at all but was made to do so by enthusiastic followers” (p. 479, citing Luke 19:37; John 6:15). This is the only occurrence of the diminutive form ὄνάριον (onarion, young donkey)

in the NT.

20 The possible reference to Isa. 40:9 is noted by Carson (1991: 433); cf. Barrett 1978: 418; contra Morris 1995: 521 n. 48. R. Brown (1966: 458) points to Zeph. 3:16. This kind of conflation of quotations from the OT is not uncommon in the NT (e.g., Matt. 27:9–10; Mark 1:2–3).

22 Ridderbos (1997: 424 n. 145) notes that the first two occurrences of ταῦτα (tauta, these things) refer to the events narrated in 12:12–15. As to the third ταῦτα in 12:16, Morris (1995: 521) suggests that as the object of ἐποίησαν (epoiēsan, they had done), it refers to the role that the disciples played in acquiring the donkey (but see R. Brown [1966: 458], who proposes a general, passive sense of ἐποίησαν in 12:16, while Ridderbos [1997: 424] prefers to take it with reference to the manner in which the crowd greeted Jesus as he entered Jerusalem).

28 Barrett (1978: 420) and, very tentatively, Morris (1995: 523) suggest that θεωρεῖτε (theōreite, see) is probably an indicative (rather than an imperative). Whitacre (1999: 308) notes that both verbs θεωρεῖτε and ὠφελεῖτε (ōpheteite, you accomplish) in 12:19 are in the second-person plural, suggesting that this captures “the mutual condemnation they are throwing at one another: ‘You guys see that you are doing no good.’”

21 Morris (1995: 528) points out that the choice of verb may be significant here: “It may be important that the verb is ‘say’ rather than ‘choose’ or the like; there is no question about whether he will do the Father’s will or not.” On the address “Father,” see commentary at 11:41.

22 Commentators almost universally consider the present pericope to be the Johannine equivalent to the Synoptic account of Gethsemane (e.g., Morris 1995: 529; Barrett 1978: 424; R. Brown 1966: 475–76; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.386), though Ridderbos (1997: 435–36, pointing to Ps. 6) and Carson (1991: 440) rightly reject the notion that the Fourth Evangelist has simply refashioned the Synoptic Gethsemane scene to suit his purposes.

24 Contra Carson (1991: 440 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 212; Burge 2000: 345]), who understands this to be a genuine question (“What shall I say?”) and takes the following statement as a positive prayer (“Father, save me from this hour!”). As Morris (1995: 528) rightly notes, this interpretation, in an effort to do justice to the genuineness of Jesus’ struggle, is unlikely in that it has Jesus utter a prayer and then immediately repudiate it. Moreover, even if the question is seen as rhetorical, this does not deny the reality of Jesus’ struggle but simply shows how he overcomes succumbing to merely human reasoning.

31 Ridderbos (1997: 437) understands “I have glorified it” to refer to “the whole of Jesus’ earthly activity.” Carson (1991: 441) includes Jesus’ earthly ministry, the incarnation, and the signs. Morris (1995: 530) seems to think that “I will glorify it” refers solely to the cross. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.388, citing Ps. 138:2; Ezek. 36:23; 38:23) takes the same phrase to point to the Son’s exaltation and vindication: “He will justify the Son, raise him above the power of evil, and give him glory and saving power.”

39 The term “draw” brings out the truth that people do not come to Christ on their own initiative; only as God works in people and draws them can they come to him (Morris 1995: 531). The phrase “all people” does not imply universalism (the ultimate salvation of all [see commentary at 1:9]). Rather, the approach of Gentiles prompts Jesus’ statement that after his glorification he will draw “all kinds of people,” even Gentiles, to himself. For this interpretation and a brief discussion of the textual issues, see Köstenberger 1999a: 194. See also Ridderbos (1997: 439–40), who provides the glosses “the entire human world” and “‘all’ without distinction of people or race”; and Morris (1995: 531–32), who struggles but then interprets πάντας (pantas) to refer to “all kinds of men.” In addition, Carson (1991: 443) sees a parallel with Rev. 12:11a and takes issue with the adversative NIV rendering, “But I, when I am lifted up” (changed in the TNIV to “And I, when I am lifted up”).

44 Note the emphatic personal pronouns ἡμεῖς (hēmeis, we) and σύ (sy, you) (Morris 1995: 532).

47 Regarding the people’s question “Who is this ‘Son of Man’?” see commentary at 1:51 and at 9:35–36. Ridderbos (1997: 441) takes the question to pertain to the nature of the Son of Man (“What kind of Son of man are you speaking of?”) rather than his identity. Morris (1995: 532) thinks that the crowd asks what the function of the Son of Man is and whether or not he is one and the same as the Messiah. Carson (1991: 445) notes that though four months earlier the Jewish authorities were unclear about whether or not Jesus used the “Son of Man” title messianically, the less knowledgeable crowd, already ripe with messianic expectations, made the “Son of Man = Messiah” connection. To the contrary, if taken at face value, the crowd’s question reveals not understanding, but misunderstanding, even ignorance, or at least confusion (so, rightly, Morris 1995: 533: “To the end they remain confused and perplexed, totally unable to appreciate the magnitude of the gift offered to them and the significance of the Person who offers it”).

50 See Morris 1995: 534. “Son of ...” reflects Hebrew idiom; the expression “sons of light,” however, is not attested in rabbinic literature. A “son of light” displays the moral qualities of “light” and has become a follower of the “light” (cf. Luke 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; Eph. 5:8). The phrase is also common in the DSS, where it designates members of the Qumran community (e.g., 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 20–21, 24–25; 4:11; 1QM 1:1, 3, 9, 11, 13). “Born of light” occurs in 1 Enoch 108:11. See also T. Naph. 2:10.

3 Thus, while τοσαῦτα (tosauta, so many, so great) may refer to both quantity and quality (Morris 1995: 536 n. 103), the latter is more likely in the present instance, since John selected only a few of Jesus’ most striking signs and recorded them in vivid detail (so, rightly, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.413).

9 This is the view of the majority of major commentators: e.g., Carson 1991: 449; Morris 1995: 538; Ridderbos 1997: 445; R. Brown 1966: 484.

11 In conjunction with the chief priests, the Pharisees are consistently shown in the Gospel to function as the most influential body in Jewish national life (7:32, 45; 11:47, 57; 18:3). Note the imperfect tense in οὐχ ὁμολόγουν (ouch hōmologoun, they were not confessing), conveying these “believers’ ... continuing failure to confess” (Morris 1995: 538 n. 122; though Morris’s overall analysis is hampered by use of an outmoded Greek verbal theory).

17 Ridderbos (1997: 448 n. 128) and Morris (1995: 540) note that both “I” and “light” are emphatic.

19 The emphatic αὐτός (autos, he) is noted by Morris (1995: 541), who also points to the perfects δέδωκεν (dedōken, he has given [12:49]) and εἶρηκεν (eirēken, he has told [12:50]) as underscoring the permanence of Jesus’ message.

20 The TNIV’s “leads to” eternal life perhaps is less than ideal (cf. Morris 1995: 541).

1 Cf. “six days before the Passover” in 12:1; “the next day” in 12:12. Carson (1991: 455–58) rightly concludes that Jesus and his disciples ate a true paschal meal on Thursday, 15 Nisan (contra Barrett 1978: 50–51; R. Brown 1970: 556; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.36). On the chronology of the passion narrative in John and the Synoptics (siding with Carson, despite Morris 1995: 688–90), see the sidebar in Köstenberger 1999a: 146, with further bibliographical references (see also Köstenberger 2002c: 130, 164, 173; Blomberg 1987: 175–80; Carson 1984: 530–32). Some seek to adjudicate apparent differences between the presentations in John and the Synoptics by the theory that differences in chronology are due to the use of different calendars. John, it is suggested, like the Judeans and the Sadducees, uses a lunar sunset-to-sunset calendar, while the Synoptics, like the Galileans, the Pharisees, and Jesus and his followers, employ a solar sunrise-to-sunrise reckoning (Hoehner 1977: 85–90; see chart on p. 89; Morris 1995: 684–95); or, John’s calendric usage shifts: his light-darkness theme (rooted in the Genesis account) is conveyed by way of a solar calendar, while elsewhere a lunar system is found (building on exodus redemptive motifs) (Busada 2003). However, these theories seem to lack a clear textual base in the Gospels themselves and are unnecessarily complicated if the solution argued here is adopted.

4 So Morris (1995: 544), citing Calvin (1961: 60), who denounces annual footwashing rites as “theatrical,” “empty and bare,” “ceremonial comedy,” and “shameful mockery of Christ.” See also Carson 1991: 458.

7 This is favored by Morris (1995: 545 n. 9) and Ridderbos (1997: 452); cf. Barrett 1978: 438; R. Brown 1970: 550. Carson (1991: 461), at least explicitly, remains undecided, though his translation reflects an intensive force.

14 Morris (1995: 547) notes the “vivid” historical presents used in this verse (see also 13:5a). The deponent form ἐγείρεται in 13:4 has an active meaning (as in 7:52; cf. BDAG 271).

33 So Schlatter 1948: 282. Morris (1995: 548 n. 22) notes the plural form ταῦτα (tauta, these things) and suggests that the expression “probably points to all the events associated with the Passion,” though he does say that in part, the “later” may refer to the explanation that Jesus soon will give. The latter is ruled out categorically by Schnackenburg (1990: 3.19) and, less categorically but still firmly, by Carson (1991: 463). However, a radical disjunction between Jesus’ explanation here and the events of the passion seems to be unnecessary.

42 This is noted by Morris (1995: 551), who says that the reversal “may be significant.” R. Brown (1970: 553) theorizes that “the order in which the two titles are mentioned may reflect the development of the disciples’ understanding, for ‘Teacher’ is more common in the earlier chapters of the Gospel and ‘Lord’ in the later chapters.” Morris (1995: 551 n. 34, citing BDF §147 [cf. Barrett 1978: 443; Beasley-Murray 1999: 229 n. g]) says that the nominative ὁ διδάσκαλος καὶ κύριος “is equivalent to a vocative,” though the phrase clearly functions as an apposition to ἐγώ in the present context.

52 So Morris 1995: 549 n. 27; apparently, Carson 1991: 464–66; and the UBS committee (Metzger 1994: 204), adducing the “preponderant weight of external attestation”; contra Barrett 1978: 442; Beasley-Murray 1999: 229 n. f; Lindars 1972: 451; D. M. Smith 1999: 254; Dunn 1970: 250–51.

12 Barrett (1978: 446) maintains that “the specially favoured disciple is represented as standing in the same relation to Christ as Christ to the Father” (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 238). Morris (1995: 555 n. 53) argues that Barrett goes too far and that there is only “a tender regard” between Jesus and the “disciple he loved.” Indeed, Barrett’s statement seems somewhat hyperbolic, though Morris’s reaction leads him to a wording that appears unduly minimalistic. The verbal allusion does suggest that an analogy is intended with regard to intimacy of relationship, without implying that the beloved disciple’s relationship with Jesus is identical to Jesus’ relationship with the Father in every respect.

417, 417n21, 423n5, 423n7, 424, 424n12, 424n13, 425, 425n19, 425n22, 427n30, 428, 430, 431, 431n48, 432, 434n64, 436n72, 436n73, 439, 439n80, 440, 440n83, 442n91,

18 Carson (1991: 474) suggests that “the momentous nature of Jesus’ confidence left him temporarily paralysed.” Barrett (1978: 447) says that the disciple’s “inactivity is incomprehensible.” Morris (1995: 558) thinks that the disciple “did not grasp the significance of the sop,” an option sharply rejected by Barrett (1978: 447), who objects that “to say that he failed to grasp the meaning of the sign is to make him an imbecile.”

21 The present verb ποιεῖς (poieis, you are doing) is conative (Wallace 1996: 535), denoting an action not yet begun but about to be attempted. Carson (1991: 475) and Morris (1995: 557 n. 63; cf. Barrett 1978: 448) suggest that τάχιον (tachion, quickly) should be construed as a genuine comparative and rendered “more quickly” (than Judas had planned). This would be in keeping with the way the comparative form of this word is used in its only other Johannine reference (20:4), though in its other two NT instances the form is simply elative, to be rendered “soon” or “quickly” (Heb. 13:19, 23). Hence, caution seems to be called for in drawing conclusions from the comparative form of the term in the present passage.

5 “New command” is in the emphatic position (Morris 1995: 562). The command probably harks back to the footwashing earlier in the chapter (Carson 1991: 484; Burge 2000: 376).

7 Lev. 19:18; cf. Matt. 5:43. For a general survey, see Morris, DJG 492–95.

12 In the Greek, “you” here is singular (directed specifically to Peter), while in 13:33 it is plural (addressed to the disciples in general) (Morris 1995: 563).

13 Cf. 10:11. Carson (1991: 486) aptly notes that Peter’s response “displays not only gross ignorance of human weakness, but a certain haughty independence that is the seed of the denial itself.” Peter has no response to Jesus’ prediction of his denials (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.57) and is not heard from again until 18:10 (Morris 1995: 564).

19 The Greek present imperative implies that the disciples were anxious already; the phrase therefore may be rendered as “stop being troubled” (Morris 1995: 565; Beasley-Murray 1999: 249; Köstenberger 1999a: 152).

22 Most commentators take both occurrences of πιστεύετε (pisteute, believe, trust) in 14:1 as imperatives (e.g., Carson 1991: 488; Morris 1995: 566; Beasley-Murray 1999: 249; Burge 2000: 391; Westcott 1908: 2.167; Köstenberger 1999a: 163). Alternatively, the first form may be an indicative: “You trust in God; trust also in me” (NIV footnote) or interrogative (Bultmann 1971: 600). Schnackenburg (1990: 3.59) notes that 14:1b forms a chiasm (“[You] Trust in God, also in me trust”).

30 See John 21:22–23; 1 Thess. 4:16–17. So, rightly, Morris 1995: 568. Contra Schnackenburg (1990: 3.62), who says that a reference to the parousia would be in contradiction to the Fourth Evangelist’s present eschatology, and Keener (1993: 299), who claims that Jesus’ coming after the resurrection to give the Spirit is in view. This certainly is the case in 16:16 (cf. 14:17–24), but it is more than doubtful whether Jesus’ comments in 14:2–3 indicate that he will prepare a place for the disciples in the interim between his crucifixion and his resurrection and then come back and take them with him at that time. After all, Jesus taught that the gospel must first be preached to all nations, and this will be done through Jesus’ followers.

48 In principle, “Philip” could conclude this sentence or commence the following one, the preferable option being the former (contra Morris 1995: 572 n. 25). The perfect ἐγνώκας (egnōkas, you know) has present meaning (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.69).

64 The word “love” occurs eight times in 14:15–24 (Morris 1995: 575).

72 “The Spirit is the divine presence when Jesus’ physical presence is taken away from his followers” (Morris 1989: 159). Startlingly, Borchert (2002: 121), on the basis of the second-person plural pronoun, seems to deny that 14:17 should be understood with reference to the personal experience of believers. By his logic, believers are to show their love for Jesus by obeying him corporately but not individually—a transparent absurdity.

73 Though, as Moloney (1998: 407) points out, there are differences between Jesus and the Spirit as well: the latter neither becomes flesh nor dies for our sins. Alternatively, the statement refers to Jesus’ postresurrection appearances to his followers (so Ridderbos 1997: 505; Carson 1991: 501; Morris 1995: 578–59; Beasley-Murray 1999: 258; Borchert 2002: 126). Barrett (1978: 464) says that the passage refers neither to Jesus coming in the person of the Holy Spirit nor to the parousia but rather is using language appropriate to both the resurrection and the parousia to refer to both.

80 See Morris (1995: 579), who says that “if this is accepted it must be in the sense of 20:22, where the Spirit was in some sense given on the day of resurrection”; and Bruce (1983: 303), who points out that the resurrection appearances were but brief and temporary. See also Barrett (1978: 464), who maintains that the primary reference is to the resurrection but the expression also extends to the presence of Christ in his disciples (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 258). In the patristic period, the Eastern church fathers understood the phrase “in a little while” to refer to the resurrection, while the Latin church thought that Jesus meant the parousia. Bultmann (1971: 619) contends that John’s source referred to the latter, with the evangelist demythologizing his source by reinterpreting it as the former. Hence, the second coming is swallowed up in Easter. However, this reconstruction is predicated upon Bultmann’s source theory regarding John’s Gospel as well as upon his existential approach to interpretation, including the categories of “myth” and “demythologization.” Yet note how even after his resurrection, Jesus refers to a future time at which he will return (21:22, 23). Moloney (1998: 403) implausibly contends that “that day” is Jesus’ hour and departure.

83 Morris (1995: 580–81) perceives that Judas’s question betrays a political hope.

91 The vast majority of commentators (including R. Brown, Barrett, Borchert, Morris, Carson, and Ridderbos) believe that teaching and reminding are in synonymous parallelism. On the Spirit’s teaching ministry, see the parallel in 16:13. Both verses together (14:26 and 16:13) echo Ps. 25:5 (cf. 25:9). See also Neh. 9:20 (cf. 1 John 2:20, 27). Regarding Jesus’ teaching, see John 6:59; 7:14, 28, 35; 8:20; 18:20. It is often argued that the use of the Greek masculine pronoun ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, he) for the Spirit in passages such as John 14:26; 15:26; and 16:13–14 affirms the personality of the Holy Spirit (Barrett 1978: 482; Borchert 2002: 159; Morris 1995: 583 n. 73 [citing Westcott]; 606 n. 64; 621 n. 27; and others cited in Wallace 1996: 331 n. 42). However, the most likely reason for John’s use of the masculine pronoun in these passages is that the antecedent is the masculine noun ὁ παράκλητος (ho paraklētos, the helping presence). If so, John’s use of a masculine pronoun to refer to the Spirit is best explained as a function of grammar rather than theology, and arguments for the personality of the Holy Spirit must be made on other grounds (so rightly Wallace 1996: 331–32, who points out that it is difficult to find any text where the neuter noun πνεῦμα [pneuma, spirit/Spirit] is grammatically referred to by the masculine).

95 Hence, 14:27 continues 14:25–26. See Kellum (2005: 164), who cites Witherington 1995: 253 and Brodie 1993: 469. In the Greek world, peace (εἰρήνη, eirēnē) was essentially a concept stated negatively, denoting the absence of war. Though this is also part of the term's range of meaning in Hebrew thought (e.g., Josh. 9:15; 1 Sam. 7:14; 1 Kings 2:5), the expression shālôm usually had much richer connotations, conveying the notion of positive blessing, especially that of a right relationship with God (Morris 1965a: 237–44; Lindars 1972: 484). This is evident in the well-known blessing given by Moses and Aaron (Num. 6:24–26; cf. Ps. 29:11; Hag. 2:9). The OT prophetic writings in particular look forward to a period of peace inaugurated by the coming of the Messiah. The “prince of peace” (Isa. 9:6) would “command peace to the nations” (Zech. 9:10; cf. 9:9), and there would be good tidings of peace and salvation (Isa. 52:7; cf. 54:13; 57:19; Acts 10:36). Through the royal Messiah, God would make an everlasting “covenant of peace” with his people (Ezek. 37:26).

98 So Carson 1991: 506; Morris 1995: 584; contra Ridderbos (1997: 511), who construes this clause not as conditional but causal (p. 494 n. 37).

2 Although vine imagery is widespread in ancient literature, an OT background for the present passage is favored by the vast majority of commentators, primarily owing to the frequent OT references or allusions and the replacement motif in this Gospel (e.g., Carson 1991: 513; R. Brown 1970: 669–71; Morris 1995: 593; Ridderbos 1997: 515; contra Bultmann 1971: 530; Witherington 1995: 255–57).

20 This is what, in application of Robert E. Longacre's methodology, may mark 15:1–17 as the peak of the entire farewell discourse (Kellum 2005: 193–96). In the present chapter, “remain” seems to serve as a metaphorical substitute for “believe.” On the “strange absence” of the word πιστεύω (pisteuō, believe) in John 15, see Morris 1995: 297 (cited in Croteau 2002: 111).

32 Note the parallel in 13:35 with reference to mutual love. See the (not entirely convincing) efforts of coming to terms with this in Morris (1995: 597), who concludes that discipleship is a process, so that the true disciple is always “becoming more fully a disciple.”

36 The perfect τετήρακα (tetēraka, I have kept) sounds the notion of completeness (R. Brown 1970: 663; Morris 1995: 597 n. 26).

48 Some may object that love for one's enemies would be greater; but the present passage is concerned only with the greatest possible way to show love for one's friends (Bultmann 1971: 542 n. 4; Morris 1995: 599; Carson 1991: 522).

52 Morris (1995: 599 n. 33) notes the emphatic personal pronouns ὑμεῖς (hymeis, you) and ἐγώ (egō, I), which set off Jesus' relationship with his disciples from the world. The converse does not follow: Jesus does not have to obey his followers in order to be called their friend (Carson 1991: 522; Kruse 2003: 321, who notes that Matt. 11:19 = Luke 7:34 is no real exception). Borchert (2002: 149) registers his concern that the hymn “What a Friend We Have in Jesus” may be unduly fraternizing.

58 This is summed up by the well-known dictum of Rabbi Joshua b. Perahyah (ca. 100 B.C.): “Provide yourself with a teacher and get yourself a fellow disciple” (m. Ḥabot 1.6; see Morris 1995: 600 n. 36).

2 Keener (2003: 1019) finds another micro-chiasm in 15:18–25, with 15:20ab (a servant is not greater than his master) at the center. The six conditional clauses in 15:18–24 represent warnings pertaining to the future (or present) of the Christian community in relation to the world. Such parting exhortations are a common feature of farewell discourses (Moloney 1998: 433). The present condition is second class: “If the world hates you—and it does” (Wallace 1996: 696; Borchert 2002: 154). On the “world,” see commentary at 1:9; the same phrase occurs in 1 John 3:13 (see also John 17:14). On the contrast between “above” and “below,” see 3:31; 8:23 (cf. 18:36–37). The form γινώσκετε (ginōskete, you know) can be read as an imperative (NIV; NRSV; NLT; ISV; ESV; HCSB; TNIV; Barrett 1978: 480) or an indicative (NASB; KJV), though admittedly the difference is marginal (R. Brown 1970: 686). The pronoun με is emphatic (Morris 1995: 602 n. 42). The perfect verb form μεμίσηκεν (memisēken, it hated) stresses the settled, completed state of the world’s hatred toward Jesus (Barrett 1978: 480; R. Brown 1970: 686; Morris 1995: 602 n. 44).

16 So Ridderbos 1997: 525; R. Brown 1970: 688; Morris 1995: 605; Barrett 1978: 482; Carson 1991: 527 n. 2.

30 See Carson 1991: 530; Barrett 1978: 484. Though note the lack of the article in the present instance (Morris 1995: 615 n. 4). The same phrase, ὥρα ἔρχεται (hōra erchetai, a time, hour is coming), occurs in John also in 4:21, 23; 5:25, 28; 16:25, 32.

59 So, rightly, Carson (1991: 543), who speaks of “Jesus’ departure in death and his return after his resurrection” (cf. Morris 1995: 623; Burge 2000: 440), and makes the point that these verses cannot apply to the parousia, because according to Jesus’ accompanying illustration in 16:20–24, there would have to be grief in the interim, while 15:11 promises joy. Contra Borchert (2002: 173 n. 295), who refers to Carson’s view as “narrow.”

68 Morris (1995: 628) notes the present tense of the imperative αἰτεῖτε (aiteite, ask) in 16:24, conveying the continual nature of the asking. Note also the presence of two different words for “ask,” ἐρωτάω (erōtaō) in 16:23 and αἰτέω (aiteō) three times in 16:23–24, whereby the former refers to the barrage of questions that the disciples had for Jesus prior to the crucifixion (cf. 16:5, 30), and the latter to prayer requests subsequent to his exaltation (see Carson 1991: 545, apparently dependent on Barrett 1978: 494; contra Borchert 2002: 176).

72 Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25; 1 John 2:1; cf. John 14:16; 17:9, 15, 20. See Carson 1991: 547; Ridderbos 1997: 543; Morris 1995: 629; Barrett 1978: 496.

7 See Morris 1995: 634; with further delineation of subunits, Hunter 1979: 326–28. Lindars (1972: 515) further divides 17:20–26 into 17:20–23 and 17:24–26. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.168–69, with reference to a 1973 German article) provides a more complicated proposal, dividing at 17:1–2, 4–5, 6–11a, 11b–16, 17–19, 22–23, 24–26 (he considers 17:3 and 17:20–21 to be secondary glosses). Others favor division at 17:1–8, 9–19, 20–26 (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 748–51). Malatesta (1971: 191–92) divides at 17:1–5, 6–8, 9–19, 20–24, 25–26 and proposes a strophic arrangement. More eccentric is the suggestion by Appold (1976: 204) that there is an oscillating pattern of petition and review, featuring six petition and six review units. A survey of structural proposals for John 17 up to the late 1970s is found in Hunter 1979: 312–28. More recently, Borchert (2002: 185–89) has favored seven petitions, based on the address “Father.” Yet, as Ridderbos (1997: 547) remarks, “The structure is not severe enough and the transitions are too fluid for us to speak of a detailed and sharply delineated thought scheme.”

18 According to 6:37–40, everyone who “looks to the Son and believes in him shall have eternal life” (cf. 1 John 2:23–25). In 10:27–28, Jesus is said to give life to “his sheep” who “listen to his voice.” Morris (1995: 636 n. 6) notes the frequency of the term δίδωμι (didōmi, give) in the present prayer and elaborates on its significance. The neuter πάν ὃ (pan ho, all that) focuses less on the persons as such and more on the God-given nature of Jesus’ authority (Morris 1995: 636 n. 9); R. Brown (1970: 741) suggests that it may “give a certain unity to the group.”

493, 493n47, 494, 494n51, 495, 496, 497n68, 498, 498n70, 500n88, 501n89, 503, 504n4, 504n5, 504n9, 505, 505n12, 505n13, 505n14, 507n22, 508, 512, 512n6, 513, 513n13,

19 The explanatory phrase “now this is” is in keeping with Johannine style (cf., e.g., 3:19: “this is the verdict”). The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) here, in typical Johannine idiom, is appositional (Wallace 1996: 475). Morris (1995: 638) notes that ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) here precedes the noun (elsewhere in John also in 4:23), and he proposes that this indicates emphasis. The verse is regularly seen by critical scholars as a Johannine insertion (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 741; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.172; Barrett 1978: 503; but see Carson 1991: 556; Ridderbos 1997: 549). 36 Cf. Exod. 3:13–15. See R. Brown 1970: 755; Carson 1991: 558; Morris 1995: 640; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.175.

47 R. Brown (1970: 759 [approvingly cited by Borchert 2002: 197]) says that ἐν (en, in, by) is both instrumental and local. Contra Carson (1991: 562) and Morris (1995: 644), who prefer a locative force (“in your name”).

51 So Morris 1995: 644–45: “characterized by ‘lostness,’ not ... predestined to be ‘lost.’” For example, in Isa. 57:4, “children of unrighteousness” in the MT becomes “children of perdition” in the LXX; the same phrase is found in Jub. 10:3.

68 R. Brown (1970: 769) notes a “grammatical parallelism” between six lines of 17:20–21 and six lines of 17:22–23. Morris (1995: 649) points to structural similarities between 17:21 and 17:23 and says the effect is to “add solemnity and emphasis.” See also the helpful thoughts in Black 1988: 155–59 on the kind of unity envisioned by Jesus.

70 Carson (1991: 568) maintains that such unity is achieved not by finding “the lowest common theological denominator, but by common adherence to the apostolic gospel, by love that is joyfully self-sacrificing, by undaunted commitment to the shared goals of the mission.”

Similarly, Morris (1995: 644) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 306–7). Schlatter (1948: 325) points out that unity is all the more important as the circle of believers in Jesus grows. He also notes the contrast between such unity and the existence of various sects in contemporary Judaism.

88 So Carson 1991: 570; cf. R. Brown 1970: 781; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.197; Borchert 2002: 211. Contra Morris (1995: 653), who thinks that it is through the cross. Ridderbos (1997: 566) suggests that this is not so much an anticipation of the passion as it is a reference “to Jesus’ continuing work in heaven.”

4 “With” here is σύν (syn) rather than μετά (meta), another instance of Johannine stylistic variation (Morris 1995: 655 n. 2). Moloney (1998: 484) notes the emphasis placed on the disciples in this Gospel in contrast with the Synoptics, contending that the “passion of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel may not only be about what happens to Jesus, but may also determine the future of the disciples.”

5 Morris (1995: 655) suggests that ἐξῆλθεν (exēlthen, they left) means they “went out of the house” (cf. Barrett 1978: 517). Carson (1991: 576) proposes that it means they left the city (cf. Bultmann 1971: 638).

9 The phrase “there was” rather than “there is” may indicate that the garden had been destroyed by the time of writing of John’s Gospel (Morris 1995: 655–56 n. 3).

12 So Blomberg 2002: 228–30; Burge 2000: 491; Morris 1995: 656 (though both the LXX and Josephus use the term also with reference to non-Roman military [2 Macc. 8:23; 12:20, 22; Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §215; J.W. 2.1.3 §11]). Cf. the cautious assessment by Ridderbos (1997: 575). Contra Keener (1993: 306), who maintains that both the “detachment of soldiers” and the “officials from the chief priests and Pharisees” refer to the temple police.

13 The term χιλίαρχος (chiliarchos) was used to translate the Roman tribunus militum, a commander of a cohort of six hundred or even as few as two hundred soldiers (e.g., Polybius, Histories 11.23; the LXX features twenty-nine instances of χιλίαρχος for civil or military officials). Stibbe (1992: 170) thinks that the σπεῖρα probably consisted of two hundred soldiers. See the discussion by Morris (1995: 656 n. 5), who suggests that the use of σπεῖρα with the definite article here may indicate that a specific cohort is meant.

14 As presumably is the case here (so Morris 1995: 656 n. 5; cf. Carson 1991: 577; Witherington 1995: 285; Borchert 2002: 218).

22 So Ridderbos 1997: 576; with reference to the threefold repetition of this phrase in this section, Morris 1995: 658 and Ball 1996: 201; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 322; Moloney 1998: 485; R. Brown 1970: 818; Borchert 2002: 219; Burge 2000: 492.

6 Though Annas is also mentioned by Luke (Luke 3:2; Acts 4:6). On the historical plausibility of such a trial, see Ridderbos 1997: 579–80. See also the excursus on the political and judicial situation in Israel during the time of Jesus in Borchert 2002: 224–26 and the chart showing the relationship of the four Gospels to one another concerning Jesus before the Jewish authorities in R. Brown 1970: 830–31. John 18:12a–b can be construed either with 18:1–11 (Beasley-Murray 1999: 324; Moloney 1998: 486; Barrett 1978: 523) or with 18:12c–14 (so Ridderbos 1997: 578; Morris 1995: 664; R. Brown 1970: 819).

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235). Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

16 So Morris 1995: 665–66 n. 35, citing Dodd; Carson 1991: 581; Barrett 1978: 526; but see Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 3. The term is used for a “close friend” in the LXX (e.g., 2 Kings 10:11; Ps. 54:14 [55:13 Eng.]; cf. Luke 2:44; see also NewDocs 4.44; Homer, Iliad 15.350).

21 Morris (1995: 667 n. 44) sees this as a mark of the Fourth Evangelist’s “fondness for exact detail.” Borchert (2002: 231) notes the literary link established between the present verse and the reference to a “charcoal fire” in 21:9 (the only two occurrences of this term in the NT).

24 Among those viewing the present hearing in more unofficial terms are Carson (1991: 584), Ridderbos (1997: 582), and R. Brown (1970: 826). Most other major commentators consider this to be an official trial (e.g., Morris, Barrett). On the Sadducees’ reputation for judging in general, Josephus writes that “the school of the Sadducees ... are indeed more heartless than any of the other Jews ... when they sit in judgment” (Ant. 20.9.1 §199).

33 Apparently, Jesus did not consider his response to be in violation of his “turning the other cheek” principle (see the discussions in Ridderbos 1997: 583; Morris 1995: 670 n. 55; Carson 1991: 585). Schlatter (1948: 335) resolves the apparent difficulty by noting that Jesus merely pointed out the abuse without fighting for his rights. In fact, “Turning the other cheek without bearing witness to the truth is not the fruit of moral resolution but the terrorized cowardice of the wimp” (Carson 1991: 585). Contrast also Jesus’ response with Paul’s in Acts 23:2–5, where the apostle lost his temper and called the high priest “you whitewashed wall” (see Carson 1991: 584–85).

35 “Bound” in 18:24 corresponds to “bound” in 18:12 (though it is unclear whether Jesus had been bound throughout the entire proceedings or whether he was rebound after those; see Morris 1995: 670–71).

38 Ridderbos (1997: 584 n. 46) and Morris (1995: 672) claim that the wording indicates the expectation of a negative answer, though once again the force may be more that of a cautious assertion (see commentary at 18:17).

41 Though note that in the third instance Peter’s exact words are not cited (Morris 1995: 673). Barrett (1978: 529) considers John’s “abrupt ending” even more effective than Mark’s presentation.

9 See Carson 1991: 588; Beasley-Murray 1999: 317 n. h; Morris 1995: 674–75. R. Brown (1970: 844) sees the hearing before Annas as concluding at 3:00 A.M., Jesus before Caiaphas from 3:00 to 6:00 A.M., and before Pilate from 6:00 A.M. until noon.

21 Barrett 1978: 533–35; Morris 1995: 695–97; Hengel 1999: 330; Winter 1974. See especially the references in Josephus (J.W. 2.8.1 §117; Ant. 20.9.1 §§197–203 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 164]). Cf. the acknowledgment in talmudic literature that the Jews had lost this power “forty years” before the destruction of Jerusalem (y. Sanh. 1.1; 7.2; on “forty years,” see commentary at 18:24 above; loss of this power may have occurred as early as A.D. 6; see also Legasse 1997: 54–56).

28 Πάλιν (palin) here hardly means “again,” since there is no previous reference to Pilate entering the palace. Here the term means “back,” as in 6:15; 10:40 (Morris 1995: 679 n. 78).

65 Similarly most translations (including the TNIV, NASB, NLT, NKJV); alternatively, the meaning is “very afraid,” since there is no previous reference to Pilate being afraid (see Carson 1991: 600; Morris 1995: 704; Barrett 1978: 542; Conway 1999: 159).

67 See the later incident recounted in Philo, Gaius 38 §§299–305, and the parallel in Josephus, J.W. 2.9.2–3 §§169–74. So Carson 1991: 600; cf. Morris 1995: 704. Yet see P. Maier 1969.

72 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 601; cf. Morris 1995: 705; Beasley-Murray 1999: 340; Burge 2000: 505; Borchert 2002: 254. Contra Barrett (1978: 543), who thinks that the singular participle constructed from the verb παραδίδωμι (paradidōmi, I hand over) suggests Judas. See also the discussions by Schnackenburg (1990: 3.261–63) and Ridderbos (1997: 603), both of whom ultimately point to the Jews as the most likely referent. Stibbe (1992: 170) concludes that “the one” in 19:11 probably refers to Caiaphas as a representative of the Jewish nation, as the evangelist has a propensity to implicate the Jews in Jesus’ death.

78 The verb ἐκάθισεν (ekathisen, he sat) is intransitive, with Pilate, not Jesus, being the one sitting down (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 605; Carson 1991: 608; Morris 1995: 707 n. 31). Barrett (1978: 544) thinks that this is an instance of Johannine double meaning, though, as R. Brown (1970: 881) rightly objects, “the phenomenon [of double meaning] has not been based on syntactical ambiguity, nor is it usual for the second meaning to be opposite of the first.”

83 Cf. Did. 8:1; Mart. Pol. 7:1. See Torrey 1931 (including his critique of Str-B 2:834–85 on pp. 235–36); Higgins 1954–55: 206–9; Story 1989: 318; Blomberg 1987: 177–78; Morris 1995: 708; Ridderbos 1997: 606.

84 So, correctly, the NIV; see also Carson 1991: 604; contra Barrett 1978: 545; R. Brown 1970: 882–83, 895. Also contra those who, like Morris (1995: 684–95, esp. 604–95), contend that Jesus and the temple authorities followed different calendars, with the Synoptics using Jesus' calendar (according to which the meal was the Passover) and John using that of the temple authorities (according to whom the sacrificial animals were slain the following day; hence, Jesus was sacrificed as our Passover).

538, 539, 541n2, 544n19, 544n20, 545, 545n27, 545n29, 547n35, 548n43, 548n44, 549, 549n47, 550n53, 551n60, 551n61, 552n67, 553, 556n87, 560n1, 561, 561n2, 561n4,

2 So, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 608; Carson 1991: 608; Morris 1995: 711; Beasley-Murray 1999: 344; Borchert 2002: 260; Burge 2000: 524. Contra Moloney (1998: 506, following R. Brown), who contends that "the Jews" are the subject of the verb.

19 Morris (1995: 713) suggests that the καί (kai, also) of 19:19 may indicate that the notice was another means used by Pilate to disgrace the Jews.

20 Cf. the causative use of "flogged" in 19:1. So the majority of commentators, including R. Brown 1970: 901; Carson 1991: 610; Morris 1995: 713; Barrett 1978: 549 (but see Borchert 2002: 265). See also commentary at 19:40.

27 According to Morris (1995: 714 n. 51), the reference to the "chief priests of the Jews" may be designed to create a contrast with the "king of the Jews."

29 The double perfect of γέγραφα (gegrapha, I have written) conveys a sense of finality, portraying Pilate's action as a fait accompli (Ridderbos 1997: 609 n. 134; Morris 1995: 714 n. 54). Bultmann (1971: 670 n. 2 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 902]) suggests that the first perfect is aoristic; Wallace (1996: 577) lists 19:22 as an example of an extensive perfect focusing on the completion of an action in the past. Similar word combinations are found also in the LXX (Gen. 43:14; Esth. 4:16; 1 Macc. 13:38) and in rabbinic literature (b. Menah. 3a; b. Ketub. 96a; b. Yebam. 106b) (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; further instances are cited in Schlatter 1948: 349). Perhaps significantly, similar phrases are found also in a Roman context (note Cicero, Epistulae ad Quintum fratrem 1.2.2; 1.2.13: scripsi, scripsi). Keener's (2003: 1138) observation that every other instance of "written" in this Gospel refers to Scripture (2:17; 6:31, 45; 8:17; 10:34; 12:14, 16; 15:25), which cannot be broken (10:35), seems of doubtful relevance here.

35 The general conclusion of commentators is that the reference to the "seamless robe" may not necessarily have theological significance (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 610 n. 136; cf. Morris 1995: 715, esp. n. 56; Bultmann 1971: 671). Both Witherington (1995: 309) and R. Brown (1970: 920–22) note several possibilities yet caution against dogmatic conclusions (see also Carson 1991: 614). Barrett (1978: 550) sees an allusion to Jesus' death resulting in "the scattered children of God."

43 So also the vast majority of commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Morris 1995: 716–17; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Bultmann 1971: 672; Borchert 2002: 268; R. Brown 1970: 904; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.276. Ridderbos (1997: 611 n. 142) notes that in light of Mark 15:40 and Matt. 27:56, there could have been other women there as well. See also Luke 23:49.

44 See Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 616; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Burge 2000: 528; contra Barrett 1978: 551–52; Bultmann 1971: 672 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.277. Carson (1991: 616 [cf. Morris 1995: 717]) notes that, like Jesus' mother's sister, Jesus' mother is also unnamed here and elsewhere in the Gospel (as is the "disciple Jesus loved" in 19:26–27).

47 Commentators have detected various types of symbolism in this scene. Bultmann (1971: 673), true to F. C. Baur, sees Mary as representative of Jewish Christianity, and the beloved disciple of Gentile Christianity, the latter being charged to honor the former as its "mother," from whom it originated (cf. Brodie 1993: 549). Witherington (1995: 309) views these two characters as symbolic of a new Adam and Eve, who are obedient whereas the former were not. Carson (1991: 618, following M. Gourgues) suggests that Mary, on account of her faith in Christ, is now able metaphorically to become a mother to a new son supplied for her by Jesus (cf. Matt. 19:29; see also Witherington 1995: 310). Beasley-Murray (1999: 350, following Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278) sees Mary as representing that part of Israel that is willing to believe in Jesus as the Messiah. Refreshingly, and refusing to resort to symbolism or allegory, Morris (1995: 718) says the beloved disciple simply “provided her [Mary] with a roof” and took her under his care. Others focus on lessons (to be) learned by Mary, such as needing to “step back in submission to the law of life that the Father has set for her son” (Ridderbos 1997: 612) or to receive the gift of salvation that she desired to receive at the wedding in Cana (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278; Beasley-Murray 1999: 350; Borchert 2002: 269).

53 The vast majority of commentators connect the reference to Scripture being fulfilled with Jesus’ statement (e.g., Carson 1991: 619; Barrett 1978: 553; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; though Morris [1995: 719] seems to suggest that it might be deliberately ambiguous). Contra R. Brown (1970: 908), who seems to prefer linking Jesus’ statement with his words to Mary and the beloved disciple.

60 Borchert 2002: 272–73; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.284; contra Bultmann 1971: 675. The same word, παραδίδομι (paradidōmi, give up) is used in Isa. 53:12 to describe the death of the suffering Servant (Morris 1995: 721 n. 81).

61 So the vast majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 618; Carson 1991: 622; Barrett 1978: 555; Morris 1995: 730; Bultmann 1971: 676). Contra Borchert (2002: 273 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 933]), who seems to suggest that Jesus died on Nisan 14 and thus was being portrayed as the Passover lamb.

67 See Lev. Rab. 15.2 on Lev. 13:2. Commentators disagree as to whether or not the present reference is intended to counter incipient Docetism, which denied Jesus’ full humanity at his death. Some consider this unlikely (Ridderbos [1997: 620], who thinks that the present passage is simply designed to further support the reliability and eyewitness nature of the account; R. Brown 1970: 949–52), while a majority favors such a polemic purpose (e.g., Carson [1991: 623], who sees this verse as the “counterpoint” to 1:14; Barrett 1978: 556; Morris 1995: 724; Beasley-Murray 1999: 356; Borchert 2002: 276–77; Burge 2000: 532).

87 Carson (1991: 631 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 959]) suggests that by mentioning that no one had previously been placed in the tomb, the evangelist intends to help the reader realize that only one person was in the tomb and that only that same person could have been resurrected three days later. This may find support in the emphatic way in which this is stated in the original Greek: οὐδέπω οὐδεὶς (oudepō oudeis, no one ever before) (Morris 1995: 730 n. 115). Matthew 27:60 indicates that this was Joseph of Arimathea’s “own new tomb, which he had cut in the rock.”

1 For a discussion of this pericope’s relationship to the Synoptics, see Ridderbos 1997: 629–30 (see also Morris 1995: 732; R. Brown 1970: 996). Ridderbos (1997: 630–31) also defends the historicity of the event over against Bultmann (1971: 685), who denies historicity and takes an allegorical approach. On historical questions surrounding the Johannine account of Jesus’ resurrection and appearances, see also Keener 2003: 1167–78.

2 Cf. Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; cf. 1 Cor. 15:4; see Carson 1991: 635. The expression “on the first day of the week” reads more literally, “on one of the Sabbath [week]” and may allude to the week of creation (cf. Gen. Rab. 11.9 on Gen. 2:3). Morris (1991: 733 n. 7 [cf.

Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. a]) notes that σαββάτων (sabbatōn) can mean either “Sabbath” or “week” (contra R. Brown [1970: 980], who claims that the meaning “week” emerged only later). The use of the cardinal numeral (“one”) for the ordinal (“first”) may represent a Semitism (Barrett 1978: 562; cf. Morris 1995: 733 n. 6; Beasley-Murray 1999: 366; Moloney 1998: 521; Lindars 1972: 599).

4 Carson (1991: 635–36 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 371]) suggests that Mary was alone during her first trip to the tomb (contra Morris 1995: 734; Moloney 1998: 522; Witherington 1995: 323; Burge 2000: 553). Mary’s witness was not used as significantly in the preaching of the early church as that of Peter, doubtless because evidence provided by a woman was held in lesser esteem (e.g., m. Roš Haš. 1.8). This is underscored by the fact that Jesus’ encounter with Mary is not included in the resurrection appearances to the disciples cited in 21:14.

15 Morris 1995: 734; cf. Bernard 1928: 2:262. Contra Carson (1991: 635, following Bultmann), who maintains that the plural “we” is “merely a mode of speech, without plural referent.”

18 The word παρακύπτω (parakypō, stoop to see) is in the LXX regularly used to describe peering through a door or window (Judg. 5:28; Prov. 7:6; Song 2:9; Sir. 14:23; 21:23). See Morris 1995: 735 n. 17, following BAGD 619 (= BDAG 767).

21 Carson (1991: 637) denies that the burial cloths still retained the shape of Jesus’ body (cf. Morris 1995: 735; Beasley-Murray 1999: 372; R. Brown 1970: 1007–8). But Whitacre (1999: 473) says, “With the body gone, the clothes were presumably collapsed, though perhaps retaining much of their shape due to the spices.”

22 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 637; Barrett 1978: 563; Morris 1995: 735; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.311; Moloney 1998: 523. Carson also suggests that the fact that the graveclothes were still in the tomb is intended to create a contrast with Lazarus, who left the tomb with his graveclothes on (11:44) (cf. Barrett 1978: 563; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.311; Beasley-Murray 1999: 372; Moloney 1998: 519–20).

24 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 638; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Borchert 2002: 295; R. Brown 1970: 987; Bultmann 1971: 684; Burge 2000: 554; Laney 1992: 360. Witherington (1995: 325) suggests, less plausibly, that the beloved disciple believed that Jesus had been taken by God similar to Elijah. Morris (1995: 736) notes that the two verbs do not have explicit objects, supplying the graveclothes as the object of the beloved disciple’s “seeing” and Jesus’ resurrection as that of the disciple’s “believing” (albeit without understanding its full theological significance). Hardly plausible is the suggestion by Minear (1983: 91 n. 14, with reference to 1976 [followed by Conway 1999: 189–90]) that what the disciples believed was the statement of Mary Magdalene in 20:2.

25 Carson (1991: 638–39 [contra Bultmann 1971: 684]) suggests, on the basis of Luke 24:12, that Peter did not believe at this time (cf. D. M. Smith 1999: 374). Byrne (1985: 92) calls him “the odd-man-out” within the context of John 20. Morris (1995: 737, following Michaels 1989: 336) says that Peter could have believed, and the evangelist may have chosen to present the beloved disciple’s reaction as his own while describing Peter from an external point of view.

1 The term κλαίω (klaiō, cry) denotes the loud wailing typical of people in the ancient Near East (Morris 1995: 739 n. 30; Borchert 2002: 297–98; see commentary at 11:31).

12 The only other NT instance is Mark 10:51. John here translates the word for his Hellenistic audience (see commentary at 1:38, 41). For targumic background material, see Morris 1995: 741 nn. 39–40.

569n14, 572, 572n2, 572n5, 572n8, 573n10, 573n11, 573n12, 574n13, 574n15, 575, 576, 577, 578n3, 579, 579n6, 580, 580n14, 582, 583n2, 588n2, 589n7, 589n12, 590n17,

14 Commentators are not agreed as to whether Mary had already touched Jesus or was about to do so. Some say that Mary had already touched him (e.g., Morris 1995: 742; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.318; Witherington 1995: 331; R. Brown 1970: 992; Burge 2000: 555), while others seem to allow for the possibility that she was about to but had not yet done so (e.g., Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. g, 376; Bultmann 1971: 687). Regarding Mary's devotion, see Ruth 1:16. Stibbe (1993: 205) says that the present passage is "most stylized" and detects intertextual echoes with Song 3:1–3.

2 Cf. Luke 24:33. Barrett (1978: 568) contends that it is impossible to know the extent of the gathering but that even if only "the ten" were present, they are still representative of the entire church. Morris (1995: 745) and R. Brown (1970: 1022, 1034) favor a larger group beyond the apostles including also other disciples (contra Carson 1991: 646, 656).

5 The preposition εἰς (eis, into) may convey motion toward the disciples (Morris 1995: 745 n. 52).

8 Only John mentions that Jesus showed his followers his side (Morris 1995: 745 n. 53). Note also the opening καί (kai, and) in 20:20, which is unusual for John, who normally prefers asyndeton. Morris (ibid.) suggests that the use of the double καί may seek to stress "the completeness of the process."

10 The aorist ἐχάρησαν (echarēsan, they rejoiced) may point to a sudden influx of joy at the sight of their resurrected Lord (Morris 1995: 746 n. 54).

11 Morris (1995: 746) sees the conjunction οὖν (oun, then, so) conveying the notion that the disciples' rejoicing was the result of their recognition of Jesus on the basis of his showing them his hands and side.

12 The statement harks back to 17:18, albeit without reference to the sphere of the disciples' commission (i.e., the world), indicating that the emphasis in the present passage is on the disciples' authorization rather on the realm of their activity (Ridderbos 1997: 643). Compare also the general statement in 13:20, which suggests that the present passage extends beyond the original disciples to later generations of believers (Morris 1995: 746 n. 55).

13 The vast majority of the instances of "sending" in John's Gospel relate to Jesus' having been sent by the Father. "Sending" terminology also occurs with regard to God's sending of the Baptist, the Father's and the Son's sending of the Spirit, and Jesus' sending of his disciples. The present passage features two "sending" verbs, πέμπω (pempō) and ἀποστέλλω (apostellō), with no apparent difference in meaning (as is the virtual consensus among major commentators, including Ridderbos, Morris, Carson, Barrett, Schnackenburg, and R. Brown; see also Köstenberger 1999c: 125–43). Morris (1995: 746 n. 56) notes that this is already suggested by the use of καθώς (kathōs, just as) linking the two verbs.

15 The absence in the Greek of the article in the expression "Holy Spirit" may indicate a focus on "the quality of the gift of the Holy Spirit rather than on the individuality of the Spirit" (Morris 1995: 747 n. 59).

3 Thomas's comments at 11:16 perhaps display similar skepticism (if not sarcasm). Ridderbos (1997: 646–47) believes that Thomas's response does not represent "a serious condition for belief" but rather shows how ridiculous he thought his fellow disciples' statement was. Morris (1995: 752) suggests that Thomas's response shows how traumatized he was by the circumstances of Jesus' death and the degree of his injuries. Both of these views are possible but hard to verify and not necessarily accurate. See further discussion below.

6 So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 647) and most major commentators (e.g., Morris 1995: 753; Witherington 1995: 344; Carson 1991: 657; Moloney 1998: 537; Barrett 1978: 572; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.332; contra Borchert 2002: 314; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

14 So, rightly, the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 197: 648; Morris 1995: 754; Carson 1991: 659; Beasley-Murray 1999: 386; Burge 2000: 563; Barrett 1978: 573; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.334; contra Borchert 2002: 316; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

2 As always, undertaken at Jesus' initiative (Carson 1991: 668; cf. Morris 1995: 760). The term also occurs in 21:14, marking off 21:1–14 as the first of two scenes in this chapter (Gaventa 1996: 242).

7 This, incidentally, is yet another argument against reading 20:22 as indicating an actual impartation of the Spirit at that point. Had they already received the Spirit, it would be almost inexplicable why Peter went back to fishing so soon after that event. So, rightly, Carson (1991: 669–70 [cf. Morris 1995: 760]): “It is impossible to imagine any of this taking place in Acts, after Pentecost ... this is not the portrait of believers who have received the promised Paraclete.” Barrett (1978: 579) considers it “unthinkable” that Peter and his fellow disciples “should contemplate a return to their former occupation after the events of chapter 20.” Contra Keener (2003: 1227), who argues against negative interpretations of the disciples' return to fishing in 21:3, saying that the disciples simply made use of free time (citing Bruce 1983: 399). Keener also cites Beasley-Murray's (1999: 399) contention that, even though Jesus had risen from the dead, the disciples must still eat.

12 The reference to Jesus “standing” (ἵστημι, histēmi) at the shore is part of a pattern of describing Jesus' presence in the resurrection narratives (cf. 20:14, 19, 26; see Ridderbos 1997: 659). Morris (1995: 761) notes, “It is not said that he came there or the like, and the choice of language may be a hint at the kind of thing we see in earlier passages, where Jesus suddenly appears behind closed doors.”

17 Morris (1995: 762 n. 17, citing H. V. Morton) conjectures that an individual on the shore may be able to see better than the one fishing and thus may plausibly direct the latter on where to cast the net. Similarly, Laney (1992: 375) suggests that “perhaps the disciples thought the stranger on the shore could see a school of fish near the surface of the water.”

23 Note the translation by R. Brown (1970: 1066): “Simon Peter tucked in his outer garment (for he was otherwise naked).” Similarly, Morris (1995: 763) contends “that here the word means that parts of the body normally covered were exposed, so that Peter was not naked but rather ‘stripped for work.’ ”

24 So, rightly, Barrett 1978: 580–81; Morris 1995: 762 n. 19 (though Soards [1983: 283] may have a point when he says “that the impetuous Peter met in this story would not have modesty uppermost in his mind”). Cf. t. Ber. 2.20.

28 Ridderbos (1997: 662) notes how Jesus involves his followers as those who will continue his work on earth (more restrained is Morris [1995: 764]). This, of course, has already been his practice during his earthly ministry (e.g., 6:5–13). Moreover, care must be taken not to overreach in finding symbolism in every detail of this or other Johannine narratives. For instance, it would be wrong to infer from the present instance a kind of synergism in which believers collaborate with Jesus in his provision as if what Jesus provides were insufficient to meet their needs.

4 This is somewhat overlooked by Morris (1995: 772), who notes that love is indispensable for Christian service and adduces as a parallel 1 Cor. 13:1–3.

14 Note further the verbal link between the reference to Jesus' "lifting up" (i.e., crucifixion) in 12:32–33 and the reference to Peter's future destiny in 21:19. See Carson 1991: 679–80; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Barrett 1978: 585. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 667); Morris (1995: 773); and Schnackenburg (1990: 3.366–67), who believe that the reference is more generally to martyrdom.

5 Most likely, Peter, just having been told that he would be martyred in the future, wants to know if, once again, the beloved disciple will fare better and be spared a similar fate. Contra Morris (1995: 774), who construes Peter's motivation much more positively: "Happy in his own position, Peter now gave thought to his friend." The words "if I want him to remain" emphasize Jesus' authority and power, which is not accountable to Peter (Ridderbos 1997: 668–69).

8 So Carson (1991: 682), who contends, "It seems simpler to think that the circulating rumour is making the rounds while the beloved disciple is still alive, but advancing in years, and he is determined to stifle it as well as he can for fear of the damage that would be done if he died before the Lord's return" (cf. Morris 1995: 775). Jackson (1999: 21–22) maintains that 21:23 "makes perfectly good sense as a corrective from a living Beloved Disciple anxious to dispel what he feels are overly enthusiastic eschatological inferences being drawn by some from Jesus' words."

13 As Carson (1991: 686) perceptively notes, "It is as if John had identified himself (v. 24), but is not content to focus on himself, not even on his veracity. He must close by saying his own work is only a minute part of all the honours due the Son."

21 Similarly, Morris (1995: 775), who vaguely refers to "people respected in the church who knew the facts of the case." Osborne (1981: 327, following Dodd) favors "the community as a whole as separate from the author of the epilogue." Moloney (1998: 562) focuses more on the way in which the "we" of 21:24 "involves [later] generations of Christian readers who know that this witness is true and who can give witness to their own belief."

17 Morris (1995: 762 n. 17, citing H. V. Morton) conjectures that an individual on the shore may be able to see better than the one fishing and thus may plausibly direct the latter on where to cast the net. Similarly, Laney (1992: 375) suggests that "perhaps the disciples thought the stranger on the shore could see a school of fish near the surface of the water."

24 On Jesus as the replacement and fulfillment of the temple in John's Gospel, see especially Coloe 2001; Johnson 2001; Hoskins 2002; and Kerr 2002. For a treatment that links this Johannine motif with the composition of the Fourth Gospel, see Motyer 1997 and Köstenberger forthcoming. On Jesus and Israel's traditions of judgment and restoration, see Bryan 2002.

21 Motyer (1997: 152–53) plausibly suggests that 7:14–24 is designed to enable the reader to make an appropriate judgment concerning the death of Jesus. If the Jews are correct, Jesus is a sinner, demon-possessed, and the like. If Jesus' claims are valid, it is the Jews who are misleading the people, not Jesus. Keener (2003: 721) discerns a common structure in 7:14–36 and 7:37–52: (1) Jesus teaches in the temple (7:14–24; 7:37–39), (2) people speculate about his identity (7:25–29, 31; 7:40–43), and (3) an attempt to arrest him fails (7:30, 32–36; 7:44–52, citing Talbert 1992: 145, following Lindars).

81 For further discussion of this issue, including bibliographic references, see Morris 1995: 385

Moule, C. F. D. 83, 328n27, 329n31, 587
p 659 Moulton, J. H. 514
Mounce, R. H. 92
Mowvley, H. 40, 41, 42, 45, 47, 49
Müller, M. 294
Muller, R. A. 129
Munck, J. 7n17

n. 115. Motyer (1997: 154) suggests that the reference is to “the prophet” of Deut. 18:15.

4 The conjunction οὖν (oun, so, then) in 8:12 and 8:13, as elsewhere in this Gospel (cf. 8:21, 22, 25), is transitional in nature (Wallace 1996: 674). Motyer (1997: 155–56) plausibly suggests that this conjunction in 8:12 connects with 7:37–38, noting the continuation of themes from the Feast of Tabernacles. He also suggests that the same conjunction in 8:12 also corresponds to 7:52 because John is going to show that the Messiah can indeed come from Galilee. This is based on the prophecy of Isa. 9:1–2.

40 So Carson 1991: 344; R. Brown 1966: 347; cf. Motyer 1997: 159, referring to 8:12 and 5:19–30.

73 Note the absence of the personal pronoun with τοῦ πατρός (tou patros, of the father), which harks back to 8:38. Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 315. Τοῦ διαβόλου (tou diabolou, of the devil) stands in apposition to τοῦ πατρός rather than implying that the devil has a father (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.213). For a study of 8:31–59 taking 8:44 as its point of departure, see Motyer (1997: esp. 160–210), who argues that the present interchange does not serve an anti-Jewish purpose, but rather is designed to persuade Jews that Jesus is the Christ.

27 For a similar delay, see 7:4–10 (noted by Moule 1975: 118). Keener (2003: 839) observes that in 4:40 Jesus also remains two additional days. Westcott (1908: 2.82) comments, “Because the Lord loved the family He went at the exact moment when His visit would be most fruitful, and not just when He was invited.”

31 Stibbe (1994: 51) paraphrases as follows: “I can return to Judea because the hour for my death (the hour of darkness) is not quite upon us. I will therefore not be killed (‘stumble’) at Bethany because I am still ministering in a season of pre-ordained security (daylight).” The saying is not without Jewish parallels (e.g., b. Sanh. 38b). Pollard (1973: 438, following Henderson 1920–21) somewhat implausibly suggests that the present statement indicates that Jesus “waited for light,” that is, divine guidance, and hence the delay. But see the critique in Moule 1975: 118–20.

17 One tricky piece of evidence concerns the second-century writer Papias (cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.4–5), a contemporary of Polycarp, who, in turn, was a disciple of the apostle John (on the date of Papias, see Yarbrough 1983; Munck 1959). Papias (at least to Eusebius) seems to refer to two separate Johns, the apostle and a “John the elder.” On this basis some have conjectured that the latter, rather than the former, wrote the Fourth Gospel. However, there is no need to drive a wedge between the two references to John in the passage in question. To the contrary, John may be designated “the elder” in the latter part of the quotation precisely because he is grouped with the elders mentioned earlier in the same passage. For a sound critique of the “John the elder” hypothesis, see Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 141–43. Keener (2003: 95–98) likewise challenges the reliability of Eusebius’s interpretation of Papias, owing to the former’s agenda of seeking to denigrate the Apocalypse. Keener (2003: 102–3) also includes an insightful discussion of the plausibility of John writing the Gospel at an advanced age. See also the works

Murphy-O'Connor, J. 106n19

Mussies, G. 239n50

Neirynck, F. 558n3, 585n8

Nelson, D. P. 157n55

cited in Bauckham 1993: 27 n. 17 and the important essay by Hill (1998), who adduces from Eusebius's (Hist. eccl. 3.24.5–13, esp. 11) reference to Papias (without naming him) that Papias held John the apostle to be the author of the Fourth Gospel (contra Bauckham 1993; Hengel 1989a; note my review of Hengel's more extensive 1993 German monograph on the subject, Köstenberger 1996). For studies of the external evidence regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, see Bauckham 1993: 24 n. 1.

19 Several commentators also mention that Tyrian coinage would have been preferred because it did not bear effigies (Moloney 1998: 76; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38 n. c; R. Brown 1966: 115; Borchert 1996: 163). However, this is disputed by Murphy-O'Connor (2000: 47, referring to Ben-David 1969), who cites evidence that Tyrian shekels "carried the head of the god Melkart (or Herakles) on the obverse and a Tyrian (Ptolemaic) eagle on the reverse with the inscription 'Tyre the holy and inviolable.'" Murphy-O'Connor also notes the minting of Jewish shekels carrying the legend "shekel of Israel/Jerusalem [is/the] holy" at the onset of the Jewish war in A.D. 66 (pp. 47–48, citing Schürer 1973–79: 1.605), and he points to the Qumran interpretation of a one-time requirement in 4Q159 frag. 1, col. 2, lines 6–7 (p. 49).

50 Does this imply that Jesus' contemporaries thought him capable of instructing Gentiles in the Diaspora by using Greek? If so, the present passage would provide indirect evidence that Jesus was known to at least speak (if not write) Greek. On the question of the language of Jesus, see the surveys by C. Rabin and G. Mussies in Safrai and Stern 1976: 1007–64 (plus the bibliography cited there); see also Silva 1991 (plus the bibliography cited there on p. 222 n. 3).

3 Note the lack of consensus on the relationship between the Johannine empty tomb narrative and those found in the Synoptics: see, for example, the studies by Neirynck (1984), who detects a "determinative" Synoptic influence on the Fourth Evangelist; Lindars (1956), who says that John's sources are traditions that lie behind the Synoptics rather than the Synoptics themselves; and Curtis (1971), who makes the implausible suggestion that Luke used John rather than vice versa.

8 See Ridderbos (1997: 656 n. 3), who cites Schlatter: "The attribution of the new narrative to another author is impossible, however, since the identical linguistic conventions have been fully maintained." Even Bultmann (1971: 700) declares, "Language and style admittedly afford no sure proof." Similarly, Neirynck (1990: 336) concludes that "the evidence of style and vocabulary ... is ambiguous and not decisive." Barrett (1978: 576) provides a list of words used in chapter 21 but not in chapters 1–20. See also Breck (1992: 36), who notes that words unique to chapter 21 in John's Gospel are either "technical expressions linked to the fishing trade" (ἀλιεύω, πιάζω, αἰγιαλός, προσφάγιον, δίκτυον, σύρω, ἀποβαίνω) or particular expressions required by their respective contexts (πρωῖα, ἐπενδύτης, γυμνός, βόσκω, ἀρνίον, ποιμαίνω, προβάτιον [variant of πρόβατα, the more likely reading in 21:16–17]).

55 The OT occasionally establishes a relationship between "word" and "spirit" (Neh. 9:20, 30; Ps. 33:6; 147:18; Isa. 59:21). In John's Gospel, Jesus is the Word (1:14), has received the fullness of the Spirit (3:34), and is himself the truth (14:6); in his final prayer, he affirms that God's Word is truth that sanctifies (17:17). Hence "spirit" and "truth" are part of a conceptual cluster that also includes "word" and "worship." On this connection, see Nelson 2001. See also

Nestle, E. 550

Neuer, W. 3

Neusner, J. 102n3, 106n22

Neyrey, J. H. 82n102, 142n5, 147, 148, 151, 151n36, 158, 224n3, 256, 305n38

Carson 1991: 226; Barrett 1978: 238–39; R. Brown 1966: 180.

3 Interpreters differ as to whether Jesus' clearing of the temple was designed to "cleanse" temple worship (cf. E. Sanders 1985: 61–71; Neusner 1989; Evans 1989). In any case, the major point of the temple clearing in John is that Jesus serves as the temple's replacement in the life of the messianic community.

22 See commentary at 2:14. See also Barrett 1975b; Evans 1997. On Gentile worship at the Jerusalem temple, see the appendix on Gentile participation in worship at Jerusalem in Schürer 1973–79: 2.309–13. Neusner (1989) adds another possible reason: the understanding that the daily whole offering, which was financed by the temple tax, provided atonement and expiation of sin.

102 Carson (1991: 161) notes, "Since Jesus is about to tell him of greater visions that will be his (1:50–51), there may also be an allusion to the popular etymology that related 'Israel' to ʾiš rōʾeh ʾēl, 'the man who sees God' " (cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.66 §186; similarly, Morris 1995: 148 n. 117). On Jacob traditions in nonbiblical Jewish sources, see Neyrey 1982; Rowland 1984.

5 Blomberg (1995: 8), with reference to Dockery (1988), lists five approaches to the present narrative: (1) allegorical (cf. 2 Kings 17:30–31); (2) existential (Bultmann 1971: 175–202); (3) pastoral (Milne 1993: 85–86); (4) salvation-historical (W. Davies 1974; Carson 1993); and (5) intertextual (focusing on OT parallels such as Gen. 24:10–61; 29:1–20; Exod. 2:15b–21) (Neyrey 1979). Acknowledging that all of these approaches capture elements of truth, Blomberg nevertheless finds them wanting and proposes a seven-pronged approach of his own. Stibbe (1993: 68–69) advocates a symbolic reading: "If the woman has had five husbands and is living de facto with a sixth, then Jesus is the seventh man in her life. Since seven is the perfect number in Judaism, the implicit commentary must be that Jesus is the man which she has been waiting for, the man in whose presence she will find wholeness." In the same vein, Brodie (1993: 217–18) sees this as a betrothal-type scene. See also Dockery (1988: 127–40), who distinguishes between author-, text-, and reader-oriented approaches, and Marshall 1974. R. Lightfoot (1956: 122) detects certain parallels between John 4 and 19.

36 On Jacob traditions in relation to a variety of subjects addressed in the present pericope, see Neyrey 1979.

3 Ridderbos (1997: 253) considers chapters 7–10 to constitute a unit, marked by Jesus' "encounters, conversations, and confrontations" with the Jews. More in depth is the analysis by Schenke (1989: esp. 186), who likewise defends the unity of chapters 7–10 dramatically developing the escalating conflict regarding Jesus. Schenke discerns three major scenes (7:10–8:59; 9:1–10:21; 10:22–39) plus a prologue (7:1–9) and an epilogue (10:40–42). In chapters 7–8 (scene I, taking place in the Jerusalem temple), Schenke finds seven smaller scenes (7:10–13, 14–31, 32–36, 37–44, 45–52; 8:12–20, 21–59) moving from diversity of opinion regarding Jesus to a united front against him. Scene II is staged in Jerusalem and can also be divided into seven smaller scenes (9:1–7, 8–12, 13–17, 18–23, 24–34, 35–39; 9:40–10:21). The location of scene III is once again the temple. A very similar division of chapter 7 is found in Neyrey 1996 (followed in the discussion below). On the thematic unity of the present unit, see also Dodd 1953: 345–54. On the thematic unity and development of 7:1–36, see Attridge 1980.

Nicholson, G. C. 380n19
Nickelsburg, G. W. E. 86
Nicklas, T. 83n105, 353, 356
Nixon, J. A. 16n26
Nortjé, S. J. 142

O'Brien, P. T. 307n46, 455
O'Connell, M. J. 394n18

38 Possible parallels include Judg. 12:3; 1 Sam. 19:5; 28:21; Job 13:14; Ps. 119:109. Neyrey (2001 [see esp. chart on p. 287]) seeks to make a case (in my view, unsuccessful) for a Hellenistic background of John 10:11–18, contending that the burden of this passage (and 11:46–53) is to show that Jesus died a “noble death.”

19 On the possible influence of Ps. 42 here and elsewhere in John's Gospel (11:33, 35, 37; 14:1–9, 27; 19:28), see the interchange between Beutler (1979, modifying Freed 1965b: 117–30) and Freed (1983a). See also Carson (1991: 440), who says that τετάρακται signifies “revulsion, horror, anxiety, agitation.” This emphasis on the precrucifixion turmoil suffered by Jesus stands over against those who, in an effort to focus on the “glory” aspect of Jesus' death, overlook the real agony and anxiety he endured. So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 434), who argues, contra Witkamp, that 12:27a can “hardly refer to anything other than the natural human reaction in confrontation with death”; and Carson (1991: 439–40), who contends, contra E. Käsemann and G. C. Nicholson, that “even in John [with its realized eschatology], Jesus cannot contemplate the cross as a docetic actor, steeped in dispassionate unconcern.” R. Brown (1966: 475) notes that here “we see the true humanity of the Johannine Jesus.”

105 C. Koester 1990a: 23–34; cf. Barrett 1978: 185; Nicklas (2000b: 201–2) is less than convinced. Other commentators consider the reference to be incidental, intended to show merely that Jesus “knew” Nathanael prior to their actual encounter (Ridderbos 1997: 90; cf. Burge 2000: 78; R. Brown 1966: 83; Moloney 1998: 56; contra Morris 1995: 146; Witherington 1995: 71; Borchert 1996: 148; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.317). Keener (2003: 486), too, rejects any deeper significance in the identification, suggesting that the fig tree may be mentioned simply because a specific landmark was necessary for some reason. Witherington's suggestion that Nathanael is being portrayed as an expert in the law who thus would know that the Messiah could not come from Nazareth seems far-fetched.

26 For a survey of second-century patristic references to John as the author of the Fourth Gospel, see Nixon 2003.

46 Note the present tense ἔχω (echō, I have), which points to Christ's current possession of these sheep despite their absence from the fold (Morris 1995: 455). There is no basis for the supposition by some (e.g., Bultmann 1971: 383) that 10:16 represents a later addition (see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.299; ambivalent is Ridderbos 1997: 362). As a study of the Johannine mission theme makes clear (not to mention the mission theme in the other Gospels), this passage, far from representing an isolated reference to Jesus' anticipation of a future (Gentile) mission, coheres with a repeated and consistent emphasis on the extension of the scope of God's salvation beyond the boundaries of national Israel to the other nations (e.g., Matt. 28:19; Acts 1:8). See Köstenberger 1998b; Köstenberger and O'Brien 2001: 73–127, 203–26.

18 This emphasis is in keeping with instances in Second Temple literature, where the law seems to take a more active part in the process of judging (2 Bar. 48:47; 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 13:30–35; Wis. 9:3; cf. Philo, Mos. 2.10 §53). John 12:48–50 contains echoes of the Book of Deuteronomy

O'Day, G. R. 1n2, 143n7, 158, 246n2, 247, 248, 515n20
Odeberg, H. 186n53, 213, 253n6
Oepke, A. 39, 315n84, 335n65, 407n36

(cf. Deut. 18:19; 31:19, 26; see O'Connell 1960; cf. R. Brown 1966: 491–92). There, it is God who takes vengeance on those who refuse to hear; in the Targumim, it is God's memra, or word: "And the man who does not listen to his words which he [the future prophet] will speak in the name of my memra, I in my memra will be avenged of him" (Tg. Neof. on Deut. 18:19); "my memra will take revenge on him" (Tg. Ps.-J. on Deut. 18:19). For "the last day," see 6:39–40, 44; 11:24 (the phrase, with "day" in the singular, does not occur elsewhere in the NT).

2 See the recent paper by O'Day (2002), who says that the abandonment of the apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel has "created space" for new readings of the Gospel. Others, however, view the results of the rejection of the apostolic authorship of John's Gospel in less positive terms. In any case, the summary way in which Johannine authorship is regularly dismissed in contemporary scholarship is without justification, for this theory of authorship has never been definitively refuted (Köstenberger 2001b: 17–47). Though only a theory, it continues to be a possible and, I would argue, eminently plausible hypothesis based on both external and internal evidence (see, e.g., Carson 1991: 68–81; Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 138–57; and the discussion below).

7 O'Day (1986: 76) says that the question "is not a denial, but neither is it a full affirmative." BDAG 649 identifies 4:29b as a hesitant question, citing Matt. 12:23 as closest parallel; BDF §221: "perhaps this is the Messiah." See also the discussion in Beck 1997: 75–76.

2 O'Day (1992: 639) further notes that "scribes and Pharisees" (as well as "Mount of Olives") occurs nowhere else in John.

20 Calvin (1961: 159) puts it memorably: "He had boasted that he would prove an invincible fighter and triumphant unto death. Now, at the voice of one maid, and that without any threatening, he is confounded and throws down his weapons." Conway (1999: 174) cites O'Day (1995: 808): "The words of Peter's denial ... are the antithesis of Jesus' words of self-identification and revelation from 18:1–12, 'I am.' "

53 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Borchert 1996: 236; Moloney 1998: 174; Bultmann 1971: 245; Morris 1995: 274–75 n. 48 (referring to Odeberg 1968: 203), 277; Barrett 1978: 259; Keener 1999: 42–43. The use of ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, that one) for God "lays stress upon the separate divine Person" in contrast with υἱός (huios, son). Also stressed is the Son's inability to do anything apart from the Father (again in 5:30; see Moloney 1998: 178; Barrett 1978: 264).

6 See Isa. 60:19–22; Zech. 14:5b–8; cf. Rev. 21:23–24. Contemporary Judaism applied the phrase "light of the world" not only to God but also to Israel, Jerusalem, the patriarchs, the Messiah, famous rabbis (e.g., Yohanan ben Zakkai), the Torah, the temple, and even Adam (Keener 1993: 285; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 128; R. Brown 1966: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.190; Moloney 1998: 266). The universality of "light" symbolism in religious language issues in numerous non-Jewish parallels (see Barrett 1978: 335–37; Bultmann 1971: 40–44, 342–43; Dodd 1953: 201–8; Odeberg 1968: 286–92).

84 See b. Abod. Zar. 5a. For a variation of the first view, see Jungkuntz 1964; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311; Morris 1995: 467; Beasley-Murray 1999: 176–77. The second position is held by Emerton 1960; 1966. For a variation of the third view, see Hanson 1964–65; 1967. See further Oepke, TDNT 4:1022–32, 1054–55. Most major commentators seem to favor the third view as well (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 373; Carson 1991: 398; Barrett 1978: 384; Schnackenburg 1990:

Okure, T. 567n7, 568, 570n16
Olsson, B. 354n152
O'Neill, J. C. 40n64, 77n73
Osborn, E. F. 17n28

2.311).

65 See Matt. 22:23–33 pars.; Acts 23:8; Josephus, J.W. 2.8.14 §165; Ant. 18.1.4 §16. See Oepke, TDNT 1:370; Meyer, TDNT 7:46–47.

36 Relevant instances of λούω in Scripture (LXX and NT) include Lev. 14:9; 15:11; 16:4; 17:16; Num. 19:7; Deut. 23:12; Acts 9:37; Heb. 10:22. Note especially Lev. 15:11, where νίπτω and λούω are found side by side. The word νίπτω occurs elsewhere in the NT for washing one's face (Matt. 6:17), hands (Matt. 15:2; Mark 7:3), eyes (John 9:7, 11, 15), and feet (John 13:5, 6, 8, 10, 12, 14; 1 Tim. 5:10). On the distinction in meaning between λούω and νίπτω, see Thomas 1991a: 51 n. 25; Oepke, TDNT 4:305; Hauck, TDNT 4:947.

7 Mary's response notably replaces her earlier "the Lord" and "we" (20:2) with the more personal "my Lord" and "I" (20:13) (Okure 1992: 180).

16 The Latin for this phrase, noli me tangere, famously inspired a medieval painting (Okure 1992: 177).

152 Schwank (1977) helpfully points out that in the final analysis, the reason for the mention of Ephraim in 11:54 is most likely the Fourth Evangelist's conviction that Jesus did in fact withdraw to this location at this juncture of his ministry, whether or not this served the purpose of geographical symbolism or other theological purposes (cf. Olsson 1974: 28 [cited in Schwank 1977: 380]). He rejects the view of Bultmann (1971: 412 n. 3) that the reference is merely "schematic" (i.e., literary but not historical in nature) and also the contention by Kundsinn (1925: 49–50) that the evangelist chose the name because the location was significant for Christians at the end of the first century (unsupported by evidence, as is admitted by Kundsinn [p. 49]; see the discussions in Katz 1997: 131 n. 7; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.351).

64 This point is made forcefully by O'Neill (1991: 127): "The Word did not turn into flesh, did not change its nature and become flesh, did not masquerade as flesh, and did not come on the scene as flesh... 'The Word was born flesh' or 'the Word was made flesh.'"

73 See Ps. Sol. 17:32; 1 Enoch 48:10; 52:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 12:32; 2 Bar. 29:3; 30:1; 40:1; 70:9; 72:2. See O'Neill 1995: 25–26; Abegg and Evans 1998: 191–94; Horbury 1998: chapter 2.

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon's work is given extensive coverage in Origen's commentary on John's Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John's Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σὰρξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that "the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel's] use"; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges "the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

Osborne, G. R. 3, 583n3, 585n9, 597, 604n21

Osburn, C. D. 122n21

Pagels, E. H. 26n20, 41

9 See Schlatter 1948: 363–77. Note, for example, the references to a charcoal fire in 21:9 and 18:18 and to “drawing” in 21:8 and 12:32, as well as the links between 21:20; 13:23; 1:18 (see Ellis 1992: 18–19). See also the common elements between the good shepherd discourse in chapter 10 and Peter’s commissioning in 21:15–19 (Cassian 1956–57: 132–36 [cited in Minear 1983: 95 n. 24]). Minear (1983: 96–97) further notes the appellation of Thomas as “the twin” in 20:24 and 11:16; the references to Nathanael in 21:2 and 1:45–51 and to Cana in chapters 2, 4, and 21; and several other terminological and thematic connections. Gaventa (1996: 245) notes the similarity between μετὰ ταῦτα (meta tauta, after these things) in 21:1 and 19:38. To this may be added the term “Sea of Tiberias” (21:1; cf. 6:1); Simon Peter “son of John” (21:15; cf. 1:42); Jesus’ taking (λαμβάνω, lambanō) and distributing (δίδωμι, didōmi) bread (21:13; cf. 6:11 [close verbal parallels with 6:11, where Jesus’ giving thanks is explicitly mentioned, may imply thanksgiving in 21:13]); the double ἀμὴν (amēn, truly) (21:18; cf., e.g., 1:51); the connection between Peter’s and Jesus’ death established by the evangelist’s parenthetical comment (21:19; cf. 12:33); Jesus’ call for his disciples to “follow” him (21:19, 22; cf. 1:43); and other verbal links, grammatical features, and thematic connections (Osborne 1981: 294). Spencer (1999) finds the following “narrative echoes” of earlier portions in John’s narrative: (1) the feeding of the five thousand (ch. 6); (2) Peter’s threefold denial (18:15–18, 25–27); (3) the footwashing and the final meal (13:3–5, 36–38); and (4) the good shepherd discourse (10:1–18). Note, however, that Spencer considers chapter 21 to be a “later redactional addition” (p. 68).

21 Similarly, Morris (1995: 775), who vaguely refers to “people respected in the church who knew the facts of the case.” Osborne (1981: 327, following Dodd) favors “the community as a whole as separate from the author of the epilogue.” Moloney (1998: 562) focuses more on the way in which the “we” of 21:24 “involves [later] generations of Christian readers who know that this witness is true and who can give witness to their own belief.”

21 The phrase “enter the kingdom of God [or ‘heaven’]” is found in the NT also in Matt. 5:20; 7:21; 18:3; 19:23–24 par.; Mark 9:47; Acts 14:22. Pryor (1991b: 71–95 [cf., earlier, Lindars 1981: 287–88]) seeks to make a case for John’s dependence on the tradition behind Matt. 18:3, but his argument is both unpersuasive and unnecessary (cf. Osburn 1989: 132: “unconvincing”).

20 For a more thorough discussion, see E. Miller (1993: 448–49), who lists as many as nine different theories: (1) the OT dbr; (2) Wisdom (R. Harris 1917); (3) Greek philosophy (Stoicism); (4) Philo (Evans 1993: 100–145; Tobin 1990); (5) the Aramaic mmr (Hayward 1978); (6) rabbinic speculation on the Torah; (7) gnostic sources, such as the Hermetic literature, especially Poimandres (Pagels 1999); (8) the Hellenistic-gnostic redeemer myth, Mandeans, and the Odes of Solomon (Bultmann 1923; 1973; 1971); and (9) the breaking of divine silence (Jeremias). Some, such as Epp (1975), combine two or more of the above (in Epp’s case, Wisdom and Torah). Miller himself (1993: 452), building on his earlier work (1989), advances the thesis that the uses of λόγος in the Gospel proper, while not a christological title, are invested “with a certain christological transparency” (B. Reicke’s term). Thus, startlingly, Miller, who believes that the prologue was written not only after the Gospel proper, but even after John’s first epistle, finds the origin of the prologue’s λόγος in the Fourth Gospel itself: “The one of whom it was said in John 7:46, ‘Never has a man spoken like this!’ eventually came to be called, appropriately, ‘the Word.’ ” I find this thesis entirely unconvincing (Miller [1999] attempts to make the same case for ἀρχή). It is quite a tour de force to brush aside the massive OT substructure pervading the entire prologue. Not surprisingly, Miller’s thesis has found few followers.

Painter, J. 58n5, 84
Pamment, M 119n14
Pancaro, S. 244, 244n77, 254, 256, 315n83, 513n10

5 Moloney (1998: 58) proposes that the question “Who are you?” could be taken as the leitmotif of John’s Gospel. Barrett (1978: 172) considers the phrase an allusion to Jesus’ “I am” statements in 6:35 and 8:24. Witherington (1995: 64) follows Painter in classifying the present pericope as a “quest story” that prepares the evangelist’s audience to properly answer subsequent questions about Jesus’ identity. He also contends—a rather dubious claim—that the evangelist presents Jesus as a Jewish sage à la Wisdom whom disciples were to seek and follow (adducing Sir. 51:23). The opening demonstrative “this” is classified by Wallace (1996: 334) as an instance of “inverse attraction,” where the pronominal subject is linked with the gender of the preceding nominative (cf. Matt. 7:12; 13:38; Luke 2:12; 8:11; Rom. 11:27; Gal. 4:24). More questionable is Wallace’s claim (1996: 532) that the present verb ἐστίν (estin, is) is a “testimonium present” (discussed under the rubric of “perfective present”). More likely, ἐστίν is a historical present (Wallace denies that εἶμι is ever used as a historical present in the NT).

14 Cf. Paulien (ABD 4:1106), who also refers to de Jonge 1971: 342; Sylva 1988: 148–49; Michel (1981: 231), who calls Nicodemus a “borderline character” (“personnage-frontière”); and Pamment (1985: 71, 73), who writes, “Nicodemus is the only individual character who fails to make a decision, remaining the good but uncommitted observer who tries to prevent injustice” (p. 73). Similarly, Conway (1999: 85–103) says that Nicodemus is a “pathetic character” who from beginning to end “is genuinely interested in Jesus, but is never able to gather the courage and conviction to confess his belief openly” (p. 103). Note also Pazdan (1987), who sees Nicodemus’s portrayal as part of John’s reversal of the traditional geographical polemic regarding Judeans, Samaritans, and Galileans; and Burge (2000: 124), who contends that Nicodemus never became a model disciple, because “disciples confess Jesus’ identity, remain with him, and tell others.” If my assessment of Nicodemus is correct, it runs counter to the notion, popular in current scholarship, that John’s Gospel is “anti-Semitic,” for here we have a Jewish person who, though not a believer in Jesus the Messiah, represents a fair-minded, moral, kind Jewish leader, providing a counterpoint to the more hostile element on the Sanhedrin. It is also possible that John includes the Nicodemus account at least in part because he had access to individuals among the Jewish leadership (cf. 18:15b: “that disciple [the ‘other disciple’ of 18:15a, presumably the evangelist; cf. 20:2; 21:24] was known to the high priest”).

77 Cf. Acts 25:16; Josephus, Ant. 14.9.3 §167; J.W. 1.10.6 §209; see Pancaro 1972. Later rabbinic rulings concur (Exod. Rab. 21.3 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 81]).

83 The expression “law” also covered the Psalter (for a broader conception of the term “the law,” see 12:34; 15:25; Rom. 3:10–19; 1 Cor. 14:21), just as “Torah” in rabbinic literature sometimes covers the Hebrew Scriptures in their entirety. Regarding this “generic sense” of law, see Pancaro 1975, especially 175–92.

10 See m. Hor. 3.4; cf. m. Meg. 1.9; m. Mak. 2.6; t. Yoma 1.4. See also Luke 3:2, where the appearance of John the Baptist is placed “during the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas.”

Parrot, A. 543n10
Paschal, R. W., Jr. 396n2
Paulien, J. 119n14, 120
Payne, J. B. 177n8
Payton, J. R. 499n78
Pazdan, M. M. 119n14, 158

Josephus indicates that it was customary for former high priests to continue to be called by that term (J.W. 4.3.7 §151; 4.3.9 §160; see Ridderbos 1997: 579; Moloney 1998: 490; Pancaro 1975: 66–67). The family is mentioned several times in later Jewish writings; it was noted not only for its great size, wealth, and power (b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.18), but also for its greed (see the street-ballad referred to in commentary at 18:3). Its wealth is reported later to have been destroyed by the Zealots.

10 See Riesner, DJG 43; Taylor 1998. “Gordon’s Calvary” is ruled out by Parrot 1957: 59–65.

2 The following material is adapted from Moloney 1998: 377–78 (for further bibliography, see pp. 389–91). See also Bammel 1993; Kurz 1985; 1990; Lacomara 1974; Paschal, DJG 229–33, esp. 232.

14 Cf. Paulien (ABD 4:1106), who also refers to de Jonge 1971: 342; Sylva 1988: 148–49; Michel (1981: 231), who calls Nicodemus a “borderline character” (“personnage-frontière”); and Pamment (1985: 71, 73), who writes, “Nicodemus is the only individual character who fails to make a decision, remaining the good but uncommitted observer who tries to prevent injustice” (p. 73). Similarly, Conway (1999: 85–103) says that Nicodemus is a “pathetic character” who from beginning to end “is genuinely interested in Jesus, but is never able to gather the courage and conviction to confess his belief openly” (p. 103). Note also Pazdan (1987), who sees Nicodemus’s portrayal as part of John’s reversal of the traditional geographical polemic regarding Judeans, Samaritans, and Galileans; and Burge (2000: 124), who contends that Nicodemus never became a model disciple, because “disciples confess Jesus’ identity, remain with him, and tell others.” If my assessment of Nicodemus is correct, it runs counter to the notion, popular in current scholarship, that John’s Gospel is “anti-Semitic,” for here we have a Jewish person who, though not a believer in Jesus the Messiah, represents a fair-minded, moral, kind Jewish leader, providing a counterpoint to the more hostile element on the Sanhedrin. It is also possible that John includes the Nicodemus account at least in part because he had access to individuals among the Jewish leadership (cf. 18:15b: “that disciple [the ‘other disciple’ of 18:15a, presumably the evangelist; cf. 20:2; 21:24] was known to the high priest”).

8 See Payne, ZPEB 3:460. “Jewish” festival, rather than pointing to a Gentile audience (Morris 1995: 265), indicates the “temporal and material distance that had developed at the time of the Gospel between the Christian church and the situation to which the story takes us” (Ridderbos 1997: 184). It was customary for Jews at any place and any elevation in Palestine to use the expression going “up” to Jerusalem.

78 Lindars (1972: 530) asserts, “A disunited Christian community denies by its behaviour the message which it proclaims.” For an interesting example of the use of John 17 in church history, see Payton 1992: 26–38 on Martin Bucer’s 1531 sermon on John 17 in the context of the Reformation controversy regarding the Eucharist. Bucer reminded his listeners that Jesus himself is the one praying, and God alone is all-knowing.

14 Cf. Paulien (ABD 4:1106), who also refers to de Jonge 1971: 342; Sylva 1988: 148–49; Michel (1981: 231), who calls Nicodemus a “borderline character” (“personnage-frontière”); and Pamment (1985: 71, 73), who writes, “Nicodemus is the only individual character who fails to make a decision, remaining the good but uncommitted observer who tries to prevent injustice” (p. 73). Similarly, Conway (1999: 85–103) says that Nicodemus is a “pathetic character” who from beginning to end “is genuinely interested in Jesus, but is never able to gather the courage and conviction to confess his belief openly” (p. 103). Note also Pazdan (1987), who sees Nicodemus’s portrayal as part of John’s reversal of the traditional geographical polemic regarding Judeans, Samaritans, and Galileans; and Burge (2000: 124), who contends that Nicodemus never became a model disciple, because “disciples confess Jesus’ identity, remain with him, and tell others.” If my assessment of Nicodemus is correct, it runs counter to the notion, popular in current scholarship, that John’s Gospel is “anti-Semitic,” for here we have a Jewish person who, though not a believer in Jesus the Messiah, represents a fair-minded, moral, kind Jewish leader, providing a counterpoint to the more hostile element on the Sanhedrin. It is also possible that John includes the Nicodemus account at least in part because he had access to individuals among the Jewish leadership (cf. 18:15b: “that disciple [the ‘other disciple’ of 18:15a, presumably the evangelist; cf. 20:2; 21:24] was known to the high priest”).

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’ ” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

74 But note that Aquila uses μονογενής to translate yahîd in Gen. 22:2, as does Symmachus in Gen. 22:12 (see Pendrick 1995: 593 n. 29).

75 For a very thorough and definitive demonstration that the notion of Jesus as the “only begotten” of the Father is foreign to Johannine thought and was read into the Gospel only later during the patristic period, see Pendrick 1995. Among other pieces of evidence, Pendrick cites ancient references where μονογενής is applied to an only child who was not the only begotten, “for the father might have begotten other children who died young and so the preservation of his name rests on the only surviving son” (p. 590). In light of the high infant mortality rate in the ancient world, Pendrick notes that “there must have been many only children who were not the only ones begotten by their parents” (p. 590 n. 23). See also Moody 1953: 213–19 and W. O. Walker 1994: 41 n. 37 (though when Walker contends that “the Greek of 1.14 does not include

Petersen, W. L. 247, 247n8, 248, 248n9

Peterson, E. 41n67

Peterson, R. A. 130n47

Piper, O. A. 194n98

Pixner, B. 79n86

Plummer, A. 259

Poirier, J. C. 281n14

Pollard, T. E. 1, 2, 2n3, 17, 17n28, 27, 29, 44, 329n31, 334, 337n80, 338n80, 338n82, υἱός with μονογενής,” he overlooks that “son” surely is implied in the term μονογενής, both semantically and by virtue of the juxtaposition with “from the Father”).

8 The attribution, recorded by Eusebius and reported by Papias (Hist. eccl. 3.39.17), of a similar pericope to a contemporary source probably refers to the sinful woman in Luke 7:36–50 rather than to the adulterous woman considered here (Petersen 1997: 196–97; contra Burge 1984: 143).

9 This was first suggested by J. Drusius (1595), followed by Hugo Grotius (1641) and J. A. Fabricius (1703–19) (see Petersen 1997: 217). M. Robinson (1998: 5) wrongly attributes to Petersen the view that the pericope of the adulterous woman “was circulating as part of John’s gospel in the mid-second century” (italics added). Apart from the fact that Petersen speaks of “the second half of the second century,” his actual conclusion is that “three constitutive elements of the pericope adulterae, as it is now known [sic] to us from the Gospel of John, were known in the second half of the second century” (1997: 207 [italics added]). Nowhere does he suggest that John’s Gospel was the source of the Protevangelium of James or that John’s Gospel already contained the pericope in the mid-second century (and even if it did, this still would not prove that the pericope is original).

67 Or, as Eugene Peterson’s modern paraphrase (The Message) expresses it, “the Word moved into the neighborhood.”

47 For further study on hell, see L. Dixon 1992; Fernando 1994; and Peterson 1995.

98 See Barnett 1980–81; Schlatter 1948: 160; Piper, ISBE 3:332–33; van der Woude, TDNT 9:509–27. However, calling these figures “messianic pretenders” goes beyond the evidence. Thus, Meier (1994: 611–12 n. 75) and R. Brown (1997: 820 n. 6) emphatically deny that any Jew (other than Jesus) claimed or was said to be the Messiah prior to, contemporaneous with, or even in the decades immediately following Jesus’ ministry.

86 For general (including archaeological) information on Bethsaida, see Strickert 1998; Kuhn and Arav 1991; and Pixner 1985.

14 Poirier (1996), Burge (2000: 273), and Kruse (2003: 220–21) take the purpose clause in 9:3b with 9:4, which is less likely.

3 On the Latin background, see Volfing 2001: 11–59. See also the works referenced in J. N. Sanders 1943; Pollard 1970; Braun 1959; and Grillmeier 1975.

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P. Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon’s work is given extensive coverage in Origen’s commentary on John’s Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John’s Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάπξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that “the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel’s] use”; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges “the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

31 Stibbe (1994: 51) paraphrases as follows: “I can return to Judea because the hour for my death (the hour of darkness) is not quite upon us. I will therefore not be killed (‘stumble’) at Bethany because I am still ministering in a season of pre-ordained security (daylight).” The saying is not without Jewish parallels (e.g., b. Sanh. 38b). Pollard (1973: 438, following Henderson 1920–21) somewhat implausibly suggests that the present statement indicates that Jesus “waited for light,” that is, divine guidance, and hence the delay. But see the critique in Moule 1975: 118–20.

80 An egregious example comes from Schnackenburg (1990: 2.333), who says that Mary “gives the impression of being nothing but a complaining woman,” a comment for which he is sharply rebuked by Borchert (1996: 359), who calls this “a Western male’s misunderstanding.” Pollard (1973: 438–41) strongly contends that Martha’s and Mary’s responses are diametrically opposed (cautioning against reading the present pericope in light of Luke 10:38–42): Martha exemplifies “confident trust,” but Mary demonstrates “hysterical weeping,” eliciting Jesus’ reaction of “bitter disappointment” (p. 440). Similarly, Stibbe (1994: 47), who maintains that these two women “exhibit different types of grief,” with Martha evincing “growth in resurrection faith,” and Mary’s grief being a “desperate, passionate and forlorn affair.” For Pollard (1973: 441), “the lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews who were with her” is the actual reason why Jesus decides to raise Lazarus.

80 An egregious example comes from Schnackenburg (1990: 2.333), who says that Mary “gives the impression of being nothing but a complaining woman,” a comment for which he is sharply rebuked by Borchert (1996: 359), who calls this “a Western male’s misunderstanding.” Pollard (1973: 438–41) strongly contends that Martha’s and Mary’s responses are diametrically opposed (cautioning against reading the present pericope in light of Luke 10:38–42): Martha exemplifies “confident trust,” but Mary demonstrates “hysterical weeping,” eliciting Jesus’ reaction of “bitter disappointment” (p. 440). Similarly, Stibbe (1994: 47), who maintains that these two women “exhibit different types of grief,” with Martha evincing “growth in resurrection faith,” and Mary’s grief being a “desperate, passionate and forlorn affair.” For Pollard (1973: 441), “the lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews who were with her” is the actual reason why Jesus decides to raise Lazarus.

82 Though, conversely, Martha understands Jesus as a thaumaturge. Thus, according to Moloney (1998: 330), “Mary is the character in the story reflecting true faith (vv. 29, 32) while Martha has fallen short of such faith (vv. 21–22, 24, 27).” Ironically, this conclusion is precisely the opposite of that drawn by Pollard 1973: 440–41 (see n. 80 above). Both instances seem to represent the kind of dichotomizations that Ridderbos (1997: 401) rejects.

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, “The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death.” See also Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999:

Porter, C. L. 296

Porter, S. E. 42n72, 59n6, 182n37

289. The mourners' unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999: 192–93), several of whom adduce Paul's statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus' anger is directed toward both "the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow" and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus' anger as occasioned by Mary's turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either "misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition," to mean "moved in spirit." Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus' struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, "He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself" (11:38 is translated "bearing the rebuke within himself"). According to Story, at the sight of people's grief, Jesus was overcome by "momentary self-regret," thinking, "Why did I not come sooner ... ? I have only myself to blame. ... Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?" However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

94 The term δακρύω occurs occasionally in the LXX (Job 3:24; Ezek. 27:35; Mic. 2:6; 2 Macc. 4:37; Sir. 12:16; 31:13). Owing to the force of the verb tense in the Greek original (an "ingressive aorist"), "Jesus burst into tears" is a better translation than the customary "wept" (Morris 1995: 495 n. 77; cf. Barrett 1978: 400; Pollard 1973: 441; Stibbe 1994: 45). This is suggested by comparison with instances of δακρύω in the same grammatical form in Greco-Roman and Hellenistic Jewish literature, where the term is regularly rendered this way (see Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 17.66.4; 27.6.1; Plutarch, Camillus 5.5; Pyrrhus 34.4; Pompeius 80.5; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162; J.W. 5.10.5 §445; 6.5.3 §304).

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, "It is not einzig, but einzigartig" (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): "not 'einzig geboren,' but 'einzig der Art nach.'" Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers "unique," pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son's procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the "root fallacy"; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors "only" or "unique," disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means "unique" and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, "beloved" (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward "only begotten" rather than simply "only," especially in light of the ensuing preposition "from." This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers "unique" or "one-of-a-kind," while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that "the phrase of the Father ... is decisive." Keener (2003: 412–14)

Potter, R. D. 146n16, 151

Prest, L. A. 153n40

Pryor, J. W. 15, 17n28, 21, 21n10, 34, 37, 37n54, 37n55, 42n69, 86, 140, 168, 297n3, 308, demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

6 Greek, Ἰουδαῖοι. Here and elsewhere in the Fourth Gospel, this Greek term ought to be rendered in keeping with the connotative meaning supplied by the respective context (see the TNIV). In a recent paper, S. Porter (2002), taking as his point of departure the recent compendium edited by Bieringer et al. (2001a; 2001b), contends that no single proposal explains all instances of the term in John’s Gospel. He notes that only twenty-six out of seventy instances of Ἰουδαῖοι in John are negative (including 11:8, 54, but not 1:19; 5:10, 15; 8:22; 10:24; 18:12; 19:31).

According to Porter, the singular referent of the term in John’s Gospel is the Jewish people as a religious, ethnic group. However, a given context may limit the reference to a subgroup. A case in point is an articular, demonstrative use: “those Jews there.” Anaphoric usage provides discourse continuity and cohesion. Partitive uses are found as well. Both literalistic views and “politically correct” views, according to Porter, are to be eschewed in favor of an understanding that is linguistically informed and contextually sensitive. When applied as part of a salvation-historical reading of the Johannine narrative and supplemented by other related terms, such as οἱ ἴδιοι in 1:11, the approach advocated by Porter is superior to woodenly literal or ideologically driven alternatives (see also Köstenberger 2003).

37 See Ridderbos 1997: 189 n. 14; Morris 1995: 272. Carson (1991: 246 n. 1) rightly cautions against a simplistic generalization of negated present imperative = command to stop doing something (though he acknowledges that this may be the force here). More accurately, the present imperative regularly stresses urgency (with reference to S. Porter 1989: 335ff.).

16 See Potter 1959: 331; Kippenberg 1971: 94; Riesner, DJG 40. A few late sources (such as Jerome) substitute “Shechem” for “Sychar,” but this is clearly secondary (contra R. Brown 1966: 169; Burge 2000: 141).

40 Some interpreters (such as Lindars [1972: 186]) argue that “five men/husbands” alludes to a tradition cited in Josephus, according to which the Samaritans had five gods (Ant. 9.14.3 §288; cf. 2 Kings 17:24, 30–31), just as “five colonnades” in 5:2 is taken to refer to the Jewish Pentateuch (Hengel 1999: 307, 315). As Blomberg (1995: 8 [cf. Schlatter 1948: 122]) points out, however, in reality the text lists seven gods of five nations (but see Prest 1992: 368; see also the discussion in C. Koester 1990b: 675–77).

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon’s work is given extensive coverage in Origen’s commentary on John’s Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John’s Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάραξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds

Quast, K. 16, 558n5

Quell, G. 459

Rabin, C. 239n50

Ramsay, Lady W. M. 514n19

Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that “the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel’s] use”; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges “the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

10 So Culpepper 1980–81: 15–17. This is supported by the observation of Pryor (1990: 202) that 1:14 is not to be considered as the prologue’s “great incarnational turning point,” but that “the ministry of the historical Jesus, which is unquestionably in focus in vv 12–13, ought to be projected back at least to v 9.” Staley (1988: 53–55) suggests that the center is found in 1:12–13. 54 This is the view of, among others, Carson 1991: 125; Dodd 1953: 402; R. Brown 1966: 10; Morris 1995: 85; Borchert 1996: 114; Burge 2000: 59. For a demonstration that 1:11, properly interpreted and understood (particularly the world as God’s property), refutes the notion, advanced by Bultmann, that John reflects gnostic thought, see Jervell 1956: 17–18. But see also the interaction with Jervell in Pryor 1990: 210–14.

55 Pryor (1990: 217) contends that “his own” here is “not a status term but a relational one,” referring to the Jews as Jesus’ “own kinsfolk,” “his own people according to the flesh,” “the people of his homeland,” but that “nothing in the verse is implied of Israel as God’s covenant people.” For Pryor, 1:11 is thus equivalent to 4:44. But surely this dichotomy is unnecessary: consider the parallelism between 1:11 and 13:1 and the salvation-historical references pervading the prologue (e.g., tabernacle in 1:14, giving of the law through Moses in 1:17). On a different note, “did not recognize” in 1:10 and “did not receive” in 1:11 are equivalent in meaning (Bultmann 1971: 56), a Semitism (cf. “did receive” in 1:12; see Bultmann 1971: 57 n. 2). 69 Pryor (1990: 202 n. 6), in interaction with Schnackenburg, sees in 1:14–18 a polemic using the language of Exod. 33–34: whereas God’s tent was pitched outside the camp of Israel and Moses was denied the vision of God’s glory, Jesus’ followers had the grace of the incarnate Word dwelling among them and have seen his glory.

3 For a list of ways in which John appropriates old-covenant language to designate Jesus’ new messianic community, see Köstenberger 1998b: 162, in adaptation of Pryor 1992a.

7 Note, for example, the preponderance of the five major verb themes of Exod. 33–34 and Deuteronomy—“love,” “obey,” “live,” “know,” and “see”—in John 14:15–24. See Lacomara 1974; Pryor 1992a: esp. 160, 166, 216 n. 8, referring also to Malatesta 1978: 42–77.

5 See the introduction to John 21 below. On the parallel development of Peter and the beloved disciple in the Fourth Gospel, see Quast 1989 (though see the critical interaction in Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61).

50 Does this imply that Jesus’ contemporaries thought him capable of instructing Gentiles in the Diaspora by using Greek? If so, the present passage would provide indirect evidence that Jesus was known to at least speak (if not write) Greek. On the question of the language of Jesus, see the surveys by C. Rabin and G. Mussies in Safrai and Stern 1976: 1007–64 (plus the bibliography cited there); see also Silva 1991 (plus the bibliography cited there on p. 222 n. 3).

Reddish, M. G. 127n41
Reich, R. 96
Reicke, B. 26n20
Reim, G. 583n2
Reinhardt, W. 354n153
Reiser, W. E. 346, 346n125
Rengstorf, K. H. 179n20, 188n65, 283n22, 393n16, 530n47

19 See Ramsay 1915–16 and the supplement by J. Mann (pp. 424–25) pertaining to talmudic literature.

41 See, e.g., Ps. 14:2; 33:14; 103:19. See Schoonhoven, ISBE 2:654–55; Reddish, ABD 3:90–91.

20 For a more thorough discussion, see E. Miller (1993: 448–49), who lists as many as nine different theories: (1) the OT δβρ; (2) Wisdom (R. Harris 1917); (3) Greek philosophy (Stoicism); (4) Philo (Evans 1993: 100–145; Tobin 1990); (5) the Aramaic mmr (Hayward 1978); (6) rabbinic speculation on the Torah; (7) gnostic sources, such as the Hermetic literature, especially Poimandres (Pagels 1999); (8) the Hellenistic-gnostic redeemer myth, Mandeans, and the Odes of Solomon (Bultmann 1923; 1973; 1971); and (9) the breaking of divine silence (Jeremias). Some, such as Epp (1975), combine two or more of the above (in Epp’s case, Wisdom and Torah). Miller himself (1993: 452), building on his earlier work (1989), advances the thesis that the uses of λόγος in the Gospel proper, while not a christological title, are invested “with a certain christological transparency” (B. Reicke’s term). Thus, startlingly, Miller, who believes that the prologue was written not only after the Gospel proper, but even after John’s first epistle, finds the origin of the prologue’s λόγος in the Fourth Gospel itself: “The one of whom it was said in John 7:46, ‘Never has a man spoken like this!’ eventually came to be called, appropriately, ‘the Word.’ ” I find this thesis entirely unconvincing (Miller [1999] attempts to make the same case for ἀρχή). It is quite a tour de force to brush aside the massive OT substructure pervading the entire prologue. Not surprisingly, Miller’s thesis has found few followers.

153 See Reinhardt 1995: 262–63. Josephus (J.W. 6.9.3 §§422–25) provides the unlikely figure of over 2.7 million on the basis of a census taken by Cestius in the A.D. 60s.

125 Stibbe (1994: 53) brilliantly elaborates that John expects the reader to follow the beginning and middle of a pericope from the point of view of its end, so that narrative form and christological claim coincide. Jesus Christ is portrayed as the eschaton personified, “the one who brings the end of history into the middle of time.” Stibbe also notes the classic character of the story in which Jesus appears as one who is both sympathetic and yet able to transcend the situation. See also Reiser (1973: 52–54), who notes the parallels between 11:43–44, on the one hand, and 5:25, 28b, as well as 10:3, 10, 17–18 respectively.

20 Mackowski (1980: 81–83) even believes that behind 5:2–9 is the story of a pagan sanctuary that he believes to have been an Asclepieum; but this is categorically ruled out by Hengel (1999: 313), who nonetheless points to the significance of the Asclepius cult for John’s Asia Minor audience (p. 315, referring also to a work by K. H. Rengstorf in n. 84). See also the ancient and bibliographic references cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 266–67.

65 See Rengstorf, TDNT 1:414–20.

22 Most frequently cited is the healing of the blind soldier Valerius Aper, apparently by Asclepius, in which an eye-salve was used (Deissmann 1927: 135; Rengstorf, TDNT 6:119). According to Boring, Berger, and Colpe (1995: 284), the inscription probably comes from the

Rensberger, D. 291n63

Repond, C. 547n36

Richardson, P. 106n18

Ridderbos, H. xii, 22, 22n14, 25, 27, 30, 31, 34, 35n45, 36, 36n50, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 42n71, 43n72, 44n77, 45, 46, 46n82, 50n98, 53, 55, 58, 59, 60, 60n11, 60n13, 63, 63n24, Asclepius temple on the island in the Tiber in Rome and dates to A.D. 138.

16 For a detailed account of the Jewish legal theory of envoys, see Rengstorf, TDNT 1:414–20.

47 Josephus frequently uses the term for those engaged in revolutionary guerilla warfare who, harboring mixed motives of plunder and nationalism, roamed the Jewish countryside in those volatile days. The term applies particularly to the Zealots, who had made armed resistance against Rome the consuming passion of their lives and who were committed to attaining national liberty by all means, including risk of their own lives (Rengstorf, TDNT 4:257–62).

63 As Rensberger (1988: 42 [cited in Conway 1999: 132]) notes, the man's attitude resembles that of Jesus before the high priest in 18:19–23, which is “why Jesus can be absent from the central episodes of the story; his role is taken over by the blind man himself.”

36 See Repond 1922; Dalman 1928–39: 5.126–29. Josephus notes that the high priestly robe (χιτών, chitōn) was “not composed of two pieces, ... [but] one long woven cloth” (Ant. 3.7.4 §161; cf. Exod. 28:31; Rev. 1:13), while Philo uses a robe as symbolic of the Logos, which binds all things together in unity (Flight 20 §§110–12). However, it is far from certain whether the present passage alludes to the high-priestly garment (or the unity of the church, for that matter) (so, rightly, Carson 1991: 614; contra Moloney 1998: 503, 507). Carson (1991: 614–15) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 347–48), following Schnackenburg (1990: 3.274), see in the preservation of the seamless tunic an allusion to the Father's preservation of the Son; Carson also sees a connection with the footwashing.

18 Cf. m. Šeqal. 1.3: “On the 25th thereof [the month of Adar] they [the tables of the moneychangers] were set up in the Temple.” On Tyrian shekels, see Richardson 1992: 514–18. On the half-shekel offering, see Liver 1963.

14 Haenchen (1984: 1.117) holds that 1:6–8 represents a rather clumsy insertion into the original hymn. Bultmann (1971: 49) believes that the material is inserted to counter veneration of John the Baptist (cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.249–50). Ridderbos (1997: 42) ardently defends the prologue's unity. Moloney (1998: 37) notes that 1:6–8 is essential to the prologue in its current form.

45 Among those who take 1:9 as a preliminary reference to the incarnation are Ridderbos 1997: 43; Carson 1991: 122; Borchert 1996: 112–13; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.255; Laney 1992: 41. Moloney (1998: 37) sees a hint to the incarnation already in 1:3c–4. There also may be an implied contrast with Hellenistic religions that offered false “light.”

50 Schnackenburg (1990: 1.256) claims that the reference is not to Jesus' earthly ministry but to Israel's history prior to the incarnation. Similarly, R. Brown (1966: 30) cites the parallel of Wisdom in 1 Enoch 42:2: “Wisdom came to make her dwelling place among the children of men and found no dwelling place.” More likely, the reference is anticipatory of the Word's incarnation in 1:14 (Culpepper 1980–81: 13–14; Carson 1991: 122; Ridderbos 1997: 43; Moloney 1998: 37). On a literal level, see the reference in Luke 2:7 that there was “no guest room available” (TNIV) for Jesus and his parents at his birth, which may have spiritual overtones as well.

71 Ridderbos (1997: 53) renders ὥς as “in keeping with his nature as” (cf. Schnackenburg 1990:

1.270), R. Brown (1966: 13) as “in the quality of.”

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’ ” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

77 The antecedent of πλήρης (plērēs, full) is subject to debate. If declinable, it refers to ὁ λόγος (R. Brown 1966: 14; Morris 1995: 94). If indeclinable, it should be taken with δόξαν (Carson 1991: 129) or αὐτοῦ, as is perhaps most likely (so BDAG 827; Ridderbos 1997: 54 n. 117). In any case, fullness of grace and truth is predicated of Jesus.

82 For this reason R. Brown (1966: 15) and Ridderbos (1997: 56) believe that this verse was inserted later by the evangelist.

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

11 Ironically, in John’s case it was virtuous to confess not to be someone. Humility prevented him from elevating himself as a messianic pretender (Ridderbos 1997: 65; cf. Barnett 1980–81).

13 The Greek word Χριστός, like its Hebrew counterpart, mešiah, means “anointed one.” Though the term was applied in the OT to a variety of men who were set apart and anointed to serve God and his people in a special capacity (such as priest or king), OT predictive prophecy gave rise to the expectation that there would be a future figure, the Anointed One, sent by God to deliver and rule his people. See especially Horbury 1998. For a convincing refutation of the claim that the present passage was written to counter a Baptist sect in the evangelist's day, see Ridderbos 1997: 64 (cf. R. Brown 1966: 48).

24 So Ridderbos 1997: 66 n. 10; Morris 1995: 122; Carson 1991: 144; Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292; contra R. Brown 1966: 44; Moloney 1998: 52. While thus the delegation included some Pharisees, this does not mean that the Pharisees were responsible for sending out the delegation, since the Sadducees had a majority on the Sanhedrin (Carson 1991: 144). This is true especially if an article is to be added (or implied) before ἀπεσταλμένοι (Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Barrett 1978: 174; R. Brown 1966: 43–44; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292). Ἀπεσταλμένοι ἦσαν (apestalmenoi ēsan, they had been sent) is a periphrastic pluperfect (Wallace [1996: 586] calls it “consummative”).

27 So Ridderbos 1997: 67; Burge 2000: 71; Barrett 1978: 174; R. Brown 1966: 51; Borchert 1996: 126.

38 For a thorough discussion of several additional alternatives, see Morris 1995: 127–29; see also Barrett 1978: 176; Ridderbos 1997: 73–74.

43 The reference to a previous statement is a recurring stylistic feature in this Gospel (Schlatter [1948: 50] cites 3:26, 28; 4:54; 5:33; 7:21; 8:24; 11:37; 13:33; 15:20; 18:9, 14, 32; 21:14). The statement is largely unchanged from 1:15 and 1:27, though the context is now Jesus' actual appearance (Ridderbos 1997: 75; Morris 1995: 132). The form of the verbs has been changed from participles to indicatives, enabling the author to stress the reality of the thought more forcefully (Morris 1995: 132). The inference that John includes this statement as a polemic against elements elevating the Baptist over Jesus in the evangelist's day (Beasley-Murray 1999: 25) is unnecessary.

64 Ridderbos (1997: 82–83) suggests a connection with 1:14: “Not only did they see that he lived among them and where he lived among them, but at his invitation they also stayed with him that day, and he spent time with them as a human among humans” (see also 4:40). A similar development from literal to figurative can be observed regarding the word ἀκολουθέω (see commentary at 1:37).

69 Ridderbos (1997: 84) thinks that this identification is all the more likely since Peter learns about Jesus from his brother Andrew and this unnamed disciple (1:41) and since Peter and John are closely associated in this and the other Gospels (so also Schlatter 1948: 55; more cautious assessments are found in Borchert 1996: 143; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.310; Carson 1991: 154). Note also the connection between Andrew and John in the Muratorian Canon (Bettenson 1967: 28). Michaels (1989: 37) thinks that the second disciple is Philip. Keener (2003: 468) likewise sees “no reason” to identify the other disciple with the beloved disciple, since he is not mentioned until 13:23. On a literary level, this is self-evident, but the absence of “beloved disciple” language prior to 13:23 does not seem to rule out the possibility that the apostle John appears in the Johannine narrative as a historical character that is left unnamed.

77 Ridderbos (1997: 85–86) thinks that John is making use of a tradition that is distinct and earlier than that of the Synoptics, based on his use of the Aramaic Cephas and the fact that Simon's father is called John (rather than Jonah).

83 Though note that Philip plays a considerably larger role in the Fourth Gospel than in the Synoptics (cf. 6:5–7; 12:21–23; 14:8–9; see Ridderbos 1997: 87).

78n84, 79, 79n87, 80n89, 81, 82, 83, 83n105, 84, 85, 85n116, 86, 86n118, 87, 88n122, 89, 91, 91n7, 94, 95, 97n31, 98, 98n34, 100, 100n39, 106n20, 107, 107n24, 108, 109,

84 Note the plural “we have found” in 1:45 (Ridderbos 1997: 87). Westcott (1908: 1.45) suggests that “the very mixture of Hebrew (Simon, Nathanael) and Greek (Andrew, Philip) names seems to indicate the representative character of this first group of disciples.” Brodie (1993: 165) sees the call of Philip as “in some sense proleptic of ... the call of the Greeks.”

87 Though it is not explicitly stated exactly where Philip found Nathanael, it may have been Cana, Nathanael’s hometown (21:2; see Ridderbos 1997: 88).

89 The identification of Nathanael with Bartholomew is favored by Ridderbos 1997: 87–88; Morris 1995: 143; Carson 1991: 159; Burge 2000: 77; contra Barrett 1978: 184; R. Brown 1966: 82; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.314. Barrett (1978: 179, 184) conjectures that the meaning of the name “Nathanael,” “God has given,” indicates that he represents an “ideal disciple” and that the passage should be interpreted allegorically. Somewhat along similar lines, Witherington (1995: 71) suggests that Nathanael’s name implies that the disciples are the Father’s gift to Jesus. It seems, however, that these kinds of conjectures leave the realm of well-founded exegesis and veer into the sphere of ultimately unverifiable speculation (see the critiques by Morris [1995: 143] and Carson [1991: 159], both of whom defend Nathanael’s and the event’s historicity). Hanhart (1970: 24–25) identifies Nathanael as Matthew; Hill (1997) somewhat cautiously advances the theory that Nathanael is identical with James of Alphaeus (cf. Epistle to the Apostles 2 [second century A.D.]).

105 C. Koester 1990a: 23–34; cf. Barrett 1978: 185; Nicklas (2000b: 201–2) is less than convinced. Other commentators consider the reference to be incidental, intended to show merely that Jesus “knew” Nathanael prior to their actual encounter (Ridderbos 1997: 90; cf. Burge 2000: 78; R. Brown 1966: 83; Moloney 1998: 56; contra Morris 1995: 146; Witherington 1995: 71; Borchert 1996: 148; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.317). Keener (2003: 486), too, rejects any deeper significance in the identification, suggesting that the fig tree may be mentioned simply because a specific landmark was necessary for some reason. Witherington’s suggestion that Nathanael is being portrayed as an expert in the law who thus would know that the Messiah could not come from Nazareth seems far-fetched.

116 The angels also serve as a resource for the “Son of Man” while he is absent from his heavenly abode (Matt. 26:53; Mark 1:13; Luke 22:43) (Ridderbos 1997: 94).

118 Note that although the Danielic “Son of Man” is a humanlike figure distinguishable from God, he is cast in entirely transcendent terms (Ridderbos 1997: 93).

122 The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. 65, was published in 1998 by the Egypt Exploration Society (see pp. 12–13). Among commentators, “Chosen One of God” is favored by Morris 1995: 134; Carson 1991: 152; Burge 1987: 59–61; 2000: 74; Barrett 1978: 178; R. Brown 1966: 57; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.305. “Son of God” is the reading advocated by Bultmann 1971: 92–93 n. 6; Borchert 1996: 139; Ridderbos 1997: 77; Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. g; Laney 1992: 53 (though all prior to the discovery of P¹⁰⁶). Rodgers (1999: 304) prefers both (“This is the only, the chosen Son of God”), while Michaels (1989: 36) proposes that the Baptist spoke “Chosen One of God” (hence the MS tradition), which the evangelist interpreted as “Son of God.”

7 It is doubtful that the reference to “the third day” represents an allusion to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 102; Carson 1991: 167; Burge 2000: 90; contra Borchert 1996: 153; Stibbe 1993: 46; Keener 2003: 497–98). The reference serves as a chronological connective with preceding events, perhaps indicating that the promise of 1:51 was quickly fulfilled (Beasley-

Murray 1999: 34, citing Schnackenburg 1990: 1.325; cf. Talbert [1992: 86], who says that 2:1–11 serves as fulfillment of the prophecy in 1:51; and D. M. Smith [1999: 86], who speaks of the “first installment ... of the revelation promised in 1:51”). The beginning of Jesus’ final week is signaled in 12:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 189–90).

31 So, for example, Ridderbos 1997: 107; Morris 1995: 162; Carson 1991: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 35; R. Brown 1966: 105; Kruse 2003: 94–95. Ridderbos (1997: 108) cites OT allusions to the abundance of wine in the new age (Gen. 49:11; Isa. 25:6; Amos 9:13–14; Jer. 31:12–14; see also Joel 3:18). Keener (2003: 512) suggests a (proleptic) connection between the abundant “measure” of water turned into wine in 2:6 and the unlimited provision of the Spirit in 3:34.

34 Ridderbos (1997: 107–8) rightly notes that the master of the banquet’s ignorance is not intended to portray him as a symbol for unbelieving Israel. R. Brown (1966: 107) makes the dubious suggestion that the man epitomizes blindness vis-à-vis wisdom.

39 Carson (1991: 169) rightly notes that there is little contextual support for the notion that Mary is here presented as a mediatrix between humanity and Jesus (contra those who see Mary here as representative of the people [e.g., Brodie 1993: 174]). Witherington (1995: 79, 378, referring to Ashton) may read too much into John’s presentation when he sees Mary here depicted as a fledgling disciple who later becomes an “archetypal female disciple.” Ridderbos (1997: 108) likewise seems to overreach when he suggests that Mary is symbolic of believing Israel, which has eagerly awaited the coming of the Savior. Another dubious suggestion is made by Stibbe (1993: 44), who proposes that Jesus’ use of γύναι may constitute an allusion to Gen. 3:15, “in which case she is to be seen as the New Eve in the New Creation of Jesus’ ministry.”

20 So Ridderbos 1997: 116; Moloney 1998: 81; Barrett 1978: 197; Witherington 1995: 87; contra TNIV.

24 The LXX reads “has consumed me” (Moloney 1998: 77). Unlike in 2:22 and 12:16, the present reference does not refer to the postresurrection period, but to the actual situation (so Ridderbos 1997: 116; Carson 1991: 180; R. Brown 1966: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.347; Barrett 1978: 198; contra Witherington 1995: 88; Bultmann 1971: 122).

34 Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.344; Barrett 1978: 195; R. Brown 1966: 117; Witherington 1995: 85–86; Borchert 1996: 160; Bultmann 1971: 122; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38–39; Dodd 1963: 162; Lindars 1972: 135–37; Keener 2003: 518–19. Keener contends that it is historically implausible that Jesus would challenge the temple system by overturning tables and yet continue in public ministry for two or three years afterward, sometimes even visiting Jerusalem (though he notes that Jesus faces considerable hostility there when he does). On the contrary, an early temple cleansing accounts well for Jewish hostility toward Jesus early on (5:18), and Jesus’ continuing in ministry for two or three more years is eminently plausible historically in light of Jesus’ pattern of withdrawal (3:22; 6:15; 7:9–10; 8:59; 10:40) and his caution from the very inception of his ministry because his “time” has not yet come (2:4; 7:6). Borchert (1996: 160) contends that two temple clearings are “a historiographic monstrosity that has no basis in the texts of the Gospels.” Kreitzer (1998: 100–101) claims that the evangelist followed the motto “When the details of history no longer serve the functions of the story—discard them.” R. Brown (1966: 118) concludes that Jesus uttered some prophetic saying concerning the destruction of the temple on his first visit but actually cleansed the temple at the end of his ministry. Wallace (1996: 561 n. 20) notes that this would require a crucifixion date of A.D. 33.

128, 129, 130, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 137n9, 138, 138n12, 138n13, 139n15, 140, 142, 143, 146n15, 147n21, 148, 149n30, 150, 151, 152, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 161,

26 Note in 3:5 the single Greek preposition governing both “water” and “spirit” (Ridderbos 1997: 127). Some have suggested that “born of water” refers to water baptism, be it John the Baptist’s or Christian baptism, or both (Schnackenburg 1990: 1.369; Barrett 1978: 203, 208–9; R. Brown 1966: 141–42; Ridderbos 1997: 127–28; Beasley-Murray 1999: 49; Michaels 1989: 57). But it would hardly have been meaningful for Jesus to inform Nicodemus that he must be baptized in order to go to heaven. Nothing in the context indicates that this is the case, and it is unlikely that Jesus would have expected Nicodemus already to have known this. Moreover, the emphasis here is on the Spirit’s activity, not on human ritual observance (Morris 1995: 193).

33 Cf. Ezek. 11:19–20; 36:26–27; Isa. 44:3; 59:21; Jer. 31:31–34; Ps. 51:10; cf. Wis. 9:16–18; 1QS 3:13–4:26; see Ridderbos 1997: 132; Barrett 1978: 203; Moloney 1998: 94.

34 It may be too early in Jesus’ ministry for his disciples to be included (Carson 1991: 198–99; contra Ridderbos 1997: 134; Morris 1995: 196). Schnackenburg’s (1990: 1.376) solution, that Jesus’ statement is proleptic, looking “forward to the time when his disciples make his ‘testimony’ their own, as part of their preaching” (with reference to 3:22 and 9:4), likewise fails to convince. There is also no need to postulate that the “we” aligns Jesus with the OT prophets, reflects the Johannine community (Witherington 1995: 98; cf. Moloney 1998: 94), or denotes the church versus the synagogue (Barrett 1978: 211; Brodie 1993: 198).

9 It is not necessary to postulate that here the evangelist is addressing those who had remained followers of John the Baptist in his day (Carson 1991: 210; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 146; Morris 1995: 211; contra R. Brown 1966: 156; Barrett 1978: 219; Witherington 1995: 107; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.410).

12 Jesus calls himself “the bridegroom” in Matt. 9:15 pars. For the role of the bridegroom’s friend, see Gower 1987: 64–66; Zimmermann and Zimmermann 1999. Joy was the overriding theme at Jewish weddings; the verb πληρόω (plēroō, fulfill, complete) is associated with joy throughout this Gospel (Carson 1991: 211–12; Barrett 1978: 223). The Baptist’s words χαρᾷ χαίρει (chara chairei, lit., rejoices with joy), a Hebraism (χαρᾷ is a cognate dative [Wallace 1996: 168–69]), serve to intensify the verb (Ridderbos 1997: 147 n. 132; Morris 1995: 213 n. 112).

13 Note the reference to John by Jesus as a “lamp” in 5:35. See Ridderbos 1997: 147–48; cf. R. Brown 1966: 153; Moloney 1998: 110.

15 “No one” in 3:32 is hyperbolic; cf. 3:33 and see the similar progression in 1:11–12 (Morris 1995: 216–17; Borchert 1996: 193; Ridderbos 1997: 150).

15 This represents the wide consensus of interpreters: see Ridderbos 1997: 153; Carson 1991: 215–16; Borchert 1996: 198–99; Beasley-Murray 1999: 59; Witherington 1995: 115; R. Brown 1966: 169; Morris 1995: 226; Barrett 1978: 230; Moloney 1998: 116, 120; Conway 1999: 105.

21 See Ridderbos 1997: 153; cf. Carson 1991: 217; Borchert 1996: 201; Morris 1995: 228; Burge 2000: 142.

30 See Maccini 1996: 131–44. Daube (1956: 375–82) argues that “do not associate with” specifically refers to Jews not sharing vessels with Samaritans (cf. NIV text and note at 4:9). However, no common utensils (such as the woman’s water jar) are specifically mentioned in 4:9. The explanatory aside, “For Jews have no dealings with [συγχρῶνται] Samaritans,” probably is broader than the mere refusal to share drinking vessels (Ridderbos 1997: 154; Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. f; contra Carson 1991: 218; Borchert 1996: 203; Witherington 1995: 120; R. Brown 1966: 170; Morris 1995: 229; Barrett 1978: 232; Moloney 1998: 117, 121; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.425 n. 19).

4 One school of interpretation identifies πατρίς (patris, homeland, hometown) in 4:44 with Jerusalem (so Barrett 1978: 246; Dodd 1953: 352; 1963: 238–41; Meeks 1966; 1967: 39–40; see, much earlier, Origen, Commentarii in evangelium Joannis 13.54–56, cited in van Belle 1998: 30). However, see the critiques by W. Davies (1974: 321–31) and Stimpfle (1992: 89) as summarized by van Belle (1998: 30–32). The Galilee/Nazareth explanation is found already in Augustine (cited by van Belle 1998: 33) and is defended by Stimpfle (1992: 86–96 [followed by van Belle 1998: 27–44]) and others (see van Belle 1998: 32–33; see also Ridderbos 1997: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 73; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.463). Still others think that both Galilee and Judea are in view (Carson 1991: 235–36; Burge 2000: 151–52; Witherington 1995: 126; W. Davies 1974: 321–31).

7 So Carson 1991: 234; Ridderbos 1997: 174–75; Morris 1995: 255; Borchert 1996: 219–20; Burge 2000: 152–53; Witherington 1995: 127; contra R. Brown 1966: 193; Barrett 1978: 245; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.471–75; Bultmann 1971: 205.

14 The imperfect ἡρώτα (ērōta, urged) points to the official's determination (Ridderbos 1997: 175 n. 215; Morris 1995: 256). The urgency of the situation is further highlighted by the word ἤμελλεν (ēmellen, about to [Morris 1995: 256 n. 11]). “To come down” is a literal rendering of the Greek, for Capernaum was lower in elevation than Cana (see above and commentary at 4:51). Regarding the phrase “about to die,” see the references to the royal official's son being “sick” (ἡσθένει, ēsthenei) in 4:46 and “having a fever” (ὁ πυρετός, ho pyretos) in 4:52.

22 The numbering of the two Cana signs has suggested to some the existence of a “signs source” (Bultmann 1971: 206; Fortna 1970; 1989; Whitacre 1999: 116). However, this inference is not a necessary one (Ridderbos 1997: 178; Carson 1991: 178; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; contra Barrett 1978: 246; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.469–71).

1 In light of the apparently abrupt reference to Jesus “crossing to the far shore of the Sea of Galilee” in 6:1 (ch. 5 has him in Jerusalem), it has been speculated that chapters 5 and 6 should be reversed (see Bultmann 1971: 209, 237; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.92); but see Carson 1991: 240; Morris 1995: 264; cf. Barrett 1978: 23–24; Borchert 1996: 250; and especially Ridderbos 1997: 183.

8 See Payne, ZPEB 3:460. “Jewish” festival, rather than pointing to a Gentile audience (Morris 1995: 265), indicates the “temporal and material distance that had developed at the time of the Gospel between the Christian church and the situation to which the story takes us” (Ridderbos 1997: 184). It was customary for Jews at any place and any elevation in Palestine to use the expression going “up” to Jerusalem.

9 See Carson 1991: 240. Bultmann (1971: 240) claims that the festival is Passover, based on his switching the order of John 5 and 6, but this is unlikely, since the evangelist clearly identifies Passover everywhere else in his Gospel. Also unlikely is Michaels's (1989: 85) theory that the present pericope was transposed from Jesus' first Passover in Jerusalem (cf. 2:23; 3:2). Many commentators choose to remain agnostic on which feast is in view (Keener 2003: 635), regarding its identity as either unknown (Ridderbos 1997: 184; Morris 1995: 265 n. 6) or of secondary interest (R. Brown 1966: 206), or both (Carson 1991: 241). Calvin (1959: 116) thinks that the feast probably is Pentecost.

179n17, 179n21, 180, 180n28, 181, 181n34, 182n36, 182n37, 182n39, 183, 184n45, 185, 186, 186n54, 188n66, 189, 190, 190n76, 191n81, 192, 193, 194n100, 195n109, 195n110,

21 A similar healing is recorded in Matt. 9:1–8 pars. (Ridderbos 1997: 186).

28 Carson 1991: 244; Barrett 1978: 254. Though Ridderbos (1997: 186) perhaps gets carried away slightly when he sees the act as a sign of victory, exulting, “No longer does the bed carry a powerless man but, with vitality to spare, he (triumphantly) carries the bed.”

34 Ridderbos 1997: 188; Carson 1991: 245; Morris 1995: 271; Culpepper 1983: 138; 1993: 204–5; contra Staley 1991: 63–64. The term ὑγιής (hygiēs, well, healthy) occurs five times in this chapter, six times total in John, and only five other times in the rest of the NT (Morris 1995: 271–72 n. 30).

36 Some (such as Bultmann [1971: 243]) view 5:14 as being in contradiction with 9:2–3 (see discussion in Ridderbos 1997: 188). Though the ailment in the present passage may be the result of specific personal sin, and that in John 9 may not, however, this merely illustrates that caution must be exercised in individual cases and that sweeping theories must be avoided (cf. Carson 1991: 246; Morris 1995: 272).

37 See Ridderbos 1997: 189 n. 14; Morris 1995: 272. Carson (1991: 246 n. 1) rightly cautions against a simplistic generalization of negated present imperative = command to stop doing something (though he acknowledges that this may be the force here). More accurately, the present imperative regularly stresses urgency (with reference to S. Porter 1989: 335ff.).

39 God’s judgment: Ridderbos 1997: 189; Barrett 1978: 255; Gehenna or Hades: Beasley-Murray 1999: 74; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.98; eternal consequences: Morris 1995: 272; Witherington 1995: 139.

45 Ridderbos (1997: 190) speaks of “the continuing position of ‘the Jews’ vis-à-vis Jesus.” Bultmann (1971: 243–44) says that it shows “that the narrator is less interested in the details of the story than in portraying the Jews’ habitual bearing towards the normal (or repeated) activity of Jesus.”

54 Though calling this a “parable” (Dodd 1968a; Burge 2000: 177; cf. R. Brown 1966: 218) may be an overstatement (Carson 1991: 250; Ridderbos 1997: 192; Beasley-Murray 1999: 75; Barrett 1978: 259–60).

66 So Carson 1991: 256; Moloney 1998: 183; Ridderbos 1997: 197; Morris 1995: 280; Beasley-Murray 1999: 76.

76 The rendering “not valid” (rather than “not true,” indicating a courtroom setting) is suggested by Carson (1991: 259) and Morris (1995: 287) (contra Ridderbos 1997: 202).

81 That “another” refers to God the Father represents a broad consensus among commentators: so Ridderbos 1997: 202; Morris 1995: 288; Moloney 1998: 190; Beasley-Murray 1999: 78; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.121; Barrett 1978: 264; R. Brown 1966: 224.

100 See Exod. 32:11–14, 30–32; Num. 12:13; 14:19–20; 21:7; Deut. 9:18–20, 25–29. See also As. Mos. 11:17 (cf. 12:6; Jub. 1:19–21; cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 62; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 79; Ridderbos 1997: 207; Carson 1991: 266).

109 Hengel (1999: 309) comments, “One should by all means read ‘Bethesda’ ”; so also Carson 1991: 241; Morris 1995: 267; Witherington 1995: 137; Borchert 1996: 231; Moloney 1998: 171; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94; Schlatter 1948: 142; undecided are Ridderbos 1997: 185; R. Brown 1966: 206–7.

110 So Fee 1982 and the vast majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 185; Carson 1991: 242; Morris 1995: 267; Barrett 1978: 253; R. Brown 1966: 207; Beasley-Murray 1999: 70

196, 200, 200n8, 201, 202, 202n18, 204, 205, 205n36, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 210n56, 211, 211n60, 212, 213, 214, 215, 215n72, 216, 216n77, 216n79, 217, 219, 219n93, 220n95, 221, 221n104, 222n106, 224n3, 229n8, 230n11, 230n13, 231, 232, 232n22, 235,

n. h; Bultmann 1971: 241 n. 4; Borchert 1996: 232; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94–95.

8 The phrase ἐπάρας οὖν τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς is reminiscent of 4:35 (Ridderbos 1997: 210; Keener 2003: 665).

18 Cf. Isa. 25:6–8; 49:9–11; see also Matt. 22:1–14; Luke 22:15–30 (Ridderbos 1997: 213).

36 For example, Michaels (1989: 107) observes, “The disciples wanted to take Jesus into the boat, but before they had a chance, they found themselves suddenly at their destination.”

Ridderbos (1997: 218) rejects the idea; many commentators do not arrive at a definitive conclusion (e.g., Morris 1995: 310). The phrase “and at once” is found elsewhere in John in 5:9 and 18:27 (the closely related term εὐθύς [euthys] is found in 13:30, 32; 19:34).

56 Subsequent sayings include 8:12 = 9:5; 10:7 = 10:9; 10:11 = 10:14; 11:25; 14:6; 15:1 (see the excursus in Witherington 1995: 156–58). The personal pronoun ἐγώ (egō, I) is emphatic (Ridderbos 1997: 229 n. 118); what is more, the “I am” saying of 6:35 forms the “narrative and theological centre of the scene,” as it is based on what precedes it and is explained by what follows (Lee 1994: 135–36). “Of life” constitutes a verbal genitive (Carson 1991: 288 n. 1).

60 See discussion at 6:30. The second καί (kai, and) in 6:36 probably is adversative (so Barrett 1978: 293). The majority of commentators consider the word με (me, me) in 6:36 to be original (so Ridderbos 1997: 230 n. 120; Carson 1991: 289–90; Morris 1995: 325 n. 104; R. Brown 1966: 270; contra Barrett 1978: 293; Moloney 1998: 216; see also the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 85; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.46).

72 So Ridderbos 1997: 235–37; cf. Carson 1991: 295; Morris 1995: 331–32; contra Moloney 1998: 223; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.55; Lindars 1972: 267; Talbert 1992: 140. As Keener (2003: 690) observes, “John’s words [in 6:27–63] invite his audience to look to Christ’s death itself, not merely those symbols which point to his death.” At best, any such overtones are derivative (Borchert 1996: 270–71; cf. Brodie 1993: 286; Calvin 1959: 170).

77 John’s use of τρώγω (trōgō, chew, eat) in 6:54 may be intended to heighten the vividness of Jesus’ words (Ridderbos 1997: 242 n. 163; cf. Moloney 1998: 221; Bultmann 1971: 236), though it may merely be the evangelist’s preferred verb for “eating” in the present tense (Carson 1991: 296; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 95; Barrett 1978: 299).

79 There is no reason to conclude, on the basis of the present tense participles in this verse, that this partaking is an act to be repeated (contra Ridderbos 1997: 243; Morris 1995: 336). The logic of this section rather seems to demand that partaking of Jesus’ flesh and blood is to be understood as an action that takes place once for all. Mutual indwelling ought not to be understood in egalitarian terms, as if Jesus and the believer were fulfilling equal roles. Jesus’ sacrifice is foundational, and the believer’s responsibility is the appropriation of this gift (Carson 1991: 298). Moreover, contrary to what might be expected, such mutual indwelling does not imply surrender of personality (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.63–64).

93 Note that “flesh” here takes on a different meaning than in the preceding discourse, where it referred to Jesus’ body (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 247; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.72).

95 Ridderbos 1997: 248; Carson 1991: 302; Morris 1995: 342; Barrett 1978: 305. Elsewhere in this Gospel, Jesus is shown to reiterate his earlier teaching: 8:24 (cf. 8:21); 15:20 (cf. 13:16); 16:15 (cf. 16:14).

104 Jesus’ choice of twelve disciples likely was intended to correspond to the number of tribes of Israel (Ridderbos 1997: 250).

106 So Carson 1991: 267; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 208–9; Barrett 1978: 272; Witherington 1995: 385; contra R. Brown 1966: 235–36; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.5–9.

3 Ridderbos (1997: 253) considers chapters 7–10 to constitute a unit, marked by Jesus’ “encounters, conversations, and confrontations” with the Jews. More in depth is the analysis by Schenke (1989: esp. 186), who likewise defends the unity of chapters 7–10 dramatically developing the escalating conflict regarding Jesus. Schenke discerns three major scenes (7:10–8:59; 9:1–10:21; 10:22–39) plus a prologue (7:1–9) and an epilogue (10:40–42). In chapters 7–8 (scene I, taking place in the Jerusalem temple), Schenke finds seven smaller scenes (7:10–13, 14–31, 32–36, 37–44, 45–52; 8:12–20, 21–59) moving from diversity of opinion regarding Jesus to a united front against him. Scene II is staged in Jerusalem and can also be divided into seven smaller scenes (9:1–7, 8–12, 13–17, 18–23, 24–34, 35–39; 9:40–10:21). The location of scene III is once again the temple. A very similar division of chapter 7 is found in Neyrey 1996 (followed in the discussion below). On the thematic unity of the present unit, see also Dodd 1953: 345–54. On the thematic unity and development of 7:1–36, see Attridge 1980.

8 See Laney 1992: 138–39. The background for this may be the brothers’ memory of Jesus’ feat at the wedding of Cana (2:1–12) and his subsequent apparent popularity in Jerusalem (2:23–25; Ridderbos 1997: 257–58; Barrett 1978: 311). Kruse (2003: 182) proposes that the recent defection of many disciples may have been to the detriment of the family honor, which Jesus’ brothers wanted restored. Ποιᾶ καὶ ζητεῖ in 7:4 represents Hebraic parataxis (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.139).

11 Paraphrased, this may mean “You can go anywhere you please, any time you want; I cannot” (cf. Ridderbos 1997: 258–59). Only in the present context is the term καιρός (kairos, time) used to denote Jesus’ (God-appointed) “time”; elsewhere the expression is ώρα, hōra (e.g., 2:4; see R. Brown 1966: 306; Carson 1991: 307–8; Morris 1995: 351–53).

13 The personal pronoun ἐμέ (eme, me) is emphatic (Morris 1995: 353 n. 20). The statement harks back to the evangelist’s comments in 3:19–20 (Ridderbos 1997: 258–59; see, later, 7:19; 8:31–59; 9:39–41; 16:8–11).

22 See 6:59; 8:20; cf. Mark 11:27; see Ridderbos 1997: 261–62. As in 5:1 and 7:8, there is the idea of “going up,” to Jerusalem and then to the temple itself.

31 E.g., Deut. 16:18–19; Isa. 11:3–4; Zech. 7:9. See also John 5:22–30 (esp. 5:30).

Grammatically, Μὴ κρίνετε (mē krinete, stop judging) enjoins people to cease an action rather than merely prohibiting it (Carson 1991: 316). Κρίσιν κρίνετε (krisin krinete, lit., “judge judgment”) represents a cognate accusative construction (Ridderbos 1997: 266 n. 40; Wallace 1996: 190).

36 The καί (kai, but) preceding ἀπ’ ἐμαυτοῦ (ap’ emautou, on my own accord) is adversative (Ridderbos 1997: 268 n. 45; Barrett 1978: 323; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.147). The ἐγώ (egō, I) at the beginning of 7:29 is emphatic, set against the ὑμεῖς (hymeis, you) in 7:28 (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.147). The alternating use of two words meaning “send,” πέμπω (pempō) and ἀποστέλλω (apostellō), in 7:28–29 represents stylistic variation (Morris 1995: 367 n. 58; Barrett 1978: 323; R. Brown 1966: 313).

42 This is the first occurrence of the frequent Johannine phrase indicating that Jesus will return to “him who sent me” (Ridderbos 1997: 271). The term ὑπάγω (hypagō, go) is favored by John (32 times, compared to 19 times in Matthew, 15 in Mark, and 5 in Luke; see Morris 1995: 369

n. 67; Moloney 1998: 250; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.476 n. 47). It is used seventeen times to refer to Jesus' departure to the Father.

45 Cf. 11:50–52. So Beasley-Murray 1999: 112; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.150; Bultmann 1971: 309. Ridderbos (1997: 271–72) thinks that it merely indicates a presumed place of refuge for Jesus. Schlatter (1948: 150) sees in 7:35 not only an objection that Jesus' departure from Jerusalem would compromise the Jews' privilege as God's chosen people but also an acknowledgment of the oppressive superiority of Greek learning, the profundity of the Greeks' antipathy toward the Jews, and the firmness of religious traditions in Greek-speaking areas.

47 See R. Brown 1966: 314; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.150; Schlatter 1948: 198. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 271), who opts for Greek-speaking Diaspora Jews. Carson (1991: 320 [cf. Barrett 1978: 325; Witherington 1995: 173]) thinks that Gentile proselytes probably are in view.

53 Most commentators favor a time immediately following cessation of ceremonies on the eighth day (Carson 1991: 321; Morris 1995: 373, esp. n. 79; Barrett 1978: 326; Moloney 1998: 256; Schlatter 1948: 199). Some believe that Jesus' words fit better with the ceremonies of the seventh day (R. Brown 1966: 320; Bultmann 1971: 302 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.152; Ridderbos 1997: 272; Burge 2000: 227). On the water-drawing ceremony, see Keener 2003: 722–24.

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee's observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus "from within him" refers to "whoever believes in me." Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of "rivers of living water" (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987: 88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

67 The sharp disjunction drawn by several commentators between Jesus' earthly and heavenly origins in John is overdrawn (cf. Ridderbos 1997: 278; Barrett 1978: 331; Schnackenburg 1980: 2.158). On the verb πιάζω (piazō, seize) in 7:44, see commentary at 7:30.

72 The particle μή (mē) at the beginning of the sentence is indicative of the Sanhedrin's "enraged frustration" (Ridderbos 1997: 279 n. 74). Stibbe (1993: 94) detects narrative echoes of the Nicodemus story in 3:1–21.

73 See Ridderbos 1997: 279–80; Carson 1991: 331–32. Morris (1995: 383) adds that it is not that the people are (entirely) unfamiliar with the law, but that they do not "know" (observe) it the way the Pharisees do: keeping the 613 commandments and so forth.

75 Ridderbos 1997: 280 (contra Moloney [1998: 255], who says that Nicodemus "now advocates a new way of understanding God's design for the people ... in the words and deeds of Jesus"; see also Ridderbos's excursus on Nicodemus at the end of ch. 7).

78 Ridderbos (1997: 281 n. 81) again notes the introductory particle μή, which here indicates ridicule. Ἐραυνήσον (eraunēson, search) is a conditional imperative, with the verb in the apodosis, ἴδε (ide, see), being another imperative (Wallace 1996: 489). The present tense of ἐγείρεται (egeiretai, he arises) states a (supposedly) timeless truth (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 281) rather than emphasizing presentness (Morris 1995: 385 n. 114). See also additional note. As to the brashness of the comment, cf. 11:49.

259, 259n42, 259n43, 260, 260n47, 261, 261n50, 262, 263, 263n60, 264, 264n65, 264n66, 265, 265n68, 266n72, 266n73, 266n74, 266n76, 267, 267n77, 268n81, 268n85,

16 See Ridderbos 1997: 294; Carson 1991: 339; Beasley-Murray 1999: 129; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.192.

28 The preposition ἐν (en) is to be rendered “at,” “near,” or “by,” since not just anyone would have been allowed inside (Ridderbos 1997: 298 n. 137). There may be irony in the location where the Jews manifest their ignorance of Jesus’ true identity (Moloney 1998: 298). There may also be an element of judgment (Bultmann 1971: 283).

42 Ridderbos 1997: 303. The expression καὶ γὰρ (kagō, and I) creates a close link between Jesus and the Father (Morris 1995: 401 n. 54). The use of εἰς (eis, to) in the phrase “to the world” is interesting. R. Brown (1966: 348) suggests that it has an “aspect of motion.”

43 Ridderbos (1997: 303) proposes that 8:27 relates to Jesus’ words in 8:24b (rather than 8:25–26), translating, “They had not understood.” If so, the Jews failed to understand that Jesus was actually referring to himself in 8:24.

47 So the majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 305–6; Carson 1991: 346–47; Morris 1995: 404; Beasley-Murray 1999: 132; D. M. Smith 1999: 185; Borchert 1996: 301 n. 182; Burge 2000: 259; Bultmann 1971: 252 n. 2; contra R. Brown 1966: 354–55, 358; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.204–5; Moloney 1998: 277; Westcott 1908: 2.13–14.

50 Ridderbos (1997: 306–7) notes the anachronistic and incongruous nature of the tendency of modern scholars to associate statements such as those made in this verse with events in the early church while disassociating them from the life and ministry of Jesus. See also Carson 1991: 347.

60 Ridderbos (1997: 310) notes the similarity of this passage with Rom. 6:11–18; 7:7–25. See also commentary at 13:27.

65 Contra Ridderbos (1997: 312 n. 185), who thinks that the terms are used synonymously.

66 Ridderbos (1997: 312) cites Gen. 15:6; 17:5; Rom. 9:16ff. (intending Rom. 9:6ff.); Gal. 3:7, 29.

68 So Carson 1991: 352; R. Brown 1966: 357; Barrett 1978: 348; contra Ridderbos 1997: 313; Borchert 1996: 305; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.212.

72 On predestination in John’s Gospel, see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.214–15. Carson (1991: 353) suggests that ἀκούω (akouō, hear) has the connotation of “obey.” R. Brown (1966: 357) thinks that the verb means literally that the Jews “have become so obdurate that they cannot even hear him; they are deaf.” Ridderbos (1997: 314) notes that Jesus’ opponents’ spiritual incomprehension results from their failure to combine hearing with faith.

73 Note the absence of the personal pronoun with τοῦ πατρὸς (tou patros, of the father), which harks back to 8:38. Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 315. Τοῦ διαβόλου (tou diabolou, of the devil) stands in apposition to τοῦ πατρὸς rather than implying that the devil has a father (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.213). For a study of 8:31–59 taking 8:44 as its point of departure, see Motyer (1997: esp. 160–210), who argues that the present interchange does not serve an anti-Jewish purpose, but rather is designed to persuade Jews that Jesus is the Christ.

74 So Morris 1995: 411; Ridderbos 1997: 315; Carson 1991: 353; Barrett 1978: 349; Beasley-Murray 1999: 135; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.213; Moloney 1998: 280; Borchert 1996: 305–6. It was commonly recognized in Second Temple literature that death was the result of Satan’s initiative (Wis. 2:23–24; Sir. 25:24; cf. Rom. 5:12).

76 The phrase means, more literally, “not standing in the truth,” which may imply that “the truth was not his starting point or standpoint” (Ridderbos 1997: 315; Barrett 1978: 349). The phrase

270, 271n96, 272, 272n102, 273, 274, 274n111, 275, 278, 278n5, 281, 281n12, 282, 282n20, 283n25, 284, 285, 285n34, 285n37, 286, 287, 287n45, 288, 289, 289n52,

“truth is not in him” asserts that Satan “has nothing in common with truth” (Barrett [1978: 349], who notes the absence of the article).

77 Notably, ψευδος (pseudos, lie) “does not refer here to a distinct act that can be immediately rectified but to a transindividual power of deception with paternity of its own” (Ridderbos 1997: 315).

81 Ridderbos (1997: 317 n. 200) notes that 8:46 is missing from certain MSS because of the homoioteleuton in 8:45 and 8:46.

85 This implies that Jesus neglects the traditional ways of Judaism and so is perceived as acting more like a Samaritan than like a true Jew (Morris 1995: 414; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 318). Morris (1995: 414) suggests that the Jews might be addressing Jesus’ failure to recognize their relationship with Abraham. Barrett (1978: 350) notes that since Dositheus and Simon Magus (both Samaritans who claimed to be sons of God) were described as demon-possessed, Jesus’ opponents might be making a similar connection with him (cf. Moloney 1998: 286; R. Brown 1966: 358).

96 The conjunction καί (kai, but) at the beginning of 8:55 is adversative (“yet” [Ridderbos 1997: 320 n. 209; Barrett 1978: 351]). Γινώσκω (ginōskō) and οἶδα (oida) for “know” are synonymous (Barrett 1978: 351; Borchert 1996: 307).

102 Ridderbos 1997: 321–22; cf. Carson 1991: 357; Barrett 1978: 352; R. Brown 1966: 367; Burge 2000: 263.

111 Cf. 1:14; Ezek. 10–11; see Carson 1991: 358, citing W. Davies 1974: 290–96; Barrett 1978: 353. Keener (2003: 774) concurs that Jesus’ withdrawing from the temple may “evoke a state of Ichabod, God’s glory withdrawing from a polluted and rebellious sanctuary” (citing Ezek. 5:11; 8:4; 9:3; 10:4, 18). Ridderbos (1997: 324 n. 225) suggests that the meanings of the verbs ἐκρύβη and ἐξῆλθεν (exēlthen, he left) “mutually determine each other.”

5 For structural proposals, see especially Ridderbos (1997: 332), who divides the chapter into four major scenes (9:1–5, 6–12, 13–34, 35–41); Duke (1985: 125–26 [followed by Lincoln 2000: 97]), who contends that irony is intensified by the evangelist’s juxtaposition of parallel scenes (9:1–7, 8–12, 13–17, 18–23, 24–34, 35–38, 39–41), which are arranged chiastically with 9:22 at the center; Lee (1994: 164–65), who sees a threefold structure (9:1–7, 8–34, 35–41); and Keener (2003: 775), who divides chapters 9 and 10 as follows: 9:1–34 (blindness and sin); 9:35–10:18 (true shepherd, sheep, and thieves); 10:19–21 (divided response); and 10:22–42 (conflict at Hanukkah). Lincoln (2000: 99) also follows Duke (1985: 126) in contending that in John 9 “the theme is clearly trial and judgment,” with the elements of a trial emerging from 9:13 onward.

12 On “rabbi,” see commentary at 1:38. Apart from 9:2–3, the verb ἁμαρτάνω (hamartanō, sin) occurs elsewhere in this Gospel only in 5:14. The ἵνα (hina, so that) is consecutive, expressing result (Ridderbos 1997: 332 n. 246; Wallace 1996: 473).

20 Bultmann (1971: 332 n. 1) finds this problematic and attributes the alleged difficulty to disparate sources; but see the responses by Ridderbos (1997: 334) and Carson (1991: 363).

25 The double imperative constitutes a Semitism (Barrett 1978: 358). Ridderbos (1997: 336) lists three reasons why the blind man was sent to Siloam: (1) to wash the mud out of his eyes; (2) to evoke the blind man’s faith; and (3) to carry out ritual purification (cf. Luke 7:14). Carson (1991: 365) adds (4) to correlate the Pharisees’ unbelief with a prophecy of judgment in Isa. 8:6 (though he rejects any prefiguration of baptism, contra Lindars [1972: 344], who sees the man’s bath as a

289n53, 289n54, 290, 290n57, 291, 291n59, 292, 292n64, 293, 294, 294n79, 294n81, 295, 295n84, 296, 297, 300n9, 300n10, 300n11, 301n13, 302, 302n16, 302n18, 304, 306, “quasi-baptismal washing”; see also Ridderbos 1997: 337). Grigsby (1985) argues that the washing in the pool of Siloam constitutes a thematic anticipation of the Johannine cross.

34 Τόν ποτε τυφλόν (ton pote typhlon, the formerly blind man) is placed in apposition to αὐτόν (auton, him) earlier in the sentence, which is construed as emphatic by some commentators, including Ridderbos (1997: 339) and Morris (1995: 430 n. 29).

37 See Ridderbos 1997: 335; Morris 1995: 427; Barrett 1978: 359; R. Brown 1966: 373; Borchert 1996: 318.

45 Ridderbos (1997: 339 n. 267) favors the sense “since you say he opened your eyes”; Barrett (1978: 360, citing LSJ) advocates ὅτι meaning “with regard to the fact that.”

52 Note the verb συνετέθειντο (synetetheinto, they decided among themselves; see Ridderbos 1997: 343 n. 281). Wallace (1996: 427) cites the form as an example of a reciprocal middle, with the pluperfect being extensive or consummative (p. 585). The same author classifies the ἵνα (hina, that) as complementary (p. 476).

53 Ridderbos 1997: 343; similarly, Morris 1995: 434 n. 36; contra Barrett 1978: 361; R. Brown 1966: 380; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.250; Bultmann 1971: 335.

54 Conway (1999: 131) suggests the idiomatic translation “Tell us the truth.” See Josh. 7:19; 2 Chron. 30:8; Jer. 13:16; 1 Esdr. 9:8; m. Sanh. 6.2; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 344; Carson 1991: 372; Morris 1995: 436. Alternatively, the Jews exhort the man to give glory to God, who performed the miracle (but see Barrett 1978: 362).

57 This is the only instance of λοιδορέω (loidoreō, insult) in the Gospel (elsewhere in the NT only in Acts 23:4; 1 Cor. 4:12; 1 Pet. 2:23). Note the emphatic juxtaposition of the personal pronouns σύ (sy, you) and ἡμεῖς (hēmeis, we), an “antithesis [that] is intended to expose the utter inferiority of the discipleship to which the man born blind refers” (Ridderbos 1997: 345), and the contemptuous force of ἐκείνου (ekeinou, that one’s) (Carson 1991: 373; Morris 1995: 437 n. 42; Barrett 1978: 362).

59 The perceptive reader will note that the Phrisees’ claim to being disciples of Moses is refuted by the earlier statement in 5:45–47 (Keener 2003: 791). There is some debate as to how common this self-designation was among the Jews of Jesus’ day (cf., e.g., Matt. 23:2). In b. Yoma 4a, it is applied to Pharisees as opposed to Sadducees. In m. Abot 5.19, Jews are referred to as “the disciples of Abraham,” while Christians are dismissed as “the disciples of Balaam the wicked” (that is, Jesus!). Schnackenburg (1990: 2.251) and Ridderbos (1997: 345 n. 287, referring to TDNT 4:443) consider this to be a characteristic rabbinic self-designation, while Carson (1991: 373–74, apparently following Barrett 1978: 362–63) says that this self-designation was not common.

64 Ridderbos (1997: 345 n. 289) notes that the γάρ (gar, for) “dangles somewhat,” lacking an obvious referent.

79 Though Carson (1991: 376 [cf. Morris 1995: 439]) also notes the judging role of the Son of Man (5:27), which coheres well with 9:39–41. Ridderbos (1997: 348) points out how Jesus repeatedly shifts to this title to reveal “greater things” about himself (1:51; 3:13; 6:27, 62; 8:28).

81 Ridderbos 1997: 348; Bultmann 1971: 339 n. 1. On the phrase “he is the one speaking with you,” see 4:26.

84 R. Brown (1966: 381–82) seeks to make a case for the baptismal significance of the healing of the blind man in this chapter (but see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.257–58; see also Ridderbos 1997: 337).

9 Barrett (1978: 368) suggests that ἀναβαίνων ἀλλαχόθεν (anabainōn allachothēn, going up another way) refers to individuals who attempt to reach the heavenly realm through a method other than the cross, but it is doubtful that the symbolism can be extended this far. See the appropriate cautions against pressing an allegorical reading of every detail in the present discourse registered by Ridderbos 1997: 355 (Morris 1995: 447 cites the doorkeeper as an example; see below).

10 Later, Judas is called a thief (12:6), and Barabbas a robber (18:40; cf. Mark 15:7). At his arrest, Jesus asks why he is treated like a robber (Matt. 26:55 pars.), and in the end he is crucified with robbers on either side (Matt. 27:38, 44 pars.). The majority of commentators take both terms as referring to the same people (Ridderbos 1997: 354; Carson 1991: 381; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.281; contra Barrett 1978: 369). See further Hengel 1989a: 24–46; Simonis 1967: 101–3.

11 The lack of an article before ποιμήν (poimēn, shepherd) in 10:2 does not negate the specificity of the term (Ridderbos 1997: 354; Morris 1995: 446 n. 13, 453–54; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.282). Westcott (1908: 2.50) says that the “absence of the article fixes attention on the character as distinct from the person.”

13 The wording is reminiscent of OT passages such as Num. 27:15–17 and Ezek. 34:13. Carson (1991: 383 [cf. Barrett 1978: 369]) understands Num. 27:15–18 as a typological allusion to Christ (contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.293; Moloney 1998: 308). Ridderbos (1997: 354) also mentions Ps. 80:1.

16 So Barrett 1978: 370; contra Ridderbos 1997: 354. See commentary at 10:8 and 10:10.

18 Stibbe (1993: 113) characterizes παροιμία as “a symbolic word-picture with a cryptic meaning ... essentially elusive discourse.” Morris (1995: 445) suggests that this is a rather unique form of allegory. Ridderbos (1997: 355 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 168]) opts for a parable with allegorical elements (cf. 10:7–9). Bultmann (1971: 375) describes the genre as a mixture between parable and riddle. See Köstenberger 2002b: 72–75. See also the long discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.284–88.

42 Cf. 1:18; 5:19–20; 7:29; 8:19, 55; 14:7, 31; 17:23, 25; see Carson 1991: 387; Ridderbos 1997: 361–62. Καθώς (kathōs, just as) entails not only a comparative but also a causal dimension (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.297).

43 See Exod. 3:7; 33:12, 17; Jer. 31:34; Hos. 6:6; 13:5; Nah. 1:7. For additional references and discussion, see Ridderbos 1997: 361. The saying “I know those who are mine, and those who are mine know me” has a proverbial ring to it; Boring, Berger, and Colpe (1995: 288) cite a Greek parallel: “I know Simon and Simon knows me.”

45 So the vast majority of commentators, including Barrett, Beasley-Murray, Burge, Carson, Moloney, Morris, Ridderbos, Schnackenburg, and Witherington. For Jewish material indicating that the Messiah would gather the Gentiles, see Hofius 1967.

46 Note the present tense ἔχω (echō, I have), which points to Christ’s current possession of these sheep despite their absence from the fold (Morris 1995: 455). There is no basis for the supposition by some (e.g., Bultmann 1971: 383) that 10:16 represents a later addition (see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.299; ambivalent is Ridderbos 1997: 362). As a study of the Johannine mission theme makes clear (not to mention the mission theme in the other Gospels), this passage, far from representing an isolated reference to Jesus’ anticipation of a future (Gentile) mission, coheres with a repeated and consistent emphasis on the extension of the scope of God’s salvation beyond the boundaries of national Israel to the other nations (e.g., Matt. 28:19; Acts 1:8). See Köstenberger 1998b; Köstenberger and O'Brien 2001: 73–127, 203–26.

50 Cf. Paul's teaching regarding the μυστήριον (mystērion, mystery) in Eph. 3:1–10; Col. 1:26–27 (Ridderbos 1997: 363). Ridderbos (1997: 364–65) also provides a helpful discussion and critique of Martyn's (1977: 170–74) reading of 10:16 as "one great cryptogram" in terms of the "Johannine community hypothesis." See also the comments in Carson 1991: 390.

53 Ridderbos (1997: 366) also notes that the verb τίθημι (tithēmi, lay down) has the connotation of removing an article of clothing, and he points to the strong conceptual link between the present passage and Jesus' actions in 13:4, 12. Both passages feature Jesus' authority and compassion alongside each other.

60 See Josephus, J.W. 5.5.1 §§184–85; Ant. 15.11.3 §§396–401; 20.9.7 §§220–21. So the vast majority of commentators, including Carson, Barrett, Morris, Beasley-Murray, R. Brown, Moloney, and Burge; contra Ridderbos 1997: 368.

61 Cf. 18:18: "it was cold." If so, he is referring to the Jews' "chilling response" to Jesus (Hengel 1999: 319). See also Borchert 1996: 337. Contra Ridderbos 1997: 368; Carson 1991: 391–92. Stibbe (1993: 116) comments that the "sense of impending doom in 10.1–21 is heightened by the atmospheric statement of the narrator in v. 22." Bultmann (1971: 361) suggests that the reference to the season serves to indicate that "the end is near," as the "seasons of the year reflect the progress of the revelation."

63 More literally, the Greek may be rendered "take away our life" (Ridderbos 1997: 368 n. 358). This translation is favored also by Morris (1995: 461, with reference to the same verb, αἶρω [airō, take away], in 10:18), who believes that the Jews are suggesting that Jesus is attempting to destroy Judaism. But in 10:18, αἶρω means "take up," not "take away." Bultmann (1971: 361 n. 5) thinks that this is "scarcely credible" and adduces the parallel expression in Josephus, Ant. 3.2.3 §48: οἱ δ' ἦσαν ἐπὶ τὸν κίνδυνον τὰς ψυχὰς ἡρμένους (LCL translation: "hearts elated"). R. Brown (1966: 403) proposes that Jesus is creating a pun on the word ψυχή (psychē, life), using it both with reference to Jesus' giving his life for his sheep and, ironically, to refer to Jesus' "taking away the life" of those who refuse to acknowledge him. In light of the fact that John's Gospel is laden with irony, this is possible but hard to verify.

65 So Carson 1991: 392; Burge 2000: 295. Compare the "messianic secret" motif in Mark (e.g., Mark 1:34; 5:43; 7:36; 8:30; 9:9; see Ridderbos 1997: 368; Barrett 1978: 378–80).

67 So, in effect, Ridderbos 1997: 368; Carson 1991: 392–93; Morris 1995: 462; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174. Borchert (1996: 338) suggests that the "interplay between paroimia and parrēsia allows Jesus to tell the Pharisees that he has already answered their question."

78 Ridderbos (1997: 371 n. 373) identifies λιθάζετε (lithazete, you stone) as a conative present (cf. Morris 1995: 466 n. 90); Wallace (1996: 535) calls it a "tendential present," describing an act about to be performed.

79 Cf. Mark 14:64 par.; see Bock 1998: es p. 234–37. See the brief discussion of Synoptic parallels in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.310. John 10:33 is the only occurrence of the term βλασφημία (blasphēmia, blasphemy) in this Gospel; the verb βλασφημέω (blasphēmeō, blaspheme) occurs only in 10:36. The expression καὶ ὅτι (kai hoti, even because) (adverbial καὶ) further clarifies the charge made by the Jews (Morris 1995: 467 n. 92). The participle ὄν (ōn, being) in 10:33 is concessive: "even though you are a mere man" (Wallace 1996: 634–35). Ποιεῖς (poieis, you make) is identified by Ridderbos (1997: 372 n. 375) as a durative present.

82 Ridderbos (1997: 372) suggests, not implausibly, that the expression “in your law” may indicate the value placed on the law by the Jews resulting in their attempt to stone Jesus (“in the law that to uphold ... is so important to you”). As noted by Carson (1991: 397), νόμος (nomos, law) here probably refers to the entire OT.

84 See b. Abod. Zar. 5a. For a variation of the first view, see Jungkuntz 1964; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311; Morris 1995: 467; Beasley-Murray 1999: 176–77. The second position is held by Emerton 1960; 1966. For a variation of the third view, see Hanson 1964–65; 1967. See further Oepke, TDNT 4:1022–32, 1054–55. Most major commentators seem to favor the third view as well (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 373; Carson 1991: 398; Barrett 1978: 384; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311).

85 The presence of an argument from the lesser to the greater is denied by Ridderbos (1997: 374) against the overwhelming majority of commentators (e.g., R. Brown 1966: 410; Morris 1995: 469; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.310; Moloney 1998: 316). Carson (1991: 399, perhaps following Barrett 1978: 385), calls this an ad hominem argument, which he defines (somewhat idiosyncratically, it seems) as an argument that “does not require Jesus to subscribe to the same literal exegesis as his opponents.”

100 Ridderbos (1997: 378 n. 402) plausibly suggests that a period might be placed after πρὸς αὐτόν (pros auton, to him) in 10:41.

103 Ridderbos (1997: 379) proposes that the words of 10:42 are seeking to indicate that despite his rejection by the Jews elsewhere, Jesus’ ministry was not ineffective. Ridderbos sees no reason to question the faith of these individuals. However, in light of the consistent string of instances of fleeting faith in John’s Gospel, there seems to be good reason to do just that. Also doubtful is the contention by Morris (1995: 472) that 10:42 describes a process akin to what occurred in John 4 (the impact of the woman’s testimony).

2 Though see the reference to “all the miracles” that the people of Jerusalem had seen in Luke 19:37 (noted by Ridderbos 1997: 383; R. Brown 1966: 429). For a defense of the historicity of the raising of Lazarus, see M. Harris 1986: 310–15. See also Morris (1995: 474–76), who, arguing for the historicity of the raising of Lazarus, presents several lines of reasoning: (1) the impressive amount of detail given, including names and geographical references; (2) Peter’s absence from the Johannine narrative in 7:1–13:6 (cf. Matt. 19:27–26:33; Mark 10:28–11:21; Luke 18:28–22:8), which may account, at least in part, for the omission of the raising of Lazarus in Mark and Matthew; and (3) all the Jerusalem miracles are excluded from the Synoptic tradition, and Jerusalem itself is excluded, with the exception of the final week. Keener (2003: 836) conjectures that Mark may have “suppressed” (an infelicitous word choice) the Lazarus story to protect Lazarus and his sisters, who still lived near Jerusalem at the time of publication. Keener (2003: 837) also observes that the account of Jesus’ raising of Lazarus is critical for John’s plot development (the Lazarus account is at the heart of John’s message: Jesus dies most immediately because he has given life to a disciple [11:14–16; cf. 3:16–17]); it constitutes the longest single sign account in the Fourth Gospel; and, apart from the passion narrative, it represents the longest narrative without a substantial discourse section.

6 The conjecture that the designation “the one you love” in 11:3 points to Lazarus as the “disciple Jesus loved,” the author of John’s Gospel, is entirely speculative. Also, there is almost certainly no connection between this figure and the character in the parable about the rich man and Lazarus recorded in Luke 16:19–31 (rightly noted by Ridderbos 1997: 386 n. 14; Carson 1991: 404; contra Dunkerley 1959).

326n18, 327, 327n24, 328, 328n28, 329, 330, 330n33, 331, 332, 333, 333n53, 333n55, 333n57, 334, 334n60, 334n61, 335n69, 336, 336n72, 337, 337n74, 338, 338n82, 340n92,

8 There is no reason to drive a wedge between history and theology and to diminish the historicity of the raising of Lazarus along the lines suggested by R. Brown (1966: 428–30 [but see Ridderbos 1997: 382]). R. Brown proposes that chapters 10–11 comprises a “later addition to the plan of the Gospel” (p. 427), attributing the present pericope more to “Johannine pedagogical and theological purpose than ... historical reminiscence” (p. 430). Also precarious is the type of source-critical reconstruction attempted by Schnackenburg (1990: 2.316–21). Ridderbos (1997: 382) helpfully points to the “agains” in 11:7–8 (presupposing a long prior stay in Judea and Jerusalem) and the disciples’ remarks about earlier attempts on Jesus’ life by the Jews in 11:8 as evidence that chapter 11 constitutes an integral structural component of the overall Gospel. Ridderbos (1997: 386) rightly notes that the reality of the miracle and its theological significance cannot be separated (referring to 1:14). For a rebuttal of existentialist interpretations of chapter 11, see Carson 1991: 404.

10 Ridderbos (1997: 383) comments, “In the Lazarus story the miraculous event and Jesus’ self-revelation in that event are completely interwoven.”

11 This does not keep Ridderbos (1997: 386) from calling the introduction “choppy and cumbersome,” or Barrett (1978: 387) from describing it as “clumsy.”

18 Ridderbos (1997: 386–87) also notes the somewhat unusual placement of the final phrase “whose brother Lazarus was sick” in 11:2.

24 Contrast 11:1, where Mary is mentioned before Martha (presumably because of her prominence on account of the anointing [11:2]). Ridderbos (1997: 388 n. 22 [cf. Carson 1991: 411]) suggests (citing John 11:19ff. and Luke 10:38b, 40–41) that usually Martha is mentioned first because she more often appears as the initiator of events. Carson (1991: 406 [cf. Morris 1995: 478]) proposes that Martha may be the oldest of the three.

28 This is why Carson (1991: 407 [cf. Morris 1995: 479 n. 16]) is right in rejecting the NIV’s rendering of 11:6 as “Yet when he heard” (retained in the TNIV), proposing instead the translation “When therefore he heard.” Ridderbos (1997: 388 n. 24) avers that the particle μέν (men) in 11:6b is “more or less concessive” (“he [it is true] stayed where he was”). Similarly, Barrett (1978: 390) suggests that τότε μέν (tote men, then) in 11:6b anticipates the ἐπειτα μετὰ τοῦτο (epeita meta touto, then after this) in 11:7, stressing Jesus’ deliberate delay.

33 Readings of 11:9–10 with reference to the coming of darkness leading to Jesus’ crucifixion and the like (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 391) seem to go beyond the image field conjured up by Jesus’ saying.

53 See Lev. Rab. 18.1 on Lev. 15:1; cf. Eccles. Rab. 12.6 (universally cited by commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 393; Carson 1991: 411; Morris 1995: 485). Cf. m. Yebam. 16.3; Semahot 8, rule 1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 109). See also Hanson 1973. Keener (2003: 841 n. 63, citing Michaels 1984: 190) cautions, however, that the belief that the soul left the body three days after death is not widely attested in the early period.

55 Again, Martha is mentioned first (cf. 11:5; noted by Ridderbos 1997: 393 n. 39).

57 So Ridderbos 1997: 393; Carson 1991: 411 (but see Wis. 19:3; m. Ketub. 4.4).

60 So Ridderbos 1997: 395. Wallace (1996: 703) goes further: “Although formally a second class condition, it is intended here as a rebuke. It is as if she had said, ‘Lord, you should have been here!’ ” (contra Carson 1991: 412).

61 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 412; Ridderbos 1997: 395, with reference to 2:5; similarly, Keener 2003: 106–7, citing Barrett 1978: 390. The term κύριος (kyrios) probably means “Lord,” as in 11:3 (Carson 1991: 411). Regarding the statement “God will give you whatever you ask,” see commentary at 9:31.

69 Ridderbos (1997: 396) persuasively argues that 11:25b refers to “death in the natural sense and to living in the sense of eternal life,” while “lives” in 11:26a “refers to natural human existence, while ‘never die’ refers to the eternal life that natural death can neither prevent nor affect” (so also Bultmann 1971: 403, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.331; Stibbe 1994: 51). Contra Carson (1991: 413), R. Brown (1966: 425), and Borchert (1996: 356) (also Calvin and Schlatter), who maintain that “lives” in 11:26a refers to eternal life. Wuellner (1991: 182) calls the present statement an oxymoron.

72 For this reason Witherington (1995: 203), who calls Martha’s confession “the least inadequate confession yet in this Gospel,” and R. Brown (1966: 433), who labels her belief “inadequate,” are overly negative. More positive are Morris (1995: 489), who says, “She may not understand fully the implications of what he has just said, but as far as she can she accepts it,” and Carson (1991: 414), who labels her faith as “a rich mixture of personal trust (fiducia) and of confidence that certain things about Jesus are true (assensus).” Keener (2003: 844–45) suggests that John, by including Martha’s confession, likely sought to balance gender the way Luke does (cf. Peter’s confession in 6:68–69). See also Stibbe (1994: 47), who perceives movement from two “I know’s” (11:22, 24) to a climactic “I believe” (11:27); from propositional to personal understanding; and from confessor to witness. Ridderbos (1997: 399–400) calls the confession “spontaneous and uninhibited” and sees it as reminiscent of the man blind from birth, who confessed despite his lack of understanding concerning the Son of Man (9:38). On “the Christ,” see commentary at 1:41; on “Son of God,” see commentary at 1:34 and 1:49.

74 Ridderbos (1997: 400) comments, “The time of his public self-disclosure before ‘the Jews’ was past.”

82 Though, conversely, Martha understands Jesus as a thaumaturge. Thus, according to Moloney (1998: 330), “Mary is the character in the story reflecting true faith (vv. 29, 32) while Martha has fallen short of such faith (vv. 21–22, 24, 27).” Ironically, this conclusion is precisely the opposite of that drawn by Pollard 1973: 440–41 (see n. 80 above). Both instances seem to represent the kind of dichotomizations that Ridderbos (1997: 401) rejects.

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, “The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death.” See also Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999: 289. The mourners’ unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999: 192–93), several of whom adduce Paul’s statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus’ anger is directed toward both “the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow” and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus’ anger as occasioned by Mary’s turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth

341, 341n94, 342, 342n103, 343, 343n106, 343n107, 344, 345, 347, 347n126, 348n131, 349, 349n135, 352, 353, 354, 355, 355n156, 358n5, 360n10, 361n12, 361n16, 362, 364,

Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either “misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition,” to mean “moved in spirit.” Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus’ struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, “He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself” (11:38 is translated “bearing the rebuke within himself”). According to Story, at the sight of people’s grief, Jesus was overcome by “momentary self-regret,” thinking, “Why did I not come sooner . . . ? I have only myself to blame. . . . Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?” However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

94 The term δακρύω occurs occasionally in the LXX (Job 3:24; Ezek. 27:35; Mic. 2:6; 2 Macc. 4:37; Sir. 12:16; 31:13). Owing to the force of the verb tense in the Greek original (an “ingressive aorist”), “Jesus burst into tears” is a better translation than the customary “wept” (Morris 1995: 495 n. 77; cf. Barrett 1978: 400; Pollard 1973: 441; Stibbe 1994: 45). This is suggested by comparison with instances of δακρύω in the same grammatical form in Greco-Roman and Hellenistic Jewish literature, where the term is regularly rendered this way (see Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 17.66.4; 27.6.1; Plutarch, Camillus 5.5; Pyrrhus 34.4; Pompeius 80.5; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162; J.W. 5.10.5 §445; 6.5.3 §304).

103 Again, Ridderbos (1997: 401), rightly in my opinion, dismisses attempts to link Jesus’ anger to the unbelief of the Jews. Carson (1991: 417) perhaps construes the relationship between 11:38 and 11:37 too tightly when he states, “This unbelief is the reason the next verse [v. 38] reports that Jesus’ quiet outrage flares up again.” Similarly, Barrett (1978: 401) speaks of “inchoate faith” that draws Jesus’ wrath.

106 Ridderbos (1997: 403) calls Jesus’ command “measured, almost gruff.”

107 Ridderbos (1997: 403–4) construes the sense as follows: “Enough now of tears and wailing! Enough honor has been bestowed on death! Against the power of death God’s glory will now enter the arena!”

126 Ridderbos (1997: 406) perhaps goes too far when he says that Jesus’ words are “the sovereign word of the conqueror.” Also, his comment that Lazarus is brought out of “the half-darkness of the tomb into the full light of the day” is interesting, but is not a point actually made by the evangelist. Jesus is presented here as the resurrection and the life, not as the light.

131 On the Pharisees, see commentary at 1:19, 24. On the chief priests and Pharisees, see commentary at 7:32. Ridderbos (1997: 407 n. 84) plausibly argues that the evangelist’s reference to the Pharisees as the key leaders of the people is a function not only of their influence in Jesus’ day but also of their significance in the post-temple period in which the evangelist wrote. Thus, “Their name was particularly useful to him as a general term for the Jewish authorities.” Carson (1991: 420), too, sees no hint of anachronism, pointing out also the Pharisees’ more direct access to the people. This stands in marked contrast to the provocative statement by Barrett (1978: 405) that if the evangelist conceived of the Pharisees as an official body, “he was ignorant of Judaism as it was before A.D. 70.” R. Brown (1966: 439) notes, “The reference to the Pharisees is more a question of simplification than of error.”

135 The temple is favored by, among others, Ridderbos (1997: 408) and Carson (1991: 420).

156 Barrett (1978: 410) opts for the rendering “He will not come, will he?” The imperfect verb forms ἐζήτουν (ezētoun, they were looking) and ἔλεγον (elegon, they were saying) indicate the ongoing search for Jesus and his being the subject of discussion. The former term need not be understood negatively but reflects “curious looking about for Jesus” (Ridderbos 1997: 411–12).

5 See Köstenberger 2001b: 49–63. Ridderbos (1997: 413 [cf. Burge 2000: 336]) rightly contends that Mary is not the woman described in Luke 7 (though he perceives some degree of dependence on Mark 14:3–9 = Matt. 26:6–13). This view is rather common, though not universally so. Contra Holst (1976: 435–46), who on form-critical grounds believes that there is only one underlying historical event and that “variations arose in the course of oral transmission” (citing Dodd 1963: 172; other proponents include D. F. Strauss, Dibelius, and Bultmann).

10 Martha’s serving suggests to some (e.g., Moloney 1998: 356) that the dinner was given at her (and Lazarus’s) house. Others object that if the dinner had been at Lazarus’s house, it likely would not have been stated that he was reclining with Jesus; his presence at the house would have been assumed (Morris 1995: 511; R. Brown 1966: 448; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 414). As on previous occasions, Martha is mentioned before her sister Mary (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.366).

12 The meaning “genuine” or “pure” is supported by most commentators (e.g., Carson 1991: 428; Barrett 1978: 412; Beasley-Murray 1999: 204 n. b; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.367; Ridderbos 1997: 414). Michaels (1989: 217), on the other hand, thinks that “it may have been the trade name under which the product was marketed” (i.e., “pistic nard”).

16 This is further underscored by the repeated reference to Jesus’ feet in 12:3 (Ridderbos 1997: 414–15; Morris 1995: 512).

25 Most commentators view the statement in an elliptical fashion, though there is less consensus on precisely what ought to be supplied. Carson (1991: 429) suggests that the statement is to be construed as follows: “Leave her alone. [She has done this—i.e., held on to the jar] in order to keep it for the day of my burial.” Ridderbos (1997: 417–19), too, holds that the ἵνα (hina, that) of 12:7 is independent (a “brachylogy” [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.369]) and proposes that the phrase is best understood as a rhetorical question. Less likely is the construal of Witherington (1995: 208, appealing to Synoptic parallels), who thinks that Jesus is urging that Mary be left to keep the “burial ritual.” Also doubtful is Maccini’s (1996: 173–74) rendering: “Let her alone, so that she might keep what oil she has left for the day of my burial” (so, earlier, Schlatter 1948: 264).

28 Ridderbos (1997: 420) speaks somewhat pompously of the “caesura in the manifestation of Jesus’ glory” and notes the heightening of the distinction between the risen Christ and the historical Jesus implied in the present narrative. According to Ridderbos, the imminence of Jesus’ burial highlights the separation between faith and unbelief that is illustrated radically in the contrast between Mary and Judas.

5 Contra Laney (1992: 224, citing Hoehner 1977: 91), who thinks that the “next day” refers to the day after the great crowds of Jews came to Bethany (12:9), “probably Monday, rather than Sunday.” Ridderbos (1997: 422), among others, proposes that the triumphal entry occurred the day after the anointing at Bethany. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.373) contends that a definitive conclusion is not possible.

11 Ridderbos (1997: 423 n. 137) says that “hosanna” literally means, “Please help!”; Carson (1991: 432) prefers the meaning “Give salvation now!” But probably Barrett (1978: 417–18) is correct that at the time of Christ, the phrase might have been no more than a “jubilant shout of praise” as part of a “spontaneous ovation” (cf. Morris 1995: 516; R. Brown 1966: 457). Beasley-

Murray (1999: 210) adds that it may have been a greeting as well.

17 This is the translation proposed by Ridderbos (1997: 424), who suggests that δέ (de, and, but) is not adversative here but rather serves as a transitional device.

19 See commentary at 1:49–51 and at 6:14–15 (where both terms, “the one who comes” and “king,” are used). Both Ridderbos (1997: 423) and Barrett (1978: 418) contend that by mounting the donkey, Jesus sought to correct the mistaken nationalism of the crowd (see also R. Brown 1966: 462; Witherington 1995: 221); though note Coakley (1995: 461–82), who contends that there is no evidence that the crowd understood at the time, so that, “if Jesus tried to make the crowd understand his actions in this way, he failed” (p. 463). Ridderbos (1997: 423) also points to the salvific context of Zech. 9 and notes that Jesus’ action was intended to convey the fact that the time of salvation described in Zechariah (and other relevant OT texts) had arrived.

22 Ridderbos (1997: 424 n. 145) notes that the first two occurrences of ταῦτα (tauta, these things) refer to the events narrated in 12:12–15. As to the third ταῦτα in 12:16, Morris (1995: 521) suggests that as the object of ἐποίησαν (epoiēsan, they had done), it refers to the role that the disciples played in acquiring the donkey (but see R. Brown [1966: 458], who proposes a general, passive sense of ἐποίησαν in 12:16, while Ridderbos [1997: 424] prefers to take it with reference to the manner in which the crowd greeted Jesus as he entered Jerusalem).

26 Cf. 11:19, 33, 42, 45 (see Ridderbos 1997: 425; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.377).

30 The ironic nature of the final part of the Pharisees’ statement is noted by, among others, Ridderbos (1997: 426), Carson (1991: 435), and Beasley-Murray (1999: 211). Carson (1991: 435) further suggests that there is actually “irony within irony,” given the reference to unbelief in 12:37–40.

4 Ridderbos (1997: 427 n. 154) notes that ἀναβαίνω (anabainō, go up) and προσκυνέω (proskyneō, worship) are often used with reference to pilgrims going to participate in cultic ceremonies. Barrett (1978: 421) suggests that the former expression may have a frequentative sense, indicating that these people regularly went up to these festivals.

6 See commentary at 7:35, the only other occurrence of the term in John’s Gospel. A look at the remaining NT references indicates that in virtually all instances the term is used in contrast with “Jews” (Ἰουδαῖοι, Ioudaioi; see Acts 14:1; 16:1; 18:4; 19:10, 17; 20:21; Rom. 1:16; 2:9, 10; 3:9; 10:12; 1 Cor. 1:22, 24; 10:32; 12:13; Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11). That the “Greeks” mentioned here were not Diaspora Jews (as Calvin [1961: 35] thought) is accepted by virtually all major commentators (e.g., Westcott [1908: 2.120], who likens these to the Gentile magi at the beginning of Matthew’s Gospel; Ridderbos 1997: 427; Carson 1991: 436; Barrett 1978: 421; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.381; Witherington 1995: 223; Moloney 1998: 351; Burge 2000: 342).

11 Philip’s provenance from a bilingual region is cited by many commentators, including Ridderbos (1997: 427), Carson (1991: 436), Schnackenburg (1990: 2.382), R. Brown (1966: 470), Witherington (1995: 223), and Moloney (1998: 352).

19 On the possible influence of Ps. 42 here and elsewhere in John’s Gospel (11:33, 35, 37; 14:1–9, 27; 19:28), see the interchange between Beutler (1979, modifying Freed 1965b: 117–30) and Freed (1983a). See also Carson (1991: 440), who says that τετάρακται signifies “revulsion, horror, anxiety, agitation.” This emphasis on the precrucifixion turmoil suffered by Jesus stands over against those who, in an effort to focus on the “glory” aspect of Jesus’ death, overlook the real agony and anxiety he endured. So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 434), who argues, contra Witkamp, that 12:27a can “hardly refer to anything other than the natural human reaction in confrontation with death”; and Carson (1991: 439–40), who contends, contra E. Käsemann and G. C. Nicholson, that “even in John [with its realized eschatology], Jesus cannot contemplate the cross as a docetic actor, steeped in dispassionate unconcern.” R. Brown (1966: 475) notes that here “we see the true humanity of the Johannine Jesus.”

22 Commentators almost universally consider the present pericope to be the Johannine equivalent to the Synoptic account of Gethsemane (e.g., Morris 1995: 529; Barrett 1978: 424; R. Brown 1966: 475–76; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.386), though Ridderbos (1997: 435–36, pointing to Ps. 6) and Carson (1991: 440) rightly reject the notion that the Fourth Evangelist has simply refashioned the Synoptic Gethsemane scene to suit his purposes.

23 Ridderbos (1997: 435 n. 185) cites BDF §448.4 as evidence that ἀλλά after a question posed to oneself could be rendered more strongly as “No!” (cf. NRSV; Bultmann 1971: 427), though Ridderbos himself does not adopt this rendering. Cf. Whitacre 1999: 312, following Carson.

31 Ridderbos (1997: 437) understands “I have glorified it” to refer to “the whole of Jesus’ earthly activity.” Carson (1991: 441) includes Jesus’ earthly ministry, the incarnation, and the signs. Morris (1995: 530) seems to think that “I will glorify it” refers solely to the cross.

Schnackenburg (1990: 2.388, citing Ps. 138:2; Ezek. 36:23; 38:23) takes the same phrase to point to the Son’s exaltation and vindication: “He will justify the Son, raise him above the power of evil, and give him glory and saving power.”

35 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.390) here sees Jesus commenting on people’s incomprehension and urging them to believe. Ridderbos (1997: 437), on the other hand, argues that Jesus refers to the sound of the voice, not the words, maintaining that Jesus “is not holding the crowd answerable for what it could not understand.” Neither Barrett (1978: 426) nor R. Brown (1966: 477) seems able to reconcile the apparent tension in the voice being for the crowd yet unintelligible to the crowd. Carson (1991: 442) offers four points, most importantly that even if the crowd had not understood the voice, the voice itself should be a signal of divine activity.

39 The term “draw” brings out the truth that people do not come to Christ on their own initiative; only as God works in people and draws them can they come to him (Morris 1995: 531). The phrase “all people” does not imply universalism (the ultimate salvation of all [see commentary at 1:9]). Rather, the approach of Gentiles prompts Jesus’ statement that after his glorification he will draw “all kinds of people,” even Gentiles, to himself. For this interpretation and a brief discussion of the textual issues, see Köstenberger 1999a: 194. See also Ridderbos (1997: 439–40), who provides the glosses “the entire human world” and “‘all’ without distinction of people or race”; and Morris (1995: 531–32), who struggles but then interprets πάντας (pantas) to refer to “all kinds of men.” In addition, Carson (1991: 443) sees a parallel with Rev. 12:11a and takes issue with the adversative NIV rendering, “But I, when I am lifted up” (changed in the TNIV to “And I, when I am lifted up”).

40 Ridderbos (1997: 439) rightly notes that this is more than a mere proleptic reference to a future event, which effectively reduces 12:31b to a “prophetic vision” (contra Bultmann [1971: 431], who argues that the “nows” of 12:31 necessitate the purgation of traditional Christian eschatology). As Carson (1991: 444–45) aptly notes, “The end times have begun already. It is not that there is nothing reserved for the consummation; rather, it is that the decisive step is about to be taken in the death/exaltation of Jesus.” See also R. Brown 1966: 477.

47 Regarding the people’s question “Who is this ‘Son of Man’?” see commentary at 1:51 and at 9:35–36. Ridderbos (1997: 441) takes the question to pertain to the nature of the Son of Man

390, 390n2, 391, 391n6, 391n9, 393, 393n17, 394, 402, 402n7, 403, 403n13, 404, 405n30, 406, 407, 409, 411, 411n1, 412, 412n6, 415, 416, 418, 422, 423, 424n14, 425,

(“What kind of Son of man are you speaking of?”) rather than his identity. Morris (1995: 532) thinks that the crowd asks what the function of the Son of Man is and whether or not he is one and the same as the Messiah. Carson (1991: 445) notes that though four months earlier the Jewish authorities were unclear about whether or not Jesus used the “Son of Man” title messianically, the less knowledgeable crowd, already ripe with messianic expectations, made the “Son of Man = Messiah” connection. To the contrary, if taken at face value, the crowd’s question reveals not understanding, but misunderstanding, even ignorance, or at least confusion (so, rightly, Morris 1995: 533: “To the end they remain confused and perplexed, totally unable to appreciate the magnitude of the gift offered to them and the significance of the Person who offers it”).

1 For a discussion of 12:37–50 in the context of the Johannine lawsuit motif (cf. Isa. 40–55), see Lincoln 2000: 105–10. Keener (2003: 882) notes that many find in 12:37–43 a theological summary of people’s responses to Jesus’ public ministry and in 12:44–50 an anthology of representative sayings. Whitacre (1999: 326) suggests that 12:37–43 emphasizes Jesus’ deeds, and 12:44–50 his words (also adducing Moses’ final words in Deut. 32:45–47 as a parallel). Both Ridderbos (1997: 443) and Schnackenburg (1990: 2.411) stress the relevance of this section for the evangelist’s own day and the historical distance from which this section was presumably written. This surely is true but should not be exaggerated. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.421) also provides a defense of Johannine authorship against Boismard, who claims that 12:44–50 is non-Johannine. Bultmann (1971: ix), in a hardly defensible move, relocates both 12:34–36 and 12:44–50 to John 8, with only 12:37–43 remaining in the traditional position.

2 Οὐκ ἐπίστευον (ouk episteuon, they were not believing), using the imperfect tense, highlights the progressive nature of the Jews’ unbelief (Ridderbos 1997: 443). Croteau (2002: 65–66) plausibly contends that the antecedents of the reference to people’s unbelief in 12:37 include all previous instances of unbelief in the narrative, including 2:23; 4:45–48; 6:14; 7:31; 8:30–31; 11:47; 12:11 (viewed negatively by Croteau).

6 The balancing emphasis is provided by Ridderbos (1997: 444–45), who notes, “Unbelief is not thereby blamed on God in a predestinarian sense, but is rather described as a punishment from God.” Carson (1991: 448–49), too, engages in theodicy when he writes, “God’s judicial hardening is not presented as the capricious manipulation of an arbitrary potentate ... but as a holy condemnation of a guilty people who are condemned to do and be what they themselves have chosen.”

9 This is the view of the majority of major commentators: e.g., Carson 1991: 449; Morris 1995: 538; Ridderbos 1997: 445; R. Brown 1966: 484.

17 Ridderbos (1997: 448 n. 128) and Morris (1995: 540) note that both “I” and “light” are emphatic.

7 This is favored by Morris (1995: 545 n. 9) and Ridderbos (1997: 452); cf. Barrett 1978: 438; R. Brown 1970: 550. Carson (1991: 461), at least explicitly, remains undecided, though his translation reflects an intensive force.

13 Ridderbos (1997: 459 n. 33, with reference to Friedrichsen 1939: 94) suggests the translation “after the meal,” but this seems to be an unlikely rendering of the preposition ἐκ (ek).

30 Ridderbos (1997: 459 n. 34 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 3.19]) notes the use of Peter’s double name, “as elsewhere when his most striking and characteristic interventions are described” (e.g., 6:68; 13:9, 24, 36; 18:10, 15, 25; 21:3). On the designation “Lord,” see 13:9, 36, 37, and commentary at 13:13.

1 John’s quotation is closer to the MT than to the LXX. Menken (1990) contends that the rendering of Ps. 41:9 in the present passage represents the evangelist’s own translation from the Hebrew. Moloney (1998: 384), on the strength of the evangelist’s choice of the verb τρώγω (trōgō [used also in 6:54–58]) in the place of the LXX’s ἐσθίω (esthiō) for “eat,” postulates “eucharistic overtones” to the meal. On fulfillment quotations, see commentary at 12:38. Similar texts in the Psalms include 31:9–13; 38:10–12; 55:13–14 (see commentary at 13:21). Ridderbos (1997: 467 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 554]) rightly argues for a general sense of “this is to fulfill the scripture” rather than taking the statement to imply that Jesus chose Judas in order to fulfill Scripture. This latter view seems to be held by Carson (1991: 470), who writes, “The reason Jesus chose one who would betray him was to fulfill the Scripture.”

6 Ridderbos (1997: 467) notes that at the outset, 13:20 does not seem to fit the apologetic thrust of 13:18–19. Barrett (1978: 445) observes the rapidly oscillating movement of thought between the intimate union sustained by Jesus with his disciples and the prediction of Judas’s betrayal.

14 Ridderbos (1997: 478) says that Jesus hurls Peter’s words back at him “almost contemptuously,” though this is not required by the text. Jesus may just as well have responded mildly, albeit with some grief owing to Peter’s inability to live up to his good intentions. The theme of the disciples’ failure to understand their inability to follow Jesus now is continued throughout the discourse.

33 Ridderbos (1997: 493), failing to note 15:1, incorrectly refers to the present passage as the last “I am” saying in this Gospel. Compare also Heb. 10:20 where Jesus is said to have opened up a “new and living way” through his blood. The only other occurrence of ὁδός (hodos, way) in this Gospel is 1:23 (citing Isa. 40:3).

34 The importance of 14:6 in the context of the entire Gospel (not to mention Christian theology at large) can hardly be exaggerated. Ridderbos (1997: 493) calls it “the core statement of this entire Gospel.” Schnackenburg (1990: 3.65 [cited approvingly by Beasley-Murray 1999: 252]) says that this text “forms a classical summary of the Johannine doctrine of salvation.” Burge (2000: 392) calls it the premier expression of the Gospel’s theology.

69 Ridderbos (1997: 500) perceptively notes that here, “spirit” designations such as “Spirit of truth,” “Holy Spirit,” and simply “Spirit” serve as further description of the παράκλητος rather than vice versa, as might be expected.

70 The translation of the term has proved particularly difficult since there does not seem to be an exact equivalent in the English language (see discussion in Carson 1991: 499). None of the expressions chosen in English translations seems fully adequate: “Counselor” (NIV) smacks of contemporary notions of counseling (marriage counselor, camp counselor), focusing primarily on emotional or psychological aspects (though the legal term “Counselor” or “Counsel” is more appropriate); “Helper” (NASB, ESV, ISV) is more neutral but conveys inferior status overtones not present in the text and lacks the legal connotation possibly present (cf. the discussion in Lindars 1972: 479); the fact that some translations give several alternative renderings in footnotes also suggests that any one English rendering may be inadequate (e.g., NLT: “the Counselor; or Comforter, or Encourager, or Advocate”). “Companion” (suggested by Brodie [1993: 466]) also falls short, as does Calvin’s (1961: 82) “Patron.” Some make reference to the root meaning of the word, “one called alongside to help,” but it is unclear whether first-century usage consciously drew on this background. There is evidence that the expression was used in a legal setting, but it is less clear that the meaning should be restricted to “Advocate” (so, consistently, the TNIV) or the like (standard Greek reference works cite the following meanings: LSJ—one called to one’s aid, legal assistant, advocate, summoned, intercessor; Behm, TDNT 5:800–814—legal advisor, helper, advocate in court [for a helpful survey, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.144–50]). Perhaps “helping presence” captures the import of the term better than any other (Köstenberger 1999a: 157) for the following reasons: (1) this is what Jesus was while with the disciples; (2) this encompasses the various functions laid out for the Spirit in John 14–16; (3) this transcends (but may include) the legal context of the term (see esp. 16:7–11). See the discussion by Ridderbos (1997: 503), who issues a plea to let the Johannine context (rather than alleged extrabiblical parallels) determine the meaning of παράκλητος and concludes that “the dominant idea is of someone who offers assistance in a situation in which help is needed.”

73 Though, as Moloney (1998: 407) points out, there are differences between Jesus and the Spirit as well: the latter neither becomes flesh nor dies for our sins. Alternatively, the statement refers to Jesus’ postresurrection appearances to his followers (so Ridderbos 1997: 505; Carson 1991: 501; Morris 1995: 578–59; Beasley-Murray 1999: 258; Borchert 2002: 126). Barrett (1978: 464) says that the passage refers neither to Jesus coming in the person of the Holy Spirit nor to the parousia but rather is using language appropriate to both the resurrection and the parousia to refer to both.

91 The vast majority of commentators (including R. Brown, Barrett, Borchert, Morris, Carson, and Ridderbos) believe that teaching and reminding are in synonymous parallelism. On the Spirit’s teaching ministry, see the parallel in 16:13. Both verses together (14:26 and 16:13) echo Ps. 25:5 (cf. 25:9). See also Neh. 9:20 (cf. 1 John 2:20, 27). Regarding Jesus’ teaching, see John 6:59; 7:14, 28, 35; 8:20; 18:20. It is often argued that the use of the Greek masculine pronoun ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, he) for the Spirit in passages such as John 14:26; 15:26; and 16:13–14 affirms the personality of the Holy Spirit (Barrett 1978: 482; Borchert 2002: 159; Morris 1995: 583 n. 73 [citing Westcott]; 606 n. 64; 621 n. 27; and others cited in Wallace 1996: 331 n. 42). However, the most likely reason for John’s use of the masculine pronoun in these passages is that the antecedent is the masculine noun ὁ παράκλητος (ho paraklētos, the helping presence). If so, John’s use of a masculine pronoun to refer to the Spirit is best explained as a function of grammar rather than theology, and arguments for the personality of the Holy Spirit must be made on other grounds (so rightly Wallace 1996: 331–32, who points out that it is difficult to find any text where the neuter noun πνεῦμα [pneuma, spirit/Spirit] is grammatically referred to by the masculine).

98 So Carson 1991: 506; Morris 1995: 584; contra Ridderbos (1997: 511), who construes this clause not as conditional but causal (p. 494 n. 37).

2 Although vine imagery is widespread in ancient literature, an OT background for the present passage is favored by the vast majority of commentators, primarily owing to the frequent OT references or allusions and the replacement motif in this Gospel (e.g., Carson 1991: 513; R. Brown 1970: 669–71; Morris 1995: 593; Ridderbos 1997: 515; contra Bultmann 1971: 530; Witherington 1995: 255–57).

6 Ridderbos (1997: 515) calls it the “redemptive-historical description of the people of God.” See Isa. 5:1–7; 27:2–6; cf. Ps. 80:8–16; Jer. 2:21; 6:9; 12:10–13; Ezek. 15:1–8; 17:5–10; 19:10–14; Hos. 10:1–2; 14:7; see also Sir. 24:17–23; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 5:23. An extensive allegorical depiction of Israel as a vine is also found in Lev. Rab. 36.2 (with reference to Ps. 80:9).

460n59, 460n60, 464, 465, 465n4, 465n5, 465n8, 466, 467, 467n16, 467n18, 468n24, 468n26, 469, 470, 471, 472, 475, 476n65, 477, 478, 478n72, 479, 480, 482n1, 483,

17 Ridderbos (1997: 517 n. 119) rejects Judas and Peter as specific referents, yet it seems hard to deny that these two individuals (plus the rest of the Eleven alongside Peter) serve as excellent examples of the type of procedure described in the present verse.

28 As mentioned, Judas seems to be the prime example (cf. 13:10–11; 15:2; see Stibbe 1996: 161–62). Both verbs ἐβλήθη (eblēthē) and ἐξηράνθη (exēranthē) are in the Greek aorist (lit., “has been thrown” and “has been withered”), indicating the completeness of the divine judgment (see the discussion in Carson 1991: 519). Of the four verbs in 15:6, the first two are passive and the second two active in the Greek, which is a bit awkward in English. Hence, several translations (such as the NIV, NLT, RSV, NRSV, and TNIV) render συναγούσιν (synagousin, they gather), for example, as a passive (but see KJV, ASV, NASB, NKJV; Ridderbos 1997: 518). In either case, the agents are left unspecified.

29 Lang, TDNT 6:934–47, especially 936–37, 942; Carson 1991: 517; R. Brown 1970: 679; Ridderbos 1997: 518. See, for example, Isa. 30:27; Matt. 3:12 par.; 5:22; 18:8; 25:41; Luke 12:49; Heb. 12:29; 2 Pet. 3:10; Jude 7, 23; Rev. 20:14.

59 See the discussions in Ridderbos 1997: 522 (greater emphasis on fruitbearing, but missionary activity is part of it); Barrett 1978: 478 (reference to apostles’ mission to the world); and Schnackenburg 1990: 3.112 (leans against reference to missionary activity).

60 There is some debate as to whether the two ἵνα-clauses in 15:16 are coordinate (Ridderbos 1997: 521 n. 132; Barrett 1978: 478) or subordinate (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.112). The former seems more likely.

4 Ridderbos (1997: 524) and Barrett (1978: 480) note the formal contradiction between Jesus’ statement that he no longer calls his followers “servants” in 15:15 and his application of the saying quoted in 15:20 to the disciples. Both conclude that there is no actual contradiction here.

5 See Ridderbos 1997: 523; Carson 1991: 525. Compare Matt. 10:24 par. (Beasley-Murray 1999: 275). See also the additional note on 15:20.

8 See 7:28; 8:19, 27, 55; 16:3. Ταῦτα πάντα (tauta panta, all these things) presumably includes both hatred (15:18–19) and the resulting persecution (15:20; cf. 16:1–3; see Bultmann 1971: 550 n. 1; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276; Ridderbos 1997: 524). The expression “because of my name” reflects OT terminology pertaining to God and his great name (cf. 1 Sam. 12:22; 2 Chron. 6:32; Jer. 14:21; cf. Acts 5:41; 1 Pet. 4:14; 1 John 2:12; Rev. 2:3; see R. Brown 1970: 687), though in the present context it is essentially synonymous with “me” (Carson 1991: 526; Moloney 1998: 433).

16 So Ridderbos 1997: 525; R. Brown 1970: 688; Morris 1995: 605; Barrett 1978: 482; Carson 1991: 527 n. 2.

18 So Ridderbos 1997: 525–26; Barrett 1978: 482; Carson 1991: 527; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276; contra Moloney (1998: 434), who contends that “most” favor Ps. 35. Cf. the citation of Ps. 69:9 in John 2:17. See also Ps. 119:161. Extrabiblical parallels include Ps. Sol. 7:1; b. Yoma 9b (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 147; cf. Barrett 1978: 482; R. Brown 1970: 689).

24 So Carson 1991: 529; Ridderbos 1997: 527; R. Brown 1970: 690; Moloney 1998: 434. See 16:4; 6:64; 8:25. See also Luke 1:2; Acts 1:21–22; 10:37. The present tense ἐστé (este, you are) is perfective in meaning, “you have been” (R. Brown 1970: 690; contra Bultmann 1971: 554).

26 Cf. the link between the “they” in 16:2 and those mentioned in 15:21–25 (Ridderbos 1997:

528).

65 See Isa. 13:8; 21:3; 26:17–18; 42:14; 66:7–13; Jer. 4:31; 6:24; 13:21; 22:23; 30:6; 49:22–24; 50:43; Mic. 4:9–10; cf. 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 16:38–39. The anarthrous expression “a woman” is generic (Carson 1991: 544 n. 1). For a brief discussion and refutation of a Mariological interpretation of the woman (mostly by Roman Catholic interpreters), see Ridderbos 1997: 539 n. 188 (referring also to Schnackenburg 1990: 3.158–59).

72 Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25; 1 John 2:1; cf. John 14:16; 17:9, 15, 20. See Carson 1991: 547; Ridderbos 1997: 543; Morris 1995: 629; Barrett 1978: 496.

1 The prayer is often called Jesus’ “high-priestly prayer” (a designation reaching back at least as far as the sixteenth century), though this label hardly fits with Johannine thought, which does not picture Jesus as a high priest (Ridderbos 1997: 546; Carson 1991: 552–53; though see commentary at 17:19 below). Westcott’s and E. C. Hoskyns’s title “prayer of consecration,” though not without merit (see below), fails to encompass the contents of the entire prayer (Carson 1991: 553; Barrett 1978: 500). Hence, commentators now frequently opt for more generic titles of the present prayer, such as “The Farewell Prayer” (Ridderbos) or “The Prayer of Jesus” (Carson). Witherington (1995: 266) calls it “The Sage’s Prayer,” based on his view that the Fourth Evangelist portrays Jesus as a sage.

7 See Morris 1995: 634; with further delineation of subunits, Hunter 1979: 326–28. Lindars (1972: 515) further divides 17:20–26 into 17:20–23 and 17:24–26. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.168–69, with reference to a 1973 German article) provides a more complicated proposal, dividing at 17:1–2, 4–5, 6–11a, 11b–16, 17–19, 22–23, 24–26 (he considers 17:3 and 17:20–21 to be secondary glosses). Others favor division at 17:1–8, 9–19, 20–26 (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 748–51). Malatesta (1971: 191–92) divides at 17:1–5, 6–8, 9–19, 20–24, 25–26 and proposes a strophic arrangement. More eccentric is the suggestion by Appold (1976: 204) that there is an oscillating pattern of petition and review, featuring six petition and six review units. A survey of structural proposals for John 17 up to the late 1970s is found in Hunter 1979: 312–28. More recently, Borchert (2002: 185–89) has favored seven petitions, based on the address “Father.” Yet, as Ridderbos (1997: 547) remarks, “The structure is not severe enough and the transitions are too fluid for us to speak of a detailed and sharply delineated thought scheme.”

12 Ridderbos (1997: 548) says that the glory sought by Jesus here is none other than the one he already possessed on earth (e.g., 1:14; 2:11; cf. 9:3; 11:4, 40; 12:28). Carson (1991: 554) suggests that the petition is for the Father to reverse the self-emptying entailed in Jesus’ incarnation and to restore Jesus to his preexistent glory (cf. 17:24).

19 The explanatory phrase “now this is” is in keeping with Johannine style (cf., e.g., 3:19: “this is the verdict”). The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) here, in typical Johannine idiom, is appositional (Wallace 1996: 475). Morris (1995: 638) notes that ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) here precedes the noun (elsewhere in John also in 4:23), and he proposes that this indicates emphasis. The verse is regularly seen by critical scholars as a Johannine insertion (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 741; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.172; Barrett 1978: 503; but see Carson 1991: 556; Ridderbos 1997: 549).

26 The expression “Jesus Christ” is used in this Gospel only here and in 1:17 (see also 1 John 4:2), and it perhaps reveals hindsight: “Christ” has now become Jesus’ last name (but see Ridderbos 1997: 549). It may strike the modern reader as curious that Jesus would call himself “Jesus Christ”; however, self-reference in the third person was common in antiquity (cf. 21:24; see Jackson 1999: esp. 24–31).

35 Moreover, as Ridderbos (1997: 551) notes, “Jesus did not manifest God’s name to those who had no knowledge of it but rather to those who were among the people to whom God had from of old revealed ‘his name’ and to whom he had obligated himself to reveal his name in the future” (citing Isa. 52:6; Ezek. 39:7).

49 See 6:37, 39, 70; 10:28–29; 18:8–9. The juxtaposition of the verbs “protect” and “keep safe” reflects Semitic parallelism (cf. Prov. 18:10). The verb ἐφύλαξα (ephylaxa, I guarded) may conjure up the image of a shepherd guarding his flock (Ridderbos 1997: 553). On “the name you gave me,” see 17:11. R. Brown (1970: 764) views the events of 18:5–8 as a demonstration of how God’s name protects the disciples: when Jesus identifies himself as ἐγώ εἰμι (egō eimi, I am [he]), his arresters fall down, and the disciples are allowed to leave. Similarly, Stibbe (1993: 176–77), who notes how both of Jesus’ statements in his final prayer, that he protected his own (17:12) and that he completed his mission (17:4), anticipate realities still future from the vantage point of the Johannine narrative (cf. 18:1–11 and 19:30, respectively).

57 See the earlier references to the “ruler of this world” in John (12:31; 14:30; 16:11; see also Ridderbos 1997: 555). Cf. Matt. 6:13; 1 John 2:13–14; 3:12; 5:18–19.

66 “Truly” translates the phrase ἐν ἀληθείᾳ (en alētheia), which refers adverbially to the unique nature of the disciples’ consecration (Ridderbos 1997: 556). Borchert (2002: 204) remarks, “In consecrating himself, Jesus modeled for his disciples what is meant to be both alien from the world and yet committed to a mission in and to the world, even to the point of death.” See also the short excursus in which Ridderbos (1997: 557) responds to the charge that the farewell discourse and prayer are world-avoiding.

67 See the parallel in Deut. 29:14–15. The present participle πιστευόντων (pisteuontōn, believing) clearly is future-referring (Ridderbos 1997: 558 n. 248, citing BDF §339.2b).

“Message” translates the term λόγος, logos (see commentary at 17:17).

79 See Carson 1991: 569; Ridderbos 1997: 564. On “you ... have loved them,” see 14:23; 16:27.

88 So Carson 1991: 570; cf. R. Brown 1970: 781; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.197; Borchert 2002: 211. Contra Morris (1995: 653), who thinks that it is through the cross. Ridderbos (1997: 566) suggests that this is not so much an anticipation of the passion as it is a reference “to Jesus’ continuing work in heaven.”

1 Stibbe (1992: 111–12) contends that John’s characterization of Jesus in his passion narrative consists of three aspects: Jesus as judge, king, and elusive God. Stibbe also suggests that 18:1–27 serves as an “implicit commentary on the truth enunciated in 1:5” (i.e., the victory of the light over the darkness [p. 100]). On the relationship between the Johannine and the Synoptic passion narratives, see Ridderbos 1996: 569–72; Carson 1991: 571–76; Westcott 1908: 2.262–64. Burge (2000: 485–86) addresses the historical trustworthiness of the Johannine passion narrative. Moloney (1998: 482) divides 18:1–19:42 into five scenes on the basis of the introduction of new people and places. He also notes that this section begins and ends with κῆπος (kēpos, garden). R. Brown (1970: 813–17), too, has an extensive discussion of the structure and historicity of John’s passion narrative. See also the examination of theological and literary features of this section in Schnackenburg 1990: 3.218–19.

2 In the Synoptics, it is Judas, rather than Jesus himself, who identifies Jesus to those who would arrest him (Ridderbos 1997: 574).

6 However, there is no need to postulate the later insertion of John 15–17 into the narrative (contra, e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 573). Ridderbos (1997: 573) notes that the Fourth Evangelist begins the passion narrative completely independent of the Synoptic accounts.

506n15, 507n22, 508, 509, 512, 512n6, 512n8, 513, 513n10, 513n13, 514, 515, 516, 516n24, 518, 518n33, 519, 519n38, 521, 521n1, 524n10, 525, 527, 529n40, 530, 531n50,

12 So Blomberg 2002: 228–30; Burge 2000: 491; Morris 1995: 656 (though both the LXX and Josephus use the term also with reference to non-Roman military [2 Macc. 8:23; 12:20, 22; Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §215; J.W. 2.1.3 §11]). Cf. the cautious assessment by Ridderbos (1997: 575). Contra Keener (1993: 306), who maintains that both the “detachment of soldiers” and the “officials from the chief priests and Pharisees” refer to the temple police.

15 Ridderbos (1997: 574) suggests that the two groups are mentioned jointly here to underscore Jesus’ authority. Carson (1991: 577) concludes that the two groups are described to imply that the whole world is against Jesus (cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 322). See the further references in 18:12, 18, 22; 19:6 (cf. 18:36).

22 So Ridderbos 1997: 576; with reference to the threefold repetition of this phrase in this section, Morris 1995: 658 and Ball 1996: 201; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 322; Moloney 1998: 485; R. Brown 1970: 818; Borchert 2002: 219; Burge 2000: 492.

6 Though Annas is also mentioned by Luke (Luke 3:2; Acts 4:6). On the historical plausibility of such a trial, see Ridderbos 1997: 579–80. See also the excursus on the political and judicial situation in Israel during the time of Jesus in Borchert 2002: 224–26 and the chart showing the relationship of the four Gospels to one another concerning Jesus before the Jewish authorities in R. Brown 1970: 830–31. John 18:12a–b can be construed either with 18:1–11 (Beasley-Murray 1999: 324; Moloney 1998: 486; Barrett 1978: 523) or with 18:12c–14 (so Ridderbos 1997: 578; Morris 1995: 664; R. Brown 1970: 819).

8 He is called “Ananus the son of Seth[i]” by Josephus (Ant. 18.2.1 §26). Ridderbos (1997: 578) lists the dates as A.D. 5 to 16.

10 See m. Hor. 3.4; cf. m. Meg. 1.9; m. Mak. 2.6; t. Yoma 1.4. See also Luke 3:2, where the appearance of John the Baptist is placed “during the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas.” Josephus indicates that it was customary for former high priests to continue to be called by that term (J.W. 4.3.7 §151; 4.3.9 §160; see Ridderbos 1997: 579; Moloney 1998: 490; Pancaro 1975: 66–67). The family is mentioned several times in later Jewish writings; it was noted not only for its great size, wealth, and power (b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.18), but also for its greed (see the street-ballad referred to in commentary at 18:3). Its wealth is reported later to have been destroyed by the Zealots.

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235). Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

24 Among those viewing the present hearing in more unofficial terms are Carson (1991: 584), Ridderbos (1997: 582), and R. Brown (1970: 826). Most other major commentators consider this to be an official trial (e.g., Morris, Barrett). On the Sadducees’ reputation for judging in general, Josephus writes that “the school of the Sadducees ... are indeed more heartless than any of the other Jews ... when they sit in judgment” (Ant. 20.9.1 §199).

33 Apparently, Jesus did not consider his response to be in violation of his “turning the other cheek” principle (see the discussions in Ridderbos 1997: 583; Morris 1995: 670 n. 55; Carson 1991: 585). Schlatter (1948: 335) resolves the apparent difficulty by noting that Jesus merely pointed out the abuse without fighting for his rights. In fact, “Turning the other cheek without bearing witness to the truth is not the fruit of moral resolution but the terrorized cowardice of the wimp” (Carson 1991: 585). Contrast also Jesus’ response with Paul’s in Acts 23:2–5, where the apostle lost his temper and called the high priest “you whitewashed wall” (see Carson 1991: 584–85).

38 Ridderbos (1997: 584 n. 46) and Morris (1995: 672) claim that the wording indicates the expectation of a negative answer, though once again the force may be more that of a cautious assertion (see commentary at 18:17).

1 R. Brown (1970: 861) comments, “With all its drama and its theology, John’s account of the trial is the most consistent and intelligible we have.” Further positive evaluations of John’s historicity are offered by Ridderbos (1997: 587–88) and by Carson (1991: 587), who suggests as possible Johannine sources Jesus after the resurrection, court attendants who later became believers, or possibly some public court records. Barrett (1978: 530) believes that most of the material is based on the Markan passion narrative.

10 Ridderbos 1997: 589; Carson 1991: 589; Duke 1985: 127–28. Duke (1985: 128 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 866]) notes the further irony that the Jews are concerned about not being able to eat the Passover, yet they ultimately kill the true Passover.

40 Witherington (1995: 292) writes, “Apparently Pilate concludes that Jesus is a deluded quack whom he can banter with but not take seriously.” Carson (1991: 595) describes Pilate’s response as “curt and cynical” and thinks that his reply is terse “either because he is convinced there is no answer, or, more likely, because he does not want to hear it.” Ridderbos (1997: 596) sees Pilate “shrugging his shoulders, in effect.”

50 On Pilate, see commentary at 18:29. Ἐμαστίγωσεν (emastigōsen) is a causative active form: “Pilate caused Jesus to be scourged, but did not perform the act himself” (Wallace 1996: 412). The juxtaposed expressions ἐμαστίγωσεν (scourged [19:1]) and ῥαπίσματα (rhapismata, blows [19:3]) echo the Servant Song in Isa. 50:6 LXX, where the same two words (the former in noun form) are featured (Ridderbos 1997: 599 n. 102; cf. R. Brown 1970: 874).

63 “We have a law” may refer to Lev. 24:16: “Anyone who blasphemes the name of the Lord must be put to death” (Carson 1991: 599; Barrett 1978: 541; Ridderbos 1997: 602).

72 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 601; cf. Morris 1995: 705; Beasley-Murray 1999: 340; Burge 2000: 505; Borchert 2002: 254. Contra Barrett (1978: 543), who thinks that the singular participle constructed from the verb παραδίδωμι (paradidōmi, I hand over) suggests Judas. See also the discussions by Schnackenburg (1990: 3.261–63) and Ridderbos (1997: 603), both of whom ultimately point to the Jews as the most likely referent. Stibbe (1992: 170) concludes that “the one” in 19:11 probably refers to Caiaphas as a representative of the Jewish nation, as the evangelist has a propensity to implicate the Jews in Jesus’ death.

78 The verb ἐκάθισεν (ekathisen, he sat) is intransitive, with Pilate, not Jesus, being the one sitting down (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 605; Carson 1991: 608; Morris 1995: 707 n. 31). Barrett (1978: 544) thinks that this is an instance of Johannine double meaning, though, as R. Brown (1970: 881) rightly objects, “the phenomenon [of double meaning] has not been based on syntactical ambiguity, nor is it usual for the second meaning to be opposite of the first.”

83 Cf. Did. 8:1; Mart. Pol. 7:1. See Torrey 1931 (including his critique of Str-B 2:834–85 on pp. 235–36); Higgins 1954–55: 206–9; Story 1989: 318; Blomberg 1987: 177–78; Morris 1995: 708; Ridderbos 1997: 606.

2 So, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 608; Carson 1991: 608; Morris 1995: 711; Beasley-Murray 1999: 344; Borchert 2002: 260; Burge 2000: 524. Contra Moloney (1998: 506, following R. Brown), who contends that “the Jews” are the subject of the verb.

4 This most likely is to describe the custom that called for those who were to be crucified to carry their own cross (see the primary references cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 174–75; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 608 n. 128; Beasley-Murray 1999: 345). “By himself” is probably more accurate than the TNIV’s “carrying his own cross.” Note also the emphatic position of ἑαυτῷ (Barrett 1978: 548).

17 So, for example, Ridderbos 1997: 608; Beasley-Murray 1999: 346; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270; Moloney 1998: 502; Schlatter 1948: 348; Westcott 1908: 2.308.

28 “Do not write” in 19:21 somewhat unexpectedly involves a present-tense verb (γράφει, graphe). Wallace (1996: 487–88) classifies the form as an imperative of entreaty. Barrett (1978: 549, following N. Turner 1963) proposes the translation “Alter what you have written” (i.e., “Do not go on writing [what you have written]”; cf. R. Brown 1970: 902).

35 The general conclusion of commentators is that the reference to the “seamless robe” may not necessarily have theological significance (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 610 n. 136; cf. Morris 1995: 715, esp. n. 56; Bultmann 1971: 671). Both Witherington (1995: 309) and R. Brown (1970: 920–22) note several possibilities yet caution against dogmatic conclusions (see also Carson 1991: 614). Barrett (1978: 550) sees an allusion to Jesus’ death resulting in “the scattered children of God.”

38 There is no agreement, however, on the exact way in which soldiers and bystanders are related by the evangelist. Ridderbos (1997: 610 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 903]) thinks that there is no implied contrast between these two groups. Other commentators believe that the construction does imply such a contrast (e.g., Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.273, 276). If a contrast is intended, it is hardly a sharp one; more likely, the two groups are distinguished as the narrative moves from one to the other.

43 So also the vast majority of commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Morris 1995: 716–17; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Bultmann 1971: 672; Borchert 2002: 268; R. Brown 1970: 904; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.276. Ridderbos (1997: 611 n. 142) notes that in light of Mark 15:40 and Matt. 27:56, there could have been other women there as well. See also Luke 23:49.

44 See Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 616; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Burge 2000: 528; contra Barrett 1978: 551–52; Bultmann 1971: 672 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.277. Carson (1991: 616 [cf. Morris 1995: 717]) notes that, like Jesus’ mother’s sister, Jesus’ mother is also unnamed here and elsewhere in the Gospel (as is the “disciple Jesus loved” in 19:26–27).

46 Many view the “disciple Jesus loved” as an ideal disciple, often in conjunction with the “ideal faith” of Jesus’ mother (e.g., Moloney 1998: 503–4; but see the dissenting voice of Carson 1991: 618; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 614–15). Witherington (1995: 310) suggests that these two unnamed individuals are models for potential disciples to follow. Ridderbos (1997: 613) has an extensive discussion of Mary and the “disciple Jesus loved” as representatives of the new community that is established with the death of Jesus.

47 Commentators have detected various types of symbolism in this scene. Bultmann (1971: 673), true to F. C. Baur, sees Mary as representative of Jewish Christianity, and the beloved disciple of Gentile Christianity, the latter being charged to honor the former as its “mother,” from whom it originated (cf. Brodie 1993: 549). Witherington (1995: 309) views these two characters as symbolic of a new Adam and Eve, who are obedient whereas the former were not. Carson (1991: 618, following M. Gourgues) suggests that Mary, on account of her faith in Christ, is now able metaphorically to become a mother to a new son supplied for her by Jesus (cf. Matt. 19:29; see also Witherington 1995: 310). Beasley-Murray (1999: 350, following Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278) sees Mary as representing that part of Israel that is willing to believe in Jesus as the Messiah. Refreshingly, and refusing to resort to symbolism or allegory, Morris (1995: 718) says the beloved disciple simply “provided her [Mary] with a roof” and took her under his care. Others focus on lessons (to be) learned by Mary, such as needing to “step back in submission to the law of life that the Father has set for her son” (Ridderbos 1997: 612) or to receive the gift of salvation that she desired to receive at the wedding in Cana (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278; Beasley-Murray 1999: 350; Borchert 2002: 269).

54 So Ridderbos 1997: 616; Carson 1991: 619; Barrett 1978: 553; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; Schlatter 1948: 351. Psalm 69:21 is also cited in the Qumran hymn 1QH 12:11. Another relevant passage is Ps. 22:15 (Schlatter 1948: 351; Kruse 2003: 369). The suggestion that Jesus here refers back to his statement in 18:11 is improbable (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 617; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; R. Brown 1970: 930).

61 So the vast majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 618; Carson 1991: 622; Barrett 1978: 555; Morris 1995: 730; Bultmann 1971: 676). Contra Borchert (2002: 273 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 933]), who seems to suggest that Jesus died on Nisan 14 and thus was being portrayed as the Passover lamb.

67 See Lev. Rab. 15.2 on Lev. 13:2. Commentators disagree as to whether or not the present reference is intended to counter incipient Docetism, which denied Jesus’ full humanity at his death. Some consider this unlikely (Ridderbos [1997: 620], who thinks that the present passage is simply designed to further support the reliability and eyewitness nature of the account; R. Brown 1970: 949–52), while a majority favors such a polemic purpose (e.g., Carson [1991: 623], who sees this verse as the “counterpoint” to 1:14; Barrett 1978: 556; Morris 1995: 724; Beasley-Murray 1999: 356; Borchert 2002: 276–77; Burge 2000: 532).

75 So R. Brown 1970: 952–53; Moloney 1998: 509. Beasley-Murray (1999: 355) suggests that the source of the Fourth Gospel was alluding to Passover typology, while the evangelist is alluding to the righteous sufferer of Ps. 34. Somewhat ironically, Barrett (1978: 558) proposes the exact converse: the source is alluding to the Psalms typology, while the evangelist is alluding to Passover typology. Ridderbos (1997: 622–23) opts for the Psalms typology but denies the Passover allusion.

76 R. Brown (1970: 939) conjectures that Pilate’s releasing the body to Joseph suggests that he was not an overt disciple of Jesus, because the Roman governor would not have done this for an ardent follower of Jesus. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 625, reacting against Martyn), who claims that Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus are symbolic of the “true Israel.”

84 Ridderbos 1997: 628; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 360; Bultmann 1971: 680.

1 For a discussion of this pericope’s relationship to the Synoptics, see Ridderbos 1997: 629–30

(see also Morris 1995: 732; R. Brown 1970: 996). Ridderbos (1997: 630–31) also defends the historicity of the event over against Bultmann (1971: 685), who denies historicity and takes an allegorical approach. On historical questions surrounding the Johannine account of Jesus’ resurrection and appearances, see also Keener 2003: 1167–78.

10 The verbs ἐφίλει (ephilei) and ἠγάπα (ēgapa) are used synonymously for “loved” in this expression (cf. 13:23; 19:26; 21:20; see Ridderbos 1997: 632 n. 7; Carson 1991: 636; Barrett 1978: 562).

17 This is disputed by Brodie (1993: 561), who says that the beloved disciple is “in better running order,” which he takes to be symbolic of superior discipleship (though on p. 564 he sees both disciples as symbolic of the unity achieved through faith in the ascending Christ). Beasley-Murray (1999: 371–72) contends that the beloved disciple’s speed was due to the extent of his love for Jesus; Moloney (1998: 522) suggests that he had stronger faith that a miracle had occurred. Yet others have seen in this statement an affirmation of John’s superiority over Peter (e.g., Schnackenburg 1990: 3.310, 312; Moloney 1998: 520; R. Brown 1970: 1004–7). More likely, however, both the beloved disciple and Peter are presented here as a duo of eyewitnesses to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 632; Carson 1991: 636–37; Bultmann 1971: 684).

23 In this he compares favorably with Thomas later in this chapter (Moloney 1998: 538; see commentary at 20:24–29). Ridderbos (1997: 633 n. 15 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Beck 1997: 117–18]) suggests that ἐπίστευσεν (episteusen, he believed) is an ingressive aorist. He also contrasts Mary’s reaction (concern that the body had been stolen) with that of the beloved disciple (faith).

27 This is inadequately recognized by those who see in the “disciple Jesus loved” a model disciple par excellence. See Ridderbos 1997: 633; Whitacre 1999: 474; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; R. Brown 1970: 1005; Borchert 2002: 295.

28 Cf. Luke 24:25–27, 32, 44–47; see commentary at 2:19–22; Ridderbos 1997: 634; Barrett 1978: 564.

12 The statement harks back to 17:18, albeit without reference to the sphere of the disciples’ commission (i.e., the world), indicating that the emphasis in the present passage is on the disciples’ authorization rather on the realm of their activity (Ridderbos 1997: 643). Compare also the general statement in 13:20, which suggests that the present passage extends beyond the original disciples to later generations of believers (Morris 1995: 746 n. 55).

13 The vast majority of the instances of “sending” in John’s Gospel relate to Jesus’ having been sent by the Father. “Sending” terminology also occurs with regard to God’s sending of the Baptist, the Father’s and the Son’s sending of the Spirit, and Jesus’ sending of his disciples. The present passage features two “sending” verbs, πέμπω (pempō) and ἀποστέλλω (apostellō), with no apparent difference in meaning (as is the virtual consensus among major commentators, including Ridderbos, Morris, Carson, Barrett, Schnackenburg, and R. Brown; see also Köstenberger 1999c: 125–43). Morris (1995: 746 n. 56) notes that this is already suggested by the use of καθώς (kathōs, just as) linking the two verbs.

3 Thomas’s comments at 11:16 perhaps display similar skepticism (if not sarcasm). Ridderbos (1997: 646–47) believes that Thomas’s response does not represent “a serious condition for belief” but rather shows how ridiculous he thought his fellow disciples’ statement was. Morris (1995: 752) suggests that Thomas’s response shows how traumatized he was by the circumstances of Jesus' death and the degree of his injuries. Both of these views are possible but hard to verify and not necessarily accurate. See further discussion below.

6 So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 647) and most major commentators (e.g., Morris 1995: 753; Witherington 1995: 344; Carson 1991: 657; Moloney 1998: 537; Barrett 1978: 572; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.332; contra Borchert 2002: 314; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

9 See M. Harris 1992: 284–86; Ridderbos 1997: 648. On 20:28, see M. Harris 1992: 105–29. For a defense of the historicity of the present pericope, see Carson 1991: 657–58; M. Harris 1992: 111–19.

11 Though this does not necessarily mean that Thomas (or the evangelist) consciously sought to allude to this or other similar OT passages in the present instance (so Ridderbos 1997: 647; contra Borchert 2002: 315). See also 2 Sam. 7:28; 1 Kings 18:39; Ps. 29:3; 86:15; 88:1; Jer. 31:18; Zech. 13:9.

14 So, rightly, the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 197: 648; Morris 1995: 754; Carson 1991: 659; Beasley-Murray 1999: 386; Burge 2000: 563; Barrett 1978: 573; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.334; contra Borchert 2002: 316; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

5 Contra those who would see ταῦτα (tauta, these) in 20:31 referring not to the antecedent πολλὰ ἄλλα σημεῖα (polla alla sēmeia, many other signs) in 20:30 but, on the contrary, to “these things” other than those signs. The term “Christ” is mentioned with possible or definite reference to Jesus in 1:41; 4:25, 29; 7:26, 27, 31, 41, 42; 9:22; 10:24; 11:27; 12:34; 20:31. “Son of God” occurs in 1:34, 49; 3:18; 5:25; 10:36; 11:4, 27; 19:7; 20:31. Though closely related, the two terms are not synonymous (Ridderbos 1997: 653; contra Beasley-Murray 1999: 388). “Christ” primarily relates to Jewish messianic expectations; “Son of God” also has messianic connotations but beyond this accentuates more keenly relationship with God, especially in the context of the Johannine characterization of Jesus as the Son of the Father.

5 So Ridderbos (1997: 656), who states, “There is much that argues for ascribing the majority of ch. 21 to the Evangelist, as the completion of his narrative, albeit as a striking ... addition to a provisionally concluded whole.” Among the tie-ins between chapters 21 and 1–20, Ridderbos cites 21:1, 14 (referring back to the preceding resurrection account, in which Peter and the beloved disciple are linked) and the connection between Peter’s reinstatement in 21:15–23 and 13:38/18:16ff. According to Ridderbos (1997: 658), the chapter “was added to describe the passage from Jesus’ work on earth to its continuation through his disciples.” Keener (2003: 1219–22), too, makes a strong case for the literary unity of John 21 as a chapter and as an integral part of the entire Gospel. He notes that, apart from special vocabulary needed for the matters at hand (such as fishing terminology), chapter 21 does not differ significantly from the rest of the Gospel. Keener (2003: 1219, citing Bruce 1983: 398) lists the following commonalities: the variation of synonymous terms in 21:15–17; the double ἀμήν (21:18); the construction “This he said, indicating” (21:19; cf. 12:33); and the reference to the Sea of Tiberias (21:1; cf. 6:1). Contra, for example, Dodd (1953: 290), who claims that chapter 21 “falls outside the design of the book as a whole” (cited in Minear 1983: 87 n. 11).

6 So Culpepper 1983: 96. See also Schlatter (1948: 366), who contends that the sustained characterization of Peter and John in 1:35–42; 13:23–29; 18:15–17; 20:2–10; and chapter 21 cannot be assigned to different hands; Ridderbos (1997: 656), who says that the final chapter is designed to bring into sharper profile the roles of Peter and the beloved disciple; and Carson (1991: 667), who notes that their relationship is removed from the realm of competition and their complementarity strongly and explicitly affirmed. Minear (1983: 91) writes, “Only in chapter 21 do we discover an adequate end to the story of the two disciples who, from chapter 13 on, have played the most conspicuous supporting roles in the gospel: Simon Peter and the beloved disciple.”

8 See Ridderbos (1997: 656 n. 3), who cites Schlatter: “The attribution of the new narrative to another author is impossible, however, since the identical linguistic conventions have been fully maintained.” Even Bultmann (1971: 700) declares, “Language and style admittedly afford no sure proof.” Similarly, Neirynck (1990: 336) concludes that “the evidence of style and vocabulary ... is ambiguous and not decisive.” Barrett (1978: 576) provides a list of words used in chapter 21 but not in chapters 1–20. See also Breck (1992: 36), who notes that words unique to chapter 21 in John’s Gospel are either “technical expressions linked to the fishing trade” (ἀλιεύω, πιάζω, αἰγιαλός, προσφάγιον, δίκτυον, σύρω, ἀποβαίνω) or particular expressions required by their respective contexts (πρωῖα, ἐπενδύτης, γυμνός, βόσκω, ἄρνιον, ποιμαίνω, προβάτιον [variant of πρόβατα, the more likely reading in 21:16–17]).

6 Ridderbos (1997: 658–59) detects in this a reference to “the unity they [the disciples] recovered after Jesus’ resurrection.” Similarly, Talbert (1992: 259) sees in this “unity” an answer to Jesus’ prayer in 17:11 and a result of the Spirit’s enabling. This seems to rest too much interpretive weight on the rather inconspicuous expression “were together,” however. Little else in the context suggests that these disciples are Spirit-filled (note that they caught no fish). The presence of symbolism in the number seven is doubtful as well (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 650; Carson 1991: 669; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.352; Beasley-Murray 1999: 399; Borchert 2002: 324); it is hard to see what would connote “completeness” in the present instance (contra Brodie 1993: 582).

12 The reference to Jesus “standing” (ἵστημι, histēmi) at the shore is part of a pattern of describing Jesus’ presence in the resurrection narratives (cf. 20:14, 19, 26; see Ridderbos 1997: 659). Morris (1995: 761) notes, “It is not said that he came there or the like, and the choice of language may be a hint at the kind of thing we see in earlier passages, where Jesus suddenly appears behind closed doors.”

15 Cf. 1 John 2:14, 18; in John 13:33, the word for “children” is τέκνια (teknia). However, understanding this as a familiar reference must be tempered with placing it in the larger context of first-century teacher-disciple relationships (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 660; Moloney 1998: 552, with further reference to 1 John). On this topic, see Köstenberger 1998a: 119–26.

16 Ridderbos (1997: 660) suggests, alternatively, that Jesus may know the answer “because the disciples were still fishing at the break of day.” However, this hardly seems to be an adequate explanation in the light of John’s characterization of Jesus both before and especially subsequent to the resurrection (note, e.g., Jesus’ prediction of Peter’s martyrdom in 21:18–19).

19 In that sense, but only in that sense, R. Brown is right in seeing parallels between the present incident and Luke 5. Regarding the interpretation taken here, compare especially Ridderbos 1997: 660, though he sees more overt symbolism in the present pericope than I do.

22 See Ridderbos 1997: 661 n. 17; Soards 1983. In 13:4–5, the same term is used for Jesus’ wrapping a towel around himself in preparation for washing his disciples’ feet.

28 Ridderbos (1997: 662) notes how Jesus involves his followers as those who will continue his work on earth (more restrained is Morris [1995: 764]). This, of course, has already been his practice during his earthly ministry (e.g., 6:5–13). Moreover, care must be taken not to overreach in finding symbolism in every detail of this or other Johannine narratives. For instance, it would be wrong to infer from the present instance a kind of synergism in which believers collaborate with Jesus in his provision as if what Jesus provides were insufficient to meet their needs.

31 Contra efforts to unlock the alleged numerical symbolism, as does Brodie (1993: 586–88), who notes that 153 is the triangular number of 17, which is the sum of both 10+7 and 12+5, all four of which are significant numbers in the Gospel. Calvin (1961: 217) called these kinds of efforts “childish trifling.” On a different note, Ridderbos (1997: 663) categorically states that “carefully counting the fish after a catch was probably never done,” but it is unclear on what basis he can make such a sweeping pronouncement.

32 So, for example, R. Brown (1970: 1076), who sees the origin of the number in authentic eyewitness, citing 21:24. Note also the presence of the sons of Zebedee, according to 21:2. Large numbers elsewhere in John are meant literally as well (e.g., 2:6; 12:3); Schlatter (1948: 368) notes that the large number of fish caught points to Jesus’ generous, abundant provision, citing 2:6; 6:13. More questionable are Burge’s (2000: 586) reference to 153 being “numerically important” for “Greek mathematicians” and Bultmann’s (1971: 709) assertion that the number is allegorical “since it is not a round number.” For proper cautions against allegorical interpretations, see Ridderbos 1997: 663.

33 The unbroken net frequently is interpreted symbolically as conveying the preservation of all that is caught (Ridderbos 197: 663, adducing 6:12; Witherington 1995: 355; Michaels 1989: 354–55), or the limitless number of Christian converts (Carson 1991: 673, following Bruce 1983: 401–2), or the unity of the church (Talbert 1992: 260). For surveys, see Carson 1991: 672–73; R. Brown 1970: 1074–76.

35 So also Ridderbos (1997: 664), though, as elsewhere, Ridderbos may somewhat overstate his point when he speaks of “the miracle of the ‘wholly-otherness’ of his [Jesus’] presence and of their ‘knowing’ him.” On “the Lord,” see 21:7.

36 As previously, indicative of his appearance (see Ridderbos 1997: 664).

14 Note further the verbal link between the reference to Jesus’ “lifting up” (i.e., crucifixion) in 12:32–33 and the reference to Peter’s future destiny in 21:19. See Carson 1991: 679–80; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Barrett 1978: 585. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 667); Morris (1995: 773); and Schnackenburg (1990: 3.366–67), who believe that the reference is more generally to martyrdom.

5 Most likely, Peter, just having been told that he would be martyred in the future, wants to know if, once again, the beloved disciple will fare better and be spared a similar fate. Contra Morris (1995: 774), who construes Peter’s motivation much more positively: “Happy in his own position, Peter now gave thought to his friend.” The words “if I want him to remain” emphasize Jesus’ authority and power, which is not accountable to Peter (Ridderbos 1997: 668–69).

19 Contra Ridderbos (1997: 672), who takes the change in grammatical person as indication of “another hand.” For a vigorous refutation of the view that 21:25 was added by a later editor, see J. Chapman (1930: 386–87), who contends that it is “quite inconceivable” that an interpolator composed this “very Johannine” verse. The main burden of Chapman’s essay is to argue that “we know” in 21:24 constitutes a “plural of authorship.”

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus

“our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

33 This would seem to invalidate the recent claims made by Mohammed Waheeb (1999: 14–15), an archaeologist directing the Jordanian excavations in the Jordan area, to have discovered the “Bethany beyond the Jordan” at a site about five miles north of the Dead Sea. Cf. Riesner 1987: 47 (succinctly presented by idem, DJG 35–36); 2002. I am indebted to Riesner also for some of the following material.

8 See Mackowski 1979; Dalman 1935: 101–6; Riesner, DJG 36–37; Deines 1993: 25 n. 38 (with further bibliography).

9 See Riesner 1987: 47, referring to Mackowski 1979: 278–79; cf. Dalman 1935: 101.

8 The first is mentioned as early as Eusebius’s Onomasticon (fourth century A.D.). The second is defended by the eminent archaeologist Albright (1924), followed by Bacon (1929); see also Finegan (1992: 70). Yet another site is suggested in Riesner, DJG 35: Ain Farah, eight miles northwest of Shechem.

16 See Potter 1959: 331; Kippenberg 1971: 94; Riesner, DJG 40. A few late sources (such as Jerome) substitute “Shechem” for “Sychar,” but this is clearly secondary (contra R. Brown 1966: 169; Burge 2000: 141).

11 Helpful treatments include Avi-Yonah 1974: 142; Jeremias 1966b; Mackowski 1980: 79–83; Vardaman 1963; and Wieand 1965–66. Riesner (DJG 41) prefers the translation “There is in Jerusalem by the Sheep Pool the [site] with five porticoes called in Hebrew [i.e., Aramaic] Bethesda.”

2 Another explanation for the name is the proximity of the nearby town Tell el-Oreimeth, which

543n10, 545
Rissi, M. 594n34
Roberts, C. 583
Robertson, A. T. 27n23
Robinson, H. W. 335n66
Robinson, J. A. T. 8n20, 19n1, 111n37, 163n78, 348n133 was lyrelike in shape. See Buehler, ISBE 2:391–92. For general information, see Riesner, DJG 37.

151 See Riesner, DJG 49; Carson 1991: 423–24. But see Albright (1922–23), who argues that the Ephraim mentioned in John is not Et-Taiyibeh, but Ain Samieh, slightly to the northeast and lower in a valley. Cf. Schwank 1977.

10 See Riesner, DJG 43; Taylor 1998. “Gordon’s Calvary” is ruled out by Parrot 1957: 59–65.

34 Witherington (1995: 354) considers this to be “a fellowship meal, a family reunion of a sort” (similarly, Michaels 1989: 356, 358), contra those who would detect the presence of “eucharistic symbolism” (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1098–1100; D. M. Smith 1999: 394; Stibbe 1993: 212; Whitacre 1999: 494). In fact, Beasley-Murray (1999: 404) points out that what is celebrated here is not Jesus’ death but his resurrection, which enabled his followers to enjoy fellowship with their Lord subsequent to his death. He classifies the present meal as “an epiphany celebration of the risen Lord” (following Rissi 1979: 81–86). Schlatter (1948: 369) says that the disciples’ present disposition fulfills 16:23.

23 Seeking to combine the notions of “with” indicating accompaniment and “toward” signifying relationship, R. Brown (1966: 4–6) translates, “The Word was in God’s presence”; A. T. Robertson (1934: 623 [cited in MacLeod 2003: 57]) glosses, “face to face with God.”

66 For a discussion of the Jewish doctrine of corporate personality, see H. Robinson 1964.

20 Very few would argue for a date prior to A.D. 70, as do J. A. T. Robinson 1976: 254–85 (but see the refutation in Kerr 2002: 19–25; see also Carson 1991: 82–86); Morris 1995: 25–30 (with reference to Cribbs 1970; Torrey 1936: x–xi); and Wallace 1990 (but see the present commentary at 5:2). However, the cumulative weight of the following internal evidence must be judged to favor a post–A.D. 70 date (cf. Croteau 2003): the references to the Sea of Tiberias in 6:1 and 21:1; Thomas’s confession of Jesus as “my Lord and my God” in 20:28 (contra emperor worship in time of Domitian?); the reference to Peter’s martyrdom (21:19); and the lack of reference to the Sadducees (Schlatter 1948: 44; though see the caution in Carson 1991: 84)—not to mention the comparative ease with which the Fourth Evangelist equates Jesus with God (e.g., 1:1, 14; 10:30; 20:28; see Carson 1991: 85, though note his caveats on p. 84) or external evidence such as Clement of Alexandria’s statement, cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7, “Last of all, John, perceiving that the external facts had been made plain [in the Synoptics] ... composed a spiritual gospel.” This is true especially since the major pieces of evidence cited in support of a pre–A.D. 70 date—the lack of reference to the destruction of the temple and the use of a present-tense verb in 5:2 to refer to the Sheep Gate pool—are not determinative and are capable of alternative explanations (see, e.g., Schlatter 1948: 23–24).

1 J. A. T. Robinson (1962–63) observes that “the themes of the gospel are played over beforehand, as in the overture to an opera” (cited in Viviano 1998: 183). Beasley-Murray (1992: 1867) calls it “an anticipatory description of the Mission of the Logos-Son to the World.” The bibliography on the Johannine prologue is vast: see van der Watt 1995: 311 n. 1; Kurz 1997: 179 n. 1. For a chart showing themes anticipated in the prologue, see p. 586 below.

Robinson, J. M. 344n114
Robinson, M. A. 247n7, 248n9
Rodgers, P. R. 88n122

37 A third possibility (held by only a few) is that there was only one clearing, at the beginning of Jesus' ministry, and John got it right (J. A. T. Robinson 1985: 127–31; Campbell 1982: 117). Finally, fourth, Buchanan (1991: 284) says, "Jesus never cleansed the temple at all but instead this event had been attributed to him from the necessity of the doctrines and messianic expectations" (cited in Ådna 2000: 21 n. 67).

78 J. A. T. Robinson (1959) limits the "others" to John the Baptist and his followers (contra Cullmann [1956], who thinks that the "others" are the Hellenists of Acts 8:4ff.; see also the critique of this view by Carson 1991: 231). On entering into someone else's labor, see 1 Cor. 3:5–15 (contrast Rom. 15:20) and the parable of the workers in the vineyard in Matt. 20:1–16. 133 See Bammel 1970; J. A. T. Robinson 1985: 223–24. Inclusion of this account may explain John's omission of the later Jewish trial of Jesus before Caiaphas, implied in 18:24, 28 and narrated in Matt. 27:1–2 and Mark 15:1 (cf. Luke 23:1).

114 Hunter (1985: 59–60) suggests that the past tense ἤκουσας (ēkousas, you heard) be taken as a reference to "a previous (private) personal prayer offered by Jesus on behalf of his friend." An OT antecedent to Jesus' prayer here is that of Elijah: "Answer me, O Lord, answer me, so these people will know that you, O Lord, are God" (1 Kings 18:37; cf. Ps. 118:21; 121:1; 123:1). Cf. John 6:5; 17:1; Mark 7:34; Luke 18:13; Acts 7:55. See also Matt. 11:25; John 6:11. Hunter (1985: 62–70, citing J. M. Robinson 1964: 194–225) notes the similarity in form with Jewish prayers of thanksgiving (hodayot). Hanson (1973: 254) and Wilcox (1977: 130) contend that 11:41 is actually a quotation of Ps. 118:21a (see the discussion in Hunter 1985: 68); Wilcox (1977: 131) further argues that Ps. 118:22 also resonates in the present passage via the "stone" motif.

7 See also Metzger (1994: 187–89), who calls the evidence for the non-Johannine origin of the pericope "overwhelming" and "conclusive." Keener (2003: 735–36), too, strongly contends that 7:53–8:11 is an interpolation, based on its suspect textual history and its large non-Johannine vocabulary. One of the few scholars favoring originality (on the grounds of Byzantine priority) is M. Robinson (1998: 1–17).

9 This was first suggested by J. Drusius (1595), followed by Hugo Grotius (1641) and J. A. Fabricius (1703–19) (see Petersen 1997: 217). M. Robinson (1998: 5) wrongly attributes to Petersen the view that the pericope of the adulterous woman "was circulating as part of John's gospel in the mid-second century" (italics added). Apart from the fact that Petersen speaks of "the second half of the second century," his actual conclusion is that "three constitutive elements of the pericope adulterae, as it is now known [sic] to us from the Gospel of John, were known in the second half of the second century" (1997: 207 [italics added]). Nowhere does he suggest that John's Gospel was the source of the Protevangelium of James or that John's Gospel already contained the pericope in the mid-second century (and even if it did, this still would not prove that the pericope is original).

122 The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. 65, was published in 1998 by the Egypt Exploration Society (see pp. 12–13). Among commentators, "Chosen One of God" is favored by Morris 1995: 134; Carson 1991: 152; Burge 1987: 59–61; 2000: 74; Barrett 1978: 178; R. Brown 1966: 57; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.305. "Son of God" is the reading advocated by Bultmann 1971: 92–93 n. 6; Borchert 1996: 139; Ridderbos 1997: 77; Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. g; Laney 1992: 53

Rohrbaugh, R. L. 181n32, 201, 277, 396n4, 531n51, 543n12

Rowland, C. 82n102

Ruckstuhl, E. 246, 596n5

Rupert of Deutz 601n6

Saayman, C. 119n13, 127n39

(though all prior to the discovery of P¹⁰⁶). Rodgers (1999: 304) prefers both (“This is the only, the chosen Son of God”), while Michaels (1989: 36) proposes that the Baptist spoke “Chosen One of God” (hence the MS tradition), which the evangelist interpreted as “Son of God.”

32 Compare and contrast this healing especially with that of the blind man in John 9, which also takes place on a Sabbath (see the chart in Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 109). The Synoptics include at least five incidents that involve healing on the Sabbath and incur the wrath of the Jewish leaders: (1) Mark 1:21–28 par.; (2) Matt. 8:14–15 pars.; (3) Matt. 12:9–14 pars.; (4) Luke 13:10–17; (5) Luke 14:1–6 (Matthew features two, Mark three, and Luke all five incidents).

4 For example, Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs; Assumption of Moses; cf. Jub. 22:10–30; 1 Macc. 2:49–70; Josephus, Ant. 12.6.3 §§279–84. For Greco-Roman farewell passages, see Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 221–22.

51 For ancient references on flogging and torture, see Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 263.

12 See Hengel 1977; Green, DJG 147–48; Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 263–64; D. Chapman 2000.

102 Carson (1991: 161) notes, “Since Jesus is about to tell him of greater visions that will be his (1:50–51), there may also be an allusion to the popular etymology that related ‘Israel’ to ʾiš rō·eh ʾēl, ‘the man who sees God’ ” (cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.66 §186; similarly, Morris 1995: 148 n. 117). On Jacob traditions in nonbiblical Jewish sources, see Neyrey 1982; Rowland 1984.

5 Though it is fascinating to contemplate the contrast in John 21 between the beloved disciple, who knows himself to be loved by Jesus (21:7a, 20a), and Peter, who is called to love Jesus (21:15–17). See Schenk 1992: 516–17, referring to Stenger 1990: 240 and Ruckstuhl 1977: 340, 343, 356.

6 Augustine (In Iohannis Evangelium 124.1 [cited in Volfing 2001: 51 n. 79]) already acknowledges the difficulty of understanding the import of Jesus’ words. While presupposing Peter’s martyrdom and John’s dying a natural death, he follows an allegorical line of interpretation, seeing the two apostles as representing, respectively, the vita activa (“active life”) and the vita contemplativa (“contemplative life”), with the latter being superior to the former (Volfing 2001: 51–53). Literal interpretations are advocated by Bede and Rupert of Deutz (Volfing 2001: 53 n. 83). Some patristic and medieval authors also seek to alleviate the apparent difficulty that Jesus predicted that both sons of Zebedee would drink from his bitter cup (Matt. 20:23; see references in Volfing 2001: 55).

13 See Blomberg (1995: 5–7), who lists seven factors in favor of seeing John’s portrait of Nicodemus as “substantially more negative” than the dominant view alleges: (1) the introduction of 2:23–25; (2) the labels “Pharisee” and “ruler of the Jews”; (3) Nicodemus’s coming by night; (4) the identification of Jesus as a mere “teacher”; (5) Nicodemus’s dependence on signs; (6) his astonishing ignorance; and (7) the evidence adduced by Cotterell regarding the increasingly negative portrayal of Nicodemus. According to Blomberg (cf. Bassler 1989), Nicodemus remains an ambivalent character, in contrast with the more positive progression found in the Samaritan woman in John 4. This overall conclusion is against Cotterell (1985: 241), who in his otherwise excellent discourse analysis exceeds the evidence when he credits Nicodemus with a “gradual

Sabbe, M. 357n1
Sacks, S. D. 60
Safrai, S. 92n10, 239n50
Saldarini, A. J. 118
Sanders, E. P. 89n2, 102n3
Sanders, J. A. 247, 247n6

dawning of true faith [culminating] in the presence of Nicodemus at the cross and in his ultimate identification with Jesus in his death.” Rather than “take his place at Calvary,” Nicodemus simply ensured giving Jesus a decent burial. (As Meeks [1972: 55] contends, Nicodemus’s “ludicrous ‘one hundred pounds’ of embalming spices indicate clearly enough that he has not understood the ‘lifting up’ of the Son of Man.”) Cotterell is on surer footing when he concludes that in the present narrative, “Nicodemus chose not to understand Jesus,” characterizing the outcome of the present conversation as “inconclusive.” Likewise mistaken, I believe, is Saayman (1995: 45), who detects in Nicodemus “a growing loyalty to Jesus.”

39 He does so despite his doubt that Nicodemus can follow his explanation (3:12), but by this time the primary audience in John’s Gospel has shifted from Nicodemus to the readers (see the survey in Saayman 1995: 30–31). Grese (1988) maintains that 3:13–18 serves to explicate the references to “being born from above” in 3:3, 5, but this is doubtful, for by 3:13–18 the monologue has moved on to a christological plane, while 3:3, 5 stipulate the human requirement for entering God’s kingdom.

1 Sabbe (1992: 2051–82) believes that John is literarily dependent on the Synoptics (esp. Mark, but also Luke) in the present instance. However, I am not convinced that the available evidence is sufficient to demonstrate redactional activity on John’s part. Coakley (1988: 254) concludes that “the story of John 12:1–8 can without difficulty be understood on the hypothesis of the priority [i.e., independence] of John,” and that the “details do not require to be explained as secondary developments of traditions preserved in more primitive form elsewhere [i.e., the Synoptics]” (though I do not share his skepticism regarding “the correctness of every detail in the account”).

10 On Jewish weddings, see the sidebar in Köstenberger 2002c: 24. See also Safrai 1976; Derrett 1970: 227–38; Ferguson 1993: 68–69; Williams, DJG 86–88.

50 Does this imply that Jesus’ contemporaries thought him capable of instructing Gentiles in the Diaspora by using Greek? If so, the present passage would provide indirect evidence that Jesus was known to at least speak (if not write) Greek. On the question of the language of Jesus, see the surveys by C. Rabin and G. Mussies in Safrai and Stern 1976: 1007–64 (plus the bibliography cited there); see also Silva 1991 (plus the bibliography cited there on p. 222 n. 3).

2 For a defense of the temple clearing as a Johannine sign, see Köstenberger 1995b (cf. P. Trudinger 1997: 330), contra R. Brown (1966: 528), who claims that every use of σημεῖον (sēmeion, sign) refers to a “miraculous deed.” By referring to the “temple cleansing” as “temple clearing,” I take up a suggestion made by Mathews (1988–89: 101); cf. E. Sanders 1985: 61–76; Evans 1989: 237–70.

3 Interpreters differ as to whether Jesus’ clearing of the temple was designed to “cleanse” temple worship (cf. E. Sanders 1985: 61–71; Neusner 1989; Evans 1989). In any case, the major point of the temple clearing in John is that Jesus serves as the temple’s replacement in the life of the messianic community.

6 A briefer and more dated (but still helpful) survey is found in Burge 1984: 142–43. Further

Sanders, J. N. 1, 2, 2n3, 17n28, 319, 343n110, 500n86
Sandy, D. B. 66
Sava, A. F. 552n66
Schenk, W. 583n1, 583n3, 596n5
Schenke, L. 224n3, 242n68

bibliographic references to materials dealing with both external and internal evidence can be found in Wallace 1993: 290 n. 2; J. A. Sanders 1990: 346 n. 1; Burge 1984: 141 n. 5. Also regularly cited is the monograph by Becker (1963).

3 On the Latin background, see Volting 2001: 11–59. See also the works referenced in J. N. Sanders 1943; Pollard 1970; Braun 1959; and Grillmeier 1975.

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon's work is given extensive coverage in Origen's commentary on John's Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John's Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάπξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that “the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel's] use”; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges “the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

110 For the use of spices in the burial process, see J. N. Sanders 1968: 274.

86 Beasley-Murray (1999: 293 n. k [contra Barrett 1978: 515]), following J. N. Sanders, suggests “that the καὶ ... δὲ construction has been combined with the καὶ ... καὶ construction used to introduce a contrast, so giving the sequence καὶ ... δὲ ... καὶ ... , which should be rendered, ‘although ... yet ... and ...’” (all accents contextual).

66 See the summary in Carson 1991: 623–24, and the fuller treatment in Beasley-Murray 1999: 355–58. For further discussion, see Barbet 1953; W. Edwards, Gabel, and Hosmer 1986; Sava 1960.

5 Though it is fascinating to contemplate the contrast in John 21 between the beloved disciple, who knows himself to be loved by Jesus (21:7a, 20a), and Peter, who is called to love Jesus (21:15–17). See Schenk 1992: 516–17, referring to Stenger 1990: 240 and Ruckstuhl 1977: 340, 343, 356.

3 Ridderbos (1997: 253) considers chapters 7–10 to constitute a unit, marked by Jesus’ “encounters, conversations, and confrontations” with the Jews. More in depth is the analysis by Schenke (1989: esp. 186), who likewise defends the unity of chapters 7–10 dramatically developing the escalating conflict regarding Jesus. Schenke discerns three major scenes (7:10–8:59; 9:1–10:21; 10:22–39) plus a prologue (7:1–9) and an epilogue (10:40–42). In chapters 7–8 (scene I, taking place in the Jerusalem temple), Schenke finds seven smaller scenes (7:10–13, 14–31, 32–36, 37–44, 45–52; 8:12–20, 21–59) moving from diversity of opinion regarding Jesus to a united front against him. Scene II is staged in Jerusalem and can also be divided into seven smaller scenes (9:1–7, 8–12, 13–17, 18–23, 24–34, 35–39; 9:40–10:21). The location of scene III is once again the temple. A very similar division of chapter 7 is found in Neyrey 1996 (followed in the discussion below). On the thematic unity of the present unit, see also Dodd 1953: 345–54. On the thematic unity and development of 7:1–36, see Attridge 1980.

68 Beasley-Murray (1999: 119) notes that those who are exposed to God’s revelation cannot remain neutral and connects the division here to the division that will occur before the judgment seat. On “schisma” as a unifying formal element in John 7–10, see Schenke 1989: 177–78.

6 See, early on, Schlatter (1948: x), who comments that the term “Johannine school” appears to him to be “completely divorced from reality” (völlig phantastisch).

20 Very few would argue for a date prior to A.D. 70, as do J. A. T. Robinson 1976: 254–85 (but see the refutation in Kerr 2002: 19–25; see also Carson 1991: 82–86); Morris 1995: 25–30 (with reference to Cribbs 1970; Torrey 1936: x–xi); and Wallace 1990 (but see the present commentary at 5:2). However, the cumulative weight of the following internal evidence must be judged to favor a post–A.D. 70 date (cf. Croteau 2003): the references to the Sea of Tiberias in 6:1 and 21:1; Thomas’s confession of Jesus as “my Lord and my God” in 20:28 (contra emperor worship in time of Domitian?); the reference to Peter’s martyrdom (21:19); and the lack of reference to the Sadducees (Schlatter 1948: 44; though see the caution in Carson 1991: 84)—not to mention the comparative ease with which the Fourth Evangelist equates Jesus with God (e.g., 1:1, 14; 10:30; 20:28; see Carson 1991: 85, though note his caveats on p. 84) or external evidence such as Clement of Alexandria’s statement, cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7, “Last of all, John, perceiving that the external facts had been made plain [in the Synoptics] ... composed a spiritual gospel.” This is true especially since the major pieces of evidence cited in support of a pre–A.D. 70 date—the lack of reference to the destruction of the temple and the use of a present-tense verb in 5:2 to refer to the Sheep Gate pool—are not determinative and are capable of alternative explanations (see, e.g., Schlatter 1948: 23–24).

31 So the majority of commentators, including Morris 1995: 66; Carson 1991: 137; Haenchen 1984: 1.113–14; Schnackenburg 1970: 1.239–40; Barrett 1978: 156–57; and Schlatter 1948: 5–6. Among the translations that construe ὁ γέγονεν with what precedes are the NASB, NIV, NKJV, ISV, NLT, HCSB, ESV, and TNIV.

34 Schlatter (1948: 6) notes the characteristic Johannine asyndeton in 1:4 and that it does not detract from the flow of thought. Keener (2003: 382) identifies the chain life-life-light-light-darkness-darkness in 1:4–5 as a literary device called sorites (also adducing Wis. 6:17–20).

37 “Overcome” or an equivalent is favored also by Morris 1995: 76; Moloney 1998: 36; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.245–46; Laney 1992: 39; Lindars 1972: 87; Schlatter 1948: 9

(“καταλαμβάνω never means ‘understand’ in John”); and Westcott 1908: 1.9–10. Carson (1991: 138) thinks that John might have both meanings (“overcome” and “comprehend”) in mind (so also Whitacre 1999: 53) and likes the ambiguity in BAGD’s translation, “master” (see BDAG 520). Keener (2003: 387) believes that John’s use of κατέλαβεν in 1:5 is an instance of traductio, a play on the multiple meanings of a word (here “comprehend” and “overcome”). Keener notes that the word occurs in Wis. 7:30 but admits that there the term clearly means “overcome” and no wordplay is present. Burge (2000: 56) agrees that both are at work, but he sees “overcome” as being dominant. Calvin (1959: 12) translates “comprehend.” The major translations divide more or less evenly between the two options, usually mentioning the one not chosen in a footnote: (1)

NIV: “understood”; NASB, NKJV: “comprehend”; (2) NLT: “extinguish”; NET: “mastered”; ISV: “put out”; HCSB, ESV, NRSV: “overcome.” Notably, the TNIV changed the NIV’s “understood” to “overcome.”

59 Calvin (1959: 17) understands ἐξουσία in 1:12 as “honor”; Schlatter (1948: 19) glosses the word as “authorization” (Ermächtigung).

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, “It is not einzig, but einzigartig” (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): “not ‘einzig geboren,’ but ‘einzig der Art nach.’ ” Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers “unique,” pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son’s procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the “root fallacy”; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors “only” or “unique,” disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means “unique” and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, “beloved” (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward “only begotten” rather than simply “only,” especially in light of the ensuing preposition “from.” This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers “unique” or “one-of-a-kind,” while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that “the phrase of the Father ... is decisive.” Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that “only begotten” as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as “one of a kind,” noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God’s children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

89 So, earlier, Schlatter (1948: 32): “Gnade für Gnade” (grace for grace).

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

28 In contrast to Mark 1:7, John uses ἅγιος not ἱκανός, does not use κύριος (Schlatter 1948: 45), and uses ἵνα plus subjunctive rather than an infinitive (Barrett 1978: 175). Staley (1988: 60) detects a progression from the Baptist’s more active role in relation to Jesus in 1:26–34 to his taking a more passive role after 1:35 until the shift is completed in 3:22–36. See also the insightful comments on the nature of the Baptist’s witness by Westcott 1908: 1.37.

31 Schlatter (1948: 45) notes the emphatic position of αὐτοῦ (autou, his), which, he argues, further accentuates the distance between the Coming One and the Baptist.

40 See the classic exposition of 1:29 in its original Jewish context by Schlatter 1948: 48–49.

43 The reference to a previous statement is a recurring stylistic feature in this Gospel (Schlatter [1948: 50] cites 3:26, 28; 4:54; 5:33; 7:21; 8:24; 11:37; 13:33; 15:20; 18:9, 14, 32; 21:14). The statement is largely unchanged from 1:15 and 1:27, though the context is now Jesus’ actual appearance (Ridderbos 1997: 75; Morris 1995: 132). The form of the verbs has been changed from participles to indicatives, enabling the author to stress the reality of the thought more forcefully (Morris 1995: 132). The inference that John includes this statement as a polemic against elements elevating the Baptist over Jesus in the evangelist’s day (Beasley-Murray 1999: 25) is unnecessary.

69 Ridderbos (1997: 84) thinks that this identification is all the more likely since Peter learns about Jesus from his brother Andrew and this unnamed disciple (1:41) and since Peter and John are closely associated in this and the other Gospels (so also Schlatter 1948: 55; more cautious assessments are found in Borchert 1996: 143; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.310; Carson 1991: 154). Note also the connection between Andrew and John in the Muratorian Canon (Bettenson 1967: 28). Michaels (1989: 37) thinks that the second disciple is Philip. Keener (2003: 468) likewise sees “no reason” to identify the other disciple with the beloved disciple, since he is not mentioned until 13:23. On a literary level, this is self-evident, but the absence of “beloved disciple” language prior to 13:23 does not seem to rule out the possibility that the apostle John appears in the Johannine narrative as a historical character that is left unnamed.

81 Schlatter (1948: 56) notes that the author implies that Jesus acted on his decision, citing 6:21. Schlatter also observes that nothing is said about Jesus’ sojourn, but that a meeting place in Galilee is likely, since only a single day separates Jesus’ encounter with Nathanael and the Cana wedding in 2:1 (p. 57).

90 Schlatter 1948: 57. Cf. Matt. 5:17; 7:12; 11:13; 22:40; Luke 16:16; 24:44; Acts 13:15; 24:14; 28:23; Rom. 3:21.

33 Schlatter (1948: 70) takes the presence of a “master of the banquet” as indication of a well-to-do family (also citing 12:3).

41 For general information, see Laughlin (1993) and Schlatter (1997: 111–12).

21 Witherington (1995: 87) contends that in light of the large area—the outer court measured 300 by 450 meters—it is probable that some, but not all, were driven out. Many commentators (e.g., Borchert 1996: 164; Schlatter 1948: 75) mention that weapons (such as clubs) were not allowed in the temple courts.

18 Schlatter (1948: 85) says that the “we” in 3:2 are “the many who believed in Jesus’ name” in 2:23.

29 See, earlier, Schlatter 1948: 89. For helpful discussions, see Carson 1991: 191–96, esp. 194–95; McCabe 1999. See also Cotterell 1985: 241; Kynes, DJG 574–76, esp. 575.

35 Schlatter (1948: 91–92) refers to the Baptist (1:7, 34), but also to Abraham (8:56) and Isaiah (12:41).

11 Note the emphatic expression “you yourselves” (Morris 1995: 212). Schlatter (1948: 107) notes how closely οὐκ (ouk, not) is linked to εἰμί (eimi, I am) in 3:28.

27 As Rabbi Eliezer (ca. A.D. 90–130) used to say, “He that eats the bread of the Samaritans is like to one that eats the flesh of swine” (m. Šeb. 8.10 [cited by many, including Schlatter 1948: 118]).

153n40, 155n46, 155n47, 156n50, 160n64, 178n12, 184n44, 191, 194n98, 195n109, 200, 201, 205n37, 207n42, 208, 209, 213, 216n78, 217n86, 219, 222, 237n38, 238n45,

40 Some interpreters (such as Lindars [1972: 186]) argue that “five men/husbands” alludes to a tradition cited in Josephus, according to which the Samaritans had five gods (Ant. 9.14.3 §288; cf. 2 Kings 17:24, 30–31), just as “five colonnades” in 5:2 is taken to refer to the Jewish Pentateuch (Hengel 1999: 307, 315). As Blomberg (1995: 8 [cf. Schlatter 1948: 122]) points out, however, in reality the text lists seven gods of five nations (but see Prest 1992: 368; see also the discussion in C. Koester 1990b: 675–77).

46 Schlatter (1948: 124) observes, “The new sacrifice (1:29) and the new temple (2:19) constitute the grounds for a new worship.”

47 Jesus refers to “what” (neuter) rather than “whom” (masculine) they do not know, perhaps pointing to the less-than-personal character of Samaritan worship (Schlatter 1948: 125).

50 The two terms are separate (but expegetically related) in the closest Johannine parallel, 1 John 3:18: “in deed and truth” (ἐν ἔργῳ καὶ ἀληθείᾳ), that is, “in deed, that is, in reality” (Collins 1995: 119, with reference to Schlatter).

64 See the discussion at the introduction to John 4 above. See also Schlatter (1948: 129), who says that, as in Matt. 12:23, the magnitude of the Christ concept allows only the question, not yet faith. Conway (1999: 123) may somewhat understate the significance of the particle when she says that it “may simply be an expression of the woman’s excitement and the overall drama of the scene.”

12 See especially Wallace (1990: esp. 204; 1996: 531, with reference to McKay 1994: 40), who claims, “Since εἰμί is nowhere else clearly used as a historical present, the present tense should be taken as indicating present time from the viewpoint of the speaker.” For evidence that εἰμί can function as a historical present, see 10:8: πάντες ὅσοι ἦλθον πρὸ ἐμοῦ κλέπται εἰσὶν καὶ λησταί, “all who have come before me were thieves and robbers” (note that “were” is the rendering chosen in the NIV, TNIV, NLT, and NET); cf. 19:40: καθὼς ἔθος ἐστὶν τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις ἐνταφιάζειν, “this was in accordance with Jewish burial customs” (NIV = TNIV; CEV: “which was how the Jewish people buried their dead”). See also Schlatter (1948: 141), who takes the present tense verb in 5:2 at face value but conjectures that the “sheep gate” must have been reconstructed subsequent to its destruction by Titus in A.D. 70.

44 The imperfect Greek verbs in 5:16 and 5:18 (ἐδίωκον, ἐποίει, ἐζήτουν, ἔλυνεν, ἔλεγεν) indicate the permanent pattern of hostility (Morris 1995: 275). Schlatter (1948: 146) views Jesus’ opponents’ urgency as an indication that they feared he might seek to escape.

98 See Barnett 1980–81; Schlatter 1948: 160; Piper, ISBE 3:332–33; van der Woude, TDNT 9:509–27. However, calling these figures “messianic pretenders” goes beyond the evidence. Thus, Meier (1994: 611–12 n. 75) and R. Brown (1997: 820 n. 6) emphatically deny that any Jew (other than Jesus) claimed or was said to be the Messiah prior to, contemporaneous with, or even in the decades immediately following Jesus’ ministry.

109 Hengel (1999: 309) comments, “One should by all means read ‘Bethesda’ ”; so also Carson 1991: 241; Morris 1995: 267; Witherington 1995: 137; Borchert 1996: 231; Moloney 1998: 171; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94; Schlatter 1948: 142; undecided are Ridderbos 1997: 185; R. Brown 1966: 206–7.

37 Schlatter (1948: 169) notes the contrasting ways in which Jesus deals with the crowd and his disciples. Whereas the former’s desire to elevate Jesus as their king is frustrated, the latter’s faith is mightily encouraged.

42 According to Schlatter (1948: 170), the present reference shows awareness of Galilean farmers' poverty, in part owing to heavy taxation. Regarding "I tell you the truth," see commentary at 1:51; on the "Son of Man," at 1:51; 3:13; concerning Jesus' "signs," at 2:11; 6:14. The relative pronoun ἥν (hēn, that) in 6:27 could refer either to "food" or to "eternal life" but probably has the entire phrase "food that lasts for eternal life" as its antecedent.

78 Lindars (1972: 269) observes, "This is the climax of the discourse. All the metaphors are dropped, and the whole thing is put into terms of personal relationship." Schlatter (1948: 179) notes aptly that the only "mysticism" that arises from this mutual indwelling is that of being "children of God."

86 Schlatter (1948: 179–80, adducing Rev. 2:9; 3:9) contends that the anarthrous συναγωγή refers not to a building but to the congregation.

38 Schlatter (1948: 197, citing Mek. Exod. 15.11), refers to the "Jewish view," "the more miracles, the more grounds for faith."

45 Cf. 11:50–52. So Beasley-Murray 1999: 112; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.150; Bultmann 1971: 309. Ridderbos (1997: 271–72) thinks that it merely indicates a presumed place of refuge for Jesus. Schlatter (1948: 150) sees in 7:35 not only an objection that Jesus' departure from Jerusalem would compromise the Jews' privilege as God's chosen people but also an acknowledgment of the oppressive superiority of Greek learning, the profundity of the Greeks' antipathy toward the Jews, and the firmness of religious traditions in Greek-speaking areas.

47 See R. Brown 1966: 314; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.150; Schlatter 1948: 198. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 271), who opts for Greek-speaking Diaspora Jews. Carson (1991: 320 [cf. Barrett 1978: 325; Witherington 1995: 173]) thinks that Gentile proselytes probably are in view.

53 Most commentators favor a time immediately following cessation of ceremonies on the eighth day (Carson 1991: 321; Morris 1995: 373, esp. n. 79; Barrett 1978: 326; Moloney 1998: 256; Schlatter 1948: 199). Some believe that Jesus' words fit better with the ceremonies of the seventh day (R. Brown 1966: 320; Bultmann 1971: 302 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.152; Ridderbos 1997: 272; Burge 2000: 227). On the water-drawing ceremony, see Keener 2003: 722–24.

11 A survey of major commentaries shows that about half provide a regular commentary (Carson, Laney, Lindars, Whitacre, Calvin, Westcott), while the other half refrain from comment (Michaels, Talbert, Stibbe, Brodie, D. M. Smith), in some cases choosing not to address the issue at all (e.g., Schlatter [1948: 205], who in his scholarly commentary moves directly from 7:52 to 8:12 without comment, though his popular commentary [1962: 139–41] does treat the pericope adulterae in deference to "ecclesiastical tradition"; see also Zahn [1921: 404], who, like Schlatter, moves immediately from 7:52 to 8:12 and deals with the pericope in a lengthy excursus on pp. 723–30).

103 Kruse (2003:217) cites a stipulation in the Qumran writings (CD 14:7–10) that certain officeholders must be between thirty and fifty years of age. Schlatter (1948: 220) says that the present passage coheres with Matt. 17:24, for the obligation to pay the temple tax ended at age fifty: "hence Jesus was not yet a πρεσβύτερος." Also, the Book of Jubilees uses "fifty years" to measure the eras since the creation (M. Edwards 1994; followed by Moloney 1998: 286).

74 Schlatter (1948: 242) says that ἐν denotes not identity but "inseparability"; nothing separates Jesus from the Father.

69 Ridderbos (1997: 396) persuasively argues that 11:25b refers to "death in the natural sense and to living in the sense of eternal life,” while “lives” in 11:26a “refers to natural human existence, while ‘never die’ refers to the eternal life that natural death can neither prevent nor affect” (so also Bultmann 1971: 403, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.331; Stibbe 1994: 51). Contra Carson (1991: 413), R. Brown (1966: 425), and Borchert (1996: 356) (also Calvin and Schlatter), who maintain that “lives” in 11:26a refers to eternal life. Wuellner (1991: 182) calls the present statement an oxymoron.

93 This is the meaning of the word in its only undisputed preceding reference in Aeschylus, Seven against Thebes 1.461, where mares are shown “snorting [ἐμβριμώμενας] in the bridles,” “with their breath whistling in their nostrils (1.463–64), as they brace themselves for the rush upon the enemy” (the latter quote is a paraphrase by Lindars 1992b: 92). It is less clear that people’s unbelief is the object of Jesus’ indignation; if so, why would he join them in their grief by bursting into tears himself in 11:35 (Lindars 1992b: 92)? Schlatter (1948: 254) comments perceptively, “All that John is saying is that Jesus took on a threatening posture and that he was agitated as he went to Lazarus’s tomb. John never provided an interpretation of the processes that moved the inner life of Jesus.” Conway (1999: 147–48) cautions similarly that “we should be wary of delving too deeply into the psyche of Jesus.”

25 Most commentators view the statement in an elliptical fashion, though there is less consensus on precisely what ought to be supplied. Carson (1991: 429) suggests that the statement is to be construed as follows: “Leave her alone. [She has done this—i.e., held on to the jar] in order to keep it for the day of my burial.” Ridderbos (1997: 417–19), too, holds that the ἵνα (hina, that) of 12:7 is independent (a “brachylogy” [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.369]) and proposes that the phrase is best understood as a rhetorical question. Less likely is the construal of Witherington (1995: 208, appealing to Synoptic parallels), who thinks that Jesus is urging that Mary be left to keep the “burial ritual.” Also doubtful is Maccini’s (1996: 173–74) rendering: “Let her alone, so that she might keep what oil she has left for the day of my burial” (so, earlier, Schlatter 1948: 264).

20 Wallace (1996: 558) identifies ἤρξατο (ērxato, he began) as an ingressive aorist, but the verb already means “begin,” which carries an ingressive notion, so that it is unclear what this identification contributes. Schlatter (1948: 281) notes that this is the only Johannine occurrence of the verb ἄρχομαι (except for the pericope adulterae, where the word appears at 8:9).

32 Schlatter (1948: 283, adducing 8:15) notes similarly that Peter here judges “according to the flesh” (κατὰ τὴν σάρκα).

33 So Schlatter 1948: 282. Morris (1995: 548 n. 22) notes the plural form ταῦτα (tauta, these things) and suggests that the expression “probably points to all the events associated with the Passion,” though he does say that in part, the “later” may refer to the explanation that Jesus soon will give. The latter is ruled out categorically by Schnackenburg (1990: 3.19) and, less categorically but still firmly, by Carson (1991: 463). However, a radical disjunction between Jesus’ explanation here and the events of the passion seems to be unnecessary.

40 “Teacher” is διδάσκαλος (didaskalos); the Aramaic equivalent is רַבּבִּי (rabbi): see 1:38, 49; 3:2; 4:31; 6:25; 9:2; 11:8; 20:16. “Lord” renders κύριος (kyrios): see 6:68; 9:38; 11:3, 12, 21, 27, 32, 34, 39; 13:6, 9, 25, 36, 37; 14:5, 8, 22; 20:28; 21:15, 16, 17, 20, 21. Schlatter (1948: 284, citing Matt. 23:8) detects in the pronoun ὑμεῖς (hymeis, you) an implied contrast: “You do it [call me ‘Teacher’ and ‘Lord’], others don’t.”

4 Schlatter (1948: 285) comments, “The kick with the foot symbolizes the entire dissolution of fellowship, just as ‘eating his bread’ portrays its reality and completeness.”

10 So, among others, Schlatter 1948: 286. On the “disciple Jesus loved,” see Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61 (including further bibliographic references). For the identification of the “disciple Jesus loved” with John the son of Zebedee, see chapter 1 in Köstenberger 1999a; for the identification of the “disciple Jesus loved” with the Fourth Evangelist, see Jackson 1999. See also the discussion of authorial modesty in Vanhoozer 1993: 374, citing Augustine and Westcott. Contra Culpepper (1983: 121–23), who views the “beloved disciple” not only as an “ideal disciple” but also as the physical personification of the Paraclete. Beck (1997: 108–36) essentially aligns himself with Culpepper in characterizing this disciple as “the paradigm” or “embodiment of discipleship” (pp. 135–36).

20 Two interesting parallels are found in T. Sim. 2:7 and T. Ash. 1:8. The DSS reveal the belief, also found in John (e.g., 8:44), that the relation between the devil and evil humans is like that of father to child (see commentary at 12:36; cf. Wis. 2:24). In Judaism in general, however, a person’s will was considered decisive in determining which of two impulses, that toward good or that toward evil, prevailed (see commentary at 8:34). The present verse is the only place in John’s Gospel where the name “Satan” is found. Elsewhere the expression is διάβολος (diabolos, devil [6:70; 8:44; 13:2]). Schlatter (1948: 287) notes that Satan entering Judas is the converse of a disciple’s “remaining in Jesus.”

28 Schlatter (1948: 287) infers from this reference that it was not dark when the meal started.

10 Schlatter (1948: 289) notes that Jesus was first one who gave (Gebende) and only then one who commanded (Gebietende). Schlatter relates the “new commandment” to the “new grace of the new covenant” (p. 288, contra Calvin).

16 Schlatter (1948: 290) considers the present reference to be proleptic of the distinction made between Peter and John with regard to the outcome of their ministry.

31 Schlatter (1948: 293–94) sees an affinity between the images of Jesus as “the door” (10:7, 9) and as “the way”; the former speaks of entrance into the community, while the latter refers to access to God and entering into eternal life.

102 So Schnackenburg 1990: 3.87; cf. 19:11: κατά (kata) not ἐν (en), though this is of course true as well. Schlatter (1948: 303) cites Matt. 5:23 and especially Rev. 2:4, but in both passages the preposition used is likewise κατά not ἐν.

104 The transition from 14:31 to 15:1 is frequently labeled an aporia, which is commonly taken to indicate a literary seam indicating the presence of different underlying sources (one of the first to see such a difficulty was C. H. Weisse 1856: 116; cf. Wellhausen 1907 and the influential series of essays by E. Schwartz 1907; 1908; see the historical survey in Kellum 2005: 10–78). However, this conclusion seems premature and unwarranted in light of preferable alternate explanations. Thielman (1991: 180), for instance, suggests that the present passage may be an instance of a “purposeful attempt at obscurity” common in ancient writers (he cites the transition from 5:47 to 6:1 as another possible example). Recently, Kellum (2005: 230) has suggested that statements indicating movement in the Fourth Gospel regularly serve as ways to move along the narrative. Stibbe (1993: 159), too, is able to make “very good sense” of the narrative as it stands without resorting to source-critical theories. For him, 14:31 is part of the Johannine theme of “the elusive Christ.” After saying in 14:30 that the devil “has no hold” on him, Jesus, knowing that the “prince of this world” is now coming, is evading his captors for one final time. Schlatter (1948: 304), finally, makes the improbable suggestion that the unevenness may be due to a break in dictation.

471n42, 472n44, 473, 481n84, 491n39, 493, 498n70, 500n87, 508n34, 514, 514n17, 514n18, 517, 518n33, 525n19, 527n33, 532, 544n17, 546n29, 550n54, 570n17, 575n23,

42 According to Schlatter (1948: 311–12), the nature of sin, righteousness, and judgment were central Pharisaic concerns, and the Spirit’s work is aimed at exposing false human views and expectations on these issues. Clearly, Christ and the Spirit work in tandem in this regard, and because of these false human conceptions the disciples require another “helping presence” that protects them and pleads their case.

44 Unbelief as sin is discussed at 8:21–24 (see also 1:11; 3:19; 15:22). Note also the reference to people’s failure to believe Moses and the Scriptures in 5:46–47 (Schlatter 1948: 312).

84 This is the only instance of the term νικάω (nikaō, triumph) in John’s Gospel. The expression occurs several times in John’s first epistle (2:13, 14; 4:4; 5:4, 5) and over a dozen times in the Book of Revelation (esp. in the letters to the seven churches in chs. 2 and 3; see Schlatter 1948: 317). The related noun νίκη (nikē, victory) occurs in 1 John 5:4. Other NT references to the victory won by Jesus (extended to believers) include John 12:31; Rom. 8:37 (ὑπερνικάω, hypernikaō); 1 Cor. 15:57 (νίκος, nikos). The verb occurs rarely in the OT, with Ps. 50:6 LXX showing God as conqueror (cited in Rom. 3:4). It is also found in apocryphal and pseudepigraphical literature (see Wis. 4:2; 16:10; 18:22; 1 Esdr. 3:12). Bruns (1967) contends that John’s portrayal of Jesus as victor echoes the pagan myth of Herakles, the conqueror of death and evil.

39 See also Isa. 62:2; 65:15–16. Speculation about the divine name was common in the Judaism of Jesus’ day. In particular, people wondered about the angel of the Lord referred to in Exod. 23:20–21. In later Jewish literature, the name of God became enshrined in the sacred Tetragrammaton (YHWH), which served as a substitute for pronouncing the divine name. In fact, Schlatter (1948: 319–20) believes that John here alludes to the Jews’ reluctance to pronounce God’s name. In gnostic literature, “name” refers to the knowledge (γνώσις, gnōsis) mediated by the redeemer. This name is revealed only to certain individuals who thereby acquire a share in God’s life, light, and joy.

70 Carson (1991: 568) maintains that such unity is achieved not by finding “the lowest common theological denominator, but by common adherence to the apostolic gospel, by love that is joyfully self-sacrificing, by undaunted commitment to the shared goals of the mission.”

Similarly, Morris (1995: 644) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 306–7). Schlatter (1948: 325) points out that unity is all the more important as the circle of believers in Jesus grows. He also notes the contrast between such unity and the existence of various sects in contemporary Judaism.

87 Schlatter (1948: 326) observes, “Jesus’ divine sonship consists not in possession of a secret name but in his ability to make God’s name known.”

34 See Ant. 1.15 §240; 13.5.1 §131; 14.14.6 §390; 15.6.2–3 §167–75; J.W. 1.14.1 §276; 1.15.1 §286; 1.18.4 §360; 1.22.3 §440; 3.4.2 §68 (see Schlatter 1948: 329).

17 Schlatter (1948: 333) maintains that it almost certainly was not the norm for the high priest’s courtyard to be guarded by a woman. This presumably was done only when all the men were otherwise engaged. Schlatter further conjectures that a man probably would not have allowed Peter and John to enter, but the girl did. John, in turn, attributed this to divine providence enabling Jesus’ prediction in 13:38 to be fulfilled. What is more, John himself had a part in this without realizing it at the time.

18 This construes the “other disciple” as the subject of εἰσήγαγεν (eisēgagen, he/she brought in) (Schlatter 1948: 333); alternatively, it is the slave girl who led Peter in. On women gatekeepers, see 2 Sam. 4:6 LXX; Acts 12:13 (R. Brown 1970: 824). MM 295 cites inscriptions dating from 14 B.C. and A.D. 34. The word παιδίσκη (paidiskē, servant girl) in John 18:17 is rendered “bondwoman” (in distinction from “free woman”) in Gal. 4:22–31.

33 Apparently, Jesus did not consider his response to be in violation of his “turning the other cheek” principle (see the discussions in Ridderbos 1997: 583; Morris 1995: 670 n. 55; Carson 1991: 585). Schlatter (1948: 335) resolves the apparent difficulty by noting that Jesus merely pointed out the abuse without fighting for his rights. In fact, “Turning the other cheek without bearing witness to the truth is not the fruit of moral resolution but the terrorized cowardice of the wimp” (Carson 1991: 585). Contrast also Jesus’ response with Paul’s in Acts 23:2–5, where the apostle lost his temper and called the high priest “you whitewashed wall” (see Carson 1991: 584–85).

19 Literally, “kill” (ἀποκτείνω, apokteinō), in possible reference to the sixth commandment of the Decalogue (Michaels 1989: 314). Schlatter (1948: 338) notes the emphatic position of ἡμῖν (hēmin, for us), contrasting the Jews and Pilate.

33 Schlatter (1948: 339) notes the connection between 18:34 and 4:42.

17 So, for example, Ridderbos 1997: 608; Beasley-Murray 1999: 346; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270; Moloney 1998: 502; Schlatter 1948: 348; Westcott 1908: 2.308.

29 The double perfect of ἔγραφα (gegrapha, I have written) conveys a sense of finality, portraying Pilate’s action as a fait accompli (Ridderbos 1997: 609 n. 134; Morris 1995: 714 n. 54). Bultmann (1971: 670 n. 2 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 902]) suggests that the first perfect is aoristic; Wallace (1996: 577) lists 19:22 as an example of an extensive perfect focusing on the completion of an action in the past. Similar word combinations are found also in the LXX (Gen. 43:14; Esth. 4:16; 1 Macc. 13:38) and in rabbinic literature (b. Menah. 3a; b. Ketub. 96a; b. Yebam. 106b) (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; further instances are cited in Schlatter 1948: 349). Perhaps significantly, similar phrases are found also in a Roman context (note Cicero, Epistulae ad Quintum fratrem 1.2.2; 1.2.13: scripsi, scripsi). Keener’s (2003: 1138) observation that every other instance of “written” in this Gospel refers to Scripture (2:17; 6:31, 45; 8:17; 10:34; 12:14, 16; 15:25), which cannot be broken (10:35), seems of doubtful relevance here.

54 So Ridderbos 1997: 616; Carson 1991: 619; Barrett 1978: 553; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; Schlatter 1948: 351. Psalm 69:21 is also cited in the Qumran hymn 1QH 12:11. Another relevant passage is Ps. 22:15 (Schlatter 1948: 351; Kruse 2003: 369). The suggestion that Jesus here refers back to his statement in 18:11 is improbable (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 617; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; R. Brown 1970: 930).

17 D. M. Smith (1999: 378) observes, “Jesus’ permanent postresurrection state will not obtain until he has ascended to the Father, which he will now do”; Schlatter (1948: 358) comments, “Jesus’ entry into fellowship with the Father in heaven is the prerequisite for his fellowship with the disciples.” On Jesus’ return to the Father, see also 3:13; 7:33; 13:1, 3; 14:4, 12, 28; 16:5, 17, 28; 17:11.

23 See Schlatter 1959: 511; Beasley-Murray 1999: 383; Borchert 2002: 310. The rabbis used the terms “binding” and “loosing” to declare what was forbidden or permitted by the law. See Str-B 1:738–41; Büchsel, TDNT 2:60–61; J. Lightfoot 1859: 2.237–41; Dalman 1902: 213–17.

4 Schlatter (1948: 361, citing Rev. 1:10) thinks that the celebration of Sunday as the Lord’s Day is in view. Carson (1991: 657) suggests that the continued reference to the Lord’s Day in the resurrection narrative may represent a polemical attempt to demonstrate the basis of Christian worship to John's Jewish readers.

3 Parallels to this type of concluding statement can be documented from both secular and intertestamental Jewish literature (Bultmann 1971: 697–98 n. 2). After describing God's creative work and the marvels of nature, one intertestamental book concludes a section with these words: "We could say more but could never say enough; let the final word be: 'He is the all' " (Sir. 43:27). Even closer in wording is 1 Macc. 9:22: "Now the rest of the acts of Judas ... and the brave deeds that he did ... have not been recorded, but they were very many." Schlatter (1948: 362) also refers to Luke 3:17; Josephus, Ant. 3.15.3 §318; 7.7.5 §161; he also notes the exact verbal parallel of γεγραμμένα ἐν τῷ βιβλίῳ τούτῳ found in Rev. 22:19.

6 So Culpepper 1983: 96. See also Schlatter (1948: 366), who contends that the sustained characterization of Peter and John in 1:35–42; 13:23–29; 18:15–17; 20:2–10; and chapter 21 cannot be assigned to different hands; Ridderbos (1997: 656), who says that the final chapter is designed to bring into sharper profile the roles of Peter and the beloved disciple; and Carson (1991: 667), who notes that their relationship is removed from the realm of competition and their complementarity strongly and explicitly affirmed. Minear (1983: 91) writes, "Only in chapter 21 do we discover an adequate end to the story of the two disciples who, from chapter 13 on, have played the most conspicuous supporting roles in the gospel: Simon Peter and the beloved disciple."

8 See Ridderbos (1997: 656 n. 3), who cites Schlatter: "The attribution of the new narrative to another author is impossible, however, since the identical linguistic conventions have been fully maintained." Even Bultmann (1971: 700) declares, "Language and style admittedly afford no sure proof." Similarly, Neirynck (1990: 336) concludes that "the evidence of style and vocabulary ... is ambiguous and not decisive." Barrett (1978: 576) provides a list of words used in chapter 21 but not in chapters 1–20. See also Breck (1992: 36), who notes that words unique to chapter 21 in John's Gospel are either "technical expressions linked to the fishing trade" (ἀλιεύω, πιάζω, αἰγιαλός, προσφάγιον, δίκτυον, σύρω, ἀποβαίνω) or particular expressions required by their respective contexts (πρωῖα, ἐπενδύτης, γυμνός, βόσκω, ἄρνιον, ποιμαίνω, προβάτιον [variant of πρόβατα, the more likely reading in 21:16–17]).

9 See Schlatter 1948: 363–77. Note, for example, the references to a charcoal fire in 21:9 and 18:18 and to "drawing" in 21:8 and 12:32, as well as the links between 21:20; 13:23; 1:18 (see Ellis 1992: 18–19). See also the common elements between the good shepherd discourse in chapter 10 and Peter's commissioning in 21:15–19 (Cassian 1956–57: 132–36 [cited in Minear 1983: 95 n. 24]). Minear (1983: 96–97) further notes the appellation of Thomas as "the twin" in 20:24 and 11:16; the references to Nathanael in 21:2 and 1:45–51 and to Cana in chapters 2, 4, and 21; and several other terminological and thematic connections. Gaventa (1996: 245) notes the similarity between μετὰ ταῦτα (meta tauta, after these things) in 21:1 and 19:38. To this may be added the term "Sea of Tiberias" (21:1; cf. 6:1); Simon Peter "son of John" (21:15; cf. 1:42); Jesus' taking (λαμβάνω, lambanō) and distributing (δίδωμι, didōmi) bread (21:13; cf. 6:11 [close verbal parallels with 6:11, where Jesus' giving thanks is explicitly mentioned, may imply thanksgiving in 21:13]); the double ἀμήν (amēn, truly) (21:18; cf., e.g., 1:51); the connection between Peter's and Jesus' death established by the evangelist's parenthetical comment (21:19; cf. 12:33); Jesus' call for his disciples to "follow" him (21:19, 22; cf. 1:43); and other verbal links, grammatical features, and thematic connections (Osborne 1981: 294). Spencer (1999) finds the following "narrative echoes" of earlier portions in John's narrative: (1) the feeding of the five thousand (ch. 6); (2) Peter's threefold denial (18:15–18, 25–27); (3) the footwashing and the final meal (13:3–5, 36–38); and (4) the good shepherd discourse (10:1–18). Note, however, that Spencer considers chapter 21 to be a “later redactional addition” (p. 68).

32 So, for example, R. Brown (1970: 1076), who sees the origin of the number in authentic eyewitness, citing 21:24. Note also the presence of the sons of Zebedee, according to 21:2. Large numbers elsewhere in John are meant literally as well (e.g., 2:6; 12:3); Schlatter (1948: 368) notes that the large number of fish caught points to Jesus' generous, abundant provision, citing 2:6; 6:13. More questionable are Burge's (2000: 586) reference to 153 being “numerically important” for “Greek mathematicians” and Bultmann's (1971: 709) assertion that the number is allegorical “since it is not a round number.” For proper cautions against allegorical interpretations, see Ridderbos 1997: 663.

34 Witherington (1995: 354) considers this to be “a fellowship meal, a family reunion of a sort” (similarly, Michaels 1989: 356, 358), contra those who would detect the presence of “eucharistic symbolism” (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1098–1100; D. M. Smith 1999: 394; Stibbe 1993: 212; Whitacre 1999: 494). In fact, Beasley-Murray (1999: 404) points out that what is celebrated here is not Jesus' death but his resurrection, which enabled his followers to enjoy fellowship with their Lord subsequent to his death. He classifies the present meal as “an epiphany celebration of the risen Lord” (following Rissi 1979: 81–86). Schlatter (1948: 369) says that the disciples' present disposition fulfills 16:23.

3 Barrett (1978: 586) detects in the reference to the beloved disciple as “following” Jesus (and Peter) in 21:20 yet another hint at this disciple's superiority over Peter: “The beloved disciple was already doing what Peter had just been bidden to do” (yet see the skepticism voiced by R. Brown [1970: 1108]). Schlatter (1948: 372–73) notes how the beloved disciple here, as elsewhere in the Gospel (at his first recorded encounter with Jesus [1:37], at his entry into the high priest's courtyard, and at the cross), is the silent listener.

22 Carson (1991: 684) adduces 1:14; 3:2, 11; 20:2; 1 John 1:2, 4, 5, 6, 7; 3 John 12; 2 Cor. 12:2–4; Schlatter (1948: 376), with reference to John 3:2 and 20:2, where the speaker is included in the plural, speaks of the possible presence of collaborators. Minear (1983: 95) believes that 1:14–18 and 21:24 are intended by the evangelist “to enclose his entire message to his audience.”

Wallace (1996: 399) lists the present passage as a (debatable) example of the exclusive “we,” “in which the first-person plural restricts the group to the author and his associates” (p. 397).

12 Karl Gottlieb Bretschneider (1776–1848) pioneered an approach to John's Gospel that dated it to the late second century and rejected its veracity at most points (see Baird 1992: 312–14). In contrast, Bretschneider's contemporary Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834) believed that “the Gospel of John bears such undeniable signs of authenticity, and so reveals on every page the eyewitness and personal participant, that one must be prejudiced and diverted from the natural course so as to doubt its authenticity” (cited in Baird 1992: 214).

26 The terminology in 2:19 is similar to, but not identical with, Mark 14:58: John 2:19 uses λύω, ἐν + dative, and ἐγείρω; Mark 14:58 has καταλύω, δία + genitive, and οἰκοδομέω; τὸν ναὸν τοῦτον is shared. But note the use of ἐν + dative in Mark 15:29 (and Matt. 27:40), which leads Schlosser (1990: 400–402) to conclude that John depends on Mark in his account of the clearing of the temple. However, see the thorough analysis by Ådna (2000: 179–89), who comes to the opposite conclusion, that neither Mark nor Matthew/Luke served as literary sources for John's account of the clearing of the temple. Jeremias (1971: 221) notes that both ἐν + dative and διὰ + genitive are based on the Semitic לְ.

14 Haenchen (1984: 1.117) holds that 1:6–8 represents a rather clumsy insertion into the original hymn. Bultmann (1971: 49) believes that the material is inserted to counter veneration of John the Baptist (cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.249–50). Ridderbos (1997: 42) ardently defends the prologue’s unity. Moloney (1998: 37) notes that 1:6–8 is essential to the prologue in its current form.

22 Moloney (1998: 35) says that πρὸς connotes motion, not just “with,” and translates it “turned toward.” Yet any force of motion inherent in πρὸς is overridden by the stative verb (Wallace 1996: 358–59; Schnackenburg [1990: 1.234] also rejects the idea). Lindars (1972: 84) proposes “in company with,” while Westcott (1908: 1.6) writes, “The personal being of the Word was realised in active intercourse with and in perfect communion with God.” Bultmann (1971: 32–33) suggests that ἦν πρὸς is a Semitism equivalent to παρά plus the dative.

31 So the majority of commentators, including Morris 1995: 66; Carson 1991: 137; Haenchen 1984: 1.113–14; Schnackenburg 1970: 1.239–40; Barrett 1978: 156–57; and Schlatter 1948: 5–6. Among the translations that construe ὁ γέγονεν with what precedes are the NASB, NIV, NKJV, ISV, NLT, HCSB, ESV, and TNIV.

32 Note the comment on this alternative by Metzger (1994: 168): “whatever that may be supposed to mean.” In Metzger’s dissenting opinion (the majority of the UBS translation committee favors taking the phrase with what follows) he states, “Despite valiant attempts of commentators to bring sense out of taking ὁ γέγονεν with what follows, the passage remains intolerably clumsy and opaque” (similarly, Schnackenburg, cited by Ashton 1986: 172). Among the major translations, only the NRSV prefers this alternative. Commentators who advocate this option are R. Brown (1966: 6–7), Bultmann (1971: 39–40, esp. n. 4), Beasley-Murray (1999: 1–2, esp. n. a), and Whitacre (1999: 52). See also E. Miller (1989), who integrates his belief that the phrase is to be taken with what follows into his larger thesis that 1:1a–b and 1:3–5 constitute a christological hymn in four strophes extolling the salvation-historical activity of the Word (he considers 1:1c and 1:2 to be interpolations). Brodie (1993: 138), because of the lack of punctuation, sees the text as inherently ambiguous and as being “part of a careful literary strategy” designed to focus on “the continuity between creation and the incarnation, between creation and redemption.”

37 “Overcome” or an equivalent is favored also by Morris 1995: 76; Moloney 1998: 36; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.245–46; Laney 1992: 39; Lindars 1972: 87; Schlatter 1948: 9 (“καταλαμβάνω never means ‘understand’ in John”); and Westcott 1908: 1.9–10. Carson (1991: 138) thinks that John might have both meanings (“overcome” and “comprehend”) in mind (so also Whitacre 1999: 53) and likes the ambiguity in BAGD’s translation, “master” (see BDAG 520). Keener (2003: 387) believes that John’s use of κατέλαβεν in 1:5 is an instance of traductio, a play on the multiple meanings of a word (here “comprehend” and “overcome”). Keener notes that the word occurs in Wis. 7:30 but admits that there the term clearly means “overcome” and no wordplay is present. Burge (2000: 56) agrees that both are at work, but he sees “overcome” as being dominant. Calvin (1959: 12) translates “comprehend.” The major translations divide more or less evenly between the two options, usually mentioning the one not chosen in a footnote: (1) NIV: “understood”; NASB, NKJV: “comprehend”; (2) NLT: “extinguish”; NET: “mastered”; ISV: “put out”; HCSB, ESV, NRSV: “overcome.” Notably, the TNIV changed the NIV’s “understood” to “overcome.”

45 Among those who take 1:9 as a preliminary reference to the incarnation are Ridderbos 1997: 43; Carson 1991: 122; Borchert 1996: 112–13; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.255; Laney 1992: 41. Moloney (1998: 37) sees a hint to the incarnation already in 1:3c–4. There also may be an implied contrast with Hellenistic religions that offered false “light.”

50 Schnackenburg (1990: 1.256) claims that the reference is not to Jesus’ earthly ministry but to Israel’s history prior to the incarnation. Similarly, R. Brown (1966: 30) cites the parallel of Wisdom in 1 Enoch 42:2: “Wisdom came to make her dwelling place among the children of men and found no dwelling place.” More likely, the reference is anticipatory of the Word’s incarnation in 1:14 (Culpepper 1980–81: 13–14; Carson 1991: 122; Ridderbos 1997: 43; Moloney 1998: 37). On a literal level, see the reference in Luke 2:7 that there was “no guest room available” (TNIV) for Jesus and his parents at his birth, which may have spiritual overtones as well.

69 Pryor (1990: 202 n. 6), in interaction with Schnackenburg, sees in 1:14–18 a polemic using the language of Exod. 33–34: whereas God’s tent was pitched outside the camp of Israel and Moses was denied the vision of God’s glory, Jesus’ followers had the grace of the incarnate Word dwelling among them and have seen his glory.

71 Ridderbos (1997: 53) renders ὥς as “in keeping with his nature as” (cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270), R. Brown (1966: 13) as “in the quality of.”

85 See also Bultmann 1971: 78; Lindars 1972: 97; Bruce 1983: 43; Beasley-Murray 1999: 15; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.275–76.

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV (“God the only Son”) and NLT (“his only Son, who is himself God”) adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: “the one and only [Son], who is himself God.” Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e; Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

3 For an extensive summary of reconstructions, see Beasley-Murray 1999: 22; cf.

Schnackenburg 1990: 1.285. Witherington (1995: 68) proposes that 1:35–2:11 describes three days, the first being narrated in 1:35–42, the second in 1:43–51, and the third in 2:1–12. Note also Moloney (1998: 50–51), who suggests that 1:19–2:11 represents an allusion to the giving of the law in Exod. 19.

24 So Ridderbos 1997: 66 n. 10; Morris 1995: 122; Carson 1991: 144; Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292; contra R. Brown 1966: 44; Moloney 1998: 52. While thus the delegation included some Pharisees, this does not mean that the Pharisees were responsible for sending out the delegation, since the Sadducees had a majority on the Sanhedrin (Carson 1991:

144). This is true especially if an article is to be added (or implied) before ἀπεσταλμένοι (Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Barrett 1978: 174; R. Brown 1966: 43–44; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292). Ἀπεσταλμένοι ἦσαν (apestalmenoi ēsan, they had been sent) is a periphrastic pluperfect (Wallace [1996: 586] calls it “consummative”).

26 Cf. Mark 1:2–5; Matt. 3:1–10; Luke 3:3–14. So Morris 1995: 123; Beasley-Murray 1999: 24; Carson 1991: 145–46; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.293.

69 Ridderbos (1997: 84) thinks that this identification is all the more likely since Peter learns about Jesus from his brother Andrew and this unnamed disciple (1:41) and since Peter and John are closely associated in this and the other Gospels (so also Schlatter 1948: 55; more cautious assessments are found in Borchert 1996: 143; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.310; Carson 1991: 154). Note also the connection between Andrew and John in the Muratorian Canon (Bettenson 1967: 28). Michaels (1989: 37) thinks that the second disciple is Philip. Keener (2003: 468) likewise sees “no reason” to identify the other disciple with the beloved disciple, since he is not mentioned until 13:23. On a literary level, this is self-evident, but the absence of “beloved disciple” language prior to 13:23 does not seem to rule out the possibility that the apostle John appears in the Johannine narrative as a historical character that is left unnamed.

79 Cf. Matt. 16:16–19; see Schnackenburg 1990: 1.312–13; R. Brown 1966: 80; Beasley-Murray 1987: 27; Carson 1984: 368. It must be noted, however, that the evangelist himself does not comment explicitly, apparently leaving it up to the reader to draw the proper inference (see Barrett 1978: 183).

89 The identification of Nathanael with Bartholomew is favored by Ridderbos 1997: 87–88; Morris 1995: 143; Carson 1991: 159; Burge 2000: 77; contra Barrett 1978: 184; R. Brown 1966: 82; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.314. Barrett (1978: 179, 184) conjectures that the meaning of the name “Nathanael,” “God has given,” indicates that he represents an “ideal disciple” and that the passage should be interpreted allegorically. Somewhat along similar lines, Witherington (1995: 71) suggests that Nathanael’s name implies that the disciples are the Father’s gift to Jesus. It seems, however, that these kinds of conjectures leave the realm of well-founded exegesis and veer into the sphere of ultimately unverifiable speculation (see the critiques by Morris [1995: 143] and Carson [1991: 159], both of whom defend Nathanael’s and the event’s historicity). Hanhart (1970: 24–25) identifies Nathanael as Matthew; Hill (1997) somewhat cautiously advances the theory that Nathanael is identical with James of Alphaeus (cf. Epistle to the Apostles 2 [second century A.D.]).

101 Contra Bultmann 1971: 104; R. Brown 1966: 83, 499–501. Schnackenburg (1990: 1.316) describes Nathanael as “a genuine Israelite,” then states in a footnote—wrongly—that this is an adverbial usage. Other instances of the adverb include 4:42; 6:14, 55 (v.l.); 7:26, 40; 8:31; 17:8. 105 C. Koester 1990a: 23–34; cf. Barrett 1978: 185; Nicklas (2000b: 201–2) is less than convinced. Other commentators consider the reference to be incidental, intended to show merely that Jesus “knew” Nathanael prior to their actual encounter (Ridderbos 1997: 90; cf. Burge 2000: 78; R. Brown 1966: 83; Moloney 1998: 56; contra Morris 1995: 146; Witherington 1995: 71; Borchert 1996: 148; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.317). Keener (2003: 486), too, rejects any deeper significance in the identification, suggesting that the fig tree may be mentioned simply because a specific landmark was necessary for some reason. Witherington’s suggestion that Nathanael is being portrayed as an expert in the law who thus would know that the Messiah could not come from Nazareth seems far-fetched.

109 Though contrast “king of Israel” with “king of the Jews” (Schnackenburg 1990: 1.318). “King of Israel” is the designation used by Palestinian Jews (1:49; 12:13; cf. Mark 15:32; Matt. 27:42); “king of the Jews” is the term employed by Gentiles and Diaspora Jews (John 18:33, 39; 19:3, 19; cf. Luke 23:37–39).

122 The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. 65, was published in 1998 by the Egypt Exploration Society (see pp. 12–13). Among commentators, “Chosen One of God” is favored by Morris 1995: 134; Carson 1991: 152; Burge 1987: 59–61; 2000: 74; Barrett 1978: 178; R. Brown 1966: 57; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.305. “Son of God” is the reading advocated by Bultmann 1971: 92–93 n. 6; Borchert 1996: 139; Ridderbos 1997: 77; Beasley-Murray 1999: 21 n. g; Laney 1992: 53 (though all prior to the discovery of P¹⁰⁶). Rodgers (1999: 304) prefers both (“This is the only, the chosen Son of God”), while Michaels (1989: 36) proposes that the Baptist spoke “Chosen One of God” (hence the MS tradition), which the evangelist interpreted as “Son of God.”

7 It is doubtful that the reference to “the third day” represents an allusion to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 102; Carson 1991: 167; Burge 2000: 90; contra Borchert 1996: 153; Stibbe 1993: 46; Keener 2003: 497–98). The reference serves as a chronological connective with preceding events, perhaps indicating that the promise of 1:51 was quickly fulfilled (Beasley-Murray 1999: 34, citing Schnackenburg 1990: 1.325; cf. Talbert [1992: 86], who says that 2:1–11 serves as fulfillment of the prophecy in 1:51; and D. M. Smith [1999: 86], who speaks of the “first installment . . . of the revelation promised in 1:51”). The beginning of Jesus’ final week is signaled in 12:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 189–90).

29 Though this is denied by most commentators (e.g., Morris 1995: 160–61; Barrett 1978: 191; Carson 1991: 174; R. Brown 1966: 100; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.332).

24 The LXX reads “has consumed me” (Moloney 1998: 77). Unlike in 2:22 and 12:16, the present reference does not refer to the postresurrection period, but to the actual situation (so Ridderbos 1997: 116; Carson 1991: 180; R. Brown 1966: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.347; Barrett 1978: 198; contra Witherington 1995: 88; Bultmann 1971: 122).

34 Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.344; Barrett 1978: 195; R. Brown 1966: 117; Witherington 1995: 85–86; Borchert 1996: 160; Bultmann 1971: 122; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38–39; Dodd 1963: 162; Lindars 1972: 135–37; Keener 2003: 518–19. Keener contends that it is historically implausible that Jesus would challenge the temple system by overturning tables and yet continue in public ministry for two or three years afterward, sometimes even visiting Jerusalem (though he notes that Jesus faces considerable hostility there when he does). On the contrary, an early temple cleansing accounts well for Jewish hostility toward Jesus early on (5:18), and Jesus’ continuing in ministry for two or three more years is eminently plausible historically in light of Jesus’ pattern of withdrawal (3:22; 6:15; 7:9–10; 8:59; 10:40) and his caution from the very inception of his ministry because his “time” has not yet come (2:4; 7:6). Borchert (1996: 160) contends that two temple clearings are “a historiographic monstrosity that has no basis in the texts of the Gospels.” Kreitzer (1998: 100–101) claims that the evangelist followed the motto “When the details of history no longer serve the functions of the story—discard them.” R. Brown (1966: 118) concludes that Jesus uttered some prophetic saying concerning the destruction of the temple on his first visit but actually cleansed the temple at the end of his ministry. Wallace (1996: 561 n. 20) notes that this would require a crucifixion date of A.D. 33.

3 Moloney (1998: 90) and R. Brown (1966: 149) believe that Jesus’ words continue through

3:21; Witherington (1995: 99) thinks that the evangelist takes over in 3:12, or at least by 3:16. Schnackenburg (1990: 1.360, citing others as well) places the start of the evangelist's reflections at 3:13.

26 Note in 3:5 the single Greek preposition governing both "water" and "spirit" (Ridderbos 1997: 127). Some have suggested that "born of water" refers to water baptism, be it John the Baptist's or Christian baptism, or both (Schnackenburg 1990: 1.369; Barrett 1978: 203, 208–9; R. Brown 1966: 141–42; Ridderbos 1997: 127–28; Beasley-Murray 1999: 49; Michaels 1989: 57). But it would hardly have been meaningful for Jesus to inform Nicodemus that he must be baptized in order to go to heaven. Nothing in the context indicates that this is the case, and it is unlikely that Jesus would have expected Nicodemus already to have known this. Moreover, the emphasis here is on the Spirit's activity, not on human ritual observance (Morris 1995: 193).

34 It may be too early in Jesus' ministry for his disciples to be included (Carson 1991: 198–99; contra Ridderbos 1997: 134; Morris 1995: 196). Schnackenburg's (1990: 1.376) solution, that Jesus' statement is proleptic, looking "forward to the time when his disciples make his 'testimony' their own, as part of their preaching" (with reference to 3:22 and 9:4), likewise fails to convince. There is also no need to postulate that the "we" aligns Jesus with the OT prophets, reflects the Johannine community (Witherington 1995: 98; cf. Moloney 1998: 94), or denotes the church versus the synagogue (Barrett 1978: 211; Brodie 1993: 198).

37 Cf. Morris 1995: 196; Carson 1991: 199; R. Brown 1966: 132; Beasley-Murray 1999: 50; Witherington 1995: 98; Moloney 1998: 94; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.377; contra Barrett 1978: 212.

44 Contra Schnackenburg (1990: 1.399), who places heavy emphasis on the incarnation rather than the crucifixion. Morris (1995: 203) and others believe that both the incarnation and the crucifixion are in view.

4 Some scholars (e.g., Witherington 1995: 108; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.411–12) suggest that it is those disciples of Jesus who had been followers of the Baptist who continued John's baptism, but this unduly shifts the focus regarding the nature of Jesus' ministry from Jesus to his disciples.

9 It is not necessary to postulate that here the evangelist is addressing those who had remained followers of John the Baptist in his day (Carson 1991: 210; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 146; Morris 1995: 211; contra R. Brown 1966: 156; Barrett 1978: 219; Witherington 1995: 107; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.410).

25 See Carson 1991: 217; Witherington 1995: 120; Morris 1995: 228; Burge 2000: 142; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.424. As part of a series of putative "wisdom" parallels, Witherington (1995: 119) proposes that the Samaritan woman is depicted as the maidservant of Wisdom. I find this background reconstruction unconvincing.

30 See Maccini 1996: 131–44. Daube (1956: 375–82) argues that "do not associate with" specifically refers to Jews not sharing vessels with Samaritans (cf. NIV text and note at 4:9). However, no common utensils (such as the woman's water jar) are specifically mentioned in 4:9. The explanatory aside, "For Jews have no dealings with [συγγρχῶνται] Samaritans," probably is broader than the mere refusal to share drinking vessels (Ridderbos 1997: 154; Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. f; contra Carson 1991: 218; Borchert 1996: 203; Witherington 1995: 120; R. Brown 1966: 170; Morris 1995: 229; Barrett 1978: 232; Moloney 1998: 117, 121; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.425 n. 19).

34 Borchert (1996: 203) sees the "gift of God" as the realization of God's promises; Morris

161, 161n73, 162, 163, 164, 165, 165n83, 166, 168, 168n4, 169n7, 169n11, 170, 171, 172, 172n22, 173n1, 182, 182n39, 184, 186, 187, 187n56, 190n78, 191n81, 194n102,

(1995: 230) and Carson (1991: 218) identify it as eternal life, the latter with reference to the Torah (cf. R. Brown 1966: 176, 178–79); Schnackenburg (1990: 1.431) suggests that the gift is either the Holy Spirit or eternal life, or both; Burge (2000: 144) thinks that the reference is to the Spirit.

37 See also Tg. Neof. of Gen. 28:10 (referring to the well at Haran; see Díaz 1963: 76–77), and the Samaritan liturgy for the Day of Atonement cited in Carson 1991: 220 (cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.430–32).

53 For a helpful discussion contrasting biblical with Hellenistic concepts of God, see Schnackenburg 1990: 1.440.

73 Somewhat similar, though in a context of judgment, is Jer. 51:33 (Schnackenburg 1990: 1.149 n. 86). Ensor (2000: 16) notes that the word θερισμός (therismos, harvest) occurs on Jesus' lips—but not those of the evangelists—in both John and the Synoptics, which supports the authenticity of John 4:35 as a saying uttered by Jesus (note also the instances that Ensor cites on p. 16 n. 17).

83 An implied contrast with the Roman emperor is favored in Morris 1995: 251 n. 98; Beasley-Murray 1999: 65; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 1.458. C. Koester (1990b: 678) contends that the Samaritans' designation of Jesus as “Savior of the world” is part of the Johannine kingship theme, in contrast to the Jews' disavowal of Jesus as their king in 19:15 (“We have no king but Caesar”). Koester also points to the Roman presence in Samaria as evidence for the countercultural nature of the Samaritans' confession of Jesus (rather than the Roman emperor) as “Savior of the world” (pp. 678–79).

4 One school of interpretation identifies πατρίς (patris, homeland, hometown) in 4:44 with Jerusalem (so Barrett 1978: 246; Dodd 1953: 352; 1963: 238–41; Meeks 1966; 1967: 39–40; see, much earlier, Origen, Commentarii in evangelium Joannis 13.54–56, cited in van Belle 1998: 30). However, see the critiques by W. Davies (1974: 321–31) and Stimpfle (1992: 89) as summarized by van Belle (1998: 30–32). The Galilee/Nazareth explanation is found already in Augustine (cited by van Belle 1998: 33) and is defended by Stimpfle (1992: 86–96 [followed by van Belle 1998: 27–44]) and others (see van Belle 1998: 32–33; see also Ridderbos 1997: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 73; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.463). Still others think that both Galilee and Judea are in view (Carson 1991: 235–36; Burge 2000: 151–52; Witherington 1995: 126; W. Davies 1974: 321–31).

7 So Carson 1991: 234; Ridderbos 1997: 174–75; Morris 1995: 255; Borchert 1996: 219–20; Burge 2000: 152–53; Witherington 1995: 127; contra R. Brown 1966: 193; Barrett 1978: 245; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.471–75; Bultmann 1971: 205.

11 So Carson 1991: 238; Morris 1995: 256; Borchert 1996: 219; R. Brown 1966: 190; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.465.

22 The numbering of the two Cana signs has suggested to some the existence of a “signs source” (Bultmann 1971: 206; Fortna 1970; 1989; Whitacre 1999: 116). However, this inference is not a necessary one (Ridderbos 1997: 178; Carson 1991: 178; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; contra Barrett 1978: 246; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.469–71).

1 In light of the apparently abrupt reference to Jesus “crossing to the far shore of the Sea of Galilee” in 6:1 (ch. 5 has him in Jerusalem), it has been speculated that chapters 5 and 6 should be reversed (see Bultmann 1971: 209, 237; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.92); but see Carson 1991:

240; Morris 1995: 264; cf. Barrett 1978: 23–24; Borchert 1996: 250; and especially Ridderbos 1997: 183.

39 God’s judgment: Ridderbos 1997: 189; Barrett 1978: 255; Gehenna or Hades: Beasley-Murray 1999: 74; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.98; eternal consequences: Morris 1995: 272; Witherington 1995: 139.

56 See Carson 1991: 251; Borchert 1996: 238; Barrett 1978: 259; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.104; Westcott 1908: 1.190.

78 As Lee (1994: 104) notes, following Schnackenburg, instead of summoning three witnesses in 5:32–47, Jesus ultimately is only calling upon the witness of God, “whose testimony is effected through” John the Baptist, Jesus’ own works, and the Scriptures.

81 That “another” refers to God the Father represents a broad consensus among commentators: so Ridderbos 1997: 202; Morris 1995: 288; Moloney 1998: 190; Beasley-Murray 1999: 78; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.121; Barrett 1978: 264; R. Brown 1966: 224.

102 Schnackenburg 1990: 1.470 n. 139, with reference to Meeks 1967: 254–55.

108 So the majority of commentators, including Barrett 1978: 250–51; Carson 1991: 240; Morris 1995: 265 n. 6; R. Brown (1966: 206), who says that the evidence is “overwhelming”; Beasley-Murray 1999: 69 n. e; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.93.

109 Hengel (1999: 309) comments, “One should by all means read ‘Bethesda’ ”; so also Carson 1991: 241; Morris 1995: 267; Witherington 1995: 137; Borchert 1996: 231; Moloney 1998: 171; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94; Schlatter 1948: 142; undecided are Ridderbos 1997: 185; R. Brown 1966: 206–7.

110 So Fee 1982 and the vast majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 185; Carson 1991: 242; Morris 1995: 267; Barrett 1978: 253; R. Brown 1966: 207; Beasley-Murray 1999: 70 n. h; Bultmann 1971: 241 n. 4; Borchert 1996: 232; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94–95.

1 A comparison between John’s account of the feeding of the five thousand and that of the Synoptics makes clear that John provides his own independent account (see esp. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.23–24; and the table in Anderson 1996: 187–88). John mentions several details that are not found in any of the other Gospels, such as the crossing of the sea (6:1); the approaching Passover (6:4); the involvement of Philip and Andrew (6:7–8); the fact that the five loaves contributed by the boy were made of barley (6:9); and Jesus’ command to his disciples to gather all the fragments so that nothing would be lost (6:12).

11 See Carson 1991: 269; also R. Brown 1966: 233; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.15. Note the personal pronoun setting Jesus apart from Philip and the verbs ᾔδει (ēdei, he knew; indicating prior knowledge) and ἐμελλεν (emellen, he was about; conveying certainty not associated with simple future) (Morris 1995: 304 n. 16). Compare also the reference to Jesus’ supernatural insight in 2:24.

14 Philo writes that barley products are “suited for irrational animals and people in unhappy circumstances” (Spec. Laws 3.10 §57). The more well-to-do preferred wheat bread (Spec. Laws 2.29 §175; see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.442 n. 25), which was traded at twice or even three times the value of barley (2 Kings 7:1, 16, 18; Rev. 6:6; m. Ketub. 5.8).

43 So Barrett 1978: 287; cf. Witherington 1995: 155; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.38; Burge 1987: 84–85. Less likely, the reference may be to his consecration (R. Brown 1966: 261) or to the incarnation (Moloney 1998: 211). On the phrase “seal of approval,” see commentary at 3:33.

49 Cf. Exod. Rab. 9.1; b. B. Meṣi’a 59b. Some of the rabbis, however, remained critical toward such signs (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.39–40).

209, 211, 211n60, 212, 214, 214n68, 215, 215n72, 215n74, 216, 216n79, 217, 217n84, 219n93, 220n96, 221, 222n106, 223, 229n4, 229n8, 230, 231n14, 231n17, 236n36,

60 See discussion at 6:30. The second καί (kai, and) in 6:36 probably is adversative (so Barrett 1978: 293). The majority of commentators consider the word με (me, me) in 6:36 to be original (so Ridderbos 1997: 230 n. 120; Carson 1991: 289–90; Morris 1995: 325 n. 104; R. Brown 1966: 270; contra Barrett 1978: 293; Moloney 1998: 216; see also the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 85; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.46).

68 There is a certain affinity between John's teaching on predestination and the Qumran doctrine of the "two spirits" (1QS 3:14–4:6). The rabbinic view is summed up by a saying attributed to Rabbi Akiba (ca. A.D. 135): "All is foreseen, but freedom of choice is given" (m. Abot 3.16). Cf. Josephus, Ant. 18.1.3 §13; 18.1.4 §16; 18.1.5 §18; J.W. 2.8.14 §§162–65; see also the excursus in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.265–70.

72 So Ridderbos 1997: 235–37; cf. Carson 1991: 295; Morris 1995: 331–32; contra Moloney 1998: 223; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.55; Lindars 1972: 267; Talbert 1992: 140. As Keener (2003: 690) observes, "John's words [in 6:27–63] invite his audience to look to Christ's death itself, not merely those symbols which point to his death." At best, any such overtones are derivative (Borchert 1996: 270–71; cf. Brodie 1993: 286; Calvin 1959: 170).

74 There is no reason to assume, as Bultmann (1971: 218–19) does, that these verses (starting with 6:51c) are the work of an "ecclesiastical redactor." See also the discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.56–59.

79 There is no reason to conclude, on the basis of the present tense participles in this verse, that this partaking is an act to be repeated (contra Ridderbos 1997: 243; Morris 1995: 336). The logic of this section rather seems to demand that partaking of Jesus' flesh and blood is to be understood as an action that takes place once for all. Mutual indwelling ought not to be understood in egalitarian terms, as if Jesus and the believer were fulfilling equal roles. Jesus' sacrifice is foundational, and the believer's responsibility is the appropriation of this gift (Carson 1991: 298). Moreover, contrary to what might be expected, such mutual indwelling does not imply surrender of personality (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.63–64).

84 Contra Schnackenburg (1990: 2.61), who suggests that John makes the sacrament an essential ceremony to gain eternal life because he was writing against a gnostic or docetic group within the Johannine community. Schnackenburg also (erroneously, in my opinion) suggests that eternal life, while gained through birth of water and the Spirit, must be maintained through participation in the sacrament.

93 Note that "flesh" here takes on a different meaning than in the preceding discourse, where it referred to Jesus' body (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 247; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.72).

96 So Moloney 1998: 231; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.75; Wallace (1996: 658) translates it "as a result of this"; Barrett (1978: 306) opts for both.

106 So Carson 1991: 267; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 208–9; Barrett 1978: 272; Witherington 1995: 385; contra R. Brown 1966: 235–36; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.5–9.

4 Beasley-Murray (1999: 106 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.143]) plausibly suggests that the references to the Jews in 7:1 and 7:13 form an inclusio, rendering the passage an introduction to the following narrative.

8 See Laney 1992: 138–39. The background for this may be the brothers' memory of Jesus' feat at the wedding of Cana (2:1–12) and his subsequent apparent popularity in Jerusalem (2:23–25; Ridderbos 1997: 257–58; Barrett 1978: 311). Kruse (2003: 182) proposes that the recent defection of many disciples may have been to the detriment of the family honor, which Jesus’ brothers wanted restored. Ποιᾶ καὶ ζητεῖ in 7:4 represents Hebraic parataxis (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.139).

14 Schnackenburg 1990: 2.142. Barrett (1978: 313) notes the similar dynamic at a different time in Jesus’ ministry (Mark 9:30; 10:1).

17 The use of ζητέω (zēteō, look for) in 7:11 reinforces the hostile intent from its use in 7:1 (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.143).

36 The καί (kai, but) preceding ἀπ’ ἑμαυτοῦ (ap’ emautou, on my own accord) is adversative (Ridderbos 1997: 268 n. 45; Barrett 1978: 323; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.147). The ἐγώ (egō, I) at the beginning of 7:29 is emphatic, set against the ὑμεῖς (hymeis, you) in 7:28 (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.147). The alternating use of two words meaning “send,” πέμπω (pempō) and ἀποστέλλω (apostellō), in 7:28–29 represents stylistic variation (Morris 1995: 367 n. 58; Barrett 1978: 323; R. Brown 1966: 313).

41 There is no need to charge the evangelist here with “ignorance” or lack of “concern for accuracy,” as do Barrett (1978: 324) and, less strongly, Schnackenburg (1990: 2.149).

42 This is the first occurrence of the frequent Johannine phrase indicating that Jesus will return to “him who sent me” (Ridderbos 1997: 271). The term ὑπάγω (hypagō, go) is favored by John (32 times, compared to 19 times in Matthew, 15 in Mark, and 5 in Luke; see Morris 1995: 369 n. 67; Moloney 1998: 250; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.476 n. 47). It is used seventeen times to refer to Jesus’ departure to the Father.

45 Cf. 11:50–52. So Beasley-Murray 1999: 112; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.150; Bultmann 1971: 309. Ridderbos (1997: 271–72) thinks that it merely indicates a presumed place of refuge for Jesus. Schlatter (1948: 150) sees in 7:35 not only an objection that Jesus’ departure from Jerusalem would compromise the Jews’ privilege as God’s chosen people but also an acknowledgment of the oppressive superiority of Greek learning, the profundity of the Greeks’ antipathy toward the Jews, and the firmness of religious traditions in Greek-speaking areas.

47 See R. Brown 1966: 314; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.150; Schlatter 1948: 198. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 271), who opts for Greek-speaking Diaspora Jews. Carson (1991: 320 [cf. Barrett 1978: 325; Witherington 1995: 173]) thinks that Gentile proselytes probably are in view.

53 Most commentators favor a time immediately following cessation of ceremonies on the eighth day (Carson 1991: 321; Morris 1995: 373, esp. n. 79; Barrett 1978: 326; Moloney 1998: 256; Schlatter 1948: 199). Some believe that Jesus’ words fit better with the ceremonies of the seventh day (R. Brown 1966: 320; Bultmann 1971: 302 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.152; Ridderbos 1997: 272; Burge 2000: 227). On the water-drawing ceremony, see Keener 2003: 722–24.

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee’s observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus “from within him” refers to “whoever believes in me.” Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of “rivers of living water” (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987:

88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

62 See the material cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 79. See also Marcus 1998; and Schnackenburg (1990: 2.156), who connects κοιλία with the water flowing from Jesus’ side at 19:34.

67 The sharp disjunction drawn by several commentators between Jesus’ earthly and heavenly origins in John is overdrawn (cf. Ridderbos 1997: 278; Barrett 1978: 331; Schnackenburg 1980: 2.158). On the verb πιάζω (piazō, seize) in 7:44, see commentary at 7:30.

6 See Isa. 60:19–22; Zech. 14:5b–8; cf. Rev. 21:23–24. Contemporary Judaism applied the phrase “light of the world” not only to God but also to Israel, Jerusalem, the patriarchs, the Messiah, famous rabbis (e.g., Yohanan ben Zakkai), the Torah, the temple, and even Adam (Keener 1993: 285; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 128; R. Brown 1966: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.190; Moloney 1998: 266). The universality of “light” symbolism in religious language issues in numerous non-Jewish parallels (see Barrett 1978: 335–37; Bultmann 1971: 40–44, 342–43; Dodd 1953: 201–8; Odeberg 1968: 286–92).

13 Morris (1995: 389 n. 10 [similarly, Laney 1992: 159]) suggests the following possibilities: “gives life,” “is life,” “springs from life,” or “illuminates life.” Schnackenburg (1990: 2.191) adds that this may be an instance of an exegetical genitive in the sense of “the life which frees a person from the sphere of death.”

14 Commentators vary as to whether to regard as synonyms the two words used in the present context for “true” or “valid,” ἀληθής (alēthēs; 8:13, 14, 17) and ἀληθινός (alēthinos; 8:16). Beasley-Murray (1999: 125 n. a [contra R. Brown 1966: 341; Lindars 1972: 317; Barrett 1978: 339]) opts to distinguish between the former meaning “true” or “valid” and the latter meaning “just” or “authentic” (similarly, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.194). Ridderbos (1997: 294) suggests the meaning “just” for ἀληθινός; Barrett (1978: 339) opts for “authentic”; and Carson (1991: 340) prefers “right.”

15 The words “where I have come from and where I am going” are an allusion to Jesus’ words in John 7 (7:28, 33–34) (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.193).

16 See Ridderbos 1997: 294; Carson 1991: 339; Beasley-Murray 1999: 129; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.192.

21 Schnackenburg 1990: 2.194; cf. Moloney 1998: 267; R. Brown 1966: 345. Carson (1991: 339 [cf. Burge 2000: 257]) denies the suggestion that κρίνω (krinō, judge) has the meaning “to pass judicial sentence” and the conclusion on that basis that Jesus came not to convict but to save.

32 “Sin” in 8:21 is in the singular, which may refer to the “cardinal sin of rejecting Jesus” (Barrett 1978: 340; Carson 1991: 341; R. Brown 1966: 350; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.197). Alternatively, “sin” may be used generically to refer to a person’s sinful state apart from Christ. The preposition ἐν (en, in) probably is locative (“in a state of sin”), though it also could be instrumental (“by reason of sin”) (Barrett 1978: 341; cf. Morris 1995: 395).

37 So Carson 1991: 344; Beasley-Murray 1999: 130–31; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.200. See especially Isa. 41:4; 43:10, 13, 25; 46:4; 48:12; cf. Deut. 32:39.

44 See Schnackenburg (1990: 2.202–3), who notes the following: (1) the verb γινώσκω (ginōskō, know) is always used positively in John; (2) the words are similar to 19:37, a quote of the salvation oracle Zech. 12:10; (3) 12:32 describes Jesus’ mission in terms of drawing “all [kinds of] people to himself”; and (4) 8:30–31 speaks positively about the Jews’ response.

47 So the majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 305–6; Carson 1991: 346–47; Morris 1995: 404; Beasley-Murray 1999: 132; D. M. Smith 1999: 185; Borchert 1996: 301

261n53, 262, 263, 265, 265n68, 266n71, 266n73, 266n74, 267, 269, 271, 272n101, 273n105, 274, 275, 275n112, 284n30, 285, 286n38, 286n40, 286n44, 287, 287n47,

n. 182; Burge 2000: 259; Bultmann 1971: 252 n. 2; contra R. Brown 1966: 354–55, 358; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.204–5; Moloney 1998: 277; Westcott 1908: 2.13–14.

53 Morris 1995: 405; cf. R. Brown 1966: 355; Borchert 1996: 303. Carson (1991: 348–49) suggests that truth in 8:32 is similar to the notion of “gospel,” that is, “the truth that has been revealed in and by Jesus” (cf. Barrett 1978: 344; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.205).

68 So Carson 1991: 352; R. Brown 1966: 357; Barrett 1978: 348; contra Ridderbos 1997: 313; Borchert 1996: 305; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.212.

71 Morris (1995: 410) and Barrett (1978: 348) claim to detect a contrast between Jesus’ λαλία (lalia, speech) and his λόγος (logos, word), but it is hard to see why these two terms should not be understood as rough synonyms, in keeping with Johannine style.

73 Note the absence of the personal pronoun with τοῦ πατρός (tou patros, of the father), which harks back to 8:38. Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 315. Τοῦ διαβόλου (tou diabolou, of the devil) stands in apposition to τοῦ πατρός rather than implying that the devil has a father (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.213). For a study of 8:31–59 taking 8:44 as its point of departure, see Motyer (1997: esp. 160–210), who argues that the present interchange does not serve an anti-Jewish purpose, but rather is designed to persuade Jews that Jesus is the Christ.

74 So Morris 1995: 411; Ridderbos 1997: 315; Carson 1991: 353; Barrett 1978: 349; Beasley-Murray 1999: 135; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.213; Moloney 1998: 280; Borchert 1996: 305–6. It was commonly recognized in Second Temple literature that death was the result of Satan’s initiative (Wis. 2:23–24; Sir. 25:24; cf. Rom. 5:12).

101 So Schnackenburg 1990: 2.222, citing 1 Enoch 61:5; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 13:52. Similarly, Bultmann (1971: 326 n. 2). Brodie (1993: 335) opts for a broader scope, suggesting that “Jesus’ day refers to the way in which, during his entire life, and especially in his death, he was revealed as the Anointed.” Similarly, Whitacre (1999: 230), who says that the expression encompasses Jesus’ “whole advent, ministry, death, resurrection and ascension.”

105 Cf. Isa. 43:10, 13; so Ball 1996: 195–96; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.224; Burge 2000: 263.

112 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 126 n. m; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.223; R. Brown 1966: 360; Bultmann 1971: 327 n. 3; contra Burge 2000: 263.

30 Barrett 1978: 358–59; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.243 (cited in Lee [1994: 167 n. 1], who also refers to Isa. 8:6 LXX). See Gen. Rab. 98.8; 99.8.

38 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.247) notes the active voice of ἀνέωξεν (aneōxen, he opened), saying that it “brings Jesus into prominence as healer and sabbath-breaker.”

40 The separation of οὗτος (houtos, this) from ὁ ἄνθρωπος (ho anthrōpos, the man) suggests that the comment is meant contemptuously (Morris 1995: 431). Barrett (1978: 360) construes the intent underlying the statement as follows: “‘He is not from God—this man’; and certainly he is no more than [a] man.” Both Morris (1995: 431) and Schnackenburg (1990: 2.248) believe that the word order is chosen by the evangelist to highlight the Pharisees’ ignorance of the incarnation and ill-conceived notion of distance between Jesus and God.

44 Contrast this with their contempt for the “people of the land” displayed in 7:49 (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.248). For a discussion of the reading σεαυτοῦ instead of αὐτοῦ in Codex Sinaiticus and P⁷⁵, see Bammel 1994: 455–56; Swanson 1995: 4.130.

47 Bultmann (1971: 335) states that the authorities “now hit on the idea of questioning the fact of the miracle, as being the easiest way of putting an end to the whole business.” Keener (2003:

786) notes how, incredibly, the Pharisees repeatedly ignore the testimony of the miracle itself, focusing instead on Jesus' alleged Sabbath violation. On "the Jews," see commentary at 5:10. Carson (1991: 368) attributes the shift from "Pharisees" to "the Jews" to John's penchant for stylistic variation. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.249) thinks that the change serves to indicate the "official character" of the inquiry. Duke (1985: 120, following Schnackenburg 1990: 2.248) suggests that the uneasiness of the Pharisees in 9:17–18 "is evident in the abrupt close of scene and their immediate change of tactic in what follows."

53 Ridderbos 1997: 343; similarly, Morris 1995: 434 n. 36; contra Barrett 1978: 361; R. Brown 1966: 380; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.250; Bultmann 1971: 335.

59 The perceptive reader will note that the Pharisees' claim to being disciples of Moses is refuted by the earlier statement in 5:45–47 (Keener 2003: 791). There is some debate as to how common this self-designation was among the Jews of Jesus' day (cf., e.g., Matt. 23:2). In b. Yoma 4a, it is applied to Pharisees as opposed to Sadducees. In m. Abot 5.19, Jews are referred to as "the disciples of Abraham," while Christians are dismissed as "the disciples of Balaam the wicked" (that is, Jesus!). Schnackenburg (1990: 2.251) and Ridderbos (1997: 345 n. 287, referring to TDNT 4:443) consider this to be a characteristic rabbinic self-designation, while Carson (1991: 373–74, apparently following Barrett 1978: 362–63) says that this self-designation was not common.

78 The emphatic pronoun σὺ (sy, you) points to the personal nature of faith (Morris 1995: 439) and draws a distinction between the man's positive response and the Pharisees' unbelief (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.253).

82 Borchert (1996: 325) relates the present reference to 20:28 and believes that this confession is a high point in the festival cycle. The man's response to Jesus' self-revelation is in keeping with the standard OT reaction to theophany (e.g., Gen. 17:3). However, it is possible that the man's actions, while being "beyond that due to other men," fall "short of that due to God Almighty" (Beasley-Murray 1999: 160; similarly, Carson 1991: 377). Nevertheless, the majority of commentators favor a fuller sense of worship (Barrett 1978: 365; R. Brown 1966: 376; Bultmann 1971: 339 n. 3; Morris 1995: 440; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.254).

83 The ἵνα (hina, that) here may convey purpose or combine purpose and result (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.255). Carson (1991: 377–78) observes, "That tragic conclusion is the foreseen result of Jesus' coming, and in that sense part of its purpose."

84 R. Brown (1966: 381–82) seeks to make a case for the baptismal significance of the healing of the blind man in this chapter (but see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.257–58; see also Ridderbos 1997: 337).

10 Later, Judas is called a thief (12:6), and Barabbas a robber (18:40; cf. Mark 15:7). At his arrest, Jesus asks why he is treated like a robber (Matt. 26:55 pars.), and in the end he is crucified with robbers on either side (Matt. 27:38, 44 pars.). The majority of commentators take both terms as referring to the same people (Ridderbos 1997: 354; Carson 1991: 381; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.281; contra Barrett 1978: 369). See further Hengel 1989a: 24–46; Simonis 1967: 101–3.

11 The lack of an article before ποιμήν (poimēn, shepherd) in 10:2 does not negate the specificity of the term (Ridderbos 1997: 354; Morris 1995: 446 n. 13, 453–54; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.282). Westcott (1908: 2.50) says that the "absence of the article fixes attention on the character as distinct from the person."

301n13, 302n18, 302n20, 302n21, 304n32, 306n42, 306n45, 308, 308n55, 311n68, 313, 314n79, 315n84, 315n85, 318, 318n98, 319, 322n8, 326n19, 329, 330, 335n68, 336n69,

13 The wording is reminiscent of OT passages such as Num. 27:15–17 and Ezek. 34:13. Carson (1991: 383 [cf. Barrett 1978: 369]) understands Num. 27:15–18 as a typological allusion to Christ (contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.293; Moloney 1998: 308). Ridderbos (1997: 354) also mentions Ps. 80:1.

18 Stibbe (1993: 113) characterizes παροιμία as “a symbolic word-picture with a cryptic meaning ... essentially elusive discourse.” Morris (1995: 445) suggests that this is a rather unique form of allegory. Ridderbos (1997: 355 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 168]) opts for a parable with allegorical elements (cf. 10:7–9). Bultmann (1971: 375) describes the genre as a mixture between parable and riddle. See Köstenberger 2002b: 72–75. See also the long discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.284–88.

20 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.288) suggests that πάλιν (palin, again) starts a new discussion. Carson (1991: 384) perceives that 10:7–9 does not necessarily expand on 10:1–5 but that it represents a treatment of the three dominant motifs (gate, shepherd, sheep) in those verses (cf. Barrett 1978: 370–71).

21 Some (e.g., Morris 1995: 450 n. 27; Barrett 1978: 371) seek to make a distinction between the meaning of ἡ θύρα τῶν προβάτων (hē thyra tōn probatōn, the door for the sheep) in 10:7 and ἡ θύρα (hē thyra, the gate) in 10:9, contending that in 10:7 Jesus is presented as the gate to the sheep, while in 10:9 he is the gate for the sheep. However, such a distinction is unnecessary (Carson 1991: 384; cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.289; Moloney 1998: 309).

32 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.294) proposes a translation “right” or “true.” Similarly, Borchert (1996: 333) suggests that the meaning of καλός is similar to that of ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) (cf. Moloney 1998: 310; Bultmann 1971: 364). Carson (1991: 386) contends that the “good shepherd” should be thought of as “noble or worthy” but not “sentimental or effeminate.” Lindars (1972: 361) favors the rendering “an ideal shepherd.”

42 Cf. 1:18; 5:19–20; 7:29; 8:19, 55; 14:7, 31; 17:23, 25; see Carson 1991: 387; Ridderbos 1997: 361–62. Καθώς (kathōs, just as) entails not only a comparative but also a causal dimension (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.297).

45 So the vast majority of commentators, including Barrett, Beasley-Murray, Burge, Carson, Moloney, Morris, Ridderbos, Schnackenburg, and Witherington. For Jewish material indicating that the Messiah would gather the Gentiles, see Hofius 1967.

55 So Morris 1995: 457; cf. Carson 1991: 390; Beasley-Murray 1999: 172; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.303; Burge 2000: 293.

68 Jesus’ references to his “sheep” are regularly followed by an assurance introduced by “and I” (καγὼ, kagō) (see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.307).

79 Cf. Mark 14:64 par.; see Bock 1998: es p. 234–37. See the brief discussion of Synoptic parallels in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.310. John 10:33 is the only occurrence of the term βλασφημία (blasphēmia, blasphemy) in this Gospel; the verb βλασφημέω (blasphēmeō, blaspheme) occurs only in 10:36. The expression καὶ ὅτι (kai hoti, even because) (adverbial καί) further clarifies the charge made by the Jews (Morris 1995: 467 n. 92). The participle ὄν (ōn, being) in 10:33 is concessive: “even though you are a mere man” (Wallace 1996: 634–35).

Ποιεῖς (poieis, you make) is identified by Ridderbos (1997: 372 n. 375) as a durative present.

84 See b. Abod. Zar. 5a. For a variation of the first view, see Jungkuntz 1964; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311; Morris 1995: 467; Beasley-Murray 1999: 176–77. The second position is held by Emerton 1960; 1966. For a variation of the third view, see Hanson 1964–65; 1967. See further Oepke, TDNT 4:1022–32, 1054–55. Most major commentators seem to favor the third view as well (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 373; Carson 1991: 398; Barrett 1978: 384; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311).

85 The presence of an argument from the lesser to the greater is denied by Ridderbos (1997: 374) against the overwhelming majority of commentators (e.g., R. Brown 1966: 410; Morris 1995: 469; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.310; Moloney 1998: 316). Carson (1991: 399, perhaps following Barrett 1978: 385), calls this an ad hominem argument, which he defines (somewhat idiosyncratically, it seems) as an argument that “does not require Jesus to subscribe to the same literal exegesis as his opponents.”

98 R. Brown (1966: 414–15) seems to suggest that these verses are included to show that Jesus would not die until his hour had come and that he would go back to Jerusalem when the hour had come. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.314) lists as many as six reasons why the evangelist included this portion: (1) to show that Jerusalem was too dangerous for Jesus; (2) to point out that Jesus received a more favorable response when he did not face opposition from the Jews; (3) to link Jesus’ ministry in Jerusalem with the beginning of the Gospel when his identity was at issue as well; (4) to recall the Baptist’s witness, which is fulfilled in Jesus’ signs; (5) to indicate Jesus’ supremacy over John the Baptist; and (6) to create a bridge to the following section.

8 There is no reason to drive a wedge between history and theology and to diminish the historicity of the raising of Lazarus along the lines suggested by R. Brown (1966: 428–30 [but see Ridderbos 1997: 382]). R. Brown proposes that chapters 10–11 comprises a “later addition to the plan of the Gospel” (p. 427), attributing the present pericope more to “Johannine pedagogical and theological purpose than ... historical reminiscence” (p. 430). Also precarious is the type of source-critical reconstruction attempted by Schnackenburg (1990: 2.316–21). Ridderbos (1997: 382) helpfully points to the “agains” in 11:7–8 (presupposing a long prior stay in Judea and Jerusalem) and the disciples’ remarks about earlier attempts on Jesus’ life by the Jews in 11:8 as evidence that chapter 11 constitutes an integral structural component of the overall Gospel. Ridderbos (1997: 386) rightly notes that the reality of the miracle and its theological significance cannot be separated (referring to 1:14). For a rebuttal of existentialist interpretations of chapter 11, see Carson 1991: 404.

19 R. Brown (1966: 423 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.322]) claims that this verse is “clearly a parenthesis added by an editor,” though it is unclear why the author himself (rather than a later editor) could not have added this kind of parenthetical statement. Carson (1991: 405 [approvingly cited by Borchert 1996: 349]) contends, against Barrett (1978: 390), that it does not follow that the intended audience was Christian, though clearly Carson’s case is difficult here. More likely is the reconstruction by Witherington (1995: 201), who says that this verse may serve as “a simple reminder of Mary’s identity to the Christians who would be using this Gospel as a missionary tool to bring outsiders to Christ.” Yet Carson (1991: 405) rightly points out that regardless of this issue, and even if the anointing was unknown to the reader, the proleptic reference to Mary still serves as a fine literary device, urging the first-time reader onward in the narrative.

68 Morris (1995: 489) and Carson (1991: 413) note the one article tying closely together “everyone who lives and believes.” Οὐ μὴ ... εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (ou mē ... eis ton aiōna) is an emphatic negative: “never, ever” (plus subjunctive; see Wallace 1996: 468). In the question “Do you believe this?” the verb πιστεύω (pisteuō, believe) is followed by the accusative, which is unique in this Gospel (Bultmann 1971: 404 n. 1; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.332).

69 Ridderbos (1997: 396) persuasively argues that 11:25b refers to “death in the natural sense and to living in the sense of eternal life,” while “lives” in 11:26a “refers to natural human existence, while ‘never die’ refers to the eternal life that natural death can neither prevent nor affect” (so also Bultmann 1971: 403, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.331; Stibbe 1994: 51). Contra Carson (1991: 413), R. Brown (1966: 425), and Borchert (1996: 356) (also Calvin and Schlatter), who maintain that “lives” in 11:26a refers to eternal life. Wuellner (1991: 182) calls the present statement an oxymoron.

77 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.334) conjectures that Jesus did not return with Martha to the house in order to secure private conversations with the two sisters.

80 An egregious example comes from Schnackenburg (1990: 2.333), who says that Mary “gives the impression of being nothing but a complaining woman,” a comment for which he is sharply rebuked by Borchert (1996: 359), who calls this “a Western male’s misunderstanding.” Pollard (1973: 438–41) strongly contends that Martha’s and Mary’s responses are diametrically opposed (cautioning against reading the present pericope in light of Luke 10:38–42): Martha exemplifies “confident trust,” but Mary demonstrates “hysterical weeping,” eliciting Jesus’ reaction of “bitter disappointment” (p. 440). Similarly, Stibbe (1994: 47), who maintains that these two women “exhibit different types of grief,” with Martha evincing “growth in resurrection faith,” and Mary’s grief being a “desperate, passionate and forlorn affair.” For Pollard (1973: 441), “the lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews who were with her” is the actual reason why Jesus decides to raise Lazarus.

91 Barrett (1978: 399) asserts that Jesus was angry “beyond question.” Schnackenburg (1990: 2.335) calls attempts to render ἐμβριμάομαι as an emotional experience such as grief, pain, or sympathy “illegitimate.” Beasley-Murray (1987 = 1999: 192–93, followed by Lindars 1992b: 89–90, noting that he changed his view from Lindars 1972: 398) marshals considerable evidence to support the reading “became angry in spirit.” See also Carson (1991: 415), who contends that ἐμβριμάομαι means more than “deeply moved in spirit” and says that the term refers to “anger, outrage, or emotional indignation.” Brodie (1993: 395), starting with Schnackenburg’s view that Jesus was angry at the unbelief of Mary and the Jews, maintains that his anger is directed also at sin and death, and thus ultimately against the realm of Satan.

91 Barrett (1978: 399) asserts that Jesus was angry “beyond question.” Schnackenburg (1990: 2.335) calls attempts to render ἐμβριμάομαι as an emotional experience such as grief, pain, or sympathy “illegitimate.” Beasley-Murray (1987 = 1999: 192–93, followed by Lindars 1992b: 89–90, noting that he changed his view from Lindars 1972: 398) marshals considerable evidence to support the reading “became angry in spirit.” See also Carson (1991: 415), who contends that ἐμβριμάομαι means more than “deeply moved in spirit” and says that the term refers to “anger, outrage, or emotional indignation.” Brodie (1993: 395), starting with Schnackenburg’s view that Jesus was angry at the unbelief of Mary and the Jews, maintains that his anger is directed also at sin and death, and thus ultimately against the realm of Satan.

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, “The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death.” See also Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999: 289. The mourners’ unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999:

192–93), several of whom adduce Paul’s statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus’ anger is directed toward both “the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow” and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus’ anger as occasioned by Mary’s turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either “misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition,” to mean “moved in spirit.” Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus’ struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, “He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself” (11:38 is translated “bearing the rebuke within himself”). According to Story, at the sight of people’s grief, Jesus was overcome by “momentary self-regret,” thinking, “Why did I not come sooner ... ? I have only myself to blame. ... Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?” However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

97 So, essentially, Carson (1991: 416) and Morris (1995: 495), though both (in my view, illegitimately) speak of “unbelief” or “the misconceptions of those around him” as the primary target (similarly, Kruse [2003: 254] believes Jesus wept out of “deep disappointment” with the “faithless weeping and wailing” of Mary and “the Jews”). Schnackenburg (1990: 2.337) insightfully adduces the reference to Jesus’ “tears” during his “life on earth” in Heb. 5:7, which there, as well as in the present reference, are related to the presence of and the need for salvation from death. The comment by Borchert (1996: 360) that Jesus’ weeping is “directly related to the failure of his followers to recognize his mission as the agent of God” is sheer conjecture, as is Moloney’s contention (1998: 331) that “he weeps because of the danger that his unconditional gift of himself in love ... will never be understood or accepted.”

100 As Barrett (1978: 401) writes, “They think of Jesus not as the Son of God who is light and life ... but as a thaumaturge whose capacities, authenticated by the cure of the blind man, might conceivably have been expected to rise to this extremity.” Carson (1991: 417 [cf. Morris 1995: 496]) says that we need not suppose that their attitude was “sneering,” but Schnackenburg (1990: 2.337) points to the introductory δέ (de, but) and the negative connotation of οὐκ ἔδυνάτο (ouk edynato, could he not have?).

112 R. Brown (1966: 436) thinks that the mention of “glory” here forms an inclusio within the chapter, an inclusio with the wine miracle at Cana, tying together the first and last signs, and serving to transition into “the Book of Glory.” Schnackenburg (1990: 2.338) comments, “The two sayings, in v. 4 and v. 40, are like corner-posts supporting the interpretation of the raising as the greatest sign of the presence of God’s saving power in Jesus.”

122 As is suggested by some modern commentators (e.g., Schnackenburg 1990: 2.340), with reference to Basil (ca. A.D. 330–379). But see the critique by Carson 1991: 418.

152 Schwank (1977) helpfully points out that in the final analysis, the reason for the mention of Ephraim in 11:54 is most likely the Fourth Evangelist’s conviction that Jesus did in fact withdraw to this location at this juncture of his ministry, whether or not this served the purpose of geographical symbolism or other theological purposes (cf. Olsson 1974: 28 [cited in Schwank 1977: 380]). He rejects the view of Bultmann (1971: 412 n. 3) that the reference is merely “schematic” (i.e., literary but not historical in nature) and also the contention by Kundsinn (1925: 49–50) that the evangelist chose the name because the location was significant for Christians at the end of the first century (unsupported by evidence, as is admitted by Kundsinn [p. 49]; see the discussions in Katz 1997: 131 n. 7; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.351).

7 Curiously, Schnackenburg (1990: 2.366) questions the historical veracity of Jesus’ trip to Bethany, arguing that it is unlikely that Jesus would have gone to a more dangerous location. However, there is solid, multiply attested evidence in favor of authenticity, and the Gospels make clear that Jesus was not exclusively, or even primarily, guided by concerns for his own safety, especially toward the end of his public ministry. Morris (1995: 510–11) notes that οὐν (oun, therefore) in 12:1 establishes a logical connection between the anointing and the preceding reference to the hostility of the Jewish leaders: despite their antagonism, Jesus was still willing to go to the place where he would eventually die.

9 The vast majority of commentators holds that the dinner probably was eaten on Saturday at some point during the day, presumably in the evening. See Carson 1991: 427; Barrett 1978: 410; Morris 1995: 510 n. 10; see also Beasley-Murray 1999: 208; R. Brown 1966: 447; Burge 2000: 337. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.366) says that the meal could have been on Sunday or possibly Saturday evening.

10 Martha’s serving suggests to some (e.g., Moloney 1998: 356) that the dinner was given at her (and Lazarus’s) house. Others object that if the dinner had been at Lazarus’s house, it likely would not have been stated that he was reclining with Jesus; his presence at the house would have been assumed (Morris 1995: 511; R. Brown 1966: 448; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 414). As on previous occasions, Martha is mentioned before her sister Mary (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.366).

12 The meaning “genuine” or “pure” is supported by most commentators (e.g., Carson 1991: 428; Barrett 1978: 412; Beasley-Murray 1999: 204 n. b; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.367; Ridderbos 1997: 414). Michaels (1989: 217), on the other hand, thinks that “it may have been the trade name under which the product was marketed” (i.e., “pistic nard”).

21 See especially Morris 1995: 513 n. 19. Contra Schnackenburg (1990: 2.367–68), who questions the originality of the phrase “the one who was about to betray him.”

23 This is the only NT passage in which Judas is called a thief, indeed, where he is charged with anything other than his ultimate betrayal of Jesus (though see Schnackenburg [1990: 2.368], who notes that the Synoptists, too, hint at Judas’s greed: Matt. 26:14–15; 27:3–10; Mark 14:10–11; Luke 22:3–5). Carson (1991: 428–29 [cf. Burge 2000: 339]) suggests that the consistent description of Judas as the one who betrayed Jesus resulted from the “shocking force of their hindsight.” It is as if the disciples’ minds had been permanently seared by their memory of him as the one who betrayed their master.

25 Most commentators view the statement in an elliptical fashion, though there is less consensus on precisely what ought to be supplied. Carson (1991: 429) suggests that the statement is to be construed as follows: “Leave her alone. [She has done this—i.e., held on to the jar] in order to keep it for the day of my burial.” Ridderbos (1997: 417–19), too, holds that the ἵνα (hina, that) of 12:7 is independent (a “brachylogy” [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.369]) and proposes that the phrase is best understood as a rhetorical question. Less likely is the construal of Witherington (1995: 208, appealing to Synoptic parallels), who thinks that Jesus is urging that Mary be left to keep the “burial ritual.” Also doubtful is Maccini’s (1996: 173–74) rendering: “Let her alone, so that she might keep what oil she has left for the day of my burial” (so, earlier, Schlatter 1948: 264).

365, 368n5, 369, 370n12, 372n26, 373, 377n6, 378n11, 379n13, 381n22, 381n27, 382n31, 383n35, 385n43, 386n46, 389, 389n1, 390n3, 391, 393, 399n2, 400n1, 405n30,

5 Contra Laney (1992: 224, citing Hoehner 1977: 91), who thinks that the “next day” refers to the day after the great crowds of Jews came to Bethany (12:9), “probably Monday, rather than Sunday.” Ridderbos (1997: 422), among others, proposes that the triumphal entry occurred the day after the anointing at Bethany. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.373) contends that a definitive conclusion is not possible.

12 Morris (1995: 518–19 n. 40 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.374]) denies that the branches waved on this occasion were the lulabs used at the Feast of Tabernacles.

26 Cf. 11:19, 33, 42, 45 (see Ridderbos 1997: 425; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.377).

6 See commentary at 7:35, the only other occurrence of the term in John’s Gospel. A look at the remaining NT references indicates that in virtually all instances the term is used in contrast with “Jews” (Ἰουδαῖοι, Ioudaioi; see Acts 14:1; 16:1; 18:4; 19:10, 17; 20:21; Rom. 1:16; 2:9, 10; 3:9; 10:12; 1 Cor. 1:22, 24; 10:32; 12:13; Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11). That the “Greeks” mentioned here were not Diaspora Jews (as Calvin [1961: 35] thought) is accepted by virtually all major commentators (e.g., Westcott [1908: 2.120], who likens these to the Gentile magi at the beginning of Matthew’s Gospel; Ridderbos 1997: 427; Carson 1991: 436; Barrett 1978: 421; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.381; Witherington 1995: 223; Moloney 1998: 351; Burge 2000: 342).

11 Philip’s provenance from a bilingual region is cited by many commentators, including Ridderbos (1997: 427), Carson (1991: 436), Schnackenburg (1990: 2.382), R. Brown (1966: 470), Witherington (1995: 223), and Moloney (1998: 352).

13 See the discussion of the relationship between 12:24 and the Synoptics in R. Brown 1966: 473–74, and of the relationship between 12:25 and the Synoptics in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.384.

22 Commentators almost universally consider the present pericope to be the Johannine equivalent to the Synoptic account of Gethsemane (e.g., Morris 1995: 529; Barrett 1978: 424; R. Brown 1966: 475–76; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.386), though Ridderbos (1997: 435–36, pointing to Ps. 6) and Carson (1991: 440) rightly reject the notion that the Fourth Evangelist has simply refashioned the Synoptic Gethsemane scene to suit his purposes.

27 Carson (1991: 441) finds it tempting to subsume this passage, and indeed all of Christ’s redemptive work along with the new covenant, under Ezek. 36, particularly 36:22, 32. On Jesus’ desire to glorify the Father, see further 13:31–32; 14:13; 17:1, 4–5 (cf. 15:8; 21:19). R. Brown (1966: 476 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.387]) sees 12:28 as analogous to the Lord’s Prayer (“Hallowed be your name”); Beasley-Murray (1999: 207) regards it as the equivalent of Mark 14:36a.

31 Ridderbos (1997: 437) understands “I have glorified it” to refer to “the whole of Jesus’ earthly activity.” Carson (1991: 441) includes Jesus’ earthly ministry, the incarnation, and the signs. Morris (1995: 530) seems to think that “I will glorify it” refers solely to the cross. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.388, citing Ps. 138:2; Ezek. 36:23; 38:23) takes the same phrase to point to the Son’s exaltation and vindication: “He will justify the Son, raise him above the power of evil, and give him glory and saving power.”

35 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.390) here sees Jesus commenting on people’s incomprehension and urging them to believe. Ridderbos (1997: 437), on the other hand, argues that Jesus refers to the sound of the voice, not the words, maintaining that Jesus “is not holding the crowd answerable for what it could not understand.” Neither Barrett (1978: 426) nor R. Brown (1966: 477) seems able to reconcile the apparent tension in the voice being for the crowd yet unintelligible to the crowd. Carson (1991: 442) offers four points, most importantly that even if the crowd had not understood the voice, the voice itself should be a signal of divine activity.

43 On Jesus’ exaltation and glorification, see the excursus in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.398–410.

46 So, rightly, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.395. For a summary and bibliographic references, see Köstenberger 1998b: 95 n. 180.

1 For a discussion of 12:37–50 in the context of the Johannine lawsuit motif (cf. Isa. 40–55), see Lincoln 2000: 105–10. Keener (2003: 882) notes that many find in 12:37–43 a theological summary of people’s responses to Jesus’ public ministry and in 12:44–50 an anthology of representative sayings. Whitacre (1999: 326) suggests that 12:37–43 emphasizes Jesus’ deeds, and 12:44–50 his words (also adducing Moses’ final words in Deut. 32:45–47 as a parallel). Both Ridderbos (1997: 443) and Schnackenburg (1990: 2.411) stress the relevance of this section for the evangelist’s own day and the historical distance from which this section was presumably written. This surely is true but should not be exaggerated. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.421) also provides a defense of Johannine authorship against Boismard, who claims that 12:44–50 is non-Johannine. Bultmann (1971: ix), in a hardly defensible move, relocates both 12:34–36 and 12:44–50 to John 8, with only 12:37–43 remaining in the traditional position.

3 Thus, while τοσαῦτα (tosauta, so many, so great) may refer to both quantity and quality (Morris 1995: 536 n. 103), the latter is more likely in the present instance, since John selected only a few of Jesus’ most striking signs and recorded them in vivid detail (so, rightly, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.413).

2 For a defense of the literary and theological integrity of 13:1–30, see Carson 1991: 460. For a comprehensive discussion of various attempts at reconstructing putative sources, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.7–15. Note that structurally, the cleansing motif in chapter 13 may correspond to the cleansing motif in chapter 2, both at the Cana wedding and at the clearing of the temple. While in chapter 2 Jesus’ attempt to cleanse corrupt Jewish custom and worship must be pronounced a failure in human terms (though both events serve as Johannine “signs” with messianic significance), chapter 13 witnesses his successful cleansing of the new messianic community.

1 Cf. “six days before the Passover” in 12:1; “the next day” in 12:12. Carson (1991: 455–58) rightly concludes that Jesus and his disciples ate a true paschal meal on Thursday, 15 Nisan (contra Barrett 1978: 50–51; R. Brown 1970: 556; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.36). On the chronology of the passion narrative in John and the Synoptics (siding with Carson, despite Morris 1995: 688–90), see the sidebar in Köstenberger 1999a: 146, with further bibliographical references (see also Köstenberger 2002c: 130, 164, 173; Blomberg 1987: 175–80; Carson 1984: 530–32). Some seek to adjudicate apparent differences between the presentations in John and the Synoptics by the theory that differences in chronology are due to the use of different calendars. John, it is suggested, like the Judeans and the Sadducees, uses a lunar sunset-to-sunset calendar, while the Synoptics, like the Galileans, the Pharisees, and Jesus and his followers, employ a solar sunrise-to-sunrise reckoning (Hoehner 1977: 85–90; see chart on p. 89; Morris 1995: 684–95); or, John’s calendric usage shifts: his light-darkness theme (rooted in the Genesis account) is conveyed by way of a solar calendar, while elsewhere a lunar system is found (building on exodus redemptive motifs) (Busada 2003). However, these theories seem to lack a clear textual base in the Gospels themselves and are unnecessarily complicated if the solution argued here is adopted.

406n33, 409, 416, 419n2, 422, 424n13, 425, 425n18, 425n22, 427n28, 427n30, 428, 428n34, 429n36, 431n48, 436n70, 439, 440, 441, 443, 445n102, 447, 448n1, 450n7, 451,

30 Ridderbos (1997: 459 n. 34 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 3.19]) notes the use of Peter's double name, "as elsewhere when his most striking and characteristic interventions are described" (e.g., 6:68; 13:9, 24, 36; 18:10, 15, 25; 21:3). On the designation "Lord," see 13:9, 36, 37, and commentary at 13:13.

33 So Schlatter 1948: 282. Morris (1995: 548 n. 22) notes the plural form ταῦτα (tauta, these things) and suggests that the expression "probably points to all the events associated with the Passion," though he does say that in part, the "later" may refer to the explanation that Jesus soon will give. The latter is ruled out categorically by Schnackenburg (1990: 3.19) and, less categorically but still firmly, by Carson (1991: 463). However, a radical disjunction between Jesus' explanation here and the events of the passion seems to be unnecessary.

2 The outline of the structure of the first unit (13:31–14:31) below follows Carson (1991: 498) and Blomberg (2002: 199), who take 14:15–31 as a single unit. Others divide this section between 14:24 and 14:25 (e.g., Moloney 1998: 391–92; R. Brown 1970: 623). Schnackenburg (1990: 3.58), following Becker, sees a break between 14:17 and 14:18.

13 Cf. 10:11. Carson (1991: 486) aptly notes that Peter's response "displays not only gross ignorance of human weakness, but a certain haughty independence that is the seed of the denial itself." Peter has no response to Jesus' prediction of his denials (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.57) and is not heard from again until 18:10 (Morris 1995: 564).

18 Note the shift to the plural at 14:1, in contrast to Jesus' personal address to Peter in 13:36–38 (noted by Schnackenburg 1990: 3.57).

22 Most commentators take both occurrences of πιστεύετε (pisteute, believe, trust) in 14:1 as imperatives (e.g., Carson 1991: 488; Morris 1995: 566; Beasley-Murray 1999: 249; Burge 2000: 391; Westcott 1908: 2.167; Köstenberger 1999a: 163). Alternatively, the first form may be an indicative: "You trust in God; trust also in me" (NIV footnote) or interrogative (Bultmann 1971: 600). Schnackenburg (1990: 3.59) notes that 14:1b forms a chiasm ("[You] Trust in God, also in me trust").

28 See additional note on 14:2. Similar language is used in Mark 10:40; 1 Cor. 2:9; Heb. 11:16; 1 Pet. 1:4. Jesus' words in the present passage are designed to further reassure his disciples (cf. Michaels 1989: 267). As Schnackenburg (1990: 3.59) notes, the point of reference probably is John 13:33.

30 See John 21:22–23; 1 Thess. 4:16–17. So, rightly, Morris 1995: 568. Contra Schnackenburg (1990: 3.62), who says that a reference to the parousia would be in contradiction to the Fourth Evangelist's present eschatology, and Keener (1993: 299), who claims that Jesus' coming after the resurrection to give the Spirit is in view. This certainly is the case in 16:16 (cf. 14:17–24), but it is more than doubtful whether Jesus' comments in 14:2–3 indicate that he will prepare a place for the disciples in the interim between his crucifixion and his resurrection and then come back and take them with him at that time. After all, Jesus taught that the gospel must first be preached to all nations, and this will be done through Jesus' followers.

34 The importance of 14:6 in the context of the entire Gospel (not to mention Christian theology at large) can hardly be exaggerated. Ridderbos (1997: 493) calls it "the core statement of this entire Gospel." Schnackenburg (1990: 3.65 [cited approvingly by Beasley-Murray 1999: 252]) says that this text “forms a classical summary of the Johannine doctrine of salvation.” Burge (2000: 392) calls it the premier expression of the Gospel’s theology.

36 Or perhaps better: truth and life—abstract nouns have the article in Greek but not necessarily in English. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.65) sums up the thrust of this passage well: “By revealing the truth that leads to life and mediating that true life to the one who accepts and realizes that truth in faith, Jesus takes everyone who believes in him to the goal of his existence, that is, ‘to the Father’; in this manner, he becomes the ‘way.’ ”

48 In principle, “Philip” could conclude this sentence or commence the following one, the preferable option being the former (contra Morris 1995: 572 n. 25). The perfect ἐγνώκας (egnōkas, you know) has present meaning (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.69).

70 The translation of the term has proved particularly difficult since there does not seem to be an exact equivalent in the English language (see discussion in Carson 1991: 499). None of the expressions chosen in English translations seems fully adequate: “Counselor” (NIV) smacks of contemporary notions of counseling (marriage counselor, camp counselor), focusing primarily on emotional or psychological aspects (though the legal term “Counselor” or “Counsel” is more appropriate); “Helper” (NASB, ESV, ISV) is more neutral but conveys inferior status overtones not present in the text and lacks the legal connotation possibly present (cf. the discussion in Lindars 1972: 479); the fact that some translations give several alternative renderings in footnotes also suggests that any one English rendering may be inadequate (e.g., NLT: “the Counselor; or Comforter, or Encourager, or Advocate”). “Companion” (suggested by Brodie [1993: 466]) also falls short, as does Calvin’s (1961: 82) “Patron.” Some make reference to the root meaning of the word, “one called alongside to help,” but it is unclear whether first-century usage consciously drew on this background. There is evidence that the expression was used in a legal setting, but it is less clear that the meaning should be restricted to “Advocate” (so, consistently, the TNIV) or the like (standard Greek reference works cite the following meanings: LSJ—one called to one’s aid, legal assistant, advocate, summoned, intercessor; Behm, TDNT 5:800–814—legal advisor, helper, advocate in court [for a helpful survey, see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.144–50]). Perhaps “helping presence” captures the import of the term better than any other (Köstenberger 1999a: 157) for the following reasons: (1) this is what Jesus was while with the disciples; (2) this encompasses the various functions laid out for the Spirit in John 14–16; (3) this transcends (but may include) the legal context of the term (see esp. 16:7–11). See the discussion by Ridderbos (1997: 503), who issues a plea to let the Johannine context (rather than alleged extrabiblical parallels) determine the meaning of παράκλητος and concludes that “the dominant idea is of someone who offers assistance in a situation in which help is needed.”

102 So Schnackenburg 1990: 3.87; cf. 19:11: κατά (kata) not ἐν (en), though this is of course true as well. Schlatter (1948: 303) cites Matt. 5:23 and especially Rev. 2:4, but in both passages the preposition used is likewise κατά not ἐν.

1 Carson (1991: 513) terms it “extended metaphor” or “illustrative comparison.” He is not convinced that the parallels adduced by Bauckham (1987: 84–101) establish that the present passage constitutes a commentary on one of Jesus’ parables (Carson 1991: 512). R. Brown (1970: 668) labels this a māšāl (so also Borchert 2002: 138; cf. 1996: 329); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.96) calls it “figurative discourse.”

7 Since the OT develops the vine metaphor in predominantly negative terms, the notion of the vine as the source of life for the branches is largely absent (but see Sir. 24:17–21).

Schnackenburg (1990: 3.98) notes that the vine is fruit-producing, not life-producing.

453n22, 454, 455, 455n34, 459n54, 460, 460n59, 460n60, 465n6, 466, 466n13, 467, 467n19, 470n35, 471n41, 472, 476n65, 477n69, 479n73, 480n80, 480n82, 483n7,

22 Schnackenburg (1990: 3.99) notes the elliptical nature of 15:4. The term μένω is found previously in the farewell discourse in 14:10, 17, 25. See also additional note on 15:4.

34 The chiasmic arrangement is noted by Schnackenburg 1990: 3.103.

54 The disciples' role as servants is intimated in 13:16 and implied in 13:13. On friends, see commentary at 15:13 and 15:14. The contrast between servants and sons is also found in Gal. 4:1–7 and Heb. 3:5–6. There are some interesting parallels between the present verse and John 8:31–36 (noted by Bultmann 1971: 543; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.110). The distinction between φίλοι (philoî, friends) and δούλοι (douloi, servants) is also found in Gnosticism and the mystery religions. See also Clement of Alexandria, Stromata 7.2.

59 See the discussions in Ridderbos 1997: 522 (greater emphasis on fruitbearing, but missionary activity is part of it); Barrett 1978: 478 (reference to apostles' mission to the world); and Schnackenburg 1990: 3.112 (leans against reference to missionary activity).

60 There is some debate as to whether the two ἵνα-clauses in 15:16 are coordinate (Ridderbos 1997: 521 n. 132; Barrett 1978: 478) or subordinate (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.112). The former seems more likely.

6 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 525–26, with reference to 17:20, the NIV, and many major commentators (e.g., Barrett 1978: 480; Bultmann 1971: 549; Lindars 1970: 494; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.115; Bruce 1980: 313; contra Borchert 2002: 156; Dodd 1963: 409; R. Brown 1970: 687; and the NLT). See the discussions in Beasley-Murray 1999: 275; Carson 1991: 525–26.

13 The implied object of “seen” is Jesus' works (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.116; Barrett 1978: 481; R. Brown 1970: 688).

19 Regarding the phrase “whom I will send to you,” see 14:16, 26 (where the Son is said to be the sender of the Paraclete) and 16:7. “Whom I will send from the Father” and “who proceeds from the Father” are parallel (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.118; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276). Carson (1991: 528–29) rightly notes that what is in view is not ontological procession, but the mission of the Spirit is parallel to the mission of the Son (cf. Barrett 1978: 482). On “the Spirit of truth,” see commentary at 14:17 (see also 16:13; 1 John 4:6).

35 On the surface, 13:36 and 14:5 seem to contradict Jesus' statement here, but in both previous passages the illocutionary force of the questions is a protest of Jesus' announced departure rather than a sincere inquiry as to his destination or the implications of his leaving (Carson 1991: 532–33; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.126; R. Brown 1970: 710, followed by Beasley-Murray 1999: 279; note also the curious attempt at resolving the difficulty by Borchert 2002: 164). Burge (2000: 436) notes the present tense ἐρωτᾷ (erōta, asks).

41 The preceding statement in 15:26–27, linking the Spirit's witness with that of the disciples, shows that the Spirit's convicting work in the world also involves Jesus' followers (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.129).

65 See Isa. 13:8; 21:3; 26:17–18; 42:14; 66:7–13; Jer. 4:31; 6:24; 13:21; 22:23; 30:6; 49:22–24; 50:43; Mic. 4:9–10; cf. 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 16:38–39. The anarthrous expression “a woman” is generic (Carson 1991: 544 n. 1). For a brief discussion and refutation of a Mariological interpretation of the woman (mostly by Roman Catholic interpreters), see Ridderbos 1997: 539 n. 188 (referring also to Schnackenburg 1990: 3.158–59).

69 So Carson 1991: 546; Barrett 1978: 495; R. Brown 1970: 735; Beasley-Murray 1999: 286; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.161.

73 Note the two perfect-tense verbs πεφιλήκατε (pephilēkate, you have loved) and πεπιστεύκατε (pepisteukate, you have believed) in 16:27 (see Schnackenburg 1990: 3.163).

80 So Schnackenburg 1990: 3.165. The phrase also occurs in the LXX (Esth. 5:10; 6:12), Second Temple literature (3 Macc. 6:27), and later in John (19:27).

82 Ταῦτα λελάληκα (tauta lelalēka, I have said these things) introduces the concluding statement of the whole discourse, whose purpose is to help the disciples overcome their discouragement by directing their view past the cross to the permanent victory won by Jesus. See Schnackenburg 1990: 3.166.

7 See Morris 1995: 634; with further delineation of subunits, Hunter 1979: 326–28. Lindars (1972: 515) further divides 17:20–26 into 17:20–23 and 17:24–26. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.168–69, with reference to a 1973 German article) provides a more complicated proposal, dividing at 17:1–2, 4–5, 6–11a, 11b–16, 17–19, 22–23, 24–26 (he considers 17:3 and 17:20–21 to be secondary glosses). Others favor division at 17:1–8, 9–19, 20–26 (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 748–51). Malatesta (1971: 191–92) divides at 17:1–5, 6–8, 9–19, 20–24, 25–26 and proposes a strophic arrangement. More eccentric is the suggestion by Appold (1976: 204) that there is an oscillating pattern of petition and review, featuring six petition and six review units. A survey of structural proposals for John 17 up to the late 1970s is found in Hunter 1979: 312–28. More recently, Borchert (2002: 185–89) has favored seven petitions, based on the address “Father.” Yet, as Ridderbos (1997: 547) remarks, “The structure is not severe enough and the transitions are too fluid for us to speak of a detailed and sharply delineated thought scheme.”

19 The explanatory phrase “now this is” is in keeping with Johannine style (cf., e.g., 3:19: “this is the verdict”). The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) here, in typical Johannine idiom, is appositional (Wallace 1996: 475). Morris (1995: 638) notes that ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) here precedes the noun (elsewhere in John also in 4:23), and he proposes that this indicates emphasis. The verse is regularly seen by critical scholars as a Johannine insertion (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 741; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.172; Barrett 1978: 503; but see Carson 1991: 556; Ridderbos 1997: 549).

36 Cf. Exod. 3:13–15. See R. Brown 1970: 755; Carson 1991: 558; Morris 1995: 640; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.175.

88 So Carson 1991: 570; cf. R. Brown 1970: 781; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.197; Borchert 2002: 211. Contra Morris (1995: 653), who thinks that it is through the cross. Ridderbos (1997: 566) suggests that this is not so much an anticipation of the passion as it is a reference “to Jesus’ continuing work in heaven.”

1 Stibbe (1992: 111–12) contends that John’s characterization of Jesus in his passion narrative consists of three aspects: Jesus as judge, king, and elusive God. Stibbe also suggests that 18:1–27 serves as an “implicit commentary on the truth enunciated in 1:5” (i.e., the victory of the light over the darkness [p. 100]). On the relationship between the Johannine and the Synoptic passion narratives, see Ridderbos 1996: 569–72; Carson 1991: 571–76; Westcott 1908: 2.262–64. Burge (2000: 485–86) addresses the historical trustworthiness of the Johannine passion narrative.

Moloney (1998: 482) divides 18:1–19:42 into five scenes on the basis of the introduction of new people and places. He also notes that this section begins and ends with κῆπος (kēpos, garden). R. Brown (1970: 813–17), too, has an extensive discussion of the structure and historicity of John’s passion narrative. See also the examination of theological and literary features of this section in Schnackenburg 1990: 3.218–19.

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235). Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

2 See R. Brown 1970: 858–59, followed by Lincoln 2000: 124; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.220, 242; Moloney 1998: 493.

52 Sherwin-White 1963: 27–28; Carson 1991: 596–97. Contra Schnackenburg (1990: 3.254), who believes that John misplaced the scourging and who, seeing only one scourging, believes that this scourging was the verberatio. R. Brown (1970: 858–59) thinks that John has moved the scourging from its original position (cf. Mark and Matthew) in order to fashion a chiasmic arrangement.

72 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 601; cf. Morris 1995: 705; Beasley-Murray 1999: 340; Burge 2000: 505; Borchert 2002: 254. Contra Barrett (1978: 543), who thinks that the singular participle constructed from the verb παράδιδωμι (paradidōmi, I hand over) suggests Judas. See also the discussions by Schnackenburg (1990: 3.261–63) and Ridderbos (1997: 603), both of whom ultimately point to the Jews as the most likely referent. Stibbe (1992: 170) concludes that “the one” in 19:11 probably refers to Caiaphas as a representative of the Jewish nation, as the evangelist has a propensity to implicate the Jews in Jesus’ death.

87 See commentary at 19:12. For a more inclusive statement indicting the entire nation, see Matt. 27:25: “All the people answered, ‘Let his blood be on us and on our children!’ ” (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.266).

90 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 606. See also Schnackenburg (1990: 3.267), who suggests that the evangelist “intentionally allowed the uncertainty to remain.” The present statement is echoed by Tertullian, who says that the Jews extorted from Pilate a sentence giving Jesus up “to them to be crucified” (Apol. 21.18, italics added).

6 So, with a variety of nuances, Witherington 1995: 308; R. Brown 1970: 917; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270; and Moloney 1998: 502, 506. Carson (1991: 609), who says that the omission is due to John’s desire to further highlight Jesus’ willing obedience to the Father, dismisses as unduly speculative the view that the omission is part of a polemic against the theory that Simon of Cyrene was himself crucified (contra Beasley-Murray 1999: 345). Barrett (1978: 548) proposes that the omission is due to the evangelist’s effort to highlight the “all-sufficiency of Jesus ... in effecting the redemption of the world.” Beasley-Murray (1999: 345 [cf. Borchert 2002: 261; R. Brown 1970: 917–18; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270]) suggests that the omission serves to create an allusion to Isaac carrying the wood for his sacrifice.

17 So, for example, Ridderbos 1997: 608; Beasley-Murray 1999: 346; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270; Moloney 1998: 502; Schlatter 1948: 348; Westcott 1908: 2.308.

36 See Repond 1922; Dalman 1928–39: 5.126–29. Josephus notes that the high priestly robe (χιτών, chiton) was “not composed of two pieces, ... [but] one long woven cloth” (Ant. 3.7.4 §161; cf. Exod. 28:31; Rev. 1:13), while Philo uses a robe as symbolic of the Logos, which binds all things together in unity (Flight 20 §§110–12). However, it is far from certain whether the present passage alludes to the high-priestly garment (or the unity of the church, for that matter) (so, rightly, Carson 1991: 614; contra Moloney 1998: 503, 507). Carson (1991: 614–15) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 347–48), following Schnackenburg (1990: 3.274), see in the preservation of the seamless tunic an allusion to the Father’s preservation of the Son; Carson also sees a connection with the footwashing.

38 There is no agreement, however, on the exact way in which soldiers and bystanders are related by the evangelist. Ridderbos (1997: 610 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 903]) thinks that there is no implied contrast between these two groups. Other commentators believe that the construction does imply such a contrast (e.g., Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.273, 276). If a contrast is intended, it is hardly a sharp one; more likely, the two groups are distinguished as the narrative moves from one to the other.

43 So also the vast majority of commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 615; Barrett 1978: 551; Morris 1995: 716–17; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Bultmann 1971: 672; Borchert 2002: 268; R. Brown 1970: 904; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.276. Ridderbos (1997: 611 n. 142) notes that in light of Mark 15:40 and Matt. 27:56, there could have been other women there as well. See also Luke 23:49.

44 See Ridderbos 1997: 611; Carson 1991: 616; Beasley-Murray 1999: 348; Burge 2000: 528; contra Barrett 1978: 551–52; Bultmann 1971: 672 n. 5; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.277. Carson (1991: 616 [cf. Morris 1995: 717]) notes that, like Jesus’ mother’s sister, Jesus’ mother is also unnamed here and elsewhere in the Gospel (as is the “disciple Jesus loved” in 19:26–27).

47 Commentators have detected various types of symbolism in this scene. Bultmann (1971: 673), true to F. C. Baur, sees Mary as representative of Jewish Christianity, and the beloved disciple of Gentile Christianity, the latter being charged to honor the former as its “mother,” from whom it originated (cf. Brodie 1993: 549). Witherington (1995: 309) views these two characters as symbolic of a new Adam and Eve, who are obedient whereas the former were not. Carson (1991: 618, following M. Gourgues) suggests that Mary, on account of her faith in Christ, is now able metaphorically to become a mother to a new son supplied for her by Jesus (cf. Matt. 19:29; see also Witherington 1995: 310). Beasley-Murray (1999: 350, following Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278) sees Mary as representing that part of Israel that is willing to believe in Jesus as the Messiah. Refreshingly, and refusing to resort to symbolism or allegory, Morris (1995: 718) says the beloved disciple simply “provided her [Mary] with a roof” and took her under his care. Others focus on lessons (to be) learned by Mary, such as needing to “step back in submission to the law of life that the Father has set for her son” (Ridderbos 1997: 612) or to receive the gift of salvation that she desired to receive at the wedding in Cana (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278; Beasley-Murray 1999: 350; Borchert 2002: 269).

48 In antiquity, a dying person ordinarily would entrust his mother to another with a direct charge such as this: “I leave to you my mother to be taken care of” (Lagrange 1925: 494 [cited in R. Brown 1970: 907]; cf. Lucian, Toxaris 22). In the LXX, the adoption formula is generally “you are” rather than “here is” as in the present passage (“ ‘Mother, here is your son’ ... ‘Here is your mother’ ”; cf. Ps. 2:7; Tob. 7:12). The form of expression used in John has a Semitic ring. Speaking of “the official formula of the old Jewish family law,” one commentator refers to a crucified man’s “right to make testamentary dispositions, even from the cross” (Stauffer 1960: 13; cf. Borchert 2002: 269; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278).

53 The vast majority of commentators connect the reference to Scripture being fulfilled with Jesus' statement (e.g., Carson 1991: 619; Barrett 1978: 553; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; though Morris [1995: 719] seems to suggest that it might be deliberately ambiguous). Contra R. Brown (1970: 908), who seems to prefer linking Jesus' statement with his words to Mary and the beloved disciple.

54 So Ridderbos 1997: 616; Carson 1991: 619; Barrett 1978: 553; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; Schlatter 1948: 351. Psalm 69:21 is also cited in the Qumran hymn 1QH 12:11. Another relevant passage is Ps. 22:15 (Schlatter 1948: 351; Kruse 2003: 369). The suggestion that Jesus here refers back to his statement in 18:11 is improbable (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 617; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.283; R. Brown 1970: 930).

60 Borchert 2002: 272–73; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.284; contra Bultmann 1971: 675. The same word, παραδίδωμι (paradidōmi, give up) is used in Isa. 53:12 to describe the death of the suffering Servant (Morris 1995: 721 n. 81).

1 On the structure of John 20, see the discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 3.301–2. See also Beasley-Murray 1999: 367–70; Moloney 1998: 517; Borchert 2002: 289; R. Brown 1970: 995–96. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.321) considers 20:11–18 to be a “prelude” to 20:19–29. Borchert (2002: 289–90, 296) perceives in 20:1–18 an “envelope effect or sandwich pattern” whereby the narratives involving Mary have been framed around 20:3–10, with the statement about the beloved disciple in 20:8 serving as the focal point of this chapter. Moloney (1998: 515–16) finds an inclusio between 1:35–51 and chapter 20.

3 Often, though not always, in John, darkness connotes evil or unbelief (see 1:5; 8:12; 9:4; 11:10; 12:35, 46; 13:30). It is not clear that it does so here (contra Maccini 1996: 208; Carson 1991: 635–36; Borchert 2002: 291; R. Brown 1970: 981; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.308; Moloney 1998: 518).

17 This is disputed by Brodie (1993: 561), who says that the beloved disciple is “in better running order,” which he takes to be symbolic of superior discipleship (though on p. 564 he sees both disciples as symbolic of the unity achieved through faith in the ascending Christ). Beasley-Murray (1999: 371–72) contends that the beloved disciple's speed was due to the extent of his love for Jesus; Moloney (1998: 522) suggests that he had stronger faith that a miracle had occurred. Yet others have seen in this statement an affirmation of John's superiority over Peter (e.g., Schnackenburg 1990: 3.310, 312; Moloney 1998: 520; R. Brown 1970: 1004–7). More likely, however, both the beloved disciple and Peter are presented here as a duo of eyewitnesses to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 632; Carson 1991: 636–37; Bultmann 1971: 684).

22 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 637; Barrett 1978: 563; Morris 1995: 735; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.311; Moloney 1998: 523. Carson also suggests that the fact that the graveclothes were still in the tomb is intended to create a contrast with Lazarus, who left the tomb with his graveclothes on (11:44) (cf. Barrett 1978: 563; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.311; Beasley-Murray 1999: 372; Moloney 1998: 519–20).

23 In this he compares favorably with Thomas later in this chapter (Moloney 1998: 538; see commentary at 20:24–29). Ridderbos (1997: 633 n. 15 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Beck 1997: 117–18]) suggests that ἐπίστευσεν (episteusen, he believed) is an ingressive aorist. He also contrasts Mary's reaction (concern that the body had been stolen) with that of the beloved disciple (faith).

24 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 638; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Borchert 2002: 295; R. Brown 1970: 987; Bultmann 1971: 684; Burge 2000: 554; Laney 1992: 360. Witherington (1995: 325) suggests, less plausibly, that the beloved disciple believed that Jesus had been taken by God similar to Elijah. Morris (1995: 736) notes that the two verbs do not have explicit objects, supplying the graveclothes as the object of the beloved disciple's "seeing" and Jesus' resurrection as that of the disciple's "believing" (albeit without understanding its full theological significance). Hardly plausible is the suggestion by Minear (1983: 91 n. 14, with reference to 1976 [followed by Conway 1999: 189–90]) that what the disciples believed was the statement of Mary Magdalene in 20:2.

27 This is inadequately recognized by those who see in the "disciple Jesus loved" a model disciple par excellence. See Ridderbos 1997: 633; Whitacre 1999: 474; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; R. Brown 1970: 1005; Borchert 2002: 295.

14 Commentators are not agreed as to whether Mary had already touched Jesus or was about to do so. Some say that Mary had already touched him (e.g., Morris 1995: 742; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.318; Witherington 1995: 331; R. Brown 1970: 992; Burge 2000: 555), while others seem to allow for the possibility that she was about to but had not yet done so (e.g., Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. g, 376; Bultmann 1971: 687). Regarding Mary's devotion, see Ruth 1:16. Stibbe (1993: 205) says that the present passage is "most stylized" and detects intertextual echoes with Song 3:1–3.

13 The vast majority of the instances of "sending" in John's Gospel relate to Jesus' having been sent by the Father. "Sending" terminology also occurs with regard to God's sending of the Baptist, the Father's and the Son's sending of the Spirit, and Jesus' sending of his disciples. The present passage features two "sending" verbs, πέμπω (pempō) and ἀποστέλλω (apostellō), with no apparent difference in meaning (as is the virtual consensus among major commentators, including Ridderbos, Morris, Carson, Barrett, Schnackenburg, and R. Brown; see also Köstenberger 1999c: 125–43). Morris (1995: 746 n. 56) notes that this is already suggested by the use of καθώς (kathōs, just as) linking the two verbs.

16 The critique by Hatina (1993), who says that the reference is to the indwelling Paraclete, fails to convince. Contrary to the view of many commentators, the present pericope does not constitute the Johannine equivalent to Pentecost (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1038; Barrett [1978: 570], who says that the present passage cannot be harmonized with Acts 2; Bultmann 1971: 691), nor is Calvin's (1961: 205) proposal satisfactory that at 20:22 the disciples "were only sprinkled with His grace and not [as at Pentecost] saturated with full power." Beasley-Murray (1999: 382 [followed by Borchert 2002: 307–8]) believes that John telescoped the giving of the Spirit without concern for chronology (citing the reference to the ascension in 20:17 as a parallel). M. Turner (1977) thinks that the reference is not to the Spirit at all but to Jesus' message as Spirit and life. The treatment by Moloney (1998: 532, 535) is rather idiosyncratic. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.325), too, surprisingly contends that the Johannine instance involves all believers, while the events in Acts 2 pertain to the apostles. If anything, one might have expected the opposite kind of reasoning, with John's account anticipating the general outpouring narrated in Acts 2. Against the view of Burge (2000: 558 [cf. Burge 1987: 148–49]), who notes the connection between the present passage and Jesus' promise to send the Spirit in John 14 and 16, the present event does not mark the actual fulfillment of these promises other than by way of anticipatory sign. Keener's (2003: 1196–1200, see also 1204–6) discussion, including an attempted refutation of M. Turner (1998), remains inconclusive and, on the whole, fails to convince.

5 So, essentially, Schnackenburg (1990: 3.332): "Do not be faithless, but believing." Carson

580, 580n14, 583n2, 588n1, 588n6, 594, 596n3, 597, 598n14, 599, 601n7, 603n14
Schneider, J. 265
Schneiders, S. 559n7

(1991: 657) translates both terms substantively: “Do not be an unbeliever, but a believer.” Neither word occurs elsewhere in John. In the NT epistles, “unbelieving” refers to people who are not Christians, but these categories are not as firmly in place at this earlier stage of salvation history.

6 So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 647) and most major commentators (e.g., Morris 1995: 753; Witherington 1995: 344; Carson 1991: 657; Moloney 1998: 537; Barrett 1978: 572; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.332; contra Borchert 2002: 314; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

7 Stibbe (1996: 203) comments, “Like Mary Magdalene, Thomas has made the journey to ‘owned’ faith ... his own faith in Jesus as Yahweh, ‘Lord and God.’ ” Note the double personal pronoun μου (mou, my), which accentuates the personal nature of Thomas’s confession (Carson 1991: 659; Beasley-Murray 1999: 386; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.332; Wallace 1995: 82).

14 So, rightly, the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 197: 648; Morris 1995: 754; Carson 1991: 659; Beasley-Murray 1999: 386; Burge 2000: 563; Barrett 1978: 573; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.334; contra Borchert 2002: 316; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

1 Perhaps the gloss is added with a view toward the Gospel’s Greek-speaking readership, though there is no reason why this should be relegated to the redactional (rather than authorial) level (contra R. Brown 1970: 1067; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.351; Witherington 1995: 405).

6 Ridderbos (1997: 658–59) detects in this a reference to “the unity they [the disciples] recovered after Jesus’ resurrection.” Similarly, Talbert (1992: 259) sees in this “unity” an answer to Jesus’ prayer in 17:11 and a result of the Spirit’s enabling. This seems to rest too much interpretive weight on the rather inconspicuous expression “were together,” however. Little else in the context suggests that these disciples are Spirit-filled (note that they caught no fish). The presence of symbolism in the number seven is doubtful as well (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 650; Carson 1991: 669; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.352; Beasley-Murray 1999: 399; Borchert 2002: 324); it is hard to see what would connote “completeness” in the present instance (contra Brodie 1993: 582).

3 Though see the disclaimers by R. Brown (1970: 1112–17), who says that Peter’s authority is not absolute, and Schnackenburg (1990: 3.365), who cautions that later Roman Catholic exegesis should not be read into this passage.

14 Note further the verbal link between the reference to Jesus’ “lifting up” (i.e., crucifixion) in 12:32–33 and the reference to Peter’s future destiny in 21:19. See Carson 1991: 679–80; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Barrett 1978: 585. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 667); Morris (1995: 773); and Schnackenburg (1990: 3.366–67), who believe that the reference is more generally to martyrdom.

7 So Barrett 1978: 587; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.371; R. Brown 1970: 1117–19.

14 See Gal. 6:11; Col. 4:18; 2 Thess. 3:17; Philem. 19. Morris (1995: 776) notes the present participle ὁ μαρτυρῶν (ho martyron, the one testifying) as “another indication that he [the beloved disciple] was still living” (see also Breck 1992: 33; contra Schnackenburg [1990: 3.372], who says that the evangelist “lives on in his testimony”). On the Johannine “witness” motif, see commentary at 1:7.

7 On the literary connections between John 20 and 21, see Talbert 1992: 248; Schneiders 1989 (cited in Lee 1995: 40 n. 7).

Schnelle, U. 96n30, 102n2
Schoonhoven, C. R. 127n41
Schrage, W. 295n87
Schrenk, G. 427
Schürer, E. 106n19, 106n22, 107n25, 109, 185n50, 187n61, 235, 237, 288, 335n64,
348n132, 506, 518

30 Cf. 1 Esdr. 8:20; Bel 3 (Theodotion); BDAG 643 further lists several inscriptions and papyri. See also Deines (1993: 28–29), who concludes that a μετρητής amounted to approximately thirty-nine liters. Schnelle (1996: 369, referring to Deines) adds up the total to about six hundred liters.

2 For example, Ezek. 40–44; 1 Enoch 90:28–36; Ps. Sol. 17:30; 4QFlor 1:1–13; see Schnelle 1996: 368.

41 See, e.g., Ps. 14:2; 33:14; 103:19. See Schoonhoven, ISBE 2:654–55; Reddish, ABD 3:90–91.

87 The phrase “blind ones in heart” is found in P.Oxy. 1.20–21. For the blinding effect of wickedness, see Wis. 2:21. In rabbinic Judaism, this metaphorical usage is very rare (Schrage, TDNT 8:281, 284–86), while Philo, under the influence of Greek philosophy, uses it frequently (e.g., Husb. 17 §81; Heir 9 §48; Spec. Laws 4.36 §189).

19 Several commentators also mention that Tyrian coinage would have been preferred because it did not bear effigies (Moloney 1998: 76; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38 n. c; R. Brown 1966: 115; Borchert 1996: 163). However, this is disputed by Murphy-O’Connor (2000: 47, referring to Ben-David 1969), who cites evidence that Tyrian shekels “carried the head of the god Melkart (or Herakles) on the obverse and a Tyrian (Ptolemaic) eagle on the reverse with the inscription ‘Tyre the holy and inviolable.’ ” Murphy-O’Connor also notes the minting of Jewish shekels carrying the legend “shekel of Israel/Jerusalem [is/the] holy” at the onset of the Jewish war in A.D. 66 (pp. 47–48, citing Schürer 1973–79: 1.605), and he points to the Qumran interpretation of a one-time requirement in 4Q159 frag. 1, col. 2, lines 6–7 (p. 49).

22 See commentary at 2:14. See also Barrett 1975b; Evans 1997. On Gentile worship at the Jerusalem temple, see the appendix on Gentile participation in worship at Jerusalem in Schürer 1973–79: 2.309–13. Neusner (1989) adds another possible reason: the understanding that the daily whole offering, which was financed by the temple tax, provided atonement and expiation of sin.

25 See the appendix on the Sicarii and the Zealots in Schürer 1973–79: 2.598–606.

50 See Num. 15:37–41; Deut. 6:4; 11:13–21. On the Jewish confession of God as “one God,” called the Shema (from Hebrew, “to hear”), see Schürer 1973–79: 2.454–55. See also Hurtado 1998a.

61 Cf. b. Ta’an. 2a (attributed to Rabbi Yohanan, ca. A.D. 70 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 58]) and the Shemoneh Esreh (ca. A.D. 70–100 [cited in Schürer 1973–79: 2.455–63]).

64 The resurrection of the dead was the subject of lively debate between the Pharisees and their opponents (e.g., b. Sanh. 90b, referring to Deut. 31:16; Isa. 26:19; and Song 7:9). Other mishnaic passages likewise denounce those who refuse to affirm the resurrection of the dead (m. Sanh. 10.1; cf. m. Ber. 9.5). Belief in the resurrection is also evident from the second of the Eighteen Benedictions: “Lord, you are almighty forever, who makes the dead alive. ... Blessed are you, Lord, who makes the dead alive” (cf. m. Ber. 5.2; m. Soṭah 9.15; see Schürer 1973–79: 2.456).

132 For further information on the Sanhedrin, see Schürer 1973–79: 2.199–226; Lohse, TDNT 7:861–71. Hengel (1999: 330) questions whether the Sanhedrin had seventy members in Jesus’

Schwank, B. 354n151, 354n152, 479

Schwartz, E. 377n5, 446n104

Schweizer, E. 298n5

Scott, M. 302n22

day, as is frequently alleged; he favors instead the view that the composition of the council depended on the particular ruling high priest, especially in the period between A.D. 6 and 41.

151 See Riesner, DJG 49; Carson 1991: 423–24. But see Albright (1922–23), who argues that the Ephraim mentioned in John is not Et-Taiyibeh, but Ain Samieh, slightly to the northeast and lower in a valley. Cf. Schwank 1977.

152 Schwank (1977) helpfully points out that in the final analysis, the reason for the mention of Ephraim in 11:54 is most likely the Fourth Evangelist's conviction that Jesus did in fact withdraw to this location at this juncture of his ministry, whether or not this served the purpose of geographical symbolism or other theological purposes (cf. Olsson 1974: 28 [cited in Schwank 1977: 380]). He rejects the view of Bultmann (1971: 412 n. 3) that the reference is merely "schematic" (i.e., literary but not historical in nature) and also the contention by Kundsinn (1925: 49–50) that the evangelist chose the name because the location was significant for Christians at the end of the first century (unsupported by evidence, as is admitted by Kundsinn [p. 49]; see the discussions in Katz 1997: 131 n. 7; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.351).

5 Beutler (1990: 335–45) contends that John 12:20 echoes Isa. 52:15 LXX and suggests that John 12:20–50 may constitute a "great inclusion" with 1:19–34. Contra E. Schwartz's famous dictum (quoted in Busse 1992: 2085) that the Greeks here seem "ghostlike," Busse (1992) argues that 12:20–36 is part of the evangelist's literary strategy and consciously anticipates the epilogue in John 21 (compare esp. 21:18 with 10:11, 15, and 21:19 with 12:33).

104 The transition from 14:31 to 15:1 is frequently labeled an aporia, which is commonly taken to indicate a literary seam indicating the presence of different underlying sources (one of the first to see such a difficulty was C. H. Weisse 1856: 116; cf. Wellhausen 1907 and the influential series of essays by E. Schwartz 1907; 1908; see the historical survey in Kellum 2005: 10–78). However, this conclusion seems premature and unwarranted in light of preferable alternate explanations. Thielman (1991: 180), for instance, suggests that the present passage may be an instance of a "purposeful attempt at obscurity" common in ancient writers (he cites the transition from 5:47 to 6:1 as another possible example). Recently, Kellum (2005: 230) has suggested that statements indicating movement in the Fourth Gospel regularly serve as ways to move along the narrative. Stibbe (1993: 159), too, is able to make "very good sense" of the narrative as it stands without resorting to source-critical theories. For him, 14:31 is part of the Johannine theme of "the elusive Christ." After saying in 14:30 that the devil "has no hold" on him, Jesus, knowing that the "prince of this world" is now coming, is evading his captors for one final time. Schlatter (1948: 304), finally, makes the improbable suggestion that the unevenness may be due to a break in dictation.

5 Dewey (1980), while acknowledging that the term παροιμία (paroimia, illustration) occurs only in 10:6 (with reference to 10:1–5) and 16:25, 29 (referring to 16:21–24), extends the term to encompass as many as thirty-four proverbial sayings in the Gospel. This seems overzealous. For a more restrained treatment, comparing the Synoptic parables to their Johannine counterparts, see Schweizer 1996.

22 For an interesting reconstruction of the background, see Barclay 1975: 2.58 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 99); cf. Bishop 1959–60. For links between "the door" and "the shepherd"

Segal, A. F. 383n37
Segovia, F. F. 398n9, 399n1
Sekeles, E. 552
Senior, D. 540n1

in wisdom traditions, see Scott 1992: 121–23.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

9 For the purposes of this present commentary, the farewell discourse will be treated as a literary unity. Writing in 1982, Segovia (1982: 82) could claim, “Nowadays hardly any exegete would vigorously maintain that John 13:31–18:1 is a literary unity as it stands.” The past two decades have seen the emergence of many, often mutually contradictory, redaction-critical proposals, most notably the theory of the “relecture” of John 13–14 in John 15–16 (see esp. Dettwiler 1995). The primary grounds for such theories is the magnus reus (“great offender”) of 14:31, which to many suggests a “literary seam” (aporia). However, Kellum (2005: esp. 205–33) recently has demonstrated the weaknesses of a disunity theory applied to the Johannine farewell discourse on stylistic, structural, and thematic grounds. Moreover, 14:31 is shown more likely to constitute an instance of the Johannine device of implied movement, which may in a given instance convey a shift in topic (cf. 11:16, 44; 20:11). This observation is significant not only on a micro level but also on a macro level. Within the context of the entire discourse, this device is employed to foster both discourse continuity and progression, moving in an increasingly exclusionary direction. In 13:30, Judas’s departure leaves Jesus and the Eleven, triggering Jesus’ initial cycle of instruction. In 14:31, it is Jesus and his followers whose departure is implied, followed by a metaphorical deepening of Jesus’ words from 13:31–14:30. Finally, in 17:1 Jesus lifts his eyes to heaven, praying by himself. On the other end of the discourse, Jesus and the disciples are shown to cross the Kidron Valley in 18:1, with the subsequent arrest of Jesus and the ensuing events of his passion. Hence, there is no need to resort to redaction-critical relecture or chiasmic or other theories, and 14:31 is not a “literary seam” but part of a carefully designed pattern of escalating narrative movement.

1 This narrow delineation of the farewell discourse is affirmed by, among others, G. Johnston (1970), Segovia (1991, followed tentatively by Keener [2003: 891]), and Dettwiler (1995 [though note that Dettwiler starts the discourse at 13:1 to accommodate his relecture theory]). See also Kellum 2005. Many who do include chapter 17 do so by way of separate reference to Jesus’ final prayer (e.g., Carson 1980).

1 For discussions of this passage’s relationship to the Synoptics, see Barrett 1978: 546–48 (on the assumption of John’s use of Mark and the superiority of Markan material); Beasley-Murray 1999: 343–44; Bultmann 1971: 667; R. Brown 1970: 913–16. R. Brown (1970: 910–12) divides 19:16b–42 into five chiastically arranged episodes plus introduction and conclusion; Moloney (1998: 502, following Donald Senior) sees the five scenes but not the chiasm (see also Moloney’s literary analysis of John 18–19 on pp. 511–12).

Shafaat, A. 435n67

Shanks, H. 552

Shaw, A. 594n37

Sherwin-White, A. N. 515n22, 524n8, 526, 526n22, 527, 531n52, 539n91

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

37 On the strength of the fact that only here and in John 6 is there mention of fish and bread, and that John 6 includes Jesus’ “bread of life discourse,” which displays eucharistic overtones, Shaw (1974) contends that the present pericope and Jesus’ encounter with Mary Magdalene (seeing parallels between 20:17 and 3:13; 6:62) constitute “eucharistic narratives.” He also perceives the presence of a “quasi-eucharistic meal” in the Lukan Emmaus narrative (24:13–35). According to Shaw, the point made in the two Johannine “eucharistic narratives” is that believers on this side of the ascension are able to encounter Christ by way of participation in the Eucharist. Despite its considerable sophistication, however, Shaw’s effort represents an unsuccessful effort to impose eucharistic theology onto the narratives in question. Not only are the links between chapter 6 and chapters 20 and 21 not as pronounced as he alleges, but also there is in fact a rather stark contrast between the extensive elaboration on Jesus as the “bread of life” in chapter 6 and the absence of such “eucharistic” elaboration in chapters 20 and 21.

22 Sherwin-White (1963: 45) asks, “Why light a fire—an act of some extravagance—if everyone was sleeping through the night?” He cites the younger Pliny’s astonishment at his uncle’s habit of studying at night and an instance where a protracted session of the Senate was concluded by

Shewell-Cooper, W. E. 550n56
Shidemantle, C. S. 241
Sidebottom, E. M. 450n8
Silva, M. 239n50
Simoens, Y. 396n1
Simon, W. B. 468n23
Simonis, A. J. 300n10
Skarsaune, O. 17n28

lamplight.

8 See the evidence cited in Sherwin-White 1963: 45, with primary references. See also Seneca, De ira 2.7.3.

22 Sherwin-White 1965: 99 (summarized by R. Brown [1970: 848]).

52 Sherwin-White 1963: 27–28; Carson 1991: 596–97. Contra Schnackenburg (1990: 3.254), who believes that John misplaced the scourging and who, seeing only one scourging, believes that this scourging was the verberatio. R. Brown (1970: 858–59) thinks that John has moved the scourging from its original position (cf. Mark and Matthew) in order to fashion a chiasmic arrangement.

91 Latin literature usually uses the indirect expression Duci iussit, “He ordered him to be led off” (e.g., Pliny, Epistulae 10.96; see Sherwin-White 1963: 27).

56 There is some uncertainty as to the exact species of hyssop referred to here; see the discussion in Wilkinson 1964: 77; Shewell-Cooper 1962: 75–76; Beetham 1993.

8 Sidebottom (1956–57: 234) points to similarities in vocabulary between John 15 and the māšāl of the vine in Ezek. 17. Other parallels are adduced by Vawter (1964). A general survey is found in Whitacre, DJG 867–68.

50 Does this imply that Jesus’ contemporaries thought him capable of instructing Gentiles in the Diaspora by using Greek? If so, the present passage would provide indirect evidence that Jesus was known to at least speak (if not write) Greek. On the question of the language of Jesus, see the surveys by C. Rabin and G. Mussies in Safrai and Stern 1976: 1007–64 (plus the bibliography cited there); see also Silva 1991 (plus the bibliography cited there on p. 222 n. 3).

1 It is possible that John 13 represents a chiasm centering on Jesus’ pronouncement in 13:18–20. See Moloney 1986: 372 (following Simoens 1981: 101). However, this proposal gives insufficient consideration to 13:31 as start of the farewell discourse proper. For a critique of chiasmic proposals related to the Johannine farewell discourse, see Kellum 2005: 63–72. Kellum concludes that “on a structural level the farewell discourse resists a chiasmic solution,” both owing to “the lack of stated awareness of macro-chiasm in antiquity” and because “the text of the farewell discourse itself resists a chiasmic arrangement” (ibid., 72). See also the recent paper by C. Smith (2002) pointing out foundational weaknesses of contemporary chiasmic studies. John 13–17 in its entirety explicates 1:7.

23 On the disciples’ witness elsewhere in John’s writings, see 1 John 1:2; 4:14. On the Spirit’s role in the disciples’ mission, see Simon 2002.

10 Later, Judas is called a thief (12:6), and Barabbas a robber (18:40; cf. Mark 15:7). At his arrest, Jesus asks why he is treated like a robber (Matt. 26:55 pars.), and in the end he is crucified with robbers on either side (Matt. 27:38, 44 pars.). The majority of commentators take both terms as referring to the same people (Ridderbos 1997: 354; Carson 1991: 381; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.281; contra Barrett 1978: 369). See further Hengel 1989a: 24–46; Simonis 1967: 101–3.

Skeat, T. C. 413n9

Sloyan, G. S. 17n27, 17n28

Smalley, S. S. 435n67

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon's work is given extensive coverage in Origen's commentary on John's Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John's Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάρξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that “the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel's] use”; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges “the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

9 This is the only instance of the verb ἀπορέω (aporeō, be at a loss) in this Gospel. The verb's other NT occurrences convey the notion of perplexity (Mark 6:20; Luke 24:4 [cf. 21:25]; Acts 25:20; 2 Cor. 4:8; Gal. 4:20). See also 1 Macc. 3:31; Josephus, Ant. 2.12.2 §271; Life 32 §161; the “Unknown Gospel” 1.63 (mid–second century A.D.) (see Bell and Skeat 1935: 13).

27 See the introduction above. There is no good reason to believe that John's Gospel itself is based on a gnostic Vorlage, as Bultmann (1971: 25–31, and passim) held, or that it reflects Docetism and was erroneously included in the canon (the view of Käsemann 1968: 76–77 [cited in Sloyan 1996: 127, 129–30]).

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon's work is given extensive coverage in Origen's commentary on John's Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John's Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάρξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that “the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel's] use”; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges “the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

Smallwood, E. M. 349n134, 513, 525n16
Smith, B. H. 583n1
Smith, C. A. 396n1

134 Note also the absence of the definite article before συνέδριον in the Greek (which may imply “a gathering” rather than “the Sanhedrin”), though not too much should be made of this (Morris 1995: 501 n. 99). For a complete list of high priests from 200 B.C. to A.D. 70, see Jeremias 1969: 377–78. For a list of high priests from 37 B.C. to A.D. 68, see Smallwood 1962: 31–32. For a list of the most important high priests from 200 B.C. to the time of Jesus, see Köstenberger 2002c: 114. R. Brown (1966: 439) suggests that there may be an intentional contrast between the gathering of the Sanhedrin here and the gathering of the children of God in 11:52.

16 Jesus’ trial and crucifixion under Pilate are also attested by non-Christian sources such as the Roman historian Tacitus (Annales 15.44). Pilate’s tenure came to an end in A.D. 36/37, when he was deposed and sent to Rome by Vitellius, legate of Syria, on account of his brutal action in a Samaritan uprising (Josephus, Ant. 18.4.2 §§88–89; see Smallwood 1954). He arrived in Rome after Tiberius’s death (March 16, A.D. 37).

1 It is possible that John 13 represents a chiasm centering on Jesus’ pronouncement in 13:18–20. See Moloney 1986: 372 (following Simoens 1981: 101). However, this proposal gives insufficient consideration to 13:31 as start of the farewell discourse proper. For a critique of chiastic proposals related to the Johannine farewell discourse, see Kellum 2005: 63–72. Kellum concludes that “on a structural level the farewell discourse resists a chiastic solution,” both owing to “the lack of stated awareness of macro-chiasm in antiquity” and because “the text of the farewell discourse itself resists a chiastic arrangement” (ibid., 72). See also the recent paper by C. Smith (2002) pointing out foundational weaknesses of contemporary chiastic studies. John

Smith, D. 283n24

Smith, D. M. 3n7, 17, 69n45, 91n7, 122, 134, 215, 230n10, 249n11, 258n33, 260n47, 282n19, 294n80, 370n13, 380n20, 391, 409n52, 438n77, 448n4, 485n9, 496n60, 507n25, 13–17 in its entirety explicates 1:7.

24 Cf. D. Smith 1985, building on the work of Douglas 1984.

7 As late as 1990, D. M. Smith (1990: 293 n. 30) could write, “Martyn’s thesis has become a paradigm... . It is a part of what students imbibe from standard works, such as commentaries and textbooks, as knowledge generally received and held to be valid.”

45 See also the suggestion by D. M. Smith (1999: 70): “Possibly John denies knowledge of Jesus because in this Gospel knowledge of Jesus, that is, who he really is in relation to the Father, can only come by revelation.”

7 It is doubtful that the reference to “the third day” represents an allusion to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 102; Carson 1991: 167; Burge 2000: 90; contra Borchert 1996: 153; Stibbe 1993: 46; Keener 2003: 497–98). The reference serves as a chronological connective with preceding events, perhaps indicating that the promise of 1:51 was quickly fulfilled (Beasley-Murray 1999: 34, citing Schnackenburg 1990: 1.325; cf. Talbert [1992: 86], who says that 2:1–11 serves as fulfillment of the prophecy in 1:51; and D. M. Smith [1999: 86], who speaks of the “first installment ... of the revelation promised in 1:51”). The beginning of Jesus’ final week is signaled in 12:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 189–90).

10 Keener (2003: 705) observes that the statement in 7:5 (“not even his brothers were believing in him”) follows on the heels of the apostasy of many of Jesus’ disciples (6:66), adding to a wave of unbelief mounting against Jesus. Keener (2003: 706, citing D. M. Smith 1999: 168) also adduces the incident recounted in Mark 3:21, 31–35.

11 A survey of major commentaries shows that about half provide a regular commentary (Carson, Laney, Lindars, Whitacre, Calvin, Westcott), while the other half refrain from comment (Michaels, Talbert, Stibbe, Brodie, D. M. Smith), in some cases choosing not to address the issue at all (e.g., Schlatter [1948: 205], who in his scholarly commentary moves directly from 7:52 to 8:12 without comment, though his popular commentary [1962: 139–41] does treat the pericope adulterae in deference to “ecclesiastical tradition”; see also Zahn [1921: 404], who, like Schlatter, moves immediately from 7:52 to 8:12 and deals with the pericope in a lengthy excursus on pp. 723–30).

33 D. M. Smith (1999: 184) says that “the Jews” here “at once manifest their ignorance and feign their innocence.” Whitacre (1999: 215) notes that, ironically, it is really “the Jews” whose unbelief amounts to spiritual suicide.

47 So the majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 305–6; Carson 1991: 346–47; Morris 1995: 404; Beasley-Murray 1999: 132; D. M. Smith 1999: 185; Borchert 1996: 301 n. 182; Burge 2000: 259; Bultmann 1971: 252 n. 2; contra R. Brown 1966: 354–55, 358; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.204–5; Moloney 1998: 277; Westcott 1908: 2.13–14.

19 Michaels (1989: 160) comments, “Like a laborer determined to finish his job before nightfall, Jesus summons his disciples to join him in taking full advantage of the remaining daylight hours.” D. M. Smith (1999: 192) notes that the time is short both for Jesus, who must complete his work on earth before his hour of departure arrives, and for his hearers, whose opportunity to respond positively to Jesus is close to gone (12:35–36). In this regard, compare the repeated references to Jesus’ appointed “time” in John’s Gospel (Beasley-Murray 1999: 155).

80 Carson 1991: 376; Morris 1995: 440; R. Brown 1966: 375. D. M. Smith (1999: 199) suggests that the ambiguity may be intentional, while Barrett (1978: 364) doubts that John intentionally meant to distinguish between these two meanings in 9:36 and 9:38. Regarding the question “Who is he ... ?” see 12:34 (cf. Acts 9:5).

13 Morris (1995: 520) prefers the translation “Blessed is he that comes” over “Blessed be the one.” If this is correct, then the phrase constitutes a statement rather than a prayer. Freed (1961) maintains that the OT quotations in John 12:13–15 demonstrate Johannine literary dependence on the Synoptics; but see the rebuttal by D. M. Smith 1963.

20 Though there is no need to suppose, as D. M. Smith (1999: 239) does, that “John and Hebrews knew a tradition about Jesus’ agony without knowing the story as we find it in the Synoptics.”

52 So Morris 1995: 549 n. 27; apparently, Carson 1991: 464–66; and the UBS committee (Metzger 1994: 204), adducing the “preponderant weight of external attestation”; contra Barrett 1978: 442; Beasley-Murray 1999: 229 n. f; Lindars 1972: 451; D. M. Smith 1999: 254; Dunn 1970: 250–51.

77 D. M. Smith (1999: 274–75) notes that “you” here is plural, which leads him to infer that the statement does not necessarily refer to personal indwelling. In principle, this is true, but the statement could just as well be plural because Jesus is speaking to a group of followers (rather than a single person), not because reference is made to communal as opposed to individual indwelling. Despite the plural “you,” the latter scenario seems more likely (note, e.g., the singular pronoun construction κακεῖνος [kakeinos, and that one] in 14:12, and compare the Pauline teaching on the Spirit’s indwelling of individual believers). On some of the systematic-theological issues raised by the present verse, see Hamilton (2003), who takes the passage as a point of departure for arguing that OT believers were regenerated but not indwelt by the Spirit.

4 Though it seems far-fetched to see in the present passage a secondary reference to the Eucharist, as do Brodie (1993: 482) and D. M. Smith (1999: 281) (citing Matt. 26:29; Mark 14:25).

9 Moloney (1998: 469, 473) seems to believe that the prayer was spoken while Jesus was still at the Passover meal, with his disciples still present at the table. D. M. Smith (1999: 308), too, insists on this presumption.

60 Barrett (1978: 510) rightly contends that “truth” here “means the saving truth revealed in the teaching and activity of Jesus.” Earlier references to the word in this chapter are 17:6 and 17:14 (see also 17:20, and 14:23–24; 15:3, 20, earlier in the farewell discourse). The present phrase is similar to Ps. 119:142: “Your law is true” (cf. 119:151, 160). David likewise acknowledged, “Your words are trustworthy” (2 Sam. 7:28; cf. Ps. 19:7). D. M. Smith (1999: 315) perceptively observes that the reference to God’s word here seems sudden, since according to the prologue it is Jesus who is the Word. As Smith duly notes, however, the difficulty is alleviated by the fact that “after Jesus is named (1:17), he is never again called the Word in the Gospel.”

25 Contra Lindars (1972: 541: “scarcely ... an historically reliable detail ... John’s way of expressing ... theological fact”), apparently echoed by D. M. Smith (1999: 330: “scarcely conceivable historically ... John’s way of conveying theological points”), I see no reason to question the historicity of the account.

14 Talbert (1992: 235–36) points to a reference in the Gospel of the Hebrews to the effect that John used to supply fish to the court of the high priest while still working for his father, Zebedee. This is also noted by D. M. Smith (1999: 335), who adds that “fishermen were entrepreneurs, not

Smith, R. H. 506, 506n17
Smothers, E. R. 244
Soards, M. 591n22, 591n24
Sordi, M. 469n32
Spencer, P. E. 583n3, 585n9

common laborers at the bottom of the social spectrum” (citing Wuellner 1967: 45–61).

43 The Greek wording is identical to Matt. 26:74. The translation “began to crow” reflects the understanding that the aorist verb ἐφώνησεν (ephōnēsen) is ingressive (cf., e.g., the TNIV). If so, D. M. Smith’s (1999: 337) point is moot that “it is only in Mark that the cock crows twice (14:72; cf. 14:30),” but that “like Matthew and Luke, John reports only one cock-crowing” (cf. Laney 1992: 326). Mishnaic legislation prohibited the raising of fowl in Jerusalem (m. B. Qam. 7.7), but it is unlikely that this prohibition was strictly obeyed in Jesus’ day (Jeremias 1969: 47–48).

60 As Carson (1991: 598) notes, “All the witnesses were too blind to see it at the time, but this Man was displaying his glory, the glory of the one and only Son, in the very disgrace, pain, weakness and brutalization that Pilate advanced as suitable evidence that he was a judicial irrelevance.” So also D. M. Smith (1999: 346): “In typical Johannine fashion, and with a touch of irony, Pilate is saying more than he could possibly know theologically.”

25 Carson (1991: 638–39 [contra Bultmann 1971: 684]) suggests, on the basis of Luke 24:12, that Peter did not believe at this time (cf. D. M. Smith 1999: 374). Byrne (1985: 92) calls him “the odd-man-out” within the context of John 20. Morris (1995: 737, following Michaels 1989: 336) says that Peter could have believed, and the evangelist may have chosen to present the beloved disciple’s reaction as his own while describing Peter from an external point of view.

17 D. M. Smith (1999: 378) observes, “Jesus’ permanent postresurrection state will not obtain until he has ascended to the Father, which he will now do”; Schlatter (1948: 358) comments, “Jesus’ entry into fellowship with the Father in heaven is the prerequisite for his fellowship with the disciples.” On Jesus’ return to the Father, see also 3:13; 7:33; 13:1, 3; 14:4, 12, 28; 16:5, 17, 28; 17:11.

34 Witherington (1995: 354) considers this to be “a fellowship meal, a family reunion of a sort” (similarly, Michaels 1989: 356, 358), contra those who would detect the presence of “eucharistic symbolism” (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1098–1100; D. M. Smith 1999: 394; Stibbe 1993: 212; Whitacre 1999: 494). In fact, Beasley-Murray (1999: 404) points out that what is celebrated here is not Jesus’ death but his resurrection, which enabled his followers to enjoy fellowship with their Lord subsequent to his death. He classifies the present meal as “an epiphany celebration of the risen Lord” (following Rissi 1979: 81–86). Schlatter (1948: 369) says that the disciples’ present disposition fulfills 16:23.

17 See the discussions in R. Smith 1966; Jeremias 1968: 83–87.

22 See Ridderbos 1997: 661 n. 17; Soards 1983. In 13:4–5, the same term is used for Jesus’ wrapping a towel around himself in preparation for washing his disciples’ feet.

24 So, rightly, Barrett 1978: 580–81; Morris 1995: 762 n. 19 (though Soards [1983: 283] may have a point when he says “that the impetuous Peter met in this story would not have modesty uppermost in his mind”). Cf. t. Ber. 2.20.

32 See the use of λατρεία (latreia, service, worship) with reference to Jewish worship in Rom. 9:4; Heb. 9:1, 6. On Roman persecution, see Sordi 1994. The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) is explanatory (Barrett 1978: 484).

9 See Schlatter 1948: 363–77. Note, for example, the references to a charcoal fire in 21:9 and 18:18 and to “drawing” in 21:8 and 12:32, as well as the links between 21:20; 13:23; 1:18 (see Ellis 1992: 18–19). See also the common elements between the good shepherd discourse in chapter 10 and Peter’s commissioning in 21:15–19 (Cassian 1956–57: 132–36 [cited in Minear 1983: 95 n. 24]). Minear (1983: 96–97) further notes the appellation of Thomas as “the twin” in 20:24 and 11:16; the references to Nathanael in 21:2 and 1:45–51 and to Cana in chapters 2, 4, and 21; and several other terminological and thematic connections. Gaventa (1996: 245) notes the similarity between μετὰ ταῦτα (meta tauta, after these things) in 21:1 and 19:38. To this may be added the term “Sea of Tiberias” (21:1; cf. 6:1); Simon Peter “son of John” (21:15; cf. 1:42); Jesus’ taking (λαμβάνω, lambanō) and distributing (δίδωμι, didōmi) bread (21:13; cf. 6:11 [close verbal parallels with 6:11, where Jesus’ giving thanks is explicitly mentioned, may imply thanksgiving in 21:13]); the double ἀμήν (amēn, truly) (21:18; cf., e.g., 1:51); the connection between Peter’s and Jesus’ death established by the evangelist’s parenthetical comment (21:19; cf. 12:33); Jesus’ call for his disciples to “follow” him (21:19, 22; cf. 1:43); and other verbal links, grammatical features, and thematic connections (Osborne 1981: 294). Spencer (1999) finds the following “narrative echoes” of earlier portions in John’s narrative: (1) the feeding of the five thousand (ch. 6); (2) Peter’s threefold denial (18:15–18, 25–27); (3) the footwashing and the final meal (13:3–5, 36–38); and (4) the good shepherd discourse (10:1–18). Note, however, that Spencer considers chapter 21 to be a “later redactional addition” (p. 68).

25 Cf. Pliny the Younger, Epistulae 10.96 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 148; cf. Stählin, TDNT 7:339–58).

10 See Köstenberger 1999a: 30–31. There has been a virtual avalanche of literary explorations of Johannine themes or specific Johannine portions of text pouring from the presses in the last two decades. Among those are Culpepper 1983; Duke 1985; Staley 1988; M. Davies 1992; Stibbe 1992; 1994; Lee 1994; Tovey 1997; Beck 1997; Conway 1999; and Harstine 2002, to list but a few.

10 So Culpepper 1980–81: 15–17. This is supported by the observation of Pryor (1990: 202) that 1:14 is not to be considered as the prologue’s “great incarnational turning point,” but that “the ministry of the historical Jesus, which is unquestionably in focus in vv 12–13, ought to be projected back at least to v 9.” Staley (1988: 53–55) suggests that the center is found in 1:12–13.

12 For a similar (but not identical) analysis, see Staley 1986: 245–46 (yet his suggested implications for the Gospel’s narrative structure are rather idiosyncratic).

28 In contrast to Mark 1:7, John uses ἄγιος not ἱερεύς, does not use κύριος (Schlatter 1948: 45), and uses ἵνα plus subjunctive rather than an infinitive (Barrett 1978: 175). Staley (1988: 60) detects a progression from the Baptist’s more active role in relation to Jesus in 1:26–34 to his taking a more passive role after 1:35 until the shift is completed in 3:22–36. See also the insightful comments on the nature of the Baptist’s witness by Westcott 1908: 1.37.

4 For an unfavorable comparison between this character and the man born blind in John 9, see the discussion there. Keener (2003: 639, following Culpepper 1983: 139) contends that 5:1–15 serves as a (negative) foil for the (positive) characterization in chapter 9 of the man born blind, calling the contrasting of characters a common rhetorical device. See also Asiedu-Pepurah 2001; Staley 1991. For a discussion of the similarities and differences between John 5 and 9, see Lee 1994: 105–7.

Stauffer, E. 547n39, 549n48
Steele, M. 114
Stegemann, E. 133n1
Steinmetz, D. 5
Stenger, W. 596n5
Stern, M. 239n50
Sternberg, M. 347
Stibbe, M. W. G. xii, 5n10, 22n13, 36n52, 38n57, 52n2, 58n4, 64n29, 81n93, 91n7, 100n39, 34 Ridderbos 1997: 188; Carson 1991: 245; Morris 1995: 271; Culpepper 1983: 138; 1993: 204–5; contra Staley 1991: 63–64. The term ὑγιής (hygiēs, well, healthy) occurs five times in this chapter, six times total in John, and only five other times in the rest of the NT (Morris 1995: 271–72 n. 30).

39 According to one talmudic passage, a rabbi stood under the gallows of a hanged disciple and wept (b. B. Meṣi'a 83b; see Stauffer 1960: 111–12, 179 n. 1).

48 In antiquity, a dying person ordinarily would entrust his mother to another with a direct charge such as this: “I leave to you my mother to be taken care of” (Lagrange 1925: 494 [cited in R. Brown 1970: 907]; cf. Lucian, Toxaris 22). In the LXX, the adoption formula is generally “you are” rather than “here is” as in the present passage (“ ‘Mother, here is your son’ ... ‘Here is your mother’ ”; cf. Ps. 2:7; Tob. 7:12). The form of expression used in John has a Semitic ring. Speaking of “the official formula of the old Jewish family law,” one commentator refers to a crucified man’s “right to make testamentary dispositions, even from the cross” (Stauffer 1960: 13; cf. Borchert 2002: 269; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278).

1 On the connections between 3:22–36 and 3:11–21, see Klaiber 1990. Stegemann (1990: 514), in a very sound structural proposal, views 1:19–34 and 3:22–36 as inclusios encompassing 1:19–3:36, which in turn is a composite of 1:19–2:11 (John the Baptist; first week of Jesus’ ministry; first sign) and 2:13–3:36 (Jesus’ ministry in Jerusalem, including sign; John the Baptist [2:12 is transitional]).

5 Though it is fascinating to contemplate the contrast in John 21 between the beloved disciple, who knows himself to be loved by Jesus (21:7a, 20a), and Peter, who is called to love Jesus (21:15–17). See Schenk 1992: 516–17, referring to Stenger 1990: 240 and Ruckstuhl 1977: 340, 343, 356.

50 Does this imply that Jesus’ contemporaries thought him capable of instructing Gentiles in the Diaspora by using Greek? If so, the present passage would provide indirect evidence that Jesus was known to at least speak (if not write) Greek. On the question of the language of Jesus, see the surveys by C. Rabin and G. Mussies in Safrai and Stern 1976: 1007–64 (plus the bibliography cited there); see also Silva 1991 (plus the bibliography cited there on p. 222 n. 3).

10 See Köstenberger 1999a: 30–31. There has been a virtual avalanche of literary explorations of Johannine themes or specific Johannine portions of text pouring from the presses in the last two decades. Among those are Culpepper 1983; Duke 1985; Staley 1988; M. Davies 1992; Stibbe 1992; 1994; Lee 1994; Tovey 1997; Beck 1997; Conway 1999; and Harstine 2002, to list but a few.

13 Stibbe (1993) sees elusiveness as Jesus’ “major character trait in John’s Gospel,” contending that “Jesus is depicted throughout the story as the one who evades people both at the level of presence and at the level of language” (p. 25). Though this may be true at other places in the narrative, Stibbe’s analysis of 1:18 hardly seems accurate: “What we have at the end of the Prologue is therefore the implication that the elusiveness of Jesus reflects the elusiveness of God” (p. 26). How does this square with the explicit statement in 1:18 that Jesus gives a full account of the Father? The Son must not be so elusive after all, since countless individuals down through the generations (including Jesus’ own followers) have come to know the Father through the revelation of his Son (cf. 14:6).

52 Stibbe (1993: 27) observes, “The fact that the world does not acknowledge Jesus shows that John has no time for what literary theorists call ‘the pathetic fallacy’—the fallacious view that nature sympathizes with the poet and/or the hero. The world in John’s story is actively hostile to the protagonist.”

57 Culpepper (1983: 125–32) has a helpful discussion of the evangelist’s characterization of “the Jews.” For a critique of Culpepper’s methodology of characterization and an alternate proposal, see Stibbe 1992: 24–25.

2 Stibbe, in a fascinating article entitled “The Elusive Christ,” has shown that John portrays Jesus as elusive both in his language (chs. 2–4) and in his movements (chs. 5–10). In chapters 11 and 12, “tension mounts as Jesus openly returns to the place of maximum danger and as the Sanhedrin formally plot to have Jesus killed” (Stibbe 1991: 36). Stibbe’s literary analysis further confirms the divisions sketched above into an initial “Cana cycle” in chapters 2–4 and a “festival cycle” in chapters 5–10, with chapters 11–12 occupying a bridge function. Even the pivotal defection in chapter 6, followed by the narration of opposition in Jesus’ family in chapter 7, seems to be borne out by Stibbe’s study in that all but one of the references to the Jews seeking Jesus in order to kill (or arrest) him are found after this pivot (5:18; 7:1, 19, 20, 25, 30; 8:37, 40; 10:39; 11:8) (Stibbe 1991: 22).

4 Stibbe (1993: 31) sees 1:19–28 as forming a chiasm, with 1:23 as its center.

29 Stibbe (1993: 33) again points to the theme of the “elusive Christ”: “Even though Jesus is not visibly on stage, his elusive presence is felt in the Baptist’s rather obscure remark. ... The reference here is clearly to the mysterious and elusive presence of Jesus himself.” Beyond this, the phrase “one whom you do not know” may also allude to the view held by some in that day that before commencing his public ministry, the Messiah would live a hidden life on earth (see commentary at 1:31; 7:27; see also Ridderbos 1997: 68; Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. d). The word “stand” (ἑστηκεν, hestēken), a perfect, has present force (cf. Mark 10:19; Acts 26:27; Heb. 6:9; see Wallace 1996: 579–80).

93 Stibbe (1993: 42) observes that Nathanael’s question “sounds very much like a local proverb.” Westcott (1908: 1.55) notes that some of the church fathers took this expression positively: “Something good can come out of Nazareth.”

7 It is doubtful that the reference to “the third day” represents an allusion to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 102; Carson 1991: 167; Burge 2000: 90; contra Borchert 1996: 153; Stibbe 1993: 46; Keener 2003: 497–98). The reference serves as a chronological connective with preceding events, perhaps indicating that the promise of 1:51 was quickly fulfilled (Beasley-Murray 1999: 34, citing Schnackenburg 1990: 1.325; cf. Talbert [1992: 86], who says that 2:1–11 serves as fulfillment of the prophecy in 1:51; and D. M. Smith [1999: 86], who speaks of the “first installment ... of the revelation promised in 1:51”). The beginning of Jesus’ final week is signaled in 12:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 189–90).

39 Carson (1991: 169) rightly notes that there is little contextual support for the notion that Mary is here presented as a mediatrix between humanity and Jesus (contra those who see Mary here as representative of the people [e.g., Brodie 1993: 174]). Witherington (1995: 79, 378, referring to Ashton) may read too much into John's presentation when he sees Mary here depicted as a fledgling disciple who later becomes an "archetypal female disciple." Ridderbos (1997: 108) likewise seems to overreach when he suggests that Mary is symbolic of believing Israel, which has eagerly awaited the coming of the Savior. Another dubious suggestion is made by Stibbe (1993: 44), who proposes that Jesus' use of γύναι may constitute an allusion to Gen. 3:15, "in which case she is to be seen as the New Eve in the New Creation of Jesus' ministry." 36 Stibbe (1993: 55) observes, "Who is really the possessor of knowledge is the main subject of the dialogue."

5 Blomberg (1995: 8), with reference to Dockery (1988), lists five approaches to the present narrative: (1) allegorical (cf. 2 Kings 17:30–31); (2) existential (Bultmann 1971: 175–202); (3) pastoral (Milne 1993: 85–86); (4) salvation-historical (W. Davies 1974; Carson 1993); and (5) intertextual (focusing on OT parallels such as Gen. 24:10–61; 29:1–20; Exod. 2:15b–21) (Neyrey 1979). Acknowledging that all of these approaches capture elements of truth, Blomberg nevertheless finds them wanting and proposes a seven-pronged approach of his own. Stibbe (1993: 68–69) advocates a symbolic reading: "If the woman has had five husbands and is living de facto with a sixth, then Jesus is the seventh man in her life. Since seven is the perfect number in Judaism, the implicit commentary must be that Jesus is the man which she has been waiting for, the man in whose presence she will find wholeness." In the same vein, Brodie (1993: 217–18) sees this as a betrothal-type scene. See also Dockery (1988: 127–40), who distinguishes between author-, text-, and reader-oriented approaches, and Marshall 1974. R. Lightfoot (1956: 122) detects certain parallels between John 4 and 19.

40 Stibbe (1993: 75) observes, "By the end of the story he [the healed lame man] appears to be informing on the one who healed him."

43 Better is this characterization by Stibbe (1993: 77): "The passage is composed of five carefully related and sequential blocks of material. All of them are unified by the legal symbolism of the Gospel."

4 Stibbe (1993: 92) notes, "Throughout chapter 7, Jesus is elusive in relation to his past origins, his present language and movements, and to his future destiny in glory."

72 The particle μή (mē) at the beginning of the sentence is indicative of the Sanhedrin's "enraged frustration" (Ridderbos 1997: 279 n. 74). Stibbe (1993: 94) detects narrative echoes of the Nicodemus story in 3:1–21.

11 A survey of major commentaries shows that about half provide a regular commentary (Carson, Laney, Lindars, Whitacre, Calvin, Westcott), while the other half refrain from comment (Michaels, Talbert, Stibbe, Brodie, D. M. Smith), in some cases choosing not to address the issue at all (e.g., Schlatter [1948: 205], who in his scholarly commentary moves directly from 7:52 to 8:12 without comment, though his popular commentary [1962: 139–41] does treat the pericope adulterae in deference to "ecclesiastical tradition"; see also Zahn [1921: 404], who, like Schlatter, moves immediately from 7:52 to 8:12 and deals with the pericope in a lengthy excursus on pp. 723–30).

1 See Charles 1989; Lincoln 2000. Stibbe (1993: 99) contends that the present pericope constitutes a "trial scene," whereby "the implicit commentary ... supports the narrator's defence of the divinity of Jesus and the concomitant satire of the diabolism of the Jews." According to Stibbe, much of the irony in this chapter comes from Jesus taking on the role of Yahweh, and the Jews that of the false, pagan gods.

17 Stibbe (1993: 101) comments, “The irony of the chapter is the fact that Jesus himself becomes the prosecutor. Having begun a process of questioning and prosecuting Jesus, the three Jewish groups find themselves almost imperceptibly taking on the role of defendants. The old irony of the judged becoming the judge is played out here.”

39 Stibbe (1993: 107) notes that here, as in 5:1–15, Jesus is at the center of controversy even when he is offstage: “The narrator is employing the device of ‘focus’ in such a way as to leave Jesus in the centre of the reader’s thinking even when he is not physically present in the narrative world of the Gospel.” See further discussion below.

50 See especially Martyn 1977; 1979; R. Brown 1979. But see the critique in Stibbe 1992: 59–61.

18 Stibbe (1993: 113) characterizes παροιμία as “a symbolic word-picture with a cryptic meaning ... essentially elusive discourse.” Morris (1995: 445) suggests that this is a rather unique form of allegory. Ridderbos (1997: 355 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 168]) opts for a parable with allegorical elements (cf. 10:7–9). Bultmann (1971: 375) describes the genre as a mixture between parable and riddle. See Köstenberger 2002b: 72–75. See also the long discussion in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.284–88.

52 Once again, Stibbe (1993: 115) detects here a reference to the “elusive Christ.”

61 Cf. 18:18: “it was cold.” If so, he is referring to the Jews’ “chilling response” to Jesus (Hengel 1999: 319). See also Borchert 1996: 337. Contra Ridderbos 1997: 368; Carson 1991: 391–92. Stibbe (1993: 116) comments that the “sense of impending doom in 10.1–21 is heightened by the atmospheric statement of the narrator in v. 22.” Bultmann (1971: 361) suggests that the reference to the season serves to indicate that “the end is near,” as the “seasons of the year reflect the progress of the revelation.”

73 So, rightly, Carson (1991: 394–95), whose entire discussion repays careful reading (see also Morris 1995: 465; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174; Moloney 1998: 320; Burge 2000: 296; Laney 1992: 195; Stibbe 1993: 118; Westcott 1908: 2.68). Michaels (1989: 187) seems to conceive of Jesus’ unity with the Father in functional terms (whether primarily or exclusively so), as both of them doing “the same work.” Barrett (1978: 382) notes that the unity between the Father and the Son is also a unity of love and obedience.

1 Stibbe (1994: 39) calls the function of the present pericope “crucial” and “pivotal.” Various attempts have been made to isolate sources underlying the existing narrative, but as Dodd (1963: 230 [cited in M. Harris 1986: 311]) points out, “Nowhere perhaps, in this gospel, have attempts to analyse out a written source, or sources, proved less convincing, and if the evangelist is following a traditional story of fixed pattern, he has covered his tracks.” This observation also holds true for the attempts by Burkett (1994: 209–32) to isolate two previous accounts of Lazarus’s resurrection that allegedly have been combined into one in John 11.

3 Stibbe (1994: 40) proposes a pattern in which all but the seventh sign are paired up with another sign: 2:1–11 with 4:46–54; 5:1–15 with chapter 9; and 6:1–15 with 6:16–21. I have argued elsewhere that a more plausible structure is: Cana cycle: 2:1–11 / 2:14–22 / 4:46–54; festival cycle: 5:1–15 / 6:1–15 / chapter 9. In this structure the outer signs correspond (2:1–11 with 4:46–54 as the two Cana signs; 5:1–15 and chapter 9 as healings at pools in Jerusalem with negative versus positive responses). Stibbe (1994: 41) also suggests, quite implausibly, that the genre of the narrative is that of comedy.

7 Though note that Jesus’ resurrection also plays a role in the symbolism of the second sign recorded in John, the clearing of the temple (see 2:20–22). Stibbe (1994: 39; 1993: 121) points out that the seven signs of Jesus in John's Gospel span the whole gamut from the festive mood of a wedding to the aftermath of a funeral.

9 M. Harris (1986: 311) divides the text as follows: setting (11:1–6); complication (11:7–37); and resolution (11:38–44). However, this does not adequately recognize the geographical movement from the location outside Judea where Jesus hears of Lazarus's condition (11:1–16), to his arrival in Bethany (11:17–37), to his arrival at Lazarus's tomb (11:38–44) (see Stibbe 1994: 41). According to Stibbe (1994: 43–44), the evangelist has arranged his material "in five sections using the technique of inverted parallelism or chiasmus" (11:1–16, 17–22, 23–27, 28–32, 33–44), with the "I am" saying in the center (11:25–26). Stibbe (1994: 41–42) notes that of all the Johannine signs, only the Lazarus narrative has the miracle at the end, "as the grand finale of the story" (p. 42). The initial stance of Jesus in every instance is "outside": outside Judea; outside Bethany; outside the tomb (p. 43). The two main protagonists, Jesus and Lazarus, are far apart at the beginning and reunited at the end. Jesus is portrayed in his elusiveness and his humanity, and as the one who performs in his here-and-now ministry a function (raising the dead) reserved in traditional Jewish thought for God himself, even using the divine name (11:25) (Stibbe 1994: 44–45). Other ingredients of the present narrative are delay and misunderstanding.

23 In any case, the mere reference to Lazarus as "the one you love" in the present passage hardly warrants the conclusion by Eller (1987), Brownlee (1990: 191–94), and Stibbe (1992: 79–81) that the beloved disciple is Lazarus. See the discussion in Charlesworth 1995: xiii (who advances the hardly more plausible theory that the beloved disciple is the apostle Thomas).

31 Stibbe (1994: 51) paraphrases as follows: "I can return to Judea because the hour for my death (the hour of darkness) is not quite upon us. I will therefore not be killed ('stumble') at Bethany because I am still ministering in a season of pre-ordained security (daylight)." The saying is not without Jewish parallels (e.g., b. Sanh. 38b). Pollard (1973: 438, following Henderson 1920–21) somewhat implausibly suggests that the present statement indicates that Jesus "waited for light," that is, divine guidance, and hence the delay. But see the critique in Moule 1975: 118–20.

48 For Witherington (1995: 202), Thomas's comment "sounds more like fatalistic resignation to what seemed inevitable" (I would agree). Bultmann (1971: 400) speaks of "blind devotion" (with reference to 14:5 and 20:24–25); the exact same term is picked up by Beasley-Murray (1999: 189), who also notes the veiled irony in Thomas's statement. Stibbe (1993: 125) says that Thomas's comment "reveals an element of misunderstanding," manifesting "naiveté at best, insincerity at worst."

49 Stibbe (1994: 46) calls Thomas's statement one of "false bravado" and links it with Peter's similar statement in 13:37. According to Stibbe, both epitomize "a certain kind of false disciple: the kind which promises much in word (in this case, martyrdom) but delivers little in deed (where are Thomas and Peter when Jesus is crucified?)."

58 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 411; Barrett 1978: 394; Conway 1999: 139; Stibbe 1994: 48 (though he notes the return to a negative portrayal in 11:36, 45). Contra Morris (1995: 486), who finds the use of "the Jews" here "unusual" and suggests that it may imply that "though the mourners could bring themselves to sympathize with Martha and Mary, they were hostile to Jesus."

69 Ridderbos (1997: 396) persuasively argues that 11:25b refers to "death in the natural sense and to living in the sense of eternal life,” while “lives” in 11:26a “refers to natural human existence, while ‘never die’ refers to the eternal life that natural death can neither prevent nor affect” (so also Bultmann 1971: 403, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.331; Stibbe 1994: 51). Contra Carson (1991: 413), R. Brown (1966: 425), and Borchert (1996: 356) (also Calvin and Schlatter), who maintain that “lives” in 11:26a refers to eternal life. Wuellner (1991: 182) calls the present statement an oxymoron.

72 For this reason Witherington (1995: 203), who calls Martha’s confession “the least inadequate confession yet in this Gospel,” and R. Brown (1966: 433), who labels her belief “inadequate,” are overly negative. More positive are Morris (1995: 489), who says, “She may not understand fully the implications of what he has just said, but as far as she can she accepts it,” and Carson (1991: 414), who labels her faith as “a rich mixture of personal trust (fiducia) and of confidence that certain things about Jesus are true (assensus).” Keener (2003: 844–45) suggests that John, by including Martha’s confession, likely sought to balance gender the way Luke does (cf. Peter’s confession in 6:68–69). See also Stibbe (1994: 47), who perceives movement from two “I know’s” (11:22, 24) to a climactic “I believe” (11:27); from propositional to personal understanding; and from confessor to witness. Ridderbos (1997: 399–400) calls the confession “spontaneous and uninhibited” and sees it as reminiscent of the man blind from birth, who confessed despite his lack of understanding concerning the Son of Man (9:38). On “the Christ,” see commentary at 1:41; on “Son of God,” see commentary at 1:34 and 1:49.

80 An egregious example comes from Schnackenburg (1990: 2.333), who says that Mary “gives the impression of being nothing but a complaining woman,” a comment for which he is sharply rebuked by Borchert (1996: 359), who calls this “a Western male’s misunderstanding.” Pollard (1973: 438–41) strongly contends that Martha’s and Mary’s responses are diametrically opposed (cautioning against reading the present pericope in light of Luke 10:38–42): Martha exemplifies “confident trust,” but Mary demonstrates “hysterical weeping,” eliciting Jesus’ reaction of “bitter disappointment” (p. 440). Similarly, Stibbe (1994: 47), who maintains that these two women “exhibit different types of grief,” with Martha evincing “growth in resurrection faith,” and Mary’s grief being a “desperate, passionate and forlorn affair.” For Pollard (1973: 441), “the lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews who were with her” is the actual reason why Jesus decides to raise Lazarus.

94 The term δακρῦω occurs occasionally in the LXX (Job 3:24; Ezek. 27:35; Mic. 2:6; 2 Macc. 4:37; Sir. 12:16; 31:13). Owing to the force of the verb tense in the Greek original (an “ingressive aorist”), “Jesus burst into tears” is a better translation than the customary “wept” (Morris 1995: 495 n. 77; cf. Barrett 1978: 400; Pollard 1973: 441; Stibbe 1994: 45). This is suggested by comparison with instances of δακρῦω in the same grammatical form in Greco-Roman and Hellenistic Jewish literature, where the term is regularly rendered this way (see Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 17.66.4; 27.6.1; Plutarch, Camillus 5.5; Pyrrhus 34.4; Pompeius 80.5; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162; J.W. 5.10.5 §445; 6.5.3 §304).

95 Contra the unilateral docetic emphasis on Jesus’ deity (see Ridderbos 1997: 402–3). See the brief discussion and references to Jesus’ thirst, tiredness, and so on in Köstenberger 1998b: 50. See also Stibbe (1993: 124–25), who notes that Jesus “is not some mystical, neo-Platonic God who stands far beyond the harsh realities endured by those trapped within a frail mortality,” but rather is “the deity who sheds tears, who feels anger, and who dares to look through the dark threshold of a place which he himself will have to enter.”

101 Termed “narrative echo effect” by Stibbe 1994: 39, following R. C. Tannehill. R. Brown (1966: 436) further notes that this verse “calls forth the memory of the blind man, so that Jesus as the light and Jesus as the life will be juxtaposed.”

125 Stibbe (1994: 53) brilliantly elaborates that John expects the reader to follow the beginning and middle of a pericope from the point of view of its end, so that narrative form and christological claim coincide. Jesus Christ is portrayed as the eschaton personified, “the one who brings the end of history into the middle of time.” Stibbe also notes the classic character of the story in which Jesus appears as one who is both sympathetic and yet able to transcend the situation. See also Reiser (1973: 52–54), who notes the parallels between 11:43–44, on the one hand, and 5:25, 28b, as well as 10:3, 10, 17–18 respectively.

17 According to Stibbe (1993: 132), 11:2 serves as an analepsis with 11:32 (where Mary falls at Jesus’ feet) and as a prolepsis with chapter 13 (the footwashing) and 19:38–42 (Jesus’ burial).

9 The address κύριε (kyrie) is best rendered “sir” (Carson 1991: 437; Barrett 1978: 422). The verb ἰδεῖν (idein) here means “to visit with, to meet” (R. Brown 1966: 466) or “to have an interview with” (Carson 1991: 437; Barrett 1978: 422). Stibbe (1993: 136) contends that “the use of the verb ‘see’ points to the depth of their [the ‘Greeks’] seeking.” Moloney (1998: 352, 359) lists numerous instances in this Gospel where that verb is used with reference to “the acceptance or the refusal of Jesus’ role as the revealer.”

14 Stibbe (1993: 140) views 12:44–50 as “a dramatic soliloquy, a form of discourse in which the hero voices his thoughts on an empty stage.” According to Stibbe, this “anticipates much of the farewell discourses, where the reader overhears the Revealer speaking or praying in apparent isolation.”

104 The transition from 14:31 to 15:1 is frequently labeled an aporia, which is commonly taken to indicate a literary seam indicating the presence of different underlying sources (one of the first to see such a difficulty was C. H. Weiss 1856: 116; cf. Wellhausen 1907 and the influential series of essays by E. Schwartz 1907; 1908; see the historical survey in Kellum 2005: 10–78). However, this conclusion seems premature and unwarranted in light of preferable alternate explanations. Thielman (1991: 180), for instance, suggests that the present passage may be an instance of a “purposeful attempt at obscurity” common in ancient writers (he cites the transition from 5:47 to 6:1 as another possible example). Recently, Kellum (2005: 230) has suggested that statements indicating movement in the Fourth Gospel regularly serve as ways to move along the narrative. Stibbe (1993: 159), too, is able to make “very good sense” of the narrative as it stands without resorting to source-critical theories. For him, 14:31 is part of the Johannine theme of “the elusive Christ.” After saying in 14:30 that the devil “has no hold” on him, Jesus, knowing that the “prince of this world” is now coming, is evading his captors for one final time. Schlatter (1948: 304), finally, makes the improbable suggestion that the unevenness may be due to a break in dictation.

28 As mentioned, Judas seems to be the prime example (cf. 13:10–11; 15:2; see Stibbe 1996: 161–62). Both verbs ἐβλήθη (ēblēthē) and ἐξηράνθη (exēranthē) are in the Greek aorist (lit., “has been thrown” and “has been withered”), indicating the completeness of the divine judgment (see the discussion in Carson 1991: 519). Of the four verbs in 15:6, the first two are passive and the second two active in the Greek, which is a bit awkward in English. Hence, several translations (such as the NIV, NLT, RSV, NRSV, and TNIV) render συναγούσιν (synagousin, they gather), for example, as a passive (but see KJV, ASV, NASB, NKJV; Ridderbos 1997: 518). In either case, the agents are left unspecified.

36 Though the point made by Stibbe (1993: 172) is likely apropos: “The silence of the disciples at this point reveals their caution. When Peter asked the question before, it led to a severe warning ... (13:38). When Thomas asked this question in 14:5, it led to a thinly veiled rebuke. ... The silence of the disciples in Jn 16:5 is therefore entirely explicable. [They] have become very cautious about asking questions.”

64 While acknowledging that “the equation of the mother in labour with the disciples in bereavement seems to be the first order of reference and application,” Stibbe (1993: 175) argues that the symbol is multivalent. According to Stibbe, the second order of reference is the impending agony of Jesus on the cross (citing 19:34; cf. 7:38). If so, then Jesus’ death is described here as a childbirth experience. Calvin (1961: 125) takes the symbolism in a different direction, saying that believers are like women in labor both in that they have already entered God’s kingdom and in that they are still “held captive in the penitentiary of the flesh” and long for their eternal destiny.

76 Carson (1991: 548) notes how 16:28 sums up Jesus’ entire mission, from his sending from the Father (3:16–17) through the incarnation (1:10–11, 14) to his departure from the world (14:19) and his return to the Father (the dominant theme of chs. 14–17). Similarly, Borchert 2002: 179. Barrett (1978: 496) even calls the verse “a complete summary ... of the Christian faith,” Beasley-Murray (1999: 287) “at once a summary of Johannine Christology and the heart of this Gospel” (combined by Burge 2000: 443), and Stibbe (1996: 174) “the parade example of this theme of the eternal origin and destiny of Jesus the Messiah.”

8 Stibbe (1993: 178) memorably contends that “the Jesus of John’s story [and of the present prayer] obeys very different laws of gravity [than mere mortals]. In our Newtonian perspective, ‘what goes up must come down.’ In the Johannine law of gravity, the opposite seems to be true: ‘what comes down [Jesus] must go up!’ ” He adds (echoes of Käsemann?), “John’s Jesus utters his prayer not as a human being on earth but as a divine being somewhere beyond both time and space.” This is hardly an accurate reading of the prayer, however. In failing to understand the prayer’s relation to John’s depiction of Jesus as the sent Son whose mission is about to be completed (see commentary below), Stibbe erects a false dichotomy (“not as a human being ... but as a divine being”) and then disavows the former and unilaterally accentuates the latter, which hardly does justice to the sense of dependence expressed by Jesus on his sender, the Father.

49 See 6:37, 39, 70; 10:28–29; 18:8–9. The juxtaposition of the verbs “protect” and “keep safe” reflects Semitic parallelism (cf. Prov. 18:10). The verb ἐφύλαξα (ephylaxa, I guarded) may conjure up the image of a shepherd guarding his flock (Ridderbos 1997: 553). On “the name you gave me,” see 17:11. R. Brown (1970: 764) views the events of 18:5–8 as a demonstration of how God’s name protects the disciples: when Jesus identifies himself as ἐγώ εἰμι (egō eimi, I am [he]), his arresters fall down, and the disciples are allowed to leave. Similarly, Stibbe (1993: 176–77), who notes how both of Jesus’ statements in his final prayer, that he protected his own (17:12) and that he completed his mission (17:4), anticipate realities still future from the vantage point of the Johannine narrative (cf. 18:1–11 and 19:30, respectively).

1 Stibbe (1992: 111–12) contends that John’s characterization of Jesus in his passion narrative consists of three aspects: Jesus as judge, king, and elusive God. Stibbe also suggests that 18:1–27 serves as an “implicit commentary on the truth enunciated in 1:5” (i.e., the victory of the light over the darkness [p. 100]). On the relationship between the Johannine and the Synoptic passion narratives, see Ridderbos 1996: 569–72; Carson 1991: 571–76; Westcott 1908: 2.262–64. Burge (2000: 485–86) addresses the historical trustworthiness of the Johannine passion narrative. Moloney (1998: 482) divides 18:1–19:42 into five scenes on the basis of the introduction of new people and places. He also notes that this section begins and ends with κῆπος (kēpos, garden). R. Brown (1970: 813–17), too, has an extensive discussion of the structure and historicity of John’s passion narrative. See also the examination of theological and literary features of this section in Schnackenburg 1990: 3.218–19.

10 The present passage has been subjected to several highly creative but rather improbable readings (see esp. Whitacre 1999: 425; Brodie 1993: 529; Stibbe 1993: 182–84).

13 The term χιλίαρχος (chiliarchos) was used to translate the Roman tribunus militum, a commander of a cohort of six hundred or even as few as two hundred soldiers (e.g., Polybius, Histories 11.23; the LXX features twenty-nine instances of χιλίαρχος for civil or military officials). Stibbe (1992: 170) thinks that the σπεῖρα probably consisted of two hundred soldiers. See the discussion by Morris (1995: 656 n. 5), who suggests that the use of σπεῖρα with the definite article here may indicate that a specific cohort is meant.

23 Stibbe (1993: 182–84) takes this one step further when he says that in 18:1–11, Jesus “plays the part” of the good shepherd, and Judas that of the thief; and that in 18:15–27, the beloved disciple “plays the part” of the shepherd who walks in and out of the fold; the girl at the gate “plays the part” of the gatekeeper; and Peter is equated with the role of the hired hand who runs away in the hour of danger. Stibbe may be right in the case of Jesus acting as the good shepherd, Judas as the thief, and Peter as the hired hand. But if the beloved disciple is said to play the part of the shepherd just because he is shown to walk in and out of the high priest’s courtyard, one may perhaps also argue that Pilate is portrayed as a shepherd, since he too is shown repeatedly going in and out of his palace when oscillating back and forth between the crowds and Jesus. Stibbe’s reading here is too allegorical and lacks restraint; construing John 18 as, in essence, an allegorical outplaying of John 10 seems to take careful literary analysis a step too far.

26 This, then, becomes the climax of the “elusive Christ” motif in John’s Gospel. However, Stibbe (1993: 184) unduly dichotomizes when he says that the soldiers drew back in amazement “not so much because Jesus is divine as because they have at last apprehended the elusive Christ.” It is unclear to me how this reading can be firmly established from the text.

31 For an extensive literary examination of the links between the good shepherd discourse and 18:1–27, see Stibbe 1992: 101–4.

5 For the various ways in which Peter’s characterization is contrasted with that of Jesus, see the discussion in Stibbe 1992: 97–98. Stibbe notes that Jesus is presented twice answering under interrogation with the construction ἐγώ εἰμι (egō eimi, I am) while Peter twice answers with οὐκ εἰμί (ouk eimi, I am not). Also, Peter attacks a servant of the high priest, while Jesus is assaulted by a servant of the high priest. Finally, Peter is on trial outside, while Jesus is on trial inside. Duke’s (1985: 96–99) discussion of the characterization of Peter focuses on its ironic aspects.

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235).

Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

42 The contrast with Jesus is stark: “Jesus confronts his critics denying nothing, Peter wilts before his inquisitors denying everything” (Witherington 1995: 289). As Stibbe (1993: 181) notes, the poignancy of the contrast between Jesus and Peter is “carefully explored in the use of echo effects,” with Jesus’ twice-repeated self-identification “I am” (18:5, 8) corresponding to Peter’s twice-repeated denial “I am not” (18:17, 25). The repeated term “deny” brings to mind Matt. 10:33 and Luke 12:9 (Carson 1991: 586).

3 For a narrative exegesis of 18:15–19:22, see Larsen 2001: 122–39. Larsen views Pilate as an archetypal tragic figure, in application of the work of Northrop Frye with further reference to Culpepper (1983) and Stibbe (1992; 1994). Keener (2003: 1097) proposes another chiasm for 18:29–19:16, with 19:1–3 (scourging and crown of thorns) at the center. On John’s Passover chronology, see Keener 2003: 1100–1103. Keener (2003: 1103) does not favor Blomberg’s and Carson’s harmonization and concludes that the Synoptics and John “at least imply (perhaps for theological reasons) the Passover on different days.” I have similar problems here with Keener’s reconstruction as with his view on the temple cleansing.

4 Cf. Acts 19:35–41; 23:23–26:32. In his discussion of the characterization of Pilate in the Fourth Gospel, Culpepper (1983: 143) summarizes the role of Pontius Pilate by suggesting that he “represents the futility of attempted compromise.” Stibbe (1992: 109) disagrees, concluding that the reader should not necessarily view Pilate in a negative light.

18 As will be seen, this statement involves irony on multiple levels, because not only did the Jews lack the right to impose capital punishment under Roman law, but also, more importantly, they were forbidden under God’s law to execute anyone not formally convicted of a capital offense (see Michaels 1989: 314). Moreover, in yet further irony, the Jewish authorities’ response to Pilate’s teasing remark amounts to a public acknowledgment of the illegality and illegitimacy of their dealings with Jesus (so, rightly, Stibbe 1993: 190).

46 “Barabbas” is not a personal name but a patronymic (like Simon Barjonah, “son of Jonah”) that occurs also in the Talmud (see Twomey 1956). Very possibly John saw in this designation a play on words (Stibbe 1993: 190): “Barabbas” literally means “son of the father,” and John has presented Jesus as the Son of the Father throughout the Gospel.

72 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 601; cf. Morris 1995: 705; Beasley-Murray 1999: 340; Burge 2000: 505; Borchert 2002: 254. Contra Barrett (1978: 543), who thinks that the singular participle constructed from the verb παραδίδωμι (paradidōmi, I hand over) suggests Judas. See also the discussions by Schnackenburg (1990: 3.261–63) and Ridderbos (1997: 603), both of whom ultimately point to the Jews as the most likely referent. Stibbe (1992: 170) concludes that “the one” in 19:11 probably refers to Caiaphas as a representative of the Jewish nation, as the evangelist has a propensity to implicate the Jews in Jesus’ death.

42 See the extensive discussions in Carson 1991: 616; R. Brown 1970: 905–6. Symbolic interpretations (such as Brodie 1993: 549; Stibbe 1993: 194) fail to convince.

57 Hence, Stibbe (1993: 196) says that it is very probable that Passover symbolism is intended here.

68 Homeric mythology held that the gods were bloodless and had a kind of blood-water flowing through their veins (Iliad 5.339–42; cf. Plutarch, Moralia 180E). Stibbe (1992: 118, with reference to Barrett) sees in the flow of blood and water “the paradoxical association of life-giving properties with a dead man’s body.” Less likely is Whitacre’s (1999: 466) “sacramental” interpretation of blood and water symbolizing the Eucharist and baptism.

6 Apart from the connections mentioned below, Stibbe (1993: 204) detects aspects of “the elusive Christ” again in John 20 (he says that this is the “primary characteristic” of the portrayal of Jesus in this chapter). As Stibbe notes, “Jesus’ resurrection body is not immediately recognizable as the same as his pre-resurrection body,” which makes him “a Messiah who is not easy to grasp in any conventional sense.”

14 Commentators are not agreed as to whether Mary had already touched Jesus or was about to do so. Some say that Mary had already touched him (e.g., Morris 1995: 742; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.318; Witherington 1995: 331; R. Brown 1970: 992; Burge 2000: 555), while others seem to allow for the possibility that she was about to but had not yet done so (e.g., Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. g, 376; Bultmann 1971: 687). Regarding Mary’s devotion, see Ruth 1:16. Stibbe (1993: 205) says that the present passage is “most stylized” and detects intertextual echoes with Song 3:1–3.

7 Stibbe (1996: 203) comments, “Like Mary Magdalene, Thomas has made the journey to ‘owned’ faith ... his own faith in Jesus as Yahweh, ‘Lord and God.’ ” Note the double personal pronoun μου (mou, my), which accentuates the personal nature of Thomas’s confession (Carson 1991: 659; Beasley-Murray 1999: 386; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.332; Wallace 1995: 82).

9 Cf. Luke 5:1–11. Stibbe’s (1993: 210) characterization of the event that Peter initiates is insightful: “Having failed Jesus so obviously in 18.15–27, he now seeks to suppress and even obliterate the shame in his life by reverting to ‘life before Christ,’ to fishing. He seeks to deny the three denials. This attempt to fill his ‘hole in the soul’ with work fails dismally. The narrator laconically remarks that ‘they caught nothing.’ ”

10 Carson (1991: 670) here (as elsewhere) detects symbolism in the “night” reference, citing 3:2, 19–21; 13:30; 20:1. However, though 3:19–21 and 13:30 qualify, it is less clear that 3:2, 20:1, and the present instance do. Stibbe (1993: 210) draws attention to the fact that “the time between night and the early hours of the morning was precisely the time when Peter denied Jesus in 18.15–27.” Brodie’s (1993: 583) casting of the symbolism as setting “their boat in an atmosphere of alien darkness” seems overdone, as does Whitacre’s (1999: 490) contention that the early morning hour symbolizes “the dawning of spiritual light.”

26 Borchert (2002: 329) insightfully compares the references to a charcoal fire in 18:18 and the present passage, commenting, “Although the earlier fire marked the symbol of an uninviting situation of cold, hostile questioning, this second fire with its fish and bread must be seen as an inviting setting ... providing a new commissioning for Peter.” Similarly, Stibbe (1993: 211–12) says, “Jesus is recreating the setting in which Peter denied him.”

34 Witherington (1995: 354) considers this to be “a fellowship meal, a family reunion of a sort” (similarly, Michaels 1989: 356, 358), contra those who would detect the presence of “eucharistic symbolism” (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1098–1100; D. M. Smith 1999: 394; Stibbe 1993: 212; Whitacre 1999: 494). In fact, Beasley-Murray (1999: 404) points out that what is celebrated here is not Jesus’ death but his resurrection, which enabled his followers to enjoy fellowship with their Lord subsequent to his death. He classifies the present meal as “an epiphany celebration of the risen Lord” (following Rissi 1979: 81–86). Schlatter (1948: 369) says that the disciples’ present disposition fulfills 16:23.

Stimpfle, A. 168, 168n4
Story, C. I. K. 340n92, 537n83

8 Stibbe (1993: 213) notes that Peter had acted like a hired hand at his three denials of Jesus in John 18; now, Jesus evokes pastoral imagery to call him back to his vocation as a model shepherd.

10 Stibbe (1993: 214–15) contends that it “makes no sense at all for a rumour to spread concerning the immortality of a Galilaean fisherman,” and on that basis he suggests that the beloved disciple is Lazarus, the one who had already been raised from the dead once, “the founder of the community and the authority behind the Gospel.” This is intriguing indeed but highly conjectural and based on a very small amount of textual evidence.

4 One school of interpretation identifies πατρίς (patris, homeland, hometown) in 4:44 with Jerusalem (so Barrett 1978: 246; Dodd 1953: 352; 1963: 238–41; Meeks 1966; 1967: 39–40; see, much earlier, Origen, Commentarii in evangelium Joannis 13.54–56, cited in van Belle 1998: 30). However, see the critiques by W. Davies (1974: 321–31) and Stimpfle (1992: 89) as summarized by van Belle (1998: 30–32). The Galilee/Nazareth explanation is found already in Augustine (cited by van Belle 1998: 33) and is defended by Stimpfle (1992: 86–96 [followed by van Belle 1998: 27–44]) and others (see van Belle 1998: 32–33; see also Ridderbos 1997: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 73; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.463). Still others think that both Galilee and Judea are in view (Carson 1991: 235–36; Burge 2000: 151–52; Witherington 1995: 126; W. Davies 1974: 321–31).

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, “The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death.” See also Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999: 289. The mourners’ unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999: 192–93), several of whom adduce Paul’s statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus’ anger is directed toward both “the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow” and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus’ anger as occasioned by Mary’s turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either “misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition,” to mean “moved in spirit.” Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus’ struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, “He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself” (11:38 is translated “bearing the rebuke within himself”). According to Story, at the sight of people’s grief, Jesus was overcome by “momentary self-regret,” thinking, “Why did I not come sooner ... ? I have only myself to blame. ... Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?” However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

83 Cf. Did. 8:1; Mart. Pol. 7:1. See Torrey 1931 (including his critique of Str-B 2:834–85 on pp.

Str-B (H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck) 229n6, 233n24, 256, 405n26, 537n83, 547n37, 551, 576n23, 590n18
Strachan, R. H. 194
Strack, H. L. See Str-B
Strauss, D. F. 2, 358n5
Strickert, F. 79n86
Stuhlmacher, P. 18n30

235–36); Higgins 1954–55: 206–9; Story 1989: 318; Blomberg 1987: 177–78; Morris 1995: 708; Ridderbos 1997: 606.

6 For example, 1 Kings 8:2, 65; 12:32; 2 Chron. 5:3; 7:8; Neh. 8:14, 18; Ps. 81:3; Ezek. 45:25; Str-B 2:774. Josephus (Ant. 8.4.1 §100) called it “the greatest and holiest feast of the Jews.”

24 In the post-Jamnia period (after ca. A.D. 90), the term “rabbi” came to refer exclusively to those who had undergone formal rabbinic training. See b. Soṭah 22a (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 74–75; cf. Str-B 2:486; Beasley-Murray 1999: 108). See also commentary at 7:49.

26 For example, 1 Sam. 25:41; Jos. As. 20:1–5. See also the anecdote involving the mother of Rabbi Ishmael (d. ca. A.D. 135) recounted in Str-B 1:707.

83 Cf. Did. 8:1; Mart. Pol. 7:1. See Torrey 1931 (including his critique of Str-B 2:834–85 on pp. 235–36); Higgins 1954–55: 206–9; Story 1989: 318; Blomberg 1987: 177–78; Morris 1995: 708; Ridderbos 1997: 606.

37 See the extensive discussion by Carson (1991: 614), who contends that “the Evangelist sees in the entire distribution of Jesus’ clothes a fulfillment of both lines of Psalm 22:18, but mentions the peculiarity of the decision about the tunic because he was an eyewitness, and possibly because he saw something symbolic in the seamless garment.” Regarding the use of Ps. 22 in ancient Jewish writings, see Str-B 2:574–80. Regarding the “fulfillment quotations” in the latter half of John’s Gospel, which reach their crescendo in the passion narrative, see commentary at 12:38. “So this is what the soldiers did” seeks to bring closure to the section narrating the soldiers’ actions (19:16b–24).

23 See Schlatter 1959: 511; Beasley-Murray 1999: 383; Borchert 2002: 310. The rabbis used the terms “binding” and “loosing” to declare what was forbidden or permitted by the law. See Str-B 1:738–41; Büchsel, TDNT 2:60–61; J. Lightfoot 1859: 2.237–41; Dalman 1902: 213–17.

18 See Matt. 25:33; cf., e.g., Xenophon, Cyropaedia 7.1.3. See Str-B 1:980; BDAG 217. Brodie (1993: 584) draws rather precarious conclusions from the fact that the only other instance of the term “right” in this Gospel is Peter’s cutting off of Malchus’s right ear in 18:10.

5 See Köstenberger 2001b: 49–63. Ridderbos (1997: 413 [cf. Burge 2000: 336]) rightly contends that Mary is not the woman described in Luke 7 (though he perceives some degree of dependence on Mark 14:3–9 = Matt. 26:6–13). This view is rather common, though not universally so. Contra Holst (1976: 435–46), who on form-critical grounds believes that there is only one underlying historical event and that “variations arose in the course of oral transmission” (citing Dodd 1963: 172; other proponents include D. F. Strauss, Dibelius, and Bultmann).

86 For general (including archaeological) information on Bethsaida, see Strickert 1998; Kuhn and Arav 1991; and Pixner 1985.

30 See the brief treatments in Köstenberger 1999a: 36–37, 198–200. Stuhlmacher (2002: 185–87) contends that John and the Synoptics do not merely represent different perspectives (what M. Hengel calls “aspective”), but that the Fourth Gospel “cultivates a[n] ... idealized type of memory concerning Jesus.” He urges, “The Johannine witness therefore needs to be consistently

Swain, S. R. 45, 438

Swanson, R. J. 286n44

Sylva, D. D. 119n14

Tabor, J. D. 127, 258n34

Talbert, C. H. 26, 41, 52n3, 91n7, 123n25, 146n14, 157, 215n72, 217, 232n21, 249n11, realigned with the Synoptics, the Pauline corpus and the OT, so that faith in Jesus Christ does not lose its historical roots” (p. 187). This, however, seems to be merely an oblique way of saying that John’s Gospel is historically unreliable and that there are real contradictions between John and the Synoptics (cf. Stuhlmacher’s more blunt statement in 1997: 287 [cited in Köstenberger 2002a: 144 n. 3]). I, of course, deny both accusations.

44 Contrast this with their contempt for the “people of the land” displayed in 7:49 (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.248). For a discussion of the reading σεαυτοῦ instead of αὐτοῦ in Codex Sinaiticus and P⁷⁵, see Bammel 1994: 455–56; Swanson 1995: 4.130.

14 Cf. Paulien (ABD 4:1106), who also refers to de Jonge 1971: 342; Sylva 1988: 148–49; Michel (1981: 231), who calls Nicodemus a “borderline character” (“personnage-frontière”); and Pamment (1985: 71, 73), who writes, “Nicodemus is the only individual character who fails to make a decision, remaining the good but uncommitted observer who tries to prevent injustice” (p. 73). Similarly, Conway (1999: 85–103) says that Nicodemus is a “pathetic character” who from beginning to end “is genuinely interested in Jesus, but is never able to gather the courage and conviction to confess his belief openly” (p. 103). Note also Pazdan (1987), who sees Nicodemus’s portrayal as part of John’s reversal of the traditional geographical polemic regarding Judeans, Samaritans, and Galileans; and Burge (2000: 124), who contends that Nicodemus never became a model disciple, because “disciples confess Jesus’ identity, remain with him, and tell others.” If my assessment of Nicodemus is correct, it runs counter to the notion, popular in current scholarship, that John’s Gospel is “anti-Semitic,” for here we have a Jewish person who, though not a believer in Jesus the Messiah, represents a fair-minded, moral, kind Jewish leader, providing a counterpoint to the more hostile element on the Sanhedrin. It is also possible that John includes the Nicodemus account at least in part because he had access to individuals among the Jewish leadership (cf. 18:15b: “that disciple [the ‘other disciple’ of 18:15a, presumably the evangelist; cf. 20:2; 21:24] was known to the high priest”).

34 According to the rabbis, the person who committed suicide could not pay with his life for the shedding of his blood (cf. Gen. 9:5), so that he must spend the afterlife in a state of damnation (see also Josephus, J.W. 3.8.5 §375; cf. 7.8.6–7.9.1 §§320–401). In contrast, pagan philosophers often considered suicide to be an “honorable death” (Droge and Tabor 1991).

3 Talbert (1970 [see esp. p. 343]) proposes unconvincingly that 1:19–5:47 displays the pattern of a macrochiasm. However, this comes at the expense of virtually ignoring the clear inclusio of 2:11 and 4:54, which marks this section off as a structural unit. Moreover, the very notion of a macrochiasm is far from established. An additional weakness is that at the heart of the chiasm Talbert groups 3:22–36 and 4:1–42 under the rubric “ritual and life,” hardly a self-evident categorization. On the microlevel, however, Talbert’s unit divisions are generally on target: 1:19–2:11; 2:13–22 (though there is no need to skip 2:12); 2:23–3:22; 3:23–36; 4:1–42; 4:43–54; 5:1–30; 5:31–47 (see the outline in the introduction above).

7 It is doubtful that the reference to “the third day” represents an allusion to the resurrection (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 102; Carson 1991: 167; Burge 2000: 90; contra Borchert 1996: 153; Stibbe 1993: 46; Keener 2003: 497–98). The reference serves as a chronological connective with preceding events, perhaps indicating that the promise of 1:51 was quickly fulfilled (Beasley-Murray 1999: 34, citing Schnackenburg 1990: 1.325; cf. Talbert [1992: 86], who says that 2:1–11 serves as fulfillment of the prophecy in 1:51; and D. M. Smith [1999: 86], who speaks of the “first installment ... of the revelation promised in 1:51”). The beginning of Jesus’ final week is signaled in 12:1 (cf. Barrett 1978: 189–90).

25 Carson (1991: 195) rightly contends that the NIV’s “water and the Spirit” is misleading (retained in the TNIV); “water and spirit” is preferable (see commentary at 3:6–8). Also incorrect, I believe, is the proposal by Talbert (1992: 99), who renders the phrase “of water which is Spirit.”

14 Talbert (1992: 111) maintains, “Jesus has withdrawn from Judea because of sensed competition between his ministry and that of the Baptist (vv. 1–3).”

72 So Ridderbos 1997: 235–37; cf. Carson 1991: 295; Morris 1995: 331–32; contra Moloney 1998: 223; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.55; Lindars 1972: 267; Talbert 1992: 140. As Keener (2003: 690) observes, “John’s words [in 6:27–63] invite his audience to look to Christ’s death itself, not merely those symbols which point to his death.” At best, any such overtones are derivative (Borchert 1996: 270–71; cf. Brodie 1993: 286; Calvin 1959: 170).

21 Motyer (1997: 152–53) plausibly suggests that 7:14–24 is designed to enable the reader to make an appropriate judgment concerning the death of Jesus. If the Jews are correct, Jesus is a sinner, demon-possessed, and the like. If Jesus’ claims are valid, it is the Jews who are misleading the people, not Jesus. Keener (2003: 721) discerns a common structure in 7:14–36 and 7:37–52: (1) Jesus teaches in the temple (7:14–24; 7:37–39), (2) people speculate about his identity (7:25–29, 31; 7:40–43), and (3) an attempt to arrest him fails (7:30, 32–36; 7:44–52, citing Talbert 1992: 145, following Lindars).

11 A survey of major commentaries shows that about half provide a regular commentary (Carson, Laney, Lindars, Whitacre, Calvin, Westcott), while the other half refrain from comment (Michaels, Talbert, Stibbe, Brodie, D. M. Smith), in some cases choosing not to address the issue at all (e.g., Schlatter [1948: 205], who in his scholarly commentary moves directly from 7:52 to 8:12 without comment, though his popular commentary [1962: 139–41] does treat the pericope adulterae in deference to “ecclesiastical tradition”; see also Zahn [1921: 404], who, like Schlatter, moves immediately from 7:52 to 8:12 and deals with the pericope in a lengthy excursus on pp. 723–30).

8 Commentators also debate the ontological nature and implications of Jesus’ claim here. Talbert (1992: 152) maintains that the statement is “not primarily ontological ... but soteriological,” yet Brodie (1993: 324) rightly notes that Jesus’ words are uttered “in the context of showing himself to be in union with the Father. The light, therefore, is not an isolated Jesus but a Jesus in relationship. The same is implied in the prologue: the light comes from the Word who is in relationship with God.”

11 See Beasley-Murray 1999: 128–29. Moloney (1998: 268, citing Talbert) notes that there was an expectation that the pillar of fire would return “at the end of time.” For Qumran and Second Temple parallels, see Köstenberger 2002c: 82.

50 Talbert (1992: 172) perceives that 11:17–44 consists of two loosely corresponding cycles: a “Martha cycle” (11:17–27) and a “Mary cycle” (11:28–44).

17 So, rightly, Talbert (1992: 191), who detects “prophetic symbolism” here (citing Isa. 8:1–4; Jer. 13:1–11; Ezek. 12:1–7).

39 Cf. the general application drawn by Carson (1991: 468): “[T]he heart of Jesus’ command is a humility and helpfulness toward brothers and sisters in Christ.” Talbert (1992: 194) rejects this general application and argues for a more specific one: “[F]or the disciples to wash one another’s feet ... means for them to forgive one another those daily trespasses that characterize one human being’s infringement upon another.”

17 As Talbert (1992: 203) notes, Jesus’ soteriological priority is expressed here in terms of the chronological priority of Jesus’ going: “[Jesus] is going before the disciples do; and until he goes they are unable to follow. ... 14:1–6, focuses on where Jesus is going, for what purpose, and how one gets there.”

71 Talbert (1992: 207) calls the Paraclete “an abiding presence,” “a teaching presence,” and “a presence that both guides into all truth and declares the things to come.”

52 As Talbert (1992: 220) notes, this would include believing (1 John 2:21) as well as doing the truth (2 John 4; 3 John 4). The Johannine churches (better than Talbert’s “community”) may have used this saying as a “criterion to discern among the spirits, separating true from false (1 John 4:1–2).”

14 Talbert (1992: 235–36) points to a reference in the Gospel of the Hebrews to the effect that John used to supply fish to the court of the high priest while still working for his father, Zebedee. This is also noted by D. M. Smith (1999: 335), who adds that “fishermen were entrepreneurs, not common laborers at the bottom of the social spectrum” (citing Wuellner 1967: 45–61).

7 On the literary connections between John 20 and 21, see Talbert 1992: 248; Schneiders 1989 (cited in Lee 1995: 40 n. 7).

17 See 7:39; 14:12, 16–18, 25–26; 16:12–15; cf. 20:17. Luke’s account of Pentecost hardly reads as though Acts 2 represents merely “one of several additional empowerings of the Spirit,” as Hatina (1993: 201) alleges. Talbert (1992: 252) concludes from 20:22 that Jesus must have ascended by then because otherwise, according to 7:39, he could not yet have given the Spirit. But this presupposes that the Spirit was in fact imparted at 20:22. If not, there is no need to suppose that Jesus had already ascended by then.

6 Ridderbos (1997: 658–59) detects in this a reference to “the unity they [the disciples] recovered after Jesus’ resurrection.” Similarly, Talbert (1992: 259) sees in this “unity” an answer to Jesus’ prayer in 17:11 and a result of the Spirit’s enabling. This seems to rest too much interpretive weight on the rather inconspicuous expression “were together,” however. Little else in the context suggests that these disciples are Spirit-filled (note that they caught no fish). The presence of symbolism in the number seven is doubtful as well (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 650; Carson 1991: 669; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.352; Beasley-Murray 1999: 399; Borchert 2002: 324); it is hard to see what would connote “completeness” in the present instance (contra Brodie 1993: 582).

30 For example, R. Brown (1970: 1097), who interprets the full net allegorically as the absence of schism in the Christian community; Bultmann (1971: 709), who speaks of the “indestructible unity of the Church”; Michaels (1989: 354–55), who contends that the full net indicates the successful completion of Jesus’ mission; and Talbert (1992: 260), who says that the 153 fish symbolize the universal outreach of the church. For a virtually exhaustive list of interpretations of the number 153, no matter how implausible, see Keener (2003: 1231–33). He properly concludes that “the number could simply stem from an accurate memory of a careful count on the occasion, because fish had to be counted to be divided among fishermen.” Keener (2003:

Tannehill, R. C. 342n101
Tasker, R. V. G. 111n36
Taylor, J. E. 543n10, 556n88
Tenney, M. C. 265
Thatcher, T. 181n31
Thielman, F. 2n5, 37n53, 123n23, 223n107, 446n104

1233) also notes that 153 fish may be no more symbolic than Peter swimming 100 yards in 21:8. 33 The unbroken net frequently is interpreted symbolically as conveying the preservation of all that is caught (Ridderbos 197: 663, adducing 6:12; Witherington 1995: 355; Michaels 1989: 354–55), or the limitless number of Christian converts (Carson 1991: 673, following Bruce 1983: 401–2), or the unity of the church (Talbert 1992: 260). For surveys, see Carson 1991: 672–73; R. Brown 1970: 1074–76.

101 Termed “narrative echo effect” by Stibbe 1994: 39, following R. C. Tannehill. R. Brown (1966: 436) further notes that this verse “calls forth the memory of the blind man, so that Jesus as the light and Jesus as the life will be juxtaposed.”

36 Cf. Carson 1991: 177; 1984: 441; Morris 1995: 167; Laney 1992: 70; Westcott 1908: 1.96–97; Calvin 1959: 51; Köstenberger 1999a: 76–78. Carson (1991: 177, referring to Morris) notes that virtually all of John 1–5 (except for the sections on John the Baptist) is non-Synoptic material. Morris (1995: 167 n. 55) states that “there are practically no resemblances between the two narratives, apart from the central act”; only five words are shared. Other commentators holding this view are Luther, W. Hendriksen, and R. V. G. Tasker (Kreitzer 1998: 94).

10 See Riesner, DJG 43; Taylor 1998. “Gordon’s Calvary” is ruled out by Parrot 1957: 59–65.

88 The location of the tomb is probably on the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (built by Constantine) rather than the popular “garden tomb” (Taylor 1998: 180, referring also to Barkay 1986). The vestiges of a nearby garden were still visible in Cyril of Jerusalem’s day (Catechesis 14.5 [ca. A.D. 350]).

31 The noun is qualitative, indicating the kind of day, not which day it was (so, rightly, Wallace 1996: 264). Thatcher (1999) calls this “the Sabbath trick,” “a form of ‘unstable irony’ in which the narrator of the Fourth Gospel withholds critical information about an episode until the end of the story, forcing the reader to re-evaluate radically the nature of Jesus’ activity.” However, alternate explanations of the flow of the narrative are possible (if not more probable), and Thatcher’s attempt at a poststructural reading of John 5 and 9 ultimately fails to convince. Highly improbable is the proposal by Laney (1992: 108–9) that the absence of the definite article suggests that this was not a Sabbath at all but a feast day when Sabbath regulations applied (citing Lev. 23:34–36).

5 The essays on history and theology in the Fourth Gospel and on the question of the Fourth Gospel’s authorship by Morris (1969: 65–292) still repay careful study. For an interesting application of Clement’s statement, see Thielman 1991: 183 in the context of his entire article. The reference to Clement’s Hypotyposeis is found in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14. See also Thompson (2002: 2), who rightly notes, “Whatever Clement meant in calling John ‘a spiritual Gospel,’ it is doubtful that he meant to contrast ‘facts’ in the modern sense and ‘interpretation.’ ... [A] ‘spiritual’ Gospel gives the inner meaning of an event or reality and, hence, its truth must be spiritually discerned.” Thompson rightly maintains that “the modern view” that calls into question the historicity of any item in John that “stands in the service of his theological or interpretive agenda” constitutes “a very strange way to imagine that theology works, and perhaps could only have been thought of by people actually not doing theology.” Thompson (2002: 3) proceeds to call for greater sophistication in biblical scholars’ philosophy of history. Carson (1991: 29) similarly disavows attributing to Clement a dichotomy between “spiritual” and “historical”; he suggests that “spiritual” may mean “allegorical” or “symbol-laden.”

53 On solemnity, see Thielman 1991: 177–78.

23 Cotterell’s (1985: 240) comment that there was no double meaning in Aramaic is unduly dismissive because it disregards the fact that John’s Gospel has come to us in Greek, where misunderstanding is not only possible, but almost certainly intended by the evangelist. Thielman (1991: 179 n. 1) points to the frequency of double meanings in the present pericope (see 3:3, 7, 8), “which give the reader pause and serve to ‘emphasize’ the point at hand.”

107 See also Thielman (1991: 180), who suggests that the seemingly abrupt transition from 5:47 to 6:1 may be an instance of “a purposeful attempt at obscurity” (on which, see ibid., pp. 175–77). According to Thielman, the Fourth Evangelist may have “obscured the organizational pattern of his Gospel by design—to keep out those whose eyes were blind and whose hearts hard (12.40)” (p. 181). See also the work of Kellum (2005), especially pp. 225–26.

104 The transition from 14:31 to 15:1 is frequently labeled an aporia, which is commonly taken to indicate a literary seam indicating the presence of different underlying sources (one of the first to see such a difficulty was C. H. Weiss 1856: 116; cf. Wellhausen 1907 and the influential series of essays by E. Schwartz 1907; 1908; see the historical survey in Kellum 2005: 10–78). However, this conclusion seems premature and unwarranted in light of preferable alternate explanations. Thielman (1991: 180), for instance, suggests that the present passage may be an instance of a “purposeful attempt at obscurity” common in ancient writers (he cites the transition from 5:47 to 6:1 as another possible example). Recently, Kellum (2005: 230) has suggested that statements indicating movement in the Fourth Gospel regularly serve as ways to move along the narrative. Stibbe (1993: 159), too, is able to make “very good sense” of the narrative as it stands without resorting to source-critical theories. For him, 14:31 is part of the Johannine theme of “the elusive Christ.” After saying in 14:30 that the devil “has no hold” on him, Jesus, knowing that the “prince of this world” is now coming, is evading his captors for one final time. Schlatter (1948: 304), finally, makes the improbable suggestion that the unevenness may be due to a break in dictation.

41 Moloney 1998: 173; cf. Metzner 1999; Lee 1994: 110; Witkamp 1985: 24; Leidig 1979: 211; contra Thomas 1995: 18. Moloney (1998: 173) rightly notes, contra Beck (1993 [cf. 1997: 86–90]), who argues that anonymous characters in the Fourth Gospel draw the reader into an identification with the character, “The reader of the Fourth Gospel, however, hardly identifies with a man who is in league with ‘the Jews’ (vs. 15).” Keener (2003: 87), similarly, contends that a list of Johannine models of faith is not entirely coextensive with anonymous characters (citing esp. 5:14–15) and registers this as his only serious disagreement with Beck (p. 87 n. 49). Beck, in a review (2001), indirectly responds to my earlier criticism (Köstenberger 1999b, reviewing Beck 1997) that the man in John 5 disproves his theory by alleging, in effect, that I have no place for literary analysis in my hermeneutical method. Nothing could be further from the truth. My concern, rather, lies with an unqualified wholesale adoption of reader-response criticism by evangelicals who fail to realize that this methodology is part and parcel of a postmodern hermeneutic that is left with nothing but subjective readings devoid of any claim to authority or universal applicability. Moreover, I was concerned to point out that Beck’s central

Thompson, M. M. 2n4, 2n5, 28n25, 44n76
Thomson, J. G. S. S. 304
Tobin, T. H. 26n20

thesis (i.e., that anonymity necessarily equals ideal function and positive characterization) is invalid. Note further this puzzling conclusion by Brodie (1993: 238): “The final picture ... is ... open to a positive interpretation: the man has finally come to mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus, and he is announcing the good news to the Jews.” Precisely where Brodie finds the man “announcing the good news to the Jews” is unclear to me, nor can I see textual evidence for the man coming to “mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus.”

22 See T. Abr. 3:7–9; Jos. As. 7:1. See Thomas (1991a: 35–40), who also cites instances of footwashing as part of hospitality in the Greco-Roman world (pp. 46–50).

36 Relevant instances of λούω in Scripture (LXX and NT) include Lev. 14:9; 15:11; 16:4; 17:16; Num. 19:7; Deut. 23:12; Acts 9:37; Heb. 10:22. Note especially Lev. 15:11, where νίπτω and λούω are found side by side. The word νίπτω occurs elsewhere in the NT for washing one’s face (Matt. 6:17), hands (Matt. 15:2; Mark 7:3), eyes (John 9:7, 11, 15), and feet (John 13:5, 6, 8, 10, 12, 14; 1 Tim. 5:10). On the distinction in meaning between λούω and νίπτω, see Thomas 1991a: 51 n. 25; Oepke, TDNT 4:305; Hauck, TDNT 4:947.

4 The Fourth Gospel’s integrity is not compromised by the inimitable Johannine style, enveloping narrative as well as discourse portions. For positive assessments of the historical reliability of John’s Gospel, see Köstenberger 2002c; Blomberg 1993; 2001; 2002; contra M. Casey 1996. Nevertheless, there continues to be skepticism on the part of many; see the recent survey by Kysar (2002a), the largely positive assessment by Thompson (2002), and the very negative evaluation by Attridge (2002b).

5 The essays on history and theology in the Fourth Gospel and on the question of the Fourth Gospel’s authorship by Morris (1969: 65–292) still repay careful study. For an interesting application of Clement’s statement, see Thielman 1991: 183 in the context of his entire article. The reference to Clement’s Hypotyposesis is found in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14. See also Thompson (2002: 2), who rightly notes, “Whatever Clement meant in calling John ‘a spiritual Gospel,’ it is doubtful that he meant to contrast ‘facts’ in the modern sense and ‘interpretation.’ ... [A] ‘spiritual’ Gospel gives the inner meaning of an event or reality and, hence, its truth must be spiritually discerned.” Thompson rightly maintains that “the modern view” that calls into question the historicity of any item in John that “stands in the service of his theological or interpretive agenda” constitutes “a very strange way to imagine that theology works, and perhaps could only have been thought of by people actually not doing theology.” Thompson (2002: 3) proceeds to call for greater sophistication in biblical scholars’ philosophy of history. Carson (1991: 29) similarly disavows attributing to Clement a dichotomy between “spiritual” and “historical”; he suggests that “spiritual” may mean “allegorical” or “symbol-laden.”

25 On “God” and “Father” in the Gospel of John, see especially the valuable and insightful monographs by Thompson (2000; 2001). On the characterization of God in the Fourth Gospel, see also Tolmie 1998; on God the Father, see Meyer 1996: 255–73 and Fisher 2003.

76 On God the Father in the Gospel of John, see especially the work of Thompson (2000; 2001). See my largely appreciative review of her contribution (Köstenberger 2002d), yet note the concerns I raise regarding the overall thesis of her work.

20 For a more thorough discussion, see E. Miller (1993: 448–49), who lists as many as nine different theories: (1) the OT dbr; (2) Wisdom (R. Harris 1917); (3) Greek philosophy

Tolmie, D. F. 28n25
Torgovnick, M. 584n4
Torrey, C. C. 8n20, 524n12, 537n83

(Stoicism); (4) Philo (Evans 1993: 100–145; Tobin 1990); (5) the Aramaic mmr (Hayward 1978); (6) rabbinic speculation on the Torah; (7) gnostic sources, such as the Hermetic literature, especially Poimandres (Pagels 1999); (8) the Hellenistic-gnostic redeemer myth, Mandeans, and the Odes of Solomon (Bultmann 1923; 1973; 1971); and (9) the breaking of divine silence (Jeremias). Some, such as Epp (1975), combine two or more of the above (in Epp's case, Wisdom and Torah). Miller himself (1993: 452), building on his earlier work (1989), advances the thesis that the uses of λόγος in the Gospel proper, while not a christological title, are invested “with a certain christological transparency” (B. Reicke's term). Thus, startlingly, Miller, who believes that the prologue was written not only after the Gospel proper, but even after John's first epistle, finds the origin of the prologue's λόγος in the Fourth Gospel itself: “The one of whom it was said in John 7:46, ‘Never has a man spoken like this!’ eventually came to be called, appropriately, ‘the Word.’ ” I find this thesis entirely unconvincing (Miller [1999] attempts to make the same case for ἀρχή). It is quite a tour de force to brush aside the massive OT substructure pervading the entire prologue. Not surprisingly, Miller's thesis has found few followers.

25 On “God” and “Father” in the Gospel of John, see especially the valuable and insightful monographs by Thompson (2000; 2001). On the characterization of God in the Fourth Gospel, see also Tolmie 1998; on God the Father, see Meyer 1996: 255–73 and Fisher 2003.

4 Gaventa (1996: 246–47), drawing on Torgovnick's (1981) insights on closure, suggests that chapters 20 and 21 pursue different “strategies of closure.” According to Gaventa, chapter 20 structurally corresponds primarily to the prologue (cf., e.g., 20:17 with 1:10; 20:24–31 with 1:7, 13; and 20:28, 31 with 1:18), while chapter 21 recalls a number of scenes throughout the Gospel (cf., e.g., 21:24 with 1:6–8; 21:18–19 with 10:11; 21:15–23 with 13:36) (on the connections between the call narratives of chapters 1 and 21, see Franzmann and Klinger 1992). What is more, chapters 20 and 21 also differ in focus, with chapter 20 centering primarily on Jesus, and chapter 21 foregrounding (two select representatives of) the disciples. There is some truth in this, but oversimplifications should be avoided. John's narrative strategy is doubtless more complex than is often thought.

20 Very few would argue for a date prior to A.D. 70, as do J. A. T. Robinson 1976: 254–85 (but see the refutation in Kerr 2002: 19–25; see also Carson 1991: 82–86); Morris 1995: 25–30 (with reference to Cribbs 1970; Torrey 1936: x–xi); and Wallace 1990 (but see the present commentary at 5:2). However, the cumulative weight of the following internal evidence must be judged to favor a post–A.D. 70 date (cf. Croteau 2003): the references to the Sea of Tiberias in 6:1 and 21:1; Thomas's confession of Jesus as “my Lord and my God” in 20:28 (contra emperor worship in time of Domitian?); the reference to Peter's martyrdom (21:19); and the lack of reference to the Sadducees (Schlatter 1948: 44; though see the caution in Carson 1991: 84)—not to mention the comparative ease with which the Fourth Evangelist equates Jesus with God (e.g., 1:1, 14; 10:30; 20:28; see Carson 1991: 85, though note his caveats on p. 84) or external evidence such as Clement of Alexandria's statement, cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7, “Last of all, John, perceiving that the external facts had been made plain [in the Synoptics] ... composed a spiritual gospel.” This is true especially since the major pieces of evidence cited in support of a pre–A.D. 70 date—the lack of reference to the destruction of the temple and the use

Tovey, D. xi, 5n10, 114
Trudinger, L. P. 82
Trudinger, P. 89n2, 111n33
Turner, M. M. B. 68, 574n16

of a present-tense verb in 5:2 to refer to the Sheep Gate pool—are not determinative and are capable of alternative explanations (see, e.g., Schlatter 1948: 23–24).

12 That is, “the many meals and celebrations that week in the Passover season” (Burge 2000: 499; cf. Carson 1991: 590; see also Torrey 1931: 239–40). Contra Keener (1993: 307–308), who says that different calendars or John’s “making a symbolic point” account for the apparent discrepancy between John and the Synoptics (different calendars are also the “solution” presented by Laney [1992: 330, following Hoehner]).

83 Cf. Did. 8:1; Mart. Pol. 7:1. See Torrey 1931 (including his critique of Str-B 2:834–85 on pp. 235–36); Higgins 1954–55: 206–9; Story 1989: 318; Blomberg 1987: 177–78; Morris 1995: 708; Ridderbos 1997: 606.

10 See Köstenberger 1999a: 30–31. There has been a virtual avalanche of literary explorations of Johannine themes or specific Johannine portions of text pouring from the presses in the last two decades. Among those are Culpepper 1983; Duke 1985; Staley 1988; M. Davies 1992; Stibbe 1992; 1994; Lee 1994; Tovey 1997; Beck 1997; Conway 1999; and Harstine 2002, to list but a few.

2 For a defense of the temple clearing as a Johannine sign, see Köstenberger 1995b (cf. P. Trudinger 1997: 330), contra R. Brown (1966: 528), who claims that every use of σημεῖον (sēmeion, sign) refers to a “miraculous deed.” By referring to the “temple cleansing” as “temple clearing,” I take up a suggestion made by Mathews (1988–89: 101); cf. E. Sanders 1985: 61–76; Evans 1989: 237–70.

33 P. Trudinger (1997: 329, citing Daube 1966b: 1–6) suggests that Jesus’ clearing of the temple at the beginning of his ministry resembles Hezekiah’s similar action (see 2 Chron. 29:3–5, 17; 30:1).

16 The critique by Hatina (1993), who says that the reference is to the indwelling Paraclete, fails to convince. Contrary to the view of many commentators, the present pericope does not constitute the Johannine equivalent to Pentecost (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1038; Barrett [1978: 570], who says that the present passage cannot be harmonized with Acts 2; Bultmann 1971: 691), nor is Calvin’s (1961: 205) proposal satisfactory that at 20:22 the disciples “were only sprinkled with His grace and not [as at Pentecost] saturated with full power.” Beasley-Murray (1999: 382 [followed by Borchert 2002: 307–8]) believes that John telescoped the giving of the Spirit without concern for chronology (citing the reference to the ascension in 20:17 as a parallel). M. Turner (1977) thinks that the reference is not to the Spirit at all but to Jesus’ message as Spirit and life. The treatment by Moloney (1998: 532, 535) is rather idiosyncratic. Schnackenburg (1990: 3.325), too, surprisingly contends that the Johannine instance involves all believers, while the events in Acts 2 pertain to the apostles. If anything, one might have expected the opposite kind of reasoning, with John’s account anticipating the general outpouring narrated in Acts 2. Against the view of Burge (2000: 558 [cf. Burge 1987: 148–49]), who notes the connection between the present passage and Jesus’ promise to send the Spirit in John 14 and 16, the present event does not mark the actual fulfillment of these promises other than by way of anticipatory sign. Keener’s (2003: 1196–1200, see also 1204–6) discussion, including an attempted refutation of M. Turner (1998), remains inconclusive and, on the whole, fails to convince.

Turner, N. 545n28, 596n6

Twelftree, G. H. 118

Twomey, J. J. 530n46

Tyndale, W. 426n24

p 662 Valentine, S. R. 19n2, 19n4

VanderKam, J. C. 317n95

28 “Do not write” in 19:21 somewhat unexpectedly involves a present-tense verb (γράφει, graphe). Wallace (1996: 487–88) classifies the form as an imperative of entreaty. Barrett (1978: 549, following N. Turner 1963) proposes the translation “Alter what you have written” (i.e., “Do not go on writing [what you have written]”; cf. R. Brown 1970: 902).

6 But see the dissenting opinion of McKay (1985: esp. 323), who concludes that “the pattern of variation of forms of ἀγαπάω and φιλέω in this passage are not pointless [in apparent reaction to N. Turner 1976], but constitute a contextual distinction which is not blatant, but gently significant” (p. 333). However, it is unclear what McKay means by “not blatant, but gently significant,” especially since he never elaborates on this assertion with reference to the use of these two verbs in 21:15–17.

46 “Barabbas” is not a personal name but a patronymic (like Simon Barjonah, “son of Jonah”) that occurs also in the Talmud (see Twomey 1956). Very possibly John saw in this designation a play on words (Stibbe 1993: 190): “Barabbas” literally means “son of the father,” and John has presented Jesus as the Son of the Father throughout the Gospel.

24 The rendering “mansions” (rather than “rooms”), which crept into English translations through William Tyndale (1526) via the Vulgate, mistakenly suggests luxurious accommodations in modern parlance (the Latin word mansio referred to a stopover place, which was still the meaning of “mansion” in Tyndale’s day). See R. Brown 1970: 619; Carson 1991: 489.

2 This is why the prologue has also been called the “proleptic quintessence” (Harnack 1892: 191), a “microcosm” (Valentine 1996), and an “adumbration” (Booser 1998: 13) of the entire Gospel (cited in MacLeod 2003: 48 n. 1).

4 Culpepper (1980–81: 1) quotes Barrett (1971: 27): “The Prologue is ... one piece of solid theological writing. The evangelist wrote it all” (cf. Barrett 1975a: 20–35). Keener (2003: 333–34) maintains that the prologue is an original part of the Gospel, probably added by the author (the apostle John) after completing the first draft of the Gospel. According to Keener (2003: 333–34), ancient writers commonly introduced the main themes at the beginning of their work (see Keener 2003: 334 n. 10 for examples). Bultmann believed that the prologue originated as a pre-Christian gnostic hymn that stemmed from Baptist circles and was taken over and adapted by the Fourth Evangelist (Bultmann 1923: 4; summarized by Ashton 1986: 161). Valentine (1996), in contrast to many other Johannine scholars, argues that the prologue is an organic part of the book, a genuine preface intended to preview important theological themes, rather than a mere afterthought or postscript written after the body of the Gospel had been completed. E. Harris (1994: 26) contends that the prologue “was from the first the construction of the evangelist himself.” See the survey in MacLeod 2003: 49–52.

95 Some have seen a parallel to Jesus’ assertion of oneness with God in Antiochus Epiphanes’ boast that he was “God Manifest” (the meaning of the Greek epithet “Epiphanes”). This claim made by Antiochus may also lie behind the Jews’ charge that Jesus (like the Seleucid ruler [see 2 Macc. 9:28]) was a blasphemer (cf. 10:33, 36; see VanderKam 1990: 211–14; followed by van der Watt, J. G. 19, 19n1

Vanhoozer, K. J. 4n8, 4n9, 7n15, 414n10, 600n2

Vardaman, E. J. 177n11, 178n15, 525n14

Moloney 1998: 321). See, however, the appropriate caution by Lindars (1972: 376), who distinguishes between Jesus' words here and the notion of family relationships among pagan gods. Lindars also points out that the present statement "preserves the logical priority of God, because the title Father is retained" and "denotes a personal intimacy which forestalls any suggestion of ditheism."

1 J. A. T. Robinson (1962–63) observes that "the themes of the gospel are played over beforehand, as in the overture to an opera" (cited in Viviano 1998: 183). Beasley-Murray (1992: 1867) calls it "an anticipatory description of the Mission of the Logos-Son to the World." The bibliography on the Johannine prologue is vast: see van der Watt 1995: 311 n. 1; Kurz 1997: 179 n. 1. For a chart showing themes anticipated in the prologue, see p. 586 below.

8 The classic work is Hirsch 1967. Considerably more sophisticated is the recent work by Vanhoozer (1998), whose defense of authorially intended textual meaning is all the more to be taken seriously as Vanhoozer is keenly aware of, and sensitive to, the role of the reader in biblical interpretation, without, however, absolutizing it (cf. Vanhoozer 1995; see also the penetrating collection of essays in Vanhoozer 2002 and the following note).

9 An exceedingly clever defense of the author in general and of the author of John's Gospel in particular is provided by Vanhoozer's (1993 [= 2002: 257–74]) "hermeneutical exposition" of John 21:20–24. According to Vanhoozer, "The ethos of the Fourth Gospel largely depends on the identification of the author with the Beloved Disciple" (1993: 372). The "double Anselmian hermeneutics of 'I-witness testimony' " advocated by Vanhoozer urges that the beloved disciple's testimony be received on its own terms; unless it is believed, it is not understood. Over against the "death of the author" in much of recent scholarship and the prevailing "hermeneutic of suspicion," Vanhoozer asserts "authorial rights" and advocates a "hermeneutic of belief" that seems all the more justified because the beloved disciple is consistently identified in the Fourth Gospel as an eyewitness. In this context it may be significant that as late as the very last verse of the Gospel, the authorial "I" is still heard (see commentary at 21:20–25).

15 The epithet "the disciple Jesus loved" is plausibly understood as an instance of authorial modesty (see Vanhoozer 1993: 374, who cites Augustine and Westcott, contra Barrett 1978: 117). On authorial modesty, see also Köstenberger 2004.

10 So, among others, Schlatter 1948: 286. On the "disciple Jesus loved," see Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61 (including further bibliographic references). For the identification of the "disciple Jesus loved" with John the son of Zebedee, see chapter 1 in Köstenberger 1999a; for the identification of the "disciple Jesus loved" with the Fourth Evangelist, see Jackson 1999. See also the discussion of authorial modesty in Vanhoozer 1993: 374, citing Augustine and Westcott. Contra Culpepper (1983: 121–23), who views the "beloved disciple" not only as an "ideal disciple" but also as the physical personification of the Paraclete. Beck (1997: 108–36) essentially aligns himself with Culpepper in characterizing this disciple as "the paradigm" or "embodiment of discipleship" (pp. 135–36).

2 See Vanhoozer 1993 and also the brief summary of the relevance of Vanhoozer's contribution to the case for the apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel in the section on hermeneutical presuppositions in the introduction to the present commentary.

11 Helpful treatments include Avi-Yonah 1974: 142; Jeremias 1966b; Mackowski 1980: 79–83;

Vawter, B. 450n8
Vermes, G. 171n17
Vincent, L. H. 523
Viviano, B. T. 19n1, 20n8, 27n21

Vardaman 1963; and Wieand 1965–66. Riesner (DJG 41) prefers the translation “There is in Jerusalem by the Sheep Pool the [site] with five porticoes called in Hebrew [i.e., Aramaic] Bethesda.”

15 The northern, smaller pool may go back to monarchical times; the southern pool may be that established in the second century B.C. by Simon the high priest (Sir. 50:3). For ancient sources, see Hengel 1999: 310. The site favored by most scholars is located under the monastery of St. Anne in the northeast quarter of the Old City. See Jeremias 1966b; Vardaman 1963: 28.

Regarding the archaeological identification of Bethesda, see Wieand 1965–66: 396–400. The existence of the five porticoes is disputed by Broer (2001).

14 The Synoptists use the generic title “governor” (ἡγεμών, hēgemōn) with regard to Pilate (e.g., Matt. 27:2, 11; Luke 20:20). Tacitus, the Roman historian, calls him procurator (Annales 15.44); Josephus uses the equivalent expression ἐπίτροπος, epitropos (J.W. 2.9.2 §169). The famous Latin “Pilate inscription,” found in Caesarea in 1961, identifies him as “prefect” (praefectus) of Judea: [PON]TIUS PILATUS [PRAEF]ECTUS IUDA[EA]E (Vardaman 1962).

8 Sidebottom (1956–57: 234) points to similarities in vocabulary between John 15 and the māšāl of the vine in Ezek. 17. Other parallels are adduced by Vawter (1964). A general survey is found in Whitacre, DJG 867–68.

17 On the unusual nature of Jesus’ signs selected by John, see commentary at 2:10. A similar remarkable incident (that of the healing of the centurion’s servant in Capernaum) is narrated in Matt. 8:5–13 par. Vermes (1972–73) seeks to adduce parallels with the first-century Jewish miracle worker and faith healer Ḥanina ben Dosa (cf. b. Ber. 34b; much more cautious is Bokser 1985). However, as Meier (1994: 581–88, citing Freyne 1980) points out, not only is Ḥanina ben Dosa not mentioned in Josephus, but also none of the three mishnaic references attribute miracle-working power to him; this takes place only in the talmudic tradition. Hence, all that can be said confidently about the “historical” Ḥanina is that he probably was a first-century Palestinian Jew who was noted for his efficacious prayers over the sick; there is not even early historical evidence linking him to Galilee.

1 J. A. T. Robinson (1962–63) observes that “the themes of the gospel are played over beforehand, as in the overture to an opera” (cited in Viviano 1998: 183). Beasley-Murray (1992: 1867) calls it “an anticipatory description of the Mission of the Logos-Son to the World.” The bibliography on the Johannine prologue is vast: see van der Watt 1995: 311 n. 1; Kurz 1997: 179 n. 1. For a chart showing themes anticipated in the prologue, see p. 586 below.

8 John’s prologue has stimulated several highly creative structural proposals. Often the only limit seems to be the imagination of the interpreter. A case in point is the understanding of the prologue as a series of three successive “waves,” each with three movements (La Potterie 1984; Moloney 1977: 35–39; 1993: 25–27; Viviano 1998). Coloe (1997: 44–46) sees 1:1–2 as introduction and 1:18 as conclusion, with 1:3–17 dividing into two sections of three strophes each (1:3–5, 6–8, 9–13 and 14, 15, 16–17), paralleling the six-day structure of Gen. 1:1–2:4. According to Coloe, the rest of the Gospel represents day seven.

21 Viviano (1998: 182) comments, “This passage of Isaiah [Isa. 55:10–11] almost certainly had the decisive effect on John 1:1–18.”

Volfing, A. 1n1, 2n3, 601n6, 602n9
Vorster, W. S. 583n3

Waddington, W. G. 13n23, 72n56, 109n29, 531n49
Waheeb, M. 65n33
Walker, N. 147n23

1 Taking their point of departure from the four beasts in Ezek. 1:10 and Rev. 4:6–8, the Fathers described John as an eagle. See, for example, Augustine, De consensu evangelistarum 6 (cited in Volfing 2001: 45 n. 67): “John flies like an eagle above the clouds of human weakness and gazes most keenly and steadily with the eye of his heart at the light of unchangeable truth.” On John as fisherman, son of thunder, beloved disciple, elder and seer, apostle in second-century interpretation, saint depicted as an eagle, and hero and icon, see Culpepper 1994.

3 On the Latin background, see Volfing 2001: 11–59. See also the works referenced in J. N. Sanders 1943; Pollard 1970; Braun 1959; and Grillmeier 1975.

6 Augustine (In Iohannis Evangelium 124.1 [cited in Volfing 2001: 51 n. 79]) already acknowledges the difficulty of understanding the import of Jesus’ words. While presupposing Peter’s martyrdom and John’s dying a natural death, he follows an allegorical line of interpretation, seeing the two apostles as representing, respectively, the vita activa (“active life”) and the vita contemplativa (“contemplative life”), with the latter being superior to the former (Volfing 2001: 51–53). Literal interpretations are advocated by Bede and Rupert of Deutz (Volfing 2001: 53 n. 83). Some patristic and medieval authors also seek to alleviate the apparent difficulty that Jesus predicted that both sons of Zebedee would drink from his bitter cup (Matt. 20:23; see references in Volfing 2001: 55).

9 Volfing (2001: 48 n. 74) also cites Jerome (Vir. ill. 9), according to whom John “died sixty-eight years after the passion of the Lord” (assuming a crucifixion date of A.D. 33, this would be A.D. 101). Volfing (2001: 48–59) chronicles the emergence of legendary materials surrounding the mysterious reference to John “remaining” in 21:22.

23 For the dating of the four Passovers between A.D. 29 and 33 mentioned above, see Humphreys and Waddington 1992: 335.

56 See Hoehner 1977: 37–38; Hoehner, DJG 119; Humphreys and Waddington 1992: 351.

29 Assuming a three-year ministry, we see that this puts the crucifixion at A.D. 33. This reading of John 2:20, and a date of A.D. 30 for Jesus’ first Passover and the temple clearing, were advocated by Badcock (1935: 40–41). See also P. Maier (1968: 4–5); Hoehner (1977: 38–43; followed by Laney 1992: 72; cf. Hoehner, DJG 119); Humphreys and Waddington (1992: 351). MacAdam (1999: 31–33) concurs, but believes that this was Jesus’ final Passover and that the Fourth Evangelist has transposed the temple clearing to the beginning of Jesus’ ministry. Zahn (1921: 126–27 n. 23) comes close, arriving at the year A.D. 28 or 29.

49 See Humphreys and Waddington 1992, with particular reference to the lunar eclipse occurring on that day (cf. Mark 15:33).

33 This would seem to invalidate the recent claims made by Mohammed Waheeb (1999: 14–15), an archaeologist directing the Jordanian excavations in the Jordan area, to have discovered the “Bethany beyond the Jordan” at a site about five miles north of the Dead Sea. Cf. Riesner 1987: 47 (succinctly presented by idem, DJG 35–36); 2002. I am indebted to Riesner also for some of the following material.

23 So N. Walker 1960 and the vast majority of commentators, including Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. e; Witherington 1995: 120; Barrett 1978: 231; Moloney 1998: 116, 121; Bultmann 1971:

Walker, P. W. L. 8

Walker, W. 361

Walker, W. O., Jr. 43n75, 44, 80n91, 87, 482n2

Wallace, D. B. 8n20, 27n22, 28, 29, 34n44, 38, 42n72, 46, 47n86, 48, 49, 50n98, 58n5, 178; contra Borchert 1996: 201.

75 For a very thorough and definitive demonstration that the notion of Jesus as the “only begotten” of the Father is foreign to Johannine thought and was read into the Gospel only later during the patristic period, see Pendrick 1995. Among other pieces of evidence, Pendrick cites ancient references where μονογενής is applied to an only child who was not the only begotten, “for the father might have begotten other children who died young and so the preservation of his name rests on the only surviving son” (p. 590). In light of the high infant mortality rate in the ancient world, Pendrick notes that “there must have been many only children who were not the only ones begotten by their parents” (p. 590 n. 23). See also Moody 1953: 213–19 and W. O. Walker 1994: 41 n. 37 (though when Walker contends that “the Greek of 1.14 does not include υἱός with μονογενής,” he overlooks that “son” surely is implied in the term μονογενής, both semantically and by virtue of the juxtaposition with “from the Father”).

91 W. O. Walker (1994: 36) argues that “son of Joseph” is intended “to say something significant (and problematic) about Jesus’ origin and thus about his identity: he is the son of a human father.” He concludes, “If such is the case at 6.42, it may well also be the case at 1.45, particularly in light of the fact that ‘from Nazareth’ apparently has a similar import at 1.45.” There is only one problem with this view: “son of Joseph, the one from Nazareth” is found on the lips of Philip, not Nathanael, in the wake of his claim “We have found the one of whom Moses wrote in the law and [of whom] the prophets [also wrote].” It is hard to conceive of Philip being derogatory about Jesus having a human father and coming from Nazareth (the latter is the case with Nathanael later!) while at the same time seeking to convince Nathanael that he and his fellow-seekers have found the one predicted in the Hebrew Scriptures. Moreover, as Kruse (2003: 86) notes, in the prologue the evangelist has already provided a clear presentation of Jesus’ true origins, so he can refrain from commenting on Philip’s rather incomplete description of Jesus here.

2 W. O. Walker (1982) seeks to show that the present prayer is a literary adaptation of the “Lord’s Prayer” in the Synoptics. According to Walker, the Fourth Evangelist has reworked and expanded the basic themes of this prayer in keeping with Johannine theology, whereby 17:1–8 constitutes a midrash on the first three (“you”) petitions, while 17:9–19 develops the three “we” petitions, and 17:20–26 recapitulates the major themes. However, the evidence set forth by Walker at best warrants only the conclusion that both prayers likely were prayed by the same individual, and not that there is in fact only one prayer, of which the Synoptics provide the original, and John a theological adaptation.

20 Very few would argue for a date prior to A.D. 70, as do J. A. T. Robinson 1976: 254–85 (but see the refutation in Kerr 2002: 19–25; see also Carson 1991: 82–86); Morris 1995: 25–30 (with reference to Cribbs 1970; Torrey 1936: x–xi); and Wallace 1990 (but see the present commentary at 5:2). However, the cumulative weight of the following internal evidence must be judged to favor a post-A.D. 70 date (cf. Croteau 2003): the references to the Sea of Tiberias in 6:1 and 21:1; Thomas’s confession of Jesus as “my Lord and my God” in 20:28 (contra emperor worship in time of Domitian?); the reference to Peter’s martyrdom (21:19); and the lack of reference to the Sadducees (Schlatter 1948: 44; though see the caution in Carson 1991: 84)—not to mention the comparative ease with which the Fourth Evangelist equates Jesus with God (e.g., 1:1, 14; 10:30; 20:28; see Carson 1991: 85, though note his caveats on p. 84) or external evidence such as Clement of Alexandria's statement, cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7, "Last of all, John, perceiving that the external facts had been made plain [in the Synoptics] ... composed a spiritual gospel." This is true especially since the major pieces of evidence cited in support of a pre-A.D. 70 date—the lack of reference to the destruction of the temple and the use of a present-tense verb in 5:2 to refer to the Sheep Gate pool—are not determinative and are capable of alternative explanations (see, e.g., Schlatter 1948: 23–24).

22 Moloney (1998: 35) says that πρός connotes motion, not just "with," and translates it "turned toward." Yet any force of motion inherent in πρός is overridden by the stative verb (Wallace 1996: 358–59; Schnackenburg [1990: 1.234] also rejects the idea). Lindars (1972: 84) proposes "in company with," while Westcott (1908: 1.6) writes, "The personal being of the Word was realised in active intercourse with and in perfect communion with God." Bultmann (1971: 32–33) suggests that ἦν πρός is a Semitism equivalent to παρά plus the dative.

44 Contra Wallace (1996: 477), who says that this may be an "imperative ἵνα"—a conclusion called unlikely by Barrett (1978: 160).

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, "It is not einzig, but einzigartig" (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): "not 'einzig geboren,' but 'einzig der Art nach.'" Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers "unique," pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son's procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the "root fallacy"; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors "only" or "unique," disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means "unique" and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, "beloved" (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward "only begotten" rather than simply "only," especially in light of the ensuing preposition "from." This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers "unique" or "one-of-a-kind," while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that "the phrase of the Father ... is decisive." Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that "only begotten" as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as "one of a kind," noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God's children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

86 See also Wallace 1996: 365–68, referring to Waltke 1958: 1.166–76; R. Brown 1966: 16; and especially the excellent, definitive discussion in Carson 1991: 131–34, referring also to R. Edwards 1988; La Potterie 1977: 1.145–50.

98 This also is the judgment of the majority of the UBS translation committee: see Metzger 1994: 169–70 for discussion and a more extended rationale. The type of evidence summarized above convinced the NIV, NASB, ISV, and ESV, though not the NKJV and HCSB; the NRSV ("God the only Son") and NLT ("his only Son, who is himself God") adopt a compromise solution. The TNIV, too, seeks to steer a middle course, though still affirms θεός as the original reading: "the one and only [Son], who is himself God." Among commentators, the reading μονογενής θεός is preferred by R. Brown 1966: 17; Lindars 1972: 98–99; Bruce 1983: 44–45; Carson 1991: 139; Morris 1995: 100–101; Borchert 1996: 124; Wallace 1996: 307; Beasley-Murray 1999: 2 n. e;

Burge 2000: 61; Keener 2003: 425–26; see also E. Harris 1994: 102–5; contra Bultmann 1971: 81 n. 2; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.278–80 (tentatively); Ridderbos 1997: 59 n. 140; Moloney 1998: 46; and Schlatter 1948: 34–35. Note that Barrett (1978: 169) changed his position between the first edition (1955) and second edition of his commentary: “The added evidence of the two recently discovered papyri may seem to swing the verdict this way.” Note also Wallace 1996: 360: “the unique One, God.”

5 Moloney (1998: 58) proposes that the question “Who are you?” could be taken as the leitmotif of John’s Gospel. Barrett (1978: 172) considers the phrase an allusion to Jesus’ “I am” statements in 6:35 and 8:24. Witherington (1995: 64) follows Painter in classifying the present pericope as a “quest story” that prepares the evangelist’s audience to properly answer subsequent questions about Jesus’ identity. He also contends—a rather dubious claim—that the evangelist presents Jesus as a Jewish sage à la Wisdom whom disciples were to seek and follow (adducing Sir. 51:23). The opening demonstrative “this” is classified by Wallace (1996: 334) as an instance of “inverse attraction,” where the pronominal subject is linked with the gender of the preceding nominative (cf. Matt. 7:12; 13:38; Luke 2:12; 8:11; Rom. 11:27; Gal. 4:24). More questionable is Wallace’s claim (1996: 532) that the present verb ἐστίν (estin, is) is a “testimonium present” (discussed under the rubric of “perfective present”). More likely, ἐστίν is a historical present (Wallace denies that εἰμί is ever used as a historical present in the NT).

19 Note John’s “sending” theme, especially 1:6, where the Baptist is said to have been “sent” from God; the Jewish delegation had been sent merely from Jerusalem. Note also the instance of stylistic variation of “sending” words: πέμπω in 1:22, ἀποστέλλω in 1:24 (Köstenberger 1999c). Wallace (1996: 621) cites the participle πέμψασιν in 1:22 as an example of an independent substantival participle.

20 Note the emphatic personal pronoun ἐγώ introducing the quotation; note also the implied contrast with Elijah in 1:21 (Wallace 1996: 322) and that a form of the verb “to be” needs to be supplied in the clause (Wallace 1996: 39).

24 So Ridderbos 1997: 66 n. 10; Morris 1995: 122; Carson 1991: 144; Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292; contra R. Brown 1966: 44; Moloney 1998: 52. While thus the delegation included some Pharisees, this does not mean that the Pharisees were responsible for sending out the delegation, since the Sadducees had a majority on the Sanhedrin (Carson 1991: 144). This is true especially if an article is to be added (or implied) before ἀπεσταλμένοι (Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. c; Barrett 1978: 174; R. Brown 1966: 43–44; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.292). Ἀπεσταλμένοι ἦσαν (apestalmenoi ēsan, they had been sent) is a periphrastic pluperfect (Wallace [1996: 586] calls it “consummative”).

29 Stibbe (1993: 33) again points to the theme of the “elusive Christ”: “Even though Jesus is not visibly on stage, his elusive presence is felt in the Baptist’s rather obscure remark. ... The reference here is clearly to the mysterious and elusive presence of Jesus himself.” Beyond this, the phrase “one whom you do not know” may also allude to the view held by some in that day that before commencing his public ministry, the Messiah would live a hidden life on earth (see commentary at 1:31; 7:27; see also Ridderbos 1997: 68; Beasley-Murray 1999: 20 n. d). The word “stand” (ἔστηκεν, hestēken), a perfect, has present force (cf. Mark 10:19; Acts 26:27; Heb. 6:9; see Wallace 1996: 579–80).

32 Moloney (1998: 53) notes, “Nowhere else in 1:19–51 is a day brought to such a formal close as this first day.” Note also the periphrastic imperfect ἦν ... βαπτίζων (“was baptizing”), indicating the continual nature of the Baptist's ministry (Barrett 1978: 175; Wallace 1996: 648).

34 The sense of ἐρχόμενον (erchomenon, coming) is that of John seeing Jesus coming toward him, though not for the first time. John 1:26 and 1:32–33 suggest that John had already recognized Jesus' true identity (Morris 1995: 126). Ἴδε (ide, look) indicates recognition; ὁ ἀμνός (ho amnos, the lamb) and its appositive represent a nominative of exclamation (Wallace 1996: 59–60), with the article preceding ἀμνός pointing to a one-of-a-kind substantive (a “monadic” article; Wallace 1996: 223–24).

42 The preposition used here is ὑπέρ, not the more common περί, but there is substantial overlap in meaning (cf. the use of περί in Matt. 26:28; John 17:9; Rom. 8:3; Eph. 6:18) (Wallace 1996: 363).

44 Wallace (1996: 303) notes that πρότος (prōtos, before) in this verse is an instance of the superlative serving as a comparative.

47 The question of whether ἐξ οὐρανοῦ (ex ouranou, from heaven) should be related to καταβαῖνον (katabainon, descend) or περιστεράν (peristeran, dove) (discussed by Morris 1995: 133 n. 73) is ultimately an academic issue with little consequence. Wallace (1996: 223) considers the article with πνεῦμα (pneuma, Spirit) as an instance of a par excellence usage.

75 Wallace (1996: 559–60) classifies the aorist ἤγαγεν (ēgagen, brought) as a “consummative aorist” pointing to the completion of the act.

98 Wallace (1996: 490–91) plausibly suggests that the trailing verb ἴδε (ide) is semantically equivalent to a future indicative (implying confidence on the part of the speaker: “Come, and you will see”).

108 Wallace (1996: 257, 263–64) notes the presence of the definite article in the original before “Son of God” but not “king of Israel” and points out that this was the actual passage that triggered Colwell's formulation of his famous rule. What Colwell concluded from the present passage is that the lack of the definite article need not indicate indefiniteness, given a certain syntax or word order. In other words, “king of Israel” (despite the lack of the article) is just as “definite” as “Son of God”; the reason why it has no article is that both expressions are governed by the article preceding “Son of God.” See also Morris 1995: 147 n. 114.

12 The use of a compound subject with a singular verb suggests that Jesus was invited to the wedding while his disciples simply accompanied him (Wallace 1996: 344). T. Martin (1998), surveying references to mothers in ancient writings, demonstrates that Mary is not mentioned by name because John assumed knowledge of her name among his readers (contra symbolic or polemical interpretations; see Beck 1993). For a list of unnamed characters in this Gospel, see Beck 1997: 31 (significant instances are the mother of Jesus, the Samaritan woman, the royal official, the lame man at the pool, the man born blind, and the beloved disciple). See also Beck's (1997: 54–62) treatment of the characterization of the mother of Jesus in John's Gospel.

23 See Wallace (1996: 150–51), who suggests that the statement makes use of the dative of possession, rendering it “What do we have in common?” Williams (1997: 688) paraphrases, “What concern is that (the shortage of wine) to me and to you? That is the groom's problem, why should you and I get involved?”

34 Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.344; Barrett 1978: 195; R. Brown 1966: 117; Witherington 1995: 85–86; Borchert 1996: 160; Bultmann 1971: 122; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38–39; Dodd 1963: 162; Lindars 1972: 135–37; Keener 2003: 518–19. Keener contends that it is historically implausible that Jesus would challenge the temple system by overturning tables and yet continue in public ministry for two or three years afterward, sometimes even visiting Jerusalem (though he notes that Jesus faces considerable hostility there when he does). On the contrary, an early temple cleansing accounts well for Jewish hostility toward Jesus early on (5:18), and Jesus' continuing in ministry for two or three more years is eminently plausible historically in light of Jesus' pattern of withdrawal (3:22; 6:15; 7:9–10; 8:59; 10:40) and his caution from the very inception of his ministry because his "time" has not yet come (2:4; 7:6). Borchert (1996: 160) contends that two temple clearings are "a historiographic monstrosity that has no basis in the texts of the Gospels." Kreitzer (1998: 100–101) claims that the evangelist followed the motto "When the details of history no longer serve the functions of the story—discard them." R. Brown (1966: 118) concludes that Jesus uttered some prophetic saying concerning the destruction of the temple on his first visit but actually cleansed the temple at the end of his ministry. Wallace (1996: 561 n. 20) notes that this would require a crucifixion date of A.D. 33.

125, 128, 132, 135, 138, 138n12, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 152, 153, 155, 156n52, 159n60, 160n68, 162, 164, 167, 168n6, 169, 172, 178, 178n12, 181n31, 186n52, 189n69,

5 Carson (1991: 184) notes that the converse is also true: Jesus promises to entrust himself to those who truly trust in him. Wallace (1996: 349) comments that the emphasizing pronoun in "its very repetition contrasts Jesus with the rest of humanity, setting him apart in his sinlessness." Similar reflexive uses of πιστεύω in the NT include Luke 16:11; Rom. 3:2; 1 Cor. 9:17; Gal. 2:7; 1 Thess. 2:4; 1 Tim. 1:11; Titus 1:3 (Barrett 1978: 202).

17 Contra several commentators (Barrett 1978: 205; Moloney 1998: 91; R. Brown 1966: 130; Witherington 1995: 94; Burge 2000: 114; Carson 1995: 187 n. 8; Blomberg 1995: 6), "by night" is likely not symbolic in the sense that Nicodemus came from darkness to light, while Judas went from light to darkness (cf. 6:70–71; 12:4–8; 13:2, 26–30; 18:2–5)—a view held by R. Brown (1966: 130) and Auwers (1990). Wallace (1996: 123–24) overreaches when he finds in the genitive of time an indication of "the kind of time in which Nicodemus came to see the Lord." Morris (1995: 187) suggests that John may have had more than one meaning in mind.

19 The iterative use of the present tense ποιῶν points to Jesus' continuing practice of performing "signs" (in Jerusalem; see Morris 1995: 188 n. 14; Wallace 1996: 521).

12 Jesus calls himself "the bridegroom" in Matt. 9:15 pars. For the role of the bridegroom's friend, see Gower 1987: 64–66; Zimmermann and Zimmermann 1999. Joy was the overriding theme at Jewish weddings; the verb πληρόω (plēroō, fulfill, complete) is associated with joy throughout this Gospel (Carson 1991: 211–12; Barrett 1978: 223). The Baptist's words χαρᾷ χαίρει (chara chairei, lit., rejoices with joy), a Hebraism (χαρᾷ is a cognate dative [Wallace 1996: 168–69]), serve to intensify the verb (Ridderbos 1997: 147 n. 132; Morris 1995: 213 n. 112).

52 The reference is qualitative, "stressing the nature or essence of God" (Wallace 1996: 270); see the similar phrase in 3:6.

60 Wallace (1996: 461, 553) interprets ὅτι (hoti, that, because) causally: "because he was speaking with a woman."

68 The absence of a connective in 4:30 is worthy of note. It may accentuate the immediacy of the people's decision to see for themselves whether the woman's testimony concerning Jesus was true. Wallace (1996: 545) notes that ἤρχοντο (ērchonto, they were coming) is an instance of an ingressive imperfect.

6 Wallace (1996: 631–32) notes that ἑωρακότες (heōrakotes, having seen) is an adverbial participle of cause.

12 See especially Wallace (1990: esp. 204; 1996: 531, with reference to McKay 1994: 40), who claims, “Since εἰμί is nowhere else clearly used as a historical present, the present tense should be taken as indicating present time from the viewpoint of the speaker.” For evidence that εἰμί can function as a historical present, see 10:8: πάντες ὅσοι ἦλθον πρὸ ἐμοῦ κλέπται εἰσὶν καὶ λησταί, “all who have come before me were thieves and robbers” (note that “were” is the rendering chosen in the NIV, TNIV, NLT, and NET); cf. 19:40: καθὼς ἔθος ἐστὶν τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις ἐνταφιάζειν, “this was in accordance with Jewish burial customs” (NIV = TNIV; CEV: “which was how the Jewish people buried their dead”). See also Schlatter (1948: 141), who takes the present tense verb in 5:2 at face value but conjectures that the “sheep gate” must have been reconstructed subsequent to its destruction by Titus in A.D. 70.

31 The noun is qualitative, indicating the kind of day, not which day it was (so, rightly, Wallace 1996: 264). Thatcher (1999) calls this “the Sabbath trick,” “a form of ‘unstable irony’ in which the narrator of the Fourth Gospel withholds critical information about an episode until the end of the story, forcing the reader to re-evaluate radically the nature of Jesus’ activity.” However, alternate explanations of the flow of the narrative are possible (if not more probable), and Thatcher’s attempt at a poststructural reading of John 5 and 9 ultimately fails to convince. Highly improbable is the proposal by Laney (1992: 108–9) that the absence of the definite article suggests that this was not a Sabbath at all but a feast day when Sabbath regulations applied (citing Lev. 23:34–36).

52 Barrett (1978: 256) notes that those who had made themselves equal to God in past history included Hiram, Nebuchadnezzar, Pharaoh, and Joash. Ποιῶν (poiōn, making) is a participle of result (Wallace 1996: 638, 664).

69 The verse contains the only instance in the Greek NT of an anarthrous infinitive functioning as a direct object (Wallace 1996: 602).

72 The two genitives ζωῆς (zōēs, of life) and κρίσεως (kriśeōs, of judgment) convey both purpose and result (Wallace 1996: 101).

82 “Have sent” and “have testified” are in the Greek perfect tense, indicating the settled condition resulting from the Baptist’s witness to Jesus (cf. Barrett 1978: 264; Carson 1991: 260; Beasley-Murray 1999: 78; Morris 1995: 288; R. Brown 1966: 224; Wallace [1996: 577] calls this an “extensive perfect”).

106 On the grammatical construction, see Wallace 1996: 693, 695.

15 In light of the fact that the term ἰχθύς came to have eucharistic significance, it may be significant that John uses a different word (E. Johnston 1962: 153).

29 Cf. 3:2 and especially 21:3 (though note 13:30). So Moloney 1998: 203; contra Borchert 1996: 258; Carson 1991: 274. Ἐγγόνει (egegonei, had come) is an intensive pluperfect (Wallace 1996: 585).

96 So Moloney 1998: 231; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.75; Wallace (1996: 658) translates it “as a result of this”; Barrett (1978: 306) opts for both.

105 Though the phrase could be rendered “one of you is the devil” (see Carson 1991: 304; Wallace 1996: 249, 265), this is not necessary, and contextually is less likely than the rendering “a devil.” See also Matt. 16:23 (= Mark 8:33), where Peter is rebuked as “Satan” by Jesus. In John 8:44, Jesus calls the Pharisees children of the devil.

3 The verb tense (a progressive imperfect [Wallace 1996: 543–44]) conveys the notion of Jesus continually moving about through the region of Galilee. Carson (1991: 305) proposes the rendering “continued around Galilee.”

7 The conjunction ἵνα (hina, so that) used with the future indicative represents a Johannine style characteristic (Wallace 1996: 699).

31 E.g., Deut. 16:18–19; Isa. 11:3–4; Zech. 7:9. See also John 5:22–30 (esp. 5:30).

Grammatically, Μὴ κρίνετε (mē krinete, stop judging) enjoins people to cease an action rather than merely prohibiting it (Carson 1991: 316). Κρίσιν κρίνετε (krisin krinete, lit., “judge judgment”) represents a cognate accusative construction (Ridderbos 1997: 266 n. 40; Wallace 1996: 190).

32 Παρησία (parrēsia, openly) is a dative of manner or adverbial dative (Wallace 1996: 162).

“They are not saying a word to him” is a rabbinic expression reflecting tacit approval (R. Brown 1966: 313). “Said R. Judah, ‘Helene’s sukkah [tabernacle] was twenty cubits tall, and sages went in and out, when visiting her, and not one of them said a thing’ ” (t. Sukkah 1.1). The interrogative particle μήποτε (mēpote) signals a tentative question (Carson 1991: 317; Barrett 1978: 321), the gist being “Do the rulers perhaps actually [μήποτε ἀληθῶς] know that he is the Christ?”

59 Ridderbos 1997: 273; Carson 1991: 323–25; Barrett 1978: 326–27; Lindars 1972: 300–301; Calvin 1959: 198; cf. Wallace 1996: 51–52, 654. Carson (1991: 324–25) notes Fee’s observation (1978) that the phrase τοῦτο δὲ εἶπεν (touto de eipen, and he said this) customarily refers to the words of Jesus in John. If this is the case here, then 7:38b is from Jesus and not the evangelist, and thus “from within him” refers to “whoever believes in me.” Other instances of the pendent nominative in John are 1:12; 6:39; 15:2; 17:2 (Hodges 1979b: 241, citing Cortés 1967: 79). Less likely, Jesus here is presented as the source of “rivers of living water” (R. Brown 1966: 320; Beasley-Murray 1999: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.154; Menken 1996: 165–66; Burge 1987: 88–93; 2000: 228; Keener 2003: 728–30).

71 Regarding “You have not been deceived as well, have you?” see commentary at 7:12. Note the perfect tense of πεπλάνησθε (peplanēsthe, you have been deceived) (Morris 1995: 382) as well as the passive voice, avoiding explicit reference to agency so as not to detract from the subject (i.e., the officers who are led astray) (Wallace 1996: 436). Carson (1991: 331) also sees irony in 7:48, for whatever one makes of Nicodemus, he is about to speak out on Jesus’ behalf.

78 Ridderbos (1997: 281 n. 81) again notes the introductory particle μή, which here indicates ridicule. Ἐραύνησον (eraunēson, search) is a conditional imperative, with the verb in the apodosis, ἴδε (ide, see), being another imperative (Wallace 1996: 489). The present tense of ἐγείρεται (egeiretai, he arises) states a (supposedly) timeless truth (so, rightly, Ridderbos 1997: 281) rather than emphasizing presentness (Morris 1995: 385 n. 114). See also additional note. As to the brashness of the comment, cf. 11:49.

4 In my judgment, not even Wallace’s (1993: 291–93) attempted refutation of Heil (1991) succeeds in completely enlisting the internal lexical and syntactical evidence in favor of non-Johannine authorship, though many of his individual points are well taken (Metzger [1994: 188 n. 3] calls Wallace’s refutation of Heil a “convincing rebuttal”).

6 A briefer and more dated (but still helpful) survey is found in Burge 1984: 142–43. Further bibliographic references to materials dealing with both external and internal evidence can be found in Wallace 1993: 290 n. 2; J. A. Sanders 1990: 346 n. 1; Burge 1984: 141 n. 5. Also regularly cited is the monograph by Becker (1963).

4 The conjunction οὖν (oun, so, then) in 8:12 and 8:13, as elsewhere in this Gospel (cf. 8:21, 22, 25), is transitional in nature (Wallace 1996: 674). Motyer (1997: 155–56) plausibly suggests that this conjunction in 8:12 connects with 7:37–38, noting the continuation of themes from the Feast of Tabernacles. He also suggests that the same conjunction in 8:12 also corresponds to 7:52 because John is going to show that the Messiah can indeed come from Galilee. This is based on the prophecy of Isa. 9:1–2.

27 Ἱερόν (hieron, temple area) refers to the “general structure” of the temple (Wallace 1996: 561; see commentary at 2:14).

35 The imperfect ἔλεγεν (elegen, he was saying) accentuates the progressive nature of Jesus’ claim (cf. 8:27; labeling this an “aoristic imperfect,” as Wallace [1996: 542] does, lacks explanatory power).

90 Cf. 5:24; see also 6:40, 47; 11:25–26. Carson (1991: 355 [cf. Lindars 1972: 332]) suggests that this statement is in further development of 8:50. The word ἐμὸν (emon, my) stresses that it is Jesus’ word that must be kept; θάνατον (thanaton, death) is emphatic as well (Morris 1995: 416 n. 104), as is the negative οὐ μὴ ... εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (ou mē ... eis ton aiōna, never . . . ever) (Wallace 1996: 468–69). Note that when Jesus’ opponents quote his statement in 8:52 (per the evangelist’s rendering), they use the less marked pronoun μου (mou, my) instead of the possessive adjective ἐμὸν and do not place θάνατον in an emphatic position.

95 Morris 1995: 416; Carson 1991: 356; Barrett 1978: 351. The pronoun ἡμῶν (hēmōn, our) in the phrase “our father Abraham” is likely exclusive, with Jesus not included as ancestor of Abraham (Wallace 1996: 398). Note also the relative pronoun ὅστις (hostis, who), which is both indefinite (R. Brown 1966: 359) and qualitative (Morris 1995: 416 n. 105) in import. Abraham serves as a type of others like him, and all of those were “of such a quality as to die” (Morris 1995: 416 n. 105).

106 Wallace (1996: 515, 530–31) contends that the present reference does not constitute an instance of the historical present of εἰμί (eimi, I am). Lindars (1972: 336) notes how the “striking change of tense and the use of the simple verb einai put all the emphasis on the timeless condition of eternal existence,” drawing attention also to the escalating force of the “I am” sayings of the present chapter (8:12, 24, 28, 58).

12 On “rabbi,” see commentary at 1:38. Apart from 9:2–3, the verb ἁμαρτάνω (hamartanō, sin) occurs elsewhere in this Gospel only in 5:14. The ἵνα (hina, so that) is consecutive, expressing result (Ridderbos 1997: 332 n. 246; Wallace 1996: 473).

32 The imperfect verb tenses in 9:8–10 indicate ongoing discussion (Morris 1995: 429 n. 24). Morris (1995: 429) regards the NIV rendering of ἔλεγον (elegon, they were saying) as “they demanded” in 9:10 as too strong (note the change to “they asked” in the TNIV). The passive “were opened” in 9:10 is an instance of agency being suppressed for rhetorical effect (Wallace 1996: 437).

52 Note the verb συνετέθειντο (synetetheinto, they decided among themselves; see Ridderbos 1997: 343 n. 281). Wallace (1996: 427) cites the form as an example of a reciprocal middle, with the pluperfect being extensive or consummative (p. 585). The same author classifies the ἵνα (hina, that) as complementary (p. 476).

71 On the grammatical construction underlying the phrase “he could do nothing,” see commentary at 14:30. Morris (1995: 438 n. 46) notes the emphatic double negative; Wallace (1996: 696) cites this as an example of a second-class condition (contrary to fact).

24 “Were” is the rendering chosen in the NIV (but note the TNIV), NLT, and NET. If correct, this would constitute an instance in the Fourth Gospel of a historical present of εἰμί (eimi, am), whose existence is denied by Wallace (1990: 204; 1996: 531). But see Morris (1995: 451 n. 31), who says that the emphasis is on Jesus’ own day. Another possible instance of this grammatical feature is found in 19:40 (so NIV = TNIV; CEV; see commentary at 5:2).

31 On “life,” see commentary at 1:4. Περισσόν (perisson, abundantly) is an adverbial accusative (Wallace 1996: 201, 293).

78 Ridderbos (1997: 371 n. 373) identifies λιθάζετε (lithazete, you stone) as a conative present (cf. Morris 1995: 466 n. 90); Wallace (1996: 535) calls it a “tendential present,” describing an act about to be performed.

79 Cf. Mark 14:64 par.; see Bock 1998: es p. 234–37. See the brief discussion of Synoptic parallels in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.310. John 10:33 is the only occurrence of the term βλασφημία (blasphēmia, blasphemy) in this Gospel; the verb βλασφημέω (blasphēmeō, blaspheme) occurs only in 10:36. The expression καὶ ὅτι (kai hoti, even because) (adverbial καὶ) further clarifies the charge made by the Jews (Morris 1995: 467 n. 92). The participle ὄν (ōn, being) in 10:33 is concessive: “even though you are a mere man” (Wallace 1996: 634–35).

Ποιεῖς (poieis, you make) is identified by Ridderbos (1997: 372 n. 375) as a durative present.

37 See Morris (1995: 482), who refers to the universal fear regarding death in the ancient world. There is no reason to follow Barrett (1978: 392 [cf. R. Brown 1966: 431]), who, on the basis that φίλος (philos, friend) is a technical term for a Christian in the NT, proposes that this is the “true meaning” of this “pregnant saying.” Carson (1991: 409) notes the “not accidental” switch from the plural “our friend” to the singular “I am going,” saying that this indicates that Jesus alone is the resurrection and the life. “I am going” is identified as a futuristic present by Wallace (1996: 536).

41 Whereby Jesus’ clarification in 11:14 is preceded by the evangelist’s aside in 11:13. Εἰρήκει (eirēkei, he had spoken) is an extensive pluperfect (Wallace 1996: 585); ἐκεῖνοι δέ (ekeinoi de, but they) emphasizes the difference in subject: “they in distinction from him” (Morris 1995: 482 n. 27). Κοίμησις (koimēsis, sleep) is used as an expression for death in Sir. 46:19; 48:13. On the phrase παρρησία (parrēsia, frankness), see 7:4; 16:29. Regarding the supernatural knowledge conveyed, see, e.g., 4:17–18.

60 So Ridderbos 1997: 395. Wallace (1996: 703) goes further: “Although formally a second class condition, it is intended here as a rebuke. It is as if she had said, ‘Lord, you should have been here!’ ” (contra Carson 1991: 412).

68 Morris (1995: 489) and Carson (1991: 413) note the one article tying closely together “everyone who lives and believes.” Οὐ μὴ ... εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (ou mē ... eis ton aiōna) is an emphatic negative: “never, ever” (plus subjunctive; see Wallace 1996: 468). In the question “Do you believe this?” the verb πιστεύω (pisteuō, believe) is followed by the accusative, which is unique in this Gospel (Bultmann 1971: 404 n. 1; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.332).

71 Note the emphatic ἐγώ (egō, I) (Morris 1995: 489) and the perfect (labeled “intensive” by Wallace [1996: 574]) πεπίστευκα (pepisteuka, I have come to believe), which indicates a settled conviction (contra Moloney [1998: 328], who believes that the perfect suggests arrogance on Martha’s part).

98 Wallace (1996: 548) identifies ἐφίλει (ephilei, he loved) as a customary imperfect.

102 Calvin (1961: 13) comments that Jesus comes “like a wrestler preparing for the contest”: “no wonder that He groans again, for the violent tyranny of death which He had to overcome stands before His eyes.” Wallace (1996: 631) takes ἐμβριμώμενος (embrimōmenos, bristling) to be a causal participle; my preference is attendant circumstance.

143 Note the sacrificial language (ὑπέρ, hyper, for) in 11:51–52 (Carson 1991: 422; Wallace 1996: 387). On the irony in Caiaphas’s statement, see especially Duke 1985: 87 (cited in Morris 1995: 503 n. 107).

41 The evangelist editorializes that “this was to show the kind of death Jesus was going to die” (with σημαίνων [sēmainōn, indicating] serving as a participle indicating purpose [Wallace 1996: 635]). “Kind of death” in the first instance refers to crucifixion (as opposed to, e.g., stoning) but also hints at the fact that Jesus’ death is also “the pathway to his glorification, indeed an integral part of it” (Carson 1991: 444). The same phrase is used regarding Peter’s eventual martyr’s death in 21:19 (Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61, 168). It occurs frequently in connection with Greek oracles (e.g., Plutarch, De Pythiae oraculis 404.D.10), but also in regard to the meaning of names or prophecy (Josephus, Ant. 1.19.8 §308; 7.9.5 §214).

20 Wallace (1996: 558) identifies ἤρξατο (ērtrato, he began) as an ingressive aorist, but the verb already means “begin,” which carries an ingressive notion, so that it is unclear what this identification contributes. Schlatter (1948: 281) notes that this is the only Johannine occurrence of the verb ἄρχομαι (except for the pericope adulterae, where the word appears at 8:9).

31 The verb νίπτεις (nipteis, are you washing) has a futuristic force (Wallace 1996: 535).

35 See 13:11 and 15:3, the only other two instances of καθάρως (katharos, clean) in John’s Gospel. The aorist infinitive νίψασθαι (nipsasthai, to wash oneself) is identified by Wallace (1996: 427) as a “permissive middle.”

11 Wallace (1996: 648) notes that ἦν ἀνακείμενος (ēn anakeimenos, he was reclining) is an imperfect periphrastic participle, which accentuates the ongoing, continual nature of the disciple’s posture close to Jesus.

21 The present verb ποιεῖς (poieis, you are doing) is conative (Wallace 1996: 535), denoting an action not yet begun but about to be attempted. Carson (1991: 475) and Morris (1995: 557 n. 63; cf. Barrett 1978: 448) suggest that τάχιον (tachion, quickly) should be construed as a genuine comparative and rendered “more quickly” (than Judas had planned). This would be in keeping with the way the comparative form of this word is used in its only other Johannine reference (20:4), though in its other two NT instances the form is simply elative, to be rendered “soon” or “quickly” (Heb. 13:19, 23). Hence, caution seems to be called for in drawing conclusions from the comparative form of the term in the present passage.

91 The vast majority of commentators (including R. Brown, Barrett, Borchert, Morris, Carson, and Ridderbos) believe that teaching and reminding are in synonymous parallelism. On the Spirit’s teaching ministry, see the parallel in 16:13. Both verses together (14:26 and 16:13) echo Ps. 25:5 (cf. 25:9). See also Neh. 9:20 (cf. 1 John 2:20, 27). Regarding Jesus’ teaching, see John 6:59; 7:14, 28, 35; 8:20; 18:20. It is often argued that the use of the Greek masculine pronoun ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, he) for the Spirit in passages such as John 14:26; 15:26; and 16:13–14 affirms the personality of the Holy Spirit (Barrett 1978: 482; Borchert 2002: 159; Morris 1995: 583 n. 73 [citing Westcott]; 606 n. 64; 621 n. 27; and others cited in Wallace 1996: 331 n. 42). However, the most likely reason for John’s use of the masculine pronoun in these passages is that the antecedent is the masculine noun ὁ παράκλητος (ho paraklētos, the helping presence). If so, John’s use of a masculine pronoun to refer to the Spirit is best explained as a function of grammar rather than theology, and arguments for the personality of the Holy Spirit must be made on other grounds (so rightly Wallace 1996: 331–32, who points out that it is difficult to find any text where the neuter noun πνεῦμα [pneuma, spirit/Spirit] is grammatically referred to by the masculine).

31 Conversely, fruitlessness fails to give God the glory that he so amply deserves (Carson 1991: 518). The use of ἐδοξάσθη (edoxasthē, lit., he was glorified) resembles the similar instances of passive aorist forms (with the agents remaining unspecified) in 15:6 (Borchert 2002: 145). The conjunction ἵνα (hina) functions appositionally, meaning “namely” or “that” (Wallace 1996: 475–76).

44 The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) functions appositionally (Wallace 1996: 476). The distinction made by Moloney (1998: 424 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 663]) between the disciples being commanded to love “continuously” (present subjunctive) on the basis of Jesus’ crucifixion, a single act of love (aorist), founders because of reliance on outmoded notions of Greek verbal theory.

2 Keener (2003: 1019) finds another micro-chiasm in 15:18–25, with 15:20ab (a servant is not greater than his master) at the center. The six conditional clauses in 15:18–24 represent warnings pertaining to the future (or present) of the Christian community in relation to the world. Such parting exhortations are a common feature of farewell discourses (Moloney 1998: 433). The present condition is second class: “If the world hates you—and it does” (Wallace 1996: 696; Borchert 2002: 154). On the “world,” see commentary at 1:9; the same phrase occurs in 1 John 3:13 (see also John 17:14). On the contrast between “above” and “below,” see 3:31; 8:23 (cf. 18:36–37). The form γινώσκετε (ginōskete, you know) can be read as an imperative (NIV; NRSV; NLT; ISV; ESV; HCSB; TNIV; Barrett 1978: 480) or an indicative (NASB; KJV), though admittedly the difference is marginal (R. Brown 1970: 686). The pronoun με is emphatic (Morris 1995: 602 n. 42). The perfect verb form μεμίσηκεν (memisēken, it hated) stresses the settled, completed state of the world’s hatred toward Jesus (Barrett 1978: 480; R. Brown 1970: 686; Morris 1995: 602 n. 44).

31 Wallace’s (1996: 604) paraphrase.

19 The explanatory phrase “now this is” is in keeping with Johannine style (cf., e.g., 3:19: “this is the verdict”). The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) here, in typical Johannine idiom, is appositional (Wallace 1996: 475). Morris (1995: 638) notes that ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) here precedes the noun (elsewhere in John also in 4:23), and he proposes that this indicates emphasis. The verse is regularly seen by critical scholars as a Johannine insertion (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 741; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.172; Barrett 1978: 503; but see Carson 1991: 556; Ridderbos 1997: 549).

50 On Pilate, see commentary at 18:29. Ἐμαστίγωσεν (emastigōsen) is a causative active form: “Pilate caused Jesus to be scourged, but did not perform the act himself” (Wallace 1996: 412). The juxtaposed expressions ἐμαστίγωσεν (scourged [19:1]) and ραπίσματα (rhapismata, blows [19:3]) echo the Servant Song in Isa. 50:6 LXX, where the same two words (the former in noun form) are featured (Ridderbos 1997: 599 n. 102; cf. R. Brown 1970: 874).

56 Wallace (1996: 58, citing BDF §147) says that articular nominatives with simple substantives were used in Attic Greek only to address inferiors: “Thus, although they call him ‘King,’ the form in which they make this proclamation denies the address.”

58 Wallace (1996: 221) says that the article preceding ἄνθρωπος (anthrōpos, man) is deictic (pointing).

28 “Do not write” in 19:21 somewhat unexpectedly involves a present-tense verb (γράφε, graphe). Wallace (1996: 487–88) classifies the form as an imperative of entreaty. Barrett (1978: 549, following N. Turner 1963) proposes the translation “Alter what you have written” (i.e., “Do not go on writing [what you have written]”; cf. R. Brown 1970: 902).

29 The double perfect of γέγραφα (gegrapha, I have written) conveys a sense of finality, portraying Pilate’s action as a fait accompli (Ridderbos 1997: 609 n. 134; Morris 1995: 714 n. 54). Bultmann (1971: 670 n. 2 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 902]) suggests that the first perfect is aoristic; Wallace (1996: 577) lists 19:22 as an example of an extensive perfect focusing on the completion of an action in the past. Similar word combinations are found also in the LXX (Gen. 43:14; Esth. 4:16; 1 Macc. 13:38) and in rabbinic literature (b. Menah. 3a; b. Ketub. 96a; b. Yebam. 106b) (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; further instances are cited in Schlatter 1948: 349). Perhaps significantly, similar phrases are found also in a Roman context (note Cicero, Epistulae ad Quintum fratrem 1.2.2; 1.2.13: scripsi, scripsi). Keener’s (2003: 1138) observation that every other instance of “written” in this Gospel refers to Scripture (2:17; 6:31, 45; 8:17; 10:34; 12:14, 16; 15:25), which cannot be broken (10:35), seems of doubtful relevance here.

16 The approach of several disciples here coheres with the plural ἀπῆλθον (apēlthon, they went) in Luke 24:24 (Carson 1991: 636). Wallace (1996: 401) notes the singular ἐξῆλθεν (exēlthen, he went out) in 20:3 and seems to conclude that here the evangelist is emphasizing Peter. If so, this would counter the notion (advanced by some) that Johannine supremacy is affirmed in the present pericope (see the following note).

21 Wallace (1996: 274, 277) briefly discusses the implications of this construction for the Granville Sharp rule. On Mary Magdalene, see commentary at 20:1. On the disciples, see commentary at 20:19. Regarding the statement “I have seen the Lord,” see 20:25. On “the Lord,” see commentary at 20:2; see also 20:13; 21:7. On “seeing” Jesus, see 20:20 and commentary at 20:29.

21 The two perfect verbs ἀφέωνται (apheōntai, they are forgiven) and κεκράτηνται (kekratēntai, they are retained) denote the settled state of the pronounced forgiveness or retention of sins (see esp. Carson 1991: 655; Wallace [1996: 581] calls these “proleptic perfects”). See additional note.

7 Stibbe (1996: 203) comments, “Like Mary Magdalene, Thomas has made the journey to ‘owned’ faith ... his own faith in Jesus as Yahweh, ‘Lord and God.’ ” Note the double personal pronoun μου (mou, my), which accentuates the personal nature of Thomas’s confession (Carson 1991: 659; Beasley-Murray 1999: 386; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.332; Wallace 1995: 82).

25 Wallace (1996: 155) classifies τῷ πλοιαρίῳ (tō ploiarīō, in the boat) as a dative of sphere and τῶν ἰχθύων (tōn ichthyōn, of the fish) as a genitive of content (1996: 93). The word for “towing” or “dragging” (σύρω, syrō; used elsewhere in the NT only figuratively) occurs in connection with a trawl net in Plutarch, De sollertia animalium 977.F. Carson (1991: 671) sees in the narrator’s staying with the disciples in the boat rather than following Peter in his encounter with Jesus “a small indication of eyewitness integrity.” If the narrator is none other than John, the son of Zebedee, of course, he himself would have been in that boat, which may further explain why the story is told the way it is.

22 Carson (1991: 684) adduces 1:14; 3:2, 11; 20:2; 1 John 1:2, 4, 5, 6, 7; 3 John 12; 2 Cor. 12:2–4; Schlatter (1948: 376), with reference to John 3:2 and 20:2, where the speaker is included in the plural, speaks of the possible presence of collaborators. Minear (1983: 95) believes that 1:14–18 and 21:24 are intended by the evangelist “to enclose his entire message to his audience.” Wallace (1996: 399) lists the present passage as a (debatable) example of the exclusive “we,” “in

Waltke, B. K. 47n86
Watson, D. F. 93n15
Weisse, C. H. 446n104
Welles, C. B. 532n55
Wellhausen, J. 446n104
Wenham, D. 18
West, M. 347
Westcott, B. F. 7n15, 7n16, 17n28, 27n22, 31n37, 59n10, 61n18, 64n28, 78n84, 81n93, which the first-person plural restricts the group to the author and his associates” (p. 397).

86 See also Wallace 1996: 365–68, referring to Waltke 1958: 1.166–76; R. Brown 1966: 16; and especially the excellent, definitive discussion in Carson 1991: 131–34, referring also to R. Edwards 1988; La Potterie 1977: 1.145–50.

15 On wine in biblical times, see Watson, DJG 870–73; Keener 2003: 500–501.

104 The transition from 14:31 to 15:1 is frequently labeled an aporia, which is commonly taken to indicate a literary seam indicating the presence of different underlying sources (one of the first to see such a difficulty was C. H. Weiss 1856: 116; cf. Wellhausen 1907 and the influential series of essays by E. Schwartz 1907; 1908; see the historical survey in Kellum 2005: 10–78). However, this conclusion seems premature and unwarranted in light of preferable alternate explanations. Thielman (1991: 180), for instance, suggests that the present passage may be an instance of a “purposeful attempt at obscurity” common in ancient writers (he cites the transition from 5:47 to 6:1 as another possible example). Recently, Kellum (2005: 230) has suggested that statements indicating movement in the Fourth Gospel regularly serve as ways to move along the narrative. Stibbe (1993: 159), too, is able to make “very good sense” of the narrative as it stands without resorting to source-critical theories. For him, 14:31 is part of the Johannine theme of “the elusive Christ.” After saying in 14:30 that the devil “has no hold” on him, Jesus, knowing that the “prince of this world” is now coming, is evading his captors for one final time. Schlatter (1948: 304), finally, makes the improbable suggestion that the unevenness may be due to a break in dictation.

55 The former is favored by Ha-Reubéni 1933; the latter by Hart 1952. Goodenough and Welles (1953) and Avi-Yonah (1964: 151) suggest acanthus.

104 The transition from 14:31 to 15:1 is frequently labeled an aporia, which is commonly taken to indicate a literary seam indicating the presence of different underlying sources (one of the first to see such a difficulty was C. H. Weiss 1856: 116; cf. Wellhausen 1907 and the influential series of essays by E. Schwartz 1907; 1908; see the historical survey in Kellum 2005: 10–78). However, this conclusion seems premature and unwarranted in light of preferable alternate explanations. Thielman (1991: 180), for instance, suggests that the present passage may be an instance of a “purposeful attempt at obscurity” common in ancient writers (he cites the transition from 5:47 to 6:1 as another possible example). Recently, Kellum (2005: 230) has suggested that statements indicating movement in the Fourth Gospel regularly serve as ways to move along the narrative. Stibbe (1993: 159), too, is able to make “very good sense” of the narrative as it stands without resorting to source-critical theories. For him, 14:31 is part of the Johannine theme of “the elusive Christ.” After saying in 14:30 that the devil “has no hold” on him, Jesus, knowing that the “prince of this world” is now coming, is evading his captors for one final time. Schlatter (1948: 304), finally, makes the improbable suggestion that the unevenness may be due to a break in dictation.

15 The epithet “the disciple Jesus loved” is plausibly understood as an instance of authorial modesty (see Vanhoozer 1993: 374, who cites Augustine and Westcott, contra Barrett 1978: 117). On authorial modesty, see also Köstenberger 2004.

16 See Blomberg 2001: 72, referring to Westcott. Nevertheless, it should be acknowledged that apostolic authorship remains a hypothesis. In an essay surveying scholarship from the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries on the issue, I have shown that the apostolic paradigm was challenged on largely philosophical rather than evidential grounds and that there is therefore compelling reason to doubt that the Fourth Gospel’s Johannine authorship has ever been refuted by actual argument (Köstenberger 2001b: 17–47). To assert the superiority of alternative hypotheses as virtually self-evident without adducing supporting evidence, as is commonly done today, hardly constitutes evenhanded scholarship. Cf. Keener 2003: 81–139, who at the outset of his thorough investigation of the authorship of John’s Gospel (which concludes, tentatively, in favor of apostolic authorship) states that the Fourth Gospel’s apostolic authorship has often been opposed out of dogmatism (p. 81) but that “traditional conservative scholars have made a better case for Johannine authorship of the Gospel ... than other scholars have made against it” (p. 82).

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon’s work is given extensive coverage in Origen’s commentary on John’s Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John’s Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάρξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that “the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel’s] use”; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges “the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

22 Moloney (1998: 35) says that πρὸς connotes motion, not just “with,” and translates it “turned toward.” Yet any force of motion inherent in πρὸς is overridden by the stative verb (Wallace 1996: 358–59; Schnackenburg [1990: 1.234] also rejects the idea). Lindars (1972: 84) proposes “in company with,” while Westcott (1908: 1.6) writes, “The personal being of the Word was realised in active intercourse with and in perfect communion with God.” Bultmann (1971: 32–33) suggests that ἦν πρὸς is a Semitism equivalent to παρά plus the dative.

37 “Overcome” or an equivalent is favored also by Morris 1995: 76; Moloney 1998: 36; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.245–46; Laney 1992: 39; Lindars 1972: 87; Schlatter 1948: 9 (“καταλαμβάνω never means ‘understand’ in John”); and Westcott 1908: 1.9–10. Carson (1991: 138) thinks that John might have both meanings (“overcome” and “comprehend”) in mind (so also Whitacre 1999: 53) and likes the ambiguity in BAGD’s translation, “master” (see BDAG 520). Keener (2003: 387) believes that John’s use of κατέλαβεν in 1:5 is an instance of traductio, a play on the multiple meanings of a word (here “comprehend” and “overcome”). Keener notes that the word occurs in Wis. 7:30 but admits that there the term clearly means “overcome” and no wordplay is present. Burge (2000: 56) agrees that both are at work, but he sees “overcome” as being dominant. Calvin (1959: 12) translates “comprehend.” The major translations divide more or less evenly between the two options, usually mentioning the one not chosen in a footnote: (1) NIV: “understood”; NASB, NKJV: “comprehend”; (2) NLT: “extinguish”; NET: “mastered”; ISV: “put out”; HCSB, ESV, NRSV: “overcome.” Notably, the TNIV changed the NIV’s “understood” to “overcome.”

10 Brodie (1993: 148) uses “trial” terminology. Westcott (1908: 1.32) instead sees this as “in some sense, a Temptation of John corresponding to the (simultaneous) Temptation of Christ.”

18 Westcott (1908: 1.34) notes, “The replies grow shorter from time to time: ‘I am not the Christ,’ ‘I am not,’ ‘No.’ ” Indeed, the Baptist must “decrease” (cf. John 3:30). Brodie (1993: 150) observes, “There is a faint evoking of a process of self-emptying.”

28 In contrast to Mark 1:7, John uses ἄξιος not ἱκανός, does not use κύψας (Schlatter 1948: 45), and uses ἵνα plus subjunctive rather than an infinitive (Barrett 1978: 175). Staley (1988: 60) detects a progression from the Baptist’s more active role in relation to Jesus in 1:26–34 to his taking a more passive role after 1:35 until the shift is completed in 3:22–36. See also the insightful comments on the nature of the Baptist’s witness by Westcott 1908: 1.37.

84 Note the plural “we have found” in 1:45 (Ridderbos 1997: 87). Westcott (1908: 1.45) suggests that “the very mixture of Hebrew (Simon, Nathanael) and Greek (Andrew, Philip) names seems to indicate the representative character of this first group of disciples.” Brodie (1993: 165) sees the call of Philip as “in some sense proleptic of ... the call of the Greeks.”

93 Stibbe (1993: 42) observes that Nathanael’s question “sounds very much like a local proverb.” Westcott (1908: 1.55) notes that some of the church fathers took this expression positively: “Something good can come out of Nazareth.”

14 Whitacre (1999: 78) conjectures that the way Jesus and his disciples are mentioned here may imply “that they got into town at the last minute and were invited to come along.” Whitacre adds that it may have been their “unexpected presence at the wedding [that] may account for the wine shortage.” Wine may have run out “because Jesus did not contribute, either because of his last minute arrival or because of his poverty.” Whitacre here echoes suggestions already made by Westcott (1908: 1.81).

9 The phrase “Jewish Passover” has caused some controversy. Barrett (1978: 197) conjectures that the phrase may presuppose the existence of a Christian Passover at the time of writing (so, earlier, Westcott 1908: 1.89; cf. Borchert 1996: 162). Schnackenburg (1991: 1.345) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 39) suggest that the evangelist or the church had stopped participating in the Jewish Passover. Witherington (1995: 86–87) notes that the phrase indicates a certain distance between the author and Judaism and at least a partial Gentile audience (similarly, Morris 1995: 169). Carson (1991: 176) thinks that “Jewish” refers to the Jews of Judea in contrast to Galileans and Diaspora Jews.

36 Cf. Carson 1991: 177; 1984: 441; Morris 1995: 167; Laney 1992: 70; Westcott 1908: 1.96–97; Calvin 1959: 51; Köstenberger 1999a: 76–78. Carson (1991: 177, referring to Morris) notes that virtually all of John 1–5 (except for the sections on John the Baptist) is non-Synoptic material. Morris (1995: 167 n. 55) states that “there are practically no resemblances between the two narratives, apart from the central act”; only five words are shared. Other commentators holding this view are Luther, W. Hendriksen, and R. V. G. Tasker (Kreitzer 1998: 94).

8 Cf. LSJ 1130, s.v. μήτις; NRSV; Lindars 1972: 193. Westcott (1908: 1.163) comments, “The form of the sentence grammatically suggests a negative answer (v. 33), but hope bursts through it.” The two other uses of μήτι in this Gospel (8:22; 18:35) unequivocally expect a negative response.

56 See Carson 1991: 251; Borchert 1996: 238; Barrett 1978: 259; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.104; Westcott 1908: 1.190.

30 So, in essence, Westcott (1908: 218), who infers that Jesus had led the disciples “to expect that He would be with them, and that they clung in some way to the expectation even in their disappointment.”

66 The personal pronoun ἡμεῖς (hēmeis, we) may be emphatic, underscoring the certainty of people’s conviction (Morris 1995: 328). R. Brown (1966: 270) detects a degree of animosity in the pronoun οὗτος (houtos, this one) and translates it “this fellow.” Similarly, Westcott (1908: 233), who finds “perhaps a tinge of contemptuous surprise in the pronoun.”

18 Westcott (1908: 264–65) detects in the question a mixture of ill will and curiosity.

11 A survey of major commentaries shows that about half provide a regular commentary (Carson, Laney, Lindars, Whitacre, Calvin, Westcott), while the other half refrain from comment (Michaels, Talbert, Stibbe, Brodie, D. M. Smith), in some cases choosing not to address the issue at all (e.g., Schlatter [1948: 205], who in his scholarly commentary moves directly from 7:52 to 8:12 without comment, though his popular commentary [1962: 139–41] does treat the pericope adulterae in deference to “ecclesiastical tradition”; see also Zahn [1921: 404], who, like Schlatter, moves immediately from 7:52 to 8:12 and deals with the pericope in a lengthy excursus on pp. 723–30).

47 So the majority of commentators, including Ridderbos 1997: 305–6; Carson 1991: 346–47; Morris 1995: 404; Beasley-Murray 1999: 132; D. M. Smith 1999: 185; Borchert 1996: 301 n. 182; Burge 2000: 259; Bultmann 1971: 252 n. 2; contra R. Brown 1966: 354–55, 358; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.204–5; Moloney 1998: 277; Westcott 1908: 2.13–14.

11 The lack of an article before ποιμήν (poimēn, shepherd) in 10:2 does not negate the specificity of the term (Ridderbos 1997: 354; Morris 1995: 446 n. 13, 453–54; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 2.282). Westcott (1908: 2.50) says that the “absence of the article fixes attention on the character as distinct from the person.”

73 So, rightly, Carson (1991: 394–95), whose entire discussion repays careful reading (see also Morris 1995: 465; Beasley-Murray 1999: 174; Moloney 1998: 320; Burge 2000: 296; Laney 1992: 195; Stibbe 1993: 118; Westcott 1908: 2.68). Michaels (1989: 187) seems to conceive of Jesus’ unity with the Father in functional terms (whether primarily or exclusively so), as both of them doing “the same work.” Barrett (1978: 382) notes that the unity between the Father and the Son is also a unity of love and obedience.

27 For a similar delay, see 7:4–10 (noted by Moule 1975: 118). Keener (2003: 839) observes that in 4:40 Jesus also remains two additional days. Westcott (1908: 2.82) comments, “Because the Lord loved the family He went at the exact moment when His visit would be most fruitful, and not just when He was invited.”

40 For a defense of the historicity of this incident, see Carson (1991: 409), who points out that the disciples did not have the advantage of knowing the end of the story; that the messenger had announced sickness but not death; and that the disciples’ anxiety about returning to Judea might have led to a certain amount of denseness. Carson also, rightly in my opinion, sees no double meaning in σωθήσεται (sōthēsetai, he will get well) (1991: 410; contra Barrett 1978: 393; R. Brown 1966: 424; Moloney 1998: 337; Westcott 1908: 2.84).

67 Westcott (1908: 2.90) observes, “Martha had spoken of a gift to be obtained from God and dispensed by Christ. Christ turns her thoughts to His own Person. He is that which men need.” See also the challenging question, “Do you believe this?” that concludes Jesus’ statement at the end of 11:26. Cf. Brodie 1993: 393.

113 Westcott (1908: 2.101) draws a connection between Jesus’ prayer here and his opening statement in 11:4. On the term “Father,” see commentary at 1:14. “Father” is the customary address for God used by Jesus in prayer, occasionally adorned by a divine attribute, as in “holy Father” (17:11) or “righteous Father” (17:25). See 12:27–28; 17:1, 5, 21, 24; Luke 11:2; 22:42; 23:34, 46. At times, the address is “Our Father in heaven” (Matt. 6:9) or “Father, Lord of heaven and earth” (Matt. 11:25). The address “Father” is also found in the Qumran Scrolls (4Q372).

137 Westcott (1908: 2.105) notes that the two finite verbs, ἐλεύσονται (eleusontai, they will come) and ἀροῦσιν (arousin, they will take away), rather than participle and finite verb, “give distinction to each element in the picture.”

6 See commentary at 7:35, the only other occurrence of the term in John’s Gospel. A look at the remaining NT references indicates that in virtually all instances the term is used in contrast with “Jews” (Ἰουδαῖοι, Ioudaioi; see Acts 14:1; 16:1; 18:4; 19:10, 17; 20:21; Rom. 1:16; 2:9, 10; 3:9; 10:12; 1 Cor. 1:22, 24; 10:32; 12:13; Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11). That the “Greeks” mentioned here were not Diaspora Jews (as Calvin [1961: 35] thought) is accepted by virtually all major commentators (e.g., Westcott [1908: 2.120], who likens these to the Gentile magi at the beginning of Matthew’s Gospel; Ridderbos 1997: 427; Carson 1991: 436; Barrett 1978: 421; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.381; Witherington 1995: 223; Moloney 1998: 351; Burge 2000: 342).

3 Westcott (1908: 2.159) comments, “The departure of Judas marked the crisis of the Lord’s victory. By this the company was finally ‘cleansed’ (v. 10).”

10 So, among others, Schlatter 1948: 286. On the “disciple Jesus loved,” see Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61 (including further bibliographic references). For the identification of the “disciple Jesus loved” with John the son of Zebedee, see chapter 1 in Köstenberger 1999a; for the identification of the “disciple Jesus loved” with the Fourth Evangelist, see Jackson 1999. See also the discussion of authorial modesty in Vanhoozer 1993: 374, citing Augustine and Westcott. Contra Culpepper (1983: 121–23), who views the “beloved disciple” not only as an “ideal disciple” but also as the physical personification of the Paraclete. Beck (1997: 108–36) essentially aligns himself with Culpepper in characterizing this disciple as “the paradigm” or “embodiment of discipleship” (pp. 135–36).

3 The diminutive τέκνία (teknia, little children) is used only here in John’s Gospel but seven times in John’s first epistle (1 John 2:1, 12, 28; 3:7, 18; 4:4; 5:21). See Brodie 1993: 456; Westcott 1908: 2.160–61.

22 Most commentators take both occurrences of πιστεύετε (pisteute, believe, trust) in 14:1 as imperatives (e.g., Carson 1991: 488; Morris 1995: 566; Beasley-Murray 1999: 249; Burge 2000: 391; Westcott 1908: 2.167; Köstenberger 1999a: 163). Alternatively, the first form may be an indicative: “You trust in God; trust also in me” (NIV footnote) or interrogative (Bultmann 1971: 600). Schnackenburg (1990: 3.59) notes that 14:1b forms a chiasm (“[You] Trust in God, also in me trust”).

57 Westcott (1908: 2.174) observes, “These ‘greater works’ are also works of Christ, being done by those who ‘believe on Him.’ ”

91 The vast majority of commentators (including R. Brown, Barrett, Borchert, Morris, Carson, and Ridderbos) believe that teaching and reminding are in synonymous parallelism. On the Spirit's teaching ministry, see the parallel in 16:13. Both verses together (14:26 and 16:13) echo Ps. 25:5 (cf. 25:9). See also Neh. 9:20 (cf. 1 John 2:20, 27). Regarding Jesus' teaching, see John 6:59; 7:14, 28, 35; 8:20; 18:20. It is often argued that the use of the Greek masculine pronoun ἐκεῖνος (ekeinos, he) for the Spirit in passages such as John 14:26; 15:26; and 16:13–14 affirms the personality of the Holy Spirit (Barrett 1978: 482; Borchert 2002: 159; Morris 1995: 583 n. 73 [citing Westcott]; 606 n. 64; 621 n. 27; and others cited in Wallace 1996: 331 n. 42). However, the most likely reason for John's use of the masculine pronoun in these passages is that the antecedent is the masculine noun ὁ παράκλητος (ho paraklētos, the helping presence). If so, John's use of a masculine pronoun to refer to the Spirit is best explained as a function of grammar rather than theology, and arguments for the personality of the Holy Spirit must be made on other grounds (so rightly Wallace 1996: 331–32, who points out that it is difficult to find any text where the neuter noun πνεῦμα [pneuma, spirit/Spirit] is grammatically referred to by the masculine).

13 Westcott (1908: 2.198) notes, "Everything is removed from the branch which tends to divert the vital power from the production of fruit." The term καθαίρω (kathairō, prune) is rare in the LXX and occurs only here in the NT. It is found frequently with reference to agricultural processes (though not necessarily pruning) in secular Greek (e.g., Xenophon, Oeconomicus 18.6; 20.11). On cutting, see Matt. 3:10 par.; 7:19; Rom. 11:22, 24 (ἐκκόπτω, ekkoptō, cut off). On pruning, see Isa. 18:5; Jer. 5:10 (cf. Heb. 12:4–11). Commentators are virtually unanimous in detecting a play on words in the parallel use of αἶρω (airō, remove) and καθαίρω in 15:2 (e.g., Carson 1991: 515).

19 The adjective καθαρός (katharos, clean; cf. the verb καθαίρω [kathairō] rendered "prune" in 15:2) is occasionally used in Greek literature in connection with the growth of vines (Xenophon, Oeconomicus 20.20: καθαίραι αἱ ἄμπελοι). Westcott (1908: 2.199) suggests that the word may contain an allusion to Lev. 19:23.

1 The prayer is often called Jesus' "high-priestly prayer" (a designation reaching back at least as far as the sixteenth century), though this label hardly fits with Johannine thought, which does not picture Jesus as a high priest (Ridderbos 1997: 546; Carson 1991: 552–53; though see commentary at 17:19 below). Westcott's and E. C. Hoskyns's title "prayer of consecration," though not without merit (see below), fails to encompass the contents of the entire prayer (Carson 1991: 553; Barrett 1978: 500). Hence, commentators now frequently opt for more generic titles of the present prayer, such as "The Farewell Prayer" (Ridderbos) or "The Prayer of Jesus" (Carson). Witherington (1995: 266) calls it "The Sage's Prayer," based on his view that the Fourth Evangelist portrays Jesus as a sage.

5 Hence, it was common especially in older commentators to refer to the present prayer as Jesus' "prayer of consecration" (e.g., Cullmann, E. C. Hoskyns, Bernard, W. F. Howard [cited in Agourides 1968: 138]; see also Westcott [1908: 2.238], who titles John 17 "The Prayer of Consecration" but later says that the chapter contains "what may be most properly called 'the Lord's Prayer'"). This designation has merit (esp. in light of 17:19 [so, rightly, Michaels 1989: 297]), as long as it is not used to imply a strong link between the prayer and the liturgical practices of the church toward the end of the first century A.D. More modestly and soberly, Calvin (1961: 134) calls the prayer "the seal of the preceding teaching" of Jesus.

29 Westcott (1908: 2.245–46) distinguishes between the "glory of the Eternal Word" (spoken of here) and the “glory of Christ, the Incarnate Word” (spoken of in 17:22), though he notes that the two correspond to one another. Preexistence is ascribed also to Wisdom in Second Temple literature (e.g., Wis. 7:25; 9:10–11) on the basis of its portrayal in the OT Book of Proverbs (esp. 8:23, 30). But see commentary at 1:1.

48 As Westcott (1908: 2.251) rightly affirms, the plural pronoun “we” signals the “sameness of essence” that “unites the Father and Christ. . . . Their nature is one.”

80 Westcott (1908: 2.260) writes, “The words distinctly imply the personal pre-existence of Christ. The thought of an eternal love active in the depths of divine Being presents, perhaps, as much as we can faintly apprehend of the doctrine of the essential Trinity.”

1 Stibbe (1992: 111–12) contends that John’s characterization of Jesus in his passion narrative consists of three aspects: Jesus as judge, king, and elusive God. Stibbe also suggests that 18:1–27 serves as an “implicit commentary on the truth enunciated in 1:5” (i.e., the victory of the light over the darkness [p. 100]). On the relationship between the Johannine and the Synoptic passion narratives, see Ridderbos 1996: 569–72; Carson 1991: 571–76; Westcott 1908: 2.262–64. Burge (2000: 485–86) addresses the historical trustworthiness of the Johannine passion narrative.

Moloney (1998: 482) divides 18:1–19:42 into five scenes on the basis of the introduction of new people and places. He also notes that this section begins and ends with κῆπος (kēpos, garden).

R. Brown (1970: 813–17), too, has an extensive discussion of the structure and historicity of John’s passion narrative. See also the examination of theological and literary features of this section in Schnackenburg 1990: 3.218–19.

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235). Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

89 As Westcott (1908: 2.306) points out, the Jews’ words here amount not merely to a rejection of Jesus as the Jewish Messiah but to a denial of their messianic hope per se: “The kingdom of God, in the confession of its rulers, has become the kingdom of the world. In the place of the Christ they have found the emperor. They first rejected Jesus as the Christ, and then, driven by the irony of circumstances, they rejected the Christ altogether.”

17 So, for example, Ridderbos 1997: 608; Beasley-Murray 1999: 346; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270; Moloney 1998: 502; Schlatter 1948: 348; Westcott 1908: 2.308.

45 Westcott (1908: 2.313) notes how Mary Magdalene is “introduced abruptly, as well known, without any explanation.” According to Luke 8:2–3, this Mary is a woman from Magdala, a village on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, from whom Jesus had exorcized seven demons.

59 Beasley-Murray (1999: 353) suggests that this might be the “loud cry” referred to in Mark 15:37. Westcott (1908: 2.317) provides a helpful chronological synthesis of Jesus’ “seven words” from the cross.

Whitacre, R. A. 31n37, 59n8, 74n62, 93n14, 116n6, 172n22, 203n21, 208n48, 249n11,

37 “Overcome” or an equivalent is favored also by Morris 1995: 76; Moloney 1998: 36; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.245–46; Laney 1992: 39; Lindars 1972: 87; Schlatter 1948: 9 (“καταλαμβάνω never means ‘understand’ in John”); and Westcott 1908: 1.9–10. Carson (1991: 138) thinks that John might have both meanings (“overcome” and “comprehend”) in mind (so also Whitacre 1999: 53) and likes the ambiguity in BAGD’s translation, “master” (see BDAG 520). Keener (2003: 387) believes that John’s use of κατέλαβεν in 1:5 is an instance of traductio, a play on the multiple meanings of a word (here “comprehend” and “overcome”). Keener notes that the word occurs in Wis. 7:30 but admits that there the term clearly means “overcome” and no wordplay is present. Burge (2000: 56) agrees that both are at work, but he sees “overcome” as being dominant. Calvin (1959: 12) translates “comprehend.” The major translations divide more or less evenly between the two options, usually mentioning the one not chosen in a footnote: (1) NIV: “understood”; NASB, NKJV: “comprehend”; (2) NLT: “extinguish”; NET: “mastered”; ISV: “put out”; HCSB, ESV, NRSV: “overcome.” Notably, the TNIV changed the NIV’s “understood” to “overcome.”

8 Whitacre (1999: 65) notes the disingenuous nature of the questioning, since the leaders sent others rather than going themselves, and the delegation asks only in order to provide a response to the Jewish authorities: “So even when they ask what seems to be an open question (v. 22), they do so with a closed attitude of indifference.” Brodie (1993: 151) likewise notes that the delegation was concerned foremost with politics and bureaucracy: “to have some kind of manageable answer for some people back in Jerusalem.”

62 Note that these are the first words of Jesus in John’s Gospel. Witherington (1995: 69) notes that in dramatic works the first words of the main character are often of special importance (more doubtful is Witherington’s association of Jesus with Wisdom beckoning for an audience [pp. 69–70]). Whitacre (1999: 71) observes John’s emphasis on Jesus’ “almost mysterious silence” in comparison with the other Gospels, where “Jesus teaches, preaches and calls people to follow him, yet here Jesus has said almost nothing. . . . Compared with the Synoptics’ picture, Jesus in John appears as one hidden and aloof.” However, this comment surely must be balanced by the theme of Jesus’ humanity in John’s Gospel (see, e.g., Jesus’ weariness from travel in John 4 or his bursting into tears in John 11).

14 Whitacre (1999: 78) conjectures that the way Jesus and his disciples are mentioned here may imply “that they got into town at the last minute and were invited to come along.” Whitacre adds that it may have been their “unexpected presence at the wedding [that] may account for the wine shortage.” Wine may have run out “because Jesus did not contribute, either because of his last minute arrival or because of his poverty.” Whitacre here echoes suggestions already made by Westcott (1908: 1.81).

6 As Michaels (1989: 53) notes, the problem is not signs-based faith, but cowardice and failure to acknowledge one’s faith openly. Whitacre (1999: 86) similarly notes that signs-based faith is not the problem (citing 10:38; 12:37; 14:12; 20:30–31; cf. R. Brown 1966: 525–29), but that by its very nature, all faith prior to Jesus’ glorification and the coming of the Spirit is immature. Borchert (1996: 167–69) wrongly includes even the disciples of 2:11 among the group whose faith is illegitimately signs-based in 2:23.

22 The numbering of the two Cana signs has suggested to some the existence of a “signs source” (Bultmann 1971: 206; Fortna 1970; 1989; Whitacre 1999: 116). However, this inference is not a necessary one (Ridderbos 1997: 178; Carson 1991: 178; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; contra Barrett 1978: 246; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.469–71).

21 Whitacre (1999: 144) notes, “The availability of twelve baskets for collecting the leftovers (v. 13) suggests this child was not the only one who had brought food.”

48 The parallelism between 6:30 and 2:18 is noted by Keener (2003: 678). Dodd (1953: 301, cf. 90) perceptively notes that Jesus, in response to the Jews’ demand for a sign, “does not promise any significant event yet to happen,” but rather “offers an interpretation of what has already happened,” inviting them “to see in the actual occurrence of the Feeding of the Multitude the σημεῖον which they desire.” People had seen the feeding, but they had not seen the sign; that is, they had not understood its symbolic, messianic significance as pointing to Jesus as the life-giving bread (pp. 334–35). Contra Whitacre (1999: 156), who claims that the crowd “is not asking for another sign to be given, but rather they want an interpretation of the feeding that has just occurred.”

11 A survey of major commentaries shows that about half provide a regular commentary (Carson, Laney, Lindars, Whitacre, Calvin, Westcott), while the other half refrain from comment (Michaels, Talbert, Stibbe, Brodie, D. M. Smith), in some cases choosing not to address the issue at all (e.g., Schlatter [1948: 205], who in his scholarly commentary moves directly from 7:52 to 8:12 without comment, though his popular commentary [1962: 139–41] does treat the pericope adulterae in deference to “ecclesiastical tradition”; see also Zahn [1921: 404], who, like Schlatter, moves immediately from 7:52 to 8:12 and deals with the pericope in a lengthy excursus on pp. 723–30).

33 D. M. Smith (1999: 184) says that “the Jews” here “at once manifest their ignorance and feign their innocence.” Whitacre (1999: 215) notes that, ironically, it is really “the Jews” whose unbelief amounts to spiritual suicide.

101 So Schnackenburg 1990: 2.222, citing 1 Enoch 61:5; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 13:52. Similarly, Bultmann (1971: 326 n. 2). Brodie (1993: 335) opts for a broader scope, suggesting that “Jesus’ day refers to the way in which, during his entire life, and especially in his death, he was revealed as the Anointed.” Similarly, Whitacre (1999: 230), who says that the expression encompasses Jesus’ “whole advent, ministry, death, resurrection and ascension.”

76 Whitacre (1999: 271–72) calls this “a most amazing scene.” While the Jews are standing there, stones in hand, ready to kill Jesus, he calmly reasons with them in order to show them the error of their ways and to help them come to faith. The one who is life itself continues to offer life even to those who are determined to kill him.

47 So Carson (1991: 410), who speaks of “raw devotion and courage”; similarly, Morris 1995: 484; Michaels 1989: 196. Keener (2003: 842), too, says Thomas’s is an act of courage (contrasting him with Jesus’ brothers in 7:5), though he notes that Thomas later failed to believe the disciples’ testimony regarding Jesus’ resurrection (20:25). Perhaps the strongest endorsement of Thomas’s sincerity comes from Whitacre (1999: 283), who says that Thomas displays “an incredible picture of faith,” is “following out of loyalty,” and constitutes “a model disciple.”

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, “The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death.” See also Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999: 289. The mourners’ unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999: 192–93), several of whom adduce Paul’s statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus' anger is directed toward both "the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow" and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus' anger as occasioned by Mary's turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either "misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition," to mean "moved in spirit." Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus' struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, "He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself" (11:38 is translated "bearing the rebuke within himself"). According to Story, at the sight of people's grief, Jesus was overcome by "momentary self-regret," thinking, "Why did I not come sooner ... ? I have only myself to blame. ... Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?" However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

118 Whitacre (1999: 293) notes perceptively that "Jesus could have healed Lazarus when he was still sick with a word of command, even across the miles [cf. 4:46–54]. But now he utters a mightier word across a much greater distance—that between the living and the dead."

28 Barrett (1978: 420) and, very tentatively, Morris (1995: 523) suggest that θεωρεῖτε (theōreite, see) is probably an indicative (rather than an imperative). Whitacre (1999: 308) notes that both verbs θεωρεῖτε and ὀφελεῖτε (ōpheteite, you accomplish) in 12:19 are in the second-person plural, suggesting that this captures "the mutual condemnation they are throwing at one another: 'You guys see that you are doing no good.'"

23 Ridderbos (1997: 435 n. 185) cites BDF §448.4 as evidence that ἀλλά after a question posed to oneself could be rendered more strongly as "No!" (cf. NRSV; Bultmann 1971: 427), though Ridderbos himself does not adopt this rendering. Cf. Whitacre 1999: 312, following Carson.

1 For a discussion of 12:37–50 in the context of the Johannine lawsuit motif (cf. Isa. 40–55), see Lincoln 2000: 105–10. Keener (2003: 882) notes that many find in 12:37–43 a theological summary of people's responses to Jesus' public ministry and in 12:44–50 an anthology of representative sayings. Whitacre (1999: 326) suggests that 12:37–43 emphasizes Jesus' deeds, and 12:44–50 his words (also adducing Moses' final words in Deut. 32:45–47 as a parallel). Both Ridderbos (1997: 443) and Schnackenburg (1990: 2.411) stress the relevance of this section for the evangelist's own day and the historical distance from which this section was presumably written. This surely is true but should not be exaggerated. Schnackenburg (1990: 2.421) also provides a defense of Johannine authorship against Boismard, who claims that 12:44–50 is non-Johannine. Bultmann (1971: ix), in a hardly defensible move, relocates both 12:34–36 and 12:44–50 to John 8, with only 12:37–43 remaining in the traditional position.

15 Though Jesus' act may be characterized as a "display," a "symbol," and a "model," it is not therefore a "sign" in the Johannine sense, nor is it called that by the evangelist. Contra Whitacre 1999: 328–29.

8 Sidebottom (1956–57: 234) points to similarities in vocabulary between John 15 and the māšāl of the vine in Ezek. 17. Other parallels are adduced by Vawter (1964). A general survey is found in Whitacre, DJG 867–68.

25 Whitacre (1999: 376) contends that “remaining” is more than simply “believing”—though that is crucial—but that it also entails “being in union with him, sharing his thoughts, emotions, intentions and power.”

38 Though “swept up into his dance” (Whitacre 1999: 378) might be a bit too exuberant. “I have told you these things” marks a recurring structural marker in the farewell discourse (see commentary at 14:25).

76 See 10:38; 14:10–11, 20, 23; 15:4–5; 1 John 1:3; 2:23–24; 5:20. On the relationships of mutual indwelling, see Whitacre 1999: 418–19. Brodie (1993: 516) contends that this “ideal” of “a community based on God and mutual care” is “the high point and synthesis of the discourse and of the chapter—indeed of the whole gospel. As the incarnation is the finale of the prologue, so is the idea of unity the finale of chap. 17.”

10 The present passage has been subjected to several highly creative but rather improbable readings (see esp. Whitacre 1999: 425; Brodie 1993: 529; Stibbe 1993: 182–84).

21 As Whitacre (1999: 426) notes, in the present passage we find juxtaposed references to Jesus’ humble humanity and his exalted deity: he acknowledges that he is Jesus “the Nazarene,” and in doing so he evokes the paradigmatic OT self-designation of God, “I am” (see further commentary below).

23 Symbolic interpretations of this verse (such as those by Witherington 1995: 288; Moloney 1998: 490; and Whitacre 1999: 432) fail to convince.

64 Even Israel could be called God’s son (Exod. 4:22; Hos. 11:1; cf. John 10:33–38). In Greco-Roman circles, “son of god” (υἱὸς θεοῦ; divi filius) frequently occurs in inscriptions as a title for the emperor, especially Augustus (Deissmann 1901: 167), which is why the present charge has possible political implications. However, Pilate seems to find it hard to see Jesus as a threat to Roman imperial power (Whitacre 1999: 449).

68 Homeric mythology held that the gods were bloodless and had a kind of blood-water flowing through their veins (Iliad 5.339–42; cf. Plutarch, Moralia 180E). Stibbe (1992: 118, with reference to Barrett) sees in the flow of blood and water “the paradoxical association of life-giving properties with a dead man’s body.” Less likely is Whitacre’s (1999: 466) “sacramental” interpretation of blood and water symbolizing the Eucharist and baptism.

8 The repetition of the preposition πρὸς (pros, to) may indicate that Peter and the beloved disciple were at different locations (see Whitacre 1999: 472; Brodie 1993: 561). The reference to “Simon Peter” is the first mention of this disciple since his denial of Jesus (18:27). As is his custom, John uses Peter’s full name when reintroducing him into his narrative (see commentary at 18:15).

21 Carson (1991: 637) denies that the burial cloths still retained the shape of Jesus’ body (cf. Morris 1995: 735; Beasley-Murray 1999: 372; R. Brown 1970: 1007–8). But Whitacre (1999: 473) says, “With the body gone, the clothes were presumably collapsed, though perhaps retaining much of their shape due to the spices.”

27 This is inadequately recognized by those who see in the “disciple Jesus loved” a model disciple par excellence. See Ridderbos 1997: 633; Whitacre 1999: 474; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; R. Brown 1970: 1005; Borchert 2002: 295.

20 This “new creation” theme is noted by several commentators, including Morris 1995: 747

Wiarda, T. 399n4, 508n33, 591n20, 597
Wieand, D. J. 177n11, 178n15
Wilcox, M. 344n114

n. 58 (who also cites Ezek. 37:9); Barrett 1978: 570; R. Brown 1970: 1035, 1037; Witherington 1995: 342; Keener 2003: 1204. Whitacre (1999: 482) speaks of the event in John 20:22 as the church's "conception," and of Pentecost as its "birth."

1 Keener (2003: 1213) says that 20:30–31 is the conclusion of the book, followed by the epilogue of chapter 21. Keener (2003: 1221, with reference to Whitacre 1999: 489) also cites other places in the Johannine writings where summary conclusions are followed by additional material (e.g., John 12:36–37; 1 John 5:13; Rev. 22:5).

10 Carson (1991: 670) here (as elsewhere) detects symbolism in the "night" reference, citing 3:2, 19–21; 13:30; 20:1. However, though 3:19–21 and 13:30 qualify, it is less clear that 3:2, 20:1, and the present instance do. Stibbe (1993: 210) draws attention to the fact that "the time between night and the early hours of the morning was precisely the time when Peter denied Jesus in 18.15–27." Brodie's (1993: 583) casting of the symbolism as setting "their boat in an atmosphere of alien darkness" seems overdone, as does Whitacre's (1999: 490) contention that the early morning hour symbolizes "the dawning of spiritual light."

34 Witherington (1995: 354) considers this to be "a fellowship meal, a family reunion of a sort" (similarly, Michaels 1989: 356, 358), contra those who would detect the presence of "eucharistic symbolism" (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1098–1100; D. M. Smith 1999: 394; Stibbe 1993: 212; Whitacre 1999: 494). In fact, Beasley-Murray (1999: 404) points out that what is celebrated here is not Jesus' death but his resurrection, which enabled his followers to enjoy fellowship with their Lord subsequent to his death. He classifies the present meal as "an epiphany celebration of the risen Lord" (following Rissi 1979: 81–86). Schlatter (1948: 369) says that the disciples' present disposition fulfills 16:23.

4 See Wiarda 2000: 106–9, 136–39, 172–74.

33 On Peter's characterization in 18:10–11, see Wiarda 2000: 110–11, 139, 174–75.

20 Cf. 13:23–25; 18:15–18; 20:2–10; 21:20–24; see Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61. On "the disciple Jesus loved," see commentary at 13:23; 19:26; 21:2 (see also 18:15; 20:3, 8; and commentary at 21:20). For Peter's characterization in John 21, see Wiarda 2000: 111–14, 139–40, 175–78.

11 Helpful treatments include Avi-Yonah 1974: 142; Jeremias 1966b; Mackowski 1980: 79–83; Vardaman 1963; and Wieand 1965–66. Riesner (DJG 41) prefers the translation "There is in Jerusalem by the Sheep Pool the [site] with five porticoes called in Hebrew [i.e., Aramaic] Bethesda."

15 The northern, smaller pool may go back to monarchial times; the southern pool may be that established in the second century B.C. by Simon the high priest (Sir. 50:3). For ancient sources, see Hengel 1999: 310. The site favored by most scholars is located under the monastery of St. Anne in the northeast quarter of the Old City. See Jeremias 1966b; Vardaman 1963: 28.

Regarding the archaeological identification of Bethesda, see Wieand 1965–66: 396–400. The existence of the five porticoes is disputed by Broer (2001).

114 Hunter (1985: 59–60) suggests that the past tense ἤκουσας (ēkousas, you heard) be taken as a reference to "a previous (private) personal prayer offered by Jesus on behalf of his friend." An OT antecedent to Jesus' prayer here is that of Elijah: "Answer me, O Lord, answer me, so these people will know that you, O Lord, are God" (1 Kings 18:37; cf. Ps. 118:21; 121:1; 123:1). Cf.

Wilkinson, J. 550n56
Williams, R. H. 89, 92n10, 94, 94n19, 94n20, 94n23, 96
Wilson, C. T. 301
Windisch, H. 435n67

John 6:5; 17:1; Mark 7:34; Luke 18:13; Acts 7:55. See also Matt. 11:25; John 6:11. Hunter (1985: 62–70, citing J. M. Robinson 1964: 194–225) notes the similarity in form with Jewish prayers of thanksgiving (hodayot). Hanson (1973: 254) and Wilcox (1977: 130) contend that 11:41 is actually a quotation of Ps. 118:21a (see the discussion in Hunter 1985: 68); Wilcox (1977: 131) further argues that Ps. 118:22 also resonates in the present passage via the “stone” motif.

56 There is some uncertainty as to the exact species of hyssop referred to here; see the discussion in Wilkinson 1964: 77; Shewell-Cooper 1962: 75–76; Beetham 1993.

10 On Jewish weddings, see the sidebar in Köstenberger 2002c: 24. See also Safrai 1976; Derrett 1970: 227–38; Ferguson 1993: 68–69; Williams, DJG 86–88.

19 Williams (1997: 685–86) comments that there is “no indication that Mary enters the public space of the main dining room where the men are feasting, or that Jesus enters the private space of the women in the bridegroom’s house. Some transitional space near a door or porch is the most likely physical location for this private and discreet interaction, as well as for storing the water jars.”

20 Williams (1997: 686) makes the interesting suggestion that Jesus had been “off doing his own thing” in 1:29–51 and “that when he meets his family at Cana, his mother sees the opportunity to remind her wayward son of his duty as head of the family.”

23 See Wallace (1996: 150–51), who suggests that the statement makes use of the dative of possession, rendering it “What do we have in common?” Williams (1997: 688) paraphrases, “What concern is that (the shortage of wine) to me and to you? That is the groom’s problem, why should you and I get involved?”

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the

Winter, P. 42n72, 43, 526n21, 532

Wise, M. O. 104n13

Witherington, B. 31, 38, 40, 40n61, 56n3, 58n5, 65, 66, 70, 74, 74n62, 76, 80n89, 81, concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source's figure of "helper"; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the "spirit of prophecy." For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel's lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete's role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete's ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

72 Winter (1953: 336) comments, "It is not einzig, but einzigartig" (cited in de Kruijf 1970: 112); cf. Schlatter (1948: 25): "not 'einzig geboren,' but 'einzig der Art nach.'" Commentators differ on the exact meaning of μονογενής. R. Brown (1966: 13–14) prefers "unique," pointing to the Latin unicus, and says that there is no reference to the Son's procession (similarly, Wallace 1996: 360, 363, charging S. Porter [1992: 142] with committing the "root fallacy"; Borchert 1996: 120). Morris (1995: 93) likewise favors "only" or "unique," disavowing any etymological relationship between μονογενής and γεννάω. Beasley-Murray (1999: 14 [cf. Haenchen 1984: 1.120]) concurs that the expression means "unique" and sees it as parallel to ἀγαπητός, "beloved" (cf. Carson 1991: 128). Ridderbos (1997: 53 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.270–71]) leans toward "only begotten" rather than simply "only," especially in light of the ensuing preposition "from." This is the view also of Dahms (1983), who points out that μονογενής often occurs in contexts where γεννάω is used as well (cf., e.g., 1:13; but see the refutation by Pendrick [1995]; see also Moody 1953). Laney (1992: 44) prefers "unique" or "one-of-a-kind," while Lindars (1972: 96) notes that "the phrase of the Father ... is decisive." Keener (2003: 412–14) demonstrates that "only begotten" as a rendering of μονογενής fails the etymological test. He therefore glosses the meaning as "one of a kind," noting that Christians, like Israel, are called God's children (1:12–13), but Jesus is the special, one-of-a-kind Son (citing M. Harris 1992: 84–87). For a summary of the relevant passages and debate, see Cox 2001.

21 Barrett 1978: 533–35; Morris 1995: 695–97; Hengel 1999: 330; Winter 1974. See especially the references in Josephus (J.W. 2.8.1 §117; Ant. 20.9.1 §§197–203 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 164]). Cf. the acknowledgment in talmudic literature that the Jews had lost this power "forty years" before the destruction of Jerusalem (y. Sanh. 1.1; 7.2; on "forty years," see commentary at 18:24 above; loss of this power may have occurred as early as A.D. 6; see also Legasse 1997: 54–56).

13 For a general survey, see Wise, DJG 234–41.

61 Cf. Borchert (1996: 118), who says that spiritual birth is not the result of bloodline relations. Witherington (1995: 56) paraphrases this as "ethnic origins," Carson (1991: 126) as "natural descent."

3 For an extensive summary of reconstructions, see Beasley-Murray 1999: 22; cf.

Schnackenburg 1990: 1.285. Witherington (1995: 68) proposes that 1:35–2:11 describes three days, the first being narrated in 1:35–42, the second in 1:43–51, and the third in 2:1–12. Note also Moloney (1998: 50–51), who suggests that 1:19–2:11 represents an allusion to the giving of the law in Exod. 19.

5 Moloney (1998: 58) proposes that the question "Who are you?" could be taken as the leitmotif of John's Gospel. Barrett (1978: 172) considers the phrase an allusion to Jesus' "I am" statements in 6:35 and 8:24. Witherington (1995: 64) follows Painter in classifying the present pericope as a “quest story” that prepares the evangelist’s audience to properly answer subsequent questions about Jesus’ identity. He also contends—a rather dubious claim—that the evangelist presents Jesus as a Jewish sage à la Wisdom whom disciples were to seek and follow (adducing Sir. 51:23). The opening demonstrative “this” is classified by Wallace (1996: 334) as an instance of “inverse attraction,” where the pronominal subject is linked with the gender of the preceding nominative (cf. Matt. 7:12; 13:38; Luke 2:12; 8:11; Rom. 11:27; Gal. 4:24). More questionable is Wallace’s claim (1996: 532) that the present verb ἐστίν (estin, is) is a “testimonium present” (discussed under the rubric of “perfective present”). More likely, ἐστίν is a historical present (Wallace denies that εἰμί is ever used as a historical present in the NT).

62 Note that these are the first words of Jesus in John’s Gospel. Witherington (1995: 69) notes that in dramatic works the first words of the main character are often of special importance (more doubtful is Witherington’s association of Jesus with Wisdom beckoning for an audience [pp. 69–70]). Whitacre (1999: 71) observes John’s emphasis on Jesus’ “almost mysterious silence” in comparison with the other Gospels, where “Jesus teaches, preaches and calls people to follow him, yet here Jesus has said almost nothing. . . . Compared with the Synoptics’ picture, Jesus in John appears as one hidden and aloof.” However, this comment surely must be balanced by the theme of Jesus’ humanity in John’s Gospel (see, e.g., Jesus’ weariness from travel in John 4 or his bursting into tears in John 11).

89 The identification of Nathanael with Bartholomew is favored by Ridderbos 1997: 87–88; Morris 1995: 143; Carson 1991: 159; Burge 2000: 77; contra Barrett 1978: 184; R. Brown 1966: 82; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.314. Barrett (1978: 179, 184) conjectures that the meaning of the name “Nathanael,” “God has given,” indicates that he represents an “ideal disciple” and that the passage should be interpreted allegorically. Somewhat along similar lines, Witherington (1995: 71) suggests that Nathanael’s name implies that the disciples are the Father’s gift to Jesus. It seems, however, that these kinds of conjectures leave the realm of well-founded exegesis and veer into the sphere of ultimately unverifiable speculation (see the critiques by Morris [1995: 143] and Carson [1991: 159], both of whom defend Nathanael’s and the event’s historicity). Hanhart (1970: 24–25) identifies Nathanael as Matthew; Hill (1997) somewhat cautiously advances the theory that Nathanael is identical with James of Alphaeus (cf. Epistle to the Apostles 2 [second century A.D.]).

105 C. Koester 1990a: 23–34; cf. Barrett 1978: 185; Nicklas (2000b: 201–2) is less than convinced. Other commentators consider the reference to be incidental, intended to show merely that Jesus “knew” Nathanael prior to their actual encounter (Ridderbos 1997: 90; cf. Burge 2000: 78; R. Brown 1966: 83; Moloney 1998: 56; contra Morris 1995: 146; Witherington 1995: 71; Borchert 1996: 148; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.317). Keener (2003: 486), too, rejects any deeper significance in the identification, suggesting that the fig tree may be mentioned simply because a specific landmark was necessary for some reason. Witherington’s suggestion that Nathanael is being portrayed as an expert in the law who thus would know that the Messiah could not come from Nazareth seems far-fetched.

110 Morris 1995: 147; cf. Witherington 1995: 72; R. Brown 1966: 87; Borchert 1996: 148.

4 Witherington’s (1995: 77) suggestions that the wedding may have involved Nathanael’s family, and that Nathanael may have been the source of the story if the “disciple Jesus loved” was not present, are sheer conjecture, as is R. Brown’s (1966: 98) suggestion that the bridegroom was actually John, the son of Zebedee (or Nathanael).

39 Carson (1991: 169) rightly notes that there is little contextual support for the notion that Mary is here presented as a mediatrix between humanity and Jesus (contra those who see Mary here as representative of the people [e.g., Brodie 1993: 174]). Witherington (1995: 79, 378, referring to Ashton) may read too much into John's presentation when he sees Mary here depicted as a fledgling disciple who later becomes an "archetypal female disciple." Ridderbos (1997: 108) likewise seems to overreach when he suggests that Mary is symbolic of believing Israel, which has eagerly awaited the coming of the Savior. Another dubious suggestion is made by Stibbe (1993: 44), who proposes that Jesus' use of γύναι may constitute an allusion to Gen. 3:15, "in which case she is to be seen as the New Eve in the New Creation of Jesus' ministry."

9 The phrase "Jewish Passover" has caused some controversy. Barrett (1978: 197) conjectures that the phrase may presuppose the existence of a Christian Passover at the time of writing (so, earlier, Westcott 1908: 1.89; cf. Borchert 1996: 162). Schnackenburg (1991: 1.345) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 39) suggest that the evangelist or the church had stopped participating in the Jewish Passover. Witherington (1995: 86–87) notes that the phrase indicates a certain distance between the author and Judaism and at least a partial Gentile audience (similarly, Morris 1995: 169). Carson (1991: 176) thinks that "Jewish" refers to the Jews of Judea in contrast to Galileans and Diaspora Jews.

20 So Ridderbos 1997: 116; Moloney 1998: 81; Barrett 1978: 197; Witherington 1995: 87; contra TNIV.

21 Witherington (1995: 87) contends that in light of the large area—the outer court measured 300 by 450 meters—it is probable that some, but not all, were driven out. Many commentators (e.g., Borchert 1996: 164; Schlatter 1948: 75) mention that weapons (such as clubs) were not allowed in the temple courts.

24 The LXX reads "has consumed me" (Moloney 1998: 77). Unlike in 2:22 and 12:16, the present reference does not refer to the postresurrection period, but to the actual situation (so Ridderbos 1997: 116; Carson 1991: 180; R. Brown 1966: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.347; Barrett 1978: 198; contra Witherington 1995: 88; Bultmann 1971: 122).

34 Cf. Ridderbos 1997: 115; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.344; Barrett 1978: 195; R. Brown 1966: 117; Witherington 1995: 85–86; Borchert 1996: 160; Bultmann 1971: 122; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38–39; Dodd 1963: 162; Lindars 1972: 135–37; Keener 2003: 518–19. Keener contends that it is historically implausible that Jesus would challenge the temple system by overturning tables and yet continue in public ministry for two or three years afterward, sometimes even visiting Jerusalem (though he notes that Jesus faces considerable hostility there when he does). On the contrary, an early temple cleansing accounts well for Jewish hostility toward Jesus early on (5:18), and Jesus' continuing in ministry for two or three more years is eminently plausible historically in light of Jesus' pattern of withdrawal (3:22; 6:15; 7:9–10; 8:59; 10:40) and his caution from the very inception of his ministry because his "time" has not yet come (2:4; 7:6). Borchert (1996: 160) contends that two temple clearings are "a historiographic monstrosity that has no basis in the texts of the Gospels." Kreitzer (1998: 100–101) claims that the evangelist followed the motto "When the details of history no longer serve the functions of the story—discard them." R. Brown (1966: 118) concludes that Jesus uttered some prophetic saying concerning the destruction of the temple on his first visit but actually cleansed the temple at the end of his ministry. Wallace (1996: 561 n. 20) notes that this would require a crucifixion date of

A.D. 33.

3 Moloney (1998: 90) and R. Brown (1966: 149) believe that Jesus' words continue through 3:21; Witherington (1995: 99) thinks that the evangelist takes over in 3:12, or at least by 3:16. Schnackenburg (1990: 1.360, citing others as well) places the start of the evangelist's reflections at 3:13.

17 Contra several commentators (Barrett 1978: 205; Moloney 1998: 91; R. Brown 1966: 130; Witherington 1995: 94; Burge 2000: 114; Carson 1995: 187 n. 8; Blomberg 1995: 6), "by night" is likely not symbolic in the sense that Nicodemus came from darkness to light, while Judas went from light to darkness (cf. 6:70–71; 12:4–8; 13:2, 26–30; 18:2–5)—a view held by R. Brown (1966: 130) and Auwers (1990). Wallace (1996: 123–24) overreaches when he finds in the genitive of time an indication of "the kind of time in which Nicodemus came to see the Lord." Morris (1995: 187) suggests that John may have had more than one meaning in mind.

27 Contra those who say that "born of water" refers to physical birth, and "born of the Spirit" to spiritual birth (e.g., Witherington 1995: 97, referring to 1 John 5:6–8; Laney 1992: 78; but see Carson 1991: 191).

34 It may be too early in Jesus' ministry for his disciples to be included (Carson 1991: 198–99; contra Ridderbos 1997: 134; Morris 1995: 196). Schnackenburg's (1990: 1.376) solution, that Jesus' statement is proleptic, looking "forward to the time when his disciples make his 'testimony' their own, as part of their preaching" (with reference to 3:22 and 9:4), likewise fails to convince. There is also no need to postulate that the "we" aligns Jesus with the OT prophets, reflects the Johannine community (Witherington 1995: 98; cf. Moloney 1998: 94), or denotes the church versus the synagogue (Barrett 1978: 211; Brodie 1993: 198).

37 Cf. Morris 1995: 196; Carson 1991: 199; R. Brown 1966: 132; Beasley-Murray 1999: 50; Witherington 1995: 98; Moloney 1998: 94; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.377; contra Barrett 1978: 212.

4 Some scholars (e.g., Witherington 1995: 108; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.411–12) suggest that it is those disciples of Jesus who had been followers of the Baptist who continued John's baptism, but this unduly shifts the focus regarding the nature of Jesus' ministry from Jesus to his disciples.

9 It is not necessary to postulate that here the evangelist is addressing those who had remained followers of John the Baptist in his day (Carson 1991: 210; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 146; Morris 1995: 211; contra R. Brown 1966: 156; Barrett 1978: 219; Witherington 1995: 107; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.410).

15 This represents the wide consensus of interpreters: see Ridderbos 1997: 153; Carson 1991: 215–16; Borchert 1996: 198–99; Beasley-Murray 1999: 59; Witherington 1995: 115; R. Brown 1966: 169; Morris 1995: 226; Barrett 1978: 230; Moloney 1998: 116, 120; Conway 1999: 105.

23 So N. Walker 1960 and the vast majority of commentators, including Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. e; Witherington 1995: 120; Barrett 1978: 231; Moloney 1998: 116, 121; Bultmann 1971: 178; contra Borchert 1996: 201.

25 See Carson 1991: 217; Witherington 1995: 120; Morris 1995: 228; Burge 2000: 142; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.424. As part of a series of putative "wisdom" parallels, Witherington (1995: 119) proposes that the Samaritan woman is depicted as the maidservant of Wisdom. I find this background reconstruction unconvincing.

30 See Maccini 1996: 131–44. Daube (1956: 375–82) argues that "do not associate with" specifically refers to Jews not sharing vessels with Samaritans (cf. NIV text and note at 4:9).

However, no common utensils (such as the woman's water jar) are specifically mentioned in 4:9. The explanatory aside, "For Jews have no dealings with [συγχρῶνται] Samaritans," probably is broader than the mere refusal to share drinking vessels (Ridderbos 1997: 154; Beasley-Murray 1999: 58 n. f; contra Carson 1991: 218; Borchert 1996: 203; Witherington 1995: 120; R. Brown 1966: 170; Morris 1995: 229; Barrett 1978: 232; Moloney 1998: 117, 121; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.425 n. 19).

4 One school of interpretation identifies πατρίς (patris, homeland, hometown) in 4:44 with Jerusalem (so Barrett 1978: 246; Dodd 1953: 352; 1963: 238–41; Meeks 1966; 1967: 39–40; see, much earlier, Origen, Commentarii in evangelium Joannis 13.54–56, cited in van Belle 1998: 30). However, see the critiques by W. Davies (1974: 321–31) and Stimpfle (1992: 89) as summarized by van Belle (1998: 30–32). The Galilee/Nazareth explanation is found already in Augustine (cited by van Belle 1998: 33) and is defended by Stimpfle (1992: 86–96 [followed by van Belle 1998: 27–44]) and others (see van Belle 1998: 32–33; see also Ridderbos 1997: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 73; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.463). Still others think that both Galilee and Judea are in view (Carson 1991: 235–36; Burge 2000: 151–52; Witherington 1995: 126; W. Davies 1974: 321–31).

7 So Carson 1991: 234; Ridderbos 1997: 174–75; Morris 1995: 255; Borchert 1996: 219–20; Burge 2000: 152–53; Witherington 1995: 127; contra R. Brown 1966: 193; Barrett 1978: 245; Beasley-Murray 1999: 71; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.471–75; Bultmann 1971: 205.

9 So Mead 1985: 71; Barrett 1978: 245; Witherington 1995: 128; Moloney 1998: 153; Bultmann 1971: 206; but see the cautious assessment by Carson 1991: 234. Morris (1995: 255), somewhat idiosyncratically, suggests that the man was a Jew.

23 Cf. 1:47–48; 4:17–18. So Barrett 1978: 254; Witherington 1995: 137; contra Morris 1995: 268 n. 18.

29 Morris 1995: 269; Witherington 1995: 137. Puzzlingly, Moloney (1998: 172) concludes that the man's "obedience to the word of Jesus" "suggests that the man achieves a faith response."

39 God's judgment: Ridderbos 1997: 189; Barrett 1978: 255; Gehenna or Hades: Beasley-Murray 1999: 74; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.98; eternal consequences: Morris 1995: 272; Witherington 1995: 139.

109 Hengel (1999: 309) comments, "One should by all means read 'Bethesda' "; so also Carson 1991: 241; Morris 1995: 267; Witherington 1995: 137; Borchert 1996: 231; Moloney 1998: 171; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.94; Schlatter 1948: 142; undecided are Ridderbos 1997: 185; R. Brown 1966: 206–7.

34 So Beasley-Murray 1999: 89–90; Witherington 1995: 153; Burge 2000: 193, 195. See further the discussion of ἐγώ εἰμι sayings in ancient culture and the OT in Beasley-Murray 1999: 89–90.

39 On the address κύριε as meaning "sir," see commentary at 4:11. See Witherington, DJG 484–92, esp. 490–91.

43 So Barrett 1978: 287; cf. Witherington 1995: 155; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.38; Burge 1987: 84–85. Less likely, the reference may be to his consecration (R. Brown 1966: 261) or to the incarnation (Moloney 1998: 211). On the phrase "seal of approval," see commentary at 3:33.

56 Subsequent sayings include 8:12 = 9:5; 10:7 = 10:9; 10:11 = 10:14; 11:25; 14:6; 15:1 (see the excursus in Witherington 1995: 156–58). The personal pronoun ἐγώ (egō, I) is emphatic (Ridderbos 1997: 229 n. 118); what is more, the "I am" saying of 6:35 forms the "narrative and theological centre of the scene," as it is based on what precedes it and is explained by what follows (Lee 1994: 135–36). “Of life” constitutes a verbal genitive (Carson 1991: 288 n. 1).

212, 221, 222n106, 239n47, 256n25, 260, 267, 277, 289n55, 306n45, 316n89, 326n19, 332n48, 336n72, 340n92, 361n15, 364n25, 371n19, 377n6, 378n11, 405n27, 414n13,

58 There is no need to resort to a sapiential interpretation here, understanding Christ as the true Wisdom (Carson 1991: 289; contra R. Brown 1966: 274–75; Witherington 1995: 149–50).

106 So Carson 1991: 267; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 208–9; Barrett 1978: 272; Witherington 1995: 385; contra R. Brown 1966: 235–36; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.5–9.

47 See R. Brown 1966: 314; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.150; Schlatter 1948: 198. Contra Ridderbos (1997: 271), who opts for Greek-speaking Diaspora Jews. Carson (1991: 320 [cf. Barrett 1978: 325; Witherington 1995: 173]) thinks that Gentile proselytes probably are in view.

25 Witherington (1995: 175) notes that for someone to call upon God as witness is akin to making a serious oath. Also, not believing a statement made under oath was as precarious as lying under oath.

55 Witherington (1995: 389) aptly notes that because the man is unsure of whether Jesus is a sinner, the evangelist hardly portrays him as a model believer. At the same time, however, he does bear witness to the change that Jesus brought about in his life, acts on the light he has been given, and shows continual progress in his understanding of who Jesus truly is.

45 So the vast majority of commentators, including Barrett, Beasley-Murray, Burge, Carson, Moloney, Morris, Ridderbos, Schnackenburg, and Witherington. For Jewish material indicating that the Messiah would gather the Gentiles, see Hofius 1967.

89 In the LXX, variants of the term τὰ ἐγκαίνια (ta enkainia, Feast of Dedication [John 10:22]) refer to the dedication of the tabernacle altar (Num. 7:10–11), Solomon’s temple (1 Kings 8:63), and the second temple (Ezra 6:16–17). A connection between the present statement and the Feast of Tabernacles is made in, among others, Carson 1991: 399; R. Brown 1966: 411; Witherington 1995: 191; Moloney 1998: 317. Commentators differ as to the sacerdotal connotation of the term ἁγιάζω (hagiazō, set apart). R. Brown (1966: 411) is favorably disposed, while Barrett (1978: 385) denies such an association.

19 R. Brown (1966: 423 [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.322]) claims that this verse is “clearly a parenthesis added by an editor,” though it is unclear why the author himself (rather than a later editor) could not have added this kind of parenthetical statement. Carson (1991: 405 [approvingly cited by Borchert 1996: 349]) contends, against Barrett (1978: 390), that it does not follow that the intended audience was Christian, though clearly Carson’s case is difficult here. More likely is the reconstruction by Witherington (1995: 201), who says that this verse may serve as “a simple reminder of Mary’s identity to the Christians who would be using this Gospel as a missionary tool to bring outsiders to Christ.” Yet Carson (1991: 405) rightly points out that regardless of this issue, and even if the anointing was unknown to the reader, the proleptic reference to Mary still serves as a fine literary device, urging the first-time reader onward in the narrative.

48 For Witherington (1995: 202), Thomas’s comment “sounds more like fatalistic resignation to what seemed inevitable” (I would agree). Bultmann (1971: 400) speaks of “blind devotion” (with reference to 14:5 and 20:24–25); the exact same term is picked up by Beasley-Murray (1999: 189), who also notes the veiled irony in Thomas’s statement. Stibbe (1993: 125) says that Thomas’s comment “reveals an element of misunderstanding,” manifesting “naiveté at best, insincerity at worst.”

72 For this reason Witherington (1995: 203), who calls Martha’s confession “the least inadequate confession yet in this Gospel,” and R. Brown (1966: 433), who labels her belief “inadequate,” are overly negative. More positive are Morris (1995: 489), who says, “She may not understand fully the implications of what he has just said, but as far as she can she accepts it,” and Carson (1991: 414), who labels her faith as “a rich mixture of personal trust (fiducia) and of confidence that certain things about Jesus are true (assensus).” Keener (2003: 844–45) suggests that John, by including Martha’s confession, likely sought to balance gender the way Luke does (cf. Peter’s confession in 6:68–69). See also Stibbe (1994: 47), who perceives movement from two “I know’s” (11:22, 24) to a climactic “I believe” (11:27); from propositional to personal understanding; and from confessor to witness. Ridderbos (1997: 399–400) calls the confession “spontaneous and uninhibited” and sees it as reminiscent of the man blind from birth, who confessed despite his lack of understanding concerning the Son of Man (9:38). On “the Christ,” see commentary at 1:41; on “Son of God,” see commentary at 1:34 and 1:49.

92 Among those who favor a reference to death itself is Ridderbos (1997: 402), who writes, “The emotion is the revulsion of everything that is in him against the power of death.” See also Warfield (1950: 117 [cited in Morris 1995: 493 n. 72]); Michaels 1989: 203; Whitacre 1999: 289. The mourners’ unbelief is favored by Bultmann (1971: 406); Schnackenburg (1990: 2.336); Witherington (1995: 203); Morris (1995: 494); Borchert (1996: 360); Beasley-Murray (1999: 192–93), several of whom adduce Paul’s statement in 1 Thess. 4:13 that believers ought not to mourn as do those who have no hope (see also Pollard [1973: 441], who says that the raising of Lazarus was occasioned by lack of faith on the part of Mary and the Jews with her). Carson (1991: 416) maintains that we need not choose: Jesus’ anger is directed toward both “the sin, sickness and death in this fallen world that wrecks so much havoc and generates so much sorrow” and the unbelief demonstrated by those wailing without hope (similarly, Brodie [1993: 395], who also includes Satan). Moloney (1998: 330), rather implausibly, sees Jesus’ anger as occasioned by Mary’s turning away from him toward the mourning crowd. An even more daring conjecture is that of Lindars (1992b: esp. 101–4), who rather ingeniously argues that the Fourth Evangelist used a source including a story comparable to Mark 9:14–29 (where the verb ἐπιτιμάω [epitimaō, rebuke] in Mark 9:25 refers to demon exorcism) and that he either “misunderstood the source and reproduced what he thought that it meant, or deliberately altered the meaning, and the syntax of the phrase, for the sake of his composition,” to mean “moved in spirit.” Finally, Story (1991) proposes that Jesus’ struggle was entirely within himself, and renders the text, “He rebuked (his) spirit and troubled himself” (11:38 is translated “bearing the rebuke within himself”). According to Story, at the sight of people’s grief, Jesus was overcome by “momentary self-regret,” thinking, “Why did I not come sooner ... ? I have only myself to blame. ... Why did I cause the anxiety and sadness to this family and allow the one I love to die?” However, there is no contextual confirmation for this reading.

15 So Beasley-Murray 1999: 208–9; contra R. Brown 1966: 454. Witherington (1995: 207) notes the irony of Jesus being anointed at the same place where he raised someone from the dead. Carson (1991: 428) points out that in the following chapter, Jesus’ disciples are told to “wash one another’s feet,” a command that may be anticipated by Mary anointing Jesus’ feet in the present pericope.

25 Most commentators view the statement in an elliptical fashion, though there is less consensus on precisely what ought to be supplied. Carson (1991: 429) suggests that the statement is to be construed as follows: “Leave her alone. [She has done this—i.e., held on to the jar] in order to keep it for the day of my burial.” Ridderbos (1997: 417–19), too, holds that the ἵνα (hina, that) of 12:7 is independent (a “brachylogy” [cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 2.369]) and proposes that the phrase is best understood as a rhetorical question. Less likely is the construal of Witherington (1995: 208, appealing to Synoptic parallels), who thinks that Jesus is urging that Mary be left to keep the “burial ritual.” Also doubtful is Maccini’s (1996: 173–74) rendering: “Let her alone, so that she might keep what oil she has left for the day of my burial” (so, earlier, Schlatter 1948: 264).

19 See commentary at 1:49–51 and at 6:14–15 (where both terms, “the one who comes” and “king,” are used). Both Ridderbos (1997: 423) and Barrett (1978: 418) contend that by mounting the donkey, Jesus sought to correct the mistaken nationalism of the crowd (see also R. Brown 1966: 462; Witherington 1995: 221); though note Coakley (1995: 461–82), who contends that there is no evidence that the crowd understood at the time, so that, “if Jesus tried to make the crowd understand his actions in this way, he failed” (p. 463). Ridderbos (1997: 423) also points to the salvific context of Zech. 9 and notes that Jesus’ action was intended to convey the fact that the time of salvation described in Zechariah (and other relevant OT texts) had arrived.

6 See commentary at 7:35, the only other occurrence of the term in John’s Gospel. A look at the remaining NT references indicates that in virtually all instances the term is used in contrast with “Jews” (Ἰουδαῖοι, Ioudaioi; see Acts 14:1; 16:1; 18:4; 19:10, 17; 20:21; Rom. 1:16; 2:9, 10; 3:9; 10:12; 1 Cor. 1:22, 24; 10:32; 12:13; Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11). That the “Greeks” mentioned here were not Diaspora Jews (as Calvin [1961: 35] thought) is accepted by virtually all major commentators (e.g., Westcott [1908: 2.120], who likens these to the Gentile magi at the beginning of Matthew’s Gospel; Ridderbos 1997: 427; Carson 1991: 436; Barrett 1978: 421; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.381; Witherington 1995: 223; Moloney 1998: 351; Burge 2000: 342).

11 Philip’s provenance from a bilingual region is cited by many commentators, including Ridderbos (1997: 427), Carson (1991: 436), Schnackenburg (1990: 2.382), R. Brown (1966: 470), Witherington (1995: 223), and Moloney (1998: 352).

27 Witherington (1995: 232–34) seems to overplay the Greco-Roman background when he compares Jesus to a resident guest teacher who leads the symposium (a teaching/dialogue following the meal).

13 Though the suggestion by Witherington (1995: 238–39) that the beloved disciple’s “position at the head of the table next to Jesus may in fact suggest that it was his house in which this banquet was held” is mere conjecture. Reclining at meals was first introduced into Judaism from the Hellenistic world (NewDocs 1 §1.9; 2 §26.75) and initially viewed as a sign of decadence (Amos 6:4–7). By NT times, however, reclining had become standard practice at banquets and feasts, including Passover celebrations. This leisurely way of observance, which symbolized freedom in contrast to Israel’s bondage in Egypt (see b. Pesah. 108a), stood in marked, self-conscious contrast with the haste that marked the first Passover on the night of the exodus (Exod. 12:11).

14 Contra Witherington (1995: 239), who, without substantiation, claims that “the side to the right of the host was the more favored side at such meals, while the left-hand side was less favored and sometimes even had negative associations.”

95 Hence, 14:27 continues 14:25–26. See Kellum (2005: 164), who cites Witherington 1995: 253 and Brodie 1993: 469. In the Greek world, peace (εἰρήνη, eirēnē) was essentially a concept stated negatively, denoting the absence of war. Though this is also part of the term’s range of meaning in Hebrew thought (e.g., Josh. 9:15; 1 Sam. 7:14; 1 Kings 2:5), the expression shālôm usually had much richer connotations, conveying the notion of positive blessing, especially that of a right relationship with God (Morris 1965a: 237–44; Lindars 1972: 484). This is evident in the well-known blessing given by Moses and Aaron (Num. 6:24–26; cf. Ps. 29:11; Hag. 2:9). The OT prophetic writings in particular look forward to a period of peace inaugurated by the coming of the Messiah. The “prince of peace” (Isa. 9:6) would “command peace to the nations” (Zech. 9:10; cf. 9:9), and there would be good tidings of peace and salvation (Isa. 52:7; cf. 54:13; 57:19; Acts 10:36). Through the royal Messiah, God would make an everlasting “covenant of peace” with his people (Ezek. 37:26).

2 Although vine imagery is widespread in ancient literature, an OT background for the present passage is favored by the vast majority of commentators, primarily owing to the frequent OT references or allusions and the replacement motif in this Gospel (e.g., Carson 1991: 513; R. Brown 1970: 669–71; Morris 1995: 593; Ridderbos 1997: 515; contra Bultmann 1971: 530; Witherington 1995: 255–57).

11 Some interpreters (e.g., Barrett 1978: 473; Carson 1991: 514; Witherington 1995: 258) view the depiction of the Son as the vine and the Father as the vinedresser in terms of the Son’s subordination to the Father. Indeed, this seems to be the implication in the present allegory, though it is not at the front of the message. Borchert (2002: 140) affirms the functional, though not essential, subordination of the Son to the Father.

47 That is, for those he loves (Carson 1991: 521; R. Brown 1970: 664; Barrett 1978: 477; Witherington 1995: 259; Borchert 2002: 149). See 10:11, 15, 17–18; 1 John 3:16; cf. Rom. 5:6–8. The conjunction ἵνα (hina, that) in the present verse is epexegetical (R. Brown 1970: 664).

1 The prayer is often called Jesus’ “high-priestly prayer” (a designation reaching back at least as far as the sixteenth century), though this label hardly fits with Johannine thought, which does not picture Jesus as a high priest (Ridderbos 1997: 546; Carson 1991: 552–53; though see commentary at 17:19 below). Westcott’s and E. C. Hoskyns’s title “prayer of consecration,” though not without merit (see below), fails to encompass the contents of the entire prayer (Carson 1991: 553; Barrett 1978: 500). Hence, commentators now frequently opt for more generic titles of the present prayer, such as “The Farewell Prayer” (Ridderbos) or “The Prayer of Jesus” (Carson). Witherington (1995: 266) calls it “The Sage’s Prayer,” based on his view that the Fourth Evangelist portrays Jesus as a sage.

14 As presumably is the case here (so Morris 1995: 656 n. 5; cf. Carson 1991: 577; Witherington 1995: 285; Borchert 2002: 218).

27 See Ezek. 1:28; 44:4; Dan. 2:46; 8:18; 10:9; Acts 9:4; 22:7; 26:14; Rev. 1:17; 19:10; 22:8. Contra Carson (1991: 578–79), who argues that the evangelist is not attempting to describe a theophanic manifestation, concluding that the soldiers simply responded “better than they knew” (cf. Witherington [1995: 286], who calls this an example of “Johannine double-entendre”; but see Bultmann 1971: 639; Burge 2000: 492; Conway 1999: 173). See also the legend cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 158.

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235). Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in

515n23, 518n36, 519n42, 528, 528n35, 529n40, 538n86, 542n6, 543n11, 544, 547, 547n35, 548n41, 548n46, 549n47, 554, 555n80, 561n4, 564n24, 567, 569, 569n14,

R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

23 Symbolic interpretations of this verse (such as those by Witherington 1995: 288; Moloney 1998: 490; and Whitacre 1999: 432) fail to convince.

36 The lack of detail devoted to the trial before Caiaphas in this Gospel may be due to John's presupposing knowledge of the Synoptics among his readers as well as to the conviction "that these exchanges with the Jews settled nothing" (Witherington 1995: 289).

42 The contrast with Jesus is stark: "Jesus confronts his critics denying nothing, Peter wilts before his inquisitors denying everything" (Witherington 1995: 289). As Stibbe (1993: 181) notes, the poignancy of the contrast between Jesus and Peter is "carefully explored in the use of echo effects," with Jesus' twice-repeated self-identification "I am" (18:5, 8) corresponding to Peter's twice-repeated denial "I am not" (18:17, 25). The repeated term "deny" brings to mind Matt. 10:33 and Luke 12:9 (Carson 1991: 586).

35 Witherington (1995: 291) claims that another reason for Jesus' reserve is that "Jesus as a loyal Jew was expected to say nothing against his fellow Jews in a Gentile court."

40 Witherington (1995: 292) writes, "Apparently Pilate concludes that Jesus is a deluded quack whom he can banter with but not take seriously." Carson (1991: 595) describes Pilate's response as "curt and cynical" and thinks that his reply is terse "either because he is convinced there is no answer, or, more likely, because he does not want to hear it." Ridderbos (1997: 596) sees Pilate "shrugging his shoulders, in effect."

86 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 605. Unlikely proposals are those of Barrett (1978: 545), who suggests that confusion of the Greek numerals for 3 and 6 may have led to the apparent discrepancies; and Witherington (1995: 294), who believes "that a Roman form of reckoning is being used, in which case the sixth hour is near dawn, at six in the morning."

6 So, with a variety of nuances, Witherington 1995: 308; R. Brown 1970: 917; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270; and Moloney 1998: 502, 506. Carson (1991: 609), who says that the omission is due to John's desire to further highlight Jesus' willing obedience to the Father, dismisses as unduly speculative the view that the omission is part of a polemic against the theory that Simon of Cyrene was himself crucified (contra Beasley-Murray 1999: 345). Barrett (1978: 548) proposes that the omission is due to the evangelist's effort to highlight the "all-sufficiency of Jesus ... in effecting the redemption of the world." Beasley-Murray (1999: 345 [cf. Borchert 2002: 261; R. Brown 1970: 917–18; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270]) suggests that the omission serves to create an allusion to Isaac carrying the wood for his sacrifice.

11 For an extensive discussion of Roman crucifixion, see Witherington 1995: 303–6. See also Borchert 2002: 263–64.

35 The general conclusion of commentators is that the reference to the "seamless robe" may not necessarily have theological significance (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 610 n. 136; cf. Morris 1995: 715, esp. n. 56; Bultmann 1971: 671). Both Witherington (1995: 309) and R. Brown (1970: 920–22) note several possibilities yet caution against dogmatic conclusions (see also Carson 1991: 614). Barrett (1978: 550) sees an allusion to Jesus' death resulting in "the scattered children of God."

41 The historicity of 19:25 is buttressed by several factors (Carson 1991: 615; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 349; Witherington 1995: 309; contra Barrett 1978: 551–52): (1) the Roman soldiers most likely would not have cared to remove women from the vicinity of the cross; (2) Jesus' disciples would not have been seen as a threat by the Roman administration; (3) the fact that the sign affixed to the cross was intended to be read, and in fact was read (19:20), by many implies that people could get close enough to the cross to read it; (4) the Gospels record as many as seven statements by Jesus on the cross, suggesting that people were close enough to hear him speak.

46 Many view the "disciple Jesus loved" as an ideal disciple, often in conjunction with the "ideal faith" of Jesus' mother (e.g., Moloney 1998: 503–4; but see the dissenting voice of Carson 1991: 618; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 614–15). Witherington (1995: 310) suggests that these two unnamed individuals are models for potential disciples to follow. Ridderbos (1997: 613) has an extensive discussion of Mary and the "disciple Jesus loved" as representatives of the new community that is established with the death of Jesus.

47 Commentators have detected various types of symbolism in this scene. Bultmann (1971: 673), true to F. C. Baur, sees Mary as representative of Jewish Christianity, and the beloved disciple of Gentile Christianity, the latter being charged to honor the former as its "mother," from whom it originated (cf. Brodie 1993: 549). Witherington (1995: 309) views these two characters as symbolic of a new Adam and Eve, who are obedient whereas the former were not. Carson (1991: 618, following M. Gourgues) suggests that Mary, on account of her faith in Christ, is now able metaphorically to become a mother to a new son supplied for her by Jesus (cf. Matt. 19:29; see also Witherington 1995: 310). Beasley-Murray (1999: 350, following Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278) sees Mary as representing that part of Israel that is willing to believe in Jesus as the Messiah. Refreshingly, and refusing to resort to symbolism or allegory, Morris (1995: 718) says the beloved disciple simply "provided her [Mary] with a roof" and took her under his care. Others focus on lessons (to be) learned by Mary, such as needing to "step back in submission to the law of life that the Father has set for her son" (Ridderbos 1997: 612) or to receive the gift of salvation that she desired to receive at the wedding in Cana (Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278; Beasley-Murray 1999: 350; Borchert 2002: 269).

80 Nicodemus's description by the evangelist as "the man who had earlier visited Jesus at night" harks back to 3:2 (see there the discussion, and ultimately the negative evaluation, of Nicodemus's putative "progression" in faith throughout the narrative). Contra Carson (1991: 629 [cf. Witherington 1995: 312]), who believes that Nicodemus is, in the present context, presented as "stepping out of the darkness and emerging into the light."

4 Carson (1991: 635–36 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 371]) suggests that Mary was alone during her first trip to the tomb (contra Morris 1995: 734; Moloney 1998: 522; Witherington 1995: 323; Burge 2000: 553). Mary's witness was not used as significantly in the preaching of the early church as that of Peter, doubtless because evidence provided by a woman was held in lesser esteem (e.g., m. Roš Haš. 1.8). This is underscored by the fact that Jesus' encounter with Mary is not included in the resurrection appearances to the disciples cited in 21:14.

24 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 638; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.312; Borchert 2002: 295; R. Brown 1970: 987; Bultmann 1971: 684; Burge 2000: 554; Laney 1992: 360. Witherington (1995: 325) suggests, less plausibly, that the beloved disciple believed that Jesus had been taken by God similar to Elijah. Morris (1995: 736) notes that the two verbs do not have explicit objects, supplying the graveclothes as the object of the beloved disciple's "seeing" and Jesus' resurrection as that of the disciple's "believing" (albeit without understanding its full theological significance). Hardly plausible is the suggestion by Minear (1983: 91 n. 14, with reference to 1976 [followed by Conway 1999: 189–90]) that what the disciples believed was the statement of Mary Magdalene in 20:2.

14 Commentators are not agreed as to whether Mary had already touched Jesus or was about to do so. Some say that Mary had already touched him (e.g., Morris 1995: 742; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.318; Witherington 1995: 331; R. Brown 1970: 992; Burge 2000: 555), while others seem to allow for the possibility that she was about to but had not yet done so (e.g., Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. g, 376; Bultmann 1971: 687). Regarding Mary's devotion, see Ruth 1:16. Stibbe (1993: 205) says that the present passage is "most stylized" and detects intertextual echoes with Song 3:1–3.

7 See commentary at 14:27; 16:33. So Beasley-Murray 1999: 379; Carson 1991: 647; Witherington 1995: 339–40; Moloney 1998: 530.

20 This "new creation" theme is noted by several commentators, including Morris 1995: 747 n. 58 (who also cites Ezek. 37:9); Barrett 1978: 570; R. Brown 1970: 1035, 1037; Witherington 1995: 342; Keener 2003: 1204. Whitacre (1999: 482) speaks of the event in John 20:22 as the church's "conception," and of Pentecost as its "birth."

6 So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 647) and most major commentators (e.g., Morris 1995: 753; Witherington 1995: 344; Carson 1991: 657; Moloney 1998: 537; Barrett 1978: 572; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.332; contra Borchert 2002: 314; R. Brown 1970: 1027).

1 Perhaps the gloss is added with a view toward the Gospel's Greek-speaking readership, though there is no reason why this should be relegated to the redactional (rather than authorial) level (contra R. Brown 1970: 1067; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.351; Witherington 1995: 405).

33 The unbroken net frequently is interpreted symbolically as conveying the preservation of all that is caught (Ridderbos 197: 663, adducing 6:12; Witherington 1995: 355; Michaels 1989: 354–55), or the limitless number of Christian converts (Carson 1991: 673, following Bruce 1983: 401–2), or the unity of the church (Talbert 1992: 260). For surveys, see Carson 1991: 672–73; R. Brown 1970: 1074–76.

34 Witherington (1995: 354) considers this to be "a fellowship meal, a family reunion of a sort" (similarly, Michaels 1989: 356, 358), contra those who would detect the presence of "eucharistic symbolism" (e.g., R. Brown 1970: 1098–1100; D. M. Smith 1999: 394; Stibbe 1993: 212; Whitacre 1999: 494). In fact, Beasley-Murray (1999: 404) points out that what is celebrated here is not Jesus' death but his resurrection, which enabled his followers to enjoy fellowship with their Lord subsequent to his death. He classifies the present meal as "an epiphany celebration of the risen Lord" (following Rissi 1979: 81–86). Schlatter (1948: 369) says that the disciples' present disposition fulfills 16:23.

41 Moloney 1998: 173; cf. Metzner 1999; Lee 1994: 110; Witkamp 1985: 24; Leidig 1979: 211; contra Thomas 1995: 18. Moloney (1998: 173) rightly notes, contra Beck (1993 [cf. 1997: 86–90]), who argues that anonymous characters in the Fourth Gospel draw the reader into an identification with the character, "The reader of the Fourth Gospel, however, hardly identifies with a man who is in league with 'the Jews' (vs. 15)." Keener (2003: 87), similarly, contends that a list of Johannine models of faith is not entirely coextensive with anonymous characters (citing esp. 5:14–15) and registers this as his only serious disagreement with Beck (p. 87 n. 49). Beck, in a review (2001), indirectly responds to my earlier criticism (Köstenberger 1999b, reviewing Beck 1997) that the man in John 5 disproves his theory by alleging, in effect, that I

Workman, H. B. 464n3
Woude, A. S. van der 194n98
Wright, N. T. 6, 6n13, 186
Wuellner, W. 513n14

have no place for literary analysis in my hermeneutical method. Nothing could be further from the truth. My concern, rather, lies with an unqualified wholesale adoption of reader-response criticism by evangelicals who fail to realize that this methodology is part and parcel of a postmodern hermeneutic that is left with nothing but subjective readings devoid of any claim to authority or universal applicability. Moreover, I was concerned to point out that Beck's central thesis (i.e., that anonymity necessarily equals ideal function and positive characterization) is invalid. Note further this puzzling conclusion by Brodie (1993: 238): "The final picture ... is ... open to a positive interpretation: the man has finally come to mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus, and he is announcing the good news to the Jews." Precisely where Brodie finds the man "announcing the good news to the Jews" is unclear to me, nor can I see textual evidence for the man coming to "mature (repentant) recognition of Jesus."

19 On the possible influence of Ps. 42 here and elsewhere in John's Gospel (11:33, 35, 37; 14:1–9, 27; 19:28), see the interchange between Beutler (1979, modifying Freed 1965b: 117–30) and Freed (1983a). See also Carson (1991: 440), who says that τετάρακται signifies "revulsion, horror, anxiety, agitation." This emphasis on the precrucifixion turmoil suffered by Jesus stands over against those who, in an effort to focus on the "glory" aspect of Jesus' death, overlook the real agony and anxiety he endured. So, rightly, Ridderbos (1997: 434), who argues, contra Witkamp, that 12:27a can "hardly refer to anything other than the natural human reaction in confrontation with death"; and Carson (1991: 439–40), who contends, contra E. Käsemann and G. C. Nicholson, that "even in John [with its realized eschatology], Jesus cannot contemplate the cross as a docetic actor, steeped in dispassionate unconcern." R. Brown (1966: 475) notes that here "we see the true humanity of the Johannine Jesus."

3 The world's hatred was experienced by Christians long before John wrote. The Roman historians Tacitus (Annales 15.44) and Suetonius (Nero 16) both called Christianity "a mischievous superstition." See also the charges leveled against the early Christians listed in Köstenberger 2002c: 147, citing Barclay 1975: 2.183–85. Still useful are Frend 1967 and Workman 1923. Keener (2003: 1017) claims that the worldview presupposed in 15:18–25 is "one common to sectarian groups, in which apocalyptic ideologies (in the modern sense of that expression) often prevail" (though he later acknowledges degrees of "sectarian" outlook [quotation marks his]). In his following paragraph, Keener does concede, however, that John's emphasis here "probably [but perhaps not?] stems from authentic Jesus tradition." Did Jesus, then, propagate a sectarian worldview? And, if so, in what sense?

98 See Barnett 1980–81; Schlatter 1948: 160; Piper, ISBE 3:332–33; van der Woude, TDNT 9:509–27. However, calling these figures "messianic pretenders" goes beyond the evidence. Thus, Meier (1994: 611–12 n. 75) and R. Brown (1997: 820 n. 6) emphatically deny that any Jew (other than Jesus) claimed or was said to be the Messiah prior to, contemporaneous with, or even in the decades immediately following Jesus' ministry.

13 See the magisterial "Part II: Tools for the Task" in Wright 1992: 29–144.

14 Talbert (1992: 235–36) points to a reference in the Gospel of the Hebrews to the effect that John used to supply fish to the court of the high priest while still working for his father, Zebedee. This is also noted by D. M. Smith (1999: 335), who adds that "fishermen were entrepreneurs, not common laborers at the bottom of the social spectrum” (citing Wuellner 1967: 45–61).

Yarbrough, R. W. 7n17

Young, F. W. 473n55

Zahn, T. 109n29, 249n11, 332n45, 513n13

17 One tricky piece of evidence concerns the second-century writer Papias (cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.4–5), a contemporary of Polycarp, who, in turn, was a disciple of the apostle John (on the date of Papias, see Yarbrough 1983; Munck 1959). Papias (at least to Eusebius) seems to refer to two separate Johns, the apostle and a “John the elder.” On this basis some have conjectured that the latter, rather than the former, wrote the Fourth Gospel. However, there is no need to drive a wedge between the two references to John in the passage in question. To the contrary, John may be designated “the elder” in the latter part of the quotation precisely because he is grouped with the elders mentioned earlier in the same passage. For a sound critique of the “John the elder” hypothesis, see Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 141–43. Keener (2003: 95–98) likewise challenges the reliability of Eusebius’s interpretation of Papias, owing to the former’s agenda of seeking to denigrate the Apocalypse. Keener (2003: 102–3) also includes an insightful discussion of the plausibility of John writing the Gospel at an advanced age. See also the works cited in Bauckham 1993: 27 n. 17 and the important essay by Hill (1998), who adduces from Eusebius’s (Hist. eccl. 3.24.5–13, esp. 11) reference to Papias (without naming him) that Papias held John the apostle to be the author of the Fourth Gospel (contra Bauckham 1993; Hengel 1989a; note my review of Hengel’s more extensive 1993 German monograph on the subject, Köstenberger 1996). For studies of the external evidence regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, see Bauckham 1993: 24 n. 1.

55 The verb ἀναγγέλλω (anangelō, proclaim), which is used thrice in 16:13–15, occurs over forty times in the Book of Isaiah (cf. R. Brown 1970: 708, citing Young 1955: 224–26), where declaring things to come is the exclusive domain of Yahweh (48:14). A close parallel to the present passage is Isa. 44:7 where Yahweh challenges anyone to declare the things to come (cf. 42:9; 46:10). Another striking parallel is found in 41:21–29 (esp. vv. 22–23; see also 45:19).

29 Assuming a three-year ministry, we see that this puts the crucifixion at A.D. 33. This reading of John 2:20, and a date of A.D. 30 for Jesus’ first Passover and the temple clearing, were advocated by Badcock (1935: 40–41). See also P. Maier (1968: 4–5); Hoehner (1977: 38–43; followed by Laney 1992: 72; cf. Hoehner, DJG 119); Humphreys and Waddington (1992: 351). MacAdam (1999: 31–33) concurs, but believes that this was Jesus’ final Passover and that the Fourth Evangelist has transposed the temple clearing to the beginning of Jesus’ ministry. Zahn (1921: 126–27 n. 23) comes close, arriving at the year A.D. 28 or 29.

11 A survey of major commentaries shows that about half provide a regular commentary (Carson, Laney, Lindars, Whitacre, Calvin, Westcott), while the other half refrain from comment (Michaels, Talbert, Stibbe, Brodie, D. M. Smith), in some cases choosing not to address the issue at all (e.g., Schlatter [1948: 205], who in his scholarly commentary moves directly from 7:52 to 8:12 without comment, though his popular commentary [1962: 139–41] does treat the pericope adulterae in deference to “ecclesiastical tradition”; see also Zahn [1921: 404], who, like Schlatter, moves immediately from 7:52 to 8:12 and deals with the pericope in a lengthy excursus on pp. 723–30).

45 See Larsen 2001: 215–20; Zahn 1921: 482 (called “a bizarre idea” by Bultmann [1971: 400 n. 6]); acknowledged as grammatically possible but rejected by Michaels (1989: 199).

13 This is suggested by the juxtaposition of both expressions in 20:2 and the close association

Zerwick, M. 259n41
Zias, J. 552
Zimmerman, M. 138n12
Zimmerman, R. 138n12
Zugibe, F. T. 542n6, 543n14

between Peter and this disciple in the Gospels and Acts (see commentary at 13:23; Köstenberger 1999a: 22–24). This is held by the majority of commentators (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 580; Westcott 1881: 255; Borchert 2002: 229; Carson 1991: 582 [“tentatively”]; Witherington 1995: 288; Beasley-Murray 1999: 324). Contra Calvin 1961: 159 (but see Morris 1995: 666 n. 37); Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4 (followed by Conway 1999: 179); Schnackenburg (1990: 3.235). Alternative suggestions include Judas (Abbott), Nicodemus (Tindall) (both mentioned in R. Brown 1970: 822), James the son of Zebedee (Zahn [cited in Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 4]), and Lazarus (Stibbe 1992: 79, 98–99).

41 Beasley-Murray (1999: 131, following M. Zerwick) prefers “Just what I am telling you.” See also Michaels (1989: 149): “Just what I have been claiming all along.”

12 Jesus calls himself “the bridegroom” in Matt. 9:15 pars. For the role of the bridegroom’s friend, see Gower 1987: 64–66; Zimmermann and Zimmermann 1999. Joy was the overriding theme at Jewish weddings; the verb πληρόω (plēroō, fulfill, complete) is associated with joy throughout this Gospel (Carson 1991: 211–12; Barrett 1978: 223). The Baptist’s words χαρᾷ χαίρει (chara chairei, lit., rejoices with joy), a Hebraism (χαρᾷ is a cognate dative [Wallace 1996: 168–69]), serve to intensify the verb (Ridderbos 1997: 147 n. 132; Morris 1995: 213 n. 112).

12 Jesus calls himself “the bridegroom” in Matt. 9:15 pars. For the role of the bridegroom’s friend, see Gower 1987: 64–66; Zimmermann and Zimmermann 1999. Joy was the overriding theme at Jewish weddings; the verb πληρόω (plēroō, fulfill, complete) is associated with joy throughout this Gospel (Carson 1991: 211–12; Barrett 1978: 223). The Baptist’s words χαρᾷ χαίρει (chara chairei, lit., rejoices with joy), a Hebraism (χαρᾷ is a cognate dative [Wallace 1996: 168–69]), serve to intensify the verb (Ridderbos 1997: 147 n. 132; Morris 1995: 213 n. 112).

6 So, with a variety of nuances, Witherington 1995: 308; R. Brown 1970: 917; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270; and Moloney 1998: 502, 506. Carson (1991: 609), who says that the omission is due to John’s desire to further highlight Jesus’ willing obedience to the Father, dismisses as unduly speculative the view that the omission is part of a polemic against the theory that Simon of Cyrene was himself crucified (contra Beasley-Murray 1999: 345). Barrett (1978: 548) proposes that the omission is due to the evangelist’s effort to highlight the “all-sufficiency of Jesus ... in effecting the redemption of the world.” Beasley-Murray (1999: 345 [cf. Borchert 2002: 261; R. Brown 1970: 917–18; contra Schnackenburg 1990: 3.270]) suggests that the omission serves to create an allusion to Isaac carrying the wood for his sacrifice.

14 Shock as the cause of death is strongly argued by Zugibe (1989: 41): “Shock is unquestionably the cause of Jesus’ death on the cross,” referring also to the opinion of a surgeon who contends, “There is overwhelming evidence that Christ died from heart failure due to extreme shock caused by exhaustion, pain and loss of blood.”

Index of Greek Words

ἀγαπάω 327n25, 596
αἶρω 310n63
αἰτέω 477n68
ἀκολουθέω 73
ἀκούω 266n72
ἀληθής 254n14
ἀληθινός 35, 254n14, 304n32

25 The Greek word for “love” used here is ἀγαπάω (agapaō); in 11:3 and 11:36 it is φιλέω (phileō). However, there appears to be little distinction in meaning between these two words, and the use of two different words for “to love” is best taken as an instance of the evangelist’s penchant for stylistic variation.

63 More literally, the Greek may be rendered “take away our life” (Ridderbos 1997: 368 n. 358). This translation is favored also by Morris (1995: 461, with reference to the same verb, αἶρω [airō, take away], in 10:18), who believes that the Jews are suggesting that Jesus is attempting to destroy Judaism. But in 10:18, αἶρω means “take up,” not “take away.” Bultmann (1971: 361 n. 5) thinks that this is “scarcely credible” and adduces the parallel expression in Josephus, Ant. 3.2.3 §48: οἱ δ’ ἦσαν ἐπὶ τὸν κίνδυνον τὰς ψυχὰς ἡρμένοι (LCL translation: “hearts elated”). R. Brown (1966: 403) proposes that Jesus is creating a pun on the word ψυχή (psychē, life), using it both with reference to Jesus’ giving his life for his sheep and, ironically, to refer to Jesus’ “taking away the life” of those who refuse to acknowledge him. In light of the fact that John’s Gospel is laden with irony, this is possible but hard to verify.

68 Morris (1995: 628) notes the present tense of the imperative αἰτεῖτε (aiteite, ask) in 16:24, conveying the continual nature of the asking. Note also the presence of two different words for “ask,” ἐρωτάω (erōtaō) in 16:23 and αἰτέω (aiteō) three times in 16:23–24, whereby the former refers to the barrage of questions that the disciples had for Jesus prior to the crucifixion (cf. 16:5, 30), and the latter to prayer requests subsequent to his exaltation (see Carson 1991: 545, apparently dependent on Barrett 1978: 494; contra Borchert 2002: 176).

72 On predestination in John’s Gospel, see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.214–15. Carson (1991: 353) suggests that ἀκούω (akouō, hear) has the connotation of “obey.” R. Brown (1966: 357) thinks that the verb means literally that the Jews “have become so obdurate that they cannot even hear him; they are deaf.” Ridderbos (1997: 314) notes that Jesus’ opponents’ spiritual incomprehension results from their failure to combine hearing with faith.

14 Commentators vary as to whether to regard as synonyms the two words used in the present context for “true” or “valid,” ἀληθής (alēthēs; 8:13, 14, 17) and ἀληθινός (alēthinos; 8:16). Beasley-Murray (1999: 125 n. a [contra R. Brown 1966: 341; Lindars 1972: 317; Barrett 1978: 339]) opts to distinguish between the former meaning “true” or “valid” and the latter meaning “just” or “authentic” (similarly, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.194). Ridderbos (1997: 294) suggests the meaning “just” for ἀληθινός; Barrett (1978: 339) opts for “authentic”; and Carson (1991: 340) prefers “right.”

14 Commentators vary as to whether to regard as synonyms the two words used in the present context for “true” or “valid,” ἀληθής (alēthēs; 8:13, 14, 17) and ἀληθινός (alēthinos; 8:16). Beasley-Murray (1999: 125 n. a [contra R. Brown 1966: 341; Lindars 1972: 317; Barrett 1978: 339]) opts to distinguish between the former meaning “true” or “valid” and the latter meaning

ἀμήν 85, 299
ἀναβαίνω 231n15
ἀντλέω 97–98
ἀπό 325n13
ἀπόλλυμι 129–30
ἀπωλεία 494
ἄριστον 360, 593–94
ἀρχή 25n16
ἀρχιτρίκλιнос 98
ἄρχων τῶν Ἰουδαίων 118

γεωργός 451
γλωσσόκομον 363
γνωρίζω 50

δεῖπνον 360
δέχομαι 168
δόξα 42

ἐγνώκατε 447
ἐγνώκειτε 447
εἰς τὸν κόλπον 49–50
ἐκ 325n13

“just” or “authentic” (similarly, Schnackenburg 1990: 2.194). Ridderbos (1997: 294) suggests the meaning “just” for ἀληθινός; Barrett (1978: 339) opts for “authentic”; and Carson (1991: 340) prefers “right.”

32 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.294) proposes a translation “right” or “true.” Similarly, Borchert (1996: 333) suggests that the meaning of καλός is similar to that of ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) (cf. Moloney 1998: 310; Bultmann 1971: 364). Carson (1991: 386) contends that the “good shepherd” should be thought of as “noble or worthy” but not “sentimental or effeminate.” Lindars (1972: 361) favors the rendering “an ideal shepherd.”

15 To “go up” (ἀναβαίνω, anabainō) to Jerusalem is a common expression no matter what one’s geographical origination (cf. 5:1). Because the term is used later with reference to Jesus’ ascension to the Father, some see an allusion to Jesus’ glorification (Carson 1991: 309: “just possible”). This is unlikely (Michaels 1989: 127; Lindars 1972: 285) and in any case is not the primary referent (contra R. Brown 1966: 308).

13 Noted by Carson 1991: 405. On the relationship between the two Bethanys referred to in John’s Gospel, see Brownlee 1972: 167–74. Morris (1995: 477 n. 10) rightly rejects the distinction made between “Bethany” as their present home and “the village” as their place of origin on the basis of the prepositions ἀπό (apo) and ἐκ (ek) in 11:1.

16 Besides “beginning,” the Greek term ἀρχή can also mean “first cause.” It is possible that John here seeks to convey both meanings, “in the beginning of history” and “at the root of the universe” (Morris 1995: 65).

13 Noted by Carson 1991: 405. On the relationship between the two Bethanys referred to in John’s Gospel, see Brownlee 1972: 167–74. Morris (1995: 477 n. 10) rightly rejects the distinction made between “Bethany” as their present home and “the village” as their place of origin on the basis of the prepositions ἀπό (apo) and ἐκ (ek) in 11:1.

ἐκρύβη 274n109

Ἕλληνες 377

ἐμβριμάομαι 339–40

ἐμφανίζω 440

ἐνεφύσησεν 575

ἐξουσία 39

ἐρωτάω 477n68

ἐτάραξεν 339–40

θεάομαι 69n46

θεός 27–28

θεωρέω 212–13

θύω 304

ἱερόν 105, 108, 109, 232

Ἰουδαῖοι 53n1, 59n6, 108, 213, 261

109 The passive verb ἐκρύβη (ekrybē) in 8:59 and 12:36 is customarily translated in English Bibles as reflexive/middle (“hid himself”; KJV; NKJV; NIV; TNIV; ISV; ESV; NLT; NET; NRSV; NASB) or even actively (“hid”; NAB; CEV). The sole exception is the HCSB, which renders the expression as a genuine passive. See also Morris (1995: 421), who contends that the NT usage is to take the form as a real passive and consequently argues that the passive form may imply the agency of God the Father in concealing Jesus. This is possible; ekrybē does function as a genuine passive in Luke 19:42 and Heb. 11:23, the only other two NT instances (besides here and in John 12:36) of the aorist passive indicative form of kryptō. But cf. BDAG 571, which treats both references as instances of the passive used in an active sense (“to hide”). Similarly, BDF §471 (4).

68 Morris (1995: 628) notes the present tense of the imperative αἰτεῖτε (aiteite, ask) in 16:24, conveying the continual nature of the asking. Note also the presence of two different words for “ask,” ἐρωτάω (erōtaō) in 16:23 and αἰτέω (aiteō) three times in 16:23–24, whereby the former refers to the barrage of questions that the disciples had for Jesus prior to the crucifixion (cf. 16:5, 30), and the latter to prayer requests subsequent to his exaltation (see Carson 1991: 545, apparently dependent on Barrett 1978: 494; contra Borchert 2002: 176).

46 “I have seen” (τεθέαμαι, tetheamai) is in the perfect, indicating the settledness of John’s conviction (Carson 1991: 151). Less likely, the perfect points to the permanent effects of John’s encounter with the Christ (Morris 1995: 132–33; R. Brown 1966: 56). Morris (1995: 133 n. 72) thinks that John’s use of a different verb for seeing may be a mere instance of stylistic variation. More likely, θεάομαι in John conveys a more pronounced note of perception than other “seeing” verbs. This is borne out by all instances of θεάομαι in this Gospel: 1:14, 32, 38; 4:35; 6:5; 11:45.

1 On the term Ἰουδαῖοι, see commentary at 1:19. The new BDAG entry on Ἰουδαῖος, which systematically recasts all “Jews” as “Judeans” in order to avoid “anti-Judaism” by modern-day readers, constitutes an unduly extreme reaction and results in demonstrably inaccurate renderings that equate all Jews with inhabitants of Judea. However, Jews lived also in Galilee and adjacent provinces, not to mention the Diaspora. Note the appropriate criticism by Lowery (2003: 120–21).

6 Greek, Ἰουδαῖοι. Here and elsewhere in the Fourth Gospel, this Greek term ought to be rendered in keeping with the connotative meaning supplied by the respective context (see the TNIV). In a recent paper, S. Porter (2002), taking as his point of departure the recent compendium

καλός 304n32, 313n77
κατέλαβεν 31
κλάδος 452
κλῆμα 452
κοιλία 241
κόλπος 49–50, 414
κόσμος 35, 36n51
κύριος 221, 465–66

λαλία 266n71
λόγος 26–27, 266n71
λόγχη 552n65

edited by Bieringer et al. (2001a; 2001b), contends that no single proposal explains all instances of the term in John’s Gospel. He notes that only twenty-six out of seventy instances of Ἰουδαῖοι in John are negative (including 11:8, 54, but not 1:19; 5:10, 15; 8:22; 10:24; 18:12; 19:31). According to Porter, the singular referent of the term in John’s Gospel is the Jewish people as a religious, ethnic group. However, a given context may limit the reference to a subgroup. A case in point is an articular, demonstrative use: “those Jews there.” Anaphoric usage provides discourse continuity and cohesion. Partitive uses are found as well. Both literalistic views and “politically correct” views, according to Porter, are to be eschewed in favor of an understanding that is linguistically informed and contextually sensitive. When applied as part of a salvation-historical reading of the Johannine narrative and supplemented by other related terms, such as οἱ ἴδιοι in 1:11, the approach advocated by Porter is superior to woodenly literal or ideologically driven alternatives (see also Köstenberger 2003).

32 Schnackenburg (1990: 2.294) proposes a translation “right” or “true.” Similarly, Borchert (1996: 333) suggests that the meaning of καλός is similar to that of ἀληθινός (alēthinos, true) (cf. Moloney 1998: 310; Bultmann 1971: 364). Carson (1991: 386) contends that the “good shepherd” should be thought of as “noble or worthy” but not “sentimental or effeminate.” Lindars (1972: 361) favors the rendering “an ideal shepherd.”

77 R. Brown (1966: 403) suggests that καλός (kalos, good) here may also be intended to hark back to the description of Jesus as the “good” shepherd (10:11, 14) in the preceding narrative. The renderings by Carson (1991: 396) as “noble” or “beautiful,” and by Barrett (1978: 383) as “deeds of power and moral excellence, resulting in health and well-being,” may overreach as expositions of the meaning conveyed by the term.

51 Barrett (1978: 162) sees only one sense of κόσμος in this verse. Morris (1995: 85) contends that the first two instances refer to everyone, while the third reference is to those who came in contact with Jesus. Beasley-Murray (1999: 12) sees a progression from “the world inhabited by humankind” in 1:10a to “the world including human beings” in 1:10b to “humanity, fallen and in darkness” in 1:10c. Carson (1991: 123) demonstrates that the word κόσμος never has a positive usage (contra Burge 2000: 57) and only a few neutral ones.

71 Morris (1995: 410) and Barrett (1978: 348) claim to detect a contrast between Jesus’ λαλία (lalia, speech) and his λόγος (logos, word), but it is hard to see why these two terms should not be understood as rough synonyms, in keeping with Johannine style.

71 Morris (1995: 410) and Barrett (1978: 348) claim to detect a contrast between Jesus’ λαλία (lalia, speech) and his λόγος (logos, word), but it is hard to see why these two terms should not be understood as rough synonyms, in keeping with Johannine style.

μάχαιρα 509
 μένω 74–75, 453
 μέρος 406
 μονογενής 42–44, 49
 μονογενής θεός 50
 μονογενής υἱός 50

 ναός 105, 108, 109, 232
 νικάω 481n84
 νίπτω 406

 ὃ γέγονεν 29 ὀρφανός 439

 παιδάριον 201n13
 παραβολή 302n17
 παράκλητος 435–37
 παροιμία 297–98n5, 302, 478
 περιπατέω 387
 πιστεύω + εἰς 261n48

65 Roman soldiers used primarily two kinds of weapons: a short sword for close combat and a lance or javelin for attacks from a distance. The lance (pilum) was about three and a half feet long and was made up of an iron point or spearhead (λόγχη, lonchē) joined to a shaft of light wood (Avi-Yonah 1964: 154). Later, the term λόγχη (the word used in the present passage) came to be used for a spear or lance itself.

84 This is the only instance of the term νικάω (nikaō, triumph) in John's Gospel. The expression occurs several times in John's first epistle (2:13, 14; 4:4; 5:4, 5) and over a dozen times in the Book of Revelation (esp. in the letters to the seven churches in chs. 2 and 3; see Schlatter 1948: 317). The related noun νίκη (nikē, victory) occurs in 1 John 5:4. Other NT references to the victory won by Jesus (extended to believers) include John 12:31; Rom. 8:37 (ὑπερνικάω, hypernikaō); 1 Cor. 15:57 (νῖκος, nikos). The verb occurs rarely in the OT, with Ps. 50:6 LXX showing God as conqueror (cited in Rom. 3:4). It is also found in apocryphal and pseudepigraphical literature (see Wis. 4:2; 16:10; 18:22; 1 Esdr. 3:12). Bruns (1967) contends that John's portrayal of Jesus as victor echoes the pagan myth of Herakles, the conqueror of death and evil.

13 The use of the word παιδάριον in John 6:9 (its only NT occurrence) and several times in the LXX of the 2 Kings passage (there referring to Elisha's servant) is one major verbal connection between these two narratives. Other links include the mention of barley and the overall mode of narration, including a question of disbelief, the command to distribute the loaves, and the fact that all ate with food left to spare.

17 The word is absent from the Synoptics, where the roughly equivalent expression παραβολή (parabolē, parable) is found (not used in John; see Carson 1984: 301–4). Both terms apparently render the broad Hebrew expression māšāl (Borchert 1996: 329). They occur side by side in a few instances (e.g., Sir. 39:3; 47:17) and do not differ significantly in meaning (Dewey 1980).

48 A semantic distinction between πιστεύω + εἰς (pisteuō + eis, believe + in) and the verb alone followed by an object in the dative case cannot be maintained (Carson [1991: 346–47] and the vast majority of commentators; see also Croteau 2002). Concerning the perfect participle

πλήρωμα 46
πρός 27
πρωῖ 523–24
πυνθάνομαι 171

ρόμφαία 509

σαββάτων 561n2
σκηνώ 41
σφραγίζω 139

τίθημι 308n53

ὑπέρ 497
ὑπόδειγμα 408
ὑψώω 260n45
ὑψώσητε 260

φανός 506
φιλέω 327n25, 596
φίλος 330n37

πεπιστευκότας (pepisteukotas, having believed), Swetnam (1980 citing E. Abbott 1906: 365–66) notes that the perfect participle in Greek can also serve as a pluperfect. If so, the meaning here would be “those who had [previously] believed in him [but did so no longer].”

2 Cf. Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; cf. 1 Cor. 15:4; see Carson 1991: 635. The expression “on the first day of the week” reads more literally, “on one of the Sabbath [week]” and may allude to the week of creation (cf. Gen. Rab. 11.9 on Gen. 2:3). Morris (1991: 733 n. 7 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 366 n. a]) notes that σαββάτων (sabbatōn) can mean either “Sabbath” or “week” (contra R. Brown [1970: 980], who claims that the meaning “week” emerged only later). The use of the cardinal numeral (“one”) for the ordinal (“first”) may represent a Semitism (Barrett 1978: 562; cf. Morris 1995: 733 n. 6; Beasley-Murray 1999: 366; Moloney 1998: 521; Lindars 1972: 599).

53 Ridderbos (1997: 366) also notes that the verb τίθημι (tithēmi, lay down) has the connotation of removing an article of clothing, and he points to the strong conceptual link between the present passage and Jesus’ actions in 13:4, 12. Both passages feature Jesus’ authority and compassion alongside each other.

45 John is the only NT writer to use this term in a dual sense with reference both to Jesus’ crucifixion (his literal “lifting up”) and to his exaltation (metaphorical use). For NT instances of the verb ὑψώω, with the meaning “exalted” or “honored,” see Matt. 23:12 (= Luke 14:11 = 18:14); Luke 1:52; Acts 2:33; 5:31; James 4:10; 1 Pet. 5:6. On the phrase “I am the one I claim to be,” see commentary at 8:24 and at 8:58.

25 The Greek word for “love” used here is ἀγαπάω (agapaō); in 11:3 and 11:36 it is φιλέω (phileō). However, there appears to be little distinction in meaning between these two words, and the use of two different words for “to love” is best taken as an instance of the evangelist’s penchant for stylistic variation.

37 See Morris (1995: 482), who refers to the universal fear regarding death in the ancient world. There is no reason to follow Barrett (1978: 392 [cf. R. Brown 1966: 431]), who, on the basis that φῶς 250n2

χάριν ἀντὶ χάριτος 46–47

χάρις 44–45

χιλίαρχος 505n13

Χριστός 60n13

ψεῦδος 267n77

ψυχὴ 310n63

φίλος (philos, friend) is a technical term for a Christian in the NT, proposes that this is the “true meaning” of this “pregnant saying.” Carson (1991: 409) notes the “not accidental” switch from the plural “our friend” to the singular “I am going,” saying that this indicates that Jesus alone is the resurrection and the life. “I am going” is identified as a futuristic present by Wallace (1996: 536).

2 The term φῶς (phōs, light) spans the entire first half of John’s Gospel, from the prologue (1:4, 5, 7, 8, 9) to the concluding section (12:35, 36, 46), in each of which it occurs six times. The term is absent from the second half of John’s Gospel, which suggests that it is part of John’s presentation of Jesus’ entrance into the world and ministry to the Jews in chapters 1–12. The occurrences of φῶς are clustered in 1:4–9; 3:19–21; 5:35; 8:12; 9:5; 11:9–10; 12:35–46. Φῶς is linked with ζωὴ (zōē, life) in 1:4 and 8:12; ζωὴ is used more frequently than φῶς, especially in the phrase ζωὴ αἰώνιος (zōē aiōnios, eternal life). At times, φῶς serves as a metaphor for eternal life in its spiritual, moral, and present-day implications.

13 The term χιλίαρχος (chiliarchos) was used to translate the Roman tribunus militum, a commander of a cohort of six hundred or even as few as two hundred soldiers (e.g., Polybius, Histories 11.23; the LXX features twenty-nine instances of χιλίαρχος for civil or military officials). Stibbe (1992: 170) thinks that the σπεῖρα probably consisted of two hundred soldiers. See the discussion by Morris (1995: 656 n. 5), who suggests that the use of σπεῖρα with the definite article here may indicate that a specific cohort is meant.

13 The Greek word Χριστός, like its Hebrew counterpart, mešiah, means “anointed one.” Though the term was applied in the OT to a variety of men who were set apart and anointed to serve God and his people in a special capacity (such as priest or king), OT predictive prophecy gave rise to the expectation that there would be a future figure, the Anointed One, sent by God to deliver and rule his people. See especially Horbury 1998. For a convincing refutation of the claim that the present passage was written to counter a Baptist sect in the evangelist’s day, see Ridderbos 1997: 64 (cf. R. Brown 1966: 48).

77 Notably, ψεῦδος (pseudos, lie) “does not refer here to a distinct act that can be immediately rectified but to a transindividual power of deception with paternity of its own” (Ridderbos 1997: 315).

63 More literally, the Greek may be rendered “take away our life” (Ridderbos 1997: 368 n. 358). This translation is favored also by Morris (1995: 461, with reference to the same verb, αἶρω [airō, take away], in 10:18), who believes that the Jews are suggesting that Jesus is attempting to destroy Judaism. But in 10:18, αἶρω means “take up,” not “take away.” Bultmann (1971: 361 n. 5) thinks that this is “scarcely credible” and adduces the parallel expression in Josephus, Ant. 3.2.3 §48: οἱ δ’ ἦσαν ἐπὶ τὸν κίνδυνον τὰς ψυχὰς ἡρμένον (LCL translation: “hearts elated”). R. Brown (1966: 403) proposes that Jesus is creating a pun on the word ψυχὴ (psychē, life), using it both with reference to Jesus’ giving his life for his sheep and, ironically, to refer to

Index of Scripture and Other Ancient Writings

Old Testament Pseudepigrapha
New Testament Apocrypha
Nag Hammadi
Rabbinic Writings
Qumran / Dead Sea Scrolls
Papyri
Josephus
Philo
Classical Writers
Church Fathers

p 665 Old Testament Pseudepigrapha

Apocalypse of Abraham

9:6 458n53
10:5 458n53
31:1–3 272n98

Jesus' "taking away the life" of those who refuse to acknowledge him. In light of the fact that John's Gospel is laden with irony, this is possible but hard to verify.

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for "love" is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo's (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as "my friend" (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for "love" is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo's (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as "my friend" (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

98 Cf. 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 3:13–14; 2 Bar. 4:4; Apoc. Abr. 31:1–3; see Moloney 1998: 284.

Apocalypse of Moses

31 569n13

Assumption of Moses

1:13–14 500n84

11:17 194n100

12:6 194n100

2 (Syriac) Baruch

4:4 272n98

13:1 382n29

21 483

22:1 382n29

13 Lee (1995: 42) notes the interesting narrative tension introduced by the fact that Jesus asks Mary not to cling to him (20:17) but invites Thomas to touch him later on in the narrative (20:27). She also points out that in the end, it is inconsequential whether or not Thomas actually does touch Jesus (p. 43; see discussion below). For an alternate way of construing the syntax of 20:17 by taking γάρ (gar, for) to be anticipatory, see McGehee (1986), who translates, “Don’t cling to me. Since I have not yet ascended to the Father, go to my brothers and tell them I am ascending to my Father and your Father and my God and your God.” D’Angelo (1990) adduces Apoc. Mos. 31 as a parallel, taking the present passage to relate to a concern for purity “because the appearance takes place in some sort of intermediary stage.”

84 For example, Gen. Rab. 1.10; 2.5; Lev. Rab. 25.3; Num. Rab. 12.6; Deut. Rab. 10.2; As. Mos. 1:13–14. For further Jewish references, see Hauck, TDNT 3:620–21. A suggestive parallel is found in Odes Sol. 41:15, where the Messiah is said to have been “known before the foundations of the world, that he might give life to persons forever by the truth of his name.” Compare 17:6 with 17:26. Note also the strong affinity between 17:24–26 and 1 John 3:2.

100 See Exod. 32:11–14, 30–32; Num. 12:13; 14:19–20; 21:7; Deut. 9:18–20, 25–29. See also As. Mos. 11:17 (cf. 12:6; Jub. 1:19–21; cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 62; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 79; Ridderbos 1997: 207; Carson 1991: 266).

100 See Exod. 32:11–14, 30–32; Num. 12:13; 14:19–20; 21:7; Deut. 9:18–20, 25–29. See also As. Mos. 11:17 (cf. 12:6; Jub. 1:19–21; cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 62; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 79; Ridderbos 1997: 207; Carson 1991: 266).

98 Cf. 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 3:13–14; 2 Bar. 4:4; Apoc. Abr. 31:1–3; see Moloney 1998: 284.

29 The other two occasions are Jesus’ baptism and his transfiguration: Matt. 3:17 pars.; 17:5 pars.; cf. 2 Pet. 1:17. Old Testament references to the “voice from heaven” include 1 Sam. 3:4, 6, 8; 1 Kings 19:13; Dan. 4:31–32. For other examples of a “heavenly voice” in Jewish literature, see 1 Enoch 65:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 6:13, 17; 2 Bar. 13:1; 22:1; T. Levi 18:6. See also Acts 9:4–6; 11:7, 9–10; Rev. 10:4, 8; 11:12; 14:2, 13; 18:4; 19:5; 21:3. Evans (1981) notes the affinity of John 12:28 with Isa. 52–53.

29 The other two occasions are Jesus’ baptism and his transfiguration: Matt. 3:17 pars.; 17:5 pars.; cf. 2 Pet. 1:17. Old Testament references to the “voice from heaven” include 1 Sam. 3:4, 6, 8; 1 Kings 19:13; Dan. 4:31–32. For other examples of a “heavenly voice” in Jewish literature, see 1 Enoch 65:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 6:13, 17; 2 Bar. 13:1; 22:1; T. Levi 18:6. See also Acts 9:4–6;

29:3 77n73
29:3–30:1 200n6
29:5 93n16
29:8 200n6, 209
30:1 77n73
30:1–2 190n73
34 483
39:7 450
40:1 77n73
42:7–8 190n73
48:1–24 483
48:3–4 125
48:47 394n18
50:2 190n73

11:7, 9–10; Rev. 10:4, 8; 11:12; 14:2, 13; 18:4; 19:5; 21:3. Evans (1981) notes the affinity of John 12:28 with Isa. 52–53.

73 See Ps. Sol. 17:32; 1 Enoch 48:10; 52:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 12:32; 2 Bar. 29:3; 30:1; 40:1; 70:9; 72:2. See O’Neill 1995: 25–26; Abegg and Evans 1998: 191–94; Horbury 1998: chapter 2.

6 Kruse (2003: 161) notes that Passover was a time when the Jews expected the Prophet to provide manna from heaven the way Moses had done (citing 2 Bar. 29:3–30:1 [c. A.D. 100], see esp. 29:8, though there is in this text no specific mention of Passover).

16 See Jer. 31:12–14; Hos. 14:7; Amos 9:13–14; 2 Bar. 29:5; 1 Enoch 10:19; cf. Matt. 22:1–14 par.; 25:1–13.

6 Kruse (2003: 161) notes that Passover was a time when the Jews expected the Prophet to provide manna from heaven the way Moses had done (citing 2 Bar. 29:3–30:1 [c. A.D. 100], see esp. 29:8, though there is in this text no specific mention of Passover).

73 See Ps. Sol. 17:32; 1 Enoch 48:10; 52:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 12:32; 2 Bar. 29:3; 30:1; 40:1; 70:9; 72:2. See O’Neill 1995: 25–26; Abegg and Evans 1998: 191–94; Horbury 1998: chapter 2.

73 See 1 Enoch 22:13; 51; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:32; 2 Bar. 30:1–2; 42:7–8; 50:2.

73 See Ps. Sol. 17:32; 1 Enoch 48:10; 52:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 12:32; 2 Bar. 29:3; 30:1; 40:1; 70:9; 72:2. See O’Neill 1995: 25–26; Abegg and Evans 1998: 191–94; Horbury 1998: chapter 2.

73 See 1 Enoch 22:13; 51; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:32; 2 Bar. 30:1–2; 42:7–8; 50:2.

18 This emphasis is in keeping with instances in Second Temple literature, where the law seems to take a more active part in the process of judging (2 Bar. 48:47; 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 13:30–35; Wis. 9:3; cf. Philo, Mos. 2.10 §53). John 12:48–50 contains echoes of the Book of Deuteronomy (cf. Deut. 18:19; 31:19, 26; see O’Connell 1960; cf. R. Brown 1966: 491–92). There, it is God who takes vengeance on those who refuse to hear; in the Targumim, it is God’s memra, or word: “And the man who does not listen to his words which he [the future prophet] will speak in the name of my memra, I in my memra will be avenged of him” (Tg. Neof. on Deut. 18:19); “my memra will take revenge on him” (Tg. Ps.-J. on Deut. 18:19). For “the last day,” see 6:39–40, 44; 11:24 (the phrase, with “day” in the singular, does not occur elsewhere in the NT).

73 See 1 Enoch 22:13; 51; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:32; 2 Bar. 30:1–2; 42:7–8; 50:2.

59:2 31
70:9 77n73
72:2 77n73
77:11 443n94
77:11–16 299n7
77:13–17 307n49

3 (Greek) Baruch

6:13 303n27

4 Baruch (Paraleipomena Jeremiou)

9:3 254n12

1 (Ethiopic) Enoch

10:19 93n16
22:13 190n73
37–71 188n63, 422
39:4–5 426n26

73 See Ps. Sol. 17:32; 1 Enoch 48:10; 52:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 12:32; 2 Bar. 29:3; 30:1; 40:1; 70:9; 72:2. See O'Neill 1995: 25–26; Abegg and Evans 1998: 191–94; Horbury 1998: chapter 2.

73 See Ps. Sol. 17:32; 1 Enoch 48:10; 52:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 12:32; 2 Bar. 29:3; 30:1; 40:1; 70:9; 72:2. See O'Neill 1995: 25–26; Abegg and Evans 1998: 191–94; Horbury 1998: chapter 2.

94 There are several parallels in Second Temple literature between the consoling, teaching presence of the Paraclete and the period after the death of a revered leader in the testaments (e.g., 2 Bar. 77:11).

7 E.g., Ps. 74:1; 78:52; 79:13; 95:7; 100:3; Ezek. 34:31. A roughly contemporaneous passage, 2 Bar. 77:11–16, portrays the law as true shepherd (as well as light and water). Thus, Jesus here claims to fulfill the function that Jews generally attributed to the Torah (Moloney 1998; 307 [cited in Blomberg 2002: 158]). For a detailed treatment of John's appropriation of Ezekiel's shepherd motif in Ezek. 33–37, see Deeley 1997.

49 See Ps. Sol. 17:40; 2 Bar. 77:13–17; CD 13:7–9.

27 See Gen. 28:17; Ps. 78:23; 1 Enoch 72–75 (e.g., 72:2); 3 Bar. 6:13.

12 Cf. Ps. 36:9; 56:13; Ps. Sol. 3:12 (cf. 4 Bar. 9:3); 1QS 3:7; 1 Enoch 58:3 (cf. 58:4–6; 92:4).

16 See Jer. 31:12–14; Hos. 14:7; Amos 9:13–14; 2 Bar. 29:5; 1 Enoch 10:19; cf. Matt. 22:1–14 par.; 25:1–13.

73 See 1 Enoch 22:13; 51; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:32; 2 Bar. 30:1–2; 42:7–8; 50:2.

63 The single exception is the Son of Man (or “Chosen One”) in the Similitudes of Enoch (1 Enoch 37–71; esp. 49:4; 61:9; 62:2–6; 63:11).

26 Apocalyptic Second Temple literature provides descriptions of heavenly dwelling places for the saints (e.g., 1 Enoch 39:4–5; 41:2; 71:16; 2 Enoch 61:2–3). Note Luke 16:9, where Jesus speaks of his disciples' being “welcomed into eternal dwellings.” Philo regards heaven as a paternal house or city to which the soul returns after death (Dreams 1.39 §256; cf. Conf. Tong.

41:2 426n26
41:3 125
42:2 36n50
45–57 378
46 378
48 378
48:1 152
48:6 235n33
48:10 77n73
49:1 386n45
49:2 99n38
49:3 70
49:4 188n63

17 §78; Heir 55 §274; Mos. 2.51 §288). The rabbis believed that there were seven classes or departments, graded according to merit, in the heavenly garden of Eden (Midr. Ps. 11 §6); the church fathers held similar views. John, however, is decidedly nonapocalyptic (the exception may be 1:51), and his treatment is much more restrained than Philo's existential allegorizing. The rabbinic notion of a compartmentalized heaven is likewise foreign to John.

26 Apocalyptic Second Temple literature provides descriptions of heavenly dwelling places for the saints (e.g., 1 Enoch 39:4–5; 41:2; 71:16; 2 Enoch 61:2–3). Note Luke 16:9, where Jesus speaks of his disciples' being "welcomed into eternal dwellings." Philo regards heaven as a paternal house or city to which the soul returns after death (Dreams 1.39 §256; cf. Conf. Tong. 17 §78; Heir 55 §274; Mos. 2.51 §288). The rabbis believed that there were seven classes or departments, graded according to merit, in the heavenly garden of Eden (Midr. Ps. 11 §6); the church fathers held similar views. John, however, is decidedly nonapocalyptic (the exception may be 1:51), and his treatment is much more restrained than Philo's existential allegorizing. The rabbinic notion of a compartmentalized heaven is likewise foreign to John.

50 Schnackenburg (1990: 1.256) claims that the reference is not to Jesus' earthly ministry but to Israel's history prior to the incarnation. Similarly, R. Brown (1966: 30) cites the parallel of Wisdom in 1 Enoch 42:2: "Wisdom came to make her dwelling place among the children of men and found no dwelling place." More likely, the reference is anticipatory of the Word's incarnation in 1:14 (Culpepper 1980–81: 13–14; Carson 1991: 122; Ridderbos 1997: 43; Moloney 1998: 37). On a literal level, see the reference in Luke 2:7 that there was "no guest room available" (TNIV) for Jesus and his parents at his birth, which may have spiritual overtones as well.

33 For OT information regarding the origins of the Messiah, see Mic. 5:2; Dan. 7:13. For apocalyptic references, see 1 Enoch 48:6; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 13:51–52 (these may be post-Christian). See also Justin, Dial. 8.4 (cited in Kruse 2003: 188).

73 See Ps. Sol. 17:32; 1 Enoch 48:10; 52:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 12:32; 2 Bar. 29:3; 30:1; 40:1; 70:9; 72:2. See O'Neill 1995: 25–26; Abegg and Evans 1998: 191–94; Horbury 1998: chapter 2.

45 Carson (1991: 445) cites most of these passages and adds Ps. 72:17; 1 Enoch 49:1; and he contrasts 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29.

38 Cf. Ps. 97:6; 102:16; Isa. 60:1–2; Ps. Sol. 17:30–32; 1 Enoch 49:2; see R. Brown 1966: 104.

63 The single exception is the Son of Man (or "Chosen One") in the Similitudes of Enoch (1

51 190n73
52:4 77n73
58:3 254n12
58:4–6 254n12
60:12 125
61:5 272n101
61:9 188n63
62:2–6 188n63
62:14 386
63:11 188n63
65:4 382n29
71:16 426n26

Enoch 37–71; esp. 49:4; 61:9; 62:2–6; 63:11).

73 See 1 Enoch 22:13; 51; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:32; 2 Bar. 30:1–2; 42:7–8; 50:2.

73 See Ps. Sol. 17:32; 1 Enoch 48:10; 52:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 12:32; 2 Bar. 29:3; 30:1; 40:1; 70:9; 72:2. See O’Neill 1995: 25–26; Abegg and Evans 1998: 191–94; Horbury 1998: chapter 2.

12 Cf. Ps. 36:9; 56:13; Ps. Sol. 3:12 (cf. 4 Bar. 9:3); 1QS 3:7; 1 Enoch 58:3 (cf. 58:4–6; 92:4).

12 Cf. Ps. 36:9; 56:13; Ps. Sol. 3:12 (cf. 4 Bar. 9:3); 1QS 3:7; 1 Enoch 58:3 (cf. 58:4–6; 92:4).

101 So Schnackenburg 1990: 2.222, citing 1 Enoch 61:5; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 13:52. Similarly, Bultmann (1971: 326 n. 2). Brodie (1993: 335) opts for a broader scope, suggesting that “Jesus’ day refers to the way in which, during his entire life, and especially in his death, he was revealed as the Anointed.” Similarly, Whitacre (1999: 230), who says that the expression encompasses Jesus’ “whole advent, ministry, death, resurrection and ascension.”

63 The single exception is the Son of Man (or “Chosen One”) in the Similitudes of Enoch (1 Enoch 37–71; esp. 49:4; 61:9; 62:2–6; 63:11).

63 The single exception is the Son of Man (or “Chosen One”) in the Similitudes of Enoch (1 Enoch 37–71; esp. 49:4; 61:9; 62:2–6; 63:11).

63 The single exception is the Son of Man (or “Chosen One”) in the Similitudes of Enoch (1 Enoch 37–71; esp. 49:4; 61:9; 62:2–6; 63:11).

29 The other two occasions are Jesus’ baptism and his transfiguration: Matt. 3:17 pars.; 17:5 pars.; cf. 2 Pet. 1:17. Old Testament references to the “voice from heaven” include 1 Sam. 3:4, 6, 8; 1 Kings 19:13; Dan. 4:31–32. For other examples of a “heavenly voice” in Jewish literature, see 1 Enoch 65:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 6:13, 17; 2 Bar. 13:1; 22:1; T. Levi 18:6. See also Acts 9:4–6; 11:7, 9–10; Rev. 10:4, 8; 11:12; 14:2, 13; 18:4; 19:5; 21:3. Evans (1981) notes the affinity of John 12:28 with Isa. 52–53.

26 Apocalyptic Second Temple literature provides descriptions of heavenly dwelling places for the saints (e.g., 1 Enoch 39:4–5; 41:2; 71:16; 2 Enoch 61:2–3). Note Luke 16:9, where Jesus speaks of his disciples’ being “welcomed into eternal dwellings.” Philo regards heaven as a paternal house or city to which the soul returns after death (Dreams 1.39 §256; cf. Conf. Tong. 17 §78; Heir 55 §274; Mos. 2.51 §288). The rabbis believed that there were seven classes or departments, graded according to merit, in the heavenly garden of Eden (Midr. Ps. 11 §6); the church fathers held similar views. John, however, is decidedly nonapocalyptic (the exception may be 1:51), and his treatment is much more restrained than Philo’s existential allegorizing. The rabbinic notion of a compartmentalized heaven is likewise foreign to John.

72–75 303n27
72:2 303n27
87:2 567n5
89:12–76 305n39
90:9–12 66n36
90:22–31 305n39
90:28–36 102n2
92:2 425n21
92:4 254n12
105:2 84n112
108:11 387n50

2 (Slavonic) Enoch

61:2–3 426n26

27 See Gen. 28:17; Ps. 78:23; 1 Enoch 72–75 (e.g., 72:2); 3 Bar. 6:13.

27 See Gen. 28:17; Ps. 78:23; 1 Enoch 72–75 (e.g., 72:2); 3 Bar. 6:13.

5 Dan. 10:5–6; Ezek. 9:2; Rev. 15:6; cf. 1 Enoch 87:2.

39 E.g., Jer. 10:21; 12:10; 23:1–4; Ezek. 34; Zeph. 3:3; Zech. 10:2–3; 11:4–17; 1 Enoch 89:12–76; 90:22–31; T. Gad 1:2–4.

36 Alternatively, the Baptist may have proclaimed Jesus as the apocalyptic warrior lamb who would bring judgment (e.g., 1 Enoch 90:9–12; T. Jos. 19:8; T. Ben. 3:8; Rev. 5:6, 12; 7:17); see R. Brown 1966: 59; Carson 1991: 150; and Beasley-Murray 1999: 24–25 (Schlatter [1948: 46–47] refers to both). For the Baptist’s message of judgment, see esp. Matt. 3:7–12; Luke 3:7–17. Carson (1991: 149) notes also the doubts expressed by the Baptist in Matt. 11:2–3. Other options mentioned are the gentle lamb of Jer. 11:19 (with no overtones of bearing sin); the scapegoat of Lev. 16 that symbolically bore the sins of the people and was banished to the desert (albeit not a lamb); and the guilt offering of Lev. 14 and Num. 6 sacrificed to deal with sin (though it involved bulls and goats, not lambs).

39 E.g., Jer. 10:21; 12:10; 23:1–4; Ezek. 34; Zeph. 3:3; Zech. 10:2–3; 11:4–17; 1 Enoch 89:12–76; 90:22–31; T. Gad 1:2–4.

2 For example, Ezek. 40–44; 1 Enoch 90:28–36; Ps. Sol. 17:30; 4QFlor 1:1–13; see Schnelle 1996: 368.

21 In Second Temple farewell discourses, too, encouragement not to be afraid or dejected was common (1 Enoch 92:2; T. Zeb. 10:1–2; Jub. 22:23).

12 Cf. Ps. 36:9; 56:13; Ps. Sol. 3:12 (cf. 4 Bar. 9:3); 1QS 3:7; 1 Enoch 58:3 (cf. 58:4–6; 92:4).

112 See 4QFlor 1:6–7; 1QSa 2:11–12; 1 Enoch 105:2; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 13:52; 14:9; see Carson 1991: 162. Note also that “Messiah” and “king of Israel” are juxtaposed in Mark 15:32.

50 See Morris 1995: 534. “Son of ...” reflects Hebrew idiom; the expression “sons of light,” however, is not attested in rabbinic literature. A “son of light” displays the moral qualities of “light” and has become a follower of the “light” (cf. Luke 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; Eph. 5:8). The phrase is also common in the DSS, where it designates members of the Qumran community (e.g., 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 20–21, 24–25; 4:11; 1QM 1:1, 3, 9, 11, 13). “Born of light” occurs in 1 Enoch 108:11. See also T. Naph. 2:10.

26 Apocalyptic Second Temple literature provides descriptions of heavenly dwelling places for

4 Ezra

see 2 Esdras on p. 691

Joseph and Aseneth

7:1 404n22

20:1–5 405n26

Jubilees

1:19–21 194n100, 483

1:23 70, 71

1:23–25 124

5:14 258

7:26 498n72

7:29 258

8:19 241n61

10:8 384n37

11:5 384n37

the saints (e.g., 1 Enoch 39:4–5; 41:2; 71:16; 2 Enoch 61:2–3). Note Luke 16:9, where Jesus speaks of his disciples' being "welcomed into eternal dwellings." Philo regards heaven as a paternal house or city to which the soul returns after death (Dreams 1.39 §256; cf. Conf. Tong. 17 §78; Heir 55 §274; Mos. 2.51 §288). The rabbis believed that there were seven classes or departments, graded according to merit, in the heavenly garden of Eden (Midr. Ps. 11 §6); the church fathers held similar views. John, however, is decidedly nonapocalyptic (the exception may be 1:51), and his treatment is much more restrained than Philo's existential allegorizing. The rabbinic notion of a compartmentalized heaven is likewise foreign to John.

22 See T. Abr. 3:7–9; Jos. As. 7:1. See Thomas (1991a: 35–40), who also cites instances of footwashing as part of hospitality in the Greco-Roman world (pp. 46–50).

26 For example, 1 Sam. 25:41; Jos. As. 20:1–5. See also the anecdote involving the mother of Rabbi Ishmael (d. ca. A.D. 135) recounted in Str-B 1:707.

100 See Exod. 32:11–14, 30–32; Num. 12:13; 14:19–20; 21:7; Deut. 9:18–20, 25–29. See also As. Mos. 11:17 (cf. 12:6; Jub. 1:19–21; cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 62; cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 79; Ridderbos 1997: 207; Carson 1991: 266).

72 This parting concern is attributed to Noah (Jub. 7:26), Rebecca (Jub. 35:20), Isaac (Jub. 36:4), Zebulon (T. Zeb. 8:5–9:4), Joseph (T. Jos. 17:2–3), and Dan. (T. Dan 5:3).

61 See b. Sanh. 37a; Ezek. 5:5; 38:12; Jub. 8:19.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase "prince of the world" with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title "prince of this world" occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, "Mastema" is called "chief of the spirits" or simply "prince" (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the "dominion of Belial" extends to his entire "lot" (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter's crucifixion.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase "prince of the world"

11:11 384n37
15:17 272
15:26 266
15:33 266
16:19–29 272
16:31 369
18:2 43
18:11 43
18:15 43
19:9 458n53
22:7–23 483
22:10–30 396n4
22:22 258
22:23 425n21
22:28–30 483
23:10 264
30:20 458n53

with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for “love” is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo’s (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as “my friend” (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

4 For example, Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs; Assumption of Moses; cf. Jub. 22:10–30; 1 Macc. 2:49–70; Josephus, Ant. 12.6.3 §§279–84. For Greco-Roman farewell passages, see Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 221–22.

21 In Second Temple farewell discourses, too, encouragement not to be afraid or dejected was common (1 Enoch 92:2; T. Zeb. 10:1–2; Jub. 22:23).

30:21 458n53
35:20 498n72
36:4 498n72
49:1 418n29
49:12 418n29

Letter of Aristeas

112 304n30
132–38 186n51
210 185n47

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for “love” is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo’s (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as “my friend” (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for “love” is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo’s (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as “my friend” (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

72 This parting concern is attributed to Noah (Jub. 7:26), Rebecca (Jub. 35:20), Isaac (Jub. 36:4), Zebulon (T. Zeb. 8:5–9:4), Joseph (T. Jos. 17:2–3), and Dan. (T. Dan 5:3).

72 This parting concern is attributed to Noah (Jub. 7:26), Rebecca (Jub. 35:20), Isaac (Jub. 36:4), Zebulon (T. Zeb. 8:5–9:4), Joseph (T. Jos. 17:2–3), and Dan. (T. Dan 5:3).

29 Exod. 12:8; cf. m. Zebah. 5.8. See Jeremias (1969: 44–46), who also cites Jub. 49:1, 12; t. Pesah. 1.34; and other references.

29 Exod. 12:8; cf. m. Zebah. 5.8. See Jeremias (1969: 44–46), who also cites Jub. 49:1, 12; t. Pesah. 1.34; and other references.

30 Further ancient references are found in BDAG 675, including 1 Clem. 59:4 (psalm quotation) and Barn. 16:5 (an eschatological reference, possibly adducing 1 Enoch). The term is also used in Let. Arist. 112 and Josephus, Ant. 2.2.4 §18. Note also the messianic reference in Ps. Sol. 17:40.

51 Thus, the Roman historian Tacitus writes, “the Jews conceive of one God only” (Historiae 5 §5). See Cohon (1955), who also cites affirmations of God’s uniqueness in Sib. Or. (3:11–12, 545–61); Let. Arist. (132–38); Wis. (13–15); Philo (Mos. 1.14 §75; Decal. 12–16 §§52–81); Josephus (Ant. 2.12.4 §§275–76).

47 See Gen. Rab. 11.10; Exod. Rab. 30.9, citing Isa. 6:3; Jer. 23:24. The Letter of Aristeas (second century B.C.) says that God “is continually at work in everything” (210). See also

Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah

1:3 384n37

2:4 384n37

10:29 384n37

Odes of Solomon

8:1 456n35

8:11 456n35

Eusebius, Praeparatio evangelica 13.12.11, frg. 5 (cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 267).

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

35 Similarly, Jude 21 (R. Brown 1970: 663). The noun ἀγάπη (agapē, love) occurred earlier in John’s Gospel in 5:42 and, more significantly, in 13:35. It is found four times in 15:9–13 and once in 17:26. The corresponding verb ἀγαπάω (agapaō, love) is much more frequent; twenty-six of its thirty-seven occurrences in John are in the farewell discourse. The sober use of “love” terminology distinguishes John’s Gospel from other writings such as the Odes of Solomon (e.g., 8:1, 11, 20–21).

35 Similarly, Jude 21 (R. Brown 1970: 663). The noun ἀγάπη (agapē, love) occurred earlier in John’s Gospel in 5:42 and, more significantly, in 13:35. It is found four times in 15:9–13 and once in 17:26. The corresponding verb ἀγαπάω (agapaō, love) is much more frequent; twenty-six of its thirty-seven occurrences in John are in the farewell discourse. The sober use of “love” terminology distinguishes John’s Gospel from other writings such as the Odes of Solomon (e.g.,

8:20–21 456n35
10:5–6 353n149
14:8 441n89
15:1 456n39
17:6–11 303n28
23:1 456n39
31:3 456n39

8:1, 11, 20–21).

35 Similarly, Jude 21 (R. Brown 1970: 663). The noun ἀγάπη (agapē, love) occurred earlier in John's Gospel in 5:42 and, more significantly, in 13:35. It is found four times in 15:9–13 and once in 17:26. The corresponding verb ἀγαπάω (agapaō, love) is much more frequent; twenty-six of its thirty-seven occurrences in John are in the farewell discourse. The sober use of “love” terminology distinguishes John's Gospel from other writings such as the Odes of Solomon (e.g., 8:1, 11, 20–21).

149 See also Odes Sol. 10:5–6 (cf. Beutler 1994: 399–404). On the phrase “make them one,” see commentary at 10:16; 17:21 (cf. Appold 1976: 236–45).

89 The term occurs infrequently in the OT (Ps. 51:11; Isa. 63:9–10). There are several references to the “Holy Spirit” in Second Temple literature (e.g., Wis. 9:17; Ps. Sol. 17:37; Odes Sol. 14:8). In the Gospels, the expression is used five times in Matthew (1:18, 20; 3:11; 12:32; 28:19), four times in Mark (1:8; 3:29; 12:36; 13:11), thirteen times in Luke (1:15, 35, 41, 67; 2:25, 26; 3:16, 22; 4:1; 10:21; 11:13; 12:10, 12), and three times in John (in the other two instances without the article: 1:33; 20:22). References to the “Holy Spirit” are frequent in the Book of Acts and the writings of Paul. I am puzzled by Moloney's (1998: 413) statement that “this is the only place in the NT where the expression ‘the Holy Spirit’ is found.” There are about ninety references to the Holy Spirit in the NT.

39 The theme of joy is also found elsewhere in John, in the illustration of the woman giving birth in 16:20–24 and in 17:13 (cf. 1 John 1:4; 2 John 12; see Barrett 1978: 476; R. Brown 1970: 681). The noun χάρα (chara, joy) occurs nine times in this Gospel (all but one of the references are in the farewell discourse), more than in any other NT writing (the verb χαίρω [chairō, rejoice] occurs nine times in John's Gospel as well). Similar to Jesus, Paul later expressed the hope that his joy might also be the joy of his followers (2 Cor. 2:3; cf. Phil. 2:2). As in the case of love, John's treatment of joy is remarkably restrained in comparison with other writings such as the Odes of Solomon (e.g., 15:1; 23:1; 31:3, 6; 40:4).

28 E.g., Odes Sol. 17:6–11; 42:15–18 (after A.D. 100).

39 The theme of joy is also found elsewhere in John, in the illustration of the woman giving birth in 16:20–24 and in 17:13 (cf. 1 John 1:4; 2 John 12; see Barrett 1978: 476; R. Brown 1970: 681). The noun χάρα (chara, joy) occurs nine times in this Gospel (all but one of the references are in the farewell discourse), more than in any other NT writing (the verb χαίρω [chairō, rejoice] occurs nine times in John's Gospel as well). Similar to Jesus, Paul later expressed the hope that his joy might also be the joy of his followers (2 Cor. 2:3; cf. Phil. 2:2). As in the case of love, John's treatment of joy is remarkably restrained in comparison with other writings such as the Odes of Solomon (e.g., 15:1; 23:1; 31:3, 6; 40:4).

39 The theme of joy is also found elsewhere in John, in the illustration of the woman giving birth in 16:20–24 and in 17:13 (cf. 1 John 1:4; 2 John 12; see Barrett 1978: 476; R. Brown 1970: 681). The noun χάρα (chara, joy) occurs nine times in this Gospel (all but one of the references are in

31:6 456n39
40:4 456n39
41:15 500n84
42:15–18 303n28

Pseudo-Philo

Biblical Antiquities

25.10 154n45

Sibylline Oracles

3:11–12 186n51

the farewell discourse), more than in any other NT writing (the verb χαίρω [chairō, rejoice] occurs nine times in John's Gospel as well). Similar to Jesus, Paul later expressed the hope that his joy might also be the joy of his followers (2 Cor. 2:3; cf. Phil. 2:2). As in the case of love, John's treatment of joy is remarkably restrained in comparison with other writings such as the Odes of Solomon (e.g., 15:1; 23:1; 31:3, 6; 40:4).

39 The theme of joy is also found elsewhere in John, in the illustration of the woman giving birth in 16:20–24 and in 17:13 (cf. 1 John 1:4; 2 John 12; see Barrett 1978: 476; R. Brown 1970: 681). The noun χάρα (chara, joy) occurs nine times in this Gospel (all but one of the references are in the farewell discourse), more than in any other NT writing (the verb χαίρω [chairō, rejoice] occurs nine times in John's Gospel as well). Similar to Jesus, Paul later expressed the hope that his joy might also be the joy of his followers (2 Cor. 2:3; cf. Phil. 2:2). As in the case of love, John's treatment of joy is remarkably restrained in comparison with other writings such as the Odes of Solomon (e.g., 15:1; 23:1; 31:3, 6; 40:4).

39 The theme of joy is also found elsewhere in John, in the illustration of the woman giving birth in 16:20–24 and in 17:13 (cf. 1 John 1:4; 2 John 12; see Barrett 1978: 476; R. Brown 1970: 681). The noun χάρα (chara, joy) occurs nine times in this Gospel (all but one of the references are in the farewell discourse), more than in any other NT writing (the verb χαίρω [chairō, rejoice] occurs nine times in John's Gospel as well). Similar to Jesus, Paul later expressed the hope that his joy might also be the joy of his followers (2 Cor. 2:3; cf. Phil. 2:2). As in the case of love, John's treatment of joy is remarkably restrained in comparison with other writings such as the Odes of Solomon (e.g., 15:1; 23:1; 31:3, 6; 40:4).

84 For example, Gen. Rab. 1.10; 2.5; Lev. Rab. 25.3; Num. Rab. 12.6; Deut. Rab. 10.2; As. Mos. 1:13–14. For further Jewish references, see Hauck, TDNT 3:620–21. A suggestive parallel is found in Odes Sol. 41:15, where the Messiah is said to have been “known before the foundations of the world, that he might give life to persons forever by the truth of his name.” Compare 17:6 with 17:26. Note also the strong affinity between 17:24–26 and 1 John 3:2.

28 E.g., Odes Sol. 17:6–11; 42:15–18 (after A.D. 100).

45 C. Koester (1990b: 673–74) notes that while Samaritans claimed that Moses had hidden the vessels of the tabernacle on Mount Gerizim (see Josephus, Ant. 18.4.1 §85), the Jews traced the roots of Samaritan idolatry to when Jacob's wife Rachel stole and hid her father's household gods in that place (Gen. 31:19, 34; cf. 35:4; see Gen. Rab. 81.3 [ca. A.D. 180]; Pseudo-Philo, Bib. Ant. 25.10).

51 Thus, the Roman historian Tacitus writes, “the Jews conceive of one God only” (Historiae 5

3:49 209
3:49–50 386
3:545–61 186n51
5:344–45 382n34
12:104 199n3

Testament of Abraham

3:7–9 404n22

Testament of Asher

1:8 416n20
3:2 263

Testament of Benjamin

3:8 66n36

§5). See Cohon (1955), who also cites affirmations of God’s uniqueness in Sib. Or. (3:11–12, 545–61); Let. Arist. (132–38); Wis. (13–15); Philo (Mos. 1.14 §75; Decal. 12–16 §§52–81); Josephus (Ant. 2.12.4 §§275–76).

51 Thus, the Roman historian Tacitus writes, “the Jews conceive of one God only” (Historiae 5 §5). See Cohon (1955), who also cites affirmations of God’s uniqueness in Sib. Or. (3:11–12, 545–61); Let. Arist. (132–38); Wis. (13–15); Philo (Mos. 1.14 §75; Decal. 12–16 §§52–81); Josephus (Ant. 2.12.4 §§275–76).

34 The Sibylline Oracles speak of a “heavenly crash of thunder, the voice of God” (5:344–45). The notion of heaven answering human speech in thunder is also found in the ancient Greek world (Homer, Odyssey 20.97–104 [cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 292]).

3 The name “Sea of Tiberias” is attested in first-century literature (Sib. Or. 12:104). It is also preserved in Jewish tradition (Yamma shel Tiberya [t. Sukkah 3.9]) and by the Arabs, who call the lake Bahr Tabariyeh (Avi-Yonah 1964: 143).

22 See T. Abr. 3:7–9; Jos. As. 7:1. See Thomas (1991a: 35–40), who also cites instances of footwashing as part of hospitality in the Greco-Roman world (pp. 46–50).

20 Two interesting parallels are found in T. Sim. 2:7 and T. Ash. 1:8. The DSS reveal the belief, also found in John (e.g., 8:44), that the relation between the devil and evil humans is like that of father to child (see commentary at 12:36; cf. Wis. 2:24). In Judaism in general, however, a person’s will was considered decisive in determining which of two impulses, that toward good or that toward evil, prevailed (see commentary at 8:34). The present verse is the only place in John’s Gospel where the name “Satan” is found. Elsewhere the expression is διάβολος (diabolos, devil [6:70; 8:44; 13:2]). Schlatter (1948: 287) notes that Satan entering Judas is the converse of a disciple’s “remaining in Jesus.”

36 Alternatively, the Baptist may have proclaimed Jesus as the apocalyptic warrior lamb who would bring judgment (e.g., 1 Enoch 90:9–12; T. Jos. 19:8; T. Ben. 3:8; Rev. 5:6, 12; 7:17); see R. Brown 1966: 59; Carson 1991: 150; and Beasley-Murray 1999: 24–25 (Schlatter [1948: 46–47] refers to both). For the Baptist’s message of judgment, see esp. Matt. 3:7–12; Luke 3:7–17. Carson (1991: 149) notes also the doubts expressed by the Baptist in Matt. 11:2–3. Other options mentioned are the gentle lamb of Jer. 11:19 (with no overtones of bearing sin); the scapegoat of

9:2 61n16

Testament of Dan

5:3 498n72

Testament of Gad

1:2–4 305n39

4:1–2 423n8

6:1 423n8

Testament of Isaac

8:6–7 483

p 693 Testament of Issachar

7:6–7 423n8

Testament of Jacob

8:6–9 483

Testament of Job

43:4–17 483

Testament of Joseph

17:1–2 423n8

Lev. 16 that symbolically bore the sins of the people and was banished to the desert (albeit not a lamb); and the guilt offering of Lev. 14 and Num. 6 sacrificed to deal with sin (though it involved bulls and goats, not lambs).

16 Cf. Acts 3:22; 7:37; see also 1 Macc. 4:46; 14:41; T. Ben. 9:2.

72 This parting concern is attributed to Noah (Jub. 7:26), Rebecca (Jub. 35:20), Isaac (Jub. 36:4), Zebulon (T. Zeb. 8:5–9:4), Joseph (T. Jos. 17:2–3), and Dan. (T. Dan 5:3).

39 E.g., Jer. 10:21; 12:10; 23:1–4; Ezek. 34; Zeph. 3:3; Zech. 10:2–3; 11:4–17; 1 Enoch 89:12–76; 90:22–31; T. Gad 1:2–4.

8 For example, m. Abot 1.12. There are also several parallels in Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (T. Gad 4:1–2; 6:1; T. Zeb. 5:1; 8:5; T. Jos. 17:1–2; T. Iss. 7:6–7; T. Sim. 4:7; T. Reub. 6:9).

8 For example, m. Abot 1.12. There are also several parallels in Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (T. Gad 4:1–2; 6:1; T. Zeb. 5:1; 8:5; T. Jos. 17:1–2; T. Iss. 7:6–7; T. Sim. 4:7; T. Reub. 6:9).

8 For example, m. Abot 1.12. There are also several parallels in Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (T. Gad 4:1–2; 6:1; T. Zeb. 5:1; 8:5; T. Jos. 17:1–2; T. Iss. 7:6–7; T. Sim. 4:7; T. Reub. 6:9).

17:2–3 498n72
19:8 66n36

Testament of Judah

20 438
24 83n106
24:1 267n79
24:1–3 70
24:2–3 70
24:3 71
19:4 263

Testament of Levi

18:2 272n100
18:2–14 70
18:6 272n100, 382n29

8 For example, m. Abot 1.12. There are also several parallels in Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (T. Gad 4:1–2; 6:1; T. Zeb. 5:1; 8:5; T. Jos. 17:1–2; T. Iss. 7:6–7; T. Sim. 4:7; T. Reub. 6:9).

72 This parting concern is attributed to Noah (Jub. 7:26), Rebecca (Jub. 35:20), Isaac (Jub. 36:4), Zebulun (T. Zeb. 8:5–9:4), Joseph (T. Jos. 17:2–3), and Dan. (T. Dan 5:3).

36 Alternatively, the Baptist may have proclaimed Jesus as the apocalyptic warrior lamb who would bring judgment (e.g., 1 Enoch 90:9–12; T. Jos. 19:8; T. Ben. 3:8; Rev. 5:6, 12; 7:17); see R. Brown 1966: 59; Carson 1991: 150; and Beasley-Murray 1999: 24–25 (Schlatter [1948: 46–47] refers to both). For the Baptist’s message of judgment, see esp. Matt. 3:7–12; Luke 3:7–17. Carson (1991: 149) notes also the doubts expressed by the Baptist in Matt. 11:2–3. Other options mentioned are the gentle lamb of Jer. 11:19 (with no overtones of bearing sin); the scapegoat of Lev. 16 that symbolically bore the sins of the people and was banished to the desert (albeit not a lamb); and the guilt offering of Lev. 14 and Num. 6 sacrificed to deal with sin (though it involved bulls and goats, not lambs).

106 The DSS and other Jewish and early Christian texts indicate that the term “Branch” was a familiar designation for the Davidic messiah (4QFlor 10–12a; 4QP Bless; 4QpIsa^a 8–10; T. Jud. 24; Rev. 5:5). The DSS also show that the “Branch” was identified as God’s “son” and king over Israel (C. Koester 1990a: 27–30).

79 Alluding to this passage, the Testament of Judah speaks of the “Star from Jacob,” in whom “will be found no sin” (24:1 [Christian interpolation?]).

100 It has been suggested (e.g., Michaels 1989: 153; cf. Brodie 1993: 335) that the reference here may be to Abraham’s rejoicing when he announced to Isaac on the way to the sacrifice, “God himself will provide the lamb for the burnt offering, my son” (Gen. 22:8). See also T. Levi 18:2, 6 (cf. 18:14; Matt. 8:11).

100 It has been suggested (e.g., Michaels 1989: 153; cf. Brodie 1993: 335) that the reference here may be to Abraham’s rejoicing when he announced to Isaac on the way to the sacrifice, “God himself will provide the lamb for the burnt offering, my son” (Gen. 22:8). See also T. Levi 18:2, 6 (cf. 18:14; Matt. 8:11).

18:14 272n100

Testament of Naphtali

2:10 387n50

5:4 369

Testament of Reuben

1:3 423

6:9 423n8

Testament of Simeon

2:7 416n20

4:7 423n8

29 The other two occasions are Jesus' baptism and his transfiguration: Matt. 3:17 pars.; 17:5 pars.; cf. 2 Pet. 1:17. Old Testament references to the "voice from heaven" include 1 Sam. 3:4, 6, 8; 1 Kings 19:13; Dan. 4:31–32. For other examples of a "heavenly voice" in Jewish literature, see 1 Enoch 65:4; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 6:13, 17; 2 Bar. 13:1; 22:1; T. Levi 18:6. See also Acts 9:4–6; 11:7, 9–10; Rev. 10:4, 8; 11:12; 14:2, 13; 18:4; 19:5; 21:3. Evans (1981) notes the affinity of John 12:28 with Isa. 52–53.

100 It has been suggested (e.g., Michaels 1989: 153; cf. Brodie 1993: 335) that the reference here may be to Abraham's rejoicing when he announced to Isaac on the way to the sacrifice, "God himself will provide the lamb for the burnt offering, my son" (Gen. 22:8). See also T. Levi 18:2, 6 (cf. 18:14; Matt. 8:11).

50 See Morris 1995: 534. "Son of ..." reflects Hebrew idiom; the expression "sons of light," however, is not attested in rabbinic literature. A "son of light" displays the moral qualities of "light" and has become a follower of the "light" (cf. Luke 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; Eph. 5:8). The phrase is also common in the DSS, where it designates members of the Qumran community (e.g., 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 20–21, 24–25; 4:11; 1QM 1:1, 3, 9, 11, 13). "Born of light" occurs in 1 Enoch 108:11. See also T. Naph. 2:10.

8 For example, m. Abot 1.12. There are also several parallels in Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (T. Gad 4:1–2; 6:1; T. Zeb. 5:1; 8:5; T. Jos. 17:1–2; T. Iss. 7:6–7; T. Sim. 4:7; T. Reub. 6:9).

20 Two interesting parallels are found in T. Sim. 2:7 and T. Ash. 1:8. The DSS reveal the belief, also found in John (e.g., 8:44), that the relation between the devil and evil humans is like that of father to child (see commentary at 12:36; cf. Wis. 2:24). In Judaism in general, however, a person's will was considered decisive in determining which of two impulses, that toward good or that toward evil, prevailed (see commentary at 8:34). The present verse is the only place in John's Gospel where the name "Satan" is found. Elsewhere the expression is διάβολος (diabolos, devil [6:70; 8:44; 13:2]). Schlatter (1948: 287) notes that Satan entering Judas is the converse of a disciple's "remaining in Jesus."

8 For example, m. Abot 1.12. There are also several parallels in Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (T. Gad 4:1–2; 6:1; T. Zeb. 5:1; 8:5; T. Jos. 17:1–2; T. Iss. 7:6–7; T. Sim. 4:7; T. Reub. 6:9).

Testament of Zebulun

5:1 423n8

8:5 423n8

8:5–9:4 498n72

10:1–2 425n21

New Testament Apocrypha

Clementine Homilies

19.22 17n28

Gospel of Thomas

24 330n34

31 168n5

8 For example, m. Abot 1.12. There are also several parallels in Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (T. Gad 4:1–2; 6:1; T. Zeb. 5:1; 8:5; T. Jos. 17:1–2; T. Iss. 7:6–7; T. Sim. 4:7; T. Reub. 6:9).

8 For example, m. Abot 1.12. There are also several parallels in Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (T. Gad 4:1–2; 6:1; T. Zeb. 5:1; 8:5; T. Jos. 17:1–2; T. Iss. 7:6–7; T. Sim. 4:7; T. Reub. 6:9).

72 This parting concern is attributed to Noah (Jub. 7:26), Rebecca (Jub. 35:20), Isaac (Jub. 36:4), Zebulun (T. Zeb. 8:5–9:4), Joseph (T. Jos. 17:2–3), and Dan. (T. Dan 5:3).

21 In Second Temple farewell discourses, too, encouragement not to be afraid or dejected was common (1 Enoch 92:2; T. Zeb. 10:1–2; Jub. 22:23).

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon's work is given extensive coverage in Origen's commentary on John's Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John's Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάπξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that “the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel's] use”; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges “the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

34 E.g., 1QH 17:26. A similar statement is found in Gos. Thom. 24. A possible OT parallel is Jer. 13:16.

5 John may assume here his readers' familiarity with Synoptic tradition, according to which

Unknown Gospel

1.63 413n9

Nag HammadiGospel of Truth

22:3–4 258

25:35–26:1 258

35:1–2 258

Rabbinic WritingsBabylonian TalmudAbodah Zarah*

5a 315n84

8b 518n37

Jesus was rejected in his native Galilee, including Nazareth (Matt. 13:53–58 par.; Luke 4:16–30; cf. Matt. 11:19 par.). Other instances in which John appears to expect his readers' familiarity with Synoptic tradition include 1:40; 3:24; 6:67; 11:1–2. The present saying is found also in Gos. Thom. 31 and P.Oxy. 1.6 (van Belle 1998: 27–44). Michaels (1989: 78–79) links the present “welcome” to the Didache guideline that itinerant teachers not stay in a locale more than two days (cf. John 4:40). However, this seems to be both anachronistic and contextually far-fetched. 27 See further Matt. 3:10 par.; 13:30; cf. Gos. Thom. 40. Similar imagery is used in Heb. 6:8. The word ξηραίνω (xērainō, wither) is used only here in this Gospel.

9 This is the only instance of the verb ἀπορέω (aporeō, be at a loss) in this Gospel. The verb's other NT occurrences convey the notion of perplexity (Mark 6:20; Luke 24:4 [cf. 21:25]; Acts 25:20; 2 Cor. 4:8; Gal. 4:20). See also 1 Macc. 3:31; Josephus, Ant. 2.12.2 §271; Life 32 §161; the “Unknown Gospel” 1.63 (mid-second century A.D.) (see Bell and Skeat 1935: 13).

84 See b. Abod. Zar. 5a. For a variation of the first view, see Jungkuntz 1964; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311; Morris 1995: 467; Beasley-Murray 1999: 176–77. The second position is held by Emerton 1960; 1966. For a variation of the third view, see Hanson 1964–65; 1967. See further Oepke, TDNT 4:1022–32, 1054–55. Most major commentators seem to favor the third view as well (e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 373; Carson 1991: 398; Barrett 1978: 384; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.311).

37 A mishnaic source specifies the chamber of hewn stone on the south side of the temple court (m. Mid. 5.4), while the Babylonian Talmud indicates that the Sanhedrin ceased meeting in this location “forty years” (not necessarily a literal time marker [e.g., b. Yoma 39a]) prior to the

19b 373n29
28b 286
40b 349

Baba Batra

9a 284
9b 284
126b 283

Baba Meši'a

59b 208n49
83b 547n39
85a 373n29

Bekorot

47a 124n30

Berakot

6b 292n67
7b 405
28b 288
34b 171n17

destruction of the temple, moving to the marketplace (b. Šabb. 15a; b. Sanh. 41b; b. Abod. Zar. 8b).

29 So it is said that “the whole world would not have room for the books that would be written” if all Jesus did was recorded (a possible inclusio with 12:19); that the early Christians “have caused trouble all over the world” (Acts 17:6); that “all the world know[s] that the city of Ephesus is the guardian of the temple of the great Artemis” (Acts 19:35); that “all over the world this gospel is bearing fruit and growing” (Col. 1:6); that “all the world” followed the high priest (b. Yoma 71b); that Hezekiah taught the Torah to “the whole world” (b. Sanh. 101b); that “the people [lit., ‘the world’] were flocking to David” (b. B. Meši'a 85a; cf. 2 Sam. 15:13); and that “all the people [lit., ‘world’] came and gathered around” a certain rabbi (b. Abod. Zar. 19b).

49 Cf. Exod. Rab. 9.1; b. B. Meši'a 59b. Some of the rabbis, however, remained critical toward such signs (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.39–40).

39 According to one talmudic passage, a rabbi stood under the gallows of a hanged disciple and wept (b. B. Meši'a 83b; see Stauffer 1960: 111–12, 179 n. 1).

29 So it is said that “the whole world would not have room for the books that would be written” if all Jesus did was recorded (a possible inclusio with 12:19); that the early Christians “have caused trouble all over the world” (Acts 17:6); that “all the world know[s] that the city of Ephesus is the guardian of the temple of the great Artemis” (Acts 19:35); that “all over the world this gospel is bearing fruit and growing” (Col. 1:6); that “all the world” followed the high priest (b. Yoma 71b); that Hezekiah taught the Torah to “the whole world” (b. Sanh. 101b); that “the people [lit., ‘the world’] were flocking to David” (b. B. Meši'a 85a; cf. 2 Sam. 15:13); and that “all the people [lit., ‘world’] came and gathered around” a certain rabbi (b. Abod. Zar. 19b).

30 Thus, Rabbi Yose ben Halafta (ca. A.D. 130–160) said, “One who has become a proselyte is like a child newly born” (b. Yebam. 48b; cf. 22a; 62a; 97b; b. Bek. 47a).

67 There are also rabbinic parallels (b. Ber. 6b; Exod. Rab. 21.3; cf. Isa. 65:24).

46b 415n15

50b 202

52b 202

58a 292

63a 488n20

Beṣah

32b 264

Erubin

31b–32a 188

Giṭṭin

7b 418

56a 118

Ḥullin

105b 202n20

Ketubbot

8b 346n121

66b 118

96a 65, 405n25, 546n29

17 On the unusual nature of Jesus' signs selected by John, see commentary at 2:10. A similar remarkable incident (that of the healing of the centurion's servant in Capernaum) is narrated in Matt. 8:5–13 par. Vermes (1972–73) seeks to adduce parallels with the first-century Jewish miracle worker and faith healer Ḥanina ben Dosa (cf. b. Ber. 34b; much more cautious is Bokser 1985). However, as Meier (1994: 581–88, citing Freyne 1980) points out, not only is Ḥanina ben Dosa not mentioned in Josephus, but also none of the three mishnaic references attribute miracle-working power to him; this takes place only in the talmudic tradition. Hence, all that can be said confidently about the "historical" Ḥanina is that he probably was a first-century Palestinian Jew who was noted for his efficacious prayers over the sick; there is not even early historical evidence linking him to Galilee.

15 "The senior takes his place first, the second next above him, and then the third one below him" (b. Ber. 46b).

20 These ties are most pronounced in the OT (e.g., Jer. 31:34). Hosea records the divine lament "My people are destroyed from lack of knowledge" (Hos. 4:6), while both Isaiah and Habakkuk envision a future day when "the earth will be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. 11:9; Hab. 2:14). God's people are to acknowledge him in all their ways (Prov. 3:6) and to live lives of wisdom (the message of the OT Book of Proverbs, see Prov. 1:1–7). The principle of wise living is affirmed also in later rabbinic teaching (see b. Ber. 63a, citing Prov. 3:6; Cant. Rab. 1.4 §1, citing Hos. 4:6; b. Mak. 24a, citing Hab. 2:4).

20 This reflects the views of Rabbis Hillel and Yohanan (cf. b. Ḥul. 105b, attributed to Abaye [ca. A.D. 280–339]). The expression "so that nothing may perish" is also documented in rabbinic literature with reference to food (y. Sanh. 6.6; y. Hag. 2.2; see Köstenberger 2002c: 65).

Regarding Jewish care with respect to food, see E. Johnston 1962: 153–54; Daube 1956: 42.

121 About A.D. 90; see b. Ketub. 8b; b. Mo'ed Qaṭ. 27b.

99b 188
111b 346

Makkot

5b 437
24a 488n20

Megillah

18b 193n92
31a 240

Menahot

3a 546n29

Mo'ed Qatan

25 b. Ketub. 96a; Mek. Exod. 21.2 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 131).

29 The double perfect of γέγραφα (gegrapha, I have written) conveys a sense of finality, portraying Pilate's action as a fait accompli (Ridderbos 1997: 609 n. 134; Morris 1995: 714 n. 54). Bultmann (1971: 670 n. 2 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 902]) suggests that the first perfect is aoristic; Wallace (1996: 577) lists 19:22 as an example of an extensive perfect focusing on the completion of an action in the past. Similar word combinations are found also in the LXX (Gen. 43:14; Esth. 4:16; 1 Macc. 13:38) and in rabbinic literature (b. Menah. 3a; b. Ketub. 96a; b. Yebam. 106b) (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; further instances are cited in Schlatter 1948: 349). Perhaps significantly, similar phrases are found also in a Roman context (note Cicero, Epistulae ad Quintum fratrem 1.2.2; 1.2.13: scripsi, scripsi). Keener's (2003: 1138) observation that every other instance of "written" in this Gospel refers to Scripture (2:17; 6:31, 45; 8:17; 10:34; 12:14, 16; 15:25), which cannot be broken (10:35), seems of doubtful relevance here.

20 These ties are most pronounced in the OT (e.g., Jer. 31:34). Hosea records the divine lament "My people are destroyed from lack of knowledge" (Hos. 4:6), while both Isaiah and Habakkuk envision a future day when "the earth will be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. 11:9; Hab. 2:14). God's people are to acknowledge him in all their ways (Prov. 3:6) and to live lives of wisdom (the message of the OT Book of Proverbs, see Prov. 1:1–7). The principle of wise living is affirmed also in later rabbinic teaching (see b. Ber. 63a, citing Prov. 3:6; Cant. Rab. 1.4 §1, citing Hos. 4:6; b. Mak. 24a, citing Hab. 2:4).

92 See Kenyon 1939: 38 (cited in Morris 1995: 292 n. 118). See also b. Meg. 18b (cf. Köstenberger 2002c: 61–62).

29 The double perfect of γέγραφα (gegrapha, I have written) conveys a sense of finality, portraying Pilate's action as a fait accompli (Ridderbos 1997: 609 n. 134; Morris 1995: 714 n. 54). Bultmann (1971: 670 n. 2 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 902]) suggests that the first perfect is aoristic; Wallace (1996: 577) lists 19:22 as an example of an extensive perfect focusing on the completion of an action in the past. Similar word combinations are found also in the LXX (Gen. 43:14; Esth. 4:16; 1 Macc. 13:38) and in rabbinic literature (b. Menah. 3a; b. Ketub. 96a; b. Yebam. 106b) (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; further instances are cited in Schlatter 1948: 349). Perhaps significantly, similar phrases are found also in a Roman context (note Cicero, Epistulae ad Quintum fratrem 1.2.2; 1.2.13: scripsi, scripsi). Keener's (2003: 1138) observation that every other instance of "written" in this Gospel refers to Scripture (2:17; 6:31, 45; 8:17; 10:34; 12:14, 16; 15:25), which cannot be broken (10:35), seems of doubtful relevance here.

27a 346, 563
27b 334, 346n121

Nedarim

30b 362n18

Niddah

64a 152

Pesah\im

57a 506n16, 513n10
91a 530n42
109a 93
118a 539n88

Šabbat

15a 518n37

121 About A.D. 90; see b. Ketub. 8b; b. Mo'ed Qaṭ. 27b.

18 See further Coakley (1988: 250 n. 51), who cites additional primary and secondary literature. Apparently, for a married woman to let down her hair in public constituted grounds for divorce (t. Soṭah 5.9; y. Giṭ. 9.50d; cf. b. Yoma 47a; m. Ketub. 7.6; Num. Rab. 9.16; more general, b. Ned. 30b; but see m. Ketub. 2.1). Yet note the conclusion by Coakley: “But none of these passages touches the question of what an unmarried woman might decently do in a neighbor’s house among friends” (ibid.).

16 Their arms and methods are recalled in a “street-ballad” (see Köstenberger 2002c: 157, following Klausner 1925: 337); various versions circulated, depending on the high priests targeted (cf. b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.21).

10 See m. Hor. 3.4; cf. m. Meg. 1.9; m. Mak. 2.6; t. Yoma 1.4. See also Luke 3:2, where the appearance of John the Baptist is placed “during the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas.” Josephus indicates that it was customary for former high priests to continue to be called by that term (J.W. 4.3.7 §151; 4.3.9 §160; see Ridderbos 1997: 579; Moloney 1998: 490; Pancaro 1975: 66–67). The family is mentioned several times in later Jewish writings; it was noted not only for its great size, wealth, and power (b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.18), but also for its greed (see the street-ballad referred to in commentary at 18:3). Its wealth is reported later to have been destroyed by the Zealots.

42 The practice may go back to Hasmonean times and may have been continued by the Romans after taking over Palestine. See Josephus, Ant. 20.9.3 §209; Livy, Roman History 5.13; b. Pesah. 91a. See Blinzler 1959: 218–21.

88 Several commentators (e.g., Kruse 2003: 365; Keener 2003: 1132, referring to Meeks 1967: 77 citing b. Pesah. 118a) add that the Jews concluded the Greater Hallel in the Passover haggadah with the prayer “From everlasting to everlasting, you are God; beside you we have no king, redeemer, or savior; no liberator, deliverer, provider. ... We have no King but you.”

37 A mishnaic source specifies the chamber of hewn stone on the south side of the temple court (m. Mid. 5.4), while the Babylonian Talmud indicates that the Sanhedrin ceased meeting in this location “forty years” (not necessarily a literal time marker [e.g., b. Yoma 39a]) prior to the destruction of the temple, moving to the marketplace (b. Šabb. 15a; b. Sanh. 41b; b. Abod. Zar. 8b).

55a 182, 281
128a 262
151b 282, 284

Sanhedrin

11a 382n32
11b 239
37a 241n61
38b 329n31
41a 83
41b 518n37
43a 80, 232, 269n86, 510n3, 516
90a 292
p 694 90b 335n64, 378
98a 372n21
99a 217

32 “Since the death of the last prophets, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, the Holy Spirit [of prophetic inspiration] departed from Israel; yet they were still able to avail themselves of the bath qol” (b. Sanh. 11a; cf. t. Soṭah 13.3; see Barrett 1970: 39–40; Dalman 1902: 204–5).

61 See b. Sanh. 37a; Ezek. 5:5; 38:12; Jub. 8:19.

31 Stibbe (1994: 51) paraphrases as follows: “I can return to Judea because the hour for my death (the hour of darkness) is not quite upon us. I will therefore not be killed (‘stumble’) at Bethany because I am still ministering in a season of pre-ordained security (daylight).” The saying is not without Jewish parallels (e.g., b. Sanh. 38b). Pollard (1973: 438, following Henderson 1920–21) somewhat implausibly suggests that the present statement indicates that Jesus “waited for light,” that is, divine guidance, and hence the delay. But see the critique in Moule 1975: 118–20.

37 A mishnaic source specifies the chamber of hewn stone on the south side of the temple court (m. Mid. 5.4), while the Babylonian Talmud indicates that the Sanhedrin ceased meeting in this location “forty years” (not necessarily a literal time marker [e.g., b. Yoma 39a]) prior to the destruction of the temple, moving to the marketplace (b. Šabb. 15a; b. Sanh. 41b; b. Abod. Zar. 8b).

86 See Acts 8:9–11; Justin, 1 Apol. 26.1–5; b. Sanh. 43a.

3 The earliest references to Jesus’ death in Jewish literature frankly acknowledge involvement in the crucifixion (see esp. b. Sanh. 43a). Josephus’s “Testimonium Flavianum” states that Jesus was “accused by men of the highest standing amongst us” (Ant. 18.3.3 §64).

64 The resurrection of the dead was the subject of lively debate between the Pharisees and their opponents (e.g., b. Sanh. 90b, referring to Deut. 31:16; Isa. 26:19; and Song 7:9). Other mishnaic passages likewise denounce those who refuse to affirm the resurrection of the dead (m. Sanh. 10.1; cf. m. Ber. 9.5). Belief in the resurrection is also evident from the second of the Eighteen Benedictions: “Lord, you are almighty forever, who makes the dead alive. . . . Blessed are you, Lord, who makes the dead alive” (cf. m. Ber. 5.2; m. Soṭah 9.15; see Schürer 1973–79: 2.456).

21 Though the rabbis had difficulty reconciling this humble notion of the Messiah with that of the Danielic Son of Man “coming on the clouds of heaven” (b. Sanh. 98a). However, riding on a donkey does appear as one of the three signs of the Messiah in Eccles. Rab. 1.9, where the latter redeemer in Zech. 9:9 is featured as the counterpart to Moses in Exod. 4:20.

101b 373n29

106b 411n3

Soṭah

8a 362

22a 233n24, 269n87

47a 232

Sukkah

37b 369

48b 240n52

49b 364

52a 554

Ta'anit

2a 187n61

22a 379

Yebamot

22a 124n30

48b 124n30

62a 124n30

64b 152

77a 49

29 So it is said that “the whole world would not have room for the books that would be written” if all Jesus did was recorded (a possible inclusio with 12:19); that the early Christians “have caused trouble all over the world” (Acts 17:6); that “all the world know[s] that the city of Ephesus is the guardian of the temple of the great Artemis” (Acts 19:35); that “all over the world this gospel is bearing fruit and growing” (Col. 1:6); that “all the world” followed the high priest (b. Yoma 71b); that Hezekiah taught the Torah to “the whole world” (b. Sanh. 101b); that “the people [lit., ‘the world’] were flocking to David” (b. B. Meṣi'a 85a; cf. 2 Sam. 15:13); and that “all the people [lit., ‘world’] came and gathered around” a certain rabbi (b. Abod. Zar. 19b).

3 See b. Sanh. 106b; cf. 2 Sam. 15:12.

24 In the post-Jamnia period (after ca. A.D. 90), the term “rabbi” came to refer exclusively to those who had undergone formal rabbinic training. See b. Soṭah 22a (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 74–75; cf. Str-B 2:486; Beasley-Murray 1999: 108). See also commentary at 7:49.

87 b. Soṭah 22a; the rabbis are Eleazar (A.D. 80–120), Jannai (ca. A.D. 240), and Ah.a b. Jacob (ca. A.D. 300).

52 See Josephus, Ant. 11.5.5 §157; b. Sukkah 48b; m. Sukkah 5.6; 2 Macc. 10:6.

61 Cf. b. Ta'an. 2a (attributed to Rabbi Yohanan, ca. A.D. 70 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 58]) and the Shemoneh Esreh (ca. A.D. 70–100 [cited in Schürer 1973–79: 2.455–63]).

30 Thus, Rabbi Yose ben Ḥalafta (ca. A.D. 130–160) said, “One who has become a proselyte is like a child newly born” (b. Yebam. 48b; cf. 22a; 62a; 97b; b. Bek. 47a).

30 Thus, Rabbi Yose ben Ḥalafta (ca. A.D. 130–160) said, “One who has become a proselyte is like a child newly born” (b. Yebam. 48b; cf. 22a; 62a; 97b; b. Bek. 47a).

30 Thus, Rabbi Yose ben Ḥalafta (ca. A.D. 130–160) said, “One who has become a proselyte is like a child newly born” (b. Yebam. 48b; cf. 22a; 62a; 97b; b. Bek. 47a).

97b 124n30
105b 344n116
106b 546n29

Yoma

4a 291n59
9b 467n18
28a 261
39a 518n37
47a 362n18

30 Thus, Rabbi Yose ben Halafta (ca. A.D. 130–160) said, “One who has become a proselyte is like a child newly born” (b. Yebam. 48b; cf. 22a; 62a; 97b; b. Bek. 47a).

116 Cf. 1 Esdr. 4:58; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162. Hunter (1985: 58, citing Dodd 1963: 183; Fortna 1970: 83) notes that “first-century Jewish custom dictated that ‘prayers were generally said with downcast eyes’ ” (cf. Ps. 131:1a; b. Yebam. 105b).

29 The double perfect of γέγραφα (gegrapha, I have written) conveys a sense of finality, portraying Pilate’s action as a fait accompli (Ridderbos 1997: 609 n. 134; Morris 1995: 714 n. 54). Bultmann (1971: 670 n. 2 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 902]) suggests that the first perfect is aoristic; Wallace (1996: 577) lists 19:22 as an example of an extensive perfect focusing on the completion of an action in the past. Similar word combinations are found also in the LXX (Gen. 43:14; Esth. 4:16; 1 Macc. 13:38) and in rabbinic literature (b. Menah. 3a; b. Ketub. 96a; b. Yebam. 106b) (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; further instances are cited in Schlatter 1948: 349). Perhaps significantly, similar phrases are found also in a Roman context (note Cicero, Epistulae ad Quintum fratrem 1.2.2; 1.2.13: scripsi, scripsi). Keener’s (2003: 1138) observation that every other instance of “written” in this Gospel refers to Scripture (2:17; 6:31, 45; 8:17; 10:34; 12:14, 16; 15:25), which cannot be broken (10:35), seems of doubtful relevance here.

59 The perceptive reader will note that the Pharaisees’ claim to being disciples of Moses is refuted by the earlier statement in 5:45–47 (Keener 2003: 791). There is some debate as to how common this self-designation was among the Jews of Jesus’ day (cf., e.g., Matt. 23:2). In b. Yoma 4a, it is applied to Pharisees as opposed to Sadducees. In m. Abot 5.19, Jews are referred to as “the disciples of Abraham,” while Christians are dismissed as “the disciples of Balaam the wicked” (that is, Jesus!). Schnackenburg (1990: 2.251) and Ridderbos (1997: 345 n. 287, referring to TDNT 4:443) consider this to be a characteristic rabbinic self-designation, while Carson (1991: 373–74, apparently following Barrett 1978: 362–63) says that this self-designation was not common.

18 So Ridderbos 1997: 525–26; Barrett 1978: 482; Carson 1991: 527; Beasley-Murray 1999: 276; contra Moloney (1998: 434), who contends that “most” favor Ps. 35. Cf. the citation of Ps. 69:9 in John 2:17. See also Ps. 119:161. Extrabiblical parallels include Ps. Sol. 7:1; b. Yoma 9b (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 147; cf. Barrett 1978: 482; R. Brown 1970: 689).

37 A mishnaic source specifies the chamber of hewn stone on the south side of the temple court (m. Mid. 5.4), while the Babylonian Talmud indicates that the Sanhedrin ceased meeting in this location “forty years” (not necessarily a literal time marker [e.g., b. Yoma 39a]) prior to the destruction of the temple, moving to the marketplace (b. Šabb. 15a; b. Sanh. 41b; b. Abod. Zar. 8b).

18 See further Coakley (1988: 250 n. 51), who cites additional primary and secondary literature. Apparently, for a married woman to let down her hair in public constituted grounds for divorce

Jerusalem TalmudBerakot

2.7 495n55

8.5 148n26

Giṭṭin

9.50d 362n18

Ḥagigah

2.1 73

2.2 203n20

Pe.ah

1.1 495n55

(t. Soṭah 5.9; y. Giṭ. 9.50d; cf. b. Yoma 47a; m. Ketub. 7.6; Num. Rab. 9.16; more general, b. Ned. 30b; but see m. Ketub. 2.1). Yet note the conclusion by Coakley: “But none of these passages touches the question of what an unmarried woman might decently do in a neighbor’s house among friends” (ibid.).

29 So it is said that “the whole world would not have room for the books that would be written” if all Jesus did was recorded (a possible inclusio with 12:19); that the early Christians “have caused trouble all over the world” (Acts 17:6); that “all the world know[s] that the city of Ephesus is the guardian of the temple of the great Artemis” (Acts 19:35); that “all over the world this gospel is bearing fruit and growing” (Col. 1:6); that “all the world” followed the high priest (b. Yoma 71b); that Hezekiah taught the Torah to “the whole world” (b. Sanh. 101b); that “the people [lit., ‘the world’] were flocking to David” (b. B. Meṣi. a 85a; cf. 2 Sam. 15:13); and that “all the people [lit., ‘world’] came and gathered around” a certain rabbi (b. Abod. Zar. 19b).
 55 Parallel wordings are attested in rabbinic literature for both “take out of this world” (y. Ber. 2.7) and “protect from the evil one” (y. Pe.ah 1.1; Deut. Rab. 4.4 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 210 nn. 519–20]; cf. Ps. 140:1; Matt. 6:13).

26 See y. Šeb. 9.9; Lam. Rab. 3.17; y. Ber. 8.5; t. Ber. 6.4–5. See also Köstenberger 1998a: 122.

18 See further Coakley (1988: 250 n. 51), who cites additional primary and secondary literature. Apparently, for a married woman to let down her hair in public constituted grounds for divorce (t. Soṭah 5.9; y. Giṭ. 9.50d; cf. b. Yoma 47a; m. Ketub. 7.6; Num. Rab. 9.16; more general, b. Ned. 30b; but see m. Ketub. 2.1). Yet note the conclusion by Coakley: “But none of these passages touches the question of what an unmarried woman might decently do in a neighbor’s house among friends” (ibid.).

20 This reflects the views of Rabbis Hillel and Yohanan (cf. b. Hul. 105b, attributed to Abaye [ca. A.D. 280–339]). The expression “so that nothing may perish” is also documented in rabbinic literature with reference to food (y. Sanh. 6.6; y. Hag. 2.2; see Köstenberger 2002c: 65).

Regarding Jewish care with respect to food, see E. Johnston 1962: 153–54; Daube 1956: 42.

55 Parallel wordings are attested in rabbinic literature for both “take out of this world” (y. Ber. 2.7) and “protect from the evil one” (y. Pe.ah 1.1; Deut. Rab. 4.4 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 210 nn. 519–20]; cf. Ps. 140:1; Matt. 6:13).

Pesaḥim

9.5 529n41

Sanhedrin

1.1 526n21

6.6 203n20

7.2 526n21

11.3 404

Šebi.it

9.9 148n26

Terumot

8.10 352n142

Mekilta Exodus

15.11 237n38

15.26 220

16.32 117n7

41 The expression refers to the entire festival in Deut. 16:1–2; Ezek. 45:21; Luke 2:41; 22:1; John 2:13, 23; 6:4; 11:55; Acts 12:4; Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §213; cf. y. Pesaḥ. 9.5 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 212 n. 577).

21 Barrett 1978: 533–35; Morris 1995: 695–97; Hengel 1999: 330; Winter 1974. See especially the references in Josephus (J.W. 2.8.1 §117; Ant. 20.9.1 §§197–203 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 164]). Cf. the acknowledgment in talmudic literature that the Jews had lost this power “forty years” before the destruction of Jerusalem (y. Sanh. 1.1; 7.2; on “forty years,” see commentary at 18:24 above; loss of this power may have occurred as early as A.D. 6; see also Legasse 1997: 54–56).

20 This reflects the views of Rabbis Hillel and Yohanan (cf. b. Hul. 105b, attributed to Abaye [ca. A.D. 280–339]). The expression “so that nothing may perish” is also documented in rabbinic literature with reference to food (y. Sanh. 6.6; y. Hag. 2.2; see Köstenberger 2002c: 65).

Regarding Jewish care with respect to food, see E. Johnston 1962: 153–54; Daube 1956: 42.

21 Barrett 1978: 533–35; Morris 1995: 695–97; Hengel 1999: 330; Winter 1974. See especially the references in Josephus (J.W. 2.8.1 §117; Ant. 20.9.1 §§197–203 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 164]). Cf. the acknowledgment in talmudic literature that the Jews had lost this power “forty years” before the destruction of Jerusalem (y. Sanh. 1.1; 7.2; on “forty years,” see commentary at 18:24 above; loss of this power may have occurred as early as A.D. 6; see also Legasse 1997: 54–56).

26 See y. Šeb. 9.9; Lam. Rab. 3.17; y. Ber. 8.5; t. Ber. 6.4–5. See also Köstenberger 1998a: 122.

142 The same case is taken up in the Jerusalem Talmud (y. Ter. 8.10). Another incident involved Ulla the son of Kōsher, who was wanted by the government (Gen. Rab. 94.9; see also Gen. Rab. 91.10 on Gen. 48:10 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 117]). Cf. Daube 1966a: 18–47. M. Barker (1970) links Caiaphas’s words with current messianic expectations.

38 Schlatter (1948: 197, citing Mek. Exod. 15.11), refers to the “Jewish view,” “the more miracles, the more grounds for faith.”

7 See 1 Sam. 16:7; 1 Chron. 28:9; Ps. 139:1–18, 23–24; Jer. 17:10; Rom. 8:27; Heb. 4:12–13;

Midrash Psalms

11 §6 426n26
 78 §5 316n92
 90 §4 353
 91.7 154
 118.22 370

Midrash Qohelet

5.11 §2 83
 7.1 362n19

Midrash Rabbah

Genesis Rabbah

1.10 500n84
 1.14 193n93
 2.5 500n84

Wis. 1:6; Ps. Sol. 14:8; 17:25. Barrett (1978: 202) further cites Mek. Exod. 16.32: “There is no man who knows what is in his neighbor’s heart.”

25 b. Ketub. 96a; Mek. Exod. 21.2 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 131).

26 Apocalyptic Second Temple literature provides descriptions of heavenly dwelling places for the saints (e.g., 1 Enoch 39:4–5; 41:2; 71:16; 2 Enoch 61:2–3). Note Luke 16:9, where Jesus speaks of his disciples’ being “welcomed into eternal dwellings.” Philo regards heaven as a paternal house or city to which the soul returns after death (Dreams 1.39 §256; cf. Conf. Tong. 17 §78; Heir 55 §274; Mos. 2.51 §288). The rabbis believed that there were seven classes or departments, graded according to merit, in the heavenly garden of Eden (Midr. Ps. 11 §6); the church fathers held similar views. John, however, is decidedly nonapocalyptic (the exception may be 1:51), and his treatment is much more restrained than Philo’s existential allegorizing. The rabbinic notion of a compartmentalized heaven is likewise foreign to John.

92 Old Testament figures recognized for performing unusual works were Elisha (who was given the key to the womb and enabled a barren woman to conceive), Elijah (who was given the key to the rain in answer to prayer), and both prophets together with Ezekiel (who were given the key to the graves and who raised the dead)—all three works usually being reserved for God’s direct intervention (Midr. Ps. 78 §5).

19 See also Midr. Qoh. 7.1 (cf. Morris 1995: 513).

84 For example, Gen. Rab. 1.10; 2.5; Lev. Rab. 25.3; Num. Rab. 12.6; Deut. Rab. 10.2; As. Mos. 1:13–14. For further Jewish references, see Hauck, TDNT 3:620–21. A suggestive parallel is found in Odes Sol. 41:15, where the Messiah is said to have been “known before the foundations of the world, that he might give life to persons forever by the truth of his name.” Compare 17:6 with 17:26. Note also the strong affinity between 17:24–26 and 1 John 3:2.

93 The famous first-century Jewish rabbi Hillel used to say, “The more study of the Law the more life. . . . If a man . . . has gained for himself words of the Law he has gained for himself life in the world to come” (m. Abot 2.7; cf. Bar. 4:1; Gen. Rab. 1.14). Paul argues against this view in Rom. 7:10 and Gal. 3:21.

6.5 150n33
11.9 561
11.10 185n47
22.6 263
42.3 457
44.22 272
54.1 209n53
56.3 542n8
63.6 281n13
68.9 349
70.5 209, 209n53
81.3 154n45

84 For example, Gen. Rab. 1.10; 2.5; Lev. Rab. 25.3; Num. Rab. 12.6; Deut. Rab. 10.2; As. Mos. 1:13–14. For further Jewish references, see Hauck, TDNT 3:620–21. A suggestive parallel is found in Odes Sol. 41:15, where the Messiah is said to have been “known before the foundations of the world, that he might give life to persons forever by the truth of his name.” Compare 17:6 with 17:26. Note also the strong affinity between 17:24–26 and 1 John 3:2.

33 For the ancient Jews, the greatest “gift of God” was the Torah (the law). Other “gifts of God,” apart from the lights in the sky and rain, were considered to include peace, salvation, the land of Israel, and divine mercy (Gen. Rab. 6.5; attributed to Yohanan ben Zakkai [ca. A.D. 70] and other rabbis). Rabbinic thought associated the provision of water with the coming of the Messiah (Eccles. Rab. 1.9; see commentary at 6:31).

47 See Gen. Rab. 11.10; Exod. Rab. 30.9, citing Isa. 6:3; Jer. 23:24. The Letter of Aristaeus (second century B.C.) says that God “is continually at work in everything” (210). See also Eusebius, Praeparatio evangelica 13.12.11, frg. 5 (cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 267).

53 NIV: “food of God”; see Lev. 21:6, 8, 17, 21, 22; 22:25. Being essential for human existence, bread and water are universal symbols of life. In Judaism, the Torah was commonly called “bread” (Gen. Rab. 54.1; 70.5; Cant. [Song] Rab. 1.2 §3); “bread” and “water” symbolism was applied to salvation, the law, the Scriptures, and wisdom.

8 Later Jewish literature draws parallels between the crucifixion and Isaac’s carrying the wood “like one carries his stake [= cross] on his shoulder” (Gen. Rab. 56.3 on Gen. 22:6; see R. Brown 1970: 917–18).

13 Regarding the possibility that the man’s blindness from birth may be the result of prenatal sin, compare Jewish speculation surrounding the struggle of Jacob and Esau in their mother Rebecca’s womb (Gen. 25:22; cf. Gen. Rab. 63.6). There are also several parallels regarding the possibility that the man’s blindness was the result of his parents’ sin prior to his birth (Cant. Rab. 1.6 §3; Ruth Rab. 6.4; Tg. Ps.-J. of Deut. 21:20). However, several passages in the OT and Second Temple literature strongly challenge the notion that children suffer for their parents’ sin (e.g., Jer. 31:29–30; Ezek. 18; cf. Tob. 3:3).

53 NIV: “food of God”; see Lev. 21:6, 8, 17, 21, 22; 22:25. Being essential for human existence, bread and water are universal symbols of life. In Judaism, the Torah was commonly called “bread” (Gen. Rab. 54.1; 70.5; Cant. [Song] Rab. 1.2 §3); “bread” and “water” symbolism was applied to salvation, the law, the Scriptures, and wisdom.

45 C. Koester (1990b: 673–74) notes that while Samaritans claimed that Moses had hidden the

84.8 547
91.6 508
91.10 352n142
94.9 352. 352n142
97 386
98.8 284n30
99.8 284n30

Exodus Rabbah

1.20 192n89
2.2 305n35, 305n36
3.13 552n70
9.1 208n49
15.11 262
18.3 194n101
21.3 244n77, 292n67

vessels of the tabernacle on Mount Gerizim (see Josephus, Ant. 18.4.1 §85), the Jews traced the roots of Samaritan idolatry to when Jacob's wife Rachel stole and hid her father's household gods in that place (Gen. 31:19, 34; cf. 35:4; see Gen. Rab. 81.3 [ca. A.D. 180]; Pseudo-Philo, Bib. Ant. 25.10).

142 The same case is taken up in the Jerusalem Talmud (y. Ter. 8.10). Another incident involved Ulla the son of Kasher, who was wanted by the government (Gen. Rab. 94.9; see also Gen. Rab. 91.10 on Gen. 48:10 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 117]). Cf. Daube 1966a: 18–47. M. Barker (1970) links Caiaphas's words with current messianic expectations.

142 The same case is taken up in the Jerusalem Talmud (y. Ter. 8.10). Another incident involved Ulla the son of Kasher, who was wanted by the government (Gen. Rab. 94.9; see also Gen. Rab. 91.10 on Gen. 48:10 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 117]). Cf. Daube 1966a: 18–47. M. Barker (1970) links Caiaphas's words with current messianic expectations.

30 Barrett 1978: 358–59; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.243 (cited in Lee [1994: 167 n. 1], who also refers to Isa. 8:6 LXX). See Gen. Rab. 98.8; 99.8.

30 Barrett 1978: 358–59; Schnackenburg 1990: 2.243 (cited in Lee [1994: 167 n. 1], who also refers to Isa. 8:6 LXX). See Gen. Rab. 98.8; 99.8.

89 Cf. m. Abot 4.22; Exod. Rab. 1.20; Wis. 1:6 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 61, 201 n. 164). 35 2 Sam. 5:2; Ps. 78:70–72; Ezek. 37:24; Mic. 5:4; cf. Ps. Sol. 17:40–41; Midr. Rab. 2.2 on Exod. 3:1.

36 Isa. 63:11; cf. Ps. 77:20; Midr. Rab. 2.2 on Exod. 3:1. Philo speaks of a “good” (ἀγαθός) shepherd (Husb. 10 §44; 12 §49) and applies shepherd terminology not only to kings and wise men but also to both God and his firstborn Son or Word (Husb. 12 §§50–53; Post. Cain 19 §§67–68). In non-Jewish circles, too, gods and great men were described as shepherds (Barrett 1978: 374).

70 Later Jewish thought held that Moses struck the rock twice and that it yielded first blood, then water (Exod. Rab. 3.13 on Exod. 4:9).

49 Cf. Exod. Rab. 9.1; b. B. Meṣi'a 59b. Some of the rabbis, however, remained critical toward such signs (Schnackenburg 1990: 2.39–40).

101 See Exod. Rab. 18.3 on Exod. 12:29, where Moses is called “a good intercessor.”

77 Cf. Acts 25:16; Josephus, Ant. 14.9.3 §167; J.W. 1.10.6 §209; see Pancaro 1972. Later

29.9 210
30.9 185n47
31.1 284

Leviticus Rabbah

6.1 437
15.2 139, 552n67
18.1 333n53
25.3 500n84
30.2 369n8
36.2 450n6

Numbers Rabbah

9.16 362n18

rabbinic rulings concur (Exod. Rab. 21.3 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 81]).

67 There are also rabbinic parallels (b. Ber. 6b; Exod. Rab. 21.3; cf. Isa. 65:24).

47 See Gen. Rab. 11.10; Exod. Rab. 30.9, citing Isa. 6:3; Jer. 23:24. The Letter of Aristeas (second century B.C.) says that God “is continually at work in everything” (210). See also Eusebius, Praeparatio evangelica 13.12.11, frg. 5 (cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 267).

67 See Lev. Rab. 15.2 on Lev. 13:2. Commentators disagree as to whether or not the present reference is intended to counter incipient Docetism, which denied Jesus’ full humanity at his death. Some consider this unlikely (Ridderbos [1997: 620], who thinks that the present passage is simply designed to further support the reliability and eyewitness nature of the account; R. Brown 1970: 949–52), while a majority favors such a polemic purpose (e.g., Carson [1991: 623], who sees this verse as the “counterpoint” to 1:14; Barrett 1978: 556; Morris 1995: 724; Beasley-Murray 1999: 356; Borchert 2002: 276–77; Burge 2000: 532).

53 See Lev. Rab. 18.1 on Lev. 15:1; cf. Eccles. Rab. 12.6 (universally cited by commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 393; Carson 1991: 411; Morris 1995: 485). Cf. m. Yebam. 16.3; Semaḥot 8, rule 1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 109). See also Hanson 1973. Keener (2003: 841 n. 63, citing Michaels 1984: 190) cautions, however, that the belief that the soul left the body three days after death is not widely attested in the early period.

84 For example, Gen. Rab. 1.10; 2.5; Lev. Rab. 25.3; Num. Rab. 12.6; Deut. Rab. 10.2; As. Mos. 1:13–14. For further Jewish references, see Hauck, TDNT 3:620–21. A suggestive parallel is found in Odes Sol. 41:15, where the Messiah is said to have been “known before the foundations of the world, that he might give life to persons forever by the truth of his name.” Compare 17:6 with 17:26. Note also the strong affinity between 17:24–26 and 1 John 3:2.

8 Cf. Lev. Rab. 30.2. The Greco-Roman world knew palm branches as symbols of victory (e.g., Suetonius, Caligula 32).

6 Ridderbos (1997: 515) calls it the “redemptive-historical description of the people of God.” See Isa. 5:1–7; 27:2–6; cf. Ps. 80:8–16; Jer. 2:21; 6:9; 12:10–13; Ezek. 15:1–8; 17:5–10; 19:10–14; Hos. 10:1–2; 14:7; see also Sir. 24:17–23; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 5:23. An extensive allegorical depiction of Israel as a vine is also found in Lev. Rab. 36.2 (with reference to Ps. 80:9).

18 See further Coakley (1988: 250 n. 51), who cites additional primary and secondary literature. Apparently, for a married woman to let down her hair in public constituted grounds for divorce (t. Soṭah 5.9; y. Giṭ. 9.50d; cf. b. Yoma 47a; m. Ketub. 7.6; Num. Rab. 9.16; more general, b. Ned.

12.6 500n84

21.3 469

Deuteronomy Rabbah

4.4 495n55

10.2 500n84

Ruth Rabbah

2.14 334n59

6.4 281n13

Ecclesiastes Rabbah

1.9 150n33, 241, 372n21

30b; but see m. Ketub. 2.1). Yet note the conclusion by Coakley: “But none of these passages touches the question of what an unmarried woman might decently do in a neighbor’s house among friends” (ibid.).

84 For example, Gen. Rab. 1.10; 2.5; Lev. Rab. 25.3; Num. Rab. 12.6; Deut. Rab. 10.2; As. Mos. 1:13–14. For further Jewish references, see Hauck, TDNT 3:620–21. A suggestive parallel is found in Odes Sol. 41:15, where the Messiah is said to have been “known before the foundations of the world, that he might give life to persons forever by the truth of his name.” Compare 17:6 with 17:26. Note also the strong affinity between 17:24–26 and 1 John 3:2.

55 Parallel wordings are attested in rabbinic literature for both “take out of this world” (y. Ber. 2.7) and “protect from the evil one” (y. Pe. ah 1.1; Deut. Rab. 4.4 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 210 nn. 519–20]; cf. Ps. 140:1; Matt. 6:13).

84 For example, Gen. Rab. 1.10; 2.5; Lev. Rab. 25.3; Num. Rab. 12.6; Deut. Rab. 10.2; As. Mos. 1:13–14. For further Jewish references, see Hauck, TDNT 3:620–21. A suggestive parallel is found in Odes Sol. 41:15, where the Messiah is said to have been “known before the foundations of the world, that he might give life to persons forever by the truth of his name.” Compare 17:6 with 17:26. Note also the strong affinity between 17:24–26 and 1 John 3:2.

59 See Job 2:8, 13; Ezek. 8:14; cf. Ruth Rab. 2.14. A sitting posture was also common for mourners in ancient Rome, being adopted by, for example, Cato when learning of the defeat at Pharsalus (Plutarch, Cato Minor 56.4).

13 Regarding the possibility that the man’s blindness from birth may be the result of prenatal sin, compare Jewish speculation surrounding the struggle of Jacob and Esau in their mother Rebecca’s womb (Gen. 25:22; cf. Gen. Rab. 63.6). There are also several parallels regarding the possibility that the man’s blindness was the result of his parents’ sin prior to his birth (Cant. Rab. 1.6 §3; Ruth Rab. 6.4; Tg. Ps.-J. of Deut. 21:20). However, several passages in the OT and Second Temple literature strongly challenge the notion that children suffer for their parents’ sin (e.g., Jer. 31:29–30; Ezek. 18; cf. Tob. 3:3).

33 For the ancient Jews, the greatest “gift of God” was the Torah (the law). Other “gifts of God,” apart from the lights in the sky and rain, were considered to include peace, salvation, the land of Israel, and divine mercy (Gen. Rab. 6.5; attributed to Yohanan ben Zakkai [ca. A.D. 70] and other rabbis). Rabbinic thought associated the provision of water with the coming of the Messiah (Eccles. Rab. 1.9; see commentary at 6:31).

21 Though the rabbis had difficulty reconciling this humble notion of the Messiah with that of the Danielic Son of Man “coming on the clouds of heaven” (b. Sanh. 98a). However, riding on a donkey does appear as one of the three signs of the Messiah in Eccles. Rab. 1.9, where the latter

3.1 230n12
12.6 333n53

Canticles Rabbah

1.2 §3 209n53
1.4 §1 488n20
1.6 §3 281n13
3.4 362

Lamentations Rabbah

3.17 148n26

Mishnah

ʾAbot

1.2 284
1.5 159
1.6 459n58

redeemer in Zech. 9:9 is featured as the counterpart to Moses in Exod. 4:20.

12 See Eccles. 3:1 (cf. Eccles. Rab. 3.1) and the rabbinic and Qumran material cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 73.

53 See Lev. Rab. 18.1 on Lev. 15:1; cf. Eccles. Rab. 12.6 (universally cited by commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 393; Carson 1991: 411; Morris 1995: 485). Cf. m. Yebam. 16.3; Semaḥot 8, rule 1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 109). See also Hanson 1973. Keener (2003: 841 n. 63, citing Michaels 1984: 190) cautions, however, that the belief that the soul left the body three days after death is not widely attested in the early period.

53 NIV: “food of God”; see Lev. 21:6, 8, 17, 21, 22; 22:25. Being essential for human existence, bread and water are universal symbols of life. In Judaism, the Torah was commonly called “bread” (Gen. Rab. 54.1; 70.5; Cant. [Song] Rab. 1.2 §3); “bread” and “water” symbolism was applied to salvation, the law, the Scriptures, and wisdom.

20 These ties are most pronounced in the OT (e.g., Jer. 31:34). Hosea records the divine lament “My people are destroyed from lack of knowledge” (Hos. 4:6), while both Isaiah and Habakkuk envision a future day when “the earth will be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea” (Isa. 11:9; Hab. 2:14). God’s people are to acknowledge him in all their ways (Prov. 3:6) and to live lives of wisdom (the message of the OT Book of Proverbs, see Prov. 1:1–7). The principle of wise living is affirmed also in later rabbinic teaching (see b. Ber. 63a, citing Prov. 3:6; Cant. Rab. 1.4 §1, citing Hos. 4:6; b. Mak. 24a, citing Hab. 2:4).

13 Regarding the possibility that the man’s blindness from birth may be the result of prenatal sin, compare Jewish speculation surrounding the struggle of Jacob and Esau in their mother Rebecca’s womb (Gen. 25:22; cf. Gen. Rab. 63.6). There are also several parallels regarding the possibility that the man’s blindness was the result of his parents’ sin prior to his birth (Cant. Rab. 1.6 §3; Ruth Rab. 6.4; Tg. Ps.-J. of Deut. 21:20). However, several passages in the OT and Second Temple literature strongly challenge the notion that children suffer for their parents’ sin (e.g., Jer. 31:29–30; Ezek. 18; cf. Tob. 3:3).

26 See y. Šeb. 9.9; Lam. Rab. 3.17; y. Ber. 8.5; t. Ber. 6.4–5. See also Köstenberger 1998a: 122.

58 This is summed up by the well-known dictum of Rabbi Joshua b. Perahyah (ca. 100 B.C.):

1.12 213, 423n8
2.4 190n75
2.7 47n92, 193n93, 418
2.15 162n76, 282
3.16 214n68
4.8 255n20
4.11 437n76
4.22 192n89
5.19 264, 291n59

“Provide yourself with a teacher and get yourself a fellow disciple” (m. ʿAbot 1.6; see Morris 1995: 600 n. 36).

8 For example, m. ʿAbot 1.12. There are also several parallels in Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (T. Gad 4:1–2; 6:1; T. Zeb. 5:1; 8:5; T. Jos. 17:1–2; T. Iss. 7:6–7; T. Sim. 4:7; T. Reub. 6:9).

75 On the double-negative construction underlying the phrase “by myself I can do nothing,” see commentary at 14:30 and the close parallel 15:5. Cf. m. ʿAbot 2.4 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 60).

92 Keener (2003: 422) states that the contrast in 1:17 is between something good and something better (citing m. ʿAbot 2.7: “the more study of the Law the more life”). See also Luther’s (1957: 139–48) discussion of 1:17, summed up as follows: “It is as if he were to say: The Law, given through Moses, is indeed a Law of life, righteousness, and everything good. But far more was accomplished through Christ” (p. 144).

93 The famous first-century Jewish rabbi Hillel used to say, “The more study of the Law the more life. ... If a man ... has gained for himself words of the Law he has gained for himself life in the world to come” (m. ʿAbot 2.7; cf. Bar. 4:1; Gen. Rab. 1.14). Paul argues against this view in Rom. 7:10 and Gal. 3:21.

76 Rabbi Tarfon (ca. A.D. 130) used to say, “The day is short and the task is great and the laborers are idle and the wage is abundant and the master of the house is urgent” (m. ʿAbot 2.15).

68 There is a certain affinity between John’s teaching on predestination and the Qumran doctrine of the “two spirits” (1QS 3:14–4:6). The rabbinic view is summed up by a saying attributed to Rabbi Akiba (ca. A.D. 135): “All is foreseen, but freedom of choice is given” (m. ʿAbot 3.16). Cf. Josephus, Ant. 18.1.3 §13; 18.1.4 §16; 18.1.5 §18; J.W. 2.8.14 §§162–65; see also the excursus in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.265–70.

20 Cf. 16:32. See also m. ʿAbot 4.8. The conjunction δέ (de, but) serves to “reverse” the negative statement in 8:15b (Barrett 1978: 339). Morris (1995: 392) suggests that δέ (given its relationship with καί [kai, even]) means “even if.”

76 Rabbi Eliezer ben Jacob made this well-known statement: “He that performs one precept gets for himself one advocate [peraqlîṭ]; but he that commits one transgression gets for himself one accuser [qaṭêgôr]” (m. ʿAbot 4.11).

89 Cf. m. ʿAbot 4.22; Exod. Rab. 1.20; Wis. 1:6 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 61, 201 n. 164).

59 The perceptive reader will note that the Pharaisees’ claim to being disciples of Moses is refuted by the earlier statement in 5:45–47 (Keener 2003: 791). There is some debate as to how common this self-designation was among the Jews of Jesus’ day (cf., e.g., Matt. 23:2). In b. Yoma 4a, it is applied to Pharisees as opposed to Sadducees. In m. ʿAbot 5.19, Jews are referred to as “the disciples of Abraham,” while Christians are dismissed as “the disciples of Balaam the wicked”

5.21 272
6.1 458n53
6.7 220

Baba Batra

6.8 343
9.4 138

Baba Meṣi'a

1.8 60n14
7.8–9 306n40

Baba Qamma

7.7 520n43
8.6 262

Bekorot

8.7 105

Berakot

5.2 335n64

(that is, Jesus!). Schnackenburg (1990: 2.251) and Ridderbos (1997: 345 n. 287, referring to TDNT 4:443) consider this to be a characteristic rabbinic self-designation, while Carson (1991: 373–74, apparently following Barrett 1978: 362–63) says that this self-designation was not common.

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for “love” is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo’s (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as “my friend” (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

14 Matt. 16:14 pars.; 17:3–4, 10 pars.; 27:47, 49 par.; Sir. 48:10; m. Šeqal. 2.5; m. Soṭah 9.15; m. B. Meṣi'a 1.8; m. Ed. 8.7; probably also 1QS 9:11.

40 Later mishnaic law stipulated that if one wolf attacked the flock, the hireling must protect it. However, if two wolves threatened the sheep, no blame attached to the hired man for any damage caused to the sheep (m. B. Meṣi'a 7.8–9; see Dalman 1928–39: 6.233–35; Morris 1995: 454).

43 The Greek wording is identical to Matt. 26:74. The translation “began to crow” reflects the understanding that the aorist verb ἐφώνησεν (ephōnēsen) is ingressive (cf., e.g., the TNIV). If so, D. M. Smith’s (1999: 337) point is moot that “it is only in Mark that the cock crows twice (14:72; cf. 14:30),” but that “like Matthew and Luke, John reports only one cock-crowing” (cf. Laney 1992: 326). Mishnaic legislation prohibited the raising of fowl in Jerusalem (m. B. Qam. 7.7), but it is unlikely that this prohibition was strictly obeyed in Jesus’ day (Jeremias 1969: 47–48).

64 The resurrection of the dead was the subject of lively debate between the Pharisees and their

5.5 188, 260, 393, 432

7.1 149

8.5 360

8.8 149

9.5 263, 335n64

Bikkurim

2.2 349

Eduyyot

8.7 60n14, 69

Giṭṭin

1.5 160

9.8 545n26

Hagigah

2.1 258

Horayot

3.1–2 516

3.4 512n10, 516

opponents (e.g., b. Sanh. 90b, referring to Deut. 31:16; Isa. 26:19; and Song 7:9). Other mishnaic passages likewise denounce those who refuse to affirm the resurrection of the dead (m. Sanh.

10.1; cf. m. Ber. 9.5). Belief in the resurrection is also evident from the second of the Eighteen Benedictions: “Lord, you are almighty forever, who makes the dead alive. . . . Blessed are you, Lord, who makes the dead alive” (cf. m. Ber. 5.2; m. Soṭah 9.15; see Schürer 1973–79: 2.456).

64 The resurrection of the dead was the subject of lively debate between the Pharisees and their opponents (e.g., b. Sanh. 90b, referring to Deut. 31:16; Isa. 26:19; and Song 7:9). Other mishnaic passages likewise denounce those who refuse to affirm the resurrection of the dead (m. Sanh. 10.1; cf. m. Ber. 9.5). Belief in the resurrection is also evident from the second of the Eighteen Benedictions: “Lord, you are almighty forever, who makes the dead alive. . . . Blessed are you, Lord, who makes the dead alive” (cf. m. Ber. 5.2; m. Soṭah 9.15; see Schürer 1973–79: 2.456). 14 Matt. 16:14 pars.; 17:3–4, 10 pars.; 27:47, 49 par.; Sir. 48:10; m. Šeqal. 2.5; m. Soṭah 9.15; m. B. Meṣi-a 1.8; m. Ed. 8.7; probably also 1QS 9:11.

26 Polyglot notices were quite common in the Hellenistic era. Examples include those cited by Josephus (Ant. 14.10.2 §191; J.W. 6.2.4 §125) and the Res Gestae Divi Augusti, which existed in both Latin and Greek. Schlatter (1948: 349) also refers to m. Giṭ. 9.8 (bills of divorce written in both Greek and Hebrew). See also Esth. 8:9. Blinzler (1959: 254–55) refers to still extant Roman tombstones.

10 See m. Hor. 3.4; cf. m. Meg. 1.9; m. Mak. 2.6; t. Yoma 1.4. See also Luke 3:2, where the appearance of John the Baptist is placed “during the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas.” Josephus indicates that it was customary for former high priests to continue to be called by that term (J.W. 4.3.7 §151; 4.3.9 §160; see Ridderbos 1997: 579; Moloney 1998: 490; Pancaro 1975: 66–67). The family is mentioned several times in later Jewish writings; it was noted not only for its great size, wealth, and power (b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.18), but also for its greed (see the street-ballad referred to in commentary at 18:3). Its wealth is reported later to have been

Kelim

1.8 105n15

Ketubbot

2.1 362n18

2.9 191, 254

4.4 333n57, 338

4.6 450n10

5.8 201n14

7.6 362n18

Makkot

2.6 512n10

destroyed by the Zealots.

15 See the Greek inscription (discovered in 1870) cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 29; cf. Geva, NEAEHL 2:744; Millard 1997: 243. See also m. Kelim 1.8; Josephus, Ant. 15.11.4 §417; J.W. 5.5.1 §193; 6.2.4 §125.

18 See further Coakley (1988: 250 n. 51), who cites additional primary and secondary literature. Apparently, for a married woman to let down her hair in public constituted grounds for divorce (t. Soṭah 5.9; y. Giṭ. 9.50d; cf. b. Yoma 47a; m. Ketub. 7.6; Num. Rab. 9.16; more general, b. Ned. 30b; but see m. Ketub. 2.1). Yet note the conclusion by Coakley: “But none of these passages touches the question of what an unmarried woman might decently do in a neighbor’s house among friends” (ibid.).

57 So Ridderbos 1997: 393; Carson 1991: 411 (but see Wis. 19:3; m. Ketub. 4.4).

10 Coins of the first Jewish revolt (A.D. 66–70) feature a vine and branches as a symbol of Jerusalem, and the rabbinic school at Jamnia headed by Rabbi Yohanan ben Zakkai after the destruction of the temple was known as a “vineyard” (m. Ketub. 4.6). Philo, characteristically, interprets Isa. 5:7 in terms of “that most holy vineyard,” the virtuous soul (Dreams 2.26 §§172–73).

14 Philo writes that barley products are “suited for irrational animals and people in unhappy circumstances” (Spec. Laws 3.10 §57). The more well-to-do preferred wheat bread (Spec. Laws 2.29 §175; see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.442 n. 25), which was traded at twice or even three times the value of barley (2 Kings 7:1, 16, 18; Rev. 6:6; m. Ketub. 5.8).

18 See further Coakley (1988: 250 n. 51), who cites additional primary and secondary literature. Apparently, for a married woman to let down her hair in public constituted grounds for divorce (t. Soṭah 5.9; y. Giṭ. 9.50d; cf. b. Yoma 47a; m. Ketub. 7.6; Num. Rab. 9.16; more general, b. Ned. 30b; but see m. Ketub. 2.1). Yet note the conclusion by Coakley: “But none of these passages touches the question of what an unmarried woman might decently do in a neighbor’s house among friends” (ibid.).

10 See m. Hor. 3.4; cf. m. Meg. 1.9; m. Mak. 2.6; t. Yoma 1.4. See also Luke 3:2, where the appearance of John the Baptist is placed “during the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas.” Josephus indicates that it was customary for former high priests to continue to be called by that term (J.W. 4.3.7 §151; 4.3.9 §160; see Ridderbos 1997: 579; Moloney 1998: 490; Pancaro 1975: 66–67). The family is mentioned several times in later Jewish writings; it was noted not only for its great size, wealth, and power (b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.18), but also for its greed (see the street-ballad referred to in commentary at 18:3). Its wealth is reported later to have been

3.2 313n75

Megillah

1.9 512n10

Menahot

10.2 146

Middot

1.1–2 506

1.2 506

3.8 446n103

5.4 518n37

Nedarim

3.11 234n29

Niddah

4.1 149

5.6 287n48

Ohalot

2.4 343n105

destroyed by the Zealots.

75 In certain cases, Jewish law actually seems to have encouraged such a procedure (m. Mak. 3.2).

10 See m. Hor. 3.4; cf. m. Meg. 1.9; m. Mak. 2.6; t. Yoma 1.4. See also Luke 3:2, where the appearance of John the Baptist is placed “during the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas.” Josephus indicates that it was customary for former high priests to continue to be called by that term (J.W. 4.3.7 §151; 4.3.9 §160; see Ridderbos 1997: 579; Moloney 1998: 490; Pancaro 1975: 66–67). The family is mentioned several times in later Jewish writings; it was noted not only for its great size, wealth, and power (b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.18), but also for its greed (see the street-ballad referred to in commentary at 18:3). Its wealth is reported later to have been destroyed by the Zealots.

103 Cf. Josephus, J.W. 5.5.4 §210; Ant. 15.11.3 §395; m. Mid. 3.8; Tacitus, Historiae 5.5.

37 A mishnaic source specifies the chamber of hewn stone on the south side of the temple court (m. Mid. 5.4), while the Babylonian Talmud indicates that the Sanhedrin ceased meeting in this location “forty years” (not necessarily a literal time marker [e.g., b. Yoma 39a]) prior to the destruction of the temple, moving to the marketplace (b. Šabb. 15a; b. Sanh. 41b; b. Abod. Zar. 8b).

29 Thus Rabbi Yose b. Ḥalafta (ca. A.D. 140–65) said, “Great is circumcision which overrides even the rigor of the Sabbath” (m. Ned. 3.11; cf. m. Šabb. 18.3; 19.1–3; the midrash Tanḥuma 19b).

48 “He is old enough” probably means that the man is qualified to give legal testimony about himself—that is, he is at least thirteen (m. Nid. 5.6; Carson 1991: 369; Barrett 1978: 361; Kruse 2003: 225; Keener 2003: 788). Beyond this, his age is not known. The phrase may indicate that the man is sufficiently mature to reason and answer the Pharisees’ questions for himself (Morris 1995: 433 n. 34).

3.5 553
18.7 524n11

Pesaḥ

8 284

Pesaḥim

4.5 417
5.3 553
5.5 553
5.5–8 553
5.7 369
8.6 530n43
9.1 355, 355n154
9.3 369
10.3 416
10.7 369

p 695 Roš Haššanah

1.7 256
1.8 561n4, 570
3.1 191, 254

Šabbat

6.4 509n36
7.2 181, 285
8.1 285
10.5 181
18.3 184, 234n29

105 Regarding the stone being laid across the entrance, see m. ʾOhal. 2.4.

11 See m. ʾOhal. 18.7; cf. uncleanness contracted from contact with corpses in Num. 9:7–14; 31:19.

43 See Chavel 1941 (the quotation is from p. 277). One mishnaic passage (m. Pesaḥ. 8.6 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 167]) suggests that such releases were common enough to warrant legislation.

154 See Num. 9:6; 2 Chron. 30:17–18; John 18:28; cf. m. Pesaḥ. 9.1.

4 Carson (1991: 635–36 [cf. Beasley-Murray 1999: 371]) suggests that Mary was alone during her first trip to the tomb (contra Morris 1995: 734; Moloney 1998: 522; Witherington 1995: 323; Burge 2000: 553). Mary’s witness was not used as significantly in the preaching of the early church as that of Peter, doubtless because evidence provided by a woman was held in lesser esteem (e.g., m. Roš Haš. 1.8). This is underscored by the fact that Jesus’ encounter with Mary is not included in the resurrection appearances to the disciples cited in 21:14.

36 “A man may not go out with a sword” (m. Šabb. 6.4; so the sages with reference to Isa. 2:4, but not Rabbi Eliezer [A.D. 90–130]: “They are his adornments”).

29 Thus Rabbi Yose b. Ḥalafta (ca. A.D. 140–65) said, “Great is circumcision which overrides even the rigor of the Sabbath” (m. Ned. 3.11; cf. m. Šabb. 18.3; 19.1–3; the midrash Tanḥuma 19b).

19.1–3 234n29
19.2–3 184
23.1 418n24
23.4–5 557
24.3 285

Sanhedrin

3.5 138
4.1 517
5.2 83, 290
5.4 244
6.2 289n54, 516
6.3 546n32
6.4 314, 544n18
6.5 554n79, 557
7.1 526
7.2 526n20
7.4 232, 273, 526n25
7.5 314
7.10 232, 355
9.3 526n25
9.6 469n33

29 Thus Rabbi Yose b. Ḥalafta (ca. A.D. 140–65) said, “Great is circumcision which overrides even the rigor of the Sabbath” (m. Ned. 3.11; cf. m. Šabb. 18.3; 19.1–3; the midrash Tanḥuma 19b).

24 But see Exod. 12:22, which indicates that at the original Passover, people were required to stay inside. A similar piece of legislation is found in m. Šabb. 23.1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 135).

54 Conway (1999: 131) suggests the idiomatic translation “Tell us the truth.” See Josh. 7:19; 2 Chron. 30:8; Jer. 13:16; 1 Esdr. 9:8; m. Sanh. 6.2; cf. Ridderbos 1997: 344; Carson 1991: 372; Morris 1995: 436. Alternatively, the Jews exhort the man to give glory to God, who performed the miracle (but see Barrett 1978: 362).

32 A dispute about whether or not a man about to be stoned should be completely stripped is recorded in m. Sanh. 6.3.

18 Although later Jewish legislation forbids condemning two persons on the same day (m. Sanh. 6.4), it is unlikely that this law was in effect in Jesus’ day, and even if it was, that it would have been honored by the Romans. Earlier, the Jewish high priest Alexander Jannaeus (88 B.C.) had crucified eight hundred persons at the same time (Josephus, J.W. 1.4.6 §97).

79 See Josephus, Ant. 5.1.14 §44: Achar “given the ignominious burial proper to the condemned.” Cf. m. Sanh. 6.5.

20 One thinks of the stonings of Stephen (Acts 7) and of James the half-brother of Jesus in A.D. 62 (Josephus, Ant. 20.9.1 §200), as well as the burning of a priest’s daughter accused of committing adultery (m. Sanh. 7.2).

25 Lev. 24:16; cf. John 10:33; Acts 7:57–58; m. Sanh. 7.4; 9.3.

25 Lev. 24:16; cf. John 10:33; Acts 7:57–58; m. Sanh. 7.4; 9.3.

33 For example, Acts 5:33–40; cf. m. Sanh. 9.6. According to Josephus, the Jewish authorities

10.1 122, 335n64

Šebi.it

8.10 149n27

Šeqalim

1.3 106n18

2.5 60n14

6.5 257

Soṭah

3.4 159

9.15 60n14, 69, 335n64

Sukkah

3.9 370

4.1 239

4.5 256n22

(i.e., the high priest Ananus II) were responsible for the stoning death of James the brother of Jesus in A.D. 62 (Ant. 20.9.1 §200). The Jews displayed similar zeal at the martyrdom of Polycarp, John's disciple (Mart. Pol. 13:1).

64 The resurrection of the dead was the subject of lively debate between the Pharisees and their opponents (e.g., b. Sanh. 90b, referring to Deut. 31:16; Isa. 26:19; and Song 7:9). Other mishnaic passages likewise denounce those who refuse to affirm the resurrection of the dead (m. Sanh. 10.1; cf. m. Ber. 9.5). Belief in the resurrection is also evident from the second of the Eighteen Benedictions: "Lord, you are almighty forever, who makes the dead alive. ... Blessed are you, Lord, who makes the dead alive" (cf. m. Ber. 5.2; m. Soṭah 9.15; see Schürer 1973–79: 2.456). 27 As Rabbi Eliezer (ca. A.D. 90–130) used to say, "He that eats the bread of the Samaritans is like to one that eats the flesh of swine" (m. Šeb. 8.10 [cited by many, including Schlatter 1948: 118]).

18 Cf. m. Šeqal. 1.3: "On the 25th thereof [the month of Adar] they [the tables of the moneychangers] were set up in the Temple." On Tyrian shekels, see Richardson 1992: 514–18. On the half-shekel offering, see Liver 1963.

14 Matt. 16:14 pars.; 17:3–4, 10 pars.; 27:47, 49 par.; Sir. 48:10; m. Šeqal. 2.5; m. Soṭah 9.15; m. B. Meṣi'a 1.8; m. Ed. 8.7; probably also 1QS 9:11.

14 Matt. 16:14 pars.; 17:3–4, 10 pars.; 27:47, 49 par.; Sir. 48:10; m. Šeqal. 2.5; m. Soṭah 9.15; m. B. Meṣi'a 1.8; m. Ed. 8.7; probably also 1QS 9:11.

64 The resurrection of the dead was the subject of lively debate between the Pharisees and their opponents (e.g., b. Sanh. 90b, referring to Deut. 31:16; Isa. 26:19; and Song 7:9). Other mishnaic passages likewise denounce those who refuse to affirm the resurrection of the dead (m. Sanh. 10.1; cf. m. Ber. 9.5). Belief in the resurrection is also evident from the second of the Eighteen Benedictions: "Lord, you are almighty forever, who makes the dead alive. ... Blessed are you, Lord, who makes the dead alive" (cf. m. Ber. 5.2; m. Soṭah 9.15; see Schürer 1973–79: 2.456).

22 According to later Jewish tradition, when the priests marched in procession around the altar at the Feast of Tabernacles, singing the hosanna of Ps. 118:25, they did not sing "O Lord," but rather "I and he" in order to avoid using the name of God (m. Sukkah 4.5; cf. m. Yoma 6.2), whereby "I and he" lent expression to the fellowship between Israel and Yahweh.

4.9–10 239, 283n26
5.2–4 229n5, 253
5.6 240n52

Tamid

1.1 515

Yebamot

4.13 265
16.3 333n53

Yoma

6.2 256n22

Zebah\im

5.8 418n29

Pesiqta Rabbati

52.3–6 240n55

Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer

33 346, 378n12

Semaḥot

26 Morris (1995: 428) notes the nonchalant fashion in which the miracle is described. Barrett (1978: 359) comments, “The man’s obedience was complete and so was his cure.” A connection with the previous chapters is established by the fact that the water for the water-pouring rites of the Feast of Tabernacles was drawn from the pool of Siloam (cf. m. Sukkah 4.9–10).

5 For helpful information on the particulars of the feast, see Avi-Yonah 1964: 144. See also the mishnaic tractate Sukkah (esp. m. Sukkah 5.2–4). Old Testament references include Lev. 23:33–43; Num. 29:12–39; Neh. 8:13–18; Hos. 12:9; Zech. 14:16–19.

52 See Josephus, Ant. 11.5.5 §157; b. Sukkah 48b; m. Sukkah 5.6; 2 Macc. 10:6.

53 See Lev. Rab. 18.1 on Lev. 15:1; cf. Eccles. Rab. 12.6 (universally cited by commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 393; Carson 1991: 411; Morris 1995: 485). Cf. m. Yebam. 16.3; Semaḥot 8, rule 1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 109). See also Hanson 1973. Keener (2003: 841 n. 63, citing Michaels 1984: 190) cautions, however, that the belief that the soul left the body three days after death is not widely attested in the early period.

22 According to later Jewish tradition, when the priests marched in procession around the altar at the Feast of Tabernacles, singing the hosanna of Ps. 118:25, they did not sing “O Lord,” but rather “I and he” in order to avoid using the name of God (m. Sukkah 4.5; cf. m. Yoma 6.2), whereby “I and he” lent expression to the fellowship between Israel and Yahweh.

29 Exod. 12:8; cf. m. Zebah. 5.8. See Jeremias (1969: 44–46), who also cites Jub. 49:1, 12; t. Pesah. 1.34; and other references.

55 See, perhaps, 1 Sam. 7:6. Some rabbinic sources, which may or may not reach back to the first century, are Pesiq. Rab. 52.3–6; t. Sukkah 3.3–12. See Grigsby 1986.

12 Similarly, Pirqe R. El. 33. See also 1 Cor. 15:37.

8, rule 1 333n53

Shemoneh Ḥesreh

in toto 187n61
3 493

Sipre

Deut. 33:24 361n14

Soperim

16.8 606

Tanḥuma

6.11 270n93
19b 234n29

Targumim

Targumim on Pentateuch

Exod. 19–20 483
Deut. 32 483

Neofiti

53 See Lev. Rab. 18.1 on Lev. 15:1; cf. Eccles. Rab. 12.6 (universally cited by commentators: e.g., Ridderbos 1997: 393; Carson 1991: 411; Morris 1995: 485). Cf. m. Yebam. 16.3; Semaḥot 8, rule 1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 109). See also Hanson 1973. Keener (2003: 841 n. 63, citing Michaels 1984: 190) cautions, however, that the belief that the soul left the body three days after death is not widely attested in the early period.

61 Cf. b. Ta'an. 2a (attributed to Rabbi Yohanan, ca. A.D. 70 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 58]) and the Shemoneh Ḥesreh (ca. A.D. 70–100 [cited in Schürer 1973–79: 2.455–63]).

14 Though see the texts cited by Coakley (1988: 247–48), which illustrate that although Mary's act may have been unusual, it was “not unthinkable” (p. 248). Homer (Odyssey 19.503–7) speaks of Odysseus's feet being washed and subsequently anointed. The Greek poet Aristophanes cites an instance in which a daughter is washing, anointing (ἀλείφει), and kissing her father's feet (Vespae 608). Athenaeus (Deipnosophists 12.553) reports an Athenian custom among the wealthy of anointing “even the feet with perfumes.” See also Pliny, Natural History 13.22 (putting scent on the soles of people's feet in Nero's day); Petronius, Satyricon 70; Curtius, History of Alexander 8.9.27 (bathing feet in perfumes as a custom of the kings of India); and, in a Jewish context, t. Šabb. 3.16; Sipre on Deut. 33:24. As Coakley (1988: 248) duly notes, of course, none of these passages suggests “that anointing of the feet was an everyday occurrence in Jesus' day in Palestine.”

93 Such as Abraham: see the midrash Tanḥuma 6.11. For Greco-Roman parallels, see Köstenberger 2002c: 90.

29 Thus Rabbi Yose b. Ḥalafta (ca. A.D. 140–65) said, “Great is circumcision which overrides even the rigor of the Sabbath” (m. Ned. 3.11; cf. m. Šabb. 18.3; 19.1–3; the midrash Tanḥuma 19b).

Gen. 28:10 152n37
Deut. 18:19 394n18

Onqelos

Gen. 17:17 272

Pseudo-Jonathan

Deut. 18:19 394n18
Deut. 21:20 281n13
Isa. 6:1 391n8
Isa. 6:5 391n8

37 See also Tg. Neof. of Gen. 28:10 (referring to the well at Haran; see Díaz 1963: 76–77), and the Samaritan liturgy for the Day of Atonement cited in Carson 1991: 220 (cf. Schnackenburg 1990: 1.430–32).

18 This emphasis is in keeping with instances in Second Temple literature, where the law seems to take a more active part in the process of judging (2 Bar. 48:47; 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 13:30–35; Wis. 9:3; cf. Philo, Mos. 2.10 §53). John 12:48–50 contains echoes of the Book of Deuteronomy (cf. Deut. 18:19; 31:19, 26; see O’Connell 1960; cf. R. Brown 1966: 491–92). There, it is God who takes vengeance on those who refuse to hear; in the Targumim, it is God’s memra, or word: “And the man who does not listen to his words which he [the future prophet] will speak in the name of my memra, I in my memra will be avenged of him” (Tg. Neof. on Deut. 18:19); “my memra will take revenge on him” (Tg. Ps.-J. on Deut. 18:19). For “the last day,” see 6:39–40, 44; 11:24 (the phrase, with “day” in the singular, does not occur elsewhere in the NT).

18 This emphasis is in keeping with instances in Second Temple literature, where the law seems to take a more active part in the process of judging (2 Bar. 48:47; 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 13:30–35; Wis. 9:3; cf. Philo, Mos. 2.10 §53). John 12:48–50 contains echoes of the Book of Deuteronomy (cf. Deut. 18:19; 31:19, 26; see O’Connell 1960; cf. R. Brown 1966: 491–92). There, it is God who takes vengeance on those who refuse to hear; in the Targumim, it is God’s memra, or word: “And the man who does not listen to his words which he [the future prophet] will speak in the name of my memra, I in my memra will be avenged of him” (Tg. Neof. on Deut. 18:19); “my memra will take revenge on him” (Tg. Ps.-J. on Deut. 18:19). For “the last day,” see 6:39–40, 44; 11:24 (the phrase, with “day” in the singular, does not occur elsewhere in the NT).

13 Regarding the possibility that the man’s blindness from birth may be the result of prenatal sin, compare Jewish speculation surrounding the struggle of Jacob and Esau in their mother Rebecca’s womb (Gen. 25:22; cf. Gen. Rab. 63.6). There are also several parallels regarding the possibility that the man’s blindness was the result of his parents’ sin prior to his birth (Cant. Rab. 1.6 §3; Ruth Rab. 6.4; Tg. Ps.-J. of Deut. 21:20). However, several passages in the OT and Second Temple literature strongly challenge the notion that children suffer for their parents’ sin (e.g., Jer. 31:29–30; Ezek. 18; cf. Tob. 3:3).

8 This is confirmed by the Targumim: Tg. Ps.-J. on Isa. 6:1 changes “I saw the Lord” to “I saw the glory of the Lord,” and the same Targum changes “the King, the Lord of hosts” in Isa. 6:5 to “the glory of the shekinah of the eternal King, the Lord of hosts” (first century B.C.–third century A.D.; see Carson 1991: 449).

8 This is confirmed by the Targumim: Tg. Ps.-J. on Isa. 6:1 changes “I saw the Lord” to “I saw the glory of the Lord,” and the same Targum changes “the King, the Lord of hosts” in Isa. 6:5 to “the glory of the shekinah of the eternal King, the Lord of hosts” (first century B.C.–third century

Tosefta

Berakot

2.20 591n24

6.4–5 148n26

Menahot

13.18 513n10

13.21 506n16

Pesah

4.19 364

Pesahim

1.34 418n29

Qiddušin

5.21 234

Šabbat

3.16 361n14

A.D.; see Carson 1991: 449).

24 So, rightly, Barrett 1978: 580–81; Morris 1995: 762 n. 19 (though Soards [1983: 283] may have a point when he says “that the impetuous Peter met in this story would not have modesty uppermost in his mind”). Cf. t. Ber. 2.20.

26 See y. Šeb. 9.9; Lam. Rab. 3.17; y. Ber. 8.5; t. Ber. 6.4–5. See also Köstenberger 1998a: 122.

10 See m. Hor. 3.4; cf. m. Meg. 1.9; m. Mak. 2.6; t. Yoma 1.4. See also Luke 3:2, where the appearance of John the Baptist is placed “during the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas.” Josephus indicates that it was customary for former high priests to continue to be called by that term (J.W. 4.3.7 §151; 4.3.9 §160; see Ridderbos 1997: 579; Moloney 1998: 490; Pancaro 1975: 66–67). The family is mentioned several times in later Jewish writings; it was noted not only for its great size, wealth, and power (b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.18), but also for its greed (see the street-ballad referred to in commentary at 18:3). Its wealth is reported later to have been destroyed by the Zealots.

16 Their arms and methods are recalled in a “street-ballad” (see Köstenberger 2002c: 157, following Klausner 1925: 337); various versions circulated, depending on the high priests targeted (cf. b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.21).

29 Exod. 12:8; cf. m. Zebah. 5.8. See Jeremias (1969: 44–46), who also cites Jub. 49:1, 12; t. Pesah. 1.34; and other references.

14 Though see the texts cited by Coakley (1988: 247–48), which illustrate that although Mary’s act may have been unusual, it was “not unthinkable” (p. 248). Homer (Odyssey 19.503–7) speaks of Odysseus’s feet being washed and subsequently anointed. The Greek poet Aristophanes cites an instance in which a daughter is washing, anointing (ἀλείφει), and kissing her father’s feet (Vespae 608). Athenaeus (Deipnosophists 12.553) reports an Athenian custom among the wealthy of anointing “even the feet with perfumes.” See also Pliny, Natural History 13.22 (putting scent on the soles of people’s feet in Nero’s day); Petronius, Satyricon 70; Curtius, History of Alexander 8.9.27 (bathing feet in perfumes as a custom of the kings of India); and, in

Sanhedrin

12.10 283n23

Soṭah

5.9 362n18

13.3 382n32

13.5 352n145

13.6 352n145

Sukkah

1.1 235n32

3.3–12 240n55

3.9 199n3

Terumot

7.20 352

Yoma

a Jewish context, t. Šabb. 3.16; Sipre on Deut. 33:24. As Coakley (1988: 248) duly notes, of course, none of these passages suggests “that anointing of the feet was an everyday occurrence in Jesus’ day in Palestine.”

23 E.g., Rabbi Aqiba (ca. A.D. 130) in t. Sanh. 12.10.

18 See further Coakley (1988: 250 n. 51), who cites additional primary and secondary literature. Apparently, for a married woman to let down her hair in public constituted grounds for divorce (t. Soṭah 5.9; y. Giṭ. 9.50d; cf. b. Yoma 47a; m. Ketub. 7.6; Num. Rab. 9.16; more general, b. Ned. 30b; but see m. Ketub. 2.1). Yet note the conclusion by Coakley: “But none of these passages touches the question of what an unmarried woman might decently do in a neighbor’s house among friends” (ibid.).

32 “Since the death of the last prophets, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, the Holy Spirit [of prophetic inspiration] departed from Israel; yet they were still able to avail themselves of the bath qol” (b. Sanh. 11a; cf. t. Soṭah 13.3; see Barrett 1970: 39–40; Dalman 1902: 204–5).

145 See Josephus, J.W. 1.2.8 §68; Ant. 13.10.3 §§282–83; 13.10.7 §299; cf. t. Soṭah 13.5, with 13.6 referring to Simeon the Righteous (after 200 B.C.).

145 See Josephus, J.W. 1.2.8 §68; Ant. 13.10.3 §§282–83; 13.10.7 §299; cf. t. Soṭah 13.5, with 13.6 referring to Simeon the Righteous (after 200 B.C.).

32 Παρησία (parrēsia, openly) is a dative of manner or adverbial dative (Wallace 1996: 162). “They are not saying a word to him” is a rabbinic expression reflecting tacit approval (R. Brown 1966: 313). “Said R. Judah, ‘Helene’s sukkah [tabernacle] was twenty cubits tall, and sages went in and out, when visiting her, and not one of them said a thing’ ” (t. Sukkah 1.1). The interrogative particle μήποτε (mēpote) signals a tentative question (Carson 1991: 317; Barrett 1978: 321), the gist being “Do the rulers perhaps actually [μήποτε ἀληθῶς] know that he is the Christ?”

55 See, perhaps, 1 Sam. 7:6. Some rabbinic sources, which may or may not reach back to the first century, are Pesiq. Rab. 52.3–6; t. Sukkah 3.3–12. See Grigsby 1986.

3 The name “Sea of Tiberias” is attested in first-century literature (Sib. Or. 12:104). It is also preserved in Jewish tradition (Yamma shel Tiberya [t. Sukkah 3.9]) and by the Arabs, who call the lake Bahr Tabariyeh (Avi-Yonah 1964: 143).

Qumran / Dead Sea Scrolls

1QH

10:39 214n70
 11:8–12 476n66
 12:9–10 267n78
 12:14 267, 267n78
 13:36 208n46
 15:10 214n70
 15:14 214n70
 16:4–40 240n58

10 See m. Hor. 3.4; cf. m. Meg. 1.9; m. Mak. 2.6; t. Yoma 1.4. See also Luke 3:2, where the appearance of John the Baptist is placed “during the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas.” Josephus indicates that it was customary for former high priests to continue to be called by that term (J.W. 4.3.7 §151; 4.3.9 §160; see Ridderbos 1997: 579; Moloney 1998: 490; Pancaro 1975: 66–67). The family is mentioned several times in later Jewish writings; it was noted not only for its great size, wealth, and power (b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.18), but also for its greed (see the street-ballad referred to in commentary at 18:3). Its wealth is reported later to have been destroyed by the Zealots.

70 The expression “disciples of God” (i.e., the ones taught by God) is also found in the Qumran writings (CD 20:4; 1QH 10:39; 15:10, 14). See also the messianic parallel in Ps. Sol. 17:32 (prior to A.D. 70).

66 For example, 1QH 11:8–12; cf. Rev. 12:2–5. See Brownlee 1956–57: esp. 29.

78 In the DSS, the opponent of the “Teacher of Righteousness” is called the “Man of Lies” (1QpHab 2:1–2; 5:11; CD 20:15), with the Teacher saying of the people who want to divert him from his path, “They are sowers of deceit and seers of fraud, they have plotted evil against me ... and are not firmly based in your truth” (1QH 12:9, 14).

78 In the DSS, the opponent of the “Teacher of Righteousness” is called the “Man of Lies” (1QpHab 2:1–2; 5:11; CD 20:15), with the Teacher saying of the people who want to divert him from his path, “They are sowers of deceit and seers of fraud, they have plotted evil against me ... and are not firmly based in your truth” (1QH 12:9, 14).

46 Similar terminology is found in the Qumran Scrolls (CD 2:14; cf. 1QS 4:4; 1QH 13:36; CD 1:1–2; 13:7–8). “Work of God” is also found (in a different context) in Rom. 14:20.

70 The expression “disciples of God” (i.e., the ones taught by God) is also found in the Qumran writings (CD 20:4; 1QH 10:39; 15:10, 14). See also the messianic parallel in Ps. Sol. 17:32 (prior to A.D. 70).

70 The expression “disciples of God” (i.e., the ones taught by God) is also found in the Qumran writings (CD 20:4; 1QH 10:39; 15:10, 14). See also the messianic parallel in Ps. Sol. 17:32 (prior to A.D. 70).

58 See Neh. 9:15, 19–20; other relevant passages include Exod. 17:6; Ps. 105:41; Prov. 18:4; Isa. 43:19–20; 55:1; Jer. 2:13; 17:13; see also 1QH 16:4. See Menken 1996.

1QM

in toto 31n38, 266

1:1 387n50

1:3 387n50

1:5 130, 384n37

1:9 387n50

34 E.g., 1QH 17:26. A similar statement is found in Gos. Thom. 24. A possible OT parallel is Jer. 13:16.

38 Some believe that John is alluding here to the Greek dualism between light and darkness. Rather than affirming belief in a personal God who is sovereign, all-powerful, and good, the Greeks viewed reality in terms of polar opposites, such as light and darkness or good and evil. John, however, refutes this kind of thinking in his first epistle, where he states emphatically, “God is light; in him there is no darkness at all” (1 John 1:5). Another kind of light/darkness dualism is found in the DSS, particularly the War Scroll (1QM) depicting the battle between the “sons of light” and the “sons of darkness.” Yet, because of the sectarian nature of the Qumran community, light is never offered to those who live in darkness (cf. 1QS 3:21; 4:9–14) (Bauckham 1997). In John, on the other hand, Jesus urges his listeners, “Put your trust in the light while you have it, so that you may become sons of light” (12:36; cf. 8:12; 9:5).

50 See Morris 1995: 534. “Son of ...” reflects Hebrew idiom; the expression “sons of light,” however, is not attested in rabbinic literature. A “son of light” displays the moral qualities of “light” and has become a follower of the “light” (cf. Luke 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; Eph. 5:8). The phrase is also common in the DSS, where it designates members of the Qumran community (e.g., 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 20–21, 24–25; 4:11; 1QM 1:1, 3, 9, 11, 13). “Born of light” occurs in 1 Enoch 108:11. See also T. Naph. 2:10.

50 See Morris 1995: 534. “Son of ...” reflects Hebrew idiom; the expression “sons of light,” however, is not attested in rabbinic literature. A “son of light” displays the moral qualities of “light” and has become a follower of the “light” (cf. Luke 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; Eph. 5:8). The phrase is also common in the DSS, where it designates members of the Qumran community (e.g., 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 20–21, 24–25; 4:11; 1QM 1:1, 3, 9, 11, 13). “Born of light” occurs in 1 Enoch 108:11. See also T. Naph. 2:10.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

50 See Morris 1995: 534. “Son of ...” reflects Hebrew idiom; the expression “sons of light,” however, is not attested in rabbinic literature. A “son of light” displays the moral qualities of “light” and has become a follower of the “light” (cf. Luke 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; Eph. 5:8). The phrase is also common in the DSS, where it designates members of the Qumran community (e.g., 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 20–21, 24–25; 4:11; 1QM 1:1, 3, 9, 11, 13). “Born of light” occurs in 1

1:11 387n50
1:13 387n50
4:2 384n37
13:2 384n37
13:4 384n37
13:11–12 384n37

Enoch 108:11. See also T. Naph. 2:10.

50 See Morris 1995: 534. “Son of ...” reflects Hebrew idiom; the expression “sons of light,” however, is not attested in rabbinic literature. A “son of light” displays the moral qualities of “light” and has become a follower of the “light” (cf. Luke 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; Eph. 5:8). The phrase is also common in the DSS, where it designates members of the Qumran community (e.g., 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 20–21, 24–25; 4:11; 1QM 1:1, 3, 9, 11, 13). “Born of light” occurs in 1 Enoch 108:11. See also T. Naph. 2:10.

50 See Morris 1995: 534. “Son of ...” reflects Hebrew idiom; the expression “sons of light,” however, is not attested in rabbinic literature. A “son of light” displays the moral qualities of “light” and has become a follower of the “light” (cf. Luke 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; Eph. 5:8). The phrase is also common in the DSS, where it designates members of the Qumran community (e.g., 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 20–21, 24–25; 4:11; 1QM 1:1, 3, 9, 11, 13). “Born of light” occurs in 1 Enoch 108:11. See also T. Naph. 2:10.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar

14:9 384n37

15:3 384n37

1QpHab

2:1–2 267n78

5:11 267n78

11:4–7 510n2

11:10–15 509n40

1QS

in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

78 In the DSS, the opponent of the “Teacher of Righteousness” is called the “Man of Lies” (1QpHab 2:1–2; 5:11; CD 20:15), with the Teacher saying of the people who want to divert him from his path, “They are sowers of deceit and seers of fraud, they have plotted evil against me ... and are not firmly based in your truth” (1QH 12:9, 14).

78 In the DSS, the opponent of the “Teacher of Righteousness” is called the “Man of Lies” (1QpHab 2:1–2; 5:11; CD 20:15), with the Teacher saying of the people who want to divert him from his path, “They are sowers of deceit and seers of fraud, they have plotted evil against me ... and are not firmly based in your truth” (1QH 12:9, 14).

2 Jeremiah almost suffered a similar fate when the high officials of the Jewish nation conspired against him (Jer. 26:11). The Qumran “Teacher of Righteousness” likewise claims to have suffered persecution by the hands of the “Wicked Priest” (1QpHab 11:4–7).

40 See 1QpHab 11:10–15; Rev. 14:10; 16:19; 18:6.

1:5 131n53
1:9 387n50
1:10 266, 423
1:18 384n37
2:3 488n22
2:5 384n37
2:16 387n50
2:19 384n37

53 It is found in the Greek OT (Neh. 9:33; Isa. 26:10), the apocryphal literature (Tob. 4:6; 13:6), and the Qumran scrolls (1QS 1:5; 5:3).

50 See Morris 1995: 534. “Son of ...” reflects Hebrew idiom; the expression “sons of light,” however, is not attested in rabbinic literature. A “son of light” displays the moral qualities of “light” and has become a follower of the “light” (cf. Luke 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; Eph. 5:8). The phrase is also common in the DSS, where it designates members of the Qumran community (e.g., 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 20–21, 24–25; 4:11; 1QM 1:1, 3, 9, 11, 13). “Born of light” occurs in 1 Enoch 108:11. See also T. Naph. 2:10.

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

22 In his first epistle, John disputes the communion with God falsely claimed by gnostic teachers. In the DSS, “life” and “eternal knowledge” are set in close parallelism (1QS 2:3; cf. 1QS 4:22; 11:3–4). The expression “eternal life” is found in those writings as well (CD 3:20). In Hellenistic and oriental cults, it was the vision of God received by the initiate that was considered to be the source of life and salvation. Philo spoke of “holding that the knowledge of him is the consummation of happiness. It is also age-long life” (Spec. Laws 1.63 §345; cf. Unchang. 30 §143).

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

50 See Morris 1995: 534. “Son of ...” reflects Hebrew idiom; the expression “sons of light,” however, is not attested in rabbinic literature. A “son of light” displays the moral qualities of “light” and has become a follower of the “light” (cf. Luke 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; Eph. 5:8). The phrase is also common in the DSS, where it designates members of the Qumran community (e.g., 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 20–21, 24–25; 4:11; 1QM 1:1, 3, 9, 11, 13). “Born of light” occurs in 1 Enoch 108:11. See also T. Naph. 2:10.

3:7 254n12
3:13 387n50
3:13–4:26 125n33
3:14–4:6 213n68
3:18 438, 467n20
3:18–19 267
3:20–21 387, 387n50
3:21 31n38

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

12 Cf. Ps. 36:9; 56:13; Ps. Sol. 3:12 (cf. 4 Bar. 9:3); 1QS 3:7; 1 Enoch 58:3 (cf. 58:4–6; 92:4).

50 See Morris 1995: 534. “Son of . . .” reflects Hebrew idiom; the expression “sons of light,” however, is not attested in rabbinic literature. A “son of light” displays the moral qualities of “light” and has become a follower of the “light” (cf. Luke 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; Eph. 5:8). The phrase is also common in the DSS, where it designates members of the Qumran community (e.g., 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 20–21, 24–25; 4:11; 1QM 1:1, 3, 9, 11, 13). “Born of light” occurs in 1 Enoch 108:11. See also T. Naph. 2:10.

33 Cf. Ezek. 11:19–20; 36:26–27; Isa. 44:3; 59:21; Jer. 31:31–34; Ps. 51:10; cf. Wis. 9:16–18; 1QS 3:13–4:26; see Ridderbos 1997: 132; Barrett 1978: 203; Moloney 1998: 94.

68 There is a certain affinity between John’s teaching on predestination and the Qumran doctrine of the “two spirits” (1QS 3:14–4:6). The rabbinic view is summed up by a saying attributed to Rabbi Akiba (ca. A.D. 135): “All is foreseen, but freedom of choice is given” (m. Abot 3.16). Cf. Josephus, Ant. 18.1.3 §13; 18.1.4 §16; 18.1.5 §18; J.W. 2.8.14 §§162–65; see also the excursus in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.265–70.

20 See commentary at 16:8–11. At Qumran, the title “spirit of truth” is given to the leader of the forces of good against the forces of evil (e.g., 1QS 3:18). In 1QS 4:21, the expressions “spirit of holiness” (i.e., holy spirit) and “spirit of truth” occur in parallelism.

50 See Morris 1995: 534. “Son of . . .” reflects Hebrew idiom; the expression “sons of light,” however, is not attested in rabbinic literature. A “son of light” displays the moral qualities of “light” and has become a follower of the “light” (cf. Luke 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; Eph. 5:8). The phrase is also common in the DSS, where it designates members of the Qumran community (e.g., 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 20–21, 24–25; 4:11; 1QM 1:1, 3, 9, 11, 13). “Born of light” occurs in 1 Enoch 108:11. See also T. Naph. 2:10.

38 Some believe that John is alluding here to the Greek dualism between light and darkness. Rather than affirming belief in a personal God who is sovereign, all-powerful, and good, the Greeks viewed reality in terms of polar opposites, such as light and darkness or good and evil. John, however, refutes this kind of thinking in his first epistle, where he states emphatically, “God is light; in him there is no darkness at all” (1 John 1:5). Another kind of light/darkness dualism is found in the DSS, particularly the War Scroll (1QM) depicting the battle between the

3:24–25 387n50
4:2 473n53
4:4 46, 208n46, 281n15
4:9–14 31n38
4:11 387, 387n50
4:20–21 63, 71
4:21 467n20
4:22 488n22

“sons of light” and the “sons of darkness.” Yet, because of the sectarian nature of the Qumran community, light is never offered to those who live in darkness (cf. 1QS 3:21; 4:9–14) (Bauckham 1997). In John, on the other hand, Jesus urges his listeners, “Put your trust in the light while you have it, so that you may become sons of light” (12:36; cf. 8:12; 9:5).

50 See Morris 1995: 534. “Son of ...” reflects Hebrew idiom; the expression “sons of light,” however, is not attested in rabbinic literature. A “son of light” displays the moral qualities of “light” and has become a follower of the “light” (cf. Luke 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; Eph. 5:8). The phrase is also common in the DSS, where it designates members of the Qumran community (e.g., 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 20–21, 24–25; 4:11; 1QM 1:1, 3, 9, 11, 13). “Born of light” occurs in 1 Enoch 108:11. See also T. Naph. 2:10.

53 Second Temple literature applies guidance terminology to the figure of divine wisdom (Wis. 9:11; 10:10, 17). The illuminating function of God’s Spirit (or Wisdom) is also prominent in Philo (Mos. 2.48 §265; Giants 12 §§54–55). See also 1QS 4:2.

46 Similar terminology is found in the Qumran Scrolls (CD 2:14; cf. 1QS 4:4; 1QH 13:36; CD 1:1–2; 13:7–8). “Work of God” is also found (in a different context) in Rom. 14:20.

15 Noted by Calvin 1959: 239. See John 6:28; Ps. 64:9; 66:5; 78:7; Jer. 51:10; Tob. 12:6, 7, 11; 2 Macc. 3:36; 1QS 4:4.

38 Some believe that John is alluding here to the Greek dualism between light and darkness. Rather than affirming belief in a personal God who is sovereign, all-powerful, and good, the Greeks viewed reality in terms of polar opposites, such as light and darkness or good and evil. John, however, refutes this kind of thinking in his first epistle, where he states emphatically, “God is light; in him there is no darkness at all” (1 John 1:5). Another kind of light/darkness dualism is found in the DSS, particularly the War Scroll (1QM) depicting the battle between the “sons of light” and the “sons of darkness.” Yet, because of the sectarian nature of the Qumran community, light is never offered to those who live in darkness (cf. 1QS 3:21; 4:9–14) (Bauckham 1997). In John, on the other hand, Jesus urges his listeners, “Put your trust in the light while you have it, so that you may become sons of light” (12:36; cf. 8:12; 9:5).

50 See Morris 1995: 534. “Son of ...” reflects Hebrew idiom; the expression “sons of light,” however, is not attested in rabbinic literature. A “son of light” displays the moral qualities of “light” and has become a follower of the “light” (cf. Luke 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; Eph. 5:8). The phrase is also common in the DSS, where it designates members of the Qumran community (e.g., 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 20–21, 24–25; 4:11; 1QM 1:1, 3, 9, 11, 13). “Born of light” occurs in 1 Enoch 108:11. See also T. Naph. 2:10.

20 See commentary at 16:8–11. At Qumran, the title “spirit of truth” is given to the leader of the forces of good against the forces of evil (e.g., 1QS 3:18). In 1QS 4:21, the expressions “spirit of holiness” (i.e., holy spirit) and “spirit of truth” occur in parallelism.

22 In his first epistle, John disputes the communion with God falsely claimed by gnostic

4:23–26 438
 5:3 131n53
 5:14–20 149
 6:10 415
 6:16 211n63
 6:19 211n63
 6:22 211n63
 8:5–6 191n83, 267
 8:12–14 63
 8:12–16 429n38
 9:11 60n14, 61, 203, 241, 353
 9:15–26 211n63
 9:16 494n50
 9:17–18 429n38

teachers. In the DSS, “life” and “eternal knowledge” are set in close parallelism (1QS 2:3; cf. 1QS 4:22; 11:3–4). The expression “eternal life” is found in those writings as well (CD 3:20). In Hellenistic and oriental cults, it was the vision of God received by the initiate that was considered to be the source of life and salvation. Philo spoke of “holding that the knowledge of him is the consummation of happiness. It is also age-long life” (Spec. Laws 1.63 §345; cf. Unchang. 30 §143).

53 It is found in the Greek OT (Neh. 9:33; Isa. 26:10), the apocryphal literature (Tob. 4:6; 13:6), and the Qumran scrolls (1QS 1:5; 5:3).

63 The idea of accepting someone called by God into the community and not rejecting that person is also found in the Qumran literature (e.g., 1QS 6:16, 19, 22; 9:15–16; 11:13–14).

63 The idea of accepting someone called by God into the community and not rejecting that person is also found in the Qumran literature (e.g., 1QS 6:16, 19, 22; 9:15–16; 11:13–14).

63 The idea of accepting someone called by God into the community and not rejecting that person is also found in the Qumran literature (e.g., 1QS 6:16, 19, 22; 9:15–16; 11:13–14).

83 The idea of bearing witness to the truth occurs in the NT only in this Gospel (similarly, 18:37; cf. 3 John 3, 12); cf. 1QS 8:5–6.

38 The terms “way,” “truth,” and “life” frequently are combined in OT wisdom literature (e.g., Ps. 16:11; 86:11; Prov. 15:24). In the DSS, the ways of truth are contrasted with the ways of darkness and deceit. The Qumran covenanters considered themselves to be “the way” in absolute terms (perhaps on the basis of Isa. 40:3; cf. 1QS 8:12–16; 9:19–20), so that those who elected to join their ranks were said to have chosen “the way” (1QS 9:17–18). At Qumran, “the way” was understood to consist in strict legal observance as interpreted by the “Teacher of Righteousness.” 14 Matt. 16:14 pars.; 17:3–4, 10 pars.; 27:47, 49 par.; Sir. 48:10; m. Šeqal. 2.5; m. Soṭah 9.15; m. B. Mešî’a 1.8; m. Ed. 8.7; probably also 1QS 9:11.

63 The idea of accepting someone called by God into the community and not rejecting that person is also found in the Qumran literature (e.g., 1QS 6:16, 19, 22; 9:15–16; 11:13–14).

50 The phrase “son of” is a Semitism. See Matt. 23:15; Eph. 5:6 = Col. 3:6 (textual variant). Similar expressions (in the plural) are found in the DSS (1QS 9:16 = 10:19; CD 6:15 = 13:14). The phrase is attested also in classical Greek. Danker (1960–61) cites a passage in Menander’s Dyscolos (published as part of Papyrus Bodmer IV) that contains the word “madman” (lit., “son of madness,” ὀδυνῆς υἱός, odynēs huios).

9:19–20 429n38
10:19 494n50
11:3–4 488n22
11:13–14 211n63

p 696 1QSa

2:11–12 84, 84n112
2:14 77n72
2:20 77n72

3Q15

in toto 178n14

38 The terms “way,” “truth,” and “life” frequently are combined in OT wisdom literature (e.g., Ps. 16:11; 86:11; Prov. 15:24). In the DSS, the ways of truth are contrasted with the ways of darkness and deceit. The Qumran covenanters considered themselves to be “the way” in absolute terms (perhaps on the basis of Isa. 40:3; cf. 1QS 8:12–16; 9:19–20), so that those who elected to join their ranks were said to have chosen “the way” (1QS 9:17–18). At Qumran, “the way” was understood to consist in strict legal observance as interpreted by the “Teacher of Righteousness.”

38 The terms “way,” “truth,” and “life” frequently are combined in OT wisdom literature (e.g., Ps. 16:11; 86:11; Prov. 15:24). In the DSS, the ways of truth are contrasted with the ways of darkness and deceit. The Qumran covenanters considered themselves to be “the way” in absolute terms (perhaps on the basis of Isa. 40:3; cf. 1QS 8:12–16; 9:19–20), so that those who elected to join their ranks were said to have chosen “the way” (1QS 9:17–18). At Qumran, “the way” was understood to consist in strict legal observance as interpreted by the “Teacher of Righteousness.”

50 The phrase “son of” is a Semitism. See Matt. 23:15; Eph. 5:6 = Col. 3:6 (textual variant). Similar expressions (in the plural) are found in the DSS (1QS 9:16 = 10:19; CD 6:15 = 13:14). The phrase is attested also in classical Greek. Danker (1960–61) cites a passage in Menander’s Dyscolos (published as part of Papyrus Bodmer IV) that contains the word “madman” (lit., “son of madness,” ὀδυνηὶς υἱός, odynēs huios).

22 In his first epistle, John disputes the communion with God falsely claimed by gnostic teachers. In the DSS, “life” and “eternal knowledge” are set in close parallelism (1QS 2:3; cf. 1QS 4:22; 11:3–4). The expression “eternal life” is found in those writings as well (CD 3:20). In Hellenistic and oriental cults, it was the vision of God received by the initiate that was considered to be the source of life and salvation. Philo spoke of “holding that the knowledge of him is the consummation of happiness. It is also agelong life” (Spec. Laws 1.63 §345; cf. Unchang. 30 §143).

63 The idea of accepting someone called by God into the community and not rejecting that person is also found in the Qumran literature (e.g., 1QS 6:16, 19, 22; 9:15–16; 11:13–14).

112 See 4QFlor 1:6–7; 1QSa 2:11–12; 1 Enoch 105:2; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 13:52; 14:9; see Carson 1991: 162. Note also that “Messiah” and “king of Israel” are juxtaposed in Mark 15:32.

72 See CD 2:12; 12:23–13:1; 14:19; 19:10–11; 20:1; 1QSa 2:14, 20; 4Q521 line 1; 11QMelch line 18.

72 See CD 2:12; 12:23–13:1; 14:19; 19:10–11; 20:1; 1QSa 2:14, 20; 4Q521 line 1; 11QMelch line 18.

10:16 283

4Q159

frag. 1, col. 2, lines 6–7 106n19

4Q246

2:1 71n53, 84

4Q372

in toto 344n113

4Q521

line 1 77n72

4Q534

in toto 71

4QFlor

in toto 534

1:1–13 102n2

14 The existence of these pools, if not the name “Bethesda,” may be attested by the Copper Scroll from Qumran (3Q15), which dates from between A.D. 35 and 65. See Hengel 1999: 309–10; Küchler 1999: 382, with further references.

19 Several commentators also mention that Tyrian coinage would have been preferred because it did not bear effigies (Moloney 1998: 76; Beasley-Murray 1999: 38 n. c; R. Brown 1966: 115; Borchert 1996: 163). However, this is disputed by Murphy-O’Connor (2000: 47, referring to Ben-David 1969), who cites evidence that Tyrian shekels “carried the head of the god Melkart (or Herakles) on the obverse and a Tyrian (Ptolemaic) eagle on the reverse with the inscription ‘Tyre the holy and inviolable.’ ” Murphy-O’Connor also notes the minting of Jewish shekels carrying the legend “shekel of Israel/Jerusalem [is/the] holy” at the onset of the Jewish war in A.D. 66 (pp. 47–48, citing Schürer 1973–79: 1.605), and he points to the Qumran interpretation of a one-time requirement in 4Q159 frag. 1, col. 2, lines 6–7 (p. 49).

53 For a nonmessianic use of “son of God” at Qumran, see 4Q246 2:1.

113 Westcott (1908: 2.101) draws a connection between Jesus’ prayer here and his opening statement in 11:4. On the term “Father,” see commentary at 1:14. “Father” is the customary address for God used by Jesus in prayer, occasionally adorned by a divine attribute, as in “holy Father” (17:11) or “righteous Father” (17:25). See 12:27–28; 17:1, 5, 21, 24; Luke 11:2; 22:42; 23:34, 46. At times, the address is “Our Father in heaven” (Matt. 6:9) or “Father, Lord of heaven and earth” (Matt. 11:25). The address “Father” is also found in the Qumran Scrolls (4Q372).

72 See CD 2:12; 12:23–13:1; 14:19; 19:10–11; 20:1; 1QSa 2:14, 20; 4Q521 line 1; 11QMelch line 18.

2 For example, Ezek. 40–44; 1 Enoch 90:28–36; Ps. Sol. 17:30; 4QFlor 1:1–13; see Schnelle

1:6–7 84n112
10–12a 83n106

4QP Bless

in toto 83n106

4Qp Isa^a

8–10 83n106

4Qp Nahum

1:6–8 526n24

4Q Test

5–8 61n17, 203
9–13 35n46

5/6 Hev Psalms

in toto 554

1996: 368.

112 See 4QFlor 1:6–7; 1QSa 2:11–12; 1 Enoch 105:2; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 7:28–29; 13:52; 14:9; see Carson 1991: 162. Note also that “Messiah” and “king of Israel” are juxtaposed in Mark 15:32.

106 The DSS and other Jewish and early Christian texts indicate that the term “Branch” was a familiar designation for the Davidic messiah (4QFlor 10–12a; 4QP Bless; 4Qp Isa^a 8–10; T. Jud. 24; Rev. 5:5). The DSS also show that the “Branch” was identified as God’s “son” and king over Israel (C. Koester 1990a: 27–30).

106 The DSS and other Jewish and early Christian texts indicate that the term “Branch” was a familiar designation for the Davidic messiah (4QFlor 10–12a; 4QP Bless; 4Qp Isa^a 8–10; T. Jud. 24; Rev. 5:5). The DSS also show that the “Branch” was identified as God’s “son” and king over Israel (C. Koester 1990a: 27–30).

106 The DSS and other Jewish and early Christian texts indicate that the term “Branch” was a familiar designation for the Davidic messiah (4QFlor 10–12a; 4QP Bless; 4Qp Isa^a 8–10; T. Jud. 24; Rev. 5:5). The DSS also show that the “Branch” was identified as God’s “son” and king over Israel (C. Koester 1990a: 27–30).

24 As when Alexander Jannaeus had eight hundred of his captives crucified in the center of Jerusalem (Josephus, J.W. 1.4.6 §97). Note 4QpNahum 1:6–8: “It is horrible for the one hanged alive from the tree.”

17 See also the collection of messianic passages in 4QTest 5–8 citing Deut. 18:18–19.

46 On the general motif of “light,” see commentary at 1:4–5. On the coming of the Messiah in terms of light, see especially Horbury (1998: 92–93, 99–100), who also discusses rabbinic interpretations. Important OT references include Num. 24:17 (cf. 4QTest 9–13); Isa. 9:2 (cf. 42:6–7; see commentary at John 1:5); and Mal. 4:2 (cf. Luke 1:78–79; see Köstenberger 2002c: 8).

11QMelch

line 18 77n72

CD

1:1–2 208n46

2:12 77n72

2:14 208n46

3:2 458n53

3:3–4 458n53

3:20 488n22

6:11 442n92

72 See CD 2:12; 12:23–13:1; 14:19; 19:10–11; 20:1; 1QSa 2:14, 20; 4Q521 line 1; 11QMelch line 18.

46 Similar terminology is found in the Qumran Scrolls (CD 2:14; cf. 1QS 4:4; 1QH 13:36; CD 1:1–2; 13:7–8). “Work of God” is also found (in a different context) in Rom. 14:20.

72 See CD 2:12; 12:23–13:1; 14:19; 19:10–11; 20:1; 1QSa 2:14, 20; 4Q521 line 1; 11QMelch line 18.

46 Similar terminology is found in the Qumran Scrolls (CD 2:14; cf. 1QS 4:4; 1QH 13:36; CD 1:1–2; 13:7–8). “Work of God” is also found (in a different context) in Rom. 14:20.

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for “love” is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo’s (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as “my friend” (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for “love” is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo’s (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as “my friend” (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

22 In his first epistle, John disputes the communion with God falsely claimed by gnostic teachers. In the DSS, “life” and “eternal knowledge” are set in close parallelism (1QS 2:3; cf. 1QS 4:22; 11:3–4). The expression “eternal life” is found in those writings as well (CD 3:20). In Hellenistic and oriental cults, it was the vision of God received by the initiate that was considered to be the source of life and salvation. Philo spoke of “holding that the knowledge of him is the consummation of happiness. It is also age-long life” (Spec. Laws 1.63 §345; cf. Unchang. 30 §143).

92 However, one important difference between the Holy Spirit and the Teacher of Righteousness is that the former will guide people into truth definitively, while the latter will be followed by another “teaching righteousness” at the end of time (CD 6:11).

6:15 494n50
12:2 384n37
12:23–13:1 77n72
13:7–8 208n46
13:7–9 307n49
13:9 597n7
13:14 494n50
14:7–10 273n103
14:19 77n72
19:10–11 77n72
20:1 77n72

50 The phrase “son of” is a Semitism. See Matt. 23:15; Eph. 5:6 = Col. 3:6 (textual variant). Similar expressions (in the plural) are found in the DSS (1QS 9:16 = 10:19; CD 6:15 = 13:14). The phrase is attested also in classical Greek. Danker (1960–61) cites a passage in Menander’s Dyscolos (published as part of Papyrus Bodmer IV) that contains the word “madman” (lit., “son of madness,” ὀδυνῆς υἱός, odynēs huíos).

37 There are several Jewish (though no rabbinic) parallels to the phrase “prince of the world” with reference to Satan (Segal 1981). The title “prince of this world” occurs in relation to Beliar in Mart. Isa. (1:3; 10:29; cf. 2:4). In Jubilees, “Mastema” is called “chief of the spirits” or simply “prince” (e.g., 10:8; 11:5, 11). More generally, the Qumran texts contain the notion that the “dominion of Belial” extends to his entire “lot” (see 1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 1QM 1:5; 4:2; 13:2, 4, 11–12; 14:9; 15:3; CD 12:2). However, unlike extensive speculation in Second Temple literature regarding the demonic supernatural, John is much more restrained, limiting his treatment of Satan exclusively to his role in the plot against Jesus leading to the latter’s crucifixion.

72 See CD 2:12; 12:23–13:1; 14:19; 19:10–11; 20:1; 1QSa 2:14, 20; 4Q521 line 1; 11QMelch line 18.

46 Similar terminology is found in the Qumran Scrolls (CD 2:14; cf. 1QS 4:4; 1QH 13:36; CD 1:1–2; 13:7–8). “Work of God” is also found (in a different context) in Rom. 14:20.

49 See Ps. Sol. 17:40; 2 Bar. 77:13–17; CD 13:7–9.

7 At Qumran, the metaphor is applied to the authoritative overseer, mebaqqer (CD 13:9).

50 The phrase “son of” is a Semitism. See Matt. 23:15; Eph. 5:6 = Col. 3:6 (textual variant). Similar expressions (in the plural) are found in the DSS (1QS 9:16 = 10:19; CD 6:15 = 13:14). The phrase is attested also in classical Greek. Danker (1960–61) cites a passage in Menander’s Dyscolos (published as part of Papyrus Bodmer IV) that contains the word “madman” (lit., “son of madness,” ὀδυνῆς υἱός, odynēs huíos).

103 Kruse (2003:217) cites a stipulation in the Qumran writings (CD 14:7–10) that certain officeholders must be between thirty and fifty years of age. Schlatter (1948: 220) says that the present passage coheres with Matt. 17:24, for the obligation to pay the temple tax ended at age fifty: “hence Jesus was not yet a πρεσβύτερος.” Also, the Book of Jubilees uses “fifty years” to measure the eras since the creation (M. Edwards 1994; followed by Moloney 1998: 286).

72 See CD 2:12; 12:23–13:1; 14:19; 19:10–11; 20:1; 1QSa 2:14, 20; 4Q521 line 1; 11QMelch line 18.

72 See CD 2:12; 12:23–13:1; 14:19; 19:10–11; 20:1; 1QSa 2:14, 20; 4Q521 line 1; 11QMelch line 18.

72 See CD 2:12; 12:23–13:1; 14:19; 19:10–11; 20:1; 1QSa 2:14, 20; 4Q521 line 1; 11QMelch

20:4 214n70
20:15 267n78

Papyri

BGU

1978.9 415n16

P.Eger. 2

in toto 120n15, 291n60

P.Oxy.

1.6 168n5

line 18.

70 The expression “disciples of God” (i.e., the ones taught by God) is also found in the Qumran writings (CD 20:4; 1QH 10:39; 15:10, 14). See also the messianic parallel in Ps. Sol. 17:32 (prior to A.D. 70).

78 In the DSS, the opponent of the “Teacher of Righteousness” is called the “Man of Lies” (1QpHab 2:1–2; 5:11; CD 20:15), with the Teacher saying of the people who want to divert him from his path, “They are sowers of deceit and seers of fraud, they have plotted evil against me ... and are not firmly based in your truth” (1QH 12:9, 14).

16 Parallels cited in BDAG 670 include Lucian, Cataplus 15 (second century A.D.) and BGU 1978.9 (A.D. 39).

15 Though note Goulder (1991: 154), who contends that “the tone [in the present passage] sounds greasy,” and who adduces the parallel in Matt. 22:16, “a similarly insincere compliment, and one which led to a trap” (the second-century A.D. P.Eger. 2 links the present encounter with the question regarding paying tribute to Caesar in the Synoptics; see Bassler 1989: 636).

Goulder, too, thinks that Nicodemus’s portrayal in John’s Gospel is “solidly negative” (p. 153), noting that “all Nicodemus can manage is two crass questions (3.4, 9) which show that he is totally without spiritual insight; and Jesus says so (3.10)”; that “at 7.50f Nicodemus speaks up weakly to his fellow Pharisees ... but he is firmly snubbed, and does not stick to his point. ... He is no real Christian: he is ‘one of them’ (7.50)”; and finally, that at the burial Nicodemus brings a large amount of spices, but Jesus has already been anointed for burial (12:7), and the ointments will be laid aside at the resurrection (pp. 155–56).

60 Note also the close parallel to this verse in P.Eger. 2 (ca. A.D. 150).

5 John may assume here his readers’ familiarity with Synoptic tradition, according to which Jesus was rejected in his native Galilee, including Nazareth (Matt. 13:53–58 par.; Luke 4:16–30; cf. Matt. 11:19 par.). Other instances in which John appears to expect his readers’ familiarity with Synoptic tradition include 1:40; 3:24; 6:67; 11:1–2. The present saying is found also in Gos. Thom. 31 and P.Oxy. 1.6 (van Belle 1998: 27–44). Michaels (1989: 78–79) links the present “welcome” to the Didache guideline that itinerant teachers not stay in a locale more than two days (cf. John 4:40). However, this seems to be both anachronistic and contextually far-fetched.

1.20–21 295n87
8.1088, line 49 361

Josephus

Against Apion

2.13 §140 292n66
2.24 §194 518n32

Jewish Antiquities

1.13.1 §222 43
1.15 §240 508n34
1.19.8 §308 385n41
2.2.4 §18 304n30
2.11.1 §257 147
2.12.2 §271 413n9

87 The phrase “blind ones in heart” is found in P.Oxy. 1.20–21. For the blinding effect of wickedness, see Wis. 2:21. In rabbinic Judaism, this metaphorical usage is very rare (Schrage, TDNT 8:281, 284–86), while Philo, under the influence of Greek philosophy, uses it frequently (e.g., Husb. 17 §81; Heir 9 §48; Spec. Laws 4.36 §189).

66 The term θεοσεβής (theosebēs, god-fearing [only here in the NT]) is occasionally used in Greek writings to mean “religious” or “pious” (Plutarch, Romulus 22.1; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 2.60.4; Epistula ad Pompeium Geminum 4.2). It is also found in Josephus, with reference to David (Ant. 7.7.1 §130; 7.7.3 §153) and others (Ant. 12.6.3 §284; 14.12.3 §308; 20.8.11 §195; Ag. Ap. 2.13 §140), and in Philo (Chang. Nam. 36 §197), who likewise uses the expression in a broad sense to refer to a “god-fearing” person.

32 See also Josephus, Ag. Ap. 2.24 §194: “Anyone who disobeys him [the high priest] will pay the penalty as for impiety towards God himself.”

34 See Ant. 1.15 §240; 13.5.1 §131; 14.14.6 §390; 15.6.2–3 §167–75; J.W. 1.14.1 §276; 1.15.1 §286; 1.18.4 §360; 1.22.3 §440; 3.4.2 §68 (see Schlatter 1948: 329).

41 The evangelist editorializes that “this was to show the kind of death Jesus was going to die” (with σημαίνων [sēmainōn, indicating] serving as a participle indicating purpose [Wallace 1996: 635]). “Kind of death” in the first instance refers to crucifixion (as opposed to, e.g., stoning) but also hints at the fact that Jesus’ death is also “the pathway to his glorification, indeed an integral part of it” (Carson 1991: 444). The same phrase is used regarding Peter’s eventual martyr’s death in 21:19 (Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61, 168). It occurs frequently in connection with Greek oracles (e.g., Plutarch, De Pythiae oraculis 404.D.10), but also in regard to the meaning of names or prophecy (Josephus, Ant. 1.19.8 §308; 7.9.5 §214).

30 Further ancient references are found in BDAG 675, including 1 Clem. 59:4 (psalm quotation) and Barn. 16:5 (an eschatological reference, possibly adducing 1 Enoch). The term is also used in Let. Arist. 112 and Josephus, Ant. 2.2.4 §18. Note also the messianic reference in Ps. Sol. 17:40.

2.12.4 §§275–76 186n51
3.2.3 §48 310n63
3.7.4 §161 547n36
3.8.1 §§193–96 105n17
3.8.7 §210 568
3.10.4 §245 369–70
3.15.3 §318 581n3
4.8.15 §219 160n67, 191

9 This is the only instance of the verb ἀπορέω (aporeō, be at a loss) in this Gospel. The verb's other NT occurrences convey the notion of perplexity (Mark 6:20; Luke 24:4 [cf. 21:25]; Acts 25:20; 2 Cor. 4:8; Gal. 4:20). See also 1 Macc. 3:31; Josephus, Ant. 2.12.2 §271; Life 32 §161; the "Unknown Gospel" 1.63 (mid-second century A.D.) (see Bell and Skeat 1935: 13).

51 Thus, the Roman historian Tacitus writes, "the Jews conceive of one God only" (Historiae 5 §5). See Cohon (1955), who also cites affirmations of God's uniqueness in Sib. Or. (3:11–12, 545–61); Let. Arist. (132–38); Wis. (13–15); Philo (Mos. 1.14 §75; Decal. 12–16 §§52–81); Josephus (Ant. 2.12.4 §§275–76).

63 More literally, the Greek may be rendered "take away our life" (Ridderbos 1997: 368 n. 358). This translation is favored also by Morris (1995: 461, with reference to the same verb, αἶρω [airō, take away], in 10:18), who believes that the Jews are suggesting that Jesus is attempting to destroy Judaism. But in 10:18, αἶρω means "take up," not "take away." Bultmann (1971: 361 n. 5) thinks that this is "scarcely credible" and adduces the parallel expression in Josephus, Ant. 3.2.3 §48: οἱ δ' ἦσαν ἐπὶ τὸν κίνδυνον τὰς ψυχὰς ἡρμέντοι (LCL translation: "hearts elated"). R. Brown (1966: 403) proposes that Jesus is creating a pun on the word ψυχή (psychē, life), using it both with reference to Jesus' giving his life for his sheep and, ironically, to refer to Jesus' "taking away the life" of those who refuse to acknowledge him. In light of the fact that John's Gospel is laden with irony, this is possible but hard to verify.

36 See Repond 1922; Dalman 1928–39: 5.126–29. Josephus notes that the high priestly robe (χιτών, chiton) was "not composed of two pieces, ... [but] one long woven cloth" (Ant. 3.7.4 §161; cf. Exod. 28:31; Rev. 1:13), while Philo uses a robe as symbolic of the Logos, which binds all things together in unity (Flight 20 §§110–12). However, it is far from certain whether the present passage alludes to the high-priestly garment (or the unity of the church, for that matter) (so, rightly, Carson 1991: 614; contra Moloney 1998: 503, 507). Carson (1991: 614–15) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 347–48), following Schnackenburg (1990: 3.274), see in the preservation of the seamless tunic an allusion to the Father's preservation of the Son; Carson also sees a connection with the footwashing.

17 On the temple tax, see Exod. 30:13–14; 2 Chron. 24:5, 9; Neh. 10:32; Matt. 17:24–27; cf. Josephus, Ant. 3.8.1 §§193–96.

3 Parallels to this type of concluding statement can be documented from both secular and intertestamental Jewish literature (Bultmann 1971: 697–98 n. 2). After describing God's creative work and the marvels of nature, one intertestamental book concludes a section with these words: "We could say more but could never say enough; let the final word be: 'He is the all' " (Sir. 43:27). Even closer in wording is 1 Macc. 9:22: "Now the rest of the acts of Judas ... and the brave deeds that he did ... have not been recorded, but they were very many." Schlatter (1948: 362) also refers to Luke 3:17; Josephus, Ant. 3.15.3 §318; 7.7.5 §161; he also notes the exact verbal parallel of γεγραμμένα ἐν τῷ βιβλίῳ τούτῳ found in Rev. 22:19.

4.8.19 §227 418
5.1.14 §44 554n79
6.1.2 §11 363
6.6.3 §§115–16 352
6.11.8 §230 479
7.7.1 §130 292n66
7.7.3 §153 292n66
7.7.5 §161 581n3
7.9.5 §214 385n41
7.11.7 §287 568
8.1.5 §17 504

67 Regarding women witnesses in general, Josephus writes, “From women let no evidence be accepted, because of the levity [lightness, triviality] and temerity [over-boldness, rashness] of their sex” (Ant. 4.8.15 §219). Maccini (1996: 139) too facilely subsumes the witness of Samaritan women under the witness of Samaritans in general.

79 See Josephus, Ant. 5.1.14 §44: Achar “given the ignominious burial proper to the condemned.” Cf. m. Sanh. 6.5.

66 The term θεοσεβής (theosebēs, god-fearing [only here in the NT]) is occasionally used in Greek writings to mean “religious” or “pious” (Plutarch, Romulus 22.1; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 2.60.4; Epistula ad Pompeium Geminum 4.2). It is also found in Josephus, with reference to David (Ant. 7.7.1 §130; 7.7.3 §153) and others (Ant. 12.6.3 §284; 14.12.3 §308; 20.8.11 §195; Ag. Ap. 2.13 §140), and in Philo (Chang. Nam. 36 §197), who likewise uses the expression in a broad sense to refer to a “god-fearing” person.

66 The term θεοσεβής (theosebēs, god-fearing [only here in the NT]) is occasionally used in Greek writings to mean “religious” or “pious” (Plutarch, Romulus 22.1; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 2.60.4; Epistula ad Pompeium Geminum 4.2). It is also found in Josephus, with reference to David (Ant. 7.7.1 §130; 7.7.3 §153) and others (Ant. 12.6.3 §284; 14.12.3 §308; 20.8.11 §195; Ag. Ap. 2.13 §140), and in Philo (Chang. Nam. 36 §197), who likewise uses the expression in a broad sense to refer to a “god-fearing” person.

3 Parallels to this type of concluding statement can be documented from both secular and intertestamental Jewish literature (Bultmann 1971: 697–98 n. 2). After describing God’s creative work and the marvels of nature, one intertestamental book concludes a section with these words: “We could say more but could never say enough; let the final word be: ‘He is the all’ ” (Sir. 43:27). Even closer in wording is 1 Macc. 9:22: “Now the rest of the acts of Judas ... and the brave deeds that he did ... have not been recorded, but they were very many.” Schlatter (1948: 362) also refers to Luke 3:17; Josephus, Ant. 3.15.3 §318; 7.7.5 §161; he also notes the exact verbal parallel of γεγραμμένα ἐν τῷ βιβλίῳ τούτῳ found in Rev. 22:19.

41 The evangelist editorializes that “this was to show the kind of death Jesus was going to die” (with σημαίνων [sēmainōn, indicating] serving as a participle indicating purpose [Wallace 1996: 635]). “Kind of death” in the first instance refers to crucifixion (as opposed to, e.g., stoning) but also hints at the fact that Jesus’ death is also “the pathway to his glorification, indeed an integral part of it” (Carson 1991: 444). The same phrase is used regarding Peter’s eventual martyr’s death in 21:19 (Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61, 168). It occurs frequently in connection with Greek oracles (e.g., Plutarch, De Pythiae oraculis 404.D.10), but also in regard to the meaning of names or prophecy (Josephus, Ant. 1.19.8 §308; 7.9.5 §214).

8.4.1 §100 229n6
8.4.6 §124 565
8.13.7 §350 441n88
9.14.3 §288 153n40
11.5.5 §157 240n52
11.5.6 §162 341n94, 344n116
11.8.2 §310 154n44
11.8.4 §§321–24 154n44
11.8.4 §327 352
11.8.6 §341 151
11.8.7 §346 154n44

6 For example, 1 Kings 8:2, 65; 12:32; 2 Chron. 5:3; 7:8; Neh. 8:14, 18; Ps. 81:3; Ezek. 45:25; Str-B 2:774. Josephus (Ant. 8.4.1 §100) called it “the greatest and holiest feast of the Jews.”

88 Two interesting parallels to the phrase “make our home” (μονὴν ποιησόμεθα) in 14:23 are found in Josephus, where Jonathan is said to have “taken up residence” in Jerusalem (μονὴν ἐποίητο [Ant. 13.2.1 §41]), and Elijah is shown to “make his dwelling” in a cave (ποιοῦμενος τὴν μονήν [Ant. 8.13.7 §350]). Philo frequently speaks of God or the Word as dwelling in people.

40 Some interpreters (such as Lindars [1972: 186]) argue that “five men/husbands” alludes to a tradition cited in Josephus, according to which the Samaritans had five gods (Ant. 9.14.3 §288; cf. 2 Kings 17:24, 30–31), just as “five colonnades” in 5:2 is taken to refer to the Jewish Pentateuch (Hengel 1999: 307, 315). As Blomberg (1995: 8 [cf. Schlatter 1948: 122]) points out, however, in reality the text lists seven gods of five nations (but see Prest 1992: 368; see also the discussion in C. Koester 1990b: 675–77).

52 See Josephus, Ant. 11.5.5 §157; b. Sukkah 48b; m. Sukkah 5.6; 2 Macc. 10:6.

94 The term δακρύω occurs occasionally in the LXX (Job 3:24; Ezek. 27:35; Mic. 2:6; 2 Macc. 4:37; Sir. 12:16; 31:13). Owing to the force of the verb tense in the Greek original (an “ingressive aorist”), “Jesus burst into tears” is a better translation than the customary “wept” (Morris 1995: 495 n. 77; cf. Barrett 1978: 400; Pollard 1973: 441; Stibbe 1994: 45). This is suggested by comparison with instances of δακρύω in the same grammatical form in Greco-Roman and Hellenistic Jewish literature, where the term is regularly rendered this way (see Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 17.66.4; 27.6.1; Plutarch, Camillus 5.5; Pyrrhus 34.4; Pompeius 80.5; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162; J.W. 5.10.5 §445; 6.5.3 §304).

116 Cf. 1 Esdr. 4:58; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162. Hunter (1985: 58, citing Dodd 1963: 183; Fortna 1970: 83) notes that “first-century Jewish custom dictated that ‘prayers were generally said with downcast eyes’ ” (cf. Ps. 131:1a; b. Yebam. 105b).

44 See Ant. 11.8.4 §§321–24; cf. 13.9.1 §256. Josephus further attests to the temple’s existence in 323 B.C., the year of Alexander the Great’s death (Ant. 11.8.7 §346; cf. 11.8.2 §310). See Jeremias 1969: 352 n. 2. On archaeological excavations related to Mount Gerizim, see Crown 1989: 165–74.

44 See Ant. 11.8.4 §§321–24; cf. 13.9.1 §256. Josephus further attests to the temple’s existence in 323 B.C., the year of Alexander the Great’s death (Ant. 11.8.7 §346; cf. 11.8.2 §310). See Jeremias 1969: 352 n. 2. On archaeological excavations related to Mount Gerizim, see Crown 1989: 165–74.

44 See Ant. 11.8.4 §§321–24; cf. 13.9.1 §256. Josephus further attests to the temple’s existence

12.1.1 §10 154
12.6.3 §§279–84 396n4
12.6.3 §284 292n66
12.7.3 §298 536n77
12.7.6 §316 309
12.7.6 §§320–21 309
12.7.7 §325 309
13.2.1 §41 441n88
13.3.4 §74 154
13.4.4 §101 369n9
13.5.1 §131 508n34, 509n35
13.9.1 §§254–56 154
13.9.1 §§255–56 146
13.9.1 §256 154n44

in 323 B.C., the year of Alexander the Great’s death (Ant. 11.8.7 §346; cf. 11.8.2 §310). See Jeremias 1969: 352 n. 2. On archaeological excavations related to Mount Gerizim, see Crown 1989: 165–74.

4 For example, Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs; Assumption of Moses; cf. Jub. 22:10–30; 1 Macc. 2:49–70; Josephus, Ant. 12.6.3 §§279–84. For Greco-Roman farewell passages, see Malina and Rohrbaugh 1998: 221–22.

66 The term θεοσεβής (theosebēs, god-fearing [only here in the NT]) is occasionally used in Greek writings to mean “religious” or “pious” (Plutarch, Romulus 22.1; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 2.60.4; Epistula ad Pompeium Geminum 4.2). It is also found in Josephus, with reference to David (Ant. 7.7.1 §130; 7.7.3 §153) and others (Ant. 12.6.3 §284; 14.12.3 §308; 20.8.11 §195; Ag. Ap. 2.13 §140), and in Philo (Chang. Nam. 36 §197), who likewise uses the expression in a broad sense to refer to a “god-fearing” person.

77 In Hellenistic times, “Friends of the King” constituted a special group honored by the ruler for their loyalty and entrusted by him with responsible tasks (1 Macc. 2:18; 3:38; 10:65; 11:27; 3 Macc. 6:23; Josephus, Ant. 12.7.3 §298). In the early empire, “Friends of Augustus” was a well-known group. Later, the inscription PHILOKAISAR, “friend of Caesar,” frequently occurs on coins of Herod Agrippa I (A.D. 37–44) (cf. Philo, Flacc. 6 §40).

88 Two interesting parallels to the phrase “make our home” (μονὴν ποιησόμεθα) in 14:23 are found in Josephus, where Jonathan is said to have “taken up residence” in Jerusalem (μονὴν ἐποίειτο [Ant. 13.2.1 §41]), and Elijah is shown to “make his dwelling” in a cave (ποιοῦμενος τὴν μονὴν [Ant. 8.13.7 §350]). Philo frequently speaks of God or the Word as dwelling in people.

9 For further primary source quotes, see Coakley 1995: 471–72 (Thucydides, History 4.121; Polybius, Histories 5.26.7–12; 20.7.5; 1 Macc. 10:86; Josephus, Ant. 13.4.4 §101; Plutarch, Cicero 43).

34 See Ant. 1.15 §240; 13.5.1 §131; 14.14.6 §390; 15.6.2–3 §167–75; J.W. 1.14.1 §276; 1.15.1 §286; 1.18.4 §360; 1.22.3 §440; 3.4.2 §68 (see Schlatter 1948: 329).

35 Hence the suggestion that Malchus was an Arab; cf. 1 Macc. 11:39: “Imalkue the Arab”; Josephus, Ant. 13.5.1 §131: “Malchus the Arab,” referring to an earlier namesake. Cf. R. Brown 1970: 812; BDAG 614.

44 See Ant. 11.8.4 §§321–24; cf. 13.9.1 §256. Josephus further attests to the temple’s existence

13.10.3 §§282–83 352n145
13.10.5 §288 237
13.10.7 §299 352n145
13.13.5 §372 369
14.2.1 §21 538n85
14.3.1 §36 527n32
14.9.3 §167 244n77
14.9.3–5 §§163–84 350n138
14.9.4 §172 517
14.10.2 §191 545n26
14.12.3 §308 292n66
14.14.6 §390 508n34
15.6.2–3 §§167–75 508n34
15.8.5 §292 523n5

in 323 B.C., the year of Alexander the Great's death (Ant. 11.8.7 §346; cf. 11.8.2 §310). See Jeremias 1969: 352 n. 2. On archaeological excavations related to Mount Gerizim, see Crown 1989: 165–74.

145 See Josephus, J.W. 1.2.8 §68; Ant. 13.10.3 §§282–83; 13.10.7 §299; cf. t. Soṭah 13.5, with 13.6 referring to Simeon the Righteous (after 200 B.C.).

145 See Josephus, J.W. 1.2.8 §68; Ant. 13.10.3 §§282–83; 13.10.7 §299; cf. t. Soṭah 13.5, with 13.6 referring to Simeon the Righteous (after 200 B.C.).

85 Cf. Josephus, Ant. 14.2.1 §21; 17.9.3 §213; J.W. 2.1.3 §10; Luke 22:1; see commentary at 18:28.

32 See, for example, Josephus, Ant. 14.3.1 §36 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 166).

77 Cf. Acts 25:16; Josephus, Ant. 14.9.3 §167; J.W. 1.10.6 §209; see Pancaro 1972. Later rabbinic rulings concur (Exod. Rab. 21.3 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 81]).

138 Josephus reports several portents of the end taking place in Jerusalem (J.W. 6.5.3–4 §§288–315). Earlier fears are indicated in Ant. 14.9.3–5 §§163–84.

26 Polyglot notices were quite common in the Hellenistic era. Examples include those cited by Josephus (Ant. 14.10.2 §191; J.W. 6.2.4 §125) and the Res Gestae Divi Augusti, which existed in both Latin and Greek. Schlatter (1948: 349) also refers to m. Giṭ. 9.8 (bills of divorce written in both Greek and Hebrew). See also Esth. 8:9. Blinzler (1959: 254–55) refers to still extant Roman tombstones.

66 The term θεοσεβής (theosebēs, god-fearing [only here in the NT]) is occasionally used in Greek writings to mean “religious” or “pious” (Plutarch, Romulus 22.1; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 2.60.4; Epistula ad Pompeium Geminum 4.2). It is also found in Josephus, with reference to David (Ant. 7.7.1 §130; 7.7.3 §153) and others (Ant. 12.6.3 §284; 14.12.3 §308; 20.8.11 §195; Ag. Ap. 2.13 §140), and in Philo (Chang. Nam. 36 §197), who likewise uses the expression in a broad sense to refer to a “god-fearing” person.

34 See Ant. 1.15 §240; 13.5.1 §131; 14.14.6 §390; 15.6.2–3 §167–75; J.W. 1.14.1 §276; 1.15.1 §286; 1.18.4 §360; 1.22.3 §440; 3.4.2 §68 (see Schlatter 1948: 329).

34 See Ant. 1.15 §240; 13.5.1 §131; 14.14.6 §390; 15.6.2–3 §167–75; J.W. 1.14.1 §276; 1.15.1 §286; 1.18.4 §360; 1.22.3 §440; 3.4.2 §68 (see Schlatter 1948: 329).

5 Acts 21:35, 40; see the extensive description in J.W. 5.5.8 §§238–46; both locations are mentioned in Ant. 15.8.5 §292. Cf. the discussion in R. Brown 1970: 845.

15.11.1 §380 109
15.11.3 §395 446n103
15.11.3 §§396–401 310n60
15.11.4 §417 105n15
15.11.6 §421 109
16.6.2 §§163–64 537n82
16.10.2 §311 527
17.4.2 §74 94n22
17.8.3 §199 555
17.9.3 §213 529n41, 538n85
17.9.3 §215 505n12
17.9.3 §216 273n108
17.10.8 §285 527
17.10.10 §295 543
18.1.1 §4 81n96
18.1.3 §13 214n68

103 Cf. Josephus, J.W. 5.5.4 §210; Ant. 15.11.3 §395; m. Mid. 3.8; Tacitus, Historiae 5.5.

60 See Josephus, J.W. 5.5.1 §§184–85; Ant. 15.11.3 §§396–401; 20.9.7 §§220–21. So the vast majority of commentators, including Carson, Barrett, Morris, Beasley-Murray, R. Brown, Moloney, and Burge; contra Ridderbos 1997: 368.

15 See the Greek inscription (discovered in 1870) cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 29; cf. Geva, NEAEHL 2:744; Millard 1997: 243. See also m. Kelim 1.8; Josephus, Ant. 15.11.4 §417; J.W. 5.5.1 §193; 6.2.4 §125.

82 Matt. 27:62; Mark 15:42; Luke 23:54; Josephus, Ant. 16.6.2 §§163–64.

22 See 4:21; 20:13, 15; cf. Matt. 15:28; Luke 13:12; 22:57. Beasley-Murray (1999: 34) cites Josephus, Ant. 17.4.2 §74, as evidence that the address “woman” may be affectionate (but there it is ὦ γύναι).

41 The expression refers to the entire festival in Deut. 16:1–2; Ezek. 45:21; Luke 2:41; 22:1; John 2:13, 23; 6:4; 11:55; Acts 12:4; Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §213; cf. y. Pesah. 9.5 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 212 n. 577).

85 Cf. Josephus, Ant. 14.2.1 §21; 17.9.3 §213; J.W. 2.1.3 §10; Luke 22:1; see commentary at 18:28.

12 So Blomberg 2002: 228–30; Burge 2000: 491; Morris 1995: 656 (though both the LXX and Josephus use the term also with reference to non-Roman military [2 Macc. 8:23; 12:20, 22; Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §215; J.W. 2.1.3 §11]). Cf. the cautious assessment by Ridderbos (1997: 575). Contra Keener (1993: 306), who maintains that both the “detachment of soldiers” and the “officials from the chief priests and Pharisees” refer to the temple police.

108 Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §216; J.W. 2.1.3 §§11–12; see Morris 1995: 420–21; R. Brown 1966: 360; cf. Laney 1992: 169.

96 Though note the appearance of impostors in Galilee, such as Judas the Galilean (Acts 5:37), a man from Gamala in Gaulanitis who refused to pay tribute to Caesar in the days of the census in A.D. 6 (Josephus, Ant. 18.1.1 §4; 20.5.2 §102; J.W. 2.8.1 §118; see Burge 2000: 78; cf. R. Brown 1966: 83).

68 There is a certain affinity between John’s teaching on predestination and the Qumran doctrine of the “two spirits” (1QS 3:14–4:6). The rabbinic view is summed up by a saying attributed to 18.1.3 §14 335

 18.1.4 §16 214n68, 335n65
 18.1.4 §17 237
 p 697 18.1.5 §18 214n68
 18.1.6 §23 262
 18.2.1 §26 512n8
 18.2.2 §§29–30 418
 18.2.2 §34 512
 18.2.3 §36 199
 18.3.1–2 §§55–62 525n15
 18.3.3 §§63–64 543
 18.3.3 §64 510n3
 18.4.1 §85 154n45
 18.4.1 §§85–87 154
 18.4.2 §§88–89 525n16

Rabbi Akiba (ca. A.D. 135): “All is foreseen, but freedom of choice is given” (m. ʿAbot 3.16). Cf. Josephus, Ant. 18.1.3 §13; 18.1.4 §16; 18.1.5 §18; J.W. 2.8.14 §§162–65; see also the excursus in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.265–70.

68 There is a certain affinity between John’s teaching on predestination and the Qumran doctrine of the “two spirits” (1QS 3:14–4:6). The rabbinic view is summed up by a saying attributed to Rabbi Akiba (ca. A.D. 135): “All is foreseen, but freedom of choice is given” (m. ʿAbot 3.16). Cf. Josephus, Ant. 18.1.3 §13; 18.1.4 §16; 18.1.5 §18; J.W. 2.8.14 §§162–65; see also the excursus in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.265–70.

65 See Matt. 22:23–33 pars.; Acts 23:8; Josephus, J.W. 2.8.14 §165; Ant. 18.1.4 §16. See Oepke, TDNT 1:370; Meyer, TDNT 7:46–47.

68 There is a certain affinity between John’s teaching on predestination and the Qumran doctrine of the “two spirits” (1QS 3:14–4:6). The rabbinic view is summed up by a saying attributed to Rabbi Akiba (ca. A.D. 135): “All is foreseen, but freedom of choice is given” (m. ʿAbot 3.16). Cf. Josephus, Ant. 18.1.3 §13; 18.1.4 §16; 18.1.5 §18; J.W. 2.8.14 §§162–65; see also the excursus in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.265–70.

8 He is called “Ananus the son of Seth[i]” by Josephus (Ant. 18.2.1 §26). Ridderbos (1997: 578) lists the dates as A.D. 5 to 16.

15 For example, Josephus, J.W. 2.9.2–3 §§169–74; Ant. 18.3.1–2 §§55–62; Luke 13:1 (?).

3 The earliest references to Jesus’ death in Jewish literature frankly acknowledge involvement in the crucifixion (see esp. b. Sanh. 43a). Josephus’s “Testimonium Flavianum” states that Jesus was “accused by men of the highest standing amongst us” (Ant. 18.3.3 §64).

45 C. Koester (1990b: 673–74) notes that while Samaritans claimed that Moses had hidden the vessels of the tabernacle on Mount Gerizim (see Josephus, Ant. 18.4.1 §85), the Jews traced the roots of Samaritan idolatry to when Jacob’s wife Rachel stole and hid her father’s household gods in that place (Gen. 31:19, 34; cf. 35:4; see Gen. Rab. 81.3 [ca. A.D. 180]; Pseudo-Philo, Bib. Ant. 25.10).

16 Jesus’ trial and crucifixion under Pilate are also attested by non-Christian sources such as the Roman historian Tacitus (Annales 15.44). Pilate’s tenure came to an end in A.D. 36/37, when he was deposed and sent to Rome by Vitellius, legate of Syria, on account of his brutal action in a Samaritan uprising (Josephus, Ant. 18.4.2 §§88–89; see Smallwood 1954). He arrived in Rome

18.4.3 §91 523
18.5.2 §118 192n86
19.6.1 §294 257n30
20.5.1 §§97–98 303
20.5.1 §§97–99 193–94
20.5.2 §102 81n96
20.6.1 §118 146
20.8.5 §§169–72 303
20.8.6 §§171–72 194
20.8.10 §188 303
20.8.11 §195 292n66
20.9.1 §§197–98 512
20.9.1 §§197–203 526n21
20.9.1 §199 237, 516n24
20.9.1 §200 469n33, 526n20

after Tiberius's death (March 16, A.D. 37).

86 The aorist ἠθελήσατε (ēthelēsate, you chose) may be intended as a contrast to the perfect tense forms in 5:33, which indicate the settled condition of the Baptist's witness (Barrett 1978: 265). The word here for "enjoy" (ἀγαλλιάω, agalliaō [found elsewhere in John only in 8:56]) also occurs in the Greek text of Ps. 132:16. Josephus (Ant. 18.5.2 §118) writes that people "were aroused to the highest degree [variant: 'overjoyed']" by the Baptist's message.

30 There may actually have been several treasuries (cf. Josephus, J.W. 5.5.2 §200), the treasury, so-called, being the place where the alms boxes were set up. Several chambers were also used to store valuable items, both temple and private property (cf. J.W. 6.5.2 §282; Ant. 19.6.1 §294).

96 Though note the appearance of impostors in Galilee, such as Judas the Galilean (Acts 5:37), a man from Gamala in Gaulanitis who refused to pay tribute to Caesar in the days of the census in A.D. 6 (Josephus, Ant. 18.1.1 §4; 20.5.2 §102; J.W. 2.8.1 §118; see Burge 2000: 78; cf. R. Brown 1966: 83).

66 The term θεοσεβής (theosebēs, god-fearing [only here in the NT]) is occasionally used in Greek writings to mean "religious" or "pious" (Plutarch, Romulus 22.1; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 2.60.4; Epistula ad Pompeium Geminum 4.2). It is also found in Josephus, with reference to David (Ant. 7.7.1 §130; 7.7.3 §153) and others (Ant. 12.6.3 §284; 14.12.3 §308; 20.8.11 §195; Ag. Ap. 2.13 §140), and in Philo (Chang. Nam. 36 §197), who likewise uses the expression in a broad sense to refer to a "god-fearing" person.

21 Barrett 1978: 533–35; Morris 1995: 695–97; Hengel 1999: 330; Winter 1974. See especially the references in Josephus (J.W. 2.8.1 §117; Ant. 20.9.1 §§197–203 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 164]). Cf. the acknowledgment in talmudic literature that the Jews had lost this power "forty years" before the destruction of Jerusalem (y. Sanh. 1.1; 7.2; on "forty years," see commentary at 18:24 above; loss of this power may have occurred as early as A.D. 6; see also Legasse 1997: 54–56).

24 Among those viewing the present hearing in more unofficial terms are Carson (1991: 584), Ridderbos (1997: 582), and R. Brown (1970: 826). Most other major commentators consider this to be an official trial (e.g., Morris, Barrett). On the Sadducees' reputation for judging in general, Josephus writes that "the school of the Sadducees ... are indeed more heartless than any of the other Jews ... when they sit in judgment" (Ant. 20.9.1 §199).

20.9.3 §209 530n42
20.9.5 §215 527
20.9.7 §219 109
20.9.7 §§220–21 310n60

Jewish War

1.2.6 §63 146
1.2.8 §68 352n145
1.4.6 §97 526n24, 543, 544n18
1.10.6 §209 244n77
1.11.6 §229 355
1.14.1 §276 508n34
1.15.1 §286 508n34
1.18.4 §360 508n34
1.21.1 §401 109n28, 523

33 For example, Acts 5:33–40; cf. m. Sanh. 9.6. According to Josephus, the Jewish authorities (i.e., the high priest Ananus II) were responsible for the stoning death of James the brother of Jesus in A.D. 62 (Ant. 20.9.1 §200). The Jews displayed similar zeal at the martyrdom of Polycarp, John’s disciple (Mart. Pol. 13:1).

20 One thinks of the stonings of Stephen (Acts 7) and of James the half-brother of Jesus in A.D. 62 (Josephus, Ant. 20.9.1 §200), as well as the burning of a priest’s daughter accused of committing adultery (m. Sanh. 7.2).

42 The practice may go back to Hasmonean times and may have been continued by the Romans after taking over Palestine. See Josephus, Ant. 20.9.3 §209; Livy, Roman History 5.13; b. Pesah. 91a. See Blinzler 1959: 218–21.

60 See Josephus, J.W. 5.5.1 §§184–85; Ant. 15.11.3 §§396–401; 20.9.7 §§220–21. So the vast majority of commentators, including Carson, Barrett, Morris, Beasley-Murray, R. Brown, Moloney, and Burge; contra Ridderbos 1997: 368.

145 See Josephus, J.W. 1.2.8 §68; Ant. 13.10.3 §§282–83; 13.10.7 §299; cf. t. Soṭah 13.5, with 13.6 referring to Simeon the Righteous (after 200 B.C.).

24 As when Alexander Jannaeus had eight hundred of his captives crucified in the center of Jerusalem (Josephus, J.W. 1.4.6 §97). Note 4QpNahum 1:6–8: “It is horrible for the one hanged alive from the tree.”

18 Although later Jewish legislation forbids condemning two persons on the same day (m. Sanh. 6.4), it is unlikely that this law was in effect in Jesus’ day, and even if it was, that it would have been honored by the Romans. Earlier, the Jewish high priest Alexander Jannaeus (88 B.C.) had crucified eight hundred persons at the same time (Josephus, J.W. 1.4.6 §97).

77 Cf. Acts 25:16; Josephus, Ant. 14.9.3 §167; J.W. 1.10.6 §209; see Pancaro 1972. Later rabbinic rulings concur (Exod. Rab. 21.3 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 81]).

34 See Ant. 1.15 §240; 13.5.1 §131; 14.14.6 §390; 15.6.2–3 §167–75; J.W. 1.14.1 §276; 1.15.1 §286; 1.18.4 §360; 1.22.3 §440; 3.4.2 §68 (see Schlatter 1948: 329).

34 See Ant. 1.15 §240; 13.5.1 §131; 14.14.6 §390; 15.6.2–3 §167–75; J.W. 1.14.1 §276; 1.15.1 §286; 1.18.4 §360; 1.22.3 §440; 3.4.2 §68 (see Schlatter 1948: 329).

34 See Ant. 1.15 §240; 13.5.1 §131; 14.14.6 §390; 15.6.2–3 §167–75; J.W. 1.14.1 §276; 1.15.1 §286; 1.18.4 §360; 1.22.3 §440; 3.4.2 §68 (see Schlatter 1948: 329).

1.22.3 §440 508n34
2.1.3 §10 104, 168, 538n85
2.1.3 §11 505n12
2.1.3 §§11–12 273n108
2.8.1 §117 526n21, 535n70
2.8.1 §118 81n96
2.8.2 §119 423
2.8.5 §132 415
2.8.14 §§162–65 214n68
2.8.14 §163 335
2.8.14 §165 335n65

28 In J.W. 1.21.1 §401, Josephus dates the beginning of the restoration of the temple in the fifteenth year of Herod's reign (i.e., three years earlier, in 23/22 B.C.), which may constitute an erroneous reference or indicate an earlier point in time when materials first started to be gathered.

34 See Ant. 1.15 §240; 13.5.1 §131; 14.14.6 §390; 15.6.2–3 §167–75; J.W. 1.14.1 §276; 1.15.1 §286; 1.18.4 §360; 1.22.3 §440; 3.4.2 §68 (see Schlatter 1948: 329).

85 Cf. Josephus, Ant. 14.2.1 §21; 17.9.3 §213; J.W. 2.1.3 §10; Luke 22:1; see commentary at 18:28.

12 So Blomberg 2002: 228–30; Burge 2000: 491; Morris 1995: 656 (though both the LXX and Josephus use the term also with reference to non-Roman military [2 Macc. 8:23; 12:20, 22; Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §215; J.W. 2.1.3 §11]). Cf. the cautious assessment by Ridderbos (1997: 575). Contra Keener (1993: 306), who maintains that both the “detachment of soldiers” and the “officials from the chief priests and Pharisees” refer to the temple police.

108 Josephus, Ant. 17.9.3 §216; J.W. 2.1.3 §§11–12; see Morris 1995: 420–21; R. Brown 1966: 360; cf. Laney 1992: 169.

21 Barrett 1978: 533–35; Morris 1995: 695–97; Hengel 1999: 330; Winter 1974. See especially the references in Josephus (J.W. 2.8.1 §117; Ant. 20.9.1 §§197–203 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 164]). Cf. the acknowledgment in talmudic literature that the Jews had lost this power “forty years” before the destruction of Jerusalem (y. Sanh. 1.1; 7.2; on “forty years,” see commentary at 18:24 above; loss of this power may have occurred as early as A.D. 6; see also Legasse 1997: 54–56).

70 According to Josephus, Coponius, the first Roman governor of Judea (A.D. 6–9), “was sent out as procurator, entrusted by Augustus with full powers, including the infliction of capital punishment” (J.W. 2.8.1 §117).

96 Though note the appearance of impostors in Galilee, such as Judas the Galilean (Acts 5:37), a man from Gamala in Gaulanitis who refused to pay tribute to Caesar in the days of the census in A.D. 6 (Josephus, Ant. 18.1.1 §4; 20.5.2 §102; J.W. 2.8.1 §118; see Burge 2000: 78; cf. R. Brown 1966: 83).

68 There is a certain affinity between John's teaching on predestination and the Qumran doctrine of the “two spirits” (1QS 3:14–4:6). The rabbinic view is summed up by a saying attributed to Rabbi Akiba (ca. A.D. 135): “All is foreseen, but freedom of choice is given” (m. Abot 3.16). Cf. Josephus, Ant. 18.1.3 §13; 18.1.4 §16; 18.1.5 §18; J.W. 2.8.14 §§162–65; see also the excursus in Schnackenburg 1990: 2.265–70.

65 See Matt. 22:23–33 pars.; Acts 23:8; Josephus, J.W. 2.8.14 §165; Ant. 18.1.4 §16. See Oepke,

2.8.14 §166 351, 423n9
2.9.2 §169 525n14
2.9.2–3 §§169–74 525n15, 534n67
2.12.1 §232 146
2.12.6 §243 516
2.13.2 §253 543
2.13.4–6 §§258–65 194
2.14.8 §301 537n79
2.14.9 §306 532n53
2.14.9 §308 539
2.16.2 §340 283n27
2.17.3–5 §§411–24 350
2.21.1 §585 531n48
3.4.2 §68 508n34
3.8.5 §375 258n34

TDNT 1:370; Meyer, TDNT 7:46–47.

9 Cf. 13:1; 15:13; see also 1 John 3:23; 4:7–8, 11–12, 19–21. That the early Christians indeed did love one another is attested in the famous statement, quoting observers of Christians, recorded by the church father Tertullian: “See how they love one another” (Apol. 39). Regarding the Jews, on the other hand, the Roman historian Tacitus wrote, “The Jews are extremely loyal toward one another, and always ready to show compassion, but toward every other people they feel only hate and enmity” (Historiae 5.5; cf. Josephus, J.W. 2.8.14 §166). Keener (2003: 926) contends that “[l]ike the Qumran community, John’s outlook is sectarian and dualistic,” but he then proceeds to affirm that this does not negate love for those outside the community. It is unclear to me how, in light of the obvious missionary concern for the world evidenced in this Gospel, Keener can still maintain (even in a qualified sense) that “John’s outlook is sectarian.”

14 The Synoptists use the generic title “governor” (ἡγεμών, hēgemōn) with regard to Pilate (e.g., Matt. 27:2, 11; Luke 20:20). Tacitus, the Roman historian, calls him procurator (Annales 15.44); Josephus uses the equivalent expression ἐπίτροπος, epitropos (J.W. 2.9.2 §169). The famous Latin “Pilate inscription,” found in Caesarea in 1961, identifies him as “prefect” (praefectus) of Judea: [PON]TIUS PILATUS [PRAEF]ECTUS IUDA[EA]E (Vardaman 1962).

15 For example, Josephus, J.W. 2.9.2–3 §§169–74; Ant. 18.3.1–2 §§55–62; Luke 13:1 (?).

67 See the later incident recounted in Philo, Gaius 38 §§299–305, and the parallel in Josephus, J.W. 2.9.2–3 §§169–74. So Carson 1991: 600; cf. Morris 1995: 704. Yet see P. Maier 1969.

79 Similar accounts are given of trials before the governors Festus (Acts 25:6, 17) and Florus (Josephus, J.W. 2.14.8 §301).

53 Similar floggings are recorded in Acts 22:24 (cf. 16:22) and by Josephus, J.W. 2.14.9 §306.

27 Josephus frequently refers to the pool of Siloam. See J.W. 2.16.2 §340; 5.4.1 §140; 5.6.1 §252; 5.9.4 §410; 5.12.2 §505; 6.7.2 §363; 6.8.5 §401.

48 The word is used by Josephus to describe Zealot leadership (e.g., John of Gischala, son of Levi [J.W. 2.21.1 §585]).

34 See Ant. 1.15 §240; 13.5.1 §131; 14.14.6 §390; 15.6.2–3 §167–75; J.W. 1.14.1 §276; 1.15.1 §286; 1.18.4 §360; 1.22.3 §440; 3.4.2 §68 (see Schlatter 1948: 329).

34 According to the rabbis, the person who committed suicide could not pay with his life for the shedding of his blood (cf. Gen. 9:5), so that he must spend the afterlife in a state of damnation

3.8.5 §377 258
3.9.8 §459 165
4.2.5 §§112–13 165
4.3.7 §151 513n10
4.3.7–9 §§151–60 516
4.3.9 §160 513n10
4.4.6 §293 506n19
4.5.2 §317 551n63
4.9.9 §551 354
5.2.1 §51 537
5.4.1 §140 283n27
5.4.2 §146 556
5.4.4 §§176–83 426
5.5.1 §§184–85 310n60

(see also Josephus, J.W. 3.8.5 §375; cf. 7.8.6–7.9.1 §§320–401). In contrast, pagan philosophers often considered suicide to be an “honorable death” (Droge and Tabor 1991).

10 See m. Hor. 3.4; cf. m. Meg. 1.9; m. Mak. 2.6; t. Yoma 1.4. See also Luke 3:2, where the appearance of John the Baptist is placed “during the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas.” Josephus indicates that it was customary for former high priests to continue to be called by that term (J.W. 4.3.7 §151; 4.3.9 §160; see Ridderbos 1997: 579; Moloney 1998: 490; Pancaro 1975: 66–67). The family is mentioned several times in later Jewish writings; it was noted not only for its great size, wealth, and power (b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.18), but also for its greed (see the street-ballad referred to in commentary at 18:3). Its wealth is reported later to have been destroyed by the Zealots.

10 See m. Hor. 3.4; cf. m. Meg. 1.9; m. Mak. 2.6; t. Yoma 1.4. See also Luke 3:2, where the appearance of John the Baptist is placed “during the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas.” Josephus indicates that it was customary for former high priests to continue to be called by that term (J.W. 4.3.7 §151; 4.3.9 §160; see Ridderbos 1997: 579; Moloney 1998: 490; Pancaro 1975: 66–67). The family is mentioned several times in later Jewish writings; it was noted not only for its great size, wealth, and power (b. Pesah. 57a; t. Menah. 13.18), but also for its greed (see the street-ballad referred to in commentary at 18:3). Its wealth is reported later to have been destroyed by the Zealots.

19 “They were carrying” (not in the Greek text, supplied by the TNIV) should in any case not be taken to imply that all carried torches; it would have been sufficient for some to do so. Regarding the carrying of weapons (ὄπλον, hoplon; only here used literally in the NT; cf. Josephus, Life 19 §99 [cited in BDAG 716]), it may be noted that sometimes the temple guards were unarmed (see Josephus, J.W. 4.4.6 §293), but in the present instance both they and the Roman soldiers took no chances.

63 Josephus indicates that application of this passage was later extended to cover the crucified (J.W. 4.5.2 §317; cf. Gal. 3:13).

27 Josephus frequently refers to the pool of Siloam. See J.W. 2.16.2 §340; 5.4.1 §140; 5.6.1 §252; 5.9.4 §410; 5.12.2 §505; 6.7.2 §363; 6.8.5 §401.

60 See Josephus, J.W. 5.5.1 §§184–85; Ant. 15.11.3 §§396–401; 20.9.7 §§220–21. So the vast majority of commentators, including Carson, Barrett, Morris, Beasley-Murray, R. Brown, Moloney, and Burge; contra Ridderbos 1997: 368.

5.5.1 §193 105n15
5.5.2 §200 257n30
5.5.4 §210 446n103
5.5.8 §§238–46 523n5
5.6.1 §252 283n27
5.6.2 §259 556
5.7.2 §304 556
5.9.4 §410 283n27
5.10.5 §445 341n94
5.11.1 §451 543, 543n13
5.12.2 §505 283n27
6.2.1 §103 408n46
6.2.1 §106 408n46
6.2.4 §125 105n15, 545n26

15 See the Greek inscription (discovered in 1870) cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 29; cf. Geva, NEAEHL 2:744; Millard 1997: 243. See also m. Kelim 1.8; Josephus, Ant. 15.11.4 §417; J.W. 5.5.1 §193; 6.2.4 §125.

30 There may actually have been several treasuries (cf. Josephus, J.W. 5.5.2 §200), the treasury, so-called, being the place where the alms boxes were set up. Several chambers were also used to store valuable items, both temple and private property (cf. J.W. 6.5.2 §282; Ant. 19.6.1 §294).

103 Cf. Josephus, J.W. 5.5.4 §210; Ant. 15.11.3 §395; m. Mid. 3.8; Tacitus, Historiae 5.5.5 Acts 21:35, 40; see the extensive description in J.W. 5.5.8 §§238–46; both locations are mentioned in Ant. 15.8.5 §292. Cf. the discussion in R. Brown 1970: 845.

27 Josephus frequently refers to the pool of Siloam. See J.W. 2.16.2 §340; 5.4.1 §140; 5.6.1 §252; 5.9.4 §410; 5.12.2 §505; 6.7.2 §363; 6.8.5 §401.

27 Josephus frequently refers to the pool of Siloam. See J.W. 2.16.2 §340; 5.4.1 §140; 5.6.1 §252; 5.9.4 §410; 5.12.2 §505; 6.7.2 §363; 6.8.5 §401.

94 The term δακρύω occurs occasionally in the LXX (Job 3:24; Ezek. 27:35; Mic. 2:6; 2 Macc. 4:37; Sir. 12:16; 31:13). Owing to the force of the verb tense in the Greek original (an “ingressive aorist”), “Jesus burst into tears” is a better translation than the customary “wept” (Morris 1995: 495 n. 77; cf. Barrett 1978: 400; Pollard 1973: 441; Stibbe 1994: 45). This is suggested by comparison with instances of δακρύω in the same grammatical form in Greco-Roman and Hellenistic Jewish literature, where the term is regularly rendered this way (see Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 17.66.4; 27.6.1; Plutarch, Camillus 5.5; Pyrrhus 34.4; Pompeius 80.5; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162; J.W. 5.10.5 §445; 6.5.3 §304).

13 Seneca, Ad Marciam de consolatione 20.3 (A.D. 37–41); Pliny, Natural History 36.107–18; Josephus, J.W. 5.11.1 §451; Philo, Dreams 2.31 §213.

27 Josephus frequently refers to the pool of Siloam. See J.W. 2.16.2 §340; 5.4.1 §140; 5.6.1 §252; 5.9.4 §410; 5.12.2 §505; 6.7.2 §363; 6.8.5 §401.

46 2 Macc. 6:28, 31; 4 Macc. 17:22–23; Sir. 44:16; cf. Josephus, J.W. 6.2.1 §§103, 106.

46 2 Macc. 6:28, 31; 4 Macc. 17:22–23; Sir. 44:16; cf. Josephus, J.W. 6.2.1 §§103, 106.

15 See the Greek inscription (discovered in 1870) cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 29; cf. Geva, NEAEHL 2:744; Millard 1997: 243. See also m. Kelim 1.8; Josephus, Ant. 15.11.4 §417; J.W. 5.5.1 §193; 6.2.4 §125.

26 Polyglot notices were quite common in the Hellenistic era. Examples include those cited by

6.5.2 §282 257n30
6.5.3 §§300–309 234n28
6.5.3 §304 341n94, 542n3
6.5.3 §305 534
6.5.3–4 §§288–315 350n138
6.7.2 §363 283n27
6.8.5 §401 283n27
6.9.3 §§420–27 377n8
6.9.3 §§422–25 354n153, 368n6

Josephus (Ant. 14.10.2 §191; J.W. 6.2.4 §125) and the Res Gestae Divi Augusti, which existed in both Latin and Greek. Schlatter (1948: 349) also refers to m. Git. 9.8 (bills of divorce written in both Greek and Hebrew). See also Esth. 8:9. Blinzler (1959: 254–55) refers to still extant Roman tombstones.

30 There may actually have been several treasuries (cf. Josephus, J.W. 5.5.2 §200), the treasury, so-called, being the place where the alms boxes were set up. Several chambers were also used to store valuable items, both temple and private property (cf. J.W. 6.5.2 §282; Ant. 19.6.1 §294).

28 See also Josephus, J.W. 6.5.3 §§300–309 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 75). Keener (2003: 715) observes that Jesus will reverse this charge and in 8:41, 44 identify the devil as the “father” of “the Jews.”

94 The term δακρῦω occurs occasionally in the LXX (Job 3:24; Ezek. 27:35; Mic. 2:6; 2 Macc. 4:37; Sir. 12:16; 31:13). Owing to the force of the verb tense in the Greek original (an “ingressive aorist”), “Jesus burst into tears” is a better translation than the customary “wept” (Morris 1995: 495 n. 77; cf. Barrett 1978: 400; Pollard 1973: 441; Stibbe 1994: 45). This is suggested by comparison with instances of δακρῦω in the same grammatical form in Greco-Roman and Hellenistic Jewish literature, where the term is regularly rendered this way (see Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 17.66.4; 27.6.1; Plutarch, Camillus 5.5; Pyrrhus 34.4; Pompeius 80.5; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162; J.W. 5.10.5 §445; 6.5.3 §304).

3 Josephus reports that a certain Jesus, son of Ananias, was brought before Albinus and “flayed to the bone with scourges” (J.W. 6.5.3 §304). Eusebius writes that certain martyrs at the time of Polycarp were “lacerated by scourges even to the innermost veins and arteries, so that the hidden inward parts of the body, both their bowels and their members, were exposed to view” (Hist. eccl. 4.15.4).

138 Josephus reports several portents of the end taking place in Jerusalem (J.W. 6.5.3–4 §§288–315). Earlier fears are indicated in Ant. 14.9.3–5 §§163–84.

27 Josephus frequently refers to the pool of Siloam. See J.W. 2.16.2 §340; 5.4.1 §140; 5.6.1 §252; 5.9.4 §410; 5.12.2 §505; 6.7.2 §363; 6.8.5 §401.

27 Josephus frequently refers to the pool of Siloam. See J.W. 2.16.2 §340; 5.4.1 §140; 5.6.1 §252; 5.9.4 §410; 5.12.2 §505; 6.7.2 §363; 6.8.5 §401.

8 So, for example, Burge 2000: 343. Levinskaya (1996) demonstrates the presence of God-fearers in Jewish assemblies during the first-century Roman Empire. Cf. Josephus, J.W. 6.9.3 §§420–27; Acts 8:27–28.

153 See Reinhardt 1995: 262–63. Josephus (J.W. 6.9.3 §§422–25) provides the unlikely figure of over 2.7 million on the basis of a census taken by Cestius in the A.D. 60s.

6 Kruse (2003: 265) cites Josephus (J.W. 6.9.3 §§422–25), who puts the figure at 2.7 million, which Kruse rightly finds “hard to believe.” Cf. commentary at 11:54–57.

7.4.1 §§70–71 165
7.5.2 §§100–101 369
7.5.2 §§100–103 165
7.5.3 §119 165
7.6.4 §203 543
7.8.6 §323 262
7.8.6–7.9.1 §§320–421 258n34
7.11.1 §§437–40 303

Life

5 §21 506
16 §86 92
19 §99 506n19
32 §161 413n9
41 §207 92
52 §269 146

Philo

Against Flaccus

6 §§36–42 532n57
6 §40 536n77

34 According to the rabbis, the person who committed suicide could not pay with his life for the shedding of his blood (cf. Gen. 9:5), so that he must spend the afterlife in a state of damnation (see also Josephus, J.W. 3.8.5 §375; cf. 7.8.6–7.9.1 §§320–401). In contrast, pagan philosophers often considered suicide to be an “honorable death” (Droge and Tabor 1991).

19 “They were carrying” (not in the Greek text, supplied by the TNIV) should in any case not be taken to imply that all carried torches; it would have been sufficient for some to do so. Regarding the carrying of weapons (ὅπλον, hoplon; only here used literally in the NT; cf. Josephus, Life 19 §99 [cited in BDAG 716]), it may be noted that sometimes the temple guards were unarmed (see Josephus, J.W. 4.4.6 §293), but in the present instance both they and the Roman soldiers took no chances.

9 This is the only instance of the verb ἀπορέω (aporeō, be at a loss) in this Gospel. The verb’s other NT occurrences convey the notion of perplexity (Mark 6:20; Luke 24:4 [cf. 21:25]; Acts 25:20; 2 Cor. 4:8; Gal. 4:20). See also 1 Macc. 3:31; Josephus, Ant. 2.12.2 §271; Life 32 §161; the “Unknown Gospel” 1.63 (mid–second century A.D.) (see Bell and Skeat 1935: 13).

57 Philo tells of people mocking a certain madman named Carabas in the gymnasium of Alexandria in A.D. 38. Dressed in a rug for a royal robe, with a sheet of byblus as a diadem on his head and a papyrus scepter in his hand, Carabas received homage and was saluted as king and hailed as lord, apparently in imitation of familiar pantomimes (Flacc. 6 §§36–42 [ca. A.D. 50]). See also the reference to a similar Persian custom in Dio Chrysostom, De regno 4.67–68 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 169).

Allegorical Interpretation

2.17 §68 488n24

3.59–61 §§169–76 209n52

3.66 §186 82n102

On Dreams

1.39 §§229–30 392n10

1.39 §256 426n26

2.9 §64 451n14

77 In Hellenistic times, “Friends of the King” constituted a special group honored by the ruler for their loyalty and entrusted by him with responsible tasks (1 Macc. 2:18; 3:38; 10:65; 11:27; 3 Macc. 6:23; Josephus, Ant. 12.7.3 §298). In the early empire, “Friends of Augustus” was a well-known group. Later, the inscription PHILOKAISAR, “friend of Caesar,” frequently occurs on coins of Herod Agrippa I (A.D. 37–44) (cf. Philo, Flacc. 6 §40).

24 For example, 1 Tim. 1:17: “the only God”; 6:15–16: “God, the blessed and only Ruler, ... who alone is immortal”; Rev. 6:10: “Sovereign Lord, holy and true.” See also Philo (Alleg. Interp. 2.17 §68: “the only true God”; Spec. Laws 1.60 §332: “the one true God ... the Being who truly exists, even God”; Gaius 45 §366: “the true God”) and other Jewish writings (e.g., 3 Macc. 6:18: “most glorious, almighty, and true God”).

52 See Ps. 78:24; 105:40; Neh. 9:15; Wis. 16:20. See also Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.59–61 §§169–76; Worse Att. Bet. 31 §118; Heir 15 §79; 39 §191; Chang. Nam. 44 §§259–60.

102 Carson (1991: 161) notes, “Since Jesus is about to tell him of greater visions that will be his (1:50–51), there may also be an allusion to the popular etymology that related ‘Israel’ to ʾiš rōʾeh ʾēl, ‘the man who sees God’ ” (cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.66 §186; similarly, Morris 1995: 148 n. 117). On Jacob traditions in nonbiblical Jewish sources, see Neyrey 1982; Rowland 1984.

10 However, the notion of a preexistent Christ who was present and active in the history of Israel is found elsewhere in the NT (1 Cor. 10:4; see also Philo, Dreams 1.39 §§229–30, which, commenting on Gen. 31:13 and God’s appearing to OT Israel, says, “Here it gives the title of ‘God’ to His chief Word”), and later interpreters, using texts such as Sir. 48:24–25, speculated that the prophet looked into the future and saw the life and glory of Jesus (see Ascension of Isaiah [second century A.D.]). Elsewhere the evangelist affirms the impossibility of a direct vision of God (cf. 1:18; 5:37; 6:46).

26 Apocalyptic Second Temple literature provides descriptions of heavenly dwelling places for the saints (e.g., 1 Enoch 39:4–5; 41:2; 71:16; 2 Enoch 61:2–3). Note Luke 16:9, where Jesus speaks of his disciples’ being “welcomed into eternal dwellings.” Philo regards heaven as a paternal house or city to which the soul returns after death (Dreams 1.39 §256; cf. Conf. Tong. 17 §78; Heir 55 §274; Mos. 2.51 §288). The rabbis believed that there were seven classes or departments, graded according to merit, in the heavenly garden of Eden (Midr. Ps. 11 §6); the church fathers held similar views. John, however, is decidedly nonapocalyptic (the exception may be 1:51), and his treatment is much more restrained than Philo’s existential allegorizing. The rabbinic notion of a compartmentalized heaven is likewise foreign to John.

14 Philo refers to “superfluous shoots ... which are a great injury to the genuine shoots, and

2.26 §172–73 450n10
2.31 §213 543n13
2.38 §250 444n97

On Drunkenness

9 §32 606n26

On Flight and Finding

20 §§110–12 547n36
29 §162 165n81

On Giants

12 §§54–55 473n53

On Husbandry

2 §10 451n14

which the husbandmen cleanse and prune” (Dreams 2.9 §64; cf. Husb. 2 §10). For Palestinian horticultural practice, see Dalman 1928–39: 4.312–13.

10 Coins of the first Jewish revolt (A.D. 66–70) feature a vine and branches as a symbol of Jerusalem, and the rabbinic school at Jamnia headed by Rabbi Yohanan ben Zakkai after the destruction of the temple was known as a “vineyard” (m. Ketub. 4.6). Philo, characteristically, interprets Isa. 5:7 in terms of “that most holy vineyard,” the virtuous soul (Dreams 2.26 §§172–73).

13 Seneca, Ad Marciam de consolatione 20.3 (A.D. 37–41); Pliny, Natural History 36.107–18; Josephus, J.W. 5.11.1 §451; Philo, Dreams 2.31 §213.

97 Philo, the Hellenistic Jew, calls peace “the highest of blessings ... a gift no human being can bestow” (Mos. 1.55 §304; cf. Dreams 2.38 §250; see Foerster, TDNT 2:400–417).

26 Examples in Philo (Post. Cain 43 §144; Drunk. 9 §32; Mos. 1.38 §213) are cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 195 (see also Boring 1995: 308).

36 See Repond 1922; Dalman 1928–39: 5.126–29. Josephus notes that the high priestly robe (χιτών, chitōn) was “not composed of two pieces, ... [but] one long woven cloth” (Ant. 3.7.4 §161; cf. Exod. 28:31; Rev. 1:13), while Philo uses a robe as symbolic of the Logos, which binds all things together in unity (Flight 20 §§110–12). However, it is far from certain whether the present passage alludes to the high-priestly garment (or the unity of the church, for that matter) (so, rightly, Carson 1991: 614; contra Moloney 1998: 503, 507). Carson (1991: 614–15) and Beasley-Murray (1999: 347–48), following Schnackenburg (1990: 3.274), see in the preservation of the seamless tunic an allusion to the Father’s preservation of the Son; Carson also sees a connection with the footwashing.

81 Philo occasionally calls God “savior of the world” (Spec. Laws 2.32 §198) or “savior of all” (Unchang. 34 §156; Flight 29 §162).

53 Second Temple literature applies guidance terminology to the figure of divine wisdom (Wis. 9:11; 10:10, 17). The illuminating function of God’s Spirit (or Wisdom) is also prominent in Philo (Mos. 2.48 §265; Giants 12 §§54–55). See also 1QS 4:2.

10 §44 305n36
12 §49 305n36
12 §§50–53 305n36
17 §81 295n87

On Sobriety

11 §55 458n53

On the Change of Names

29–31 §§154–69 272
36 §197 292n66

14 Philo refers to “superfluous shoots ... which are a great injury to the genuine shoots, and which the husbandmen cleanse and prune” (Dreams 2.9 §64; cf. Husb. 2 §10). For Palestinian horticultural practice, see Dalman 1928–39: 4.312–13.

36 Isa. 63:11; cf. Ps. 77:20; Midr. Rab. 2.2 on Exod. 3:1. Philo speaks of a “good” (ἀγαθός) shepherd (Husb. 10 §44; 12 §49) and applies shepherd terminology not only to kings and wise men but also to both God and his firstborn Son or Word (Husb. 12 §§50–53; Post. Cain 19 §§67–68). In non-Jewish circles, too, gods and great men were described as shepherds (Barrett 1978: 374).

36 Isa. 63:11; cf. Ps. 77:20; Midr. Rab. 2.2 on Exod. 3:1. Philo speaks of a “good” (ἀγαθός) shepherd (Husb. 10 §44; 12 §49) and applies shepherd terminology not only to kings and wise men but also to both God and his firstborn Son or Word (Husb. 12 §§50–53; Post. Cain 19 §§67–68). In non-Jewish circles, too, gods and great men were described as shepherds (Barrett 1978: 374).

36 Isa. 63:11; cf. Ps. 77:20; Midr. Rab. 2.2 on Exod. 3:1. Philo speaks of a “good” (ἀγαθός) shepherd (Husb. 10 §44; 12 §49) and applies shepherd terminology not only to kings and wise men but also to both God and his firstborn Son or Word (Husb. 12 §§50–53; Post. Cain 19 §§67–68). In non-Jewish circles, too, gods and great men were described as shepherds (Barrett 1978: 374).

87 The phrase “blind ones in heart” is found in P.Oxy. 1.20–21. For the blinding effect of wickedness, see Wis. 2:21. In rabbinic Judaism, this metaphorical usage is very rare (Schrage, TDNT 8:281, 284–86), while Philo, under the influence of Greek philosophy, uses it frequently (e.g., Husb. 17 §81; Heir 9 §48; Spec. Laws 4.36 §189).

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for “love” is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo’s (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as “my friend” (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

66 The term θεοσεβής (theosebēs, god-fearing [only here in the NT]) is occasionally used in Greek writings to mean “religious” or “pious” (Plutarch, Romulus 22.1; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 2.60.4; Epistula ad Pompeium Geminum 4.2). It is also

On the Cherubim

14 §49 458n53

On the Confusion of Tongues

15 §64 408n45

17 §78 426n26

On the Creation of the World

46 §135 575n19

On the Decalogue

12–16 §§52–81 186n51

found in Josephus, with reference to David (Ant. 7.7.1 §130; 7.7.3 §153) and others (Ant. 12.6.3 §284; 14.12.3 §308; 20.8.11 §195; Ag. Ap. 2.13 §140), and in Philo (Chang. Nam. 36 §197), who likewise uses the expression in a broad sense to refer to a “god-fearing” person.

52 See Ps. 78:24; 105:40; Neh. 9:15; Wis. 16:20. See also Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.59–61 §§169–76; Worse Att. Bet. 31 §118; Heir 15 §79; 39 §191; Chang. Nam. 44 §§259–60.

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for “love” is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo’s (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as “my friend” (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

45 For example, the disobedience of wilderness Israel (Heb. 4:11); godless Sodom and Gomorrah (2 Pet. 2:6); see also Philo, Conf. Tong. 15 §64.

26 Apocalyptic Second Temple literature provides descriptions of heavenly dwelling places for the saints (e.g., 1 Enoch 39:4–5; 41:2; 71:16; 2 Enoch 61:2–3). Note Luke 16:9, where Jesus speaks of his disciples’ being “welcomed into eternal dwellings.” Philo regards heaven as a paternal house or city to which the soul returns after death (Dreams 1.39 §256; cf. Conf. Tong. 17 §78; Heir 55 §274; Mos. 2.51 §288). The rabbis believed that there were seven classes or departments, graded according to merit, in the heavenly garden of Eden (Midr. Ps. 11 §6); the church fathers held similar views. John, however, is decidedly nonapocalyptic (the exception may be 1:51), and his treatment is much more restrained than Philo’s existential allegorizing. The rabbinic notion of a compartmentalized heaven is likewise foreign to John.

19 See also 1 Kings 17:21; Ezek. 37:9; Wis. 15:11; cf. Philo, Creat. 46 §135.

51 Thus, the Roman historian Tacitus writes, “the Jews conceive of one God only” (Historiae 5 §5). See Cohon (1955), who also cites affirmations of God’s uniqueness in Sib. Or. (3:11–12, 545–61); Let. Arist. (132–38); Wis. (13–15); Philo (Mos. 1.14 §75; Decal. 12–16 §§52–81);

On the Embassy to Gaius

24 §159 524

24 §§159–61 536n76

38 §§299–305 523n6, 534n67

38 §§301–2 536

39 §306 523n6

45 §366 488n24

On the Life of Abraham

1 §70 262n56

On the Life of Moses

1.14 §75 186n51

p 698 1.28 §156 458n53, 459n56

Josephus (Ant. 2.12.4 §§275–76).

76 Note especially Tacitus's statement "The closer a man's intimacy with Sejanus, the stronger his claim to the emperor's friendship" (Annales 6.8). See also commentary at 19:8; on Sejanus's anti-Semitism, see Philo, Gaius 24 §§159–61.

6 Gaius 39 §306; see also the incident involving Pilate recounted in Gaius 38 §§299–305.

67 See the later incident recounted in Philo, Gaius 38 §§299–305, and the parallel in Josephus, J.W. 2.9.2–3 §§169–74. So Carson 1991: 600; cf. Morris 1995: 704. Yet see P. Maier 1969.

6 Gaius 39 §306; see also the incident involving Pilate recounted in Gaius 38 §§299–305.

24 For example, 1 Tim. 1:17: "the only God"; 6:15–16: "God, the blessed and only Ruler, ... who alone is immortal"; Rev. 6:10: "Sovereign Lord, holy and true." See also Philo (Alleg. Interp. 2.17 §68: "the only true God"; Spec. Laws 1.60 §332: "the one true God ... the Being who truly exists, even God"; Gaius 45 §366: "the true God") and other Jewish writings (e.g., 3 Macc. 6:18: "most glorious, almighty, and true God").

56 See Philo's portrayal of Abraham in Abr. 1 §70; Migr. Abr. 9 §43; 24 §§132–33; Heir 6 §§24–27.

51 Thus, the Roman historian Tacitus writes, "the Jews conceive of one God only" (Historiae 5 §5). See Cohon (1955), who also cites affirmations of God's uniqueness in Sib. Or. (3:11–12, 545–61); Let. Arist. (132–38); Wis. (13–15); Philo (Mos. 1.14 §75; Decal. 12–16 §§52–81); Josephus (Ant. 2.12.4 §§275–76).

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for "love" is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo's (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as "my friend" (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

56 "Everything that I heard from my Father I have made known to you" ties in the present statement with previous passages in the Gospel (see esp. 5:19–20; 8:26, 40; 12:49–50). Philo cites the proverb "What belongs to friends is common" (Mos. 1.28 §156).

1.38 §213 606n26
1.49 §274 353
1.50 §277 353
1.51 §283 353
1.52 §286 353
1.55 §304 444n97
2.10 §53 394n18
2.48 §265 473n53
2.51 §288 426n26

On the Migration of Abraham

9 §43 262n56
24 §§132–33 262n56

On the Posterity of Cain

26 Examples in Philo (Post. Cain 43 §144; Drunk. 9 §32; Mos. 1.38 §213) are cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 195 (see also Boring 1995: 308).

97 Philo, the Hellenistic Jew, calls peace “the highest of blessings ... a gift no human being can bestow” (Mos. 1.55 §304; cf. Dreams 2.38 §250; see Foerster, TDNT 2:400–417).

18 This emphasis is in keeping with instances in Second Temple literature, where the law seems to take a more active part in the process of judging (2 Bar. 48:47; 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 13:30–35; Wis. 9:3; cf. Philo, Mos. 2.10 §53). John 12:48–50 contains echoes of the Book of Deuteronomy (cf. Deut. 18:19; 31:19, 26; see O’Connell 1960; cf. R. Brown 1966: 491–92). There, it is God who takes vengeance on those who refuse to hear; in the Targumim, it is God’s memra, or word: “And the man who does not listen to his words which he [the future prophet] will speak in the name of my memra, I in my memra will be avenged of him” (Tg. Neof. on Deut. 18:19); “my memra will take revenge on him” (Tg. Ps.-J. on Deut. 18:19). For “the last day,” see 6:39–40, 44; 11:24 (the phrase, with “day” in the singular, does not occur elsewhere in the NT).

53 Second Temple literature applies guidance terminology to the figure of divine wisdom (Wis. 9:11; 10:10, 17). The illuminating function of God’s Spirit (or Wisdom) is also prominent in Philo (Mos. 2.48 §265; Giants 12 §§54–55). See also 1QS 4:2.

26 Apocalyptic Second Temple literature provides descriptions of heavenly dwelling places for the saints (e.g., 1 Enoch 39:4–5; 41:2; 71:16; 2 Enoch 61:2–3). Note Luke 16:9, where Jesus speaks of his disciples’ being “welcomed into eternal dwellings.” Philo regards heaven as a paternal house or city to which the soul returns after death (Dreams 1.39 §256; cf. Conf. Tong. 17 §78; Heir 55 §274; Mos. 2.51 §288). The rabbis believed that there were seven classes or departments, graded according to merit, in the heavenly garden of Eden (Midr. Ps. 11 §6); the church fathers held similar views. John, however, is decidedly nonapocalyptic (the exception may be 1:51), and his treatment is much more restrained than Philo’s existential allegorizing. The rabbinic notion of a compartmentalized heaven is likewise foreign to John.

56 See Philo’s portrayal of Abraham in Abr. 1 §70; Migr. Abr. 9 §43; 24 §§132–33; Heir 6 §§24–27.

56 See Philo’s portrayal of Abraham in Abr. 1 §70; Migr. Abr. 9 §43; 24 §§132–33; Heir 6 §§24–27.

19 §§67–68 305n36
43 §144 606n26

On the Sacrifices of Cain and Abel

38 §130 458n53

On the Special Laws

1.60 §332 488n24
1.63 §345 488n22
2.29 §175 201n14
2.32 §198 165n81

36 Isa. 63:11; cf. Ps. 77:20; Midr. Rab. 2.2 on Exod. 3:1. Philo speaks of a “good” (ἀγαθός) shepherd (Husb. 10 §44; 12 §49) and applies shepherd terminology not only to kings and wise men but also to both God and his firstborn Son or Word (Husb. 12 §§50–53; Post. Cain 19 §§67–68). In non-Jewish circles, too, gods and great men were described as shepherds (Barrett 1978: 374).

26 Examples in Philo (Post. Cain 43 §144; Drunk. 9 §32; Mos. 1.38 §213) are cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 195 (see also Boring 1995: 308).

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for “love” is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo’s (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as “my friend” (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

24 For example, 1 Tim. 1:17: “the only God”; 6:15–16: “God, the blessed and only Ruler, ... who alone is immortal”; Rev. 6:10: “Sovereign Lord, holy and true.” See also Philo (Alleg. Interp. 2.17 §68: “the only true God”; Spec. Laws 1.60 §332: “the one true God ... the Being who truly exists, even God”; Gaius 45 §366: “the true God”) and other Jewish writings (e.g., 3 Macc. 6:18: “most glorious, almighty, and true God”).

22 In his first epistle, John disputes the communion with God falsely claimed by gnostic teachers. In the DSS, “life” and “eternal knowledge” are set in close parallelism (1QS 2:3; cf. 1QS 4:22; 11:3–4). The expression “eternal life” is found in those writings as well (CD 3:20). In Hellenistic and oriental cults, it was the vision of God received by the initiate that was considered to be the source of life and salvation. Philo spoke of “holding that the knowledge of him is the consummation of happiness. It is also age-long life” (Spec. Laws 1.63 §345; cf. Unchang. 30 §143).

14 Philo writes that barley products are “suited for irrational animals and people in unhappy circumstances” (Spec. Laws 3.10 §57). The more well-to-do preferred wheat bread (Spec. Laws 2.29 §175; see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.442 n. 25), which was traded at twice or even three times the value of barley (2 Kings 7:1, 16, 18; Rev. 6:6; m. Ketub. 5.8).

81 Philo occasionally calls God “savior of the world” (Spec. Laws 2.32 §198) or “savior of all” (Unchang. 34 §156; Flight 29 §162).

2.33 §213 239n51
3.10 §57 201n14
4.36 §189 295n87
4.36 §192 353

That God Is Unchangeable

30 §143 488n22
34 §156 165n81

That the Worse Attacks the Better

31 §118 209n52

Who Is the Heir?

5 §21 458n53

51 See Lev. 23:36; Num. 29:35; Neh. 8:18. The eighth day of this feast was also the last festival day in the Jewish year. Philo (Spec. Laws 2.33 §213) speaks of it as “a sort of complement [πληρῶμα] and conclusion of all the feasts in the year.”

14 Philo writes that barley products are “suited for irrational animals and people in unhappy circumstances” (Spec. Laws 3.10 §57). The more well-to-do preferred wheat bread (Spec. Laws 2.29 §175; see Schnackenburg 1990: 2.442 n. 25), which was traded at twice or even three times the value of barley (2 Kings 7:1, 16, 18; Rev. 6:6; m. Ketub. 5.8).

87 The phrase “blind ones in heart” is found in P.Oxy. 1.20–21. For the blinding effect of wickedness, see Wis. 2:21. In rabbinic Judaism, this metaphorical usage is very rare (Schrage, TDNT 8:281, 284–86), while Philo, under the influence of Greek philosophy, uses it frequently (e.g., Husb. 17 §81; Heir 9 §48; Spec. Laws 4.36 §189).

22 In his first epistle, John disputes the communion with God falsely claimed by gnostic teachers. In the DSS, “life” and “eternal knowledge” are set in close parallelism (1QS 2:3; cf. 1QS 4:22; 11:3–4). The expression “eternal life” is found in those writings as well (CD 3:20). In Hellenistic and oriental cults, it was the vision of God received by the initiate that was considered to be the source of life and salvation. Philo spoke of “holding that the knowledge of him is the consummation of happiness. It is also age-long life” (Spec. Laws 1.63 §345; cf. Unchang. 30 §143).

81 Philo occasionally calls God “savior of the world” (Spec. Laws 2.32 §198) or “savior of all” (Unchang. 34 §156; Flight 29 §162).

52 See Ps. 78:24; 105:40; Neh. 9:15; Wis. 16:20. See also Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.59–61 §§169–76; Worse Att. Bet. 31 §118; Heir 15 §79; 39 §191; Chang. Nam. 44 §§259–60.

53 Though R. Brown (1970: 664) notes that in Isa. 41:8, the verb used for “love” is ἀγαπάω (agapaō). Barrett (1978: 477) refers to Philo’s (Sobr. 11 §55) rendering of Gen. 18:17 with the description of Abraham as “my friend” (τοῦ φίλου μου; the LXX reads τοῦ παιδός μου, my child/son). Other Jewish writings apply this designation to Abraham (Jub. 19:9; CD 3:2; Apoc. Abr. 9:6; 10:5; cf. James 2:23) and Moses (Philo, Heir 5 §21; Sacr. 38 §130; Cher. 14 §49; Mos. 1.28 §156), and also to other OT figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Levi (Jub. 30:20; CD 3:3–4), or even the Israelites (e.g., Jub. 30:21), holy souls (Wis. 7:27), or students of Torah (m. Abot 6.1).

6 §§24–27 262n56
9 §48 295n87
15 §79 209n52
39 §191 209n52
51 §256 408n44
55 §274 426n26

Classical Writers

Aeschylus

Seven against Thebes

1.461 339n86, 340n93

56 See Philo's portrayal of Abraham in Abr. 1 §70; Migr. Abr. 9 §43; 24 §§132–33; Heir 6 §§24–27.

87 The phrase “blind ones in heart” is found in P.Oxy. 1.20–21. For the blinding effect of wickedness, see Wis. 2:21. In rabbinic Judaism, this metaphorical usage is very rare (Schrage, TDNT 8:281, 284–86), while Philo, under the influence of Greek philosophy, uses it frequently (e.g., Husb. 17 §81; Heir 9 §48; Spec. Laws 4.36 §189).

52 See Ps. 78:24; 105:40; Neh. 9:15; Wis. 16:20. See also Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.59–61 §§169–76; Worse Att. Bet. 31 §118; Heir 15 §79; 39 §191; Chang. Nam. 44 §§259–60.

52 See Ps. 78:24; 105:40; Neh. 9:15; Wis. 16:20. See also Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.59–61 §§169–76; Worse Att. Bet. 31 §118; Heir 15 §79; 39 §191; Chang. Nam. 44 §§259–60.

44 For example, the prophets' patience: James 5:10; cf. Philo, Heir 51 §256.

26 Apocalyptic Second Temple literature provides descriptions of heavenly dwelling places for the saints (e.g., 1 Enoch 39:4–5; 41:2; 71:16; 2 Enoch 61:2–3). Note Luke 16:9, where Jesus speaks of his disciples' being “welcomed into eternal dwellings.” Philo regards heaven as a paternal house or city to which the soul returns after death (Dreams 1.39 §256; cf. Conf. Tong. 17 §78; Heir 55 §274; Mos. 2.51 §288). The rabbis believed that there were seven classes or departments, graded according to merit, in the heavenly garden of Eden (Midr. Ps. 11 §6); the church fathers held similar views. John, however, is decidedly nonapocalyptic (the exception may be 1:51), and his treatment is much more restrained than Philo's existential allegorizing. The rabbinic notion of a compartmentalized heaven is likewise foreign to John.

86 The term, in verb or noun form, occurs rarely in the LXX (Dan. 11:30; Lam. 2:6; cf. Sir. 13:3), though the evidence is probably late and hardly conclusive (see Lindars 1992b: 94–95). For primary Greek references, see Lindars (1992b: 92–96), who cites Aeschylus, Seven against Thebes 1.461 (sixth to fifth century B.C.) as the only extracanonical reference preceding the present one. The term occurs three times in the Synoptics (Mark 1:43: Jesus “rebukes” a demon; Mark 14:5: some “reproach” a woman for wasting ointment; Matt. 9:30: Jesus “sternly warns” healed men to tell no one). Both τῷ πνεύματι (tō pneumati, in spirit) in John 11:33 and ἐν ἑαυτῷ (en heautō, in himself) in 11:38 represent Semitisms “for expressing the internal impact of the emotions” (R. Brown 1966: 425).

93 This is the meaning of the word in its only undisputed preceding reference in Aeschylus,

AratusPhaenomena

5 30n33

AristophanesEquites

392 163n77

Vespae

608 361n14

Seven against Thebes 1.461, where mares are shown “snorting [ἐμβριμώμενας] in the bridles,” “with their breath whistling in their nostrils (1.463–64), as they brace themselves for the rush upon the enemy” (the latter quote is a paraphrase by Lindars 1992b: 92). It is less clear that people’s unbelief is the object of Jesus’ indignation; if so, why would he join them in their grief by bursting into tears himself in 11:35 (Lindars 1992b: 92)? Schlatter (1948: 254) comments perceptively, “All that John is saying is that Jesus took on a threatening posture and that he was agitated as he went to Lazarus’s tomb. John never provided an interpretation of the processes that moved the inner life of Jesus.” Conway (1999: 147–48) cautions similarly that “we should be wary of delving too deeply into the psyche of Jesus.”

93 This is the meaning of the word in its only undisputed preceding reference in Aeschylus, Seven against Thebes 1.461, where mares are shown “snorting [ἐμβριμώμενας] in the bridles,” “with their breath whistling in their nostrils (1.463–64), as they brace themselves for the rush upon the enemy” (the latter quote is a paraphrase by Lindars 1992b: 92). It is less clear that people’s unbelief is the object of Jesus’ indignation; if so, why would he join them in their grief by bursting into tears himself in 11:35 (Lindars 1992b: 92)? Schlatter (1948: 254) comments perceptively, “All that John is saying is that Jesus took on a threatening posture and that he was agitated as he went to Lazarus’s tomb. John never provided an interpretation of the processes that moved the inner life of Jesus.” Conway (1999: 147–48) cautions similarly that “we should be wary of delving too deeply into the psyche of Jesus.”

33 Cohee (1995: 473) also draws attention to parallels in Greek literature, such as the passage quoted by the apostle Paul in Acts 17:28 from Aratus, Phaenomena 5, and perhaps Cleanthes, Hymn to Zeus 4: Ἐν αὐτῷ γὰρ ζῶμεν ... (“For in him we live ...”).

77 Barrett (1978: 242) points to Greek parallels such as Aristophanes, Equites 392. Partial parallels include Josh. 24:13; Eccles. 2:18–21; Matt. 25:24; see also 1 Cor. 3:6.

14 Though see the texts cited by Coakley (1988: 247–48), which illustrate that although Mary’s act may have been unusual, it was “not unthinkable” (p. 248). Homer (Odyssey 19.503–7) speaks of Odysseus’s feet being washed and subsequently anointed. The Greek poet Aristophanes cites an instance in which a daughter is washing, anointing (ἀλείφει), and kissing her father’s feet (Vespae 608). Athenaeus (Deipnosophists 12.553) reports an Athenian custom among the wealthy of anointing “even the feet with perfumes.” See also Pliny, Natural History 13.22 (putting scent on the soles of people’s feet in Nero’s day); Petronius, Satyricon 70; Curtius,

Aristotle

De mirabilibus auscultationibus

846b.27 49n96

Arrian

Anabasis

6.13.3 569n15

Athenaeus

Deipnosophists

12.553 361n14

Aulus Hirtius

Alexandrian War

10 75

Catullus

Carmina

History of Alexander 8.9.27 (bathing feet in perfumes as a custom of the kings of India); and, in a Jewish context, t. Šabb. 3.16; Sipre on Deut. 33:24. As Coakley (1988: 248) duly notes, of course, none of these passages suggests “that anointing of the feet was an everyday occurrence in Jesus’ day in Palestine.”

96 Greek parallels include Aristotle, De mirabilibus auscultationibus 846b.27; Demosthenes, Orations 47.58.

15 That Mary’s reaction is natural may be illustrated by one incident in the life of Alexander the Great (see Arrian, Anabasis 6.13.3 [cited in BDAG 126]). That it reveals misunderstanding is well argued by Lindars (1972: 607), who writes, “The desire to hold Jesus must be restrained, because it is an attempt to recapture the conditions of the incarnate life in place of the universal and abiding relationship which is the object of his mission.”

14 Though see the texts cited by Coakley (1988: 247–48), which illustrate that although Mary’s act may have been unusual, it was “not unthinkable” (p. 248). Homer (Odyssey 19.503–7) speaks of Odysseus’s feet being washed and subsequently anointed. The Greek poet Aristophanes cites an instance in which a daughter is washing, anointing (ἀλείφει), and kissing her father’s feet (Vespae 608). Athenaeus (Deipnosophists 12.553) reports an Athenian custom among the wealthy of anointing “even the feet with perfumes.” See also Pliny, Natural History 13.22 (putting scent on the soles of people’s feet in Nero’s day); Petronius, Satyricon 70; Curtius, History of Alexander 8.9.27 (bathing feet in perfumes as a custom of the kings of India); and, in a Jewish context, t. Šabb. 3.16; Sipre on Deut. 33:24. As Coakley (1988: 248) duly notes, of course, none of these passages suggests “that anointing of the feet was an everyday occurrence in Jesus’ day in Palestine.”

CiceroEpistulae ad Quintum fratrem

1.2.2 546n29

1.2.13 546n29

In Verrem

2.5.64.165 543

2.5.65.168 543

CleanthesHymn to Zeus

4 30n33

19 First-century B.C. and A.D. references include Plautus, Mostellaria 267; Catullus, Carmina 12.3; Petronius, Satyricon 28.4; Martial, Epigrams 12.70.1; Juvenal, Satirae 14.22. The term originally referred to a piece of linen cloth and was applied to various specific things made of linen, such as handkerchiefs, towels, and curtains.

29 The double perfect of γέγραφα (gegrapha, I have written) conveys a sense of finality, portraying Pilate's action as a fait accompli (Ridderbos 1997: 609 n. 134; Morris 1995: 714 n. 54). Bultmann (1971: 670 n. 2 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 902]) suggests that the first perfect is aoristic; Wallace (1996: 577) lists 19:22 as an example of an extensive perfect focusing on the completion of an action in the past. Similar word combinations are found also in the LXX (Gen. 43:14; Esth. 4:16; 1 Macc. 13:38) and in rabbinic literature (b. Menah. 3a; b. Ketub. 96a; b. Yebam. 106b) (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; further instances are cited in Schlatter 1948: 349). Perhaps significantly, similar phrases are found also in a Roman context (note Cicero, Epistulae ad Quintum fratrem 1.2.2; 1.2.13: scripsi, scripsi). Keener's (2003: 1138) observation that every other instance of "written" in this Gospel refers to Scripture (2:17; 6:31, 45; 8:17; 10:34; 12:14, 16; 15:25), which cannot be broken (10:35), seems of doubtful relevance here.

29 The double perfect of γέγραφα (gegrapha, I have written) conveys a sense of finality, portraying Pilate's action as a fait accompli (Ridderbos 1997: 609 n. 134; Morris 1995: 714 n. 54). Bultmann (1971: 670 n. 2 [cf. R. Brown 1970: 902]) suggests that the first perfect is aoristic; Wallace (1996: 577) lists 19:22 as an example of an extensive perfect focusing on the completion of an action in the past. Similar word combinations are found also in the LXX (Gen. 43:14; Esth. 4:16; 1 Macc. 13:38) and in rabbinic literature (b. Menah. 3a; b. Ketub. 96a; b. Yebam. 106b) (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; further instances are cited in Schlatter 1948: 349). Perhaps significantly, similar phrases are found also in a Roman context (note Cicero, Epistulae ad Quintum fratrem 1.2.2; 1.2.13: scripsi, scripsi). Keener's (2003: 1138) observation that every other instance of "written" in this Gospel refers to Scripture (2:17; 6:31, 45; 8:17; 10:34; 12:14, 16; 15:25), which cannot be broken (10:35), seems of doubtful relevance here.

33 Cohee (1995: 473) also draws attention to parallels in Greek literature, such as the passage quoted by the apostle Paul in Acts 17:28 from Aratus, Phaenomena 5, and perhaps Cleanthes, Hymn to Zeus 4: Ἐν αὐτῷ γὰρ ζῶμεν ... ("For in him we live ...").

Curtius

History of Alexander

8.9.27 361n14

Demosthenes

De falsa legatione

198 533n59

In Midiam

91 533n59

Orations

47.58 49n96

Dio Chrysostom

De regno

4.67–68 532n57

Orations

45.11 97

Diodorus Siculus

14 Though see the texts cited by Coakley (1988: 247–48), which illustrate that although Mary’s act may have been unusual, it was “not unthinkable” (p. 248). Homer (Odyssey 19.503–7) speaks of Odysseus’s feet being washed and subsequently anointed. The Greek poet Aristophanes cites an instance in which a daughter is washing, anointing (ἀλείφει), and kissing her father’s feet (Vespae 608). Athenaeus (Deipnosophists 12.553) reports an Athenian custom among the wealthy of anointing “even the feet with perfumes.” See also Pliny, Natural History 13.22 (putting scent on the soles of people’s feet in Nero’s day); Petronius, Satyricon 70; Curtius, History of Alexander 8.9.27 (bathing feet in perfumes as a custom of the kings of India); and, in a Jewish context, t. Šabb. 3.16; Sipre on Deut. 33:24. As Coakley (1988: 248) duly notes, of course, none of these passages suggests “that anointing of the feet was an everyday occurrence in Jesus’ day in Palestine.”

59 For example, Demosthenes, In Midiam 91; De falsa legatione 198.

59 For example, Demosthenes, In Midiam 91; De falsa legatione 198.

96 Greek parallels include Aristotle, De mirabilibus auscultationibus 846b.27; Demosthenes, Orations 47.58.

57 Philo tells of people mocking a certain madman named Carabas in the gymnasium of Alexandria in A.D. 38. Dressed in a rug for a royal robe, with a sheet of byblus as a diadem on his head and a papyrus scepter in his hand, Carabas received homage and was saluted as king and hailed as lord, apparently in imitation of familiar pantomimes (Flacc. 6 §§36–42 [ca. A.D. 50]). See also the reference to a similar Persian custom in Dio Chrysostom, De regno 4.67–68 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 169).

Bibliotheca historica

1.94.2.8 194n103
8.12.15.10 605
13.111.1 348
17.66.4 341n94
27.6.1 341n94
30.8 408n47
34/35.1.3.9 194n103

Dionysius of Antioch

Epistle

40 47n87

Dionysius of Halicarnassus

Antiquitates romanae

2.60.4 292n66

103 E.g., Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 1.94.2.8; 34/35.1.3.9 (first century B.C.).

94 The term δακρύω occurs occasionally in the LXX (Job 3:24; Ezek. 27:35; Mic. 2:6; 2 Macc. 4:37; Sir. 12:16; 31:13). Owing to the force of the verb tense in the Greek original (an “ingressive aorist”), “Jesus burst into tears” is a better translation than the customary “wept” (Morris 1995: 495 n. 77; cf. Barrett 1978: 400; Pollard 1973: 441; Stibbe 1994: 45). This is suggested by comparison with instances of δακρύω in the same grammatical form in Greco-Roman and Hellenistic Jewish literature, where the term is regularly rendered this way (see Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 17.66.4; 27.6.1; Plutarch, Camillus 5.5; Pyrrhus 34.4; Pompeius 80.5; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162; J.W. 5.10.5 §445; 6.5.3 §304).

94 The term δακρύω occurs occasionally in the LXX (Job 3:24; Ezek. 27:35; Mic. 2:6; 2 Macc. 4:37; Sir. 12:16; 31:13). Owing to the force of the verb tense in the Greek original (an “ingressive aorist”), “Jesus burst into tears” is a better translation than the customary “wept” (Morris 1995: 495 n. 77; cf. Barrett 1978: 400; Pollard 1973: 441; Stibbe 1994: 45). This is suggested by comparison with instances of δακρύω in the same grammatical form in Greco-Roman and Hellenistic Jewish literature, where the term is regularly rendered this way (see Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 17.66.4; 27.6.1; Plutarch, Camillus 5.5; Pyrrhus 34.4; Pompeius 80.5; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162; J.W. 5.10.5 §445; 6.5.3 §304).

47 For example, Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 30.8; Plutarch, Marcellus 20.1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 132).

103 E.g., Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 1.94.2.8; 34/35.1.3.9 (first century B.C.).

87 Euripides, Helen 1234: χάρις ἀντὶ χάριτος ἐλθέτω (“since favor is for favor due”) and Dionysius of Antioch, Epistle 40: χάριν ἀντὶ χάριτος ἀπαιτήσαντες (“asking for one favor in exchange for another”).

66 The term θεοσεβής (theosebēs, god-fearing [only here in the NT]) is occasionally used in Greek writings to mean “religious” or “pious” (Plutarch, Romulus 22.1; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 2.60.4; Epistula ad Pompeium Geminum 4.2). It is also found in Josephus, with reference to David (Ant. 7.7.1 §130; 7.7.3 §153) and others (Ant. 12.6.3

4.74.2 605
5.48.1 605
6.35.2 605
7.69 598n12
11.40.2 506n18

De Thucydide

49.3 605

Epictetus

Arriani epistula ad Lucium Gellium

2.16.13 580n13

Diatribai

3.1.22 259n39
3.26.22 598n12

Epistula ad Pompeium Geminum

4.2 292n66

§284; 14.12.3 §308; 20.8.11 §195; Ag. Ap. 2.13 §140), and in Philo (Chang. Nam. 36 §197), who likewise uses the expression in a broad sense to refer to a “god-fearing” person.

12 This is illustrated by the following passages: Epictetus, Diatribai 3.26.22; Seneca, Ad Marciam de consolatione 20.3; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 7.69; Tertullian, De pudicitia 22 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 194). See Bauer (1925: 232) and Haenchen (1984: 2.226–27), who also note passages in Artemidorus and Plautus; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Hengel 1977: esp. chapter 4.

18 Cf. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 11.40.2: “carrying torches [φανούς] and lamps [λαμπάδας].”

13 Keener 2003: 1211–12. A Greek parallel is “O Lord God” in Epictetus, Arriani epistula ad Lucium Gellium 2.16.13. Only decades later, Pliny attests that Christians worshiped Christ as God (Epistulae 10.96 [before A.D. 115]). Other confessions in John include 1:49; 4:42; 6:69; 9:38; 11:27; 16:30; 20:16.

39 The same phrase occurs in Epictetus, Diatribai 3.1.22: “Well, who are you?” (Σὺ οὖν τίς εἶ) (ca. A.D. 50–120).

12 This is illustrated by the following passages: Epictetus, Diatribai 3.26.22; Seneca, Ad Marciam de consolatione 20.3; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 7.69; Tertullian, De pudicitia 22 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 194). See Bauer (1925: 232) and Haenchen (1984: 2.226–27), who also note passages in Artemidorus and Plautus; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Hengel 1977: esp. chapter 4.

66 The term θεοσεβής (theosebēs, god-fearing [only here in the NT]) is occasionally used in Greek writings to mean “religious” or “pious” (Plutarch, Romulus 22.1; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 2.60.4; Epistula ad Pompeium Geminum 4.2). It is also found in Josephus, with reference to David (Ant. 7.7.1 §130; 7.7.3 §153) and others (Ant. 12.6.3 §284; 14.12.3 §308; 20.8.11 §195; Ag. Ap. 2.13 §140), and in Philo (Chang. Nam. 36 §197), who

Euripides

Helen

1234 47n87

Herodotus

Historiae

2.86 555

2.172 404n23

Hesiod

Opera et dies

826–27 409n51

Homer

Iliad

5.339–42 552n68

15.350 514n16

Odyssey

19.503–7 361n14

likewise uses the expression in a broad sense to refer to a “god-fearing” person.

87 Euripides, Helen 1234: χάρις ἀντὶ χάριτος ἐλθέτω (“since favor is for favor due”) and Dionysius of Antioch, Epistle 40: χάριν ἀντὶ χάριτος ἀπαιτήσαντες (“asking for one favor in exchange for another”).

23 The term νιπτήρ (niptēr, washbasin [only here in the NT]) occurs elsewhere in a Cyprian inscription from Roman times (see BDAG 674). The longer expression ποδανιπτήρ (“footbath”) is found in Herodotus, Historiae 2.172 (fifth century B.C.); cf. ποδονιπτῆρα in P⁶⁶ of John 13:5.

51 Hesiod, Opera et dies 826–27; Seneca, Epistulae morales 75.7 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 132).

68 Homeric mythology held that the gods were bloodless and had a kind of blood-water flowing through their veins (Iliad 5.339–42; cf. Plutarch, Moralia 180E). Stibbe (1992: 118, with reference to Barrett) sees in the flow of blood and water “the paradoxical association of life-giving properties with a dead man’s body.” Less likely is Whitacre’s (1999: 466) “sacramental” interpretation of blood and water symbolizing the Eucharist and baptism.

16 So Morris 1995: 665–66 n. 35, citing Dodd; Carson 1991: 581; Barrett 1978: 526; but see Bultmann 1971: 645 n. 3. The term is used for a “close friend” in the LXX (e.g., 2 Kings 10:11; Ps. 54:14 [55:13 Eng.]; cf. Luke 2:44; see also NewDocs 4.44; Homer, Iliad 15.350).

14 Though see the texts cited by Coakley (1988: 247–48), which illustrate that although Mary’s act may have been unusual, it was “not unthinkable” (p. 248). Homer (Odyssey 19.503–7) speaks of Odysseus’s feet being washed and subsequently anointed. The Greek poet Aristophanes cites an instance in which a daughter is washing, anointing (ἀλείφει), and kissing her father’s feet

Horace

Epodi

2.13 451n15

p 699 Justinian

Digesta

48.20 546n31

Juvenal

Satirae

14.22 404n19

Livy

Roman History

5.13 530n42

Lucian

(Vespae 608). Athenaeus (Deipnosophists 12.553) reports an Athenian custom among the wealthy of anointing “even the feet with perfumes.” See also Pliny, Natural History 13.22 (putting scent on the soles of people’s feet in Nero’s day); Petronius, Satyricon 70; Curtius, History of Alexander 8.9.27 (bathing feet in perfumes as a custom of the kings of India); and, in a Jewish context, t. Šabb. 3.16; Sipre on Deut. 33:24. As Coakley (1988: 248) duly notes, of course, none of these passages suggests “that anointing of the feet was an everyday occurrence in Jesus’ day in Palestine.”

34 The Sibylline Oracles speak of a “heavenly crash of thunder, the voice of God” (5:344–45). The notion of heaven answering human speech in thunder is also found in the ancient Greek world (Homer, Odyssey 20.97–104 [cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 292]).

15 Note Horace, Epodi 2.13: “cutting off useless branches with the pruning knife.”

31 If a later collection of Roman law also reflects earlier practice, then the soldiers were to take Jesus’ clothes into custody but not necessarily keep them for themselves. See Justinian, Digesta 48.20 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 177; contra Barrett 1978: 550).

19 First-century B.C. and A.D. references include Plautus, Mostellaria 267; Catullus, Carmina 12.3; Petronius, Satyricon 28.4; Martial, Epigrams 12.70.1; Juvenal, Satirae 14.22. The term originally referred to a piece of linen cloth and was applied to various specific things made of linen, such as handkerchiefs, towels, and curtains.

42 The practice may go back to Hasmonean times and may have been continued by the Romans after taking over Palestine. See Josephus, Ant. 20.9.3 §209; Livy, Roman History 5.13; b. Pesah. 91a. See Blinzler 1959: 218–21.

Cataplus

15 415n16

De morte Peregrini

6 407n37, 439n79

Gallus

7.9 407n37

Phalaris

2.8 451n12

Timon

54 407n37

Toxaris

22 549n48

Martial

16 Parallels cited in BDAG 670 include Lucian, Cataplus 15 (second century A.D.) and BGU 1978.9 (A.D. 39).

37 Thus, according to Plutarch (first century A.D.), both Cato the Younger and Pompey had a bath before supper (λούω, δεῖπνον) (cf. Cato Minor 67.1; Pompeius 55.6; see also Lucian, Gallus 7.9; Timon 54; De morte Peregrini 6). Keener (2003: 909) suggests that the reference “may allude physically to the ritual purification preceding the eating of Passover.”

79 Plato wrote regarding the followers of Socrates that in the face of their teacher’s imminent death, “they felt that he was like a father to us and that when bereft of him we should pass the rest of our lives as orphans” (Phaedrus 65). A similar phrase is also found in Lucian, De mort. Peregrini 6. See Barrett 1978: 463.

37 Thus, according to Plutarch (first century A.D.), both Cato the Younger and Pompey had a bath before supper (λούω, δεῖπνον) (cf. Cato Minor 67.1; Pompeius 55.6; see also Lucian, Gallus 7.9; Timon 54; De morte Peregrini 6). Keener (2003: 909) suggests that the reference “may allude physically to the ritual purification preceding the eating of Passover.”

12 The Roman writer Lucian portrays God as γεωργός who acts without human collaboration (Phalaris 2.8 [second century A.D.]).

37 Thus, according to Plutarch (first century A.D.), both Cato the Younger and Pompey had a bath before supper (λούω, δεῖπνον) (cf. Cato Minor 67.1; Pompeius 55.6; see also Lucian, Gallus 7.9; Timon 54; De morte Peregrini 6). Keener (2003: 909) suggests that the reference “may allude physically to the ritual purification preceding the eating of Passover.”

48 In antiquity, a dying person ordinarily would entrust his mother to another with a direct charge such as this: “I leave to you my mother to be taken care of” (Lagrange 1925: 494 [cited in R. Brown 1970: 907]; cf. Lucian, Toxaris 22). In the LXX, the adoption formula is generally “you are” rather than “here is” as in the present passage (“ ‘Mother, here is your son’ ... ‘Here is your mother’ ”; cf. Ps. 2:7; Tob. 7:12). The form of expression used in John has a Semitic ring. Speaking of “the official formula of the old Jewish family law,” one commentator refers to a crucified man’s “right to make testamentary dispositions, even from the cross” (Stauffer 1960: 13; cf. Borchert 2002: 269; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.278).

Epigrams

12.70 404n19

Menander

Sententiae e codicibus Byzantinis

532 282n18

Sent. Mono.

1.385 282n18

Petronius

Satyricon

28.4 404n19

70 361n14

137 539

19 First-century B.C. and A.D. references include Plautus, Mostellaria 267; Catullus, Carmina 12.3; Petronius, Satyricon 28.4; Martial, Epigrams 12.70.1; Juvenal, Satirae 14.22. The term originally referred to a piece of linen cloth and was applied to various specific things made of linen, such as handkerchiefs, towels, and curtains.

18 Similarly, Rom. 13:12: “The night is nearly over; the day is almost here. So let us put aside the deeds of darkness and put on the armor of light.” Another proverb, which takes the night symbolism in a different direction, is found in Menander: “The night refreshes, the day brings forth work” (Sententiae e codicibus Byzantinis 532 = Sent. Mono. 1.385).

18 Similarly, Rom. 13:12: “The night is nearly over; the day is almost here. So let us put aside the deeds of darkness and put on the armor of light.” Another proverb, which takes the night symbolism in a different direction, is found in Menander: “The night refreshes, the day brings forth work” (Sententiae e codicibus Byzantinis 532 = Sent. Mono. 1.385).

19 First-century B.C. and A.D. references include Plautus, Mostellaria 267; Catullus, Carmina 12.3; Petronius, Satyricon 28.4; Martial, Epigrams 12.70.1; Juvenal, Satirae 14.22. The term originally referred to a piece of linen cloth and was applied to various specific things made of linen, such as handkerchiefs, towels, and curtains.

14 Though see the texts cited by Coakley (1988: 247–48), which illustrate that although Mary’s act may have been unusual, it was “not unthinkable” (p. 248). Homer (Odyssey 19.503–7) speaks of Odysseus’s feet being washed and subsequently anointed. The Greek poet Aristophanes cites an instance in which a daughter is washing, anointing (ἀλείφει), and kissing her father’s feet (Vespae 608). Athenaeus (Deipnosophists 12.553) reports an Athenian custom among the wealthy of anointing “even the feet with perfumes.” See also Pliny, Natural History 13.22 (putting scent on the soles of people’s feet in Nero’s day); Petronius, Satyricon 70; Curtius, History of Alexander 8.9.27 (bathing feet in perfumes as a custom of the kings of India); and, in a Jewish context, t. Šabb. 3.16; Sipre on Deut. 33:24. As Coakley (1988: 248) duly notes, of course, none of these passages suggests “that anointing of the feet was an everyday occurrence in Jesus’ day in Palestine.”

Philostratus

Vita Apollonii

1.21 534n66

4.44 534n66

Pilate inscription

in toto 525n14

Plato

Apologia

33B 517n31

Leges

9.864E 512

Phaedrus

65 439n79

Republic

7.1–11 131n51

Plautus

66 Two instances of such fear on the part of a judge of one accused whom he came to recognize as a higher being are relayed by Philostratus (Vita Apollonii 1.21; 4.44 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 212 n. 596]). See Bultmann 1971: 661 n. 4.

66 Two instances of such fear on the part of a judge of one accused whom he came to recognize as a higher being are relayed by Philostratus (Vita Apollonii 1.21; 4.44 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 212 n. 596]). See Bultmann 1971: 661 n. 4.

14 The Synoptists use the generic title “governor” (ἡγεμὼν, hēgemōn) with regard to Pilate (e.g., Matt. 27:2, 11; Luke 20:20). Tacitus, the Roman historian, calls him procurator (Annales 15.44); Josephus uses the equivalent expression ἐπίτροπος, epitropos (J.W. 2.9.2 §169). The famous Latin “Pilate inscription,” found in Caesarea in 1961, identifies him as “prefect” (praefectus) of Judea: [PON]TIUS PILATUS [PRAEF]ECTUS IUDA[EA]E (Vardaman 1962).

31 Socrates answered his judges similarly (Plato, Apologia 33B). The Qumran community, on the other hand, preferred secret teaching, as did the mystery religions.

79 Plato wrote regarding the followers of Socrates that in the face of their teacher’s imminent death, “they felt that he was like a father to us and that when bereft of him we should pass the rest of our lives as orphans” (Phaedrus 65). A similar phrase is also found in Lucian, De mort. Peregrini 6. See Barrett 1978: 463.

51 See the discussion of Plato’s “Allegory of the Cave” (Republic 7.1–11 [ca. 390 B.C.]) in relation to John 3:19–21 by Köstenberger (2002c: 38–39), who notes that in Plato’s allegory, the person who has seen the light is the philosopher who is cognizant of the world of ideas and thus is able better to explain reality, while in Jesus’ teaching, the light is himself (cf. 1:4–5; 8:12; 9:5), and people’s main problem is not ignorance but sin (cf. Ferguson 1993: 313–14).

Mostellaria

267 404n19

Pliny the Elder

Natural History

2.188 75n65

13.22 361n14

36.107–18 543n13

Pliny the Younger

Epistulae

10.96 468n25, 539n91, 580n13

19 First-century B.C. and A.D. references include Plautus, Mostellaria 267; Catullus, Carmina 12.3; Petronius, Satyricon 28.4; Martial, Epigrams 12.70.1; Juvenal, Satirae 14.22. The term originally referred to a piece of linen cloth and was applied to various specific things made of linen, such as handkerchiefs, towels, and curtains.

65 Carson (1991: 156–57) points out that the primary support for the Roman time-reckoning theory comes from Pliny the Elder, who notes that Roman authorities (like Egyptian ones) counted the official civil day from midnight to midnight—for example, in cases of leases and other documents that expired at day’s end. But Pliny himself says that “common people everywhere” conceive of the day as running “from dawn to dark” (Natural History 2.188). See also the discussion in Morris 1995: 138 n. 91.

14 Though see the texts cited by Coakley (1988: 247–48), which illustrate that although Mary’s act may have been unusual, it was “not unthinkable” (p. 248). Homer (Odyssey 19.503–7) speaks of Odysseus’s feet being washed and subsequently anointed. The Greek poet Aristophanes cites an instance in which a daughter is washing, anointing (ἀλείφειν), and kissing her father’s feet (Vespaie 608). Athenaeus (Deipnosophists 12.553) reports an Athenian custom among the wealthy of anointing “even the feet with perfumes.” See also Pliny, Natural History 13.22 (putting scent on the soles of people’s feet in Nero’s day); Petronius, Satyricon 70; Curtius, History of Alexander 8.9.27 (bathing feet in perfumes as a custom of the kings of India); and, in a Jewish context, t. Šabb. 3.16; Sipre on Deut. 33:24. As Coakley (1988: 248) duly notes, of course, none of these passages suggests “that anointing of the feet was an everyday occurrence in Jesus’ day in Palestine.”

13 Seneca, Ad Marciam de consolatione 20.3 (A.D. 37–41); Pliny, Natural History 36.107–18; Josephus, J.W. 5.11.1 §451; Philo, Dreams 2.31 §213.

25 Cf. Pliny the Younger, Epistulae 10.96 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 148; cf. Stählin, TDNT 7:339–58).

91 Latin literature usually uses the indirect expression Duci iussit, “He ordered him to be led off” (e.g., Pliny, Epistulae 10.96; see Sherwin-White 1963: 27).

13 Keener 2003: 1211–12. A Greek parallel is “O Lord God” in Epictetus, Arriani epistula ad Lucium Gellium 2.16.13. Only decades later, Pliny attests that Christians worshiped Christ as God (Epistulae 10.96 [before A.D. 115]). Other confessions in John include 1:49; 4:42; 6:69;

Plutarch

Camillus

5.5 341n94

Cato Minor

56.4 334n59

67.1 407n37

Cicero

43 369n9

De Alexandri magni fortuna aut virtute

6 307n51

De Pythiae oraculis

404.D.10 385n41

De sollertia animalium

9:38; 11:27; 16:30; 20:16.

94 The term δακρύω occurs occasionally in the LXX (Job 3:24; Ezek. 27:35; Mic. 2:6; 2 Macc. 4:37; Sir. 12:16; 31:13). Owing to the force of the verb tense in the Greek original (an “ingressive aorist”), “Jesus burst into tears” is a better translation than the customary “wept” (Morris 1995: 495 n. 77; cf. Barrett 1978: 400; Pollard 1973: 441; Stibbe 1994: 45). This is suggested by comparison with instances of δακρύω in the same grammatical form in Greco-Roman and Hellenistic Jewish literature, where the term is regularly rendered this way (see Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 17.66.4; 27.6.1; Plutarch, Camillus 5.5; Pyrrhus 34.4; Pompeius 80.5; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162; J.W. 5.10.5 §445; 6.5.3 §304).

59 See Job 2:8, 13; Ezek. 8:14; cf. Ruth Rab. 2.14. A sitting posture was also common for mourners in ancient Rome, being adopted by, for example, Cato when learning of the defeat at Pharsalus (Plutarch, Cato Minor 56.4).

37 Thus, according to Plutarch (first century A.D.), both Cato the Younger and Pompey had a bath before supper (λούω, δείπνον) (cf. Cato Minor 67.1; Pompeius 55.6; see also Lucian, Gallus 7.9; Timon 54; De morte Peregrini 6). Keener (2003: 909) suggests that the reference “may allude physically to the ritual purification preceding the eating of Passover.”

9 For further primary source quotes, see Coakley 1995: 471–72 (Thucydides, History 4.121; Polybius, Histories 5.26.7–12; 20.7.5; 1 Macc. 10:86; Josephus, Ant. 13.4.4 §101; Plutarch, Cicero 43).

51 Leaders who promoted unity were also prized in the Hellenistic world (e.g., Plutarch, De Alexandri magni fortuna aut virtute 6 [cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 288]).

41 The evangelist editorializes that “this was to show the kind of death Jesus was going to die” (with σημαίνων [sēmainōn, indicating] serving as a participle indicating purpose [Wallace 1996: 635]). “Kind of death” in the first instance refers to crucifixion (as opposed to, e.g., stoning) but also hints at the fact that Jesus’ death is also “the pathway to his glorification, indeed an integral part of it” (Carson 1991: 444). The same phrase is used regarding Peter’s eventual martyr’s death in 21:19 (Köstenberger 1998b: 154–61, 168). It occurs frequently in connection with Greek oracles (e.g., Plutarch, De Pythiae oraculis 404.D.10), but also in regard to the meaning of names or prophecy (Josephus, Ant. 1.19.8 §308; 7.9.5 §214).

977.F 592n25

Galba

16.1 363

Marcellus

20.1 408n47

Moralia

180E 552n68

Mulierum virtutes

243.D.7 605

Pompeius

55.6 407n37

80.5 341n94

Pyrrhus

34.4 341n94

25 Wallace (1996: 155) classifies τῷ πλοιαρίῳ (tō ploiarīō, in the boat) as a dative of sphere and τῶν ἰχθύων (tōn ichthyōn, of the fish) as a genitive of content (1996: 93). The word for “towing” or “dragging” (σύρω, syrō; used elsewhere in the NT only figuratively) occurs in connection with a trawl net in Plutarch, De sollertia animalium 977.F. Carson (1991: 671) sees in the narrator’s staying with the disciples in the boat rather than following Peter in his encounter with Jesus “a small indication of eyewitness integrity.” If the narrator is none other than John, the son of Zebedee, of course, he himself would have been in that boat, which may further explain why the story is told the way it is.

47 For example, Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 30.8; Plutarch, Marcellus 20.1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 132).

68 Homeric mythology held that the gods were bloodless and had a kind of blood-water flowing through their veins (Iliad 5.339–42; cf. Plutarch, Moralia 180E). Stibbe (1992: 118, with reference to Barrett) sees in the flow of blood and water “the paradoxical association of life-giving properties with a dead man’s body.” Less likely is Whitacre’s (1999: 466) “sacramental” interpretation of blood and water symbolizing the Eucharist and baptism.

37 Thus, according to Plutarch (first century A.D.), both Cato the Younger and Pompey had a bath before supper (λούω, δεῖπνον) (cf. Cato Minor 67.1; Pompeius 55.6; see also Lucian, Gallus 7.9; Timon 54; De morte Peregrini 6). Keener (2003: 909) suggests that the reference “may allude physically to the ritual purification preceding the eating of Passover.”

94 The term δακρύω occurs occasionally in the LXX (Job 3:24; Ezek. 27:35; Mic. 2:6; 2 Macc. 4:37; Sir. 12:16; 31:13). Owing to the force of the verb tense in the Greek original (an “ingressive aorist”), “Jesus burst into tears” is a better translation than the customary “wept” (Morris 1995: 495 n. 77; cf. Barrett 1978: 400; Pollard 1973: 441; Stibbe 1994: 45). This is suggested by comparison with instances of δακρύω in the same grammatical form in Greco-Roman and Hellenistic Jewish literature, where the term is regularly rendered this way (see Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 17.66.4; 27.6.1; Plutarch, Camillus 5.5; Pyrrhus 34.4; Pompeius 80.5; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162; J.W. 5.10.5 §445; 6.5.3 §304).

94 The term δακρύω occurs occasionally in the LXX (Job 3:24; Ezek. 27:35; Mic. 2:6; 2 Macc.

Romulus

22.1 292n66

Polybius

Histories

5.26.7–12 369n9

11.23 505n13

20.7.5 369n9

Quintilian

Declamationes

6.9 551n62

Res Gestae Divi Augusti

4:37; Sir. 12:16; 31:13). Owing to the force of the verb tense in the Greek original (an “ingressive aorist”), “Jesus burst into tears” is a better translation than the customary “wept” (Morris 1995: 495 n. 77; cf. Barrett 1978: 400; Pollard 1973: 441; Stibbe 1994: 45). This is suggested by comparison with instances of δακρύω in the same grammatical form in Greco-Roman and Hellenistic Jewish literature, where the term is regularly rendered this way (see Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica 17.66.4; 27.6.1; Plutarch, Camillus 5.5; Pyrrhus 34.4; Pompeius 80.5; Josephus, Ant. 11.5.6 §162; J.W. 5.10.5 §445; 6.5.3 §304).

66 The term θεοσεβής (theosebēs, god-fearing [only here in the NT]) is occasionally used in Greek writings to mean “religious” or “pious” (Plutarch, Romulus 22.1; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 2.60.4; Epistula ad Pompeium Geminum 4.2). It is also found in Josephus, with reference to David (Ant. 7.7.1 §130; 7.7.3 §153) and others (Ant. 12.6.3 §284; 14.12.3 §308; 20.8.11 §195; Ag. Ap. 2.13 §140), and in Philo (Chang. Nam. 36 §197), who likewise uses the expression in a broad sense to refer to a “god-fearing” person.

9 For further primary source quotes, see Coakley 1995: 471–72 (Thucydides, History 4.121; Polybius, Histories 5.26.7–12; 20.7.5; 1 Macc. 10:86; Josephus, Ant. 13.4.4 §101; Plutarch, Cicero 43).

13 The term χιλίαρχος (chiliarchos) was used to translate the Roman tribunus militum, a commander of a cohort of six hundred or even as few as two hundred soldiers (e.g., Polybius, Histories 11.23; the LXX features twenty-nine instances of χιλίαρχος for civil or military officials). Stibbe (1992: 170) thinks that the σπεῖρα probably consisted of two hundred soldiers. See the discussion by Morris (1995: 656 n. 5), who suggests that the use of σπεῖρα with the definite article here may indicate that a specific cohort is meant.

9 For further primary source quotes, see Coakley 1995: 471–72 (Thucydides, History 4.121; Polybius, Histories 5.26.7–12; 20.7.5; 1 Macc. 10:86; Josephus, Ant. 13.4.4 §101; Plutarch, Cicero 43).

62 Though Roman law does seem to have allowed burial of crucified people, as is suggested by a passage attributed to the first-century A.D. rhetorician Quintilian (Declamationes 6.9 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 179]).

in toto 545n26

Seneca

Ad Marciam de consolatione

20.3 543n13, 598n12

De ira

2.7.3 524n8

Epistulae morales

75.7 409n51

Suetonius

Caligula

32 369n8

Domitian

10.1 544n21

13.2 580

Nero

16 464n3

26 Polyglot notices were quite common in the Hellenistic era. Examples include those cited by Josephus (Ant. 14.10.2 §191; J.W. 6.2.4 §125) and the Res Gestae Divi Augusti, which existed in both Latin and Greek. Schlatter (1948: 349) also refers to m. Git. 9.8 (bills of divorce written in both Greek and Hebrew). See also Esth. 8:9. Blinzler (1959: 254–55) refers to still extant Roman tombstones.

13 Seneca, Ad Marciam de consolatione 20.3 (A.D. 37–41); Pliny, Natural History 36.107–18; Josephus, J.W. 5.11.1 §451; Philo, Dreams 2.31 §213.

12 This is illustrated by the following passages: Epictetus, Diatribai 3.26.22; Seneca, Ad Marciam de consolatione 20.3; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 7.69; Tertullian, De pudicitia 22 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 194). See Bauer (1925: 232) and Haenchen (1984: 2.226–27), who also note passages in Artemidorus and Plautus; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Hengel 1977: esp. chapter 4.

8 See the evidence cited in Sherwin-White 1963: 45, with primary references. See also Seneca, De ira 2.7.3.

51 Hesiod, Opera et dies 826–27; Seneca, Epistulae morales 75.7 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 132).

8 Cf. Lev. Rab. 30.2. The Greco-Roman world knew palm branches as symbols of victory (e.g., Suetonius, Caligula 32).

21 See Suetonius, Domitian 10.1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 176). Though instances are known in which a condemned man carried the notice around his neck or had it carried in front of him—such as “Attalus the Christian” during Marcus Aurelius’s reign in the amphitheater in Lyons (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.44)—there is little or no evidence for the custom of affixing it to a cross.

Tiberius

58 536n74
73 55n2

Tacitus

Annales

3.38 536n74
4 §4 55n2
6.8 536n76
15.44 461, 464n3, 525n14, 525n16

3 The world's hatred was experienced by Christians long before John wrote. The Roman historians Tacitus (Annales 15.44) and Suetonius (Nero 16) both called Christianity "a mischievous superstition." See also the charges leveled against the early Christians listed in Köstenberger 2002c: 147, citing Barclay 1975: 2.183–85. Still useful are Frend 1967 and Workman 1923. Keener (2003: 1017) claims that the worldview presupposed in 15:18–25 is "one common to sectarian groups, in which apocalyptic ideologies (in the modern sense of that expression) often prevail" (though he later acknowledges degrees of "sectarian" outlook [quotation marks his]). In his following paragraph, Keener does concede, however, that John's emphasis here "probably [but perhaps not?] stems from authentic Jesus tradition." Did Jesus, then, propagate a sectarian worldview? And, if so, in what sense?

74 See Suetonius, Tiberius 58; Tacitus, Annales 3.38.

2 See Hoehner (1977: 31–37) and Messner (1998), with reference to the Roman historians Tacitus (Annales 4 §4) and Suetonius (Tiberius 73), both of whom date the beginning of Tiberius's reign at A.D. 14 (the precise date is August 19, the day of Emperor Augustus's death); see also commentary at 2:20–21. It is unclear why Hengel (1999: 322) dates Tiberius's fifteenth year to ca. A.D. 27/28.

74 See Suetonius, Tiberius 58; Tacitus, Annales 3.38.

2 See Hoehner (1977: 31–37) and Messner (1998), with reference to the Roman historians Tacitus (Annales 4 §4) and Suetonius (Tiberius 73), both of whom date the beginning of Tiberius's reign at A.D. 14 (the precise date is August 19, the day of Emperor Augustus's death); see also commentary at 2:20–21. It is unclear why Hengel (1999: 322) dates Tiberius's fifteenth year to ca. A.D. 27/28.

76 Note especially Tacitus's statement "The closer a man's intimacy with Sejanus, the stronger his claim to the emperor's friendship" (Annales 6.8). See also commentary at 19:8; on Sejanus's anti-Semitism, see Philo, Gaius 24 §§159–61.

3 The world's hatred was experienced by Christians long before John wrote. The Roman historians Tacitus (Annales 15.44) and Suetonius (Nero 16) both called Christianity "a mischievous superstition." See also the charges leveled against the early Christians listed in Köstenberger 2002c: 147, citing Barclay 1975: 2.183–85. Still useful are Frend 1967 and Workman 1923. Keener (2003: 1017) claims that the worldview presupposed in 15:18–25 is "one common to sectarian groups, in which apocalyptic ideologies (in the modern sense of that expression) often prevail" (though he later acknowledges degrees of "sectarian" outlook [quotation marks his]). In his following paragraph, Keener does concede, however, that John's emphasis here "probably [but perhaps not?] stems from authentic Jesus tradition." Did Jesus,

Historiae

5.5 185n51, 423n9, 446n103

ThemistiusPeri Philanthropias

9d–10c 300n8

ThucydidesHistory of the Peloponnesian War

1.1.1 604n17

then, propagate a sectarian worldview? And, if so, in what sense?

14 The Synoptists use the generic title “governor” (ἡγεμών, hēgemōn) with regard to Pilate (e.g., Matt. 27:2, 11; Luke 20:20). Tacitus, the Roman historian, calls him procurator (Annales 15.44); Josephus uses the equivalent expression ἐπίτροπος, epitropos (J.W. 2.9.2 §169). The famous Latin “Pilate inscription,” found in Caesarea in 1961, identifies him as “prefect” (praefectus) of Judea: [PON]TIUS PILATUS [PRAEF]ECTUS IUDA[EA]E (Vardaman 1962).

16 Jesus’ trial and crucifixion under Pilate are also attested by non-Christian sources such as the Roman historian Tacitus (Annales 15.44). Pilate’s tenure came to an end in A.D. 36/37, when he was deposed and sent to Rome by Vitellius, legate of Syria, on account of his brutal action in a Samaritan uprising (Josephus, Ant. 18.4.2 §§88–89; see Smallwood 1954). He arrived in Rome after Tiberius’s death (March 16, A.D. 37).

51 Thus, the Roman historian Tacitus writes, “the Jews conceive of one God only” (Historiae 5 §5). See Cohon (1955), who also cites affirmations of God’s uniqueness in Sib. Or. (3:11–12, 545–61); Let. Arist. (132–38); Wis. (13–15); Philo (Mos. 1.14 §75; Decal. 12–16 §§52–81); Josephus (Ant. 2.12.4 §§275–76).

9 Cf. 13:1; 15:13; see also 1 John 3:23; 4:7–8, 11–12, 19–21. That the early Christians indeed did love one another is attested in the famous statement, quoting observers of Christians, recorded by the church father Tertullian: “See how they love one another” (Apol. 39). Regarding the Jews, on the other hand, the Roman historian Tacitus wrote, “The Jews are extremely loyal toward one another, and always ready to show compassion, but toward every other people they feel only hate and enmity” (Historiae 5.5; cf. Josephus, J.W. 2.8.14 §166). Keener (2003: 926) contends that “[l]ike the Qumran community, John’s outlook is sectarian and dualistic,” but he then proceeds to affirm that this does not negate love for those outside the community. It is unclear to me how, in light of the obvious missionary concern for the world evidenced in this Gospel, Keener can still maintain (even in a qualified sense) that “John’s outlook is sectarian.”

103 Cf. Josephus, J.W. 5.5.4 §210; Ant. 15.11.3 §395; m. Mid. 3.8; Tacitus, Historiae 5.5.

8 Though the OT is doubtless John’s primary point of reference, the kind of imagery employed by the evangelist would not have been unknown to his Hellenistic audience. Cf. Themistius, Peri Philanthr. 9d–10c (fourth century A.D.), cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 286.

17 “This is the disciple,” “his testimony.” See especially 19:35. Compare also Jesus’ final prayer, where Jesus refers to himself as “Jesus Christ” (17:3), and Thucydides’ practice of introducing

4.104.4 604n17
4.121 369n9
5.26.1 604n17

Vitae Aesopi

61.9 (Vita W) 404n18
61.13 404n18
67.4 (Vita G) 404n18

Xenophon

Cyropaedia

7.1.3 590n18

Oeconomicus

18.6 451n13

himself in the third person (History of the Peloponnesian War 1.1.1; 5.26.1) and of referring to himself as “Thucydides” (ibid., 4.104.4: “Thucydides, the son of Oloros, who composed this history”; this is also true of Julius Caesar in Gallic Wars). See Jackson 1999: 27; see also there pp. 28–20 on Josephus.

17 “This is the disciple,” “his testimony.” See especially 19:35. Compare also Jesus’ final prayer, where Jesus refers to himself as “Jesus Christ” (17:3), and Thucydides’ practice of introducing himself in the third person (History of the Peloponnesian War 1.1.1; 5.26.1) and of referring to himself as “Thucydides” (ibid., 4.104.4: “Thucydides, the son of Oloros, who composed this history”; this is also true of Julius Caesar in Gallic Wars). See Jackson 1999: 27; see also there pp. 28–20 on Josephus.

9 For further primary source quotes, see Coakley 1995: 471–72 (Thucydides, History 4.121; Polybius, Histories 5.26.7–12; 20.7.5; 1 Macc. 10:86; Josephus, Ant. 13.4.4 §101; Plutarch, Cicero 43).

17 “This is the disciple,” “his testimony.” See especially 19:35. Compare also Jesus’ final prayer, where Jesus refers to himself as “Jesus Christ” (17:3), and Thucydides’ practice of introducing himself in the third person (History of the Peloponnesian War 1.1.1; 5.26.1) and of referring to himself as “Thucydides” (ibid., 4.104.4: “Thucydides, the son of Oloros, who composed this history”; this is also true of Julius Caesar in Gallic Wars). See Jackson 1999: 27; see also there pp. 28–20 on Josephus.

18 The possible exception is Vitae Aesopi 61.13; 67.4 (Vita G); 61.9 (Vita W).

18 The possible exception is Vitae Aesopi 61.13; 67.4 (Vita G); 61.9 (Vita W).

18 The possible exception is Vitae Aesopi 61.13; 67.4 (Vita G); 61.9 (Vita W).

18 See Matt. 25:33; cf., e.g., Xenophon, Cyropaedia 7.1.3. See Str-B 1:980; BDAG 217. Brodie (1993: 584) draws rather precarious conclusions from the fact that the only other instance of the term “right” in this Gospel is Peter’s cutting off of Malchus’s right ear in 18:10.

13 Westcott (1908: 2.198) notes, “Everything is removed from the branch which tends to divert the vital power from the production of fruit.” The term καθαίρω (kathairō, prune) is rare in the LXX and occurs only here in the NT. It is found frequently with reference to agricultural processes (though not necessarily pruning) in secular Greek (e.g., Xenophon, Oeconomicus 18.6; 20.11). On cutting, see Matt. 3:10 par.; 7:19; Rom. 11:22, 24 (ἐκκόπτω, ekkoptō, cut off). On

20.11 451n13
20.20 453n19

p 700 Church Fathers

Augustine

De consensu evangelistarum

6 1n1

In Iohannis Evangelium

124.1 601n6

pruning, see Isa. 18:5; Jer. 5:10 (cf. Heb. 12:4–11). Commentators are virtually unanimous in detecting a play on words in the parallel use of αἶρω (airō, remove) and καθαίρω in 15:2 (e.g., Carson 1991: 515).

13 Westcott (1908: 2.198) notes, “Everything is removed from the branch which tends to divert the vital power from the production of fruit.” The term καθαίρω (kathairō, prune) is rare in the LXX and occurs only here in the NT. It is found frequently with reference to agricultural processes (though not necessarily pruning) in secular Greek (e.g., Xenophon, Oeconomicus 18.6; 20.11). On cutting, see Matt. 3:10 par.; 7:19; Rom. 11:22, 24 (ἐκκόπτω, ekkoptō, cut off). On pruning, see Isa. 18:5; Jer. 5:10 (cf. Heb. 12:4–11). Commentators are virtually unanimous in detecting a play on words in the parallel use of αἶρω (airō, remove) and καθαίρω in 15:2 (e.g., Carson 1991: 515).

19 The adjective καθαρός (katharos, clean; cf. the verb καθαίρω [kathairō] rendered “prune” in 15:2) is occasionally used in Greek literature in connection with the growth of vines (Xenophon, Oeconomicus 20.20: καθαίρει αἱ ἄμπελοι). Westcott (1908: 2.199) suggests that the word may contain an allusion to Lev. 19:23.

1 Taking their point of departure from the four beasts in Ezek. 1:10 and Rev. 4:6–8, the Fathers described John as an eagle. See, for example, Augustine, De consensu evangelistarum 6 (cited in Volting 2001: 45 n. 67): “John flies like an eagle above the clouds of human weakness and gazes most keenly and steadily with the eye of his heart at the light of unchangeable truth.” On John as fisherman, son of thunder, beloved disciple, elder and seer, apostle in second-century interpretation, saint depicted as an eagle, and hero and icon, see Culpepper 1994.

6 Augustine (In Iohannis Evangelium 124.1 [cited in Volting 2001: 51 n. 79]) already acknowledges the difficulty of understanding the import of Jesus’ words. While presupposing Peter’s martyrdom and John’s dying a natural death, he follows an allegorical line of interpretation, seeing the two apostles as representing, respectively, the vita activa (“active life”) and the vita contemplativa (“contemplative life”), with the latter being superior to the former (Volting 2001: 51–53). Literal interpretations are advocated by Bede and Rupert of Deutz (Volting 2001: 53 n. 83). Some patristic and medieval authors also seek to alleviate the apparent difficulty that Jesus predicted that both sons of Zebedee would drink from his bitter cup (Matt. 20:23; see references in Volting 2001: 55).

Barnabas

12 598n13
16:5 304n30

1 Clement

59:4 304n30

2 Clement

6:9 435n67

13 Note also that patristic interpreters read Isa. 65:2 with reference to the crucifixion (Barn. 12; Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 35; Irenaeus, Epid. 79; see Barrett 1978: 585).

30 Further ancient references are found in BDAG 675, including 1 Clem. 59:4 (psalm quotation) and Barn. 16:5 (an eschatological reference, possibly adducing 1 Enoch). The term is also used in Let. Arist. 112 and Josephus, Ant. 2.2.4 §18. Note also the messianic reference in Ps. Sol. 17:40.

30 Further ancient references are found in BDAG 675, including 1 Clem. 59:4 (psalm quotation) and Barn. 16:5 (an eschatological reference, possibly adducing 1 Enoch). The term is also used in Let. Arist. 112 and Josephus, Ant. 2.2.4 §18. Note also the messianic reference in Ps. Sol. 17:40.

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

Clement of AlexandriaHypotyposeis

in toto 2n5

Stromata

7.2 459n54

The Rich Man's Salvation

25.7 435n67

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon's work is given extensive coverage in Origen's commentary on John's Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John's Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάραξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that “the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel's] use”; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges “the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

5 The essays on history and theology in the Fourth Gospel and on the question of the Fourth Gospel's authorship by Morris (1969: 65–292) still repay careful study. For an interesting application of Clement's statement, see Thielman 1991: 183 in the context of his entire article. The reference to Clement's Hypotyposeis is found in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14. See also Thompson (2002: 2), who rightly notes, “Whatever Clement meant in calling John ‘a spiritual Gospel,’ it is doubtful that he meant to contrast ‘facts’ in the modern sense and ‘interpretation.’ ... [A] ‘spiritual’ Gospel gives the inner meaning of an event or reality and, hence, its truth must be spiritually discerned.” Thompson rightly maintains that “the modern view” that calls into question the historicity of any item in John that “stands in the service of his theological or interpretive agenda” constitutes “a very strange way to imagine that theology works, and perhaps could only have been thought of by people actually not doing theology.” Thompson (2002: 3) proceeds to call for greater sophistication in biblical scholars' philosophy of history. Carson (1991: 29) similarly disavows attributing to Clement a dichotomy between “spiritual” and “historical”; he suggests that “spiritual” may mean “allegorical” or “symbol-laden.”

54 The disciples' role as servants is intimated in 13:16 and implied in 13:13. On friends, see commentary at 15:13 and 15:14. The contrast between servants and sons is also found in Gal. 4:1–7 and Heb. 3:5–6. There are some interesting parallels between the present verse and John 8:31–36 (noted by Bultmann 1971: 543; Schnackenburg 1990: 3.110). The distinction between φίλοι (philoî, friends) and δούλοι (douloi, servants) is also found in Gnosticism and the mystery religions. See also Clement of Alexandria, Stromata 7.2.

Cyril of Jerusalem

Catechesis

14.5 556n88

Didache

5:2 435n67

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23).

88 The location of the tomb is probably on the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (built by Constantine) rather than the popular “garden tomb” (Taylor 1998: 180, referring also to Barkay 1986). The vestiges of a nearby garden were still visible in Cyril of Jerusalem’s day (Catechesis 14.5 [ca. A.D. 350]).

67 The term παράκλητος does not occur in the LXX (but see Aquila and Theodotion on Job 16:2: παράκλητοι), and elsewhere in the NT it appears only in 1 John 2:1, there with reference to Jesus “our advocate” with God the Father. For a survey of all known examples from the fourth century B.C. to the third century A.D., see Grayston (1981), who concludes that παράκλητος was a more general term that was sometimes (but not always) used in legal contexts, meaning “supporter” or “sponsor.” The closest contemporaneous usage is found in Philo, who uses the expression to convey the notion of rendering general help, be it by giving advice or support (with the latter meaning being the more common). In later rabbinic usage, the term in its transliterated form is

8:1 537n83
16:5 468n27

Eusebius

Ecclesiastical History

3.1 599n17
3.1.1 8
3.20.6 528n37
3.23.3–4 7n18
3.24.5–14 7n17

used alongside the transliterated term for a Greek expression meaning “advocate” (συνήγορος, synēgoros). Patristic references include Did. 5:2; 2 Clem. 6:9; and Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man’s Salvation 25.7 (for a study of the Johannine Paraclete in the church fathers, see Casarella 1983). Betz (1963) unconvincingly argues for a Qumran background (the archangel Michael; cf. Shafaat [1980–81], who likewise adduces DSS parallels; and Leaney [1972], who says that the Paraclete is God himself); Windisch (1968) advances the hardly more plausible hypothesis that the Paraclete is “a kind of angel ... in human form,” be it a prophet or teacher; G. Johnston (1970) unsuccessfully proposes that the παράκλητος is an active divine power that has become embodied in certain leaders of the apostolic church, such as the Fourth Evangelist (see the critiques by R. Brown [1967: 126; 1971: 268–70], for whom the Paraclete is the “alter ego of Jesus” [cited in Smalley 1996: 297]; cf. Burge 1987); Bultmann (1971: 566–72) views the concept as a Johannine appropriation of his gnostic source’s figure of “helper”; Riesenfeld (1972) postulates a sapiential provenance, which is equally unlikely; Boring (1978) claims that the Paraclete is an angel demythologized as the “spirit of prophecy.” For a discussion of the Paraclete as part of the Fourth Gospel’s lawsuit motif (esp. in 15:26–16:15), see Lincoln 2000: 110–23, esp. 113–14. Billington (1995) appropriately stresses the Paraclete’s role in mission. If the disciples are to witness to Jesus, they must understand the significance of his coming; witness to Jesus and the Paraclete’s ministry thus are inseparable (15:26–27; 16:8–11; 20:21–23). 83 Cf. Did. 8:1; Mart. Pol. 7:1. See Torrey 1931 (including his critique of Str-B 2:834–85 on pp. 235–36); Higgins 1954–55: 206–9; Story 1989: 318; Blomberg 1987: 177–78; Morris 1995: 708; Ridderbos 1997: 606.

27 According to Matt. 26:31, the first words that Jesus spoke after going from the supper to the Mount of Olives were, “This night you will all fall away [σκανδαλισθήσεσθε] because of me.” For Johannine parallels, see John 6:61; 1 John 2:10; Rev. 2:14; cf. Did. 16:5.

17 Scorpiace 15 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 214 n. 666). Blomberg (2002: 278) also cites Acts Pet. 37–39 and Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.1.

37 The answer given by the grandchildren of Jude, Jesus’ half-brother, at a trial before Domitian echoes Jesus’ words (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.20.6 [cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 166]). Jesus’ description of the nature of his kingdom is reminiscent of certain passages in Daniel (e.g., 2:44; 7:14, 27).

18 Irenaeus, Haer. 2.22.5; 3.3.4 (quoted by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.23.3–4), places John’s death during the reign of Trajan (A.D. 98–117); Jerome (Vir. ill. 9) says that John died in the sixty-eighth year after Jesus’ passion (i.e., A.D. 98 or 101). Regarding John being the last to write his Gospel, see Irenaeus, Haer. 3.1.1; Clement, cited by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7; and Eusebius himself, Hist. eccl. 3.24.7. See Carson 1991: 83.

17 One tricky piece of evidence concerns the second-century writer Papias (cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.4–5), a contemporary of Polycarp, who, in turn, was a disciple of the apostle John (on the date of Papias, see Yarbrough 1983; Munck 1959). Papias (at least to Eusebius) seems to refer to two separate Johns, the apostle and a “John the elder.” On this basis some have conjectured that the latter, rather than the former, wrote the Fourth Gospel. However, there is no need to drive a wedge between the two references to John in the passage in question. To the contrary, John may be designated “the elder” in the latter part of the quotation precisely because he is grouped with the elders mentioned earlier in the same passage. For a sound critique of the “John the elder” hypothesis, see Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 141–43. Keener (2003: 95–98) likewise challenges the reliability of Eusebius’s interpretation of Papias, owing to the former’s agenda of seeking to denigrate the Apocalypse. Keener (2003: 102–3) also includes an insightful discussion of the plausibility of John writing the Gospel at an advanced age. See also the works cited in Bauckham 1993: 27 n. 17 and the important essay by Hill (1998), who adduces from Eusebius’s (Hist. eccl. 3.24.5–13, esp. 11) reference to Papias (without naming him) that Papias held John the apostle to be the author of the Fourth Gospel (contra Bauckham 1993; Hengel 1989a; note my review of Hengel’s more extensive 1993 German monograph on the subject, Köstenberger 1996). For studies of the external evidence regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, see Bauckham 1993: 24 n. 1.

18 Irenaeus, Haer. 2.22.5; 3.3.4 (quoted by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.23.3–4), places John’s death during the reign of Trajan (A.D. 98–117); Jerome (Vir. ill. 9) says that John died in the sixty-eighth year after Jesus’ passion (i.e., A.D. 98 or 101). Regarding John being the last to write his Gospel, see Irenaeus, Haer. 3.1.1; Clement, cited by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7; and Eusebius himself, Hist. eccl. 3.24.7. See Carson 1991: 83.

17 One tricky piece of evidence concerns the second-century writer Papias (cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.4–5), a contemporary of Polycarp, who, in turn, was a disciple of the apostle John (on the date of Papias, see Yarbrough 1983; Munck 1959). Papias (at least to Eusebius) seems to refer to two separate Johns, the apostle and a “John the elder.” On this basis some have conjectured that the latter, rather than the former, wrote the Fourth Gospel. However, there is no need to drive a wedge between the two references to John in the passage in question. To the contrary, John may be designated “the elder” in the latter part of the quotation precisely because he is grouped with the elders mentioned earlier in the same passage. For a sound critique of the “John the elder” hypothesis, see Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 141–43. Keener (2003: 95–98) likewise challenges the reliability of Eusebius’s interpretation of Papias, owing to the former’s agenda of seeking to denigrate the Apocalypse. Keener (2003: 102–3) also includes an insightful discussion of the plausibility of John writing the Gospel at an advanced age. See also the works cited in Bauckham 1993: 27 n. 17 and the important essay by Hill (1998), who adduces from Eusebius’s (Hist. eccl. 3.24.5–13, esp. 11) reference to Papias (without naming him) that Papias held John the apostle to be the author of the Fourth Gospel (contra Bauckham 1993; Hengel 1989a; note my review of Hengel’s more extensive 1993 German monograph on the subject, Köstenberger 1996). For studies of the external evidence regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, see Bauckham 1993: 24 n. 1.

17 One tricky piece of evidence concerns the second-century writer Papias (cited in Eusebius,

3.39.17 247, 247n8
4.15.4 542n3
6.14 2n5
6.14.7 8n18, 8n20, 16

Hist. eccl. 3.39.4–5), a contemporary of Polycarp, who, in turn, was a disciple of the apostle John (on the date of Papias, see Yarbrough 1983; Munck 1959). Papias (at least to Eusebius) seems to refer to two separate Johns, the apostle and a “John the elder.” On this basis some have conjectured that the latter, rather than the former, wrote the Fourth Gospel. However, there is no need to drive a wedge between the two references to John in the passage in question. To the contrary, John may be designated “the elder” in the latter part of the quotation precisely because he is grouped with the elders mentioned earlier in the same passage. For a sound critique of the “John the elder” hypothesis, see Carson, Moo, and Morris 1992: 141–43. Keener (2003: 95–98) likewise challenges the reliability of Eusebius’s interpretation of Papias, owing to the former’s agenda of seeking to denigrate the Apocalypse. Keener (2003: 102–3) also includes an insightful discussion of the plausibility of John writing the Gospel at an advanced age. See also the works cited in Bauckham 1993: 27 n. 17 and the important essay by Hill (1998), who adduces from Eusebius’s (Hist. eccl. 3.24.5–13, esp. 11) reference to Papias (without naming him) that Papias held John the apostle to be the author of the Fourth Gospel (contra Bauckham 1993; Hengel 1989a; note my review of Hengel’s more extensive 1993 German monograph on the subject, Köstenberger 1996). For studies of the external evidence regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, see Bauckham 1993: 24 n. 1.

8 The attribution, recorded by Eusebius and reported by Papias (Hist. eccl. 3.39.17), of a similar pericope to a contemporary source probably refers to the sinful woman in Luke 7:36–50 rather than to the adulterous woman considered here (Petersen 1997: 196–97; contra Burge 1984: 143).
3 Josephus reports that a certain Jesus, son of Ananias, was brought before Albinus and “flayed to the bone with scourges” (J.W. 6.5.3 §304). Eusebius writes that certain martyrs at the time of Polycarp were “lacerated by scourges even to the innermost veins and arteries, so that the hidden inward parts of the body, both their bowels and their members, were exposed to view” (Hist. eccl. 4.15.4).

5 The essays on history and theology in the Fourth Gospel and on the question of the Fourth Gospel’s authorship by Morris (1969: 65–292) still repay careful study. For an interesting application of Clement’s statement, see Thielman 1991: 183 in the context of his entire article. The reference to Clement’s Hypotyposeis is found in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14. See also Thompson (2002: 2), who rightly notes, “Whatever Clement meant in calling John ‘a spiritual Gospel,’ it is doubtful that he meant to contrast ‘facts’ in the modern sense and ‘interpretation.’ ... [A] ‘spiritual’ Gospel gives the inner meaning of an event or reality and, hence, its truth must be spiritually discerned.” Thompson rightly maintains that “the modern view” that calls into question the historicity of any item in John that “stands in the service of his theological or interpretive agenda” constitutes “a very strange way to imagine that theology works, and perhaps could only have been thought of by people actually not doing theology.” Thompson (2002: 3) proceeds to call for greater sophistication in biblical scholars’ philosophy of history. Carson (1991: 29) similarly disavows attributing to Clement a dichotomy between “spiritual” and “historical”; he suggests that “spiritual” may mean “allegorical” or “symbol-laden.”

18 Irenaeus, Haer. 2.22.5; 3.3.4 (quoted by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.23.3–4), places John’s death during the reign of Trajan (A.D. 98–117); Jerome (Vir. ill. 9) says that John died in the sixty-

Praeparatio evangelica

13.12.11, frg. 5 185n47

HippolytusRefutation of All Heresies

7.22 17n28

eighth year after Jesus' passion (i.e., A.D. 98 or 101). Regarding John being the last to write his Gospel, see Irenaeus, Haer. 3.1.1; Clement, cited by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7; and Eusebius himself, Hist. eccl. 3.24.7. See Carson 1991: 83.

20 Very few would argue for a date prior to A.D. 70, as do J. A. T. Robinson 1976: 254–85 (but see the refutation in Kerr 2002: 19–25; see also Carson 1991: 82–86); Morris 1995: 25–30 (with reference to Cribbs 1970; Torrey 1936: x–xi); and Wallace 1990 (but see the present commentary at 5:2). However, the cumulative weight of the following internal evidence must be judged to favor a post–A.D. 70 date (cf. Croteau 2003): the references to the Sea of Tiberias in 6:1 and 21:1; Thomas's confession of Jesus as “my Lord and my God” in 20:28 (contra emperor worship in time of Domitian?); the reference to Peter's martyrdom (21:19); and the lack of reference to the Sadducees (Schlatter 1948: 44; though see the caution in Carson 1991: 84)—not to mention the comparative ease with which the Fourth Evangelist equates Jesus with God (e.g., 1:1, 14; 10:30; 20:28; see Carson 1991: 85, though note his caveats on p. 84) or external evidence such as Clement of Alexandria's statement, cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7, “Last of all, John, perceiving that the external facts had been made plain [in the Synoptics] ... composed a spiritual gospel.” This is true especially since the major pieces of evidence cited in support of a pre–A.D. 70 date—the lack of reference to the destruction of the temple and the use of a present-tense verb in 5:2 to refer to the Sheep Gate pool—are not determinative and are capable of alternative explanations (see, e.g., Schlatter 1948: 23–24).

21 See Suetonius, Domitian 10.1 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 176). Though instances are known in which a condemned man carried the notice around his neck or had it carried in front of him—such as “Attalus the Christian” during Marcus Aurelius's reign in the amphitheater in Lyons (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.44)—there is little or no evidence for the custom of affixing it to a cross.

47 See Gen. Rab. 11.10; Exod. Rab. 30.9, citing Isa. 6:3; Jer. 23:24. The Letter of Aristeas (second century B.C.) says that God “is continually at work in everything” (210). See also Eusebius, Praeparatio evangelica 13.12.11, frg. 5 (cited in Boring, Berger, and Colpe 1995: 267).

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon's work is given extensive coverage in Origen's commentary on John's Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John's Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάραξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26)

IrenaeusAgainst Heresies

2.22.5 7n18, 602

3.1.1 8n18

3.1.2 7, 8

3.3.4 7n18, 602

also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that “the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel’s] use”; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges “the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon’s work is given extensive coverage in Origen’s commentary on John’s Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John’s Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάραξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that “the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel’s] use”; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges “the fact that in no extant ‘orthodox’ writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel.”

18 Irenaeus, Haer. 2.22.5; 3.3.4 (quoted by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.23.3–4), places John’s death during the reign of Trajan (A.D. 98–117); Jerome (Vir. ill. 9) says that John died in the sixty-eighth year after Jesus’ passion (i.e., A.D. 98 or 101). Regarding John being the last to write his Gospel, see Irenaeus, Haer. 3.1.1; Clement, cited by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7; and Eusebius himself, Hist. eccl. 3.24.7. See Carson 1991: 83.

18 Irenaeus, Haer. 2.22.5; 3.3.4 (quoted by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.23.3–4), places John’s death during the reign of Trajan (A.D. 98–117); Jerome (Vir. ill. 9) says that John died in the sixty-eighth year after Jesus’ passion (i.e., A.D. 98 or 101). Regarding John being the last to write his Gospel, see Irenaeus, Haer. 3.1.1; Clement, cited by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7; and Eusebius himself, Hist. eccl. 3.24.7. See Carson 1991: 83.

18 Irenaeus, Haer. 2.22.5; 3.3.4 (quoted by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.23.3–4), places John’s death during the reign of Trajan (A.D. 98–117); Jerome (Vir. ill. 9) says that John died in the sixty-eighth year after Jesus’ passion (i.e., A.D. 98 or 101). Regarding John being the last to write his Gospel, see Irenaeus, Haer. 3.1.1; Clement, cited by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7; and Eusebius himself, Hist. eccl. 3.24.7. See Carson 1991: 83.

Epideixis

79 598n13

Jerome

De viris illustribus

9 7n18, 602n9

Justin Martyr

1 Apology

26.1–5 269n86

35 598n13

35.1 61

61.4–5 17n28

13 Note also that patristic interpreters read Isa. 65:2 with reference to the crucifixion (Barn. 12; Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 35; Irenaeus, Epid. 79; see Barrett 1978: 585).

18 Irenaeus, Haer. 2.22.5; 3.3.4 (quoted by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.23.3–4), places John's death during the reign of Trajan (A.D. 98–117); Jerome (Vir. ill. 9) says that John died in the sixty-eighth year after Jesus' passion (i.e., A.D. 98 or 101). Regarding John being the last to write his Gospel, see Irenaeus, Haer. 3.1.1; Clement, cited by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7; and Eusebius himself, Hist. eccl. 3.24.7. See Carson 1991: 83.

9 Volting (2001: 48 n. 74) also cites Jerome (Vir. ill. 9), according to whom John "died sixty-eight years after the passion of the Lord" (assuming a crucifixion date of A.D. 33, this would be A.D. 101). Volting (2001: 48–59) chronicles the emergence of legendary materials surrounding the mysterious reference to John "remaining" in 21:22.

86 See Acts 8:9–11; Justin, 1 Apol. 26.1–5; b. Sanh. 43a.

13 Note also that patristic interpreters read Isa. 65:2 with reference to the crucifixion (Barn. 12; Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 35; Irenaeus, Epid. 79; see Barrett 1978: 585).

28 See also the gnostic Gospel of Truth and P.Eger. 2 (cited in Pollard 1970: 25). Concerning Basilides, see Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.22, 27; Heracleon's work is given extensive coverage in Origen's commentary on John's Gospel (see Bruce 1988: 128). Westcott (1896: i–ii, 184, 292) and Luthardt (1875: 96, 100–101), besides referring to Basilides, also discuss the possible acquaintance with John's Gospel reflected in Clement of Rome (2 Clem. 9:5 [ca. A.D. 150]: ἐγένετο σάραξ; cf. John 1:14), the Clementine Homilies (19.22; cf. John 9:1–3), and other patristic writings. Sloyan (1996: 130) cites an apparent reference to John 3:3, 5 in Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61.4–5 (Carson 1991: 25; though see J. N. Sanders 1943: 27–28; Pollard 1970: 39; Osborn 1973: 137–38; Skarsaune 1987: 105–6; and Pryor 1992b). Carson (1991: 26) also mentions Tatian, Claudius Apollinaris, and Athenagoras (of Athens). Bauckham (1993) adds Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (late second century). J. N. Sanders (1943: 86), on the other hand, maintains that "the Apostolic Fathers cannot be said to produce any certain traces of its [the Fourth Gospel's] use"; Pollard (1970: 24; cf. Bultmann 1971: 12) likewise acknowledges "the fact that in no extant 'orthodox' writing from before A.D. 170 is there any explicit quotation from the Gospel."

Dialogue with Trypho

8.4 235n33

8.49 69

Martyrdom of Polycarp

7:1 537n83

13:1 469n33

17:3 332

Origen

Commentarii in evangelium Joannis

13.54–56 168n4

Tertullian

Apology

21.18 539n90

39 423n9

33 For OT information regarding the origins of the Messiah, see Mic. 5:2; Dan. 7:13. For apocalyptic references, see 1 Enoch 48:6; 2 Esdr. (4 Ezra) 13:51–52 (these may be post-Christian). See also Justin, Dial. 8.4 (cited in Kruse 2003: 188).

83 Cf. Did. 8:1; Mart. Pol. 7:1. See Torrey 1931 (including his critique of Str-B 2:834–85 on pp. 235–36); Higgins 1954–55: 206–9; Story 1989: 318; Blomberg 1987: 177–78; Morris 1995: 708; Ridderbos 1997: 606.

33 For example, Acts 5:33–40; cf. m. Sanh. 9.6. According to Josephus, the Jewish authorities (i.e., the high priest Ananus II) were responsible for the stoning death of James the brother of Jesus in A.D. 62 (Ant. 20.9.1 §200). The Jews displayed similar zeal at the martyrdom of Polycarp, John's disciple (Mart. Pol. 13:1).

4 One school of interpretation identifies πατρίς (patris, homeland, hometown) in 4:44 with Jerusalem (so Barrett 1978: 246; Dodd 1953: 352; 1963: 238–41; Meeks 1966; 1967: 39–40; see, much earlier, Origen, Commentarii in evangelium Joannis 13.54–56, cited in van Belle 1998: 30). However, see the critiques by W. Davies (1974: 321–31) and Stimpfle (1992: 89) as summarized by van Belle (1998: 30–32). The Galilee/Nazareth explanation is found already in Augustine (cited by van Belle 1998: 33) and is defended by Stimpfle (1992: 86–96 [followed by van Belle 1998: 27–44]) and others (see van Belle 1998: 32–33; see also Ridderbos 1997: 174; Beasley-Murray 1999: 73; Schnackenburg 1990: 1.463). Still others think that both Galilee and Judea are in view (Carson 1991: 235–36; Burge 2000: 151–52; Witherington 1995: 126; W. Davies 1974: 321–31).

90 So, rightly, Carson 1991: 606. See also Schnackenburg (1990: 3.267), who suggests that the evangelist “intentionally allowed the uncertainty to remain.” The present statement is echoed by Tertullian, who says that the Jews extorted from Pilate a sentence giving Jesus up “to them to be crucified” (Apol. 21.18, italics added).

9 Cf. 13:1; 15:13; see also 1 John 3:23; 4:7–8, 11–12, 19–21. That the early Christians indeed did love one another is attested in the famous statement, quoting observers of Christians,

De pudicitia

22 598n12

Scorpiace

15 599n17

Theophilus of Antioch

To Autolycus

2.22 16

recorded by the church father Tertullian: “See how they love one another” (Apol. 39). Regarding the Jews, on the other hand, the Roman historian Tacitus wrote, “The Jews are extremely loyal toward one another, and always ready to show compassion, but toward every other people they feel only hate and enmity” (Historiae 5.5; cf. Josephus, J.W. 2.8.14 §166). Keener (2003: 926) contends that “[l]ike the Qumran community, John’s outlook is sectarian and dualistic,” but he then proceeds to affirm that this does not negate love for those outside the community. It is unclear to me how, in light of the obvious missionary concern for the world evidenced in this Gospel, Keener can still maintain (even in a qualified sense) that “John’s outlook is sectarian.”

12 This is illustrated by the following passages: Epictetus, Diatribai 3.26.22; Seneca, Ad Marciam de consolatione 20.3; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates romanae 7.69; Tertullian, De pudicitia 22 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 194). See Bauer (1925: 232) and Haenchen (1984: 2.226–27), who also note passages in Artemidorus and Plautus; Beasley-Murray 1999: 408–9; Hengel 1977: esp. chapter 4.

17 Scorpiace 15 (cited in Köstenberger 2002c: 214 n. 666). Blomberg (2002: 278) also cites Acts Pet. 37–39 and Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.1.